I respectfully submit to the right honorable gentleman that, even with regard to the point he puts so frankly and pleasantly in respect to the control of the Murray, there is the greatest possible conflict of opinion between authorities. I believe it would be difficult to find a deliberative body in which there are more able or more competent legal authorities than there are in this Convention, and our experience has taught us that, unless we make clear what we mean in the most unmistakeable manner, the subtlety of the legal mind leads to the greatest and widest differences as to the construction which may be fairly put upon what we resolve. What I rose to urge was this: We have no right in this Convention, if we desire federation and wish to display—as I am sure we do—a true federal spirit, to put our foot down and say—"We stand on our present rights"; because, if that were done by all of us, there would be no question to be handed over to the Federal Parliament. Each of the states has now a right to the absolute control of our military forces, and if a war broke out, and an invasion of Australia were threatened, each state has a right to say that each of the defence forces in Australia shall remain within its own state territory. But we are willing to give up that right for the obvious reason that it is to secure a greater advantage—the unity of our forces in the event of danger. Our postal system now is entirely within the control of each of the states, which can make such arrangements as they choose for their own postal accommodation. But, in order to secure a further right, a greater privilege, we give up the absolute legal control over our own postage. And so in connexion with any question you can conceive. We are here not to stand on our rights merely, but to secure that, in the changed conditions that must ensue, whatever conflicts arise between the interests of the states shall be considered fairly by a tribunal properly constituted, and representing in a fair proportion each of the interests involved. I would submit respectfully that we are giving up a right in connexion with this river question—a very important right—one of several important rights.

Mr. LYNE. -

What right are you giving up?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I am talking collectively of the states of Australia. I prefer, in discussing any question in this Convention, to look upon myself and the other representatives here rather as representatives of Australia endeavouring to arrive at a conclusion in the interests of Australia than as representatives of separate states fighting for their own hand, and striving to secure the interests of those states without regard to the interests of other states involved. I use the word "Australia," but if the honorable member (Mr. Lyne) asks me to be more definite, I say that South Australia, in this conflict—if she join the Federation without some security, not that the waters of the Murray shall be handed over to her, but that the control of the waters shall be handed over to a fair tribunal, in which her interests shall be considered—is giving up some rights which she now possesses. For if we do not federate, and it appears to the people of South Australia that New South Wales or Victoria is using the waters of the Murray in such a way as interferes with and prejudices their interests, they can appeal, as we all can, to the Imperial Parliament, by whose authority we govern ourselves. But if we federate, and refer the whole control to the Federal High Court, we shall, in a measure at any rate, if not absolutely, deprive ourselves of that right. Honorable members know that in the last resort, whenever every other course has failed, and injustice is being done by one country to another, there is the right of resort to arms. It is a right that I hope it will never be necessary to exercise beneath the Southern Cross, but it is a right that at present exists, and that will be removed by federation. One of the reasons most strongly urged by myself, and, I believe, by some of the candidates for the Federal Convention, why we should unite in bonds of friendship and justice, was lest at some time in the future these colonies, peopled from the same stock, from the same race, speaking the same language, and having the same aspirations generally, might be led by the differences that must inevitably arise into war. Now, I say that this question is so grave—it involves such important issues—that the people of South Australia are justified in viewing with alarm the giving up of a right or a power that they now possess to compel fair treatment without obtaining some guarantee of fair treatment in its place. The honorable members representing New South Wales, and more particularly Mr. McMillan and the Right Hon. the Premier of that colony, have repeatedly spoken of the handing over of their right to control their own waters as involving the handing over of their right to control their own lands. In some respects they have already handed over the control of their own lands. They have given to the Federal Parliament powers of direct taxation, which may involve the imposition of taxes or the levying of tolls on the lands of all Australia, including those of New South Wales, and surely it is not to be considered a dangerous proceeding to say that the Federal Parliament shall stand by as an umpire or an arbitrator in the event of conflicting interests arising, and one side feeling rightly or wrongly that it has been unfairly treated. Now, on the point that if Mr. Isaacs amendment is carried the construction of extensive irrigation or conservation works will be jeopardized, it seems to me that it ought to be very easy to make some provision giving a guarantee against unfairness to New South Wales, and a guarantee of perfect certainty to persons desiring to undertake works in connexion with water conservation and irrigation. There should be no difficulty in providing some means analogous to those given in the Constitutions of the various states. Acts of Parliament are passed authorizing the construction of certain works, and that gives the promoters a sufficient security. If that objection is one that weighs strongly with the people of New South Wales, it can readily be removed. In conclusion, I would say that the length of time that this question has occupied proves—not that the time has been wasted, but that the question is of extreme importance. Honorable members representing New South Wales have in a veiled—indeed, not in a very veiled way—threatened that if anything is done to in any way interfere with their absolute right to do right or wrong, they, or their colony, will withdraw from the Convention. I do not believe there is anything in that threat. The people of New South Wales are not so selfish as they have been represented to be, and I think they have such confidence in the tribunal to be created called the Federal Parliament, and which will represent them in fair proportion, and the other colonies of the group in fair proportion, that they will hand over anything, not to the management but to the fair arbitrament, in the event of disputes as to whether justice is being done, to the Federal Parliament. But if they will not, and that is a bar to federation, have we not to consider, the people of South Australia also?

Mr. LYNE. -

A handful, comparatively.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

There was a time when the most populous of the colonies was only a handful. We are very, very young yet, and it is impossible to say, from the circumstances of our development, which of the colonies will hereafter be the most populous. South Australia, with its much larger area, may be more populous than New South Wales; but I prefer, in discussing a question of right, not to consider mere population, but the justice of the proposal that is made. I earnestly hope that before this question is decided some means will be provided by which a guarantee of fair play can be given to South Australia and to New South Wales. I trust that the representatives of New South Wales do not ask for more than that. Surely they do not ask for the right to act unfairly if they choose. They may be perfectly justified in maintaining that right now when we are unfederated, but it should have no place in the discussion of a federal question such as that we are now, considering. The right to do wrong if they choose ought not to be bestowed under a Constitution by which the whole of the colonies are to be blended into one for federal purposes.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I only want to say that my object in dividing my amendment was not for the purpose—I am sure that that would not be suspected for a moment—of subordinating irrigation in any way to navigation, but of relieving some honorable members of a difficulty which they had intimated to me they suffered under in regard to the vote they should give. There is, however immense force in what the Premier of Victoria said, that the adoption of that course might cause increased embarrassment, and, with the permission of the committee, I would submit the amendment as a whole. It would then be left to any honorable member to move the omission of any words or to alter any of the words in it, and it would give honorable members the freest choice in regard to the exercise of their vote. As to the uncertainty of the position, there is no uncertainty as between irrigation and navigation. Irrigation takes precedence under all circumstances. The only element of uncertainty is in regard to the quantity of water each state may take relatively to any other state, and I should be willing to accept an amendment that this should be made certain by the proportions being determined by an Act of Parliament. They could not then be altered except by another Act of Parliament. I do not, however, think that the question of uncertainty is important, because in America this sort of thing is done every day. Canal or ditch companies, as they are called, construct immense works, and have their relative rights determined.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment now before the Chair is that submitted by Mr. Symon. Does the honorable member desire to withdraw it?

Mr. SYMON. -

No.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Then Mr. Isaacs cannot put his amendment as a whole.

Mr. McMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I have a proposal to submit to unite the two amendments, which would probably meet the wishes of all the members of the New South Wales delegation. It will retain the first portion of Mr. Symon's sub-section, and a portion also of Mr. Isaacs' amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Unless Mr. Symon withdraws his amendment, it must, be put.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I should, like to say a word before you adopt that course, because the condition of things has considerably changed. I sincerely hope that we shall feel it incumbent upon us as a matter of duty, when considering any amendment, not to re-open again the whole subject, which we have been debating for four days with the utmost exhaustion of intellect and of physique. In relation to matters so complicated, whatever the absolute rights and wrongs may be, this Convention cannot settle them, and probably no tribunal could settle them, satisfactorily. The better way then would be to confine our remarks to the specific amendment under the consideration of the committee. I would, at the same time, thank Mr. Trenwith for his exceedingly able and generous defence of the position that South Australia has taken up, and I agree with him that the sentiment he emphatically gave his adhesion to - that we should look upon this matter as citizens of Australia, rather than as people coming from diverse states, ought to govern the solution of the question. We who represent South Australia, as well as the honorable members who represent New South Wales, must not, however, forget the old saying of a member of the Swiss Parliament that, after all, his shirt was nearer to him than his coat. We may be excused if we show a certain amount of warmth in vindicating our position and asserting its justice. Sir George Turner's speech this morning came to us like a "bolt from the blue." It shattered, absolutely shattered, Mr. Isaacs' amendment. It took the whole claim from it that it possessed any virtue whatever. I would ask honorable members to consider for a moment what the position is. My right honorable friend said that we were really fighting a shadow, and he set about reducing the amendment to the same shadowy position which the question occupied in his mind. Just consider what the amendment is. We are to leave in the Constitution the control of the navigability of rivers. That is all very well.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Will the honorable member take his seat for a minute? I think the time has now come when the standing orders should be strictly applied, and the remarks of honorable members confined to the immediate question before the Chair. The immediate question is the introduction of the words "without limiting sub-section (1)." We have not come to any amendment suggested by Sir George Turner yet.

Mr. SYMON. -

May I point out, Sir Richard Baker, that I am advocating my own amendment, and, in doing so, perhaps you will allow me to combat the views opposed to it? I do not see, with all submission, how I can submit my amendment to the consideration of the committee, unless I point out the circumstances which render it impossible for me to withdraw it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Allow me to point out to the honorable member that if he permits me to do as I wish, he can still move his amendment. He will still have precedence. It is only to relieve myself and some others from a difficult position into which I have got, partly from the views of my honorable friend.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I desire to explain that when I said I wanted to propose a conjunction of two portions of these proposals, one of Mr. Symon's, and one of Mr. Isaacs', I did not refer to the small amendment of Mr. Isaacs' at the beginning.

Mr. SYMON. -

Sir, I do not know what the standing orders are coming to, but if there is to be a debate on another amendment in the middle of my few remarks-

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment now is to insert the words "without limiting sub-section (1)." That is the only question before the Chair.

Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) will understand that I am perfectly willing to accommodate him if possible. I merely wish it understood that, under the altered conditions of things, I do not hold myself open to withdraw my amendment as originally proposed. If it would convenience the honorable member, I have no objection to withdraw it temporarily.
Mr. Symon's and Mr. Isaacs' amendments were then temporarily withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Mr. Isaacs now moves the whole of his proposal (see p. 418).

Mr. SYMON. -
Then I desire to move my amendment.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
Before the honorable member moves his amendment, I would like to be perfectly clear about the words, "The navigability," at the beginning of Mr. Isaacs' amendment. I want to understand what the honorable and learned member has in view by using the words "The navigability." Do I understand that those two words would give power to the Federal Parliament to do this, we will say-to appoint a trust for a particular river which falls within the wording of this sub-section, for the maintenance of navigability, and with the duty of maintaining the navigability of any particular stream, which falls within these words? Would this give the Federal Parliament power to do anything of that sort? Would it give the Federal Parliament physical jurisdiction over the waters, as opposed to the general power of preventing anything being done which is unfederal, or contrary to the terms of the Constitution?

Mr. ISAACS. -
As I understand, it would give to the federal power not only the right to prevent obstructions, but, as in America, to improve the navigability of a river; but not the right of interfering with any streams but those rivers specifically mentioned.

Mr. REID. -
That clears up the difficulty I was in, and it also points out very strongly the anomaly that would arise under the version of my honorable and learned friend. Under that version it would be possible for the Federal Parliament to conduct works for the navigation of rivers falling within these words.

Mr. ISAACS. -
On the river itself.

Mr. REID. -
On the river itself. But an equally important power, the power of conducting works for the improvement of the entrances of harbors which are not rivers would remain within the provincial control.

Mr. ISAACS. -
No.
Mr. REID. -
Surely "The navigability of rivers" is an expression which does not necessarily include the navigability of harbors?

Mr. ISAACS. -
There is another sub-section with reference to navigation and shipping which would include that.

Mr. REID. -
If that sub-section would include the navigability of harbors, what is in the sub-section that does not include the navigability of rivers? How can those terms be held to be so narrow that, whilst they include harbors, they do not include rivers? and, if they include rivers, there is no necessity for this

Mr. ISAACS. -
The honorable member has lost sight of what I endeavoured to emphasize-my desire to place irrigation before navigation, and without this subsection you cannot do that.

Mr. REID. -
Then I understand the position.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I rise to a point of order. I do not like raising points of order, as I am exceedingly good-natured; but I thought that I was in the middle of a speech.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The honorable member (Mr. Symon) sat down and the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) rose.

Mr. SYMON. -
I thought I sat down merely in order to enable you to settle a point of order; but still I always prefer to hear my honorable friend's voice to my own.

Mr. REID. -
Sir Richard Baker, I know that when you allow me to address you, I am in order in doing so. I know that you keep us in very proper order. I understand from the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) now that, after all, these words are not so much necessary in this place, as to clear up doubts.

Mr. ISAACS. -
There are several reasons; another is that this limits it to rivers which are not purely and solely state rivers. That is an important consideration.

Mr. REID. -
Does it, really?
Mr. ISAACS. -

Undoubtedly.

Mr. REID. -

Are not rivers, for instance, on the coast of New South Wales, "navigable for trade and commerce with other countries"? I cannot conceive a river on the coast of Australia which won't fall within the definition of rivers which are, "in fact permanently or intermittently navigable for trade and commerce with other countries."

Mr. ISAACS. -

Is the Lachlan within that definition?

Mr. REID. - Will not that expression, "navigable for trade and commerce with other countries," include every coast river that is navigable?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, but it would not include the Lachlan.

Mr. REID. -

It would not, and therefore by adding the other words you include them all. In one breath the honorable member makes out that he is only referring to certain rivers, and in another breath, in order to meet that difficulty, he includes all rivers.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is not correctly representing me.

Mr. REID. -

Which position does my honorable friend take up? Does he mean to include rivers on the coast of Australia which are navigable or intermittently navigable? Does he or does he not?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I have answered that question in the affirmative about a dozen times already.

Mr. REID. -

Very well; then this has a general application.

Mr. BARTON. -

It includes the, improvement of a bar entrance.

Mr. REID. -

It must do so. What is the use of navigation on a river which has a bar that prevents navigation? What I desired the answers of my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) for, was on a very important business point. I want the Convention to understand that, in trying to adjust this difficulty about the waters of the Darling and the Murrumbidgee, the Federation is distinctly loaded—whereas the matter before was, at any rate, vague—with the duty, if it thinks fit, of improving the navigation in all the rivers of Australia, and at the same time it is not, with equal distinctness, given the opportunity of improving the harbor entrances of the continent. There is only one harbor in Victoria, and that is an ocean harbor, so that probably this matter has not come directly under my honorable friend's personal observation. But take, for example, the harbor of Newcastle. In that harbor, which has an enormous trade, it is absolutely necessary, as I have been advised by the officers, that, in view of the exigencies of commerce, we should deepen the entrance several feet. Now, why should this definite power be inserted here with reference to rivers, and not also with reference to harbors? In what sense is the improvement of a river a national work, and the improvement of a great harbor like that of Newcastle not a national work? What an extraordinary anomaly we should be landed in if there were provincial control of harbors-avenues of trade and commerce with the world-and federal control of the rivers, down to very small streams that are navigated by small ketches on the coast of Australia. Why should we load the Federation with this purely local duty? Why should we bring into the Federation all sorts of local questions? Why blight the prospects of expansion of the federal power with these eternal questions, which trouble us so much in our local politics, about river and harbor improvements? If this is to be done, let it be done fully. Let river and harbor improvements be taken over generally. I am against the whole proposal, and I am only pointing out the objection to what we all admit is my honorable friend's most praiseworthy attempt to deal with this matter. We all fully recognise that the intention of the honorable member is to endeavour to bring the parties now at issue to a friendly settlement;

but, in his anxiety to do that, he has lost sight of the fact that he would really put the Federal Parliament in a most anomalous position, if, by express words, the navigability of rivers is to be a subject on which it may, if it likes, exercise jurisdiction, whereas the navigation of harbors and the improvement of entrances would not be such a subject.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If that is your difficulty, you can vote afterwards for Mr. Symon's proposed amendment, which would remove all question about the matter.

Mr. REID. -

My objection is a cardinal one to the whole proposition. I submit that it is better to leave it as the Constitution originally left it. We certainly made no express legislation about it, and I appeal to members of the Convention whether they ever thought that, in passing the general words of this clause, they were aware that they were, by these general words, handing over, if the Federal Parliament wishes it, the physical control of all their rivers, and the improvement of navigation?
Mr. DOBSON. - It is only a concurrent jurisdiction.

Mr. REID. -

In this sub-section we have only put in subjects on which we think the Federal Parliament should act. No doubt the honorable member is strictly right that this is only concurrent, but the object of making these powers concurrent was to meet the difficulty which would exist if they were made exclusive, and the state laws perished immediately the Federation came into existence.

Mr. BARTON. -

As we know by the case of the United States, the Federal Government will only legislate when they consider it absolutely necessary, and in America they have postponed legislation on a great many subjects.

Mr. REID. -

No doubt that is true; but to come back to the practical difficulty I have mentioned, if, with all the claims I know of in my own colony for improvements, it is considered that the Federal Parliament has this power, and can exercise it, it would be exposed to a great many attempts, at any rate, to obtain federal expenditure on such works. I do not want to have any uncertainty on this point. I am glad the honorable member raised the matter in this way, so that we can elicit some definite opinion upon it, and can afterwards make that opinion clear, if it is contrary to the view of the honorable member. I invite those who are opposed to handing over to the federal authority the right of dealing with rivers and harbors, in the sense of spending money on them, and taking possession of them for the purposes of navigation-I invite those who take that view to oppose this amendment, and in inviting them to do that, I at the same time cheerfully recognise that we have already passed general words which will absolutely prevent any provincial power, in dealing with its rivers and harbors, from treating the trade of any of the other colonies differently from its own. On that point we are all at one. We wish to have equality of trade all over the Commonwealth; but the difference between the honorable member and myself is that I propose that the Federal Government shall have a preventive power-the power to prevent abuses in the colony; whereas my honorable friend's amendment hands over to the Federation the duty respecting the navigation of rivers without handing over, in express terms, the same duty in reference to harbors. Then, again, I oppose the whole proposal.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Although I am following an honorable member who is from New South Wales, like myself, and who takes up to a very large extent the same position as I take, I should like to say a few words at this stage in order that my own position in this matter may not by any means be misunderstood. I am here to state, with reference to what I think is the true construction of "trade and commerce," that if Mr. Isaacs will look at clause 89, which provides that-

So soon as uniform duties of customs have been imposed, trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free.

He will see that that clause, in terms not thought of at the time the American Constitution was framed, secures to the Commonwealth the control of all trade and intercourse in the direction of freedom. That is to say, that the words "internal carriage," in clause 89, if they are carefully read and contrasted with "ocean navigation," must apply to the security of freedom of trade, whether the trade is carried by land or on a river. Then, that clause, I take it, means uninterrupted intercourse between the states.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Is the meaning of that clause any greater than the mere freedom of inter-colonial trade and commerce from customs duties.

Mr. BARTON. -

It means that at least, but I think it means more, read in connexion with other clauses.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is a prevention of barriers between the colonies.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is the prevention of barriers between the colonies, for one thing. Now, I submit that uninterrupted intercourse means no interference with trade or commerce. Clause 89 seems to me to find its corollary in sub-section (1) of clause 52-

The regulation of trade and commerce with other countries, and among the several states.

The corresponding sub-section in the United States Constitution contains the originating power. In this Constitution, sub-section (1) of clause 52 is really the corollary of clause 89, covering internal free-trade, and the command of navigation and carriage, internal and external, which is conveyed by clause 89. So that the point I made is this—that instead of being an originating and original power as in the United States, sub-section (1) is a corollary, it is really derivative from clause 89, which is the spring and source of sub-section (1). If honorable members will read the two provisions together I think they will see that there is great force in that contentions consideration of the matter which, to some extent, has been overlooked.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Do you consider that that would touch the power of the Federal authority to deal positively with the waters of rivers, or give any such power to the federal authority?

Mr. BARTON. -

I think it strengthens sub-section (1) in the direction of legislating for the prevention of obstruction to navigation, and for the furtherance of navigation. I go a great deal further than my honorable friend, and my colleague, Mr. Reid. I put it this way—take it that clause 89 insists that trade and commerce shall not be interrupted, or, I would rather put it, that trade and commerce shall be uninterrupted. Trade and commerce are not uninterrupted if the state can make navigation on ordinarily navigable rivers of the Commonwealth impossible. Therefore, the Commonwealth must secure that navigability. If that is not so, the federation is not complete in what I consider an essential of any federation, Sub-section (1) of clause 52 does permit the Commonwealth to secure this essential, because, read with clause 89, looking at it in that way, in which we can see that the one provision may be derivative from the other, there is no doubt in my mind that, under these circumstances, the trade and commerce clause is for the purpose of permitting the Commonwealth, by legislation, to secure those things which are secured by way of declaration in clause 89—namely, uninterrupted trade and commerce. I do not see how we of New South Wales—I make this frank declaration—can object to that if we are to call ourselves, federalists. It is a federal power. The means to secure inter-colonial free-trade-uninterrupted trade and commerce—should be in the hands of the Federation, and a man cannot call himself a federalist if he does not submit to that proposition. Nevertheless, this leaves the state powers of conserving water untouched unless they are used in contravention of any legislation of the Commonwealth within the powers conceded to it by legislation. The point I now wish to make is this: That going to the fullest extent of what I consider is the strength and construction of the trade and commerce clause, arising from the presence in this Bill of such a provision as clause 89, which has no compeer at all, no parallel, in the United States Constitution—allowing for all that, nevertheless the state powers of conserving water, and indeed of dealing with navigation on their rivers, so far as it is the navigation of that state alone, are altogether untouched until there arises some act of legislation by the Commonwealth, properly and constitutionally passed, under which that power of conservation of water-may be to some extent impaired or infringed for the necessities of navigation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

On your argument does not clause 82 take that away at once?

Mr. BARTON. -

No; I do not think that there is anything in the Bill that takes it away. Very well, then, if a state law, or the action of the state, or the action of a citizen of a state, does not contravene Commonwealth legislation under that power of legislation, granted in this Bill, the state law is still valid, and cannot be touched or interfered with, and that I conceive is sufficient for the purpose of New South Wales under this Constitution. Now, my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) yesterday, in that remarkably able and statesmanlike speech which he made—one of the best speeches addressed to this Convention since it began its sittings in Adelaide—mentioned state laws with regard to irrigation in the United States, especially state laws passed with reference to the and country, and with reference to California. Now, while my honorable friend mentioned those in support of his argument, all those instances are evidences that, under the operation of the trade and commerce clause in America, the right is retained to the states, under the United States Constitution, to deal with these matters, and is recognised by the courts. And if there were any doubt about that in our own' case, we have only to refer to clause 99 of this Bill, which tells us that—

All powers which at the establishment of the Commonwealth are vested in the Parliaments of the several colonies, and which are not by this Constitution exclusively vested in the Parliament of the Commonwealth, or withdrawn from the Parliaments of the several states, are reserved to, and shall remain vested in, the Parliaments of the states respectively.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That is the reservation clause.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, the reservation clause. Now, that clause has a twofold operation. It means, first, that the power to deal with water conservation and irrigation, which, if you rely on sub-section (1) alone, finds no mention in this Constitution, and, therefore, is not a power given to the Commonwealth, but a power retained in the states absolutely. And it means, in addition to that, that the states will retain their power of dealing with the navigation of their rivers, except so far as those rivers fall under the domination—if you like to use that large word-of the legislation of the Commonwealth, when the Commonwealth chooses to legislate on the subject of navigation. So that the position of the state is secure as regards the conservation and use of its waters, except to the extent that there may be an actual navigation law passed by the Commonwealth, which may have the effect of limiting the state use of the water of the rivers within that state. Now, when we consider that as we go on in these colonies the uses of our rivers for purposes of navigation are likely to be less and less instead of largely increasing, when we consider that in the United States the use of the rivers for navigation, notwithstanding the grand volumes of their streams, is really diminished, and has given place very largely to the carriage of goods and produce by traction on land, by railways which cut off the corners, so to speak, when we consider that railways in these colonies will cut off so much more of the corners because our streams are so immensely meandering, when we consider that railways in the United States, are streams that are navigable only piecemeal, as it were, cannot we see that as years go on, and railway traction increases, whether we hand over the railways to the Commonwealth or not, the result will be that the tendency of the states will be to carry their goods and their produce by rail, as a continuous and daily cheapening means of communication, instead of by these sparsely-watered rivers. What will follow from that? It has been well pointed out already by Mr. Isaacs that no doubt as time goes on, as river navigation yields to railway traction, so the uses of the states of the waters of those rivers in the way of conservation and irrigation will meet with less and less interference from the Federal Government by the exercise of its power under sub-section (1) of clause 52. So that a state which is now tremulous about its power of water conservation and irrigation may well take this comfort to itself - that, as years go on, its right to do that will be more and more recognised, whatever the Constitution says, simply because the Federation would not find it useful or necessary to make many regulations as to the navigation of intermittent streams. I say that to clear away the misapprehension that seems to exist in the minds of some honorable members from New South Wales, as well as in the minds of other honorable members from other colonies, and I say it also because it seems to me to clear up the question a great deal. First, you have to ascertain by the operation of this Constitution, which differs in an important respect from the United States Constitution, this power of navigation. This power of navigation is a strong power to give to the Federation, but it must be given if we are to federate at all, because it is a federal power, inseparable from the right of maintaining free intercourse. Then you have it established that while that may be not only technically, but in right and justice, a necessary power to establish at this moment, the dangers to states which are fearful about the conservation of their water will diminish every year, from the circumstances I have explained. Well, now, all these considerations lead me to say that the safety which is secured first by a sufficiently definite provision in the Constitution, and is secured as time goes on by the elasticity of the Constitution, will be fortified by leaving the trade and commerce section untouched, and not encumbering it with limitations. The honorable member (Mr. Solomon), or anybody else who has a doubt about it, may be assured of this, that I am taking this Convention entirely into my confidence and telling it entirely what I believe. Recognising that, I feel that to the full extent the whole of the rivers of Australia must be subjected to the right of navigation. I am bound as a federalist to accede that power, and that is why I am in favour of the trade and commerce section. I think that doubts as to whether a British court would interpret it in the same way as the American courts have interpreted a similar section in the United States Constitution will be apt to vanish when we find that that section is so enormously fortified as it is in this Constitution by clause 89. I am satisfied that our best and wisest course is to leave things to the operation of the trade and commerce section, fortified as it is, and to let the natural tendency of things work itself out. If irrigation is more important than navigation, let it be so. Navigation, at any rate in competition with land traction by railways, will inevitably diminish. That subject will become less important every year, and the rights of the states with regard to irrigation and water conservation will ultimately prevail, according to the necessities of the people. Is it not better to leave these things to future developments, rather than interfere by hampering restrictions and limitations, such as are contained in this great number of amendments? I should like to reiterate the position I took up the other day. I will not consent to any dealing with the navigation of rivers which are in New South Wales, or on its boundaries, in any other way than the rivers of the whole Commonwealth are dealt with. I know no way of maintaining that impartial application of the law to all rivers of the Commonwealth, except by striking out all these sub-sections, replacing no one of them, and depending upon the efficacy of sub-section (1) of this clause. Perhaps I shall find myself compelled, when the amendments are moved, to vote for anything which I consider will improve them or render them less dangerous, but I say at the outset that my intention is in the end to vote against every amendment and restriction that has been proposed. I would urge upon the Convention that the safety of all the colonies concerned lies in the maintenance of sub-section (1).

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
After the rest I have had from the continuance of the few remarks I intended to make-

Mr. BARTON.-

I hope I did not interrupt the honorable member.

Mr. SYMON.-

The honorable member interrupted me most agreeably. I will now resume, and finish the little I have to say with regard to the substantial amendment, but before doing that I should like to preface what I have to say with the remark that with a great deal of what the honorable member (Mr. Barton) has said I entirely agree. It has very largely my unqualified assent. At the "we time, be did introduce a good many things that are debatable, full of doubt, and a number of other matters that are purely speculative as to the future operation of this clause with which we are dealing. I do not intend to re-argue the matter or re-open these general questions. But I wish to point out to honorable members what this amendment as proposed to be mutilated by the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) comes to. We of South Australia thought that by this amendment we were going to get something—that we should get at least a tribunal which would determine any difficulties and doubts that might arise with regard to the operation of these clauses affecting navigable rivers. Instead of that, the amendment which is proposed to cut this paragraph short at the word "irrigation" will have the effect of embedding in this Constitution a declaration that the states shall have absolute and uncontrolled power over all these water-courses with which we have been dealing. I ask my right honorable friend if that is fair? We have been debating for days the necessity for some provision which will secure this navigability, as to the necessity of which we are all agreed, and the whole matter in dispute between us has been as to whether it shall be dealt with entirely by a federal authority, or, as suggested by the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs), whether it shall be referable to an Inter-State Commission. It has never been suggested, except in the contention of New South Wales, that there shall be this absolutely uncontrolled power on behalf of the state. It is taking away everything we have got. It would be better for us to leave the whole thing absolutely as it is, without protection of any kind, than to introduce the amendment of my right honorable friend. It is absolutely destructive of the other principle which the Attorney-General of Victoria has proposed, and to which certainly we were misled, I do not say intentionally, into giving our assent yesterday in principle, subject to any verbal amendments, as it substituted some [P.505] starts here fair tribunal to deal with this matter. I ask my right honorable friend if he is prepared to do that now? I say, further, that to put this amendment as a whole and not sub-divided will have the effect of more greatly embarrassing this question than would be the case either by sub-division or by withdrawing this amendment altogether. I warn my honorable friends from South Australia that if they vote for the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) as a whole, they may find themselves-I will not say entrapped—but in an unfortunate position at the end of the discussion, by having assented to this amendment mutilated in the way the Right Hon. Sir George Turner desires.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Not if they vote for it as a whole.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
It will not be the case if we get the amendment carried as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I may point out that the amendment has not yet been moved.

Mr. SYMON. -
I am dealing with what has been indicated to the Convention. The clearest way is to have this amendment put section by section, in order to know what we are voting for. I tell the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) that I am not going to vote for this amendment of his except piecemeal. I will vote for the first part, with the addition which I have proposed, but I cannot vote for that portion down to "irrigation." I will not vote for any amendment as a whole that is likely to imperil the object we have in view.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If it is carried as a whole the risk will disappear.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
As I have spoken enough on this subject, I merely rise to make a practical suggestion, if I am in order. Before doing so, I should like to say that I would be very pleased indeed if I could follow the lead of my honorable friend the leader of the Convention; but I cannot see that in a case of this kind, where there is distinctly a doubt, that we have a right to leave that doubt in this Bill. The whole of this controversy, with the enormous amount of legal ability which has been exercised, is an object-lesson for the future. If, amongst the ablest men in this Convention, we find absolutely divergent opinions, what will be the case in the High Court of the future? Then, again, the great evil of the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) is that after confining our attention entirely to the question of one river—the Darling or, at any rate, to the question of the rivers that flow between different states, it is extended now to the question of the whole of the rivers of the colonies. Why should this new ground be opened up at all? I find that by combining a portion of the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Symon) with a portion of the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs), we can, at any rate, get a clear test of what we are fighting for. If I am in order, I would just make this suggestion in the course of my speech. I would suggest that an amendment should be drawn up so that it should read in this way:-

Navigable rivers flowing into or between two or more states, so far as may be necessary to the maintenance and improvement of their navigability.

That is taken from the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Symon), and I think it brings us back to our original position. Then I would add these words from the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs):-

But so that no state shall be prevented from using any of the waters of such rivers for the purposes of conservation and irrigation.

All that the honorable members from South Australia will have to do, in dealing with this, is to put in the word "reasonable," or something else to that effect.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Will you agree to that?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I do not say that I would, but we should then have a clear issue, and we shall have done with the round-about fighting. We shall know what we are doing. Of course I differ from my honorable friends (Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor). I say, without limiting the general powers under sub-section (1), or the general powers under navigation and shipping, we ought, in this matter which we have been fighting about for days, to have a clear enunciation of the views of the Convention. This seems to me to bring matters to a point.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Are you willing to put in the word "reasonable"?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I am not.

Mr. GORDON. -
The honorable member will not agree to anything reasonable.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Perhaps my only unreasonable action is my friendship for the honorable member; but, at any rate, without going away from the original conflict of opinion, this would be our proposal for New South Wales, if I may speak for my colleagues. The proposal of my honorable friends from South Australia would be to restore one or two words of the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Symon), in order to give a discretionary power to the Federal Government.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
   Or the Federal Judiciary.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
   Yes, I do not care which.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
   Would your suggestion include the Darling and the Murrumbidgee?
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
   That is questionable.
Mr. BARTON. -
   Why make flesh of one and fish of another? Why mention New South Wales?
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
   I do not want to introduce any words of my own; I have no objection to the honorable member (Mr. Symon) introducing some expression which will bring in the Darling River. If my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) would agree to the withdrawal of his amendment, and if be and the honorable member (Mr. Symon) would consider the proposal on the lines I have suggested during the luncheon hour, we should have a clear test vote. My honorable friend, perhaps, was not listening to me when I was speaking a moment or two ago. What I objected to principally was that he broadened out the question into that of the whole of the rivers of the colony.
Mr. ISAACS. -
   Would the honorable member mind reading it again?
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
   I beg to hand it to my learned friend.
Mr. DOBSON. -
   What would happen under your proposal when the time came that so much water would be wanted for irrigation that navigability could not be maintained?
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
   Now, that is going over the whole question again.
Mr. DOBSON. -
   What would happen then?
Mr. REID. -
   We all want to know that one thing.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
   I have been twitted with reducing the question to a reductio ad absurdum. If the state has a right absolutely, as we contend it has, to the waters of the Darling, although such an extreme right would never be exercised, it must absolutely carry the whole right of draining that river. There is one matter on which I feel very strongly. It has been referred to slightly before, and at the expense of wearying the committee I would refer to it again, because it is one of the most important matters connected with the development of New South Wales. It will be necessary, in the development of these and districts of New South Wales, to carry out large works of irrigation. At the present time there is a syndicate in Melbourne in treaty for private lands in a portion of New South Wales, and they intend to ask for irrigation rights from the Government. If it is told to these companies, who employ either colonial or English money, that the whole of their works might be declared ultra vires by the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth, it is very clear that all their operations will cease. However, I would suggest to my learned friends (Mr. Isaacs and Mr. Symon) to put their two proposals together, somewhat in the shape I have indicated, and let us have a fair test vote on the matter without any more circumlocution-as we certainly have spent long enough time over it.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I was very much inclined to agree to the idea which my learned friend (Mr. Barton) gave expression to this morning, namely, that we should have no sub-section dealing with this question in place of sub-section (31), and should allow the whole matter to be left to the interpretation of the words in sub-section (1). But I am very much against allowing that to take place after listening to his interpretation, for it gives away everything which New South Wales has been contending for, and I, for one, cannot agree to that. The proposal which my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan) has just made would be one which I think would definitely show what power of conservation and irrigation we should have, and without something of that kind I fear very much that the very extended interpretation given to sub-section (1) by Mr. Barton will not be favorably received by those who are most interested. The proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) is one that I could not support, and I do not see how any other representative of New South Wales could support it. The nearest one I could support is Mr. Symon's, but that is not such a one as, I think, we are justified in accepting; and, indeed, no amendment that does not interpret what rights we have regarding irrigation and conservation will, I think, be acceptable to New South Wales or to the representatives of that colony. I regret very much, now that we have come to this stage, that we cannot agree with Mr. Barton in his idea, and I think South Australia ought to be more than satisfied with the interpretation he has placed on that sub-section. It has frightened me, and I venture to think it has frightened a few representatives of New South Wales.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

The honorable member (Mr. Lyne) certainly is very candid, and I think we can leave that candour to speak for itself. I only rise to say that I hope no such use will be made, as is suggested by the honorable member (Mr. McMillan), of the amendments of Mr. Isaacs and Mr. Symon as to warp them to a purpose so entirely opposite to the desire of each of those honorable gentlemen. The result of combining portions of the two amendments would be to put a face on the hybrid just exactly the opposite of what is intended by those two honorable gentlemen. I cannot help noticing, I regret to say the decline of the federal spirit in this Convention as compared with the Convention of 1891; and, if honorable members will pardon me for a moment, I will read from the official report of the debates of the Convention of 1891 a very short speech, by one of the leading members of the New South Wales delegation, on that occasion. It is very short, but it is so sparkling and luminous on the point under discussion, and it expresses so thoroughly what I, if I spoke at any length, might vaguely endeavour to express, that I am sure honorable members will pardon me if I read the speech.

Mr. WALKER. -

Who is speaking?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It is Mr. McMillan's speech. Speaking of the sub-section which relates to river navigation, with respect to the common purposes of two or more states or parts of the Commonwealth, he says-

This is a sub-section that I think requires some kind of elaboration, which probably those who have drawn the Bill may be able to undertake. The sub-section means more than the river navigation. We want the control of the rivers as regards the use of the water, and furthermore, it is necessary to have some control over the tributaries. As we know, in connexion with the Murray, there may be tributary streams, to check the flow of water from which might have such an effect as to render the river useless. It seems to me although I do not propose now to indicate any actual amendment—that there ought to be some very general powers with regard to the control of the river, not merely for navigation purposes, but also for purposes of irrigation and the conservation of the water. That I look upon as one of the most important matters in connexion with the whole scheme of federation. We have large rivers which are absolutely essential to future schemes of irrigation and the conservation of water.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
You have shown me the danger since then, you know.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

These run through different colonies, and if economically managed by one power-

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Are you still quoting from me?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
I am still putting forth my own thoughts in the language of the honorable member, which I say surpasses all I could possibly achieve by my own inferior utterances.

Mr. SYMON. -
No, you don't go far enough. They are his thoughts, too.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Yes, they are his thoughts, too.

Mr. SYMON. -
I mean his secret thoughts.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
His federal thoughts, and that is why I regret the decline of the federal sentiment.

These run through different colonies, and if economically managed by one power, equitably dealing with all the rights of the different states, they may be great sources of wealth in the future. Consequently, it seems to me that a clause ought to be introduced into the Bill which will give the Central Government general powers to deal in some equitable way with the different rights of different states, and with the general conservation of all rights with regard to these rivers.

Mr. REID. -
That was said seven years ago, and a man entirely changes himself in seven years.

Mr. DOBSON. -
A verdict for South Australia.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
We want nothing more than that, and I wish in some respects we could get back to the feeling which animated that Convention.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Will not Mr. Higgins, amendment give you that now?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Yes; and I will ask my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan)-

Mr. HOWE. -

This is not the same man, is it?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

He does not appear altered in the slightest degree. I question whether he is able to express himself better than he did in the language he used in 1891. I will ask my honorable friend to go back to the time when he attended that Convention in the responsible position of Colonial Treasurer of the mother colony. I think we have to place more weight on the utterances of a responsible Minister than we can place on the words of a gentleman not occupying an official position. And knowing that when the Treasurer of such a great colony as New South Wales speaks, he weighs every word before he utters it, I cannot but admire the succinct manner in which my honorable friend placed before the Convention of 1891 his views.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

And the views of New South Wales, too.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

His views were the views of New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -

In fact, it was an official utterance.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It was an official utterance of the views of New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -

By the First Lord of the Admiralty.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Let us have more of the federal spirit in the consideration of this question. I want to say but a few words more on the question. I have occupied very little of the time of the Convention in the course of this discussion. It is such a battle of legal luminaries that I almost think that if I had my career to begin again, and knew that I should have to attend so many Conventions, I should get myself articled to a lawyer before I started with regard to the remarks of Mr. Barton

Mr. REID. -

Surely they ought to satisfy you.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

They would if I was quite sure about his version; but as my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) takes entirely the opposite view, and as I have a very great regard for his astuteness-a feeling which has grown on me every time I have met him, and seen him meeting his foes in controversy-his clear exposition on this matter throws some doubt-

Mr. Reid. -

I am going to clear that up before I am done with it.

Dr. Cockburn. -

It throws some doubt in my mind on the able exposition of the leader of the Convention. As far as I can read clause 89, on which the leader of the Convention lays so much stress, it seems to me nothing more than a provision that no duties and no tolls shall be levied on these rivers. That is the interpretation my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) places on the clause, and I believe he is right. It is said that we can take the precedent of the United States with regard to the general development of this Constitution. But I do not think we can derive any reliable analogy from the United States in this respect. We must remember that for many years the United States Constitution was developed under a very strong centralizing and national influence. We know that for a number of years the nomination of the Supreme Court Bench was entirely in the hands of those who wanted to see the whole country unified- until they had translated to the bench, I believe, without one exception, none but Judges holding only a similar view on this matter, and because they, under these circumstances, placed an interpretation on the Constitution which tended towards giving large powers to the Federal Government in this matter, it does not follow that in our case the same result would ensue. I feel, sir, that it is not right unduly to prolong the debate at this stage. But I cannot refrain from observing that there was no desire on the part of the Convention to close the debate while those holding the federal view had an apparent majority, but now that there is some feeling that the majority has gone the other way there appears to be a very strong desire to bring the debate to a close. I rather wish that not quite so conciliatory spirit had been shown by South Australia in this matter.

Mr. Howe. -

It is a pity that you did not read the extract yesterday.

Mr. McMillan. -

Who put you up to reading the extract?

Dr. Cockburn. -

I never run anybody else-

Mr. McMillan. -

You are too harmless a dove to find that speech.

Dr. Cockburn. -

I never run anybody else into a sin for which I alone am responsible.

Mr. McMillan. -
In this case somebody ran you into it.

Mr. SYMON. -
This is not a sin.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
It is a sin from his point of view.

Mr. SYMON. -
It is a virtue.

Dr. COCKBURN. - Even justice, from the present point of view of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan), is a sin. Remembering the luminous nature of his utterances, I obtained a copy of the Hansard of the Convention of 1891, and therefore the honorable member is solely responsible for my having raised up from under the dust of the ages of the past his previous powerful utterances. I felt that he was not on this occasion doing himself justice, but I hope that after a few minutes' reflection he will see that his official opinion, when he felt that the eyes of the colony—indeed, the eyes of the world—were on his utterances, is the correct one, and I ask him to go back to his first love, and show himself again to be imbued with that federal spirit of which we all formerly recognised him to be so able an exponent.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Were there any more speeches of the same kind made in 1891?

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at six minutes past two p.m.]

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I have not spoken this morning, and I do not intend now to make a speech of any length; but I wish to know, Mr. Chairman, exactly how the amendment which I indicated my desire to move some two days ago stands? I have not joined in this discussion, because I cannot help feeling that the debate has been carried on upon a low level with regard to federal principle, upon a level with which I cannot have any sympathy. The amendment to which I refer is that marked "AA," which would leave to the Federal Parliament "the adjustment of riparian rights as between states as to all waters which, in the course of their flow or after joining other waters, touch more than one state." The effect of that amendment would be to leave it absolutely to the Federal Parliament to declare as an inter-state matter what shall be the use of these waters. I utterly reprobate any attempt to say at this stage of our history that conservation and irrigation shall be paramount to navigation. In the ordinary course of the development of science, the Federal Parliament will learn what is best to be done, and I do not think it is for us in framing a Constitution to dictate to the Federal Parliament what shall be considered the paramount use. This is a matter which is in all respects of federal interest. I did not want to interrupt the course of debate upon the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs), because I saw a very great chance of its being carried with the approbation of South Australia, and I did not think that I, a Victorian representative, would be justified in interfering with an arrangement which seemed likely to be accepted all round. I have, however, been pressed by at least half-a-dozen honorable members to insist upon my amendment, and, as the amendment of the honorable and learned member is not now likely to be accepted all round, there is a strong feeling that a division should be taken upon the question whether the mode of using these waters from their source in Queensland, throughout New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, should not be left to the determination of the Federal Parliament, in the interests of all.

Mr. SYMON. -

The Federal Parliament is the proper tribunal to determine this question. It is a political rather than a judicial question.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

My honorable and learned friend is quite right. I should be willing to leave this question to the Federal Court if it were a question of law, but, as a question of expediency, I wish to leave it to the Federal Parliament. In the course of centuries—because this Constitution is a matter for centuries—I want to leave the Federal Parliament free to alter the rules in regard to these waters as expediency may dictate. I admit that we cannot, in view of the expression of the representatives of New South Wales, carry any provision with their assent which will suit the views of the majority of honorable members. It is not for me to judge other honorable members, but the change of feeling in regard to this matter which has taken place since 1891 is to me lamentable, because it was then distinctly recognised that this was a matter for the Federal Parliament to deal with. Where you have a river which is filled by rains falling in Queensland, in New South Wales, in Victoria, and in South Australia, it and its tributaries cannot be properly dealt with except by the Federal Parliament. I understood you to intimate, Mr. Chairman, that you intend to take these amendments in their order, and, under the forms of the House, the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) has been put first. In order, however, to allow a test vote upon the question whether this matter should be left to the decision of the Federal Parliament, as expediency may dictate, I shall propose the emission of all the words after the word "The" in the amendment, with a view to substituting the words contained in my amendment.
Mr. ISAACS. -
Do not strike out anything; put in your amendment afterwards

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Yes, I can do that if the honorable member would prefer me to take that course. I should like the amendment to read-

Without limiting sub-section (1), the adjustment of riparian rights as between states as to all waters which, in the course of their flow or after joining other waters, touch more than one state.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Had we not better come to a decision in regard to the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) first, so as not to mix up these matters?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I hope that the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) will not misunderstand me when I say that I do not sympathize with the narrowing of South Australian rights which I think is involved in his amendment. I am of opinion that South Australia and all the other colonies are entitled to insist that this matter of the use of these waters, whether for irrigation or for navigation, shall be left to the Federal Parliament. The effect of my amendment is, not to enable the Federal Parliament to spend money upon irrigation in New South Wales or elsewhere; but to declare the limits within which New South Wales and Victoria may operate for the purposes of irrigation. The Federal Parliament is to make an adjustment of the rights of the colonies interested. The Federal Parliament, in fact, has a kind of negative power to say that New South Wales can irrigate as long as she likes, providing that she does not go beyond a certain number of gallons. Now, I think we might agree to that. This debate has been prolonged because I and certain others felt that there might be an agreement, but we now see that it is impossible that there should be an agreement, having regard to all the conditions. It is therefore important for all of us who feel this matter to be one of federal import to declare our views.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Do not think that when we are voting with Mr. Isaacs we are voting against you

Mr. HIGGINS. -
No; but the position is that we shall have to vote upon the insertion, after the word "The," of the words which I have proposed. Of course, if my words are carried I understand that Mr. Isaacs will not insist upon his, because the greater will include the less. This is not at all a new matter. My amendment has been before the Chair for two days at least, but I did not press it, because I thought there was a possibility of an agreement on the part of New South Wales. But I now see that there is no possibility, and that it is essential that we should have a division.

Mr. ISAACS. -

How does your proposal differ from mine?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

My proposal will leave it for the Federal Parliament to say, from time to time, what shall be the reasonable use for any purpose of these waters-will leave it entirely to the Federal Parliament; but the amendment of Mr. Isaacs only goes so far as to say that the Federal Parliament may make laws as to the navigability of these waters, subject to the paramount power with regard to conservation and irrigation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

On the part of the states.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I say that we ought not to declare in making a Constitution that any mode of use is to be paramount. I admit that it is likely that irrigation for a dry continent like this is likely to be the paramount use, but it is not a matter for the Constitution. It is a matter for the Federal Parliament to decide from time to time. I feel that I should not be justified after this long debate in prolonging it, but, having been pressed to do so by several of those who are in favour of the Federal Parliament having control in this matter, I shall feel bound to press my amendment to a division.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Ought we not to decide Mr. Symon's amendment first?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Honorable members ought to confine their remarks to the amendment before the Chair; but

I find that it is extremely difficult to keep honorable members strictly to the point.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -

It has been my misfortune to be so often in opposition to my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Higgins) in the discussions of this Convention, that it gives me a peculiar pleasure to say that on this occasion I am entirely in accord with him. I have listened without intervention or interruption of any kind to the very prolonged debate which has taken place on this subject, and during the last two days I have asked myself—not for the first time during the sittings of this Convention in Adelaide, Sydney, and Melbourne whether you, sir, were not presiding over a judicial court, in which a case exciting very widespread interest was being contended for on the one side and the other, by the most brilliant members of the Australian bar. The legal technicalities which have been brought forward have, of course, been highly interesting, and I would like to say that especially the speech of the Attorney-General for Victoria yesterday was, I thought, a most valuable contribution to the debate. It certainly put the matter before us in a most lucid and forcible manner, especially in regard to its legal aspect, which has given rise to so much discussion. I think I must take exception to one remark of Mr. Higgins as to the change of feeling since 1891. I think there has been no change of feeling in regard to the point that this matter should be left to the decision of the Federal Parliament, but a new aspect has been given to the case by the springing upon us of the claims of South Australia as to the navigability of the Murray, those claims having provoked counter claims on the part of New South Wales, which to most of us seem of an overwhelming character, as to their right to use the waters of the sources of the Murray for irrigation purposes. These claims have imported into the matter a very much larger interest than there could possibly have been on the occasion when the question was discussed in 1891. But, sir, what I wish to impress upon the members of this Convention more especially is this—that, as has been said on more than one occasion during the course of this debate, we are fighting with a shadow, and it will be far better for the general principles to be left for the Federal Parliament to deal with, giving the Parliament the powers which we can give to them, in terms suggested by Mr. Higgins, but not attempting to import into the document embodying this Constitution limitations and discriminations which are so dear to the legal mind, but which to men of common sense seem, as regards a matter of this kind, altogether unnecessary. There is another phase of the question which is, I think, occasionally lost sight of, and that is that, while it is true that the colonies of New South Wales and South Australia are mainly concerned in this matter, yet they have surely sufficient confidence that the decisions of the Parliament will be such as will insure right and justice being done by the members for those states which are not immediately concerned in the matter. It is, I think, obvious to every honorable member that when matters of this kind come before the Federal Parliament they will be dealt with as similar matters are dealt with in our local Parliaments; members not immediately interested have no particular motive affecting them in their decisions, except the consideration of what is right and just between the parties concerned. The same thing will happen in the discussions of the Federal Parliament we are about to create. I think that our friends from South Australia should trust to the sense of fairness of the Federal Parliament, and I am sure that our friends from New South Wales ought to be equally satisfied to do the same.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
That is what we want to do.

Mr. BROWN. -
I am supporting the proposition of Mr. Higgins, to leave the matter to be decided by the Federal Parliament, so as not to prolong our discussions on limitations, definitions, and discriminations, as to which it is absolutely impossible for 50 members of this Convention to come to an agreement. I think the sooner we come to a division the better. I shall be glad to support a proposition which will leave it entirely for the Federal Parliament to deal with the matter; and I take leave to say that I think they will deal more effectually with it than we can, because they will have before them all the facts and all the interests concerned, which we have not before us. I trust, therefore, that, without further prolonging the discussion, we shall come to a decision upon the point. I say, unhesitatingly, that if we do not decide it on the general principle which I have indicated, I shall oppose every one of the amendments which have been suggested, and do all I can to have them rejected, so as to leave the matter as it stood before Mr. Gordon introduced sub-section (31), which has been so much objected to. I am sure that that will be much the safer and better way of dealing with the whole matter.

The amendment for the insertion of the words "without limiting sub-section (1)" was agreed to without a division.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The next amendment is that of Mr. Higgins.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I now beg to move the insertion, after the word "The," of my amendment AA, which is as follows:-
adjustment of riparian rights as between states as to all waters which, in the course of their flow or after joining other waters, touch more than one state.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I should like to have some explanation of the meaning of these words.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
They mean referring the whole matter to the Federal Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I do not think they do. If the amendment is a general proposition that the whole question of irrigation and navigation, and the rights of the states to water, shall be left to the Federal Parliament, I shall be prepared to support it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That is what it means.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not know that the insertion of these words will carry out that meaning. "The adjustment of riparian rights." The "adjustment"-what does that mean?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You have a declaration of what the rights are.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The honorable member assumes that certain rights are existing.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If the Federal Parliament is to adjust them, surely he does.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If you say rights, what rights do you mean?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Can you suggest a better word?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Mr. Higgins wants to give new rights.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If it is simply to adjust existing rights we shall be left in the same difficulty as we are in now, because New South Wales claims that she has all the rights, and that South Australia has none at all, whereas South Australia claims that she has certain rights. "Riparian rights" here, I would urge, mean legal rights-some existing legal rights-and all the Federal Parliament will have power to do will be to adjust those rights between two conflicting States. I do not know whether the Federal Parliament is the proper body, to do that. I should say that the Federal Judicature is the proper body. But it seems to me that these words will not give South Australia what the representatives of that colony think they are going to get, and will not give what I, for one, desire to see the Federal Parliament have power to give, if it is to have any power at all. There is no question here about navigation; it is simply to "adjust riparian rights." Well, so far as I can recollect, from reading the law many years ago, that will be an extremely limited power, which will be useless to South Australia, and, to my mind, will give New South Wales everything she wants if she has the legal rights she claims to have.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I should like to ask whether Mr. Higgins would consent to substitute the word "rivers" for "waters"? I have some doubt as to whether the Darling will come in under this.

Mr. BARTON. -
What about the lakes?

Mr. GLYNN. -
I am afraid that they would not come in under this amendment. We are anxious about them, because the lakes amount to a six months' flow and affect the navigation of the river. About six months' discharge of the Darling finds its way into lakes, and would not reach South Australia at all.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Would not the word "waters" cover "lakes" better than the word "rivers"?

Mr. GLYNN. -
I think not.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Does the word "rivers" include lakes?

Mr. GLYNN. -
The word "waters" would not include the waters kept back in the lakes into which the Darling flows at times.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I understood that waters would cover the whole thing.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Does the honorable member think that the flood waters of the Darling, which find their way into about 70 lakes, and would be impounded by New South Wales, would come under the definition of this clause?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Yes.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I have a doubt about it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The word "rivers" would be less wide than the word "waters."

Mr. GLYNN. -
I simply call attention to the point so that it may be considered.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I do not want to take any further part in the discussion, but it may be of interest to honorable members to learn that I have received a communication from a gentleman whose authority we all value (Mr. A. Inglis Clark), in the shape of "Notes on the Proposal to provide in the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia for the regulation of the use of the waters of the River Murray and its tributaries." It is a highly interesting and learned Statement, and, without expressing any opinion upon it myself, I propose to lay it on the table.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

Would it not be the most convenient course to take it as read, so that it may go straight into Hansard?

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not want to make it a portion of any remarks of mine on the subject, because I have not sufficiently considered it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Then I will take the responsibility of it. I do not propose to read the document, but would ask the Chairman's ruling on the question whether it may be taken as read, so that Hansard may publish it to-morrow?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

It has been suggested to me that the paper should be laid on the table when the Convention resumes its sitting. The only difficulty I feel about it is that some honorable members may, wish to make use of it this afternoon.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Is there any objection to the paper being taken as read?

The CHAIRMAN. -

I understand that the honorable member proposes to make a speech in which, instead of reading the paper, he is to be supposed to have read it?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Exactly.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I venture to submit that that would be a very irregular proceeding. It is irregular to lay any expression of opinion from a private individual, however distinguished he may be, on the table, and the only way in which this paper could properly be included in our debates would be to make it a part of a speech. We should then have an opportunity of considering it. To put it in the records of the debates in a silent manner would be utterly irregular, and it would serve no useful purpose so far as the present discussion is concerned.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I would like to take your ruling, Mr. Chairman, on the question of whether this document can be read at all, or be placed on the table of the House? If it can, then an opportunity is afforded to any person outside to practically make a speech to the Convention. Mr. Clark holds no position in Australia different from that of others. If he can send a letter to the Convention and have it read, what is to prevent thousands of other persons from doing the same thing? To permit such a proceeding would be highly inconvenient, and it would also be contrary to the practice of Parliament. It is not, I submit, within the power of an honorable member to read a document in the House and to lay it on the table, unless he is a Minister charged with some responsibility. If it was, we know the ki

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I recognise that it is the rule of Parliament that outside persons shall not be allowed to take part in the debates of Parliament. That is a rule that should guide us. Under the circumstances, I shall not again ask to have this document laid on the table, but I will take the ordinary course of handing it to the press at the conclusion of the sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The question before the Chair is the insertion of the words proposed by Mr. Higgins.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

While fully appreciating the intention of the honorable member's amendment, I would point out that it would land us in a greater state of perplexity than we are in at the present time. First of all, with regard to the words "adjustment of riparian rights," when an arbitrator is called in to settle accounts between conflicting parties, it is assumed that their rights exist, and he has to adjust matters between them.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

What words would you suggest?

Mr. SYMON. -

Ascertainment and adjustment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think that the honorable member's intention would be expressed by some such word as creation or determination.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Determination means that the rights exist.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Creation is the proper word.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, that is the only word which would make the thing certain. We might say "creation and apportionment."

Mr. BARTON. -

We have to be sure that this is not an attempt to give rights.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think a court would be loath to say that to adjust rights means to create or apportion rights. Then there is another difficulty. The amendment only refers to waters which, in the course of their flow, or after joining other waters, touch more than one state. Now, apply that practically to the Darling. Does the Darling in the course of its flow touch more than one state?

Mr. HOLDER. -

The waters touch two states.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Do the waters, after joining other waters, touch more than one state? I think it could be argued, with more or less success, that all the waters above the point of junction would be outside the amendment. Mr. Glynn pointed out that the word "rivers" might extend the whole length, but "waters after joining other waters" refer to the whole flow after the waters reach a certain point.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

This is a question of drafting. If we approve of the idea, the Drafting Committee can suggest the words.

Yes, if we are thoroughly seised of the meaning of the words. I am not sure that the vote will properly show whether we are all of the same mind.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I am quite sure that I am representing the views of my fellow delegates when I say that what we are desirous of doing is to leave to the Federal Parliament the full power of absolutely determining the conflicting rights of states in connexion with these rivers.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Claims.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes. I do not think it departs in the slightest degree from the position we have taken up. It is simply a furtherance of the suggestion now made, and, at the least, it shows that the representatives of South Australia have confidence in the justice of the claims they have put forward when they are prepared to submit them to the final arbitrament of a tribunal in which New South Wales, in the natural order of things, will be much more largely represented than South Australia.

Mr. REID. -

Fancy a Parliament settling a point of law.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

We shall make a great mistake if, in the Constitution of our Federal Parliament, we omit to provide a facile means for the settlement of disputes which now agitate the people of the states.
Very facile, no doubt.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

We should be leaving an element of possible discord and disruption if we did not do that. For my own part, I should be prepared to give this power in the fullest possible form. The preceding portion of the clause confers on the Federal Parliament the power to legislate, and I would ask honorable members whether they see any objection to the specification of the subject of legislation in the following terms: "Inter-state riparian differences" or "differences between states as to riparian rights"?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Riparian "rights" is a bad expression.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Then we might say "inter-state riparian differences."

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Or claims.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes. No word can be suggested that South Australia would look upon as too large for the purpose of referring this matter to the peaceful solution of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. SYMON. -

Claims would be better.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That term may be larger. The position will then be that there will be no interference until there is a bonâ fide dispute. When there is a dispute as to the rights of the various states with reference to the use of these waters, there will be a tribunal which can properly and finally settle it.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

On this point, Mr. Inglis Clark's paper includes a reference to certain United States authorities which show the effect of a power in the Constitution of the United States identical with a power we have already adopted. Attaching great value to Mr. Clark's opinion on this matter, let me read a part of the paper.

Mr. BARTON. -

The authorities, at any rate, might be cited.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Mr. Clark says-

The Draft Bill to constitute the Commonwealth of Australia expressly provides that the judicial power of the Commonwealth shall extend "to all matters between states"; and it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United, States of America, that, under the provision of the Constitution of that country, which extends the power of the Federal Judiciary to
"controversies between two or more states," one state may file a bill in equity against another state to determine the question of a disputed boundary (Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Peters 657). And if the Federal Judiciary of the Commonwealth of Australia will have the like power to determine a question of a disputed boundary between two states, it must, as a logical sequence, have jurisdiction of the question whether any portion of the territory within the boundary of one state is to be deprived of all that makes that territory valuable by the aggressive legislation of another state. The riparian rights of the owners of land abutting on the River Murray, in the colony of South Australia, are rights of property in South Australia, and if those rights shall be infringed by any private person or any public body professing to act under colour of the authority of an Act of the Legislature of New South Wales, when both colonies are constituent parts of the Commonwealth of Australia, the citizen of South Australia whose riparian right has been violated will have a remedy in the federal courts of the Commonwealth, either for damages or for a writ of injunction to restrain the continuance of the injury, or for both. As a direct authority upon this point, I may refer to the ease of the Holyoke Water Power Company v. Connecticut River Company, which was decided in the United States in the year 1884 (22 Blatchford, 131). In that case the Legislature of Connecticut had authorized the Connecticut River Company to raise their existing dam across the River in Connecticut to improve the navigation, and also maintain the water power of the company. The Connecticut River Company's dam was about 16 miles below the dam and factories belonging to the Holyoke Water Power Company in Massachusetts and the Connecticut River Company proposed to raise its dam in Connecticut so high that it would cause a diminution in the fall of the river above the dam for six or seven months in the year, to the detriment of Holyoke Company, and the Holyoke Company filed a bill in equity, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Connecticut, praying for an injunction restraining the Connecticut River Company from raising their dam to the proposed height. The court granted the injunction.

The concluding portion of the judgment of Judge Shipman is quoted, but I will not read it. Then Mr. Clark says-

The same principle of inter-state law was enunciated and applied by Treat, J., in the case of Rutz v. City of St. Louis (7 Fed. Rep., 438). . .

The consideration of this subject in the light of judicial decisions upon it in America has directed my attention to the omission in the Draft Bill to constitute the Commonwealth of Australia, of the provision in the Constitution of the United States which extends the jurisdiction of the Federal Judiciary to controversies between citizens of different states.

I will not read the whole of this, but I will read the concluding paragraph, which is as follows:-

In regard to the particular question of the riparian rights of two or more states in relation to the same river, the states concerned could at any time refer the question to the Federal Parliament for legislative action upon it under sub-section (35) of section 52, and in the meantime the separate states could pass such local legislation as might be beneficial to their own citizens without affecting injuriously the riparian proprietors of other states. But if the whole subject is transferred to the Federal Parliament in the Constitution, the Legislatures of the several states may find themselves deprived of all such power, to the detriment of their local industries and local supplies of water for purely domestic purposes. Under this aspect of the question, the colonies of South Australia and Victoria may discover that they have as much interest as New South Wales in refraining from granting to the Federal Parliament exclusive jurisdiction on the subject in the Constitution.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

This is not exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I would ask my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) if he would consent to the substitution of the word "claims" for "rights"?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I would also ask the honorable member if he would consent to the insertion of the words "of rivers" after "waters"?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is it not enough to settle the principle of leaving the whole thing to the Federal Parliament now? There will be time afterwards to have the exact drafting settled.

Mr. WISE. -

In order to leave it to the Federal Parliament, you must vote against every one of these amendments.

Mr. GLYNN. -

At all events, by the substitution I suggest of "claims" for "rights," I think you will have a more emphatic declaration of what is intended, and it will be a guide to the draftsman.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I think that "claims" is a better term than "rights"; and, with the leave of the committee, I will amend my amendment by substituting "claims" for "rights."

Mr. WISE. -

Is this an admission from South Australia that they have no rights at present?

Mr. Higgins' amendment was amended accordingly.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I would ask the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) if he would have any objection to insert, after the word "touch," the words "or would, but for interference or obstruction; touch"? (Laughter.) My honorable friends from New South Wales laugh.

Mr. WISE. -

We are only astonished at your modesty.

Mr. SYMON. -

What I want is to prevent the possibility of interference with the waters that will keep them from touching or coming into our colony. I am not going to move an amendment, but I would submit this alteration for my honorable friend's (Mr. Higgins') consideration.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I only desire to say, before a division is taken, that I think this is a most objectionable attempt to take away from the Federal Court the decision of legal rights as affecting different states, and to transfer it to a political tribunal, the Federal Parliament.

Question-That there be inserted in Mr. Isaacs' proposed new sub-section, after the word "The," the words "adjustment of riparian claims as between states as to all waters which, in the course of their flow or after joining other waters, touch more than one state"-put.

The committee divided-

Ayes ... ... ... ... 18
Noes ... ... ... ... 26
Majority against the amendment 8

AYES.

Berry, Sir G. Holder, F.W.
Braddon, Sir E.N.C. Howe, J.H.
Brown, N.J. Kingston, C.C.
Cockburn, Dr. J.A. Lee Steere, Sir J.G.
Dobson, H. Solomon, V.L.
Downer, Sir J.W. Symon, J.H.
Glynn, P.M. Trenwith, W.A.
I would ask Mr. Isaacs if he would agree to strike out the word "several" before "states"? As the sub-section reads now, it relates to "trade and commerce with other countries or among the several states." That might be a limitation, because the Murray and the Darling are not rivers with trade and commerce amongst several states.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am keeping to the words of the first sub-section of clause 52.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The honorable member knows that the American decisions refer to commerce between two states. What I am afraid of is that the terms of the clause are too wide.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think it should be left as it is, to keep it in harmony with sub-section (1) of clause 52.

Mr. GLYNN. -

If the honorable member is satisfied, I have no desire to move an amendment. I would, however, make another suggestion with regard to the use of the words "other countries." It has been said by the representatives... of New South Wales that this will give the Federal Parliament power over rivers whose source and discharge are in one state; such rivers are not touched in America.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes, they are.

Mr. GLYNN. -
They are so far as regards the provision with reference to freedom of trade and commerce; but do the decisions authorize improvements on these rivers?

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes, just the same.

Mr. GLYNN. -
At all events, this is a very strong objection urged by the representatives of New South Wales to the amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That also follows the words of sub-section (1) of clause 52.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Are you fighting for New South Wales now?

Mr. GLYNN. -
I am fighting with regard to a thing which we do not care about. I wish to conciliate New South Wales to some extent if possible. We do not want control over rivers whose source and discharge are altogether in one colony, and if this would affect the vote of New South Wales, I, for one, would consent to the elision of these words, and make the amendment cover only rivers which flow into or through more than one state.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I desire to move an amendment in the last three lines of the proposed amendment of Mr. Isaacs. The first portion of that amendment gives jurisdiction with regard to the navigability of rivers, and then, for the purpose of putting conservation and irrigation in the forefront, it declares that the state is not to be prevented from using the waters for those purposes. Then it has this further limitation upon that-it is to be to such an extent as, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, is not unjust or unreasonable, having regard to the needs and requirements of any other state for such purpose. Now, my great difficulty with regard to that is this: I desire that, if it be at all possible, irrigation and conservation shall be taken into consideration by the Federal Parliament when dealing with this subject above the mere question of navigation; but I do not desire to leave any doubt in the minds of those who are about to expend money on irrigation works as to what may become of those works afterwards, and, as the amendment stands the question could not be decided until after the money had been expended.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes, it could.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No, the work would have to be done, and then the question would be raised as to whether the taking out of the water, in consequence of that work, was unjust or unreasonable. Now, with that doubt staring a man in the face, no one would attempt to expend any money, and the result is that you stop altogether any schemes of conservation or irrigation in New South Wales. If we can get, by some means, finality in the matter, then the persons who expend their money will know that, having expended it, they cannot be interfered with. I desire to obtain that if it is at all possible. I am perfectly prepared, for one, to trust the Federal Parliament to carry out properly the protection given in this clause; that there shall be navigability of the rivers, but that that navigability is to be subservient, wherever possible, to conservation and irrigation; and I want to give certainty to those who expend their money for irrigation purposes.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Certainty to those in New South Wales; and uncertainty to those in South Australia. That is the effect of it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The honorable member does not know what I am about to propose. I propose to so alter this clause as to leave absolute power to the Federal Parliament to deal with the matter before the expenditure of money. Of course, I know this will not be palatable to New South Wales, because they claim that they ought not to submit to the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament. But, for my own part, I think that we all ought to submit as far as we possibly can to that jurisdiction.

Mr. REID. -

There is a great difference between the Federal Court and the Federal Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The case would be one for the Federal Court if you had to decide existing legal rights, but I want to go further than that. Of course, I can understand that my honorable friends from New South Wales say that they have the rights.

Mr. BARTON. -
You want to confer rights.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If the rights do not now exist, I want to give this body, whom the leader of the Convention has told us, on more than one occasion, we ought to trust, the power of conferring these rights.

Mr. REID. -

By taking them from us.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If it is in the interests of the whole Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON. -

We quite understand you.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I have no doubt that you understand me. I do not want to conceal my object but in dealing with these rights you must keep conservation and irrigation in the foreground, and navigation in the background. I propose to amend Mr. Isaacs' proposal, so that the latter part of it will read as follows:-

But so that

So that we will then leave it to the Federal Parliament to have this jurisdiction. They are to deal with navigation, but they are always to keep in mind, when dealing with that subject, the questions of conservation and irrigation. And, in dealing with the questions of conservation and irrigation-in giving the necessary powers to take water for those purposes-they must have regard to all the other states.

Mr. LYNE. -

You are proposing to do what we have been fighting all along not to do.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No, I think this is a modification of what the honorable member and his friends have opposed.

The honorable member and his friends are against giving any, power whatever to the Federal Parliament. That is, of course, what they are fighting against. I desire to give the power to the Federal Parliament with this limitation: That they must not deal with navigation to the detriment of conservation and irrigation. That is the argument. I am not endeavouring to put the case for New South Wales, and the representatives of that colony will probably vote against my amendment, but I desire the Parliament to protect the people of New South Wales and the people of Victoria also, and that the Parliament shall have a direction given to them by this Constitution that their first care is to, be conservation and irrigation, and their next care navigation.

Mr. LYNE. -
You are taking away our present state powers altogether.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

As soon as the Federal Parliament legislated by virtue of this provision, no doubt state powers would have to be modified, and some of them would be taken away. Well, state powers have to be taken away with regard to many matters, if we are to have a true federation. If we are to have federation, and the states are to retain all their powers, our federation will be of very little use indeed. The question as to whether this should be another power for the Federal Parliament to deal with is a question for this Convention to decide. I trust that we shall give this power to the Federation, but, until it is so given and until the Federation Parliament legislates on the subject, the states will continue to deal with their irrigation and conservation schemes as they think fit. If the Federal Parliament does once legislate on the subject, then the rights of the state Parliaments to legislate on it will probably be gone. But in that federal legislation I feel perfectly certain existing rights will be preserved. I am sure that if we were sitting as a Federal Parliament instead of as a Convention, and legislating on the subject, we would say with regard to whatever the states had done up to the time we passed our legislation-"We will take good care to protect the interests of the states." I put in my amendment the words "may by Act declare," because if it were a mere resolution it might be rescinded at any time, but if it has to be done by an Act of Parliament, then the persons who act by virtue of that legal enactment will know that any change can only be made by another Act of Parliament, and the Federal Parliament, in passing an amending or repealing Act, will, of course, do justice to all.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think there is a root objection in principle to this amendment, which objection ought to claim the consent of every member of the Convention, with every respect to my right honorable friend. And it is this-this is a proposal to make the second part of Mr. Isaacs' amendment read as follows:-

so that no state shall be prevented from using any of the waters of such rivers for the purposes of conservation and irrigation to such extent as Parliament, having regard to the needs and requirements of all the states for such purposes, may by Act declare.

Mr. Howe. -

That is reasonable.

The first thing that strikes a reasonable mind about a proposal of this kind, is what is the real distinction between the functions of Parliament and the functions of the High Court which we are creating? A declaration of rights between people is for the High Court to make, but if you want to create or confer new rights, that is a thing for Parliament to do. But it is not for Parliament to create or confer new rights that were non-existent at the time of federation, there being then no legal right for Parliament to take hold of. Yet the amendment amounts to an attempt to enable Parliament to make a declaration by Act—that certain things are rights which were not rights at the time of federation. That is an attempt to enable Parliament to declare what is not true.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. - What new rights?

Mr. BARTON. - The right to determine that a state having, at the time of federation, the use and control of certain water is to be limited in the use and control of that water. There is to be a power given to Parliament to limit the exercise of that right. If disputes arise as to rights between states, those are matters of law, which ought to be determined by the Federal High Court. If you go outside that, and give Parliament any right by legislation to declare matters to be rights which at the time of federation were not rights, you are misprescribing the process of federal legislation, because you give the Parliament power to declare rights over property which rights did not exist at the time of federation. If there is to be any determination as to the rights of South Australia, New South Wales, and Victoria, as they exist at the time of federation, there is one tribunal, and one only, to decide them, that is the court constituted for the very purpose of determining them—the Federal High Court. If there is to be any departure from that, let this amendment be distinct on its face. Don't let the amendment talk about Parliament declaring the extent to which water may be used, because that very declaration is the creation of a right in somebody who did not possess it at the time of federation. What is the use of endeavouring, by cloaking over the object with words, to give Parliament the right to make an enactment altering rights that existed at the time of federation? The whole thing would be a process which we did not contemplate, and which our constituents did not contemplate when they sent us into this Convention. We were sent here for no such purpose as that of giving Parliament the right to make such a declaration, and at the same time alter the rights of the states as they exist at the time of federation. There is a distinct objection in principle, which every one of us ought to raise—the objection to this manner of endeavouring to settle this dispute by conferring more rights on the Federation. I do not want to enter into other aspects of the question—into the provincial dispute—but this is not a constitutional thing to do, or a piece of work which we can at any time be proud of, in making this Constitution.
Mr. SYMON (South Australia).-

In the interests of South Australia, I also object to this amendment. Its effect is to declare that no state irrigation shall take place without a Federal Act of Parliament being first obtained. That is the effect of the amendment.
We in South Australia could not use one drop of water from these rivers without being obliged to go to the Federal Parliament for legislation to enable us to do so. I venture to prefer Mr. Isaacs' amendment. The difference between Sir George Turner's and Mr. Isaacs' amendment is this—that my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) says that to every state shall be continued the power of dealing with its own irrigation. But the abuse of that power, that is, the unreasonable or unjust use of the water, might be liable to be restrained by the Federal Parliament, the Inter-State Commission, or the High Court, as it might be. The amendment suggested by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner is that no state shall be allowed to use the waters of these streams for irrigation if, on the pretext of affecting their navigability, the question should be remitted to the Federal Parliament.
Mr. ISAACS.-

Would my honorable friend's difficulty be met by an amendment of this kind—"so that no state shall be prevented from taking any of the waters of such rivers for works of irrigation and conservation except to such an extent as the Parliament, having regard to such considerations, may declare to be unjust or unreasonable"?
Mr. SYMON. -

I do not think that would meet the difficulty. I think the intention that my honorable friend has in view is clear enough from his own amendment. He does not want to interfere, and we do not want to interfere, with the power of the state to deal with its own internal irrigation. But if there is an excess of that user which will interfere with navigability, he says remit that for settlement either to the Federal Parliament or the Inter-State Commission.
My right honorable friend (Sir George Turner) says "I go beyond that. I say that no state is to rise the water, the user of which may interfere with navigability, without a Federal Act of Parliament."
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No; I said exactly the reverse. The state will go on using the water until the Federal Parliament choose to legislate by virtue of this clause.
Mr. SYMON. -

I do not see the difference. Without the thing being unreasonable or unjust, the Federal Parliament might interfere; it might be made a party question, and the Federal Parliament might step in and take out of the hands of the state the power of saying water is required for irrigation. South Australia might have to establish irrigation colonies, and she ought not to be liable to be put in that position. There are modifications which I think might be suggested in the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs), but I think, with great respect, that my right honorable friend's suggestion really makes the matter worse.

The amendment that the words "Inter State Commission" be omitted, with the view to insert the word "Parliament," was negatived.

Mr. SYMON. -

I beg to move that after the word "the," before the words "Inter State Commission," the following word be inserted:-

The CHAIRMAN. -

It is too late, because it has been resolved that these words shall stand part of the question.

Mr. SYMON. -

I thought the words we voted upon were "as in the opinion of."

The CHAIRMAN. -

No: I put the question quite clearly and distinctly.

Mr. SYMON. -

I thought we were dealing with the matter so as to allow the introduction of the words proposed by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The honorable member spoke against that, and cried "No" against it. It was carried that the words stand part of the question.

Mr. SYMON. -

I was certainly under a misapprehension as to our adopting the principle of the Inter-State Commission. The result will be that, owing to a misapprehension, I will now be obliged to vote against the whole thing. I do not wish to be put in that position. I object to the Inter-State Commission, and I certainly did not understand that we were adopting the principle of an Inter State Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I put the words quite clearly, and read them out distinctly, and no amendment can be moved, unless it comes after the word "unreasonable." If no further amendment be moved, I shall put the sub-section as amended.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I understand that the honorable member (Mr. Symon) wishes to move for the insertion of some other body than the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. SYMON. -

Mr. ISAACS. -

This is only, I understand, to give an intimation to the Drafting Committee. Could not an amendment be put in this way: To insert words after the word "unreasonable"? It would then read it as in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission is not unjust or unreasonable," and if my honorable friend

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I will accept the suggestion of the honorable member, because I wish to facilitate the honorable member in bringing on his motion for a division. I will move the words he proposes, with a view afterwards of their being licked into proper shape. I beg to move-

That after the word "unreasonable" the following words be inserted:-"or as in the opinion of the Parliament is not unjust or unreasonable."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Do I understand the honorable member (Mr. Symon) that his real wish is to substitute the discretion of the Federal Parliament for that of the Inter-State Commission?

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes.

Mr. BARTON. -

Then I object to his putting this, because it makes an alternative discretion instead of a sole discretion, and that does not carry out the intention of the mover of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment is in order all the same.

Question-That the words "or as in the opinion of the Parliament is not unjust or unreasonable" proposed to be inserted be so inserted-put.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. REID. -
I think we might also put in "or the Federal Supreme Court."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I would like to call the attention of the committee to the position of this sub-section. It does not matter very much to me as a member of the Drafting Committee, or as a member of the Convention, what a member states as his reason for moving an amendment, but the position of the subsection now is this, that two authorities are created, and there is not the least dividing line given as to how these authorities are to work-independently of each other or together; whether the Inter State Commission is to work independently of the Parliament, or whether the Parliament is to work independently of the Inter-State Commission, is not shown; whether there is to be an appeal from the one or the other, or which is to be the higher court of the two, is not shown. The whole sub-section is now a rank absurdity.

Mr. REID. -
It is exactly what we might have expected from the debate.

Mr. BARTON. -
I voted in order that the amendment at any rate might be made intelligible; but having been carried as it is the amendment is really in a state which a printer would describe as "pie." There is absolutely no possibility of distinguishing what cases the Parliament is to choose for itself, or what cases the Inter-State Commission is to choose for itself—which is to be subordinate to the other, and whether each of them is to give different decisions, and both of them are to be the law.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Or in what way is Parliament to adjudge matters of this kind.

Mr. BARTON. -
Is it to determine that where the commission has not acted, it is time for the Parliament to come in, and is it therefore to wait until the Inter-State Commission acts? Or is it to step in at the beginning, and is the Inter-State Commission to come in afterwards, at the heel of the hunt?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
The Federal Parliament will appoint the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. BARTON. -
It will appoint the Inter-State Commission, but how will that affect the question? You have a Constitution here-

Mr. REID. -
Which is above the court and the Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -
The Constitution is above the court and above the Parliament, and it must be read and interpreted. You have a right given to the Inter-State Commission or to the Parliament to decide what is just and reasonable for the purpose of conservation and irrigation, and you have given equal power and simultaneous power to both.

Mr. DOBSON. -
When the clause is recommitted that can be altered.

Mr. REID. -
Recommitted! Another month to be spent over the question!

Mr. BARTON. -
I ask the committee not to commit itself to a process of making hash-and that is what has been going on.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Is this in order, sir?

Mr. BARTON. -
I submit, sir, that it is in order. I ask the committee not to commit itself to the process of making hash of the various clauses, that no Drafting Committee can ever regulate. In expressing this intention the committee has expressed its will, and now it has reduced the sub-section to such a state that the whole clause, if you once read it together, becomes absurd and impossible, and I submit to the committee that it ought to be rejected without further consideration.

Mr. ISAACs (Victoria). -

If this were the final stage of the measure, I think my honorable friend's remarks would be unanswerable, but I believe the committee felt perfectly well-at least I think the majority did-that in voting in this way it was only to give the learned member (Mr. Symon) an opportunity to get the views of the committee as to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. SYMON. -

And the committee, by that vote, have decided that, the Federal Parliament is the tribunal they wish to deal with it.

Mr. FRASER. -

No, they may strike out the whole clause.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is another thing.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think it will be agreed that the views of the majority were that the Federal Parliament was a preferable tribunal to the Inter-State Commission, and there can be no doubt that, as far as the forms of the Convention will allow, the present formal difficulty which exists can be swept away. I therefore submit that there is no difficulty arising from that vote. I would like to say, with regard to the very forcible and powerful observations of my learned friend (Mr. Barton) this morning in regard to the clause as a whole, and in regard to clause 89 of the Constitution, I was not able to follow him as I usually do in the interpretation of that clause as applying to this present question. Clause 89, he urged, enlarged or confirmed in some way the powers in sub-section (1) of clause 52, so as to make perfectly clear, beyond any reasonable doubt, at all events, the power of the Federal Parliament to deal with the navigability of the rivers, and that, therefore, there was no reason whatever for putting any express power in. Clause 89 is simply, as far as I read it, a declaratory clause. It is too large, I think, as I once before expressed it, in its present terms; but in its full extent it simply declares that there shall be no obstacle to trade by reason of any customs duties, or licence-fees, or anything of that kind as between the states. It is intended to preserve perfect freedom of trade as we ordinarily understand it. But, to my mind-I may be wrong; possibly I am wrong, as I am in opposition to my learned friend (Mr. Barton)-it does not touch this question in the smallest degree, as to the navigability of the river. And, therefore, with the greatest deference, I would say that the presence of that sub-section—which will have a potent influence, however modified, in regard to freedom of trade hereafter, and truly, as the leader of the Convention said, in a somewhat different degree to the position of free-trade under the United States Constitution—will have good effect, too, here. Its real import in our Constitution, as contrasted with its absence from the United States Constitution, is that, Congress could if it chose provide for protection as between the states, could say that one state could levy duties against another. The absence of any prohibitory clause to that effect would give Congress that power. It has been held in the courts that, so long as Congress does not legislate on the subject, it is equivalent to a declaration that trade between, the states shall be free, and we know, as a matter of practice and as a matter of fact, that Congress would never legislate to the contrary. The presence of clause 89 in this Bill is a prohibition on the Federal Parliament to ever make any such law whatever. It would be unconstitutional, and, therefore, illegal, for the Federal Parliament to say that one state could levy any duty against the citizens of another state. The presence of that clause has that effect, but it has, in my humble judgment, no relevancy whatever to the question of the navigability of the rivers or to the question of irrigation.

Mr. BARTON. -
Are not inter-state duties forbidden by the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. ISAACS. -
No.

Mr. BARTON. -
Well, what is the meaning of that provision that no state shall levy any import or export duty?

Mr. ISAACS. -
That refers to duties on goods coming from foreign countries.

Mr. BARTON. -
Are you quite sure of that?

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes.

Mr. BARTON. -
There is no restriction on it?

Mr. ISAACS. -
No.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
If it were not for the gravity of the matter we are now about to decide, the proceedings of to-day would certainly appeal very keenly to any sense of humour which any member of the Convention may possess. For many days, throughout the whole of this struggle, our friends from South Australia have come forward in the purest possible guise as a body of men seeking only their just legal rights in connexion with these rivers, and their complaint has been that the representatives of New South Wales have, with equal zeal, contended for the enjoyment of those rights, and, more than that, are determined for all time to prevent them from the enjoyment of those just rights. But what is the extraordinary development which we witness to-day? and I am sorry to see that it is a development to which gentlemen from other states have deliberately made themselves parties. This, at any rate, fair pretension or demand has suddenly assumed a most sinister complexion. Whereas upon all the most vital matters that can arise in the history of this Commonwealth, affecting the very life of the nation, every one here is anxious that the Supreme Court of the Federation should decide according to justice, we find this positively sinister development, that in this matter between states, and vitally affecting the interests of one of them, there is an organization here to deflect the course of justice from the supreme judicial tribunal of the Commonwealth to the party arena of the Federal Parliament. This is a most sinister complexion to put upon the matter, and it must be so regarded by those whose interests are concerned. It becomes all the more sinister when I find that the Premier of Victoria makes no secret of the fact that he wants to go further than legal rights and justice, and to confer rights upon South Australia—at whose expense?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
To confer rights upon the Parliament.

Mr. REID. -
For what purpose? To take away rights from New South Wales. If there is no intention to take away something unjustly, surely the federal tribunal of the Commonwealth is pure enough and independent enough to deal with these disputes between states. More than that in all solemnity, and without the slightest difference of opinion from any one representative, it is expressly provided in clause 77, which was passed only a few days ago, that disputes within states will be within, not only the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court—because if only within that jurisdiction they might never come before that tribunal at all—but within its original jurisdiction. The meaning of these words is that any state, as a matter of right, in a question by which its interests are affected, and as to which some other state is doing something contrary to its rights, can come into the Federal Court and complain of the proceedings of that other state and get justice. It is not enough for my honorable friends that the Federal Court that we have established should deal with these disputes between states, it must be a political and party tribunal, with scarcely a fairly constituted court. I speak in all seriousness. This is not a laughing matter. It may, perhaps, become a laughing matter when you have New South Wales in the Federation; you may laugh as much as you like then, but not until then. It is a very serious matter to us to find, after the statement made by the leader of the Convention, which went infinitely further than I ever dreamt of going in connexion with the waters of the Commonwealth, that there is this deliberately organized attempt to take this matter-in which we in New South Wales, as every one will admit, have vital interests-out of the ordinary course of justice and to commit it to the chances of politics. I say at once to honorable members that if the Convention is so composed-I cannot conceive that it can be-that a majority can be got to twist the Constitution in this sinister way before its birth, in order to serve the interests of one state, I am afraid our labours will fall somewhat from the high plane upon which we have endeavoured to keep them. I beg to remind honorable members that we in New South Wales cannot excite any indignation in dealing with this matter, because whilst, as a matter of right and justice, we have spoken strongly as to that which we believe ourselves to possess, in our conduct or management of it we have shown a generosity and federal spirit which exists in no other part of Australia to-day. That is a solid fact from which my honorable friends from South Australia get great benefits every day up and down the Murray and up and down to Broken Hill. We come forward as persons who, resolved upon the defence of our just rights, have acted a brotherly part towards the trade and commerce of the other colonies, such a part, as no other colony has ever attempted to act. We do not stand in a light before this Convention in which we can be exposed to any ungenerous imputations. It is not because we have the remotest idea of at any time using the Darling in a way unfriendly to South Australia that we take this strong stand. We have sense enough not only as individuals, but by the form of our public policy as registered in Acts of Parliament, to believe, and to legislate, too, in the direction of securing the interests of persons settled along the banks of that river at such a great distance from our own metropolis without the slightest reference to any consideration of self-interest. We have spent more than £100,000, I believe more than £200,000, in clearing this highway of commerce between South Australia and Bourke to defeat' the profits of a railway which we have constructed at great expense, piercing as it does into the very heart of the continent. We have never allowed the interests of our railways to put the slightest embargo upon the trade of our citizens with every part of Australia.

Mr. Howe. -
For the advantage of your citizens.

Mr. Reid. -
Is not that a proper course to pursue? I wish the honorable member could make a similar boast with regard to his colony. We have reconciled the benefit of our own producers with the federal interests of all Australia. That is the peculiarity of our policy. A colony which has done this, whatever may be thought of the particular merits of her policy from a domestic and internal point of view, stands in this Convention in a truly honorable position—unfortunately, a position of solitary distinction in this respect.

Dr. Cockburn. -
The only honorable colony!

Mr. Reid. -
No, not at all.

Dr. Cockburn. -
Those are the right honorable member's own words.

Mr. Reid. -
I never dreamt of suggesting anything so offensive. I only say, what the honorable member cannot deny, that whatever may be the merits of our policy as it affects our own people, those outside our borders must admit that it is truly federal. Why are we preparing this Constitution? To obtain federal freedom for trade and intercourse between the different colonies of the Commonwealth. We have given that already.

Mr. Higgins. -
To all the world.

Mr. Reid. -
Is that interjection a sneer or a piece of applause? I can quite understand my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) thinking that when we enlarge the benefits of the intercourse of our producers in New South Wales with the whole world, it is a great wrong not to draw the line at South Australia and Victoria. But we have not done that, and I do not suppose we ever shall. The one point which I wish to insist upon before the division is taken is this: Whilst we have had to be resolute in the maintenance of our rights, yet in the management of things belonging to us we have invariably treated the other colonies in a friendly, broad, and generous spirit.

Mr. Dobson. -
Why not put that spirit in the Constitution?

Mr. Reid. -
I do not intend to consent to putting it in the Constitution, because what we have is now in the possession of those who can be trusted to treat their neighbours generously. I am sorry to say that in this dispute between South Australia and New South Wales there has been displayed on more than one occasion a frivolous conception of the rights we possess, and an indifference to the vital problems of colonization that depend in New South Wales upon its waters, which is not at all reassuring to the people who have to work out the destinies of that part of Australia. The whole case assumes (to repeat a word I have already used) a decidedly, sinister aspect when those who have been clamouring for justice to be meted out to them are not prepared to leave the Federal Court of the United Commonwealth to give them that justice which they require. I am willing that every matter of dispute between New South Wales and South Australia, and every other colony in the group, shall be referable, in so far as it can form a dispute at all "between states," under clause 77. I believe that at present we have put all that is required in that provision. If the words in clause 77, giving an original jurisdiction as well as an appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court, in all matters "between states" (sub-section (3), confer an original jurisdiction in regard to all such matters of dispute between states, then, if this Federal Court were established, it would give any one colony the right to go into court and complain of any act on the part of a neighbouring state in a matter affecting both, as this is said to be, and to get justice if justice was required.

Yes, if the act complained of infringe upon the legal rights of the complaining state.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is the whole question.

My. REID. - It is not remarkable for my dreaming equity friend (Mr. Higgins) to look at legal rights as things to jeer at, but I should be surprised if this Convention were prepared to follow the somewhat socialistic lead of the honorable member. Mr. Higgins is satisfied with a very small quantity of figures upon all other matters coming before this Convention, but suddenly, in regard to this question, he has become a sort of leader of the Convention, a man of great influence among us. And on what ground?

Mr. BARTON. -

It is on the ground of water.

Mr. REID. -

No doubt; but really on the ground that the legal rights of New South Wales are to be dealt with contrary to the wish of New South Wales, by a tribunal which New South Wales has not accepted, a tribunal whose jurisdiction every representative of New South Wales here repudiates. You cannot arbitrate under such circumstances. The essence of arbitration is the reference of a matter by mutual consent to arbitrament. And the one point I wish to emphasize is this: That after we have all agreed to a method of arbitration of the fairest kind, after we have established, embedded in the bed-rock of the Constitution, a tribunal giving an everlasting guarantee to every human being in the Commonwealth that justice shall be done, we suddenly have this most sinister demand that in reference to this particular matter, which only vitally affects one colony, that colony is to be deprived of the tribunal which is being set up with so much solemnity to settle the humblest and the greatest of the difficulties that arise within the scope of the Constitution. I should like to see any gentleman out of South Australia voting for that proposition.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I have refrained from taking any part in the debate upon this question, which has lasted nearly the whole of the week, and if I intervene now it is to say a few words in the belief that the committee, if they adopt Mr. Isaacs' amendment, will be voting contrary to their intention and their desire. I would like to say, by way of preface to my remarks, that I do not regard this question as a dispute between South Australia and New South Wales. I look upon it, as I have endeavoured to do during the whole discussion, from the federal point of view, and I say at once, that, although I represent New South Wales, which is by some supposed to take an unfederal attitude upon this matter, for my part every vote I give will be given to secure the recognition in the fullest manner possible of the principle that the navigability of all navigable rivers within the Commonwealth is essentially a matter of federal concern; and I am prepared to accept any amendment that will define navigable rivers to include rivers intermittently navigable. I go further, and say that the maintenance of navigability includes both the improvement and the maintenance of navigation. I think, having said that, and intending to act on that assertion of principle, I may claim to be speaking to the Convention with full candour when I point out that the step honorable members will be taking if they vote for Mr. Isaacs' amendment will be such as they do not desire to take. The principle I have endeavoured to lay down is one which has been accepted from all sides of the chamber, that the territorial integrity of each province should be preserved. As an illustration of that principle Sir George Turner, either this morning or yesterday, in a most emphatic manner, declared that irrigation is essentially a state matter. Now, if this amendment is passed no water trust in Victoria will be enabled to extend its works so as to increase by a single cubic foot the volume of water drawn from the Murray unless it gets a Bill passed through the Federal Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We are prepared to trust the Federal Parliament.

Mr. WISE. -

That is a fair thing to say, but it is a distinct violation of the principle of Sir George Turner that irrigation is essentially a matter of provincial concern. I quite recognise the spirit of the remark of the Attorney-General of Victoria; but let us recognise what we are doing if we accept that as the view of the Convention. It is exactly the same in regard to South Australia as in regard to Victoria. South Australia has irrigation works along the banks of the Murray; but under this amendment they will not be able to improve or modify or alter those works in any way without a Bill being passed through the Federal Parliament. Do we wish for that? The clause is still wider in its extension. It proposes to place under the control of the Federal Parliament the navigability of every navigable river in the Commonwealth. The Derwent, the Tamar, the Swan River, as well as our Clarence and Richmond, the Yarra, and every navigable river that is valuable for commerce between any part of the Commonwealth and other colonies, would be, by that part of the proposal, placed under the control of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -

How can there be any rights of other states for conservation and irrigation in connexion with the Swan River?

Mr. WISE. -

I have not made myself clear. I say that the first part of the amendment already carried has nothing to do with irrigation. If finally carried, it absolutely places the control of the Derwent, the Tamar, and the Swan Rivers for the purposes of irrigation under the Federal Parliament, and to that extent I am pleased with it. I do not know whether the representatives of Tasmania are equally pleased. Then follows the other qualification, which provides that if it is desired to use any of those rivers which, when navigable, are adjacent to more than one state for any domestic purpose whatever it shall first be necessary to obtain the sanction of the Federal Parliament. I will not repeat myself. I hope the Convention will clearly understand that the step they are taking now is a new step, and one which is in contradistinction to the express declaration of policy from honorable members on every side of the chamber during the last few days, and from no one more clearly than Sir George Turner, who said that irrigation was essentially a matter of domestic concern.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -

I am only going to say a few words. I have refrained from speaking purposely because I have been sorry to see so much waste of time. In my opinion, honorable members, in voting for this proposal as amended, will effectually kill federation.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I desire to say that I voted for the last amendment not because I believe in the Federal Parliament having the determination of this matter. It should be settled by the Federal High Court. I thought it was understood that after our very long, I will not say weary, debate, although the subject is getting rather wearisome, the principle which we are seeking to engraft in this Constitution would be put in proper phraseology by the Drafting Committee.

Mr. BARTON. -

The Drafting Committee will do nothing to undo the decision of the committee.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I agreed with every word Mr. Barton said half-an-hour ago. It did not need the long and powerful speech of the Premier of New South Wales to convince me that a political tribunal like the Federal Parliament was a totally unfit tribunal to adjust riparian rights or apportion the water. It is a great mistake to criticise too closely what we are doing now, because we are in somewhat of a muddle with six or eight or ten amendments before us. We have a right to look to the Drafting Committee to put into legal shape the principle that we desire to see adopted. If the words "Federal Parliament" and "Inter-State Commission" appear in the sub-section-and I do not wish to see them retained-cannot we strike them out when the clause is recommitted and substitute "the Federal High Court"?

Mr. SYMON. -

You can move now to insert the Federal High Court.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Yes. It may be said that we should then make the thing ridiculous. We should, however, be acting in strict conformity with the standing orders, and if we made nonsense of the sub-section we should at least indicate what was the desire of the majority of honorable members. There is only one difference between the Premier of New South Wales and myself. Whilst he is overflowing with federal love and with the milk of human kindness, when he is asked to give expression to his generous sentiments in the Constitution, he says no. I was disappointed that Mr. Higgins' amendment was not carried. I thought it was the most statesmanlike amendment before the Chair. As it has been lost, I shall have much pleasure in supporting Mr. Isaacs' amendment, but I shall be no party to remitting this great question to a political tribunal, which would be utterly incapable of dealing with it.

Mr. PEACOCK (Victoria). -

As one of the lay members of the Convention, I may say that I have listened with interest to the discussion that has taken place on this question. At first, I was inclined to the view that too much time was being devoted to the consideration of it, but I think it will be agreed by every honorable member that its importance demanded that the closest attention should be given to it. The people of the colonies have received quite an education on this subject in the splendid speeches that have been delivered by gentlemen holding high official positions. I differ entirely from Mr. Dobson. The views expressed this morning by my chief (the Premier of Victoria) are exactly the views I have held all through. I would not have intruded at this late hour were it not for the fact that my honorable colleague (the Attorney-General of Victoria), after having moved his amendment, stated, speaking on behalf of the delegates and the people of Victoria, that they were quite prepared to leave this matter to the Federal Parliament. I have always been, and I am still, and I believe the people of Victoria generally will be, wholly opposed to the limitations introduced in the latter part of the amendment. This question should neither be left to the Inter-State Commission nor to the Federal Parliament. I will not enter into the merits of the dispute as between South Australia and New South Wales, but I must express my honest conviction, and it has been forced upon my mind during the last 48 hours, that the position taken up by the delegates of South Australia in the sister capital of Adelaide and here has been dictated by considerations of provincialism and trading rather than by the higher consideration of what is the best in the interests of the whole of the people of Australia. I have the greatest respect for the members of the Convention who belong to the legal profession, but with regard to the quotations they have given to us from American authorities, it struck me, as a layman, that to us this is an entirely different question. You cannot enter upon the consideration of it simply from the point of view of the experience of the United States. The United States have an altogether different river system. No speech made a greater impression upon me than that of Sir Joseph Abbott, which clearly proved-and that conclusion is verified by information which I have received-that the first consideration of this Convention and of the people of Australia should be production, and not navigation. We have to remember that many of these streams are intermittent. A friend of mine—a retired squatter—told me the other night that in times gone by he has had on this very River Darling to take measures to protect his stock. For months the river was only a chain of water-holes, and to distinguish his sheep from his neighbour's sheep he had to erect fences along the water-holes. Any honorable member can see by looking at the map in the corridor how essential it is to the development, not of a portion of New South Wales as New South Wales territory, but of a large part of the continent, that conservation of water and irrigation should come first. There must be no doubt in our Constitution as to the position we take up. It is for these reasons that I have, with great regret, to differ from my honorable colleague (the Attorney-General of Victoria) I have determined to oppose the amendment in the interests of the people of Australia, because water conservation and irrigation must come before navigation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The amendment places them in that position.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

I do not agree with the honorable member. There will be a doubt in the minds of the people, at any rate. The matter should be left in the form suggested by the Premier of Victoria, and I should have liked to have seen an amendment submitted in the direction he indicated. By adopting that proposal we should have been doing far more to promote the interests of federation than we shall be by carrying the amendment of Mr. Isaacs in the form in which it is now presented. I do not desire that any difficulties should be raised in connexion with this question. It is for these reasons that I have determined, rather reluctantly, to vote against my honorable colleague. I say that in the interests of production as compared with navigation it is our duty, as a Convention, to reject the amendment.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I rise simply to ask the honorable member for Victoria (Mr. Isaacs) if he will agree to allow the words that have reference to the Inter-State Commission to be struck out when we come to reconsider this clause in committee?

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

What would be left?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I think a statement of that sort made by him might remove the considerable confusion that now exists, and might effectually reply to the somewhat severe strictures of the honorable leader of the Convention, who has told us that we have made nonsense of this provision by instituting two powers.

If after hearing that opinion we now took a vote, the honorable member's amendment might very possibly be lost, simply because it sets up those two separate powers. I think if Mr. Isaacs would make that statement, the majority in favour of the action of the Federal Parliament being undoubted-the Federal Parliament as against the Inter-State Commission-if he would do that, those who support him would support him in it, and I admit I was one of his strongest supporters in that respect, and we should then get a decision on the merits of the case.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

In answer to that question, as I stated at the very beginning, I am not wedded to any particular tribunal. The words Inter-State Commission were put in by me originally to form a basis of discussion. I would willingly consent to meet the wish of the committee in the matter, whether its choice is the Inter-State Commission, the Federal Parliament, or the Federal Judiciary, or any other tribunal that may be suggested. None other has been suggested but those three. My only object in the matter is, first of all, to put irrigation before navigation-my honorable friend (Mr. Peacock) is going to vote against the only proposal to effect that-and, secondly, to secure a fair division of the water for irrigation between the colonies. But whatever tribunal is desired by a majority of the Convention I will be perfectly willing to insert in my amendment.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

If, on recommittal, the words relating to the Inter-State Commission are omitted, so that the tribunal remains the Federal Parliament, I should be equally opposed to this amendment, and opposed to it for this reason. If there is likely to be-I do not know that there will be-any conflict of authority between the powers exercised by the Federal Parliament as to navigation and the powers exercised by the states with regard to the conservation and distribution of water, that, like all other disputes under this Constitution, ought to be determined by the Federal High Court, and not by the Federal Parliament. And there is no right or reason in seeking, with reference to the productive value of a portion of the territory of New South Wales, to wrest the matter away from the authority which the Constitution sets up to deal with it and to substitute another authority. Then, again, I must object to this amendment on the original ground that, whatever we may say with regard to the extent of the power to be exercised as to the navigation of rivers, we from New South Wales cannot consent, under any circumstances, to have the provincial right of distributing water which is collected in our territory interfered with by any authority under heaven. And for this reason. Honorable members say-"Why not trust the Federal Parliament?" Well, I think that we do trust the Federal Parliament, and that we have shown it repeatedly in this Convention, but what we are here to trust the Federal Parliament is federal matters, and we never came here to trust the Federal Parliament in provincial matters. That is the whole distinction that lies at the very root of the matter. Here there is embodied in this sub-section an absolute denial of the very first sub-section of the set of resolutions which we passed in Adelaide. The first of those resolutions was this-

That the powers, privileges, and territories of the several existing colonies shall remain intact, except in respect of such surrenders as may be agreed upon to secure uniformity of law and administration in matters of common concern.

But here is a matter of the development of the territory of one of the colonies, not being a matter of common concern, which this amendment seeks to make a matter of common concern, and to say "Wrest the whole business away from the intention with which we came here, and from the resolutions we passed in Adelaide."

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

It is not a surrender, but-an exaction.

No, it is not a surrender, but a taking of this power. I do not wish to give it any worse form of words than that; but this is clearly an effort to take a power which we do not give up—which we refuse to give up. We refuse to give up any, portion of our territory, and we refuse to give up that without which alone we can not develop our territory. Let other people try to develop their territory in the same way as us, and not complain that, in the exercise of our rights as a state, we are getting an advantage. If the course of the Murray was almost entirely in New South Wales, and only one mile in South Australia before it debauched into the sea, South Australia would surely not think of making this claim, and yet every reason of justice would apply in support of their claim on account of that one mile as on account of the distance it actually traverses that colony, and which is only a fractional part of the course of that river and the Darling in New South Wales. But the grave objection I have to the amendment is that this is an interference with the provinces on a matter of provincial concern, and it, is idle to talk about trusting the Federal Parliament—it is idle, under the guise of that sentiment, to take away part of our province, and then say—"Trust the Federal Parliament to govern your province." Does South Australia ask the Federal Parliament to govern her province. What state has asked the Federal Parliament to govern her province? Not one in matters of territorial concern, and this will be the only instance from end to end of this Bill in which any province will be required to give up matters of entirely territorial concern, without its own consent, to the Federal Government. That is a proposal which stands alone, and I rely on the justice and good sense of this Convention to protect New South Wales from this irruption on her undoubted rights. Not only that. I shall fight to the last against any attempt to take away from New South Wales these matters of entirely provincial concern. I have over and over again expressed my willingness to do everything I can, with regard to the great power of navigation, to get accepted a construction of the Constitution, which I feel it fairly and rightly bears, which will give a vast deal more than the South Australians have ever asked us for in the way of navigation, but I dissent from this or any other proposal to give them rights in respect of New South Wales rivers alone. Why should they not be content with the rights proposed to be given in the way of navigation-content with taking the powers which deal with the federal side of the question—the navigation side, and not attempt to usurp powers which deal only with the provincial side of the question, and that against a whole state? The adoption of this amendment would be an entire infraction of the first resolution passed in Adelaide—the resolution under which the Bill of 1891 and this Bill were drawn; and, strong is I am in my respect for the Attorney-General of Victoria, I must say that, as far as any part of this resolution affecting to deal with the river system of New South Wales is concerned, it will meet with my uncompromising opposition, and I believe that the sense of justice of the Convention will support New South Wales in that respect.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I beg to move—

That the proposed new sub-section be amended by adding the following:—

"Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall be construed as making mandatory the provisions of section 96."

The provision we are discussing will, I think, render it compulsory on Parliament to appoint an Inter-State Commission under clause 96, and I do not believe that that commission will be a success. At all events, I do not think that we should fix it so rigidly on the Constitution that it cannot be abolished except by an amendment of the Constitution.
Mr. ISAACS. -

There is nothing in clause 96 to make it mandatory.

Mr. GLYNN. -

No; but if you provide in this sub-section that a certain power shall be given to the Inter-State Commission it cannot exercise or continue that power unless it is created. To prevent any doubt, I wish to move that these words be added. The representatives of South Australia have been described as unreasonably provincial, and other epithets have been used by honorable members today which would not have been used yesterday by those honorable members, according to their own expressions. It is extraordinary how the wind of opinion will change about. We have seen since last night a great deal of shifting of position, not only by the larger but by the smaller states. That cannot be the result of any deep study during the last 24 hours. The honorable member (Mr. Wise) put the position very clearly as being one that necessitates the very strongest consideration by the other members of the Convention as to the justice of the claim put forward by New South Wales. He said he would be quite willing to stand upon sub-section (1), with a definition which would get rid of the doubt as to what was a navigable river and the difficulty as to intermittency. I have on the printed list of amendments one which defines rivers that are navigable, including those which are intermittent. I ask honorable members, and particularly the delegates from New South Wales, will they be prepared, if the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) is not carried, to rest upon sub-section (1), and remove all doubts as to its comprehension by a definition? I said this morning that personally I was prepared to do that, but until I get some definite statement from the members from New South Wales as to that definition, I shall stand by the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs).

Mr. WISE. -

The amendment as it stands will prevent you doing anything with your own irrigation works without going to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I am not going to argue what this amendment will do. I do not say it is the best amendment possible.

Mr. WISE. -

Are you willing to hand over your irrigation works to the Federal Parliament

Mr. GLYNN. -

Certainly not.

Mr. WISE. -
Then you ought to vote against the amendment.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I am not now going to discuss the scope of the amendment, but I am not so wedded to the amendment which I intend to propose that I would not be prepared to support the New South Wales members if they would make clear the meaning of sub-section (1). I have heard the honorable members (Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Barton) say over and over again that they wished to leave the rights of the states to be decided under sub-section (1). There is a doubt whether the Darling River would come under its comprehension, and I ask to have that doubt removed. Is it unreasonable for the members from South Australia to say to the members from New South Wales, are you prepared to render plain beyond all doubt the meaning of sub-section (1)? If they say "Yes," I will give them my adhesion. If they will not answer, I am bound to support the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs). I am not absolutely wedded even to the definition which I have given in my amendment on the paper. I will be prepared to support any words that will make it perfectly clear that the intermittent flow of rivers will not prevent them from being considered navigable.

Mr. LYNE. -

Why not allow that to be decided by the High Court?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Why leave a matter of doubt to be interpreted by any tribunal? The New South Wales delegates have over and over again said, "until this doubt is removed our hand will be stayed as to improvements." We want to settle that question. The honorable member (Mr. Lyne) now says -"Why not leave that to the Federal Judicature?" The Federal Judicature might not decide the matter for two or three years, and in the meantime the works contemplated could not be carried out, according to the New South Wales delegates.

Mr. WISE. -

I have stated the course I will take up.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The honorable member is perfectly fair, and I am prepared to stand by the position he has assumed. He says -"Do not pass this clause, but put in a definition." I am prepared to do that, but I am not going to vote against the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) until I know what the New South Wales delegates will do. I only ask that they shall put such a definition before us as will place it beyond the possibility of doubt whether the Darling is navigable within the meaning of the American decisions. That is a fair position to take up.
Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I submit to the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) that it is utterly useless to press this amendment. The provision for the Inter-State Commission is only in this clause now because of our inability to take it out at present. It is clear that on the recommittal of the clause it will be taken out, and then the proposed addition will be unnecessary.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I have been most anxious all through to vote for the South Australians if I can possibly see my way to do so. I know that the Attorney-General of Victoria has spent a large amount of time in drafting this amendment, but the more I think of it the more I feel that the last three lines will practically kill water conservation and irrigation.

Mr. FRASER. -

And federation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not say federation, because I do not think it will have much effect, but the more I think of it, notwithstanding the strong opinion of the honorable member (Mr. Symon), I am convinced that these lines will prevent the carrying out of what is my great desire—that is, to see the furtherance of irrigation and water conservation. With great regret, I shall have to vote against the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs).

Mr. Glynn's amendment was negatived. Question—that the proposed sub-section, as amended, be inserted in the clause—put.

NOES.
Abbott, Sir J.P. Moore, W.
I withdrew my alternative amendment this morning to give my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) an opportunity to move his amendment. I said that I did not care for his amendment so much as I did for the alternative one I had drafted, I suppose because of the love which a parent has for his offspring. I ask you now, sir, to put my amendment to the committee. I think it will be a fair test as to whether New South Wales is willing to give us what they declare will be the effect of this decision. I have already spoken on the matter, and therefore I content myself, sir, with asking you to put the amendment.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I would suggest to you, Sir Richard, that, although the amendment would be undoubtedly out of place if it were included in the clause as one of the powers of legislation, still if it were inserted at the end of the clause as an assistance to the interpretation of sub-section (1) it would be in order. We have not yet completed the consideration of the clause itself.

Mr. BARTON. -

We have that proviso about the liquor trade standing in the way.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I will put it, for instance, in this way—if my honorable colleague were to move, not at the end of any particular sub-section, but at the end of the clause itself, that for the purposes of sub-section (1) of the clause navigable rivers shall be deemed to be so-and-so, it would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I think the amendment would be in order if it were moved, not as a power of Parliament but as a portion of the clause.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

My intention, sir, was that it might subsequently be transposed to its proper place in the clause. I beg to move—

That the clause be amended by the addition of the following words:—"For the purposes of sub-section (1), waters shall be deemed navigable for trade and commerce which are in fact navigated continuously or at times for trade and commerce with other nations or among states, either by themselves or by their connexions with other waters."

Mr. BARTON. -

What does "at times" mean?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Intermittently.

Mr. BARTON. -

It may be one day in the year.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

If the amendment of my learned friend (Mr. Glynn) be adopted, it will preclude me from moving the alternative amendment which I have prepared, and which has been in print for some time. It will be understood that I had to vote against the amendment of my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) on the ground put so clearly by my honorable friends (Mr. Wise and Sir George Turner), which was that the last words of the amendment virtually made it necessary for each state to get the permission of the Federal Parliament, or of the Inter-State Commission, before it could make one water trust.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No; that was not the case.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I am putting my view of it, but I am not going to discuss it now I have no doubt whatever that that will be the effect, and of course my honorable friend has a doubt the other way. If my learned friend had put the first part of his amendment alone I should have voted for it. He did not put the first part of his amendment alone, and therefore I propose to move as sub-section (31) the amendment printed on the notice-paper:

To secure the navigability of all waters so far as in fact navigable which, in the course of their flow or after joining other waters, touch more than one state.

[P.537] starts here

The effect of this amendment will practically be what appears in the first part of the amendment of my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs). I was hoping that the two parts of his amendment would be divided, so that we might have the beneficial part, that is the first part, and not have the second part. I think honorable members who are interested in the cause—the just cause—of South Australia will have an opportunity, on pty amendment, to secure in effect the first part of the amendment of my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs), and, therefore, I beg to move the amendment accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Will the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) withdraw his amendment for the purpose of allowing the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) to move his amendment?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I understand, sir, that the honorable member wishes to insert his amendment where sub-section (31) was struck out.

The CHAIRMAN-Yes.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Of course, sir, my amendment may be moved after his amendment is disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Yes.

Mr. Glynn's amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I beg to move-

That the following be sub-section (31):-

To secure the navigability of all waters so far as in fact navigable which, in the course of their flow or after joining other waters, touch more than one state.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I do not know whether my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) has the right view of this or whether I have. I think we are both of the opinion that we ought to provide for irrigation; but the wording of this amendment is a direct instruction to the Federal Parliament to secure the navigability of all waters so far as in fact navigable which, in the course of their flow or after joining other waters, touch more than one state. That, to my mind, will shut out irrigation entirely.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
No.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Surely my honorable friend must misconceive it, with all due deference to his better knowledge and better judgment than mine. It simply says to the Federal Parliament: "It is your duty to secure the navigability of these rivers at all hazards or at all costs, and the expense of irrigation is not to be taken into consideration. If I read this amendment correctly I must vote against it, unless my honorable friend can show me that I have misconstrued his meaning.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
It is not a direction or a duty, but a power.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Surely power implies a duty.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
One broad reason which influences me in voting against the amendment is that it, like so many others which have been suggested, makes a difference between certain rivers and the other rivers of the Commonwealth. I hold the distinct opinion that whether we leave the Constitution to the operation of sub-section (1), or whether we do anything by way of stronger definition-and I am afraid that strong definitions too often amount to limitations—we should make no difference between the navigable waters of one state and those of another.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
My amendment refers to all navigable waters touching more than one state

Mr. ISAACS. -
That will not include the Darling.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It would include the Darling, but not the Yarra.

Mr. BARTON. -
The Commonwealth control of navigation should include control over the navigation of the Yarra, the Tamar, the Derwent, the Swan, and every river in the Commonwealth which is in fact navigable.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Not unless its waters touch more than one state.

Mr. BARTON. -

During recent debates we have heard a great deal about federalism, but we never heard that it was federalism to prescribe in one part of the Constitution that trade and intercourse should be absolutely free, while in another part of the Constitution power is not taken to secure that freedom.

Mr. DOBSON. -

That is hardly a fair way of putting it. What have we to do with rivers that do not touch more than one state?

Mr. BARTON. -

We prescribe in the Constitution that trade and intercourse shall be free; we also give the Commonwealth power to regulate trade and commerce. By the combined effect of these two provisions, and by further words, if necessary, we wish to obtain that the authority of the Commo

Mr. DOBSON. -

Yes, between state and state.

Mr. BARTON. -

Not merely between state and state. If a ship sails from Sydney for the Swan River, or from some port in Victoria for the Derwent or Tamar, is that not commerce between state and state?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Is it not the river that flows from state to state that we want to regulate?

Mr. BARTON. -

No, that is an exploded idea, which has been created by the continuous way in which the minds of some honorable members have been sedulously directed to the belief that the only river traffic worth troubling about is that in which New South Wales is concerned. A great many honorable members have been led to forget that inter-state commerce is not comprehended in the navigation of the Murray and of the Darling, that it of necessity includes the navigation of all rivers that are navigable, and which under a reasonable interpretation of the trade and commerce sub-section can be kept navigable. The difficulty which has arisen, and which I quite anticipated, has arisen from the fact that we have been discussing the question of the Murray and the Darling at such great length that we have really left all other rivers out of account. I am sure that every honorable member will see that whatever power we give over the navigability of one river we must give over the navigability of another.

Mr. ISAACS. -

My amendment proposed to include them all.
Mr. BARTON. -

So far as the first portion of it is concerned the honorable and learned member took the statesmanlike position of proposing to deal equally with all the rivers of the Commonwealth. With regard to the trade and commerce sub-section I have been quite at one with him; we have been at difference only as to the best means to effect our ends. But I want honorable members to recognise that we must not make fish of one and fowl of another. We have no business to prescribe certain regulations for rivers which flow through or between two or more states. What we have to deal with is the river system, not of New South Wales or of Western Australia, but of the whole Commonwealth. The only federal view to take of the question is to let the power of controlling the navigation of rivers extend to every navigable river in the Commonwealth. If a ship goes out of a harbor, and is bound to a river, or if she goes out of a river, and is bound to a harbor, it matters not, the control of that river is essential to the complete federal control of the navigation. Without labouring the matter, I have only to say that I object to any differentiation between the rivers of one part of the Commonwealth and those of another part of the Commonwealth. When we deal with the rivers, we must make a uniform law applicable to them all, and as we are not now making that law, but only giving power to enact it, we must make that power as comprehensive as the equity of the case demands, and as wide as the limits of the whole Commonwealth.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

It is with something approaching to awe that I venture to differ from the construction placed upon the amendment by the leader of the Convention. The honorable and learned member is a lawyer, and a very astute one. I am a simple layman, who, when he reads the English language, outside of certain Acts of Parliament, puts a reasonable construction upon what he reads.

Mr. BARTON. -

Is not that claiming infallibility?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I do not claim infallibility; I have read the proposed amendment, as I think any average schoolboy and a good many adults would read it. The amendment is to secure the navigability of all waters so far as they are in fact navigable which, in the course of their flow or after joining other waters, touch more than one state. How can my honorable and learned friend contend that a vessel leaving Adelaide for the Tamar sails its course over the waters of a river which join with the waters of the port from which the vessel comes?

Mr. BARTON. -

My right honorable friend must have misunderstood me. I never committed myself to any ridiculous nonsense of the kind.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I understood the honorable and learned member to say that the Tamar, the Derwent, and the Swan were three rivers over which, according to the amendment, federal control would be given.

Mr. BARTON. -

Will the right honorable member allow me to explain what I said? I objected to the amendment because it dealt with rivers which, in the course of their flow, touched more than one state. My objection was that it was not material whether a river flowed entirely through one state or not, for if we gave the power to regulate trade and commerce, and with it navigation, that power should be so large as to extend to the control of the navigation of every river within the Commonwealth so far as it was navigable. Therefore, the clause imposed a limitation with which I did not agree.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I am glad that the leader of the Convention did not make such a monstrous statement as I understood him to make.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I quite agree with the leader of the Convention with regard to this matter, and I am not disposed to criticise the amendment from a merely verbal stand-point. I agree also with Sir George Turner that the radical defect in the amendment is that it places navigability not only in the first rank, but refers to it as the only consideration. It is, under this amendment, the primary duty of the Federal Parliament to look after the navigability of these rivers, and to disregard every other consideration. I utterly disagree with that view; and I think from the wording of the amendment-I am not going to make any verbal criticism, because in my view no alteration would amend it-that the Darling would not be included, because the amendment is confined to waters which in the course of their flow do, after joining other waters, touch more than one state. Now, the waters of the Darling would not come under this provision until they touched more than one state. Suppose, however, you alter the word "waters" to "river," when does the River Darling ever touch more than one state? Never. The Murray does after the Darling joins it, but after the junction is effected the Darling has its existence obliterated.

Mr. BARTON. -

Might not the Darling touch more than one state after joining with the Murray?
Mr. ISAACS. -

Would any one say that it is the Darling River after the junction with the Murray?

Mr. BARTON. -

But the intention of the amendment is to say that the Darling is a river after the junction.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The water of the Darling joins the water of the Murray. If you use the word "river" you never get lower than the junction of the Darling and the Murray, and if you use the word "waters" you never get higher than that. Honorable members will see that you are simply between Scylla and Charybdis.

[P.540] starts here

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The idea is plain enough; it is merely a matter of drafting.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am pointing out that the amendment does not make the matter plain by any means, but I am also pointing out that it is giving the go-by altogether to irrigation, and has this further cardinal defect, that it does eliminate, by embracing one class of rivers, and therefore excluding another from the federal control, rivers which ought to be under federal control for the purposes of inter-state commerce, and which are inseparable from inter-state commerce. I think we should put in words which will make it clear that that control ought to be adhered to. I do not know any better words than those of the first part of the amendment which I suggested, which embrace all such rivers and exclude all other rivers.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I should like to reply to the criticisms which have been made upon my amendment, but I will do so very briefly. The leader of the Convention says that if this control is to be given in regard to any waters it should be given with regard to all navigable rivers, even with regard to the Snowy River, the Darling, the Tamar, and the Yarra. I join issue with the honorable member. I do not think we should give to the Federal Parliament the control over the Derwent, the Tamar, the Swan River, the Yarra, or the Brisbane River. These are purely state concerns. More than that, under the United States Constitution there is no such power given. I have a passage here which makes it clear that under the United States Constitution there is a power which we have often had referred to during the last few days-to regulate trade and commerce. Now, Story, in his work on the Constitution of the United States, says that-It is not doubted that it extends to the regulation of navigation, and to the coasting trade and fisheries, within as well as without any state, wherever it is connected with the commerce or intercourse with any other state, or with foreign nations. But it does not extend to the navigation of a river wholly within one state, separated from tide water by an impassable fall, and not forming part of any continuous track of commerce between states, or with a foreign country.

Does not the case of Daniel Ball settle the matter?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That case refers to the ebb and flow, I think.

Mr. BARTON. -

It denies that ebb and flow is an essential.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I do not intend to detain the committee with a discussion upon this matter now, but I think the point is clear from Story; and I deny, as a matter of expediency, that it is desirable to intrust the Federal Parliament with the control of the Tamar, the Derwent, the Swan River, the Yarra, or-

Mr. HOWE. -

Or the Styx.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Quite so. Sir George Turner says that this amendment stops irrigation. It does not. It simply leaves irrigation as it was, but subject to such paramount laws as the Federal Parliament may enact for the purpose of securing navigation. I admit that this amendment is not the one that I should have liked to have. I have already indicated what I should have liked, and eighteen members of the Convention have voted for it. But this amendment does say that the Federal Parliament shall secure the navigability of all inter-state rivers. That is all I wish to do here. Mr. Isaacs has said that this amendment puts navigability in the first rank. I admit that he is right; it does. I will be as frank with the committee as I can. I should have liked to leave the whole question to the Federal Parliament to say whether irrigation or navigation should be in the first rank. But if we come to the question of what is right between states, I do think that all that South Australia could fairly claim would be that navigability should be kept up to such a degree as nature has allowed navigability. But that is all. South Australia cannot claim more than that.

If she achieves the result of having maintained such navigability as nature gave the Darling and the Murray when their waters come to South Australia, she will be able to make use of those waters for irrigation or for any other purpose which will not interfere with the use of the waters above.

Mr. Barton. -

You mean to keep, not make, them navigable? You do not want to extend navigability?

Mr. Higgins. -

All I say is that if South Australia and New South Wales were in the position of private owners, with the Murray flowing through their land New South Wales, as the owner higher up the stream, must not diminish the flow of the water so far as to affect the degree of navigability which the river possesses at certain times. Apply that to the states, and say that the Federal Parliament may make such enactments as may keep navigable this river so far as nature has given it a navigable quality. If for this p

Mr. Dobson. -

Is the honorable member quite sure of his law when he says that, even though the navigability of the river is to be maintained, when a stream of water reaches South Australia, South Australia can set to work to irrigate? Might not one solitary trader object and say that his rights were being interfered with?

Mr. Higgins. -

I admit that if South Australia took, for the purpose of irrigation, such a volume of water as would prevent the navigation of the Murray, it would be doing an illegal act, and that it could be restrained: But I understand that South Australia, for the purpose of irrigation, will be able to take great quantities of this water without seriously interfering with the navigability of the river.

Mr. Dobson. -

Could not one trader stop the whole of their irrigation schemes if he were injuriously affected by them?

Mr. Higgins. -

He could, provided the Federal Parliament had passed an enactment to secure the navigability of the stream.

Mr. Glynn (South Australia). -

I would ask Mr. Higgins whether this amendment is not really a cutting down of the scope of sub-section (1), which gives a power to improve rivers? This will limit the power of the Federal Parliament to securing existing navigability.

Mr. Higgins. -

Not existing.

Mr. Glynn. -

Yes; it specifies something that might fall under sub-section (1), and it might, therefore, limit the scope of sub-section (1). If the navigable discharge was 4 feet, it might be necessary, in view of evaporation, to secure by a lock a discharge, in a given month, of 8 feet. Under this amendment an application could be made against the state for attempting to raise the level to 8 feet, because the navigable discharge without the lock would have been 4 feet. You make it 8 feet, and therefore you are really increasing beyond existing navigability the navigable discharge of the river. That would stop the hand of the Federal Parliament in improving the river. I do not say that there may not be some doubt about this point, but it seems to me that the amendment would operate as a bar to the Federal Parliament in improving the river under sub-section (1). It is a limitation rather than an extension of that provision.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

I would suggest to the leader of the Convention that this would be a convenient time to report progress. We have struck out sub-section (31), and we have got the ground clear for some other proposal which might possibly meet with the approval of a majority of honorable members. I am sure that if we leave a blank and rest content with sub-section (1), which has been described by the leader of the Convention as covering the ground, we shall not give satisfaction, at least to the people of South Australia. I have no desire to continue the debate now if the leader of the Convention will indicate that he is prepared to report progress.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

This debate has taken up five or six days of the time of the Convention. When the public speak at all on the subject through the press they say that they are heartily tired of it, and they do not want to hear the voices of any more of us, even through the press. We have all said our say, and expressed our views as strongly and emphatically as we can. If we do not come to some decision soon it will be said that we are indulging in idle reiteration. Every honorable member will agree with me that a body of this kind ought to show that it does not indulge in the practice of repeating sentiments and arguments that prevails in some other places. A good deal more is expected of the elected of the five colonies than is expected generally from representative bodies. I do think it would be a wise thing for Mr. Solomon to withdraw his request, and let us decide the matter to-night. The country is waiting to hear our decision, and when I speak of the country I speak of Australia. I think that some irritation will be caused if we do not come to a decision.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

I would submit with all respect to the leader of the Convention, and with all respect to the press and to the country, that this is a matter of so much importance that the representatives of South Australia cannot rest content with the omission of sub-section (31). That sub-section was not struck out because of any feeling on the part of honorable members that the South Australian claims did not call for recognition, but because of the manner in which the question was put, and in which the amendments were hacked about by various legal gentlemen. A number of honorable members did not know what they were voting for. I am not inclined to give way now on account of any expressions of opinion on the part of any section of the press as to the way in which our work should be done, or how long we should continue sitting. If we spent, not four or five days, but even four or five weeks, on the consideration of so important a question, and succeeded in arriving at some satisfactory conclusion, we should have done our duty. It is my intention to endeavour to get some provision inserted in the Bill that will satisfy the people of South Australia before we leave this particular clause. It is all very well for the leader of the Convention, as the representative of the colony of New South Wales, to say-after we have knocked out one sub-section that would have protected any "fancy" claims, as they have been called, of South Australia, but what we choose to call its moral claims—that the country has had enough of this subject. As far as the representatives of South Australia are concerned, they have not had enough of it. We want some provision inserted in the Bill which will more definitely place the control of the rivers in the Federal Government, and more definitely protect the interests of South Australia with regard to the Murray, than the sub-sections that now stand in this clause. I do, therefore, desire to debate the matter, at any rate, a little further. As to the question of the time occupied, I would ask whether it has been occupied by the lay members? Was it not the legal members who spoke hour after hour, and time after time, upon every simple amendment, and did they not rather resent any attempt on the part of the lay members to give voice to the opinions of their constituents? I do not wish to occupy the time of the Convention unduly. I have not done that at any of our sittings. I have always endeavoured to confine my remarks within as few words as possible, but I do not think it fair to the colony that I represent that the debate on this important subject should be closed at once. The amendments now submitted require careful consideration, and I hope that they will be discussed, and discussed fully. Mr. Higgins' amendment may not as it stands at present meet the views of all the members of the Convention, but we might, by the substitution of other words, make it acceptable. We should, at any rate, insert some provision in place of sub-section (31) which has been struck out, and in my opinion most foolishly struck out, so far as the representatives of South Australia were concerned, at any rate. That sub-section did give us some definite protection in regard to our rights in the River Murray.

Mr. FRASER. -

You were not satisfied with it.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

It is not for me to say whether the whole of the representatives of Australia were satisfied with it or not. They were not satisfied with a clause in the Draft Bill of 1891, which, to my mind, would have met all our requirements, and to which the people of New South Wales were perfectly willing to agree. That clause placed under the control of the Federal Parliament river navigation with respect to the common purposes of two or more states or parts of the Commonwealth." Sub-section (31) should have been left in the clause, and it probably would have been left in, but for a reversal of the old saying, that in the multitude of counsellors there is wisdom." There were too many counsellors-too many Queen's counsellors-and the result was that this provision, which would have been useful, was struck out. Now we find ourselves without any protection whatever against any encroachment on the part of New South Wales. I am sure the leader of the Convention will see that it is not the desire of the members of the Convention to close this debate hurriedly. We have given ourselves ample time for the consideration of many points that have been brought before us, but there is here a blank which should be filled up. There is something more wanted, and I, for one, will resist any attempt to take a final vote on this question until a reasonable opportunity has been given to honorable members to fully consider it.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I think the request made by the honorable member is a reasonable one. I am not at all satisfied in my own mind about the omission of sub-section (31). I am quite sure that some of our friends from South Australia were led to believe that that subsection conferred on them an empty right and an empty power, and, that being their view, they were quite willing to allow the sub-section to be struck out. But it is a serious matter for them, and they ought to have an opportunity of considering whether, now that the other proposals have been rejected, that sub-section ought not to be restored. I would suggest that it should be restored, with the addition of the words "without limiting sub-section (1) of clause 52." I should like to do something to help the representatives of South Australia, and I shall be no party to rushing this matter through. I would advise honorable members to seriously consider whether sub-section (31) should not be restored with the addition I have suggested. The great argument against it was that it limited the sub-section relating to the regulation of trade and commerce, and there might be considerable force in that argument. In order to give time for consideration, I would suggest that progress be reported.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

It is obvious that sub-section (31) could not be restored now. It was negatived on the consideration of this clause, and it could not be reinstated at the same stage, so that if we were to wait till midnight the honorable member would not have the opportunity he seeks. There will be an opportunity later on, if honorable members are disposed to re-open the question, to recommit the clause for the purpose of its further consideration. I myself have an amendment, which I have sent to the Government Printer, and which I may think it necessary to ask the Convention to consider.

Mr. HOWE. -

That is another reason why we ought to report progress.

Mr. REID. -

No, I do not propose to bring it on at this stage of this clause at all. I feel that after the very long time we have taken over this question the public have a right to know our final mind upon it.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Have we not got to a decision of it yet?

Mr. REID. -

It does not look like it, rooting about, as we are, among the embers.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

It is true that sub-section (31) was negatived, but not on its merits. There was a majority in favour of the purport of the sub-section, and it was simply negatived because some unfortunate words crept in which put the majority against it. However, we want to arrive at the sense of the Convention on this important question, and I think it is only reasonable that we should be given time to consider the matter. We have the members of the Convention whom we look upon as authorities on questions of this character taking opposite sides. We have the leader of the Convention telling us that we have everything we want in sub-section (1) of clause 52, and we have the Premier of the same colony from which the leader himself comes telling us that that same sub-section gives us nothing at all.

Mr. REID. -

I did not say that.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
The honorable member told us that the rivers of New South Wales were free highways, free from all tolls, free from all duties, but he is careful to oppose any provision which would secure justice to South Australia in this matter.

Mr. HOWE. -
Mr. Isaacs takes the same view as Mr. Reid.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Yes, Mr. Isaacs says that we have not got what we are contending for under sub-section (1) of clause 52.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I do not know what you contend for now.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
I am not reflecting on the honorable member, who has helped us to the best of his ability, and who has thrown such light on this matter as to enhance his already great reputation by the lucidity he has brought to bear on the problem which confronts us. Through the loss of this provision South Australia, and indeed the whole federal cause, has sustained a great injury, and we now want to know where we are.

Mr. REID. -
You had better take a week to ascertain that; you will never find out.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
No, not a week. I think we ought to take the adjournment at the ordinary time. To those honorable members who have any misgivings as to the length of time taken over our deliberations, I would venture to say that when we are at a critical point, the more time we take for the solution of the problem the better chance we shall have of securing federation, because our action in so doing goes to show that we intend to adopt the Constitution. People take more trouble about building houses when they are going to inhabit them. The great legal luminaries of the Convention differ, and we should be given time to ascertain which is on the right side and which on the wrong, because undoubtedly some members of the Convention who have the highest legal reputations are hopelessly in the wrong on the one side or the other. I want to know which side it is, and I join in the appeal that we should adjourn at the usual time, which has already arrived, to see if we cannot, to-morrow, put in some words which will make the intention of the Convention abundantly clear. I have been considering whether we had not better go back to the clause as framed at the 1891 Convention. I think that the proceedings of that gathering will never throw anything but lustre on the cause of federation. The clause which was then arrived at unanimously, I believe, reads as follows—

River navigation with respect to the common purposes of two or more states or parts of the Commonwealth.

I am in doubt whether it would not be better for us to go back again to that fountain of wisdom, and to put in some words similar to those which have been erroneously struck out.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

No doubt we have been discussing this matter for a considerable time, but we have made good progress to-day, and if we were to continue sitting we would have, in order to do any real work, to sit till a late hour this evening. Now, I would put it to my honorable friend, the leader of the Convention, that we have all been in a good temper, and that there has been good feeling right through, but I am afraid that if we sit on till late, as we should have to do to give proper time for the discussion of these amendments, we may depart from that good behaviour which has characterized us up to the present. I would therefore urge upon the leader of the Convention once more that it would be wise, in the interests of the progress of business, to give way and let us go home.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Honorable members know that I always regard the Right Hon. Sir George Turner as my "guide, philosopher, and friend." I had no intention to sit late, but I thought when I was first asked to report progress that, as we had discussed principles ad nauseam, and had decided the principles of two or three of the amendments, we might perhaps go on and deal at once with the main question. If, however, that is not the desire, and if representatives of South Australia say they wish to continue the discussion to-morrow, I am not going to exercise any drastic rule over the Convention. I am only here to carry out the wishes of honorable members, and I should certainly have the greatest pleasure in reporting progress. I thought we might sit until half-past five and dispose of the whole matter, but, as that is not to be, I shall not ask honorable members to sit any longer. I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to. Progress was then reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BARTON. -

I beg to move that the Convention do now adjourn.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I must enter my protest against the prolongation of the debate on the rivers question. We have been debating the subject for days, and we have practically come to a conclusion. We are all tired of the question now, and if any further amendments or new sub-sections are to be moved the wisest course will, be to give notice of them, and deal with them on the recommittal of the Bill. We have devoted too much time to this subject. I have come a long way to do my duty, and I have not unlimited time. Water is supposed to be refreshing, especially when diluted; but I really think we shall dispose of this subject better if we go on with some other business, and give time for honorable members to give notice of their proposals, which can be dealt with, as other important matters will be, when the Bill is recommitted. I hope we shall not devote the whole of to-morrow to this rivers question.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am quite at one with my right honorable friend in wishing a speedy termination of the debate. I hope we shall all make up our minds and take some practical step. We know each other's opinions, and if there are any other propositions made, let us not debate them interminably, but go to a vote, and take the fortune of war. Something has been said about night sittings. I should like to say that the position of business is such that the finance and trade chapter will have to be postponed until after we deal with the states and new states. That will give time for the drafting of the clauses. I do not myself propose, subject to the opinion of the Convention, to ask for any night sittings until after that point is reached—until after we begin the debate on finance—when we shall be in a position to decide whether they will be necessary.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention adjourned at fifteen minutes past five o'clock.
Friday, 4th February, 1898.

Statisticians' Reports - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

STATISTICIANS' REPORTS.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I should like to call the attention of the leader of the Convention to the request I made at one of our earlier sittings during the present session (on 21st January) that the letters of the Hon. Edward Pulsford in reference to Mr. Coghlan's figures might be laid on the table. I do not know whether those letters have been reprinted yet, but I would call attention to the fact that Mr. Pulsford has, in the Sydney Morning Herald of Wednesday last, published another letter in criticism of the further paper forwarded to the members of this Convention by Mr. Coghlan. I would ask that that letter should be included in the paper to be printed along with the first.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have not the slightest objection to the letter referred to by my honorable friend being printed.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on clause 52, and on Mr. Higgins' amendment to substitute for sub-section (31), which had been struck out, the following sub-section:-

To secure the navigability of all waters so far as in fact navigable which, in the course of their flow or after joining other waters, touch more than one state.

Question-That the sub-section proposed to be inserted be so inserted-put.

The committee divided-

I now beg to move—

That the following be sub-section (31):—

The Rivers Murray and Darling, so far as may be necessary to the maintenance and improvement of their navigability, but so that no state interested shall be prevented from using any of the waters of such rivers for the purposes of conservation and irrigation.

I think that these words embrace our original intention, that the use of the waters in a state is a state right; and that although we give away general powers with regard to navigability, still we put the necessity for irrigation and conservation first as within our own power. It seems to me that this brings us back to a very fair test of the whole question. The only difference, so far as I can see, between ourselves and South Australia is this: By the previous proposal of Mr. Symon—and I may say that the words of this proposal are entirely his words and those if Mr. Isaacs, there is scarcely a word of my own in it—to which we took objection, and on which we differed, he introduced the words "reasonable use." Now, it seems to me that if the honorable member wishes to test this question fairly and squarely, and to bring us back to our original position, he can propose as an amendment upon my proposed new sub-section, words to the effect that no state shall be prevented from the "reasonable use" of any waters. That seems to me to bring the whole matter to a fair test.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Does it not introduce the same uncertainty as we had in regard to the previous amendment?
Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I do not approve of that amendment, but I understand that it is sufficient for South Australia.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am going to move an amendment to that effect.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It indicates the principles which the South Australian representatives are fighting for; but, at the same time, we hold that there should be no restriction whatever upon our rights in that respect. Because, if honorable member will think of the question that will have to be tried in the future, they will see that it is not a question of law; it is a practical question of fact, as regards the condition of the time when any action may be taken; and it is clear that you must have the rights so embodied in the different states that there can be no friction whatever. I therefore beg to move the insertion of the words which I have read.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

The proposed sub-section of Mr. McMillan, subject to the insertion of the words "the reasonable use of the waters," will substantially give effect to my view of what the position ought to be, and which, I venture to think, the majority of this Convention desire.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It only refers to two rivers.

Mr. SYMON. -

I know it only refers to two rivers, and in that respect I very much prefer my own amendment, with the little alteration I intended to make in it. But, as a very large instalment of our contention with regard to the Darling, Mr. McMillan's amendment is substantially a great protection to South Australia.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

If amended.

Mr. SYMON. -

It does not go as far as my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) in his generous desire to help us wishes to go, but I desire that, if possible, we should settle this question and come to a fair arrangement. If the majority of this Convention concur in this amendment it will be an instalment of that justice to which we think we are entitled. I beg to move

That after the word "from" (line 4), the following words be inserted:-"the reasonable use of."

If my amendment is agreed to the sub-section will read as follows:-

The Rivers Murray and Darling, so far as may be necessary to the maintenance and improvement of their navigability, but so that no state interested shall be prevented from the reasonable use of any of the waters of such rivers for the purposes of conservation and irrigation.

I apprehend that that will bring the provision, notwithstanding its shortcomings, within the scope of what will be just to us and fair to the other colonies.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I rather regret that the amendment has been submitted. As we went so far yesterday in deciding to leave matters of rights and use to the Federal Court, I think it is better to remain where we are. To my mind the amendment infringes upon the powers of the Federal Court.

The words "maintenance and improvement" apply only to two rivers—the Murray and the Darling—but there are other rivers with which we require to deal.

Mr. HOWE. -

Do not widen the question. Let us narrow it as much as possible.

Mr. LYNE. -

I am not going to widen the question but I do not think that the power of the Federal Court to decide these rights should be restricted as the amendment would restrict it. I think that in the interests of South Australia, whose representatives have fought so determinedly in connexion with the Darling question, this power should be left unrestricted. I question very much if it is a wise thing to give the Federal Parliament power to interfere with the works of any state.

Mr. HOWE. -

The amendment has nothing to do with the Federal Parliament. The honorable member is off the track.

Mr. LYNE. -

I venture to think that it has something to do with the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HOWE. -

Read the amendment.

Mr. SYMON. -

What the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) contended for yesterday was that the High Court, if anybody, should decide these matters.

Mr. LYNE. -

Quite so; but the amendment takes it out of the power of the High Court to do this.

Mr. SYMON. -

No; quite the reverse.

Mr. LYNE. -

The honorable and learned member's amendment was moved with the intention of leaving it to the Federal Court to interpret the meaning of the words "reasonable use," but, in my opinion, if we are to accept the statements of leading members of the Convention, the High Court can do that now.

Mr. SYMON. -

No. The point is one which the High Court cannot determine.

Mr. LYNE. -

I judge from the explanation of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Barton), and of other honorable members, that the court can determine all rights existing upon the establishment of the Federation. We are surely not going to restrict this power. I thi

Mr. SOLOMON. -

There was no test vote.

Mr. LYNE. -

If we do not do so we shall be discussing this matter all next week. Some honorable members think that we should place irrigation and conservation before navigation, but I say that the Federal Court could decide that.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That is just what the honorable member will not agree to.

Mr. LYNE. -

If the amendment is carried, the Federal Court will not be able to go beyond it. The court will have to say that conservation and irrigation must come before everything else.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That is what the honorable member was arguing for yesterday.

Mr. LYNE. -

I have no objection to the latter part of the amendment, but the first part of it gives the Federal Government power to come in and do what it likes in connexion with the two rivers mentioned.

Mr. SYMON. -

Only for a limited purpose.

Mr. LYNE. -

This provision will prevent the state from carrying out works without the consent of the Federal Parliament. I do not object to the second part of the amendment, but I am not going to vote for the second part in conjunction with the first part.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Would the honorable member like the amendment better if it applied to all rivers?

Mr. LYNE. -

I do not think that it is necessary. In my opinion, matters had better be left as they stand. If you put in a declaratory clause to the effect that conservation and irrigation must come before navigation I shall not object; but I am not asking for that at the present time. To give the maintenance and the improvement of the Murray and the Darling to the Federal Parliament is to take away a state right from New South Wales, which I, as a representative of that colony, decline to give up.

Question-That the words of Mr. Symon's amendment proposed to be inserted be so inserted-put.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
The first objection I have to the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) is that it departs from the federal lines upon which the Convention has acted from the initiation of this movement down to the present moment. It seeks to isolate two streams for particular treatment. This is done in order to help one colony which is represented in the Convention at the expense of another.

Mr. ISAACs. -
The amendment has been proposed by a representative of New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -
That does not limit my intelligence in addressing myself to the subject. It is a peculiar sort of answer to any reasoning I may advance that another intellect has arrived at a different conclusion. If the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) were His Holiness the Pope, the honorable and learned member's interjection might have some force.

Mr. ISAACs. -
The right honorable member said that the amendment was introduced for a particular purpose.

Mr. REID. -
For the first time in the history of the federation movement the Convention lays its hand upon the property of one colony for federal purposes, in spite of the protest of at any rate the great body of the representatives of that colony. I do not object, as I have said all along, as to the Murray. My point of objection is not as to the Murray. I consider it is a federal river in every sense of the term. I make no difficulty about any reasonable proposition as to the Murray. I am dealing with this question as it affects the other river named—the Darling—which is the point of my observation only. I want to point out that this extends the federal fiscal interference and control right through 1,300 miles of New South Wales territory, on a river which is entirely within New South Wales territory, and I ask honorable members, if they can, simply to apply this case to their own colony. Just let us consider if, instead of New South Wales, this was Western Australia, with 1,300 miles of a river that happened to flow into any river which eventually reached the borders of another colony. Let us imagine that this was the case with Victoria, although I think Victoria in its works of conservation is much bound up with us in this matter. It is not at all a matter of interest to me; it is a matter entirely for my honorable friends who have so faithfully represented the colony of Victoria.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Only two of them voted over there.

Mr. REID. -

I am very glad to hear that. I want to point out that whilst we in New South Wales are quite agreeable that the power of the Federation should stretch along every inch of that river, along the whole 1,300 miles in New South Wales, for the purpose of preventing or stopping any exercise of local control over the rivers which is unfederal and unequal, and distinguishes in favour of our own people against the people of any other colony; whilst I am absolutely prepared, as we all are prepared in the interests of federation, to hand over to the Federation the power over all that area of New South Wales, we stop short at this. Whilst we are willing that the Federation should step in, if in our management of our lands and waters we do anything to derogate from the freedom of federal trade and commerce, we are not willing to carry the sacrifice so far as to hand over these 1,300 miles of water running through New South Wales, for it is handed over absolutely under these words.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

No.

Mr. REID. -

I shall endeavour to show my honorable friend why I say it is. If you hand over to any power whatever, either a Federal Parliament, a harbor trust, or a river board, the duty or the power of maintaining river navigation, you absolutely hand over the fiscal control of the waters navigated for the purpose of maintaining navigation. Surely that is a proposition which no one will deny. Very well, what follows from that? We come then down to a state of things which is no stretch of imagination, but is the plain notorious history of that River Darling, that, over and over again in every year, times occur when the river ceases to be navigable. Now, let us take the duty of the Federal Parliament in that case. The river is approaching the point at which it ceases to be a navigable river. The Federal Parliament has only one duty in this matter, and that is the duty of maintaining navigation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And improvement.

Mr. REID. -

And improvement. What is done for Conservation and irrigation in all the works along the river banks? They are to have the use of these waters as far as that use is reasonable. But when you come to a conflict between navigation and irrigation, what is a perfectly reasonable use of the waters when there is a conflict, and when the river is in a normal state for the purposes of irrigation and conservation, becomes an unreasonable use if it destroys navigability. And that is the point that would have to go to the Federal Court from hundreds, perhaps from thousands, of persons all along the banks of that federal river. This is not so simple as a controversy between two states. In the ease of hundreds of thousands of persons settled along the banks of the river in times to come every one of them will have a right to go to the Federal Court, to have all these various questions—they will vary according to the circumstances of the river naturally-settled by a court of law, and the Federal Court. Now, I ask this committee whether they are going to reduce irrigation to that precarious state or not? As my honorable friend (Mr. Peacock) said, it is not a New South Wales matter.
When this federation is accomplished, the broad productive interests of New South Wales are the interests of every person represented in this Convention. Nothing surprised me more in a Convention which is supposed to consist of a large number of representative men, sworn by their whole political careers to enhance production, even at the expense of the most elaborate fiscal systems of protection; nothing staggered me more in this Convention than to find men who have devoted years of their lives—I do not wish to get into any fiscal controversy, I do not wish to express an opinion on the merits of what has been done, I am merely accepting matters from their point of view—when honorable members who are distinguished throughout Australia by this attitude, so believe in developing the native industries and native productions

of Australia that they go the length of putting all sorts of taxes on importations, it is astounding to me to find that, as far as the traders of the Murray are concerned, the whole productive interests of this vast country sink into second place, and it is the merchant traders of South Australia whom these advocates of native industries really represent. This is a peculiar inversion of political careers and political sympathies. Now, I am determined, in the face of the whole of the people of Australia, to test every member of this Convention on the one question—whether, in the case of these great rivers, to which we look for an indefinite development of native industries, honorable members are prepared to put the convenience of a few barges laden with wool for Adelaide above the destinies of the continent? That is the question it has come down to. What is all this struggle about? It is a struggle for the South Australian barges to carry the wool down the Darling. When we know that, owing to the cheapness of water carriage, it is a common occurrence for the settlers of New South Wales to leave their wool on the shadow of which the irrigation of Australia will be secured, in every court and under all circumstances, we are asked to throw that vital point at the mercy of a decision, not one decision, but a thousand decisions on a thousand different sets of facts, affecting a thousand different settlers and conservation works on the banks of the River Darling. Now, if any man can look forward cheerfully to the prospect of putting the pioneers of Australia in that part of the continent under such a condition for the development of their industry and the employment of their capital, I certainly cannot view the prospect with any satisfaction, and I strongly oppose this proposal for the reasons I have mentioned; and, whether carried or not, I shall subsequently invite the Convention to pronounce on the vital point which I have referred to.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I have to oppose the insertion of this sub-section, because, in the first place, it cuts down the commercial powers, if those powers exist, of the Federation with regard to navigable waters throughout Australia. I can support, and I have supported to the best of my ability, a proposal that would be unlimited in its application with regard to navigable rivers for inter-state and international commerce throughout Australia. But I can never be a party to limiting those powers expressly to two particular rivers, in one particular colony practically. Another reason why I must oppose the insertion of the sub-section is, because it is extremely unfair to Victoria, and it is extremely unfair to New South Wales. And when I interposed the remark I did, that the sub-section came from a representative of New South Wales, all I intended to convey was, that I was quite sure that no such motive was actuating its proposer as was suggested by my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid). Now, why is it unfair to New South Wales, and why is it unfair to Victoria? I think I can demonstrate that in two or three words. It provides in the first place that the Commonwealth shall have charge of the navigability of the Murray and the Darling, and practically only of the Murray and the Darling. But then it goes on to say, not as I want the Convention to say, that irrigation and conservation should stand in all cases, as to all the rivers and all colonies, in the first place, and stand before navigability; but to a very limited extent should irrigation and conservation take precedence of navigability, and the limited extent is this—that as to Victoria there is to be no precedence at all. Every river in Victoria is to be subject to the full extent of navigability, and Victoria is not to have the smallest right, under this sub-section, of insisting on conservation and irrigation, because the conservation and irrigation powers are limited to "such rivers," that is, to the Murray and the Darling. Now, with regard to New South Wales, it is unfair, because as regards the Lachlan and the Murrumbidgee, she has no right of conservation and irrigation except subject to the navigability of the Murray. For this reason I think it will be seen that I am bound to oppose the insertion of the sub-section. I am ready to support, and I have as far as I could supported, a much broader view; but I cannot give my adhesion to a sub-section which limits both the commercial powers of the Commonwealth, if they exist, and certainly by putting in these words it would limit them—for they are an express limitation, and consequently they limit in an unfair and unlooked-for manner and degree the powers for the conservation of water and irrigation which we are all so anxious to engraft on the Constitution if possible. For these reasons I think I am bound to oppose the amendment.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I feel that it would not be wise to adopt this sub-section, because it is contrary to the distinctly federal spirit that we have been all along advocating. Although I have voted for every proposal that has been submitted for giving such powers as it is proposed to give in this sub-section over all the rivers in Australia, I must vote against this one, which is limited to two rivers. But I rose more particularly to, deprecate the somewhat adroit shifting of the ground in the discussion by the Premier of New South Wales, when he expressed astonishment that men who, had been fighting for local production should be giving away immense resources for local production in the interests of some barges. He evidently does not think—cannot think—that that was the object about which honorable members were struggling when they were endeavouring to make federal all interests in connexion with rivers which run through more than one state. It was both ungenerous and unfair for the right honorable gentleman to attempt to shift the ground of the discussion in the manner he has done. I shall not waste more time upon that to me somewhat little, not to say contemptible, treatment of this great question. The amendment for which we were fighting all day yesterday made any river that was navigable or intermittently navigable subject to federal control, and it subsequently placed irrigation in the forefront as superior to and more worthy of consideration than navigation. To charge us, therefore, with deserting irrigation—with deserting any factor of local production in the interests of a few barges—is unjust. At the same time, I would submit that these barges, important as they are to South Australia, are immensely more important to some of the people of New South Wales. It might be charged against the Premier of New South Wales that he is willing to sacrifice the interests of some of the people of that colony in order to serve the interests of the Sydney merchants, but I would not descend to that line of argument.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

It is perfectly amazing to me to hear the reasons that have been given against this proposed amendment. The statement of my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) that he cannot vote for the insertion of this sub-section, because it singles out two rivers, seems to indicate that he has entirely forgotten everything that has taken place during the last few days, and forgotten also the whole purpose of his own amendment. What other rivers have we been discussing throughout the whole of the debate? About what other rivers has the controversy arisen? Is it not a fact that the only rivers with which we have been concerned have been the Murray and the Darling? Mr. Reid says-"Why select these two for the purposes of this amendment?"

Mr. FRASER. -

There are other rivers, such as the Murrumbidgee and the Edwards.

Mr. SYMON. -

The taunt at first was that we were selecting too many rivers. It was conceded from the beginning that there was no difficulty and no injustice in the Federal Parliament having control of the navigation of the Murray and the Darling. That was the whole point in dispute, and I ask honorable members opposite whether they are to be terrified by the ad captandum appeal made to them by Mr. Reid, because some of them happen to be protectionists, and to be led astray from a real vindication of the justice of the position by a suggestion that they are doing violence to their feelings in refusing to protect the producers of New South Wales? The position of the right honorable member himself is that he seeks to deprive the federal authority of the control and the right to maintain this navigation which is admittedly, as he said the other day, the main avenue by which some of the producers of New South Wales get their produce cheaply to market. I never heard anything more utterly illogical and unworthy, if I may say so-

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Is it true?

Mr. SYMON. -

It is not true.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

I think it is.

Mr. SYMON. -

Then the honorable member is mistaken.
Mr. REID. -

The only difference is that the honorable member has been there and you have not.

Mr. SYMON. -

Is it not a fact that Mr. Reid the other day electrified us by his argument about the necessity of giving an avenue for the producers in that part of New South Wales, and said it was desirable that the means of river traffic should be maintained? Now he tells us that we must not allow the federal power to interfere, because the barges by which all this produce should come down belong mainly to South Australian merchants.

Mr. REID. -

No; I say they can wait a day or two until the water comes down.

Mr. SYMON. -

New South Wales might be like the boy who sat on the bank and waited until the river ran dry.

Mr. REID. -

The people often have to do that.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is all the honorable member wishes—that they shall remain perfectly passive on the banks of this stream, and shall not only themselves decline to continue and improve the navigation, but refuse to allow the federal power to do so. That is a most unfederal attitude to take up, and I am astounded to see honorable members on the other side getting up and abandoning their convictions and the sense of justice which seems hitherto to have animated them, simply because they are browbeaten, if Mr. Reid will forgive me for using that expression.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I would ask you, Sir Richard Baker, whether it is in order to assert that any member of the Convention is or can be browbeaten?

The CHAIRMAN. -

I do not think the honorable member should use such an expression.

Mr. SYMON. -

I will at once withdraw the expression. I do not suggest that Mr. Reid was taking my honorable friends by the throat or anything of that kind, but I would ask whether he did not make a vehement personal appeal to them?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No.

Did not he make an appeal to them on the ground that they were...
protectionists, and that this seemed like an interference with the protectionist doctrine that New South Wales ought to act upon in dealing with her producers in the western district? All I can say is that that seemed to me to be utterly inconsistent with the attitude which Mr. Reid took up, and which we were all delighted to hear him take up, at the initiation of the discussion. For my right honorable friend to say also that the whole thing amounted to this, that you are being asked to help one colony at the expense of another is not a fair way in which to put the question to the Convention. You are not being asked to help one colony at the expense of another. I would not stand here for one moment if the object of our proposal was to enable South Australia to be aggrandized at the expense of New South Wales. It is because I believe that New South Wales will not suffer by one halfpenny, and that justice will be done between the two colonies, that I support the amendment moved by Mr. McMillan, with the alteration that has been made in it. Mr. Reid says: "You are going to lay your hands on the property of New South Wales." Nothing of the kind. Are we going to do that any more under this amendment than under sub-section (1)? Mr. Barton laid it down as clearly as it could be laid down that under sub-section (1) the Federal Parliament would have control in respect to the navigation of the rivers. He said that the federal authority would be entitled to take charge of the water-courses for that purpose, and the only object of Mr. McMillan's proposal is to enable the federal authority to make improvements in the navigation which they could not otherwise do. I do not know why all this opposition should be offered to the amendment. It embodies—and I have no doubt that was the intention of Mr. McMillan—the desire of the Convention that the navigability of these rivers should be maintained; and it in effect declares that the power of maintenance shall not be limited to the removal of snags and obstructions, but that it shall extend, if need be, to further improvements. The honorable members representing New South Wales have all along conceded the right of controlling the navigation, and, therefore, the statement about the Federal Parliament taking over something which belongs to another state in order to aggrandize another set of people is utterly unfounded. It is merely a diversion which will have the effect, whatever the intention may be, of carrying honorable members' minds away from the real issue. We are all agreed that irrigation is to be paramount, and that it is not to be interfered with. If Mr. Reid thinks that the latter part of the proposal is not sufficiently clear on that point, let him move a further amendment. We are all agreed that the power of irrigation shall be maintained, but we say that if there is a dispute the High Court should determine it. Yesterday, Mr. Reid denounced the amendment proposed by Mr. Isaacs, on the ground that it referred either to the Inter-State Commission or to the Federal Parliament, which is a political body, the settlement of what was really a judicial question, and my right honorable friend pointed out with his accustomed force and power that the proper tribunal, if any, was the High Court.

Mr. HOWE. -

Now he objects to it.

Mr. REID. -

We all object to putting irrigation at the mercy of appeals to any court.

Mr. SYMON. -

Under this amendment, if there is a dispute with regard to an excess of irrigation or an improper interference with the water, the Federal High Court will determine it. I thought that was what we were all seeking to secure, and hence the amazement I expressed when I first rose that we should have these, if I may say so, extraordinary and flimsy reasons given by honorable members for abandoning the position that they have taken up and voting against Mr. McMillan's amendment.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

Mr. Reid, in referring to the trade of the Darling being simply a wool trade, hardly recognised the resources of the Darling country.

Mr. REID. -

I did not mean that.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

The Government of New South Wales are doing all that they possibly can to induce settlers to go into that country and take up land there. Unless means are afforded to those settlers of getting their produce to some market, I do not care where it is, we may as well say good-bye to the settlement of that country. The right honorable member is, I think, absolutely mistaken in laying stress on the question of irrigation as far as the Darling is concerned. It is important, but what I object to is any interference with the sources Of the Darling River or the waters which may come down in flood time. Now, if we maintain the navigability of the Darling River at the expense of the water which we require for our own producers in that part of the country, we can never maintain those producers upon the land. The irrigation of that country will not take place from the Darling, but rather from the old water-courses and lakes, about which the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) spoke so eloquently a day or two ago. If that country is to be settled we must have command of the water which at any time flows into those watercourses and lakes. I do not think the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) is likely to vote for his own amendment, seeing the words which have been introduced into it. Although I can congratulate the honorable member (Mr. Wise) upon having gone back upon all he has hitherto said in voting for the introduction of those words, I think the honorable member can hardly conceive the effect of that amendment, or he would never have voted for it. It provides for the reasonable use of the water for irrigation purposes, putting navigability first. That carries with it the control of every water-course that flows into the Darling River. The clause, as amended, means that the navigability of the Darling River is to be the first concern.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

No.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Yes, it means nothing else; and the Federal Government or High Court can interfere and stop any use of the water which would interfere with navigation. Surely any use of the water for the purposes of irrigation would be held by the Federal Court to be an unreasonable use if it had the effect of preventing the navigation of the Darling River. There is no use in trying to do by a side-wind what we have straightforwardly refused to concede. So far as the Darling is concerned, I would like to see weirs and locks on it from one end to the other. At the same time, I claim the right of New South Wales to control its own streams away up at Armidale and Goulburn and all over the colony.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Certainly.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

But we shall not have that right if the navigability of the Darling is to be the first concern.

Mr. SYMON. -

We do not wish to make it the first concern. The effect of that part is to take away navigability as being the first concern.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Oh, no.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is our intention.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Your very anxiety makes me doubt.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It is only to be such navigability as can be secured subject to the use of the water for irrigation and conservation.
Subject to reasonable use; that is a very different thing. What would any court if called upon to interpret such a clause say, but that the reasonable use of the water meant something which would not interfere with the navigation of the river? I think the Government of New South Wales are quite capable of maintaining the Darling for the purposes of its own settlers. I am not at all in favour of trying to divert that trade to Sydney.

Mr. Reid spoke somewhat contemptuously of the class of settlers in that country.

Mr. REID. -
Not at all.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
I think the honorable member did.

Mr. REID. -
Is not wool a very honorable thing?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
But the honorable member has a knack of referring to squatters as being nobodies.

Mr. REID. -
I have never in my life done so. I get a great deal of money from them.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
I am sorry I have been doing the right honorable gentleman an injustice. The squatters have been the pioneers of that country, but the time has come when we say we must get another class of squatters, and we can only do that by giving them the first thing required for their existence, and that is a fair supply of water. The honorable member talked of irrigation and the traffic on the river. I do not anticipate that there will be irrigation from the Darling River at any time. We should maintain it for navigation. We cannot take out of the river directly water for irrigation, but we can, during flood times, store immense quantities of water—far greater quantities than would maintain the Darling navigable during the whole year, if we were allowed to do so. But I say that, under this proposal, we will not be allowed. The time may come when the Darling will be falling, and we shall be told by the Federal Parliament—"Now you are interfering with the navigation of the river, and you must open every lock and weir in New South Wales. Not only the direct outflow from the Darling, but from every tributary that flows into the Darling." That is so unfair that under no circumstances should the Convention take away from us the right to develop our own lands. We were told that the railways could not be federated, and one of the strongest arguments in favour of that view was that the Commonwealth would not recognise the rights of the states to develop their own country. We hope to be able to develop every part of the large territory of New South Wales, and consequently we cannot see our way to federate the railways. If we cannot federate the railways for fear of restrictions upon the development of our own country, how much more cautious ought we to be in regard to giving away the use of the water for any purpose which would deprive us of our own right and ability to place people upon the land? Every country aims at settling her people upon the land; they are the producers and consumers of the country; they are the very strength and life of the country. For years past we have been doing our best to settle the people on the land. Are we now to place ourselves at the mercy of any Federal Court or Parliament with regard to the use of our own Crown lands?

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I would not have taken part at all in this debate, but for the direct reference made to me by the honorable member (Sir Joseph Abbott), a reference to which I shall reply in rather a different tone to that used by the honorable member, and perhaps more briefly. I object to this amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan), as I object to all the amendments which have been moved, as being unnecessary. I think the right course is to leave the control of navigation to the general clause, and while it may be necessary to add a further clause of definition in another part of the Bill, I voted for the insertion of the word "reasonable," because that was the idea I first formed, as the honorable member (Sir Joseph Abbott) would have seen if he had looked six lines down the paper at an amendment which I myself proposed to move. I voted for the word "reasonable" also, because if the word had been left out it would have been possible for the single state of South Australia to drain away as much of the Murray waters as it required for irrigation, without any regard to New South Wales' necessities. My intention is and was, as expressed at the time, to vote against the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) as a whole if put. I shall take that course. If I may be allowed, I would respectfully suggest to my honorable friend that it is not desirable nor necessary to impute motives, nor to question votes given by honorable members. It only prolongs the debate unnecessarily.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

By way of personal explanation, I desire to say that I did not wish to impute any motive to the honorable member, who, I think, is deeply indebted to me, because he has given an explanation of his vote which otherwise would not have been understood outside.

Mr. REID. -

Quite true.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

Even at the risk of having it again suggested, that South Australia is guilty of provincialism in this matter, I should like to reiterate my desire that this should be treated as a federal question. If that can be taken as an exhibition of provincialism I am sorry for it, but I do not think such a remark can be fairly applied. I also think that the observation which has been made that South Australia has some sinister designs is no more warranted by fact than the other statement. What we simply wish is this—that in regard to the treatment of the Murray waters the Federal Parliament should have power to deal with them in such a manner as having regard to all the circumstances it should deem just. Surely a position like that is not open to criticism as betraying provincial predilections. I am not wedded to any particular form of words on the subject. I am sorry to see how votes have varied, and are likely to vary. It has been suggested that the attitude of some honorable members is in some slight degree influenced by a consideration of the question as to the quarter from which the various amendments proceed. I hardly think that a suggestion of that sort is justified, although I am at the same time somewhat at a loss to otherwise explain the alteration in the attitude of some honorable members with reference to different amendments, which appear to me to seek to establish the same principle.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Do not look at me, I did not say all those nasty things I said you should have the trade.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I was delighted to hear the remarks of the honorable member (Sir Joseph Abbott) on this matter, and they render it absolutely unnecessary for me to take any notice whatever of the somewhat emphatic speech of my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid). The honorable member (Sir Joseph Abbott) has shown that the traders and settlers, to whom the right honorable member somewhat contumaciously referred, should be regarded in an altogether different light. Under those circumstances, I do not propose to deal further with that subject. But what I would point out to my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) especially, as wel

Mr. LYNE. -

They do not.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Then what have they to fear?
Mr. REID. -
    I will tell you what they have to fear.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
    I did not ask the honorable member to do so at this particular moment. Of course I do not object to a short interjection, but I do not want to have a speech from the honorable member interpolated with my own, as that is somewhat confusing. But what have the people of New South Wales to fear under such circumstances?

Mr. LYNE. -
    What have you to fear?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
    What we have to fear is this: That New South Wales will exercise the rights which she claims, and which, we are told by Mr. Lyne and others, she has in reference to the Darling and to the Murray waters, that is the right to reduce them to such an extent that South Australian navigation will be destroyed, and South Australian irrigation will be an impossibility. Would anything of that sort be reasonable, I ask my honorable friend (Mr. Lyne)?

Mr. GORDON. -
    What sort of answer does the right honorable member expect from him?

Mr. LYNE. -
    I did not hear what the honorable member said.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
    I would ask any representative of New South Wales whether a serious interference with South Australian navigation would be reasonable under the circumstances?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
    No one wants to do that.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
    I am glad indeed to find that my right honorable friend from Western Australia speaks with his characteristic candour. I am sure he would wish to prevent anything unreasonable.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
    Yes, on the Murray.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
    On the Murray or anywhere else. Surely there is no particular charm about the Murray, as compared with the Darling. When the Commonwealth is formed the Murray will be an important river in the Commonwealth, but the Darling will also be a very considerable branch of the same Australian river system. Does my right honorable friend suggest that New South Wales should have the right to do anything unreasonable with reference to the Darling?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

If it does not affect the Murray, yes New South Wales can do anything she likes.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I see. Well, of course, so far as the Premier of Western Australia and I are concerned we seem to be hopelessly at issue. The right honorable gentleman has put it that we have no concern in the Darling trade.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No right, I say.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

We have, according to Sir Joseph Abbott, who has a more practical and intimate acquaintance with this subject than even Sir John Forrest. We have that concern in the Darling trade, and, according to Sir Joseph Abbott, it is a good thing that it should continue, in the interests of both South Australia, and New South Wales.

Mr. LYNE. -

Cannot we make the Murray a better river under federation?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I do not know which is the best way to deal with the subject, and I do not think my honorable friend does either. He may know a great deal more than I do about it, but at the same time he may not know so very much. The honorable member may not know enough to enable him once for all to pronounce a final opinion as to which should receive greater attention—navigation or irrigation. We may be a body of constitutional experts, but I doubt whether any one of us has sufficient acquaintance with the question of irrigation to be able to finally determine what shall be the line on which this river system shall be dealt with by the Federal Parliament. The way it is put by the amendment before us is this—the Federal Parliament shall have power to deal with the subject as they think fit, subject to the recognition of the rights of the state for conservation and irrigation, but only so long as the exercise of its powers is not unreasonable. And who is to determine whether the manner in which it exercises its powers is unreasonable or not? Objection was taken yesterday that it should not be decided by the Interstate Commission. Well, an opportunity was sought to meet that objection by providing, in the alternative, for the decision of the Federal Parliament. Then the Premier of New South Wales pointed out with great emphasis that that was relegating to the decision of a political tribunal what ought to be decided by the Federal Judiciary. Today the amendment is so framed that the only authority which will have any power whatever to interfere with the right of the states over the unlimited use of water for conservation and irrigation will be the High Court of Australia—and that court can do it only when an unreasonable use of the waters is made for those purposes. Under these circumstances, where can the objection be? It has been suggested by the Attorney-General of Victoria that this provision ought not to be limited simply to the Rivers Murray and Darling. It strikes me that the whole discussion has proceeded on the consideration of those particular rivers, and it is well they are named, but we have not the slightest objection to the extension of this provision to all the rivers of Australia. And I think it a pity, indeed, if our friend the Attorney-General of Victoria intended to base his departure from the principle which is involved in this amendment because of its limited application, and that he did not move to extend it. We should have been very happy to support him, and I trust, for the sake of the principle which we have argued for during the last three or four days, at his instance, and which he has convinced, or almost convinced, a majority should be affirmed—that the Federal Parliament should have power to regulate this matter, subject only to the right of the states to the reasonable use of water for irrigation and conservation—that he, even now, will reconsider his expressed determination of voting against this proposal, and be found voting for the affirmation of the principle for which of late he has so admirably contended.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -
I simply rise to make a personal explanation, and I think it is due to me, as the proposer of this amendment, that the Convention should allow me to do so. I do not want to make a speech, and I did not make a speech in introducing this proposal. I was willing that it should go to the vote, but I think that in some respects it has been unfairly dealt with. My object was to get a vote on the main issue, and I still think that this question, as far as the use of the waters throughout the whole of New South Wales is concerned, ought to be absolutely settled upon a sure basis. But it struck me as very remarkable on the part of Mr. Isaacs and others, after we had, been discussing—what?—after we had been discussing sub-section (31), the control and regulation of the navigation of the River Murray and the use of the waters thereof, &c., and after only one member of this Convention (Mr. Barton) having asserted that he did not believe in this sub-section being inserted, that, within the last 24 hours, there should be, as there is, an absolute change of front; and that we should be told, as we are told, that any provision that is made that will not take in all the rivers of Australia is absolutely futile. We came to the conclusion that we had to face this peculiar position, that there are two rivers affecting certain colonies alone, and that the position of those rivers would have to be put on a base that could not be misunderstood. I certainly think that my amendment would have settled the matter. I shall now vote against the whole provision.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Because it is provided that it must be reasonable.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I shall vote against the introduction of any limitation of the powers of New South Wales, and I may say also that it seems to me that this sub-section, as I proposed it, practically puts back, in effect, the original sub-section, except that it introduces the Darling, because it has been laid down by Mr. Barton that under the general powers of the Commonwealth the Commonwealth can maintain the navigation of rivers.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

But if the New South Wales representatives thoroughly believed that sub-section (1) had that full application they would immediately vote to alter it, otherwise, why their action over this sub-section?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Well, that may be. I will say unhesitatingly, and I believe that my views are shared by others, that we do not consider that sub-section (1) ought to remain as it is without some other provision which will clearly define the rights of New South Wales.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Hear, hear; and of the other colonies.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

We are simply face to face with South Australia in a certain issue, and the whole of my action during the last two or three days has been to try to bring about a determination on the real issue we have got to decide.

Question-That the new sub-section, as amended, proposed to be inserted be inserted-put.

Majority against the amendment 8

AYES.

Berry, Sir G. Holder, F.W.
Braddon, Sir E.N.C. Howe, J.H.
Cockburn, Dr. J.A. Kingston, C.C.
Dobson, H. Lee Steers, Sir J.G.
Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

Now that this matter is practically settled, I wish to propose the insertion of words at the end of the clause which, I think, will meet with the concurrence of even my friends from South Australia. Because the interests of irrigation are just as important to South Australia as they can be to New South Wales or Victoria, and we all know that already on the banks of the Murray, in the direction of South Australia, some very important industries have been established, owing to the use of the water for such purposes. I beg to move that the following words be added to clause 52

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We have not finished trying to fill up this blank.

Mr. REID. -

There is no blank.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Oh yes, we have omitted sub-section (31), and made a blank.

Mr. REID. -

There is no blank made by omitting a sub-section.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Why, we have been trying all the morning to fill up the blank.

Mr. Reid. -
Surely you are not going to try any more?

Sir George Turner. -
Yes, we are going to have another try.

Mr. Barton. -
Perhaps Mr. Reid's amendment would do instead.

Mr. Reid. -
However, I will read my amendment; and if, after hearing it, the honorable member still wishes to insert a sub-section in lieu of sub-section (31), of course I will give way.

Mr. Peacock. -
Is your amendment printed?

Mr. Reid. -
Yes, my amendment is in print, but I shall not move it exactly as printed. It is substantially the same as the printed copy, but, verbally, I have altered it. The amendment reads as follows:-

If any question arises between the Commonwealth and a state, or between the Commonwealth and a citizen, concerning the navigation of a river and the use of the waters thereof for purposes of irrigation or water conservation, the maintenance and improvement of navigation shall be taken to be subservient to the maintenance and extension of works of irrigation or water conservation.

The leader of the Convention has stated that, in his opinion, the general words in the beginning of the clause give the Federation the power practically of maintaining navigation, and my honorable friend mentioned certain cases that were decided on, I think, very high authority in the United States, showing that, under such general words, the United States Government had so much power that they could come in and remove anything which obstructed the navigation of a river. Now, I think, in these matters, we do not want to leave things to the chances of legal decisions. They are too vitally important. If that law is correct, and, as I have said, there are many high authorities in its favour, then I say, under these general words, there would be no security for irrigation at all; because while the federal power had not a duty in connexion with irrigation, it would have a duty in connexion with navigation; and it would be a duty, therefore, on the part of the federal power to carry on the navigation, while they would have no responsibility with reference to irrigation. Now, we do not want to leave matters in an uncertain state. We do not want to have a vista of litigation. I want this vital matter to be put so that the settlers of Australia shall not be enmeshed in proceedings in the Supreme Court on questions between navigation and irrigation. These questions may not arise—on most of the rivers they will not arise—but they will inevitably arise on some of the rivers, on the Murray, on the Darling, and perhaps on the Murrumbidgee, but certainly on the Murray. Therefore, they affect the irrigation interests of the three colonies, and I do think that the men who play the part of pioneers in this country, and who are endeavouring to develop the resources of this country by means of irrigation, should not be put to the chances of a Supreme Court decision, whether they are settlers in South Australia, Victoria, or New South Wales.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
This is what you call carrying the war into the enemy's camp, I suppose?

Mr. REID. -
We have no enemies here, we are simply a band of brothers. We may be trying to take a little advantage of one brother, but it is all in the family, and no harm has come of it. And now I am looking after the interests of the irrigationists of South Australia. All my friends declare that they look upon irrigation as superior to navigation, and, therefore, I hope they will carry out their professions. At any rate, I am giving them an opportunity of doing so by moving this amendment.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
Sir Richard Baker, I would like to ask whether, according to the arrangement you made last night, my proposal should not have precedence of Mr. Reid's?

The CHAIRMAN. -
I think that what I should do is, to ask any honorable member if he has anything else to propose to take the place of the sub-section which has been struck out? If no proposal is submitted to take the place of that sub-section, then we will go on to the end of the clause, and after that, we cannot go back.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Yesterday evening I proposed my amendment, and progress was reported, partly, I understood, to enable honorable members to see it in print. I only temporarily withdrew it to facilitate the discussion of Mr. Higgins' amendment. I would ask that my proposal should have precedence to Mr. Reid's, as his would interfere with mine.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I would first ask whether any honorable member has any sub-section to propose, in lieu of the sub-section which has been struck out?

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I have a new sub-section to propose. I beg to move the following amendment, which is in print, with the exception of one or two verbal alterations, in order to bring it more into conformity with the opinions which have been expressed during the debate:

Waters permanently or intermittently navigable flowing into, through, or between two or more states, so far as may be necessary to the maintenance and improvement of their navigability, with a due regard to the necessities of water conservation and irrigation.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I doubt very much whether we have not already decided that. I would like to hear the honorable member on the point before deciding.

Mr. SYMON. -

This is a sub-section of general application to all rivers, and it is proposed to meet the point which was taken by Mr. Isaacs, as to the other proposal being limited in its operation to two specifically named rivers.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It seems to me that this has, in substance, been already decided upon; and, at this stage of the committee, I think that we should not discuss a matter which has already been decided upon.

Mr. SYMON. -

I would ask to be heard, sir, with regard to the point whether this is, in substance, the same as the proposal which has been already decided upon. So far as I can see, this is quite a different amendment from that on which the committee has decided.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

We had all the rivers yesterday—the Swan River and all.

Mr. SYMON. -

No doubt there was an amendment which was applicable to all rivers, but that amendment referred the whole dispute to the Inter-State Commission and to Parliament.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The committee could have altered that.

Mr. SYMON. -

But that was the essence of the amendment. The whole object of that amendment was to secure the determination of the use of the waters for irrigation or navigation by the Inter-State Commission or Parliament. Now, this amendment of mine is simply to confer upon the Federal Parliament the power of legislating in respect of all navigable waters coming within the description in the amendment. It is not limited in any way, as the other amendment was; and general words are put in which will place irrigation in, at any rate, an equal position, if not a paramount position, to that occupied by navigation. I submit that this is entirely distinct in substance from the amendment which was proposed yesterday. The nearest approach to this amendment was the amendment of Sir John Downer, which has not been moved.

The CHAIRMAN. -

If this was the final stage, I should be very deeply impressed with the responsibility which I am now taking of ruling this amendment out of order. But this is not the final stage. The committee can, and no doubt will, reconsider a good deal of the work which has been done, and this amendment may then be considered. But it seems to me, in substance, according to the very statement of the honorable member (Mr. Symon) himself, to be the question we have been debating for so many days, and which we have settled, so far as we can settle it, in this stage of the committee. I therefore rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I beg now to propose the definition C, which stands at the beginning of the list of amendments. The definition is as follows:-

For the purposes of sub-section (1), waters shall be deemed navigable for trade and commerce which are in fact navigated continually or at times, for trade and commerce with other nations or amongst states, either by themselves or by their connexions with other waters.

I think honorable members will agree with me, that we ought not to start a Constitution leaving any point doubtful, if we are conscious that a doubt really does exist, as to the interpretation of the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There is no reference in sub-section (1) to what you propose.

This presupposes something which may never happen.

Mr. GLYNN. -

But no one has shown more forcibly than the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) what the probable scope of sub-section (1) will be.

Mr. ISAACS. -

This won't settle the question.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Perhaps, with the help of the honorable member, it may be made more clear; but it gives expression to this fact—that we desire to extend, as far as possible, the American decisions upon this point to the interpretation of sub-section (1) of clause 52. Now, that a doubt exists is, I think, fairly clear.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Perhaps the honorable member will allow me, before he goes on, to decide which of the two amendments that have been proposed, should come first—the amendment of Mr. Reid or the amendment of Mr. Glynn. They are both to come at the end of the clause. They do not appear to be inconsistent with each other, and both can be inserted. The only question is, which I ought to put first. Now, Mr. Glynn withdrew his amendment in order to allow a new sub-section to be proposed, in lieu of sub-section (31), and, I think, as a matter of courtesy, that honorable member's amendment should be taken first.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Thank you, sir. I was saying that a point of doubt arises as to whether the character of a river, as to its being navigable, would be determined by English law or American law, and, even if it is held that the American law applies, still there is a doubt as to whether rivers that are only intermittently navigable come within the scope of the American decisions. By English law, I believe, the navigability of a river is determined by the tidal ebb and flow of the river at some point. There are two Canadian decisions not directly on this point, but the analogy of which may be followed—one given in 1883, and the other in 1896, and they seem to lean to an interpretation that would be in consonance with the English common law. The decision of 1883 speaks of "tidal" and "navigable." There was a decision on the point with regard to the question of the fisheries in 1896, which also referred to these rivers as tidal and navigable. The question of irrigation, of course, did not crop up in Canada; but so far as there is an interpretation given by which we may be guided in an English court of judicature, that interpretation would hold good in English common law. It was an assumption, in the course of argument, made by the Judges, that the question of navigability in connexion with rivers was always referred to by the use of the words tidal and navigable. Even if they were merely obiter dicta on the part of the Judges, we must be certain that they are not also emphatic declarations of the English law on the subject. In America, we have a decision which extends the idea of navigability, by making the essential condition the fact that a river is navigable irrespective of whether there is an ebb and flow and a continuity of the river as a stream of commerce. There have been some other state decisions on the point in America. There was one that laid it down that so long as a stream was, for some period of the year—or some seasons I think the word was capable of being navigated for the transfer of logs, to that extent it was a navigable stream, and came under the decision. That is a decision that seems to indicate that the Darling would come within the American decision. But the point is doubtful, because it is only a state decision, and because the question of intermittency there, and in any other decisions which I have seen, was limited to intermittency within a year; but, in the case of the Darling, we have a stream whose navigable character might be destroyed for two or even for more years without a break. Therefore the point is extremely doubtful, and it is one that should be cleared up. Beyond that, we have heard several statements by prominent representatives of New South Wales in this Convention that they are willing to leave the question of riparian rights and claims to the interpretation of sub section (1)-that, so far as that sub-section goes, they are willing that the powers of South Australia as against the other colonies, or of the other colonies as against South Australia, shall be determined under it. Therefore, there should be no objection on their part to make the point clear, because they are willing that the full extent of the American decisions should be the determinator of the scope of sub-section (1). We should not make the Supreme Court the judge of what we mean. If we know what we mean ourselves, we should put our meaning clearly in the Constitution. At present we seem to leave it to the Supreme Court to decide what we mean, and the decisions of the court upon the point might not be given for two or three years. We know ourselves what we mean, and we know that a doubt exists, and that doubt should be cleared up. I think it would be a fair thing to have these words inserted, and, as the amendment is not a limitation or an extension of the sub-section as it stands, I think it will recommend itself to honorable members for acceptance.

Mr. Reid (New South Wales). -

If we are to begin to insert other words I may have several amendments to suggest myself-amendments of interpretation, I mean. I am prepared to take the risk of these general words so far as I am concerned, because I am quite in favour of any federal control over anything used for inter-colonial purposes. When I say control, I mean control over the conduct of the states as opposed to taking possession of the property of the states. I submit that the amendment of the honorable member is not a new sub-section at all.

The Chairman. -

It is not proposed as a new sub-section.

Mr. Reid. -

I gave way, although I had a proposal before the Chair myself, because it was suggested to me that I should do so.

The Chairman. -

The right honorable gentleman probably did not hear the explanation I gave as to why Mr. Glynn's amendment should be taken first. Yesterday Mr. Glynn moved this amendment C, but he gave way for the purpose of allowing another honorable member to submit a prior amendment. Therefore, as a matter of courtesy, I think his amendment should come before that of the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -
I concur, then, that the amendment should be taken before mine. I did not hear the explanation.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I think an improvement might be made in Mr. Glynn's amendment by an alteration of its language. I think it would read better if, instead of saying "continually or at times," we said "permanently or intermittently." "At times" is a very awkward phrase to use, and might be held to cover a river which only runs once in a year.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I have no objection to the amendment which the leader of the Convention suggests.

Mr. BARTON. -
Then it would be better if the words at the end of the amendment were altered. I think, indeed, that it would be better if the amendment were made to read in this way:

For the purposes of sub-section (1), waters shall be deemed navigable for trade and commerce which, either by themselves or by their connexions with other waters, are in fact navigable permanently or intermittently for trade and commerce with other nations or among the several states.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I am quite willing to accept the suggestion of the leader of the Convention.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Perhaps the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) will ask leave to amend his amendment?

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I beg to ask leave, sir, to amend my amendment so as to make it read in the manner suggested by Mr. Barton.

The amendment was amended accordingly.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -
I rise to support the proposal of Mr. Glynn, which I hope will commend itself to the favorable consideration of the Convention. I would point out, in the first place, that it is not in any way consistent with the sub-section which we have adopted.

Mr. REID. -

On reconsideration, although I think the amendment of Mr. Glynn seems to extend the jurisdiction over us, still, as it is for a federal purpose, I shall not raise any objection to it.

Dr. QUICK. -

The amendment is intended to carry out the view of the leader of the Convention. It does not invade the rights of any of the states; it is merely an interpretation, and intends to give effect to what is contemplated by the trade and commerce sub-section (1). Therefore I hope the Convention will adopt it.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I am in full sympathy with putting in some words, but it seems to me that as the amendment is now framed, it is almost identical with the first part of my amendment; but there is a little hiatus, I think, because subsection(1) does not contain a reference to rivers and navigability and it is rather an awkward interpretation to say that for the purpose of that sub-section waters shall be deemed to be navigable. I shall, however, support the insertion of these words, but I hope that hereafter we shall have some provision made with regard to conservation and irrigation.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

Unless it is understood that there will be some provision made to place irrigation and conservation before navigation, I feel very much disposed to oppose this amendment.

Mr. REID. -

So should I absolutely.

Mr. LYNE. -

Supposing this amendment is carried, and the amendment with regard to conservation and irrigation which Mr. Reid intends to propose is not carried, we shall be in an awkward position.

Mr. REID. -

So will the other people be.

Mr. LYNE. -

I do not wish to threaten them at all.

Mr. REID. -

I am not threatening.

Mr. LYNE. -

I anticipate that there will be a definition inserted to say that irrigation and conservation shall be above navigation.

Mr. Glynn's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I beg now to move that the following words be added to the sub-section:-

If any question concerning the navigation of a river and the use of the waters thereof for purposes of water conservation arise in the exercise of powers vested in the Federal Parliament, or in the exercise of powers belonging to the several states, the maintenance of navigation shall be deemed to be subservient to the maintenance and extension of works of water conservation.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

Unless this amendment is one of the right honorable gentleman's elephantine jokes, it will require only a few words to prove two things; first of all, that it is an attempt at a piece of colossal selfishness; and, secondly, that it evidences the complete inconsistency-I am almost inclined to say the political unscrupulousness-

Mr. REID. -

You are entitled to say it on account of the hot weather-

Mr. GORDON. -

Of the right honorable gentleman himself. It is a cool proposal for the right honorable gentleman to make that irrigation shall be placed above navigation, when the colony which controls the head-waters is New South Wales herself. To carry this would simply mean that the other colonies might be deprived of every drop of water in these rivers if New South Wales proposed to use it for irrigation.

Mr. REID. -

No.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is so, though.

Mr. REID. -

May I point out to my honorable friend that I considered that before moving the amendment? The amendment is so worded that it would not interfere at all with the right of any person in connexion with an irrigation work situated in, say, South Australia, to come into court to prevent the abuse of a similar right enjoyed by some person in New South Wales. The rights of irrigationists in South Australia, Victoria and New South Wales, as between themselves, will be left as they are at the present time. The amendment would not debar a person from applying for a restraint upon the abuse of water which prejudiced irrigation lower down; but, of course, it would not give to any person practising irrigation in any part of Australia a law of his own.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is mere juggling with words. I am obliged to my right honor
Mr. REID. -

As to the Darling the honorable member is quite right. That does not apply to the Murray.

Mr. GORDON. -

Why does the right honorable gentleman waste time in these attempts to blindfold us?

Mr. REID. -

The Murrumbidgee and the Darling are entirely within New South Wales, and riparian rights upon those rivers can only be the rights of owners in New South Wales.

Mr. GORDON. -

I will take my honorable friend by his infantile syllogistic steps-

Mr. REID. -

I was an elephant just now.

Mr. GORDON. -

The right honorable gentleman is everything by turns and nothing long. He seems to be tossed by every wind blown from my honorable friend Mr. Lyne.

Mr. REID. -

I am afraid the heat wave is telling upon the honorable gentleman.

Mr. GORDON. -

The right honorable gentleman's statement of the position is this: Inasmuch as the Darling is the principal tributary of the Murray, and the Murray, to some extent, runs through New South Wales, that colony may exhaust absolutely the whole of the waters of these rivers so far as they are in her territory. While there are those of us who admit that irrigation may be a most important thing, and one which we are willing to place above navigation, the use of the water must be put upon a fair basis. If it is not, New South Wales will be able to deprive the other colonies of water.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Who is to decide what will be a fair use?

Mr. GORDON. -

There was a proposal to leave the question to a tribunal which I think could have decided it, the tribunal to which we are leaving all the huge interests of Australia. If a matter of this kind can be decided upon the fair lines which the Attorney-General of Victoria tells us are being adopted in America, surely it can be dealt with in the same way here. While we are willing that irrigation should be placed above navigation, provided that there is a fair adjustment of the use of the water, we are not going to be so silly as to allow New South Wales the command of the whole of the water.

Mr. LYNE. -
New South Wales has the command now. You are simply trying to take away a right from us.

Mr. GORDON. -

We have heard that parrot cry day after day. Our answer is that, according to the principles of international comity, you have it not. The honorable member's interjection shows how callously selfish this proposal is. The right honorable member (Mr. Reid) has been arguing for days that this is not a federal matter, that the federal authority has no right to say to any state—"You shall either do one thing or another"; but he wishes now to give the right to the federal authority to say that we in South Australia must place irrigation above navigation. The right honorable gentlemen has been educated up to a recognition of the advantage which majorities at the Convention have unfortunately given to the selfishness of New South Wales, and he is trying to go one better than the honorable member (Mr. Lyne). The Convention apparently is to be made the victim of the very natural ambitions of these honorable gentlemen, who must so soon appeal to the electors of New South Wales. If this is a joke-and the right honorable member very often wears the cap and bells—it proves two things, that New South Wales would like to be absolutely selfish and exclusive to the extent of being unjust to the other colonies, and that the right honorable member is prepared to be absolutely inconsistent, and to take up a position absolutely contradictory to that which he formerly held, just when it suits him. If the federal arm should not go into New South Wales, why should it go into South Australia? Upon what principle is this suggested? Upon no principle, but simply for the reason that New South Wales may be assisted to use a power which is put into the Constitution to the detriment of South Australia. I need not detain the Convention any longer in attempting to show that the amendment should be laughed out of court.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I should like to ask the leader of the Convention what course he intends to take with regard to the amendment? It seems to me-adopting the expression that was used yesterday—to be a sinister attempt to whittle down the broad basis upon which the right honorable gentleman appealed to the Convention to reject the claims of South Australia. Honorable members must see that this matter has now become much more serious than it was before. The leader of the Convention assured honorable members with all the weight of his great authority and learning that under sub-section (1) the federal authority would have ample power to deal out justice in regard to these water rights between South Australia, New South Wales, and Victoria. The honorable member (Mr. Lyne) said that he was alarmed at that, and while the Premier, of New South Wales did not make the same admission he no doubt has been influenced by the alarm of the honorable member (Mr. Lyne), and he now seeks to introduce into the Constitution a provision irremovable except by an amendment of the Constitution, which is in effect a declaration that navigation, where-ever it conflicts with irrigation, is to be absolutely swept away. As the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) has just pointed out, South Australia is not answerable to anybody for her use of the water passing through her territory so long as she maintains the navigability of the stream; but if a dispute were to arise in any way whatever, and the amendment were carried, we should have this declaration that navigability, even in our own territory, is to be subservient to irrigation. If, as the leader of the Convention says-and his words produced a great effect upon my mind-everything is amply protected and controlled by sub-section (1), and the Federal High Court, guided by the American decisions, will do all that is necessary for the maintenance and control of navigation, why should we have inserted in the Constitution a sub-section which will tie the hands of the Supreme Court, and which will lay down a rule for its guidance which may work immeasurable mischief in the future? Honorable members who have been guided by my honorable and learned friend must vote against the amendment. Otherwise the whole good faith-I use the term advisedly-would be an absolute nullity. Is there a man in the Convention who has not been greatly impressed by what my right honorable friend has said? Have not votes been influenced by the attitude which he assumed? But now this amendment is proposed with a view to cutting the ground entirely from under my honorable friend's feet, and to take away the foundation upon which many votes were given against us. Is that fair treatment? Is it the treatment to which men of self-respect should be called upon to submit? My honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) has excused the proposal in his light way by saying that it was a joke upon the part of the right honorable member (Mr. Reid). That is putting the best possible aspect upon it. If it is not a joke, it is in effect a violation-I do not say an intentional violation-of the line of conduct upon which we have been proceeding, and a repudiation of the attitude which the leader of the Convention has hitherto taken up-a noble and broad attitude-by which a large number of honorable members have been guided. Talk about giving with one hand and taking away with the other. The right honorable member is like Ahab, so envious of Naboth's vineyard that he wants to take from us in South Australia even our little barges. If you declare that navigation is to be considered subservient to irrigation, that is equivalent to the declaration that the claims of navigation are not to be considered at all. I therefore appeal to the leader of the Convention, before the debate goes a step further, to say whether he will or will not support the amendment.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

While I entirely approve of the principle declared in the amendment-and I think it is one which has the support of a very large majority of honorable members-that irrigation should be the predominant influence in the development of the continent, I am not quite clear as to how far it is expedient to make a declaration of this kind in the Constitution. What weighs with me is the recollection that no step can be taken in the exercise of the powers conferred under sub-section (1) without the consent of the Federal Parliament. No Act can be passed dealing with navigation, which will go before the Supreme Court, which has not previously obtained the consent of the majority of the representatives in both Houses of the Federal Parliament. The declaration which the amendment contains is intra wires of the Federal Parliament itself. The Federal Parliament at its first meeting could pass a resolution containing this declaration. The advantage of having this declaration in an Act of the Federal Parliament, rather than in the Constitution, would be that the Act would be framed having regard to special circumstances with which it was thought at the time desirable to deal, and it could be amended; whereas it is not easy to see now what the effect of putting it in a, fundamental instrument like the Constitution would be.

Mr. REID. -

Then why was Mr. Glynn's definition put in?

Mr. WISE. -

Because there is an obvious difficulty. There are two lines of conflicting decisions.

Mr. REID. -

Will there not be an obvious difficulty about irrigation and navigation?

Mr. WISE. -

No. The difficulty between irrigation and navigation cannot possibly arise until an Act is introduced into the Federal Parliament dealing with one or the other.

Mr. REID. -

Will not the Executive Government have the right to act under the powers in the Constitution?

Mr. WISE. -

At present, I think not. This is a matter which requires more consideration. Even with the fear of Sir Joseph Abbott before my eyes-

Mr. GORDON. -
He is not here.

Mr. WISE. -
I have not yet seen this matter in all its bearings, and I am only pointing out now that it is a question which requires more consideration than at first sight it appears to demand. The distinction between the two things to which my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) referred just now is a very plain one. "Navigable" is a term we all use in the Constitution.

Mr. REID. -
No; not the word "navigable."

Mr. WISE. -
The word "navigation."

Mr. REID. -
That is a different thing altogether.

Mr. WISE. -
I do not know how you can have navigation except on something that is navigable.

Mr. REID. -
Exactly; and what is the need for a definition at all?

Mr. WISE. -
If you put the word "navigation" in the Constitution, it implies that there is something which is navigable; and when we know that the two courts by whose decisions any Federal Court must be guided—the English High Court and the American High Court have given two absolutely inconsistent decisions—not one, but a long series of inconsistent decisions—it was only our duty to say at once whether we desired to follow the English interpretation or the American interpretation. No question in the Constitution itself arises as between irrigation and navigation. Any question which will arise between irrigation and navigation will arise from the terms of the Act which the Federal Parliament itself will enact.

Mr. REID. -
Don't you think it is a question which arises in the mind of a man who is asked to become a partner?

Mr. WISE. -
I do not think that that necessarily follows.

Mr. REID. -
I think so.

Mr. WISE. -
Because, as the leader of the Convention has pointed out, the court itself, even if the Act of Parliament was silent, would give such a reasonable interpretation to any words in the enactment as to prevent any injustice from being done, either to one interest or to the other. So that the danger which this amendment is designed to meet does not appear to me to be as real as is imagined, either by those from South Australia, or by those who are supporting it in what may be the interests of New South Wales.

Mr. SYMON. -

The mischief is that this is a declaration of a paramount right in the Constitution.

Mr. REID. -

Not of a right. It is putting one source of national development above another-putting production above trade.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is a play on words.

Mr. WISE. -

It appears to me it is unnecessary, because, in the very nature of things, one source of production is paramount above another-because in the very nature of things irrigation must be superior to navigation.

Mr. REID. -

Don't you see that this is one of the troubles of the matter-that if the two things were handed over to the, Federal Parliament, the Federal Parliament, having both duties within its powers, would probably do its best in justice to both; but the difficulty here is, that whilst navigation and the interests of navigation are made a duty of the Federal Parliament if it chooses to interfere, the interests of irrigation are left in the hands of the separate states that own the rivers concerned. The duty, therefore, is a divided one as far as irrigation and navigation are concerned, and our trouble is that, the power of preserving navigation being given to the Commonwealth, we, want to safeguard it.

Mr. SYMON. -

Is all this in order, sir?

The CHAIRMAN. -

It is not in order.

Mr. WISE. -

I am much obliged to my right honorable friend for the explanation he has given me. What does not impress me, as it impresses the right honorable gentleman, is that there is no immediate or likely danger of these interests clashing in the Federal Parliament. What also weighs with me, is that a declaration of this kind is likely to put our friends from South Australia in very much the same difficulty as they would have put us in if they had carried some of the propositions they have made.

Mr. GLYNN. -
That is a very strong point.

Mr. WISE. -

I feel that this is a dispute which has gained an altogether fictitious importance. According to the best information I can obtain, if New South Wales drained every drop of water out of the Darling, and never allowed any water except that which came in flood time to go into the Murray, the navigability of the Murray would not be appreciably affected. That is to say, as far as the actual navigability of the Murray is concerned, there can be no appreciable effect produced on it if all the waters of the Darling and of the whole of its tributaries are diverted. What we are really fighting over is one of those theoretic assertions of rights which often excite people far more than disputes about direct pecuniary interests. And I throw out as a suggestion to the representatives of South Australia whether it might not be a settlement of this difficulty-and an honorable settlement to them-to hold to the arrangement which was come to at Adelaide, to go back on the previous vote, meeting their views if they wish, and meeting the general views of the Convention, by striking out the words "the use of the Murray" in the original amendment, and confining this exclusive power of navigation wholly to the Murray.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the honorable member think that he is not redesuscussing a matter which has been settled?

Mr. WISE. -

I will go no further in the matter. To the leader of the Convention, I throw out the suggestion as to whether there is really any necessity for this amendment, so that the matter may be fully discussed, and a step may not be taken which, if it is unnecessary for self-defence, may prove dangerous as an unnecessary source of irritation to others.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I regret that my learned friend (Mr. Wise) has seen fit somewhat to differ from the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) in the proposal he has submitted. I was very much afraid, when the previous amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) was so readily accepted, that we would find ourselves in the position we are in now, with a strong opposition to interpreting the use of the water, as between navigation and irrigation. The pertinacity with which South Australia has fought this question, is, I think, a lesson to New South Wales. It is a lesson to New South Wales which will be of infinite advantage.

Mr. WISE. -
There are extremists on both sides, remember.

Mr. LYNE. -

If we are to accept a Federal Parliament with a Senate composed in the same way as this Convention is composed, then this pertinacity in debate will be a very strong lesson to New South Wales, and require her to be wary before she takes a course from which she cannot withdraw. It seems to me altogether beyond justice for South Australia to keep on persistently demanding to import into this Bill what she has no right to do.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We are not asking for anything now.

Mr. LYNE. -

And to put an interpretation in the Bill which will direct the Federal Court as to what decisions it must give on certain matters connected with the distribution of water.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We do not want it.

Mr. LYNE. -

Then why are you asking for it?

Mr. HOLDER. -

We are not asking for it.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

We will vote against the clause.

Mr. LYNE. -

I am very glad to hear that the South Australians are coming to their senses. Listening quietly, as I have listened to the speeches, and feeling strongly on this matter, it has become clear to my mind that South Australia is fighting almost solely for the little trade she is likely to get in consequence of keeping the Murray navigable through South Australia, and the Darling navigable in New South Wales. She is paying little attention to the Murray. She is not talking about the navigation of the Murray from her borders to its source. That can go; that can be put on one side. It is all about the navigability of the Darling she is talking. It would have been wiser for South Australia to have taken what was given at Adelaide—I thought it was too much; but as the proposal was made I was not prepared to oppose it—that is, certain rights over the Murray River for navigation. I think I know as much as most honorable members of this Convention know of the condition of the head of the Murray. As it runs on one side of my electorate for a distance of 100 or 150 miles, I think I may speak with some authority, in spite of what the right honorable member (Mr. Kingston) has said, in saying that there is a possibility, not at too great an expenditure, to conserve the water at the head of the Murray, which will keep the Darling right to its mouth in better condition and fuller than it is or ever has been. That being so, and we being prepared to give that up to the control of the Federation, surely South Australia should be quite satisfied with what she cannot claim at the present time, and what we have given up. Let us have the control of the Darling River, which is altogether within our territory, and deal with it as best we can.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Will you support me if I try to get that sub-section put in again?

Mr. REID. -
If you vote for this, certainly.

Mr. LYNE. -
I may support the honorable member if he makes such a proposal. I would not like to give a definite reply to his question till I saw the surrounding conditions, but I feel very much disposed to support the honorable member.

Mr. REID. -
So will I, if he votes for this.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I will have to consider it gravely, but I will not do it, I think, under these circumstances.

Mr. LYNE. -
My learned friend (Mr. Wise) has said that this dispute has obtained a fictitious importance. I must differ from the learned member. I think it is one of the most important questions which we will have to deal with in this Federation, dealing as it does with New South Wales, or having such vital interests in New South Wales as scarcely any other provision which could be imported into the Bill could have. It is of very vital importance to New South Wales, and I am sure if it were not so her representatives would not have been found to be so unanimous as they have been in sticking together on this question. I am satisfied, as I said before-and I have never attempted to say a word as a threat to the Convention during this adjournment—that it will cause great difficulty in the acceptance of the Bill in New South Wales if any of these rights, as to the rivers which are wholly and solely inside the territory of New South Wales is attempted to be controlled by the Federal Parliament, and taken away from the state Legislature. I should like, sir, if I am in order, to say one word in reference to a matter which is likely to take place if this is left as a state power. I feel that the state will develop the resources of New South Wales much more rapidly than the Federal Government could do, and everything which may be left in the hands of the state, as far as the development of navigation or the conservation and distribution of water are concerned, will receive far greater attention if left to the state than it would if dealt with by the Federal Parliament. Under these conditions, I am sure the whole of the people of New South Wales will view with great alarm any attempt to take away a state right or a state control where the development is of so vital a character, and to place that control, as is attempted to be done by the representatives of South Australia, in the hands of the Federal Parliament. I cannot reconcile the bitter antagonism which has been shown to New South Wales by one representative of Tasmania (Mr. Dobson).

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Nonsense!

Mr. LYNE. -

That honorable gentleman is more antagonistic almost than are the South Australian representatives.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

He is not antagonistic.

Mr. LYNE. -

Certainly it is a matter which does not affect Tasmania, and I expected to have had very strong support from the honorable gentleman in this particular matter. Why he has taken the antagonistic view he has taken to New South Wales I cannot understand.

Mr. SYMON. -

On what ground can you expect him to support an unjust proposal

Mr. LYNE. -

I beg to differ from the honorable member. I think the unjust proposal comes from South Australia.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

He takes an impartial view of the question.

Mr. LYNE. -

South Australia is attempting to take away from New Sout

Mr. GLYNN. -

It is not dictating.

Mr. LYNE. -

It is nonsense for the honorable member to tell me that it does not dictate.
I am not a lawyer, but I have some common sense. It absolutely dictates as to what course is to be taken, or what decision is to be given, or what view the High Court is to take in certain matters. That makes it absolutely necessary to put a still further definition into this sub-section. Rather than do what we are now doing it would be much better to go back to the Bill as it left Adelaide. That would be far more satisfactory to South Australia, and I think also to ourselves.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past p.m.]

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I desire to withdraw the amendment which I proposed.
The amendment was withdrawn accordingly.

Mr. REID. -
I beg now to move-
That the following words be added to the sub-section as amended:-"But no state or citizen shall be prevented from using any of such waters for purposes of irrigation or water conservation."

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I have not spoken this morning, and I just rise in order to ask the committee to put an end to this system of amendments. Mr. Reid has achieved his purpose, and the right honorable gentleman knows perfectly well that the amendment he now proposes will have the same effect as that which he has abandoned.

Mr. REID. -
I know that, but I am putting it in better words.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
In better words, but at the same time they do not show the real effect so clearly as the former amendment. I do not think that the Premier of New South Wales, having achieved his purpose need press the amendment. The leader of the Opposition in New South Wales has no card with which to overtrump this trick.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
Mr. Chairman, I do not mind such imputations from gentlemen who show ordinary frivolity, but I must take exception to such words when used by "grave and reverend seigniors" like Mr. Higgins. Coming from him they have a great deal more vitriol in them than when coming from other individuals. I submit that it is entirely wrong to impute to any honorable member that he is watching the movements of any other honorable member, or that he is endeavouring to take advantage of some other honorable member in connexion with affairs that are not before the Convention. It is highly disorderly to refer to us in any capacity excepting that in which we appear before the Convention. We are all here as representatives bound to carry out a certain duty.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I do not think the remark of the honorable member is in accordance either with the practice or the courtesies of Parliament. If any honorable member thinks that any observation that is made imputes improper motives to him it should be withdrawn.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I withdraw the remark unconditionally. The committee will bear with me when I say this: That we have watched, with great regret, the course of this debate right through, from first to last, with regard to the amendments from South Australia. The effect of the amendment now proposed is to declare that the expressed intention of Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor shall not have effect. They say, rightly or wrongly, that sub-section (1) gives to the Federal Parliament power to prevent any substantial interference with the navigation of these rivers. I understand that the view of Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor is to leave to the glorious uncertainty of the construction of this first sub-section the question of whether or not there is that power which apparently has been taken in the United States. As we cannot agree upon an amendment that will secure to South Australia, and I may say to Australia, the federal control of this river system we ought to stop.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The committee have listened patiently to the discussion of this matter, and have watched the peculiar struggle of interests that has taken place, and which I should not be in order in describing. I do submit that this amendment might be dropped, and that we might allow the glorious uncertainty of the construction of the law to operate on the first sub-section. What I desired was to make this matter federal, and I am sorry that the Premier of New South Wales has shown so anti-federal a spirit as to refuse to make it federal.

Mr. REID. -

What is the use of your saying that? I have had more to do with it than you will have if you live for a thousand years.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I do submit that the position of the Premier of New South Wales has been distinctly anti-federal.

Several HONORABLE MEMBERS. - No.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I have no doubt there are some honorable members who will differ from me, but I am entitled to my view.

Mr. REID. -

Hear, hear; nobody minds your view.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I do not expect the right honorable gentleman to mind my view, but still I do regret that we have not been able to arrive at a conclusion on a matter that is distinctly federal. If we cannot agree, even to any modification of a federal resolution, let us leave this question to sub-section (1). I think that South Australia has gained distinctly by the omission of sub-section (31). That is my view as a matter of construction. Mr. Wise puts very lucidly the view which I struggled to indicate the other day. He was not here at the time.

Mr. WISE. -
Yes, I was.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
At all events, he said that this placing of irrigation and conservation above navigation is not a matter for the Constitution. It certainly is not. It is a question for the Federal Parliament, having regard to the changed conditions of the times; it is a question of policy, to be determined by the conditions of science and of Australia as a whole. I happen to recollect that in the Federalist, Published 110 years ago, such men as Madison and Hamilton were discussing the effects of the Constitution, and they propounded for all time, as a matter of course, that agriculture would be the principal industry of the American people. With all their wisdom, how they have been falsified! Here we are asked to stereotype in the Constitution the idea that water conservation and irrigation are to be paramount for all ages over navigation.

Mr. FRASER. -
That is a different country to this one.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That is quite true, but it is not the question. Being a different country, how are we to know what will be the altered condition of things, which may render the use of those rivers far more valuable for other purposes than even conservation and irrigation? There is great doubt about irrigation and conservation now. I admit that there is overwhelming evidence at the present time that water conservation and irrigation are more useful than navigation, but it is not for the Constitution to say so. That is what is proposed to be stereotyped and rigidly declared, that the Federal Parliament must, notwithstanding how conditions may alter, treat irrigation and water conservation as paramount. As the honorable member (Mr. Holder) says, we cannot foresee what the conditions of the future may be. I have failed in carrying out my view to leave it to be absolutely determined by future conditions, and to leave it to the best arbiter—the Federal Parliament. Having failed in that, I determinedly oppose this idea of rigidly dictating to the Federal Parliament that irrigation and water conservation shall be paramount over navigation. There are uses to which water can be applied, suggested during the last ten years, which may alter altogether the idea which we are trying to put into this Bill. The leader of the Convention and the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) have put their view that sub-section (1) gives a certain operation to the Constitution. Their view, I understand, is that this does not put water conservation and irrigation above everything, but simply gives power to the Federal Parliament to interfere with any undue removal of the water from the Darling or any other river. I would appeal to them, if I could, to declare their view upon this matter. They have hitherto succeeded in opposing every amendment. I understand the view of the leader of the Convention is that there should be no sub-section put in the place of sub-section (31), but that the whole thing should be left to the operation of sub-section (1).

Mr. BARTON. - Yes.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Having regard to that, I would ask for the honorable member's vote in this matter, for here you would be dictating to the Federal Parliament that they should not have the powers which you say they ought to have under the American and this Constitution. Before we go to a vote, I should like to have the view of the leader of the Convention on this question. I want to ask whether he still persists in that view?

Mr. BARTON. - That will be stated at the proper time.

Mr. HIGGINS. - I am glad to hear it, and that will be before the division is taken; that, I apprehend, is all we want. Those honorable members have succeeded in avoiding all amendments. If they adhere to that attitude we shall be very grateful. I feel there will be a chance hereafter, and I hope, as the Convention has gone back on some of its previous resolutions, it will go back upon the resolution here. But I feel we cannot do so at this stage. I feel it is utterly impossible to carry any amendment, and I hope also there will be an absolute blank with regard to the 31st sub-section, or anything else, and that if possible we shall proceed to the next business. It is with the view of stopping this discussion-which has been fruitless from my point of view, and which has put the matter exactly as the leader of the Convention and the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) have stated-it is with the view of stopping the discussion, and leaving it where those honorable members wish to leave it-that I rose to speak.
Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I wish to assure this Convention that when the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) accuses me of an unfederal attitude on this matter he does me a great injustice. I tell the Convention plainly that if what I aim at is not embodied in this Constitution, I, as at present advised—it is too responsible a matter to speak finally upon—will be unable to use any influence which I possess in New South Wales in recommending the labours of this Convention to the acceptance of her people. Honorable members will see that it would be a far more unfederal act on my part to sit still and use no influence to prevent a thing being done which, when done, would convert me, perhaps, into an opponent of federation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Your own constituents do not support you.

Mr. REID. -

I am not explaining to the honorable member at all, I am explaining to this Convention, that I would act an unfederal part, that I would act the part of a traitor to federation, if I sat at this table, and, without any effort on my part, allowed the Constitution to be finished in such a shape that I should have to oppose it when finished. Let me remind the honorable member that there is no one in this Convention who can have a larger interest in the success of this enterprise than the man who originated it, who I happen to be. This

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No.

Mr. REID. -

It is absolutely so; that it should not rest on a question of legal decision. The honorable member (Mr. Glynn) has defined in the Constitution the meaning of general words so as to secure the control of the Darling, a river which is intermittently navigable; and those honorable members who now talk of leaving everything to definition and chance and general words, have got in special words of definition which drag the Darling out of New South Wales into the federal possession.

Mr. WISE. -

Only for one purpose.

Mr. REID. -

What is the difference?

Mr. WISE. -

Only for trade and commerce.

Mr. REID. -

Exactly. I am very sorry indeed that the honorable member (Mr. Wise) cannot see quite clearly, as I think I do, the evils of a divided jurisdiction over the same thing. Whether it is a question of navigation or of irrigation, it clearly concerns the same thing—the watering these rivers. Now there is a divided, jurisdiction upon that subject. We do not, hand over a trust and a duty with reference, to irrigation to the Federal Parliament. If we did it would be infinitely better than as it now stands, because then the Federal Parliament would owe a duty on that subject to the people of Australia. But we simply hand over a duty and an interest, with reference to the use of the water for navigation purposes. There being a divided jurisdiction over the same thing, are we to leave it to fights between the states and the Commonwealth, between the states and private individuals, between one set and another set of private individuals?

Are we to leave this question of divided jurisdiction and use to the conflicts and the chances of the future? I say no, and I say no in the interests of a colony to which the interest is a vital one. Therefore, the Darling having been taken by force under the amendment of Mr. Glynn into this Constitution, on that ground alone, I cannot leave to the federal power the control of these waters for navigation, with the certainty that in the control of these waters for navigation questions might arise as to their use for irrigation and conservation. What remedy is a court of law to a settler? What surer course to absolute ruin is there to a man who has works for water conservation on the banks of a river than the Federal Supreme Court? We owe it to the people of Australia, who put their money and enterprise into this work, to let them know the security on which they stand.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You urged yesterday that it should be left to the Federal High Court.

Mr. REID. -
I said, as to the position before the Convention then, that matters of dispute between states should be left to the Federal Court, and this is done by section 77.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Knowing that there was no legal right.

Mr. REID. -
So far from that being the case, I pointed out that section 77 gives an original jurisdiction to enable any state to come into the Federal Court and complain of the conduct of any other state. The honorable member now admits that there is no legal right.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I have always said so.

Mr. REID. -

Now, the honorable member puts himself before Australia in this position: There being no legal right behind this struggle of days against New South Wales, her waters are to be handed over to the whole field of conflicting jurisdiction, and doubt, and uncertainty, and litigation in a matter vital to the future of New South Wales. I decline to leave the solid interests of the settlers of New South Wales to such a tribunal on a vital point.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

They are not her waters but there is no legal right which you can enforce.

Mr. REID. -

I see. I do not know how to deal with any one like the honorable gentleman. I should like to know what sort of a right it is that is unenforceable?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I did not say that. I have not said there is a right. I said you ought to treat the South Australians as the law treats owners lower down the stream.

Mr. REID. -

We do more than that; we treat them in a perfectly generous way, so much so, that not a single act is complained of. But the honorable member is shifting his ground. One moment he says it rests on legal right-equitable right-and then he says that we ought to treat South Australians in a certain way, and my reply is that we treat them in such a way.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Have I said so?

Mr. REID. -

What I point out is, it is not a question of treating this or that action rightly or wrongly; we have no right to leave this vital question in doubt. If it was a matter of vital consequence to the Federal Constitution that Mr. Glynn's amendment should be added to relieve the federal courts from even the chance of deciding according to law, and to compel them to decide, that a certain river, because that is all it was aimed at, should be navigable-if that was important enough to be put in the bed-rock of the Constitution, in definite words, we from New South Wales are bound, in view of divided jurisdiction over these waters, to put some rule of conduct and decision in the Constitution to decide the vexed questions that must arise all along the banks of rivers, such as this river to which I have referred. It is the old consideration-trying to get, for navigation, the control of waters that we want and must have for irrigation.
Mr. FRASER. -

That is the whole trouble.

Mr. REID. -

This matter of disputes arising under a divided jurisdiction is of importance to, us all. In the western districts of our colony the land has become fertile owing to the expenditure of a large amount of capital and industry, by means of works of conservation and irrigation. Just as these works are fulfilling their part, just as these water conservation works are most undoubtedly filling their vital part in colonization, the river runs down to a point at which navigation is becoming dangerous, at which the issue is trembling in the balance. Are those draughts of water for irrigation purposes to continue, because if they do the river will become unnavigable? Or, are they to be stopped in order to maintain the navigability, of the river? And the only duty which the Commonwealth will have under these words will be to maintain the navigability of the river, because we put that duty on the Commonwealth

Mr. SOLOMON. -

What words in Mr. Glynns amendment do you mean?

Mr. REID. -

The honorable member ought really scarcely to interrupt me in the way he is doing, because it is admitted by all of us that, under general words, the duty of maintaining the navigability of these rivers will be vested, by this provision, in the Federal Parliament.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That is not admitted all round.

Mr. REID. -

Well, it is astonishing how my honorable friends follow Mr. Barton when it suits them, and throw over his construction of the provisions of the Bill when it does not suit them.

Mr. HOWE. -

That shows their innocence.

Mr. REID. -

All I can say is this, whether it is so or not, eminent lawyers in this Convention-and I know that the honorable the leader of the Convention is one of the most eminent-hold such an opinion. Now, since Mr. Glynn's anxieties have been cleared up by definition, I want the rights and anxieties of the people of Australia with reference to water conservation to be cleared up and defined. If they are not defined, litigation, uncertainty, and paralysis are certain to follow. And the trouble we are in in New South Wales is this: We are handing over to the Federation, in general words, according to this Bill, the whole of the waters of the Darling and the Murrumbidgee without a definition as to what our rights will be, and as to how they will be regarded if a difficulty arises between the two things—navigation and water conservation and irrigation. I say it will be an unstatesmanlike proceeding to leave that portion of the Bill in that state. The interests at stake are too serious for us to agree to that. I can assure honorable members that the ardour and earnestness with which I am fighting this matter are entirely above the tricks of local politics. Surely if there are two men in New South Wales who may be supposed to have a very fair idea of the opinion of the people, it is the two men who happen to be the Premier of the colony and the leader of the Opposition. And when gentlemen, accustomed as we are to differ perpetually and to fight constantly, agree and tell you what the public opinion of New South Wales is on this point, instead of being a proof of some trick or of a desire of the one to overpass the other in our own colony, I think the more candid-minded members of this Convention will regard it as a proof that both of us are representing what we believe to be the feelings of the people of our colony.

Mr. HOWE. -

But the leader of the Opposition is an anti-federalist.

Mr. REID. -

That is not so.

Mr. HOWE. -

He stated so.

Mr. REID. -

I know that the leader of the Opposition has never put himself in that position. His presence here is no proof of that charge. But whether that is so or not, I think, when a man who is pretty well qualified to speak on a subject expresses his opinion, it should at least be received with that respect which is usual amongst assemblies above a certain level. Now, I am earnest about this matter, because I feel that if the Constitution is left as it stands, it puts me in a very painful position in endeavouring to advocate its acceptance in New South Wales. In no case, is that a threat. It is my particular desire to stand side by side with Mr. Barton in New South Wales in strongly recommending this Constitution to the people of New South Wales, and I think my honorable friend knows, from our consultations in this matter, that I have given him practical proofs of my desire in that respect. That being so, I hope honorable members will credit me with higher motives than those that have been attributed to me.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Is the honorable member prepared to concede to South Australia a right to use these waters for irrigation purposes, leaving out navigation?

Mr. REID. -

I consider that the amendment I propose is satisfactory, in the sense that it places the irrigationists of all Australia on the same footing.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Subject to the prior right of New South Wales to use all the water but it does not give South Australia any chance of having a right to use this water. Your amendment wants some modification in that direction.

Mr. REID. -

Now, in the first place, as a matter of fact, I believe there would be no practical difficulty.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I quite agree with you.

Mr. REID. -

Because it is a comparatively simple matter in South Australia as compared with New South Wales. By the time the Murray reaches South Australia it is a large river. I do not know exactly how far it runs in South Australia, but it is a very short distance compared with our water system in New South Wales. My difficulty is this-I believe that the people of New South Wales, in their treatment of these waters, will act as they have always acted. I believe that our interests are so bound up in that part of the country with the navigation of the Darling, that, in the actual administration of affairs between the states and the Commonwealth, practically no hardship whatever can come to South Australian irrigation. That is the view I take. Now, that being my view, I am asked to give up something which has this unfortunate attribute-that, give up that something in any way you will, it raises that eternal doubt as to what the rights will be. Supposing, for instance-I want, as far as it is possible, to clear up this difficulty-I am willing to say that no rights of New South Wales in the tributaries of the Murray, or in the Murray itself, should be so exercised as to interfere with the navigation of the River Murray. Now, that would be something to ask me to give up. The evil of that concession immediately suggests itself to a practical mind. What power on earth is ever to decide a question of that kind with reference to the water of a river which does not get to South Australia for a certain period of time I allude to the water of the River Darling? What tribunal in the world is to decide this question as to whether, in fact, some one or some body of men is or are doing those things to produce that result? The everlasting uncertainty of the thing, the certainty of everlasting attempts to get these things settled-things incapable of solution on account of the uncertainty of the conditions-would put all parties in an uncertain position, in which the waters of the river would be of no use to them.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You say yourself that a deal of the uncertainty is never likely to happen.

Mr. REID. -

But we would be establishing a settlement which would, in itself, be sure to be uncertain. It would conduce to the raising of disputes which we would be anxious to avoid. If I could see a concession which I could make, which would avoid the risk of future disputes, I can assure my honorable friend, the Premier of Victoria, that such a [P.579] starts here proposition would have the greatest possible attraction for me. But the evil of any such a suggestion as, that which has been put to me is that it only exchanges a general for a practical uncertainty.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Could not you allow the Federal Parliament, as a fair body, to grant to South Australia certain rights for irrigation with regard to these waters?

Mr. REID. -

Let me put my difficulty on that point in this way. It is a very important question, and no one objects to interjections when they are of such value as those which Sir George Turner is making. I will show you our difficulty on that point. We are willing to accept, and we have accepted, a provision which enables South Australia, or any citizen of South Australia, to go to the Federal Court and complain of any act by New South Wales, or by any citizen of New South Wales, which derogates from any right they possess.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That is going back to the old trouble.

Mr. REID. -

But you will understand I am beginning at the beginning of this matter. Now I am asked to do this-it being admitted that there is to be a solution, in which a state or a citizen of the Commonwealth can get all its or his rights-I am asked to give up something which belongs to New South Wales-something which is not a right on the part of persons outside of New South Wales. And the objection which I have to give up that right of New South Wales is this-I say again I would do it, if the concession would produce certainty of tenure for enterprises in water conservation. But in giving up those rights of New South Wales-they are pretty generally recognised now-the concession would take such a form that the whole right would go. That is to say, it would produce an element of uncertainty in the use of the water, which would debar all practical men from embarking their capital in New South Wales in enterprises which depend upon the use of this water.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I think the Federal Parliament might so devise their law, at the time they were making it, as to avoid that difficulty. That is my feeling.

Mr. REID. -

Well, on federal matters, I am prepared, as every honorable member is, to accept the chances of federal action, but what I am asked to do, and what New South Wales in this vital matter will not do, is to go away from that position—the equal position in which we have been acting in federation up to this moment—and take a course which is practically giving up something for which we get nothing in return.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You will give up nothing.

Mr. REID. -

Well, is there a colony which, on its public policy, is in greater danger of giving up a great deal than New South Wales? Are none of the risks of federation falling upon the people of New South Wales, who, under any conceivable circumstances, will bear nearly 50 per cent of the taxation of the Commonwealth themselves alone?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I am speaking of you personally, not of New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -

Oh, that is the misfortune of the honorable member. He has been dealing with me too personally in this matter. I decline to be regarded as a person speaking from personal motives on this question. I am, in a special sense, the guardian of the rights and interests of a great colony—of a great community—and I say, for the first time in this federal enterprise, New South Wales, which must give up so much, which must take so large a share of the federal risks of the Commonwealth, is asked, in addition to her share of the risks of federation, to distinctly give up local rights. Now, the basis of this attempt at federation was this—that no colony was to be asked to give up its rights, unless it was prepared to surrender them. I take my position on the bed-rock of this federal movement, and I say that those who at this late hour of the day, when the Constitution is about to be finished, throw this additional difficulty in the way of the delegates of New South Wales, of asking them to make a local sacrifice in a vital matter, where no other colony is to make a local sacrifice in a vital matter, throw too great a strain upon the enthusiasm, whatever it is, of the people of New South Wales for federation. We cannot go back to our people with the destinies of three-fourths of our territory

[976]
vitaly concerned—we cannot go back to our people and say—We have given up the rights of the colony," and given them up in such a way that, instead of producing a settlement on a clearly-defined line, we would be throwing every one into the uncertainties and confusion of legal decisions upon things which are incapable of being decided on by a legal tribunal.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
We have tried to avoid that all along.

Mr. REID. -
My honorable friends have, if they will allow me to say so, been fighting to get this thing, which belongs to New South Wales, out of New South Wales in the name of federation. Well, in the name of federation, I tell you that you cannot get it.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
That is, you are prepared to give nothing?

Mr. REID. -
Give nothing? Does New South Wales give nothing in allying its destinies with the colony of South Australia?

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Not much.

Mr. REID. -
Does a country, constituted as New South Wales is, risk nothing in joining in this union? Surely, if we are willing to take an equal risk with every other colony, that is all that can be asked of us.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
The risk of what?

Mr. REID. -
Of your being Treasurer of the Commonwealth, though I admit that is very problematical. I say that this is a vital matter for New South Wales; we all must admit that.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
What is a vital matter?

Mr. REID. -
It is a vital matter to New South Wales that we should be asked to make this purely local sacrifice when there are no other local sacrifices. Where is the local sacrifice that any colony has tendered yet in the name of federation? Where is there one point in this great Constitution where any one colony has come forward and said:"In the name of federation we give up something that belongs to us exclusively"? At one moment honorable members claim rights, which, in the next breath, they admit they do not possess.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
We do not claim rights, but a fair bargain if we are going into this union. We say-"If we are going into this Federation let us go into the Federation. on such terms as we can recommend to the people of South Australia."

Mr. REID. -

I must admit that I quite see the position of the South Australian representatives. I quite see that it is a vital matter to them, and it is a vital matter to us. But the difference between the two colonies is a difference which ought to decide, in my respectful opinion, every independent member of this Convention outside of those colonies. The difference is that New South Wales is not asking anything that belongs to any one else—that New South Wales is simply asking to be allowed to keep that which belongs to her. That is the only difference, and that is an important difference, and independent men in this Convention must see that it is an important difference. After the great fight we have had, I thought we had come long ago practically to this conclusion—that in the interests of federation, New South Wales shall not be forced—she cannot be forced, but the attempt should not be made to force her into making a sacrifice, which is admitted to be a sacrifice, without her own free will and consent. Now, I go behind the representatives of New South Wales. I tell you, from all the means of information I possess, that the people of New South Wales cannot voluntarily consent to make this sacrifice. When the colony asked to make the sacrifice tells the Convention that, I think it ought to settle the matter with the Convention, and I simply put the matter upon that ground, assuring honorable members that, if I did not see the grave danger of this matter to our great enterprise, I would not have taken up the time of the Convention to-day as I have done.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I think it is a little to be regretted that the right honorable gentleman who has just sat down did not as vehemently resist the amendment proposed by Mr. Glynn as he now supports the amendment which he himself has suggested, because the effect of the right honorable gentleman's amendment on Mr. Glynn's amendment is practically to negative that amendment.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Worse than that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

That at least. Whether that amendment was necessary or not I am not sure.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It was only to make something clear which was doubtful.
Sir JOHN DOWNER.

I believe it was simply for the purpose of clearing up all doubts. However, I think myself that it is a matter for deep regret that the committee did not adopt the line of action recommended by the Attorney-General of Victoria the other day, which was founded, as I think everybody admitted, on what was right and just. Now, after three days more discussion, we have the Premier of New South Wales getting up and taking identically the same stand as he did at the beginning, asking us to reconsider everything that we have been considering over and over again for the last four days, making all our consultations and debates futile, and simply telling us that he would be a traitor to the cause of federation if he did not assure us that his people would not possibly accept federation, except on terms that we consider to be inconsistent with any true federation. Quite apart from the right honorable gentleman's difficulties with his constituents—with his colony—we have to consider the cause of what is fair and right. We are not here, I think, to make impassioned speeches. We are here to talk quietly and reasonably, and we should pay a poor tribute to the intelligence of each other if we thought declamation would very much assist argument. The right honorable gentleman asked Mr. Higgins whether he claimed that there was any legal right. Mr. Higgins replied—"I always said there was no legal right." I myself had said before that there was no legal right; everybody had said there was no legal right, in the sense that there was no court in which the right could be enforced, and it could not be enforced by the arbitriment of war. But that there was a right is what we have always contended, a right which, if the next-door neighbour of New South Wales happened to be a hostile nation, New South Wales would by the comity of nations have to recognise. All we have said is this:—"True, we have no court in which we can bring an action against you; we have no bailiffs with which we could turn you out; and we have no military to use force—we would not be allowed by the Imperial Government to do so if we had—but treat us, at all events, no worse than you would treat a hostile neighbour if he happened to be next door, instead of friends and brothers, and do what is considered by the law of nations to be reasonable and fair. I was always satisfied to have the control of navigable streams and nothing else. That was objected to. One matter after another was proposed, was resisted, and was rejected. Now, this identical proposition of the right honorable gentleman (Mr. Reid) has in effect been proposed before. It is really in substance, though not in form, the proposal that was made by Mr. McMillan, a proposal which was discussed at length, and negativted. And now we have come back to it again. We are having the whole thing over again, and we are asked to say whether or not we will begin this Federation with a distinctly anti-federal provision, and by the establishment of a condition that is bound to end in trouble to the Commonwealth, which we all hope will work smoothly and well in the future. Anything more anti-federal than the position taken up by New South Wales can hardly be conceived. For my own part, I would be willing now, although I thought it very undesirable, to take the position that Mr. Higgins takes and to say—"Strike out all these provisions and leave the matter to sub-section (1), relating to trade and commerce. What has the Premier of New South Wales to fear in regard to that? Who has been a greater advocate for the absolute freedom of trade and commerce than my right honorable friend?

Mr. REID. -
Hear, hear. And I have acted up to that, too.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Exactly; and then when a Bill is brought in, in which we only provide for the absolute freedom of trade in the Commonwealth-

Mr. REID. -
I always fought for freedom of water conservation too, and here is a divided jurisdiction which might conflict. That is the trouble.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
That is not the point I am dealing with just now. What I am willing to accept, as Mr. Higgins is willing to accept, is the simple provision for the control of trade and commerce, coupled with the other provisions for freedom of trade; yet the grand advocate for freedom of trade in Australia objects to that, because he says that in America there has been a construction put upon it, which the leader of the Convention says would apply to this, and which makes trade and commerce very much freer than even the great free-trader desires it to be. That is the objection of my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid). What injustice, I would ask, has come from the judicial decisions on the American Constitution? What injustice does my right honorable friend think will come from this High Court, which will be established, and which will certainly do justice to all in the Parliament, which is bound to represent all the best minds of Australia? But he objects to this. He wants to assert the right of every state through which a river runs to take every drop of water if it likes; and, as New South Wales happens to be the first state through which this water runs, when they have taken it all, or have acquired the possibility of taking it all, they kindly say to us—"You have just the same right; you can take the rest." Now, sir, where is the difficulty? We have had the delegates from New South Wales telling us half-a-dozen times that we are fighting shadows. They fight them very hard. If this is the manner in which the representatives of New South Wales contend with shadows, I should not like to meet them in a contest on a matter of substance. But the shadow that they want here is what we happen to consider a substance, and they are determined that we shall not have it. Now, I hope that, although the eloquence of the right honorable gentleman might have appealed to some, the appeal will not be strong enough to influence the sense of right and justice in the mind of any honorable member in this Convention. Certainly, as this discussion has gone on altogether at too great length, in my opinion— the adhesion to the cause of South Australia has become "small by degrees, and beautifully less." I do think that after this four days' discussion—

Mr. WALKER. -
Six days.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Let us restore the seventh day, then.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I hope so. I hope that after this discussion, we shall come to a decision that will not send us back just to the condition that we were in in the first instance, and one that will not render futile all the great debate that has taken place. I shall vote against this amendment. If it would be any satisfaction to the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales, I should be willing to strike out the amendment of Mr. Glynn, and leave sub-section (1) to do the work, taking the consequent risks; although it would not be artistic, and I agree that at the initiation of this Constitution we should explain what we mean and not leave too much to judicial construction. That is the view we took, and we have endeavoured to carry it out in supporting the amendment of the Attorney-General of Victoria. That amendment took into consideration all the views upon the subject. It dealt exhaustively with every question. The same reason which made me support the amendment of Mr. Isaacs makes me oppose that of Mr. Reid. If it becomes necessary, or will assist in any friendly understanding, to strike out Mr. Glynn's clause, I would, although I should think it a mistake to do so, agree to that, rather than part with a misunderstanding. But I hope that honorable members will, in spite of the strong appeal of my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid), and in spite of his undoubted knowledge as to the probable intentions of a certain portion of his constituents, be prepared to trust to the good sense of honour and justice of the people of New South Wales not to refuse to accept a Constitution which is right, because of a condition in it which they may say affects their interests prejudicially, but will rather pass the Constitution in the form we think just and right, and trust to our brothers in New South Wales to do the right thing. It is better to do this than to follow the Premier of New South Wales, who assures us he represents the views of his people, and wishes us to buy their allegiance at the expense of what we consider a wrong and an injustice.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I regret that an honorable member of this Convention has thought fit to accuse another honorable member of harboring animosity towards the mother colony of New South Wales; and if my honorable friend (Mr.
Lyne) has mistaken for animosity the earnest efforts which I have made to do what is just and right, I must leave him alone, believing that no other honorable member will hold that opinion. But in order that I may be just, and that I may vote rightly upon this extremely difficult question, I would like to say a word or two to my right honorable friend, the Premier of New South Wales, whose second amendment is now before this Convention.
When the right honorable gentleman moved his first amendment, I was most anxious to rise in my place and implore him to withdraw it. I am glad that he has withdrawn it, but it appears to me that he has now moved another amendment which is almost equally objectionable in its character
The amendment of the right honorable gentleman which we are now discussing is objectionable, because if it he is absolutely going back upon himself-withdrawing from the offer he made to us and from the promise which he made to the colony of South Australia I had been congratulating myself during this debate that if we did not engraft upon this Constitution that states as well as individuals have riparian rights, we should at all events fall back upon the promise of Mr. Reid and maintain the navigability of these rivers, because so long as you have engrafted on the Constitution that the navigability of the rivers must be maintained, that to a very great extent limits the power of New South Wales to go in for irrigation at the expense of navigation. And when the time came for the Federal Parliament to declare a policy as to whether irrigation should be paramount the federal spirit would prevail, and I am sure the colony of New South Wales would be glad to give up her claim to irrigation unless it could be done without injuring the other colonies. By the amendment now proposed, Mr. Reid, to use his own words, desires to force upon this Convention a new proposition. Now, will the right honorable gentleman deny that in the early stages of this long debate be promised in the most absolute way that the navigability of these rivers should be maintained for the purpose of inter-state commerce? and will he deny that if you are to put irrigation above navigation, and to grant that the waters of these highways which are used for the purposes of commerce may be used so that every drop of water may be taken from them for irrigation purposes, he promises a thing with one hand and withdraws it absolutely with the other? In case the right honorable gentleman should, have any doubt as to what he actually did promise, let me read a quotation from his speech on page 83 of Hansard. In that speech, the right honorable gentleman said-

But I my, in regard to the federal power-the fair and honest power which lies at the heart of federation-I do not care what its consequences are, I accept them. Therefore, I cannot be accused-neither I nor my honorable friends from New South Wales-of disputing this proposition: That for every inch of water navigable in New South Wales, and Capable of being used for inter-colonial trade, we give up any pretence to exclusive control, any power to make commerce unequal as between the colonies.

Mr. REID. -
That is perfectly correct.

Mr. DOBSON. -
How can the right honorable gentleman give up the navigability of there waters, and then say that paramount to that, and above that, he can use every, drop of the water to irrigate the arid land of New South Wales?

Mr. REID. -
I used the expression "navigable" deliberately, and I make the same statement now. When the river is navigable we do not claim any unequal right over any other colony.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Quite so; the right honorable gentleman now, by the amendment which he has moved, asks to maintain the right of New South Wales to use every drop of the water.

Mr. REID. -
To maintain their right of irrigation, surely.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Let us read a little further-

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The American decisions go further than that.

Mr. REID. -
Yes, I know; they go to an extent which alarms me, because they go to the extent of interfering with irrigation improvements of all kinds.

Mr. GORDON. -
Only in so far as the improvements intercept the traffic.

Mr. REID. -
Yes, I am aware that that is not lost sight of.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Or as far as they affect interstate navigation.
Mr. REID. -

Well, I do not oppose that power. I am, certainly the last one to wish to interfere with a power of that kind, and we, as New South Wales representatives, should be the last to do so in view of the policy we have adopted in our colony.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Would it not also be competent to interfere with the water being taken away?

Mr. REID. -

I must say that I am afraid so, and it raises up, I must tell honorable members, a very serious question indeed, even in its most unobjectionable form, as affecting New South Wales. We cannot avoid that. But still I admit that we must be thorough in all matters that are really federal and national, and which affect the broad intercourse of the different colonies. Therefore up to that point, however far it may take me, I feel that I must go.

Mr. REID. -

That is why I moved the amendment.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The right honorable gentleman, having "gone the whole hog," is now very much afraid of consequences from which he did not shrink seven days ago, and seeks by an amendment to derogate from his own gift.

Mr. REID. -

I did not promise to sacrifice irrigation to you or to any one else, and I never will.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I desire to do what is right to the parent colony. I know the immense water-shed which she has, and I am certain that no Federal Court or Parliament would take from her the enormous right which she possesses to use the waters of her rivers for purposes of irrigation. But why throw dust in our eyes by telling us that we are to have control over the navigation of every inch of water, and then put irrigation before navigation, and let the inter state trade go where it likes? The second ground upon which I object to the amendment is this: The right honorable member has all along been most cocky," as the boys say. He is of the opinion that, as Providence has given this water to New South Wales, that colony has the sole right to it. I do not think that that is so, and when the High Court or the Privy Council come to deal with this matter they will see some way of engrafting upon the Constitution the federal spirit which ought to be displayed, and they will shrink from saying-"You federalized these waters for the purposes of navigation, but New South Wales can use every drop for irrigation." Would any Judge take such a view? Would any court in the world be driven to such a conclusion if there were a way of escape? One strong man would rise up and show the way out of the difficulty. We cannot be guilty of such folly as to federalize the waters of the continent for navigation, and allow them to be abused for irrigation. I ask my right honorable friend to show the federal spirit which animated the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) in 1891, and which animated him seven days ago.

Mr. REID. -

It killed the 1891 Bill.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I agree with the honorable member (Mr. Dobson) that this is a matter which ought to be discussed without personality. None of us wish to see federation swamped in the waters of the Murray and the Darling; but unless we deal in a very cautious manner with the particular issue now presented to the Convention, we shall run the risk of losing the fruits of our labours. I am more convinced than I should like perhaps to express in words of the very critical nature of the point round which our discussion is hinging. I have incurred some reproach at the hands of my colleagues for having persistently refused to regard this question as one between New South Wales and South Australia. I continue in that view. I cannot rise to those great heights of provincial patriotism which enable one to rejoice that one colony exceeds in resources another colony, or that one colony, by the development of her natural resources, has diminished the trade and commerce of her neighbours. It appears to me that the development of any colony should redound to the advantage, pecuniary and otherwise, of every other colony. At the same time, I accept freely the determinations which, if we can gather anything from a seven days discussion, have been arrived at almost unanimously by both sections of the Convention. They are these: While navigation is to be a matter of federal concern, irrigation is to be exclusively provincial. No one has been more emphatic in regard to that doctrine than the representatives of Victoria have been, because no colony has a larger interest at stake in the matter than Victoria has. I do not agree with the amendment proposed by the right honorable member (Mr. Reid), for various reasons which I will briefly indicate, but I consider that it is absolutely necessary, in view of the far-reaching nature of the American decisions, to make it absolutely clear that provincial rights in the matter of irrigation and water conservation are to be preserved.

Mr. REID. -

Hear, hear; that is all I desire. I will accept any form of words which makes that clear.
Mr. KINGSTON. -

Even to the destruction of navigation.

Mr. WISE. -

I do not say even to the destruction of navigation. What I say is that at present we have not yet reached that full development of the federal spirit which would enable us to hand over all irrigation works to the Federal Parliament. I express no opinion as to whether that is a good thing or a bad thing; but can we gather anything from the discussion unless it is that the opinion of both sides is that irrigation should be a matter of provincial concern? The question for us to consider-and it is one which may be discussed without any heat-is this:

Does the Constitution, as at present framed and without any amendment, strike at this provincial right?

Mr. SYMON. -

No; it does not.

Mr. WISE. -

That is a question in regard to which, as a lawyer, my mind has wavered very much. The clause conferring the right to regulate trade and commerce has been interpreted in the United States to include the right to control navigation. That right, of necessity, includes the right to remove obstructions to navigation. Now, obstructions are not only such as prevent navigation; they may only make navigation difficult and retard its possibility. Let me take a concrete instance to show what might occur. Suppose I, as an individual settler, dammed back, at my own expense, a billabong running entirely within my own land. Suppose I did that near the mouth of the Murray-and the first billabong that would be dammed is near the mouth of the Murray.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Do you mean in South Australia?

Mr. WISE. -

It does not matter whether I am in Victoria, South Australia, or New South Wales. I dam back a billabong and keep the water from flowing into the Darling or the Murray, as the case may be. The result is that when a drought comes navigation is impeded for, say, two days, or two weeks, or two months. Could a man whose barge was stopped-never mind whether there has been legislation on the subject-apply to the High Court under the clause for an injunction to restrain me from impounding the water?

Mr. ISAACS. -

If there had been no legislation he could not, according to the American decisions.

Mr. WISE. -

The matters seems to me to be open to very grave doubt.

Mr. SYMON. -

The Convention could not sit in judgment upon that point.

Mr. WISE. -

No; but my contention is that, as the matter is open to doubt and I know that doubt is shared by other lawyers than myself—we are not doing our duty to those who sent us here in refusing to define clearly what will be the individual rights of a citizen in a matter of this kind.

Mr. SYMON. -

You cannot possibly have a definition to meet a case like that.

Mr. WISE. -

I think we can, and I will suggest one. The definition I propose is to make it perfectly clear in the Constitution that no general words, in either sub-section (1) or any other part of the Constitution, interfere with the exclusive right of each province, as it exists to-day, to legislate on matters of water conservation and irrigation.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Subject to the, right of navigability?

Mr. WISE. -

I say subject to nothing.

Mr. DOBSON. -

That is the whole point.

Mr. WISE. -

I admit that I cannot satisfy, and I shall not attempt to satisfy, those who say that navigation is to take precedence of irrigation.

Mr. SYMON. -

You offered it to us.

Mr. WISE. -

And I cannot satisfy those who say that irrigation is a matter of federal concern.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

If your contention is correct, every billabong and the whole of the tributaries of the Murray may be dammed back by the colonies in which they are, and the Murray converted into a dry gully.

Mr. WISE. -

May I answer that by putting another question? Do we wish to take that power away from the state?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I think we should.
Mr. WISE. -

That is a frank clear expression of opinion. It involves a determination which the Convention has not yet come to. It involves a determination which the Convention has rejected. It involves the federalization of irrigation. I will go with the honorable member for that power. I shall be found in a minority here, I believe, of fourteen. I believe that all those who voted for the federalization of the railways, of whom I think, the honorable member was one, will vote in favour of the federalization of water-ways and irrigation absolutely.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

With federal control, not management.

Mr. WISE. -

Federal control, management, and everything.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

No.

Mr. WISE. -

I will go further, perhaps, than most members to strengthen the Federal Government, but I recognise that I am in a hopeless minority. My only wish now is to suggest some form of words which will give expression to the wishes of the majority here. I do not say that I would not go further, for I would, and I have done as much as I possibly could do to extend in every direction the powers of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

By voting against us.

Mr. WISE. -

My honorable friend and I have not often differed. On one occasion, I believe, we did, and on that occasion I was right. Without occupying further time, I accept what I believe to be the decision of the Convention. With the desire to reserve exclusive provincial control over the matters over which control exists to-day, I suggest as an amendment the insertion of these words:--

Nothing in this Constitution shall affect the exclusive right of each state to legislate upon the subjects of water conservation and irrigation within its own territory.

Now, we are told by South Australia that that right does not exist to-day. If it does not exist there is a very easy way to test it. Let an application be made to-morrow in the Equity Court, through my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins), for an injunction to restrain the water trust of Goulburn, on the ground that it has no power to divert any of that water which naturally would otherwise flow past the territory of South Australia; or let the application be made to the Privy Council. The amendment which I suggest is designed to preserve, not only to us, but to our neighbours, whatever rights either may have. If the representatives of South Australia could, by application to the Imperial Parliament, get the powers of the Legislature of New South Wales or Victoria so altered as to deprive them of making use of water for this purpose, that right is preserved by the amendment I suggest. All that is preserved is the present exclusive right.

Mr. FRASER. -
That is leaving us as we are now.

Mr. WISE. -
It leaves things exactly as they are. I would like to make this appeal to my friends from South Australia, the opinion of the Convention being against them-

Mr. HOLDER. -
It is not against the trade and commerce clause though.

Mr. WISE. -
The opinion of the Convention being against them in this respect, that they cannot attain the object they have in view except by giving to the trade and commerce clause an extension utterly inconsistent with their own ideas as to the rights of the state Parliament to deal with irrigation-how can they be in a bad situation when recommending this Constitution to their constituents, when they point out to them that matters remain as they are?

Mr. HOLDER. -
You do more than that.

Mr. WISE. -
It is no question of loss; no power is taken away from a single South Australian elector. There is no assertion of any new right on the part of any of the other colonies.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Mr. Reid will abandon his amendment for mine, perhaps.

Mr. WISE. -
It would be an express declaration in the Constitution that the rights of each state in regard to these matters remain for the future exactly as they are.

Mr. GORDON. -
And we are surrendering rights in all other directions except one.

Mr. REID. -
Are we not all doing that?

Mr. WISE. -
It is all a matter of surrender, but there is no surrender in respect of these water rights by any colony. That is to say, the right to control navigation is a right which is surrendered by every colony, not by one at the expense of another. And if we do desire honestly to keep irrigation separate as a matter of provincial concern, what can be the objection to making that statement definitely in the Constitution? My objection to the previous amendment was that it attempted to lay down a hard-and-fast rule for the guidance of all future time, for the guidance particularly of the Federal Parliament, when we could not possibly forecast the necessary physical conditions, which might determine the relative importance of the two questions of irrigation and navigation. But if we have refrained from that, and if we are simply making an assertion that things are to remain as they are, then much of the objection I had is removed. The objection I have to the present amendment is that it is a serious interference with provincial rights. It provides that no state or citizen shall be prevented from taking water. It seems to me clear that this being an Imperial Act, passed by the Imperial Parliament, the result would be an absolute destruction of the right of any provincial Parliament to legislate over its own waters. As the law now stands, a man may not take water as he pleases; he maybe prevented, because he must pay regard for the rights of other riparian owners. If we put this provision in the Constitution, which will be an Imperial Act, that no citizen is to be prevented from taking water, we abrogate the common law entirely.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Strike out the words "or citizen."

Mr. WISE. -

That would remove that part of my objection. It is a mere matter of drafting. It appears to me that the form of the amendment, as I suggest it, makes it much more clear that the intention of the committee is simply to leave things as they are.

Mr. SYMON. -

What is your amendment?

Mr. WISE. -

My amendment is as follows:--

Nothing in this Constitution shall affect the exclusive right of each state to legislate upon the subjects of water conservation and irrigation within its own territory.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I rather favour the amendment submitted by the Premier of New South Wales, with this exception, that I think the words "or citizen" should be struck out.

Mr. REID. -
I am quite agreeable.

Mr. ISAACS. -
A great deal of difficulty will be cleared away by the excision of those words. It will leave the matter in this position: That, by reason of Mr. Glynn's addition, there will be no doubt, I take it, that the Federal Parliament will have a right to legislate as to the navigability of these rivers.

Mr. SYMON. -
No; only in so far as relates to the maintenance of the cardinal principle of the Constitution—the freedom of trade and commerce.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is quite right, but, according to the whole of the decisions in America, this provision will leave it absolutely to the discretion of the Federal Parliament to say how far the control of the waters is necessary for that purpose. There is no power in the United States to say that you have gone too far. It is quite right to state that they are only to legislate as to the navigability of the rivers for the purposes of trade and commerce, but the question of the extent of the control to be assumed by the Federal Parliament is a political one, as the courts have decided time after time.

Mr. SYMON. -
Do you think the control of the freedom of trade and commerce, which is the basis of the Constitution, ought to be cut down at all? It is a little too late to raise this issue.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I am saying that if you give the power to the Federal Parliament with regard to trade and commerce it ought to be complete, but I say, as I said beforehand for the reasons I gave the other day—that we must place in the forefront the question of irrigation for the purpose of production.

Mr. SYMON. -
Why cannot you trust the Federal Parliament?

Mr. ISAACS. -
Mr. Wise has raised a very important question as to whether any individual could appeal to the Supreme Court in the absence of any federal legislation to compel the removal of obstructions? I want to refer to a very late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which, to my mind, goes to show most conclusively that that cannot be done. The case is that of the Willamette Iron Bridge Company v. Hatch, which was decided in 1887, and is reported in vol. 125 United States Reports, at page 1. I am
The power of Congress to pass laws for the regulation of the navigation of public rivers, and to prevent any and all obstructions therein, is not questioned. But until it does pass some such law, there is no common law of the United States which prohibits obstructions and nuisances in navigable rivers, unless it be the maritime law, administered by the courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. No precedent, however, exists for the enforcement of any such law; and, if any such law could be enforced (a point which we do not undertake to decide), it would not avail to sustain the bill in equity filed in the original case. There must be a direct statute of the United States in order to bring within the scope of its laws, as administered by the courts of law and equity, obstructions and nuisances in navigable streams within the states.

The matter seems to be absolutely clear. Other decisions are referred to in this case, and it is established in the United States that until Congress does legislate there is no power by which the courts can enforce the removal of obstructions.

Mr. SYMON. -

Is there any decision in the United States or anywhere else to the effect that a dam for irrigation would be an obstruction?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am not aware that there is a precise decision, but I have no doubt that any abstraction of water from a river which reduced its navigability would be held to be an obstruction to navigation. You can obstruct navigation by taking water away. In fact, that is the most effectual means of doing it. It seems to me that some such provision as that which the Premier of New South Wales has introduced is necessary, unless we are going to say that we are willing to abandon the claims of irrigation.

Mr. REID. -

That is the one point.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is. If we are going to abandon the claims of irrigation, leave the matter as it stands. If we are not going to abandon the claims of irrigation—if we are going to give the people water to enable them to utilize the land in the most profitable way, perhaps in small settlements, as in parts of America—then we should insist on inserting some such provision as this. With the omission of the words "or citizen" the amendment will, I think, meet the whole case. It means that no state shall be prevented by any law of the Federal Parliament from taking any water it may require for its own use for conservation or irrigation. I regret that the amendment is not coupled with the other qualification which I desired to have added to it, but I intend to support it, because it acknowledges and enforces the right of irrigation. I am very sorry that the addition has not been made to it which, in my opinion, is necessary, to give complete and ample justice.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

It seems to me that the proposal now before us makes things worse than they have been at any time during the discussion. The amendment the Premier of New South Wales has been compelled to make proves the injustice of the whole proposal. He has been induced to strike out the words "or citizens." Clearly if we enter into this Federation on friendly terms the state becomes to the Federal Parliament what the citizen is to the state Parliament. If it is improper - and I agree that it is, that a citizen within a state should use some portion of a stream in such-a manner as to injure some others below him on that stream, it is equally wrong that a state should use some portion of a stream in such a manner as to injure some other state below it on that stream.

Mr. WISE. -

Each citizen is entitled absolutely to use all the water that falls on his own land.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

If the water that runs on to his land flows from other lands, and passes on from his lands to other lands again, all the parties along the stream have an equal right in regard to the use of it. Nobody at either end can act so as to prejudice the other. Suppose, for the sake of argument, that a stream has been running through a person's land, which is of no use to him; he considers it to be a nuisance, and he dams it back; he would be liable for causing damage to those people. The honorable member (Mr. Wise) says that his amendment is to leave things as they are. I respectfully submit to him that that is not the case. It is to state distinctly in this Constitution that each state has a natural right, enforceable by law in future, to legislate as it chooses with reference to the waters that run into other states. Now at present, although that right is claimed, it is very vigorously contested, and I am one of those who take the liberty to contest it. At present we have an appeal to the Imperial authorities, but if we get another Imperial Act with this declaration in it, that each of the states may legislate absolutely if they choose, without regard to the interests of other states, we shall have lost that appeal which we now possess to the Imperial authorities.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Validating an act which at present may be illegal.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
It seems to me, in view of the extraordinary length of this discussion, and the extraordinary legal intricacies developed in connexion with it, that it would be better to leave the Constitution in this respect a blank page than adopt such an amendment as is here suggested; that, badly off as under some circumstances some portions of the continent dependent upon the Murray undoubtedly are at present, it would be immensely worse if we adopted either the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Wise) or that moved by the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -

What is your view about irrigation?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I think irrigation is all-important. It is highly probable that it will be immensely more important than navigation. But if it is important to New South Wales, it also is to South Australia and Victoria. If, as I contend, there do exist water conditions in these three colonies in connexion with which each have an interest, and to a certain extent an equal interest, there must be created, either in regard to navigation or irrigation, some equitable central authority which can decide when conflict arises upon the justice of the case, according to all the conditions and facts before them. If we were independent states, as I ventured to point out the other day, we should have the right, in the event of wrong or injustice, to resort to arms. That is an extremely undesirable thing, which I hope will never happen, but when honorable members talk about legal rights between separate states, with all deference I say that they are talking absurdity. There can be no legal rights between separate states, because there is no international court, no tribunal, to which they can refer a claim with reference to those legal rights. All the rights that separate states possess is the right that is contained in their strong arm; if they are strong enough to maintain what is absolutely unjust they can do that. To illustrate my view, I will assume that instead of New South Wales being the stronger, as it undoubtedly is, it were the weaker state as compared with South Australia. I will assume that it proceeded to do something which was perfectly correct and just, but which South Australia objected to. If they were separate states, with no other power to intervene, South Australia could by force of arms demand that New South Wales should do what South Australia desired; but no one would call that a right except the right of conquest. It is very much in the nature of the right of conquest that a claim is made on behalf of New South Wales, that is, that it is in the stronger position. It has never had to fight for that position, but it is strong enough to fight if necessary, and therefore claims the right. But when New South Wales talks about legal rights or moral rights in that contention, I venture to say that it is talking absurdity. We are here as persons representing the various states, eager to arrive at a decision that shall be friendly to start with, that shall be just and equitable in all its incidence, having right to stand upon, and what we call our national rights at present. If it happens, in the use of some of the conditions by which we find ourselves surrounded, that one state works injury to another state, though we may be strong enough to do it, it is repugnant to every sense of right and justice to say we shall do it. Taking the illustration that I elicited from the honorable member (Mr. Wise) that there does lie inherent in the various states the right to dam up every billabong and tributary of the Murray to such an extent as to leave it a dry channel, I say, unhesitatingly, it does not exist; and that if it were exercised an appeal to the Imperial authorities would restrain the persons who acted in pursuance of such a claim. They would not permit the colony of New South Wales to reduce the Murray to a dry gully. If they would, what is the position of New South Wales in connexion with it? When New South Wales has more water than it wants, it will say to South Australia-"Find a passage for this water to the sea." When New South Wales wants all the water, it will say to South Australia, without considering its interests-"The river shall be left dry, it shall be of no use to you; there shall be no water for you." Is that a just or equitable attitude to assume?

Mr. REID. -

Is it not a clumsy cure for that to put irrigation at the mercy of navigation?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I agree with the honorable member, and I never sought to do that. I never sought to put one at the mercy of the other. As I have said, we are about to create a Constitution, under which we hope a nation shall be built, which will go on developing, and the necessities of which may become such that we can form no conception of them. If we wish that to be so we should create under the Constitution a power to establish a tribunal which shall deal equitably with the conditions which shall arise. We should not be guided by anything we see now as to how disputes shall be settled, but we should be guided by the exigencies of the various colonies at the time when the settlement is called for. That is all I have ever contended for. That is what, I think, ought to be done. The whole question with regard to the control of the rivers in which two or more colonies are interested-from the fact that they flow from one to the other, and all the questions in connexion therewith, either as to irrigation or navigation, without saying which shall be paramount-should be placed under federal control; so that in the future, if conditions have altogether changed, if conflict of interests should arise, and it should be alleged that one colony is acting in a manner prejudicial to the other and unfairly, the federal tribunal, Constitute upon a fair and right basis, and having a number of impartial persons upon it, should be able to say with authority what is the right and equity of the case, and what should be done.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I only wish to interpose for one moment between the division and the speech of my honorable friend. And I wish again to thank my honorable friend (Mr. Trenwith) for his very vigorous and very lucid exposition of principles which appear to me to be impossible to be controverted. But I do not wish to enter into these large questions at this particular moment. The whole of the discussions good deal of which I have been exceedingly sorry to listen to-has proceeded under an entire misapprehension of the position of things under this Constitution. Honorable members seem to think that there is something hid somewhere within the four corners of this instrument as it now stands which declares that navigation is to be deemed superior or paramount to irrigation. There is not one single word from beginning to end of this Bill, as we now hold it in our hands, which can possibly be construed to have that effect. Now, that is what I wish to impress on honorable members-not one single syllable, from beginning to end of this Bill, which can be construed to have the effect of making irrigation subservient to navigation. If we had succeeded in introducing into this measure some of the amendments which have been proposed, in which we declared that the maintenance and improvement of navigation was to be a concern of the Federal Parliament, then it would have been a fair contention. We could accompany that with some words which would amount to a declaration that, at least, irrigation should be placed upon an equal footing, or even, if the view of my honorable friends and my own view were to prevail, that it should be placed on a paramount footing. But we have been defeated in our efforts in that direction. Nothing of the sort has been inserted. My honorable friend (Mr. Reid) is using what is really a form of words that may impose upon, shall I say the credulity of some honorable members, in saying that this measure, but for his amendment, will throw upon the federal authority the maintenance of navigability. That position I entirely deny. I wish, it did so, but it does not do anything of the kind. The essence of this Constitution is that the trade and commerce between these states shall be free-that trade and commerce shall be entirely under the control and regulation of the federal authority. If that is not so, then the sooner we disband this Convention the better. It is the foundation of the Federation which we are going to establish, and the amendment of Mr. Reid-equally, I am sorry to say, the amendment of Mr. Wise-is to derogate from that great principle, to cut it down, and to say that the Federal Parliament shall not have the control of trade and commerce if the question of irrigation comes into play. That is the position. That is what this amendment means. There can be no doubt about it. It is either tying the hands of the Federal Parliament in this connexion, or, it is tying the hands of the Judiciary, which has got to determine the question. I do beseech honorable members to look at the clauses of this Bill that we are now considering, and if they do so they will see that the view which I am submitting is the correct one-that the governing words of sub-section (1), under which the Federal Judiciary is, in the last resort, to have the power of dealing out justice between the various states, are "the maintenance of trade and commerce." A few minutes ago Mr. Isaacs cited a case following on the lines of the case cited the other day, with the principles of which I entirely agree, but there never has been a case decided, and I do not believe that any case will be decided, in which a court having jurisdiction in such matters will declare a dam or a river or anything of that kind an obstruction trader such conditions as exist in Australia without taking into consideration the claims of irrigation as part of the national interests.

Mr. ISAACS. - Does the honorable member mean a dam in the river itself?

Mr. SYMON. - What I mean, is such a dam or weir as I can only conceive possible, away up, as Mr. Trenwith said, on one of the far-off billabongs, tributaries, or rivulets that may run into the river.

Mr. PEACOCK. - Do you think that the people of Australia will consent to allow this matter to rest on the decisions of courts of the United States?

Mr. SYMON. - No; my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) wishes the decision of this Convention to rest on them.

Mr. ISAACS. - No, I want to make things clear; I want to make it perfectly clear that irrigation shall be the first consideration.

There is not a decision in the United States or anywhere else in this universe which can be used as an argument to show that the claims of irrigation will be subordinated in the consideration of the tribunal which has got to decide the matter. Why, all these things are new. We all admit that we are living in a country the conditions of which are not to be paralleled anywhere else. And does any honorable member tell me—I will take an extreme case that if a diversion were made of the lower course of, I will not say the Darling because that is very debatable but of the River Murray between where it first forms the boundary of New South Wales and Victoria, and where it enters South Australia—does any honorable member tell me that if there was a connexion made to divert the whole of the waters of that stream, it would not be a matter for the Federal Parliament to deal with and to stop—that it would not be a just thing to stop? My honorable friends on either side will not say for a moment that that is a matter that ought not to be prevented. It is only when you come to take the opposite case of the billabongs, tributaries, and rivulets in far distant parts of New South Wales that opposition to doing so can be raised, even theoretically. If a canal were cut to take away all the water of the river, no one will deny that there should be some power—the power of the Federal Judiciary, if you like-to interfere with and put a stop to it. You can put any case of a state, you can build up an argument by those oft-reiterated declarations of Mr. Reid—"You want to take away from us something we have got"—declarations which we are sick and tired of hearing; but that is not the kind of argument to address to us. What we have to see is whether there is anything in this Constitution on which the alarms of my honorable friend the Premier of New South Wales can possibly rest. We say that there is nothing in this Bill for them to rest on. Therefore, the insertion of this amendment would be—I won't say a gratuitous insult to, but a gratuitous interference with, the rights of South Australia. It is unnecessary. You have beaten us. We have been defeated in our endeavour to put in a paramount way this question of the navigability of the rivers. You have beaten us all along the line, but now you want to humiliate us.

Mr. Reid. -

It is too bad for you to say such a thing.

Mr. Symon. -

It is not too bad for me to make such a statement. My honorable friend has made declarations and appeals here which were much more too bad. If you can justify this amendment, if you can say there is something in this Constitution which creates a paramount claim on

Mr. Wise. -

If you will show me that it is perfectly clear that the Bill does not do so, I will consent to leave out the amendment.

Mr. Howe. -

We had better adjourn and let you lawyers fight it out.

Mr. Symon. -
It is a matter for everybody's consideration. It is not at all a lawyer's question.

Mr. REID. -

If it were a lawyer's question, you would say-'I am not without doubt that this opinion may be over-ruled.'

Mr. SYMON. -

I am sure my honorable friend will acquit me of having suggested at any time that he is influenced by the tricks of politics, and it is not unnatural for him to declare that he is here as the special guardian of the rights of New South Wales. We also are here as special guardians of the rights of South Australia, and I tell my honorable friend, as emphatically as he has told us, that I do not think we could go back to South Australia, if this amendment is put in, and vindicate our position in reference to these waters. In saying that I make no threats. I never have made any threats. My desire is to help to advance the cause of federation, but I venture to tell honorable members that the position will be a most difficult one for us if this amendment is carried, and I sincerely hope that it will be rejected.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

There can be no division, I understand, this afternoon, because a number of honorable members have gone away understanding that there shall be no division; and it has been represented to me that there are reasons why the Convention should adjourn at four o'clock.

Mr. HOWE. -

Sine die?

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think so. I think we shall get through our difficulties without very many scars being inflicted upon any one. I now beg to move, sir, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

The Convention adjourned at four o'clock, until Monday, 7th February.

Paper on Control of Rivers-Leave of Absence-Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

CONTROL OF RIVERS.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

A question arose the other day about some notes by Mr. Inglis Clark, of Tasmania, upon the proposal to provide in the Constitution for the regulation and the use of the waters of the River Murray and its tributaries. A copy of the paper has, I find, been sent to one or two other gentlemen besides myself, and there is a general desire expressed by honorable members that they should have an opportunity of reading it. I take it that there would be no objection to my laying it on the table, and moving, as I now do, that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria) moved -

That the standing orders be suspended to enable a motion to be submitted granting further leave of absence to Mr. Brunker.

The motion was agreed to.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria) moved -

That leave of absence for a further period of seven days be granted to Mr. Brunker, on account of illness.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from Friday, 4th February) was resumed on clause 52 (Powers of the Parliament), and on Mr. Reid's amendment for the addition of the following words:-

But no state or citizen shall be prevented from using any of such water for purposes of irrigation or water conservation.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I have thought this matter over during the interval, and I propose to amend the amendment. I do not intend to formally move the amendment now, because some other honorable member may have some suggestion to make as to the form it should take. I will simply now intimate that I propose to omit the words "or citizen," with a view to inserting, after the word "using," the words "or authorizing the use." The amendment will then read:

But no state shall be prevented from using or authorizing the use of any such water for purposes of irrigation or water conservation.

The effect of this would be that the matter would be placed under state authority, and that the state would be directly responsible for any action of this kind.

I should have no objection to add to the sub-section the following words:

Subject to any right to the use of any portion of such water for the same purposes by any other state.

This would make it perfectly clear that we do not wish to take anything beyond that which we actually possess.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Since Mr. Reid proposed his first amendment I have given anxious consideration to this question. I think that no honorable member here is likely to accuse me of paltering with any subject that we have to deal with, or of doing anything which is inconsistent with any pronounced declaration I have made. I do not intend to be guilty of any such conduct on this occasion. I find that a difficulty has arisen, and arisen largely by my own fault, because it was partly my fault that the amendment of Mr. Glynn was accepted, out of which seems to have sprung the two propositions by Mr. Reid and Mr. Wise, which are now practically before the Convention. I take it that if the declaratory amendment proposed by Mr. Glynn had not been passed, there might have been no necessity for either of the two propositions which are really now appended to it, more by way of limitation than anything else. I have expressed myself very strongly upon the question of placing reliance on sub-section (1), relating to the regulation of trade and commerce, and I intend to quote some short passages in order that I may make my attitude very clear. I find that on the 2nd of February I said this:

Every member of the Convention to whom I have spoken knows very well the stand which I have taken in favour of the striking out of this sub-section, and the maintenance of sub-section (1) in its integrity. That is what I have always affirmed, and what I have spoken in support of since the beginning of this Convention. The stand which I have taken is no new stand. Many honorable members are aware that at the conference which took place on the day of the public holiday, a little while ago, I expressed my opinion upon the subject plainly.
I think it only fair that I should read these passages shortly, because I intend that there shall be no escape by myself from the position in which I stand with regard to the sub-section relating to trade and commerce. I also said-

My position has been from the first, and I think, notwithstanding anything that has passed, honorable members will say that I have maintained it with-perfect honesty, that the sub-section relating to trade and commerce is the most federal provision that we can adopt, and that we should strike out all other sub-sections which may seem to restrict or limit it. That is the true federal position. An important suggestion has now been made, and perhaps Mr. Glynn's amendment might be improved if some such words as these were added, "so as not to restrict the powers conferred by subsection (1)."

That is not the amendment that was carried on Friday.

But, in any case, I hold that there should be no sub-section beyond sub-section (1), and that that would best conserve the interests of all of us. Still, I think, although this matter has been very fully debated, that there might be an adjournment, as we might find from the multitude of propositions that have been submitted that some arrangement could be come to that would satisfy the Convention generally. For myself, I am not very hopeful of that. I am more hopeful that the decision come to will be that sub-section (1) is sufficient for all of us.

I need not multiply quotations of that kind. I mention this in order to show that I did maintain a definite position, which I think I ought not to depart from. I wish to put also on the other side of the question the fact that, in taking up that position, I have spoken strongly against any surrender by any province, at any rate by New South Wales, of its right to deal with water conservation and irrigation by the application and use of the waters within its own territory. In saying that I must lay it down plainly that it must be taken in connexion with what I have said with regard to the right of navigation under the sub-section relating to trade and commerce. I have contended that the right of navigation is one which we cannot deny the Federation, and that we must grant it, so far as the sub-section relating to trade and commerce does grant it. I pointed out that it is not necessary to make any express mention of the rights of irrigation and water conservation in this Bill, because those rights are conserved by clause 99, under the powers reserved by the state. The provincial right of dealing with water conservation and irrigation is therefore retained to the full extent compatible with the allowance to the Commonwealth of the right of preserving navigation. I have maintained also that that power should be unrestricted, that is to say, that no river which forms a highway of the Commonwealth should be excepted from its operation. I need not refer honorable members to authorities upon the subject of the extent of the power of navigation legislation over the rivers of the Commonwealth; but, inasmuch as Mr. Higgins the other day expressed a doubt as to whether these powers were as extensive as I stated them to be, I should like to refer him to one or two cases mentioned in Baker's Annotated Constitution of the United States, which carry the proposition to the full length. One of these is the case of Escanaba, Transportation Company v. Chicago, which is mentioned on page 22 of this book, paragraph No. 28. The others are in paragraphs 29 and 30.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Would the quotations be too long to read?

Mr. BARTON. -
Perhaps I had better read them. The first is as follows, and is with regard to the case Escanaba Transportation Company v. Chicago, 107 United States, 678:-

The Chicago River and its branches, notwithstanding the fact of its being wholly within the state of Illinois, must be deemed navigable waters of the United States, over which Congress, under this clause, may exercise control to the extent necessary to preserve and improve the free navigation thereof. But, in the absence of congressional legislation, the courts will not interfere with reasonable state regulations over that river within the limits of the city of Chicago.

The next to that is the case of Miller v. The Mayor of New York:--

Navigation being a branch of commerce, Congress has the control of all navigable rivers between the states, or connecting with the ocean, so as to preserve and protect free navigation. As a corollary of this, Congress has the paramount right to conclusively determine what shall be deemed, so far as commerce is concerned, an obstruction thereto.

The other case I mentioned is similar in statement to that case:-

A bridge constructed in accordance with the legislation of both the state and Federal Governments must be deemed a lawful structure; and it cannot therefore be treated as a public nuisance nor be subject to complaint before the courts. By "navigable waters of the United States" are meant such as are navigable in fact, and which by themselves or their connexions with other waters form a continuous channel for commerce with other nations or among the states.

That, I take it, includes every navigable river of the United States, and would include every navigable river of the Commonwealth. I need not read any more decisions-others go to the same length. I merely wanted to justify my position that in granting the power of legislation by way of regulation of trade and commerce, we are granting power, if we make no restriction on it, to regulate with regard to free navigation in the carrying out of free-trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth with respect to all rivers, although they may be wholly within a state or communicate with other states by way of the ocean, which is the channel of communication, so that the navigation is continuous between one state and the other—

Mr. ISAACS. -
Would the learned member mind my stating what our difficulty is?
Mr. BARTON. -
No.
Mr. ISAACS. -
Apart from the doubt which some of us possess as to whether the same rule would be followed here as in the United States, our difficulty is this: Suppose the Federal Parliament legislates for navigation in such a way that it requires a large body of the water, and suppose the state legislates as to irrigation whereby it requires a portion of the same water—which would prevail?
Mr. BARTON. -
As my honorable friend (Mr. Wise) mentions, if Mr. Clark is right in the memorandum he has sent over, in which he cites authorities, that is a difficulty which could be settled if it arose between the Commonwealth and the
Mr. ISAACS. -
Mr. Clark's reference, whether it is right or whether it is wrong, does not touch the point. It does not say whether the Federal Parliament will override the state Legislature.
Mr. BARTON. -
The Federal Parliament, I take it, would be entitled to exercise the right of legislation on the subject of free navigation to such an extent as to make that navigation equal to that which it is authorized to do, that is to say, to keep open free-trade and intercourse between parts of the Commonwealth for commerce. That being so, it could deal with anything done under a law of the state which was an obstruction to the navigation, when once the Commonwealth had legislated on the subject to that extent.
Mr. ISAACS. -
And therefore it could over-ride it.
Mr. BARTON. -
And therefore, to that extent, it could over-ride the state legislation.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is our difficulty.

Mr. BARTON. -
That, I take it, is the law, and my position all along has been that inasmuch as this power of navigation is a federal power, that inasmuch as we are not making inter-colonial free-trade a reality, but are leaving this power to be so exclusive as will enable the Commonwealth to make inter-colonial free-trade perfectly effectual feeling that we are not acting in a truly federal character unless we do that, I have been prepared to go as far as that. I have not come here to-day to say that I depart from that position. Now, there is this also to be remembered by those who have any very great, hesitation about the extent of this power which is to be granted to the Commonwealth. It is simply a power of legislation, and it is a power of concurrent legislation; in other words, it is plain that the state can, not only carry on these works of water conservation and irrigation-the power to do it is actually reserved to it by clause 99-but it can legislate for and regulate the navigation of any water within that state up to the point at which the legislation of the Commonwealth comes in, if it ever does legislate. It is purely optional to the Commonwealth whether it will exercise the power or not; and if the Federal Parliament, in which all the states will be represented, finds it to the interest of the Commonwealth that they should not legislate, or, to put it more plainly, finds it to the interest of the Commonwealth that the conservation and use of water should continue to go to the extent to which they, have gone, and should be allowed even to progress if they find that by doing that they are best exercising their duty, and that the navigation of the river is then sufficiently provided for, it is perfectly, open to Parliament to decline to legislate upon the subject, or to legislate only to that extent which it thinks is absolutely and imperatively necessary. And this is where I think, at any rate out-of-doors, some confusion arises. It seems often to be imagined that by placing in clause 52 of the Constitution a power, the Constitution itself will have legislated on the subject. The Constitution, of course, does nothing of that kind; it simply confers a power for use. That is a matter well known to most of us if not to all of us, but it does not seem always to be correctly appreciated out-of-doors.

Mr. REID. -
All powers intended for use.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, but the policy, of the Commonwealth is for the people of the Commonwealth as represented in their Legislature to determine. Whether it is a politic thing at a particular time to exercise any of these powers is a question not for us but for the Commonwealth itself to determine. I take this to be the position: So far as this free option of the Commonwealth goes, so far as it is unfettered, it is held even in America to have power in certain circumstances to over-ride the High Court; for that is practically what it amounts to. In the case of Pennsylvania against Wheeling Bridge Co., which I know is familiar to my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs)-

The Supreme Court of the United States, by decree thereof, declared a bridge crossing the River Ohio an obstruction to navigation and directed its removal. Afterwards Congress, by an Act, declared the bridge to be a lawful structure, "anything in the laws of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding."

So that you have first a decree of the Supreme Court, which would be equivalent to a decree of the High Court here, and next an Act of Congress declaring this bridge to be lawful. It was apparently a state structure which the Supreme Court declared to be a hindrance to navigation, and Congress itself, acting for the people, declared the bridge to be a lawful structure.

Mr. SOLOMON. - Did they over-ride the decision of the High Court?

Mr. BARTON. - They declared the bridge to be a lawful structure, anything in the laws of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SOLOMON. - Was the decision over-ridden?

Mr. BARTON. - It went again before the Supreme Court, and that court held-

That while Congress cannot annul a judgment of court upon private rights of parties, it can so annul a judgment founded on the unlawful interference with the enjoyment of a public right, which is subject to congressional regulation. In this case it is an exercise of the power to regulate commerce.

That is to say, such a right as the right of navigation. In this case it is an exercise of the power to regulate commerce. I think that is a case of some importance, because it shows how much or how little, according to its own good judgment and policy, the Parliament of the Commonwealth may do in respect to the exercise of a power of this kind. It shows that it may do as little as it likes. It shows also that Parliament may declare what would otherwise be an obstruction to the navigation, and would, therefore, be an illegal structure-it shows that the Parliament of the Commonwealth, notwithstanding that they have power to regulate trade and commerce, and, therefore, navigation is placed in its hands, can declare that to be lawful and save it from destruction.

Mr. SYMON. -

That shows that they will take into consideration as against navigation other matters of public importance.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is just what I was going to say. It shows that the Parliament of the Commonwealth can do here as the Congress has done in America—that it can consider the position of affairs, and if it finds it not politic to act in the exercise of a power of this kind at any time, or if, on the other hand, it finds that things have been done under a state law which it would be impolitic or wrong to remove or destroy, it is open to the Parliament of the Commonwealth not only to legislate on the subject, but actively to legislate for the protection of that state structure, which many people think would be doomed to destruction under this power of the regulation of trade and commerce. I mention this case because it seems to me to throw a very strong light on the position. It prevents any one of us from regarding this particular right to preserve navigation as the bugbear which it has been held up to be. There is nothing to be afraid of in it, simply because it will be exercised or not at the will of the Parliament, which will contain, as this Convention contains, representatives of every State.

Mr. WISE. -

And, as Mr. Clark's memorandum shows, if any state was injured by the legislation of another state, it could sue in the Supreme Court for redress.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is quite so. Any state which has a legal right to maintain the navigation can complain and implead the Commonwealth, if necessary, for the purpose of maintaining that right.

Mr. WISE. -

And the other state, too.

Mr. BARTON. -

If it arises between two states or between a state and the Commonwealth the position is exactly the same. That being as far as we can judge the legal position in this matter, what is there to be afraid of in merely maintaining the trade and commerce sub-section? What I suggest to this committee is that we may have made a mistake in hastily acceding to Mr. Glynn's proposition—that the whole of this difficulty may be settled if some guarantee is given that upon reconsideration or recommittal Mr. Glynn's amendment will be struck out.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
What difference would that make supposing that your law is correct?

Mr. BARTON. -
I will tell my right honorable friend in a moment. I would suggest that, upon that understanding with Mr. Glynn, it would be quite just and a fair settlement of the difficulty if Mr. Reid and Mr. Wise did not proceed with their amendments.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
What about Dr. Quick's notice to move for the recommittal of the Bill to re-insert sub-section (31) as it was before with a slight alteration?

Mr. BARTON. -
That, of course, conflicts with the position I have held from the beginning. I am against all these sub-sections, any one of which might be restrictive. I am in favour of the right to regulate trade and commerce without it being restricted, because I am not afraid of the Parliament which will exercise that right, and because I am confident that, in doing so, it will have due regard to those interests of water conservation and irrigation which exist, and which may then be actually more important than they are now. Now, let us look at the amendment of Mr. Glynn. It reads as follows:-

For the purposes of sub-section (1), waters shall be deemed navigable for trade and commerce which either by themselves or in connexion with other waters are navigable permanently or intermittently for trade and commerce with other nations or among the several states.

Now, it may be that that is nothing more than a definition of what the Federal High Court might determine when asked the question as to whether a river is navigable. What I suggest to the committee is that matters of that kind should be left, as they have been left elsewhere, to the determination of the High Court—that, having appointed the High Court as an arbiter, we should leave it free and open to that body to decide upon the evidence before it whether a river is or is not navigable. If we do that we shall be acting in the spirit with which we have treated the constitution of the High Court from the beginning; if we do that we are not running any danger or any risk whatever, but we shall have created a federal power to regulate trade and commerce. We shall have created a federal authority to interpret that power, and that will be a power which can deal with rivers that are navigable in fact, and that question is a fitting one for the determination of the High Court. But if my honorable friend's amendment is retained, it will to a considerable extent alter the situation. I must confess that if his amendment were allowed to remain where it is all of us would have to consider our position, and one would have to consider whether a proposition such as that of Mr. Reid or that of Mr. Wise would not have to be assented to, because the definition put in here by Mr. Glynn's amendment alters the position, as it takes the matter practically out of the hands of the High Court and substitutes for that power a declaration in the Constitution. That is to say, it is practically a direction to the High Court, instead of the High Court being left to be the arbiter.

Mr. HOLDER. - It does not go any further in the declaration of the policy.

Mr. BARTON. - It may not; I am not quarrelling with this amendment on that ground at all; but I say that we who held, and hold still, that matters should be left to the operation of sub-section (1) and that powerful clause 99, which protects and preserves the rights of the several states, find that position somewhat altered by this amendment, because the arbiter which was to decide the question of the regulation of trade and commerce, being the High Court, is directed by this declaration of the honorable member's (Mr. Glynn) in a way in which we, who spoke upon that subject, did not contemplate at the time. As I said before, I take some blame to myself for this, because if I had reflected upon the effect of the amendment I would have voted against it. The declaration that the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) has put in.

Mr. SOLOMON. - Limitation or nullification.

Mr. BARTON. - That is a question of construction, and I was just about to apply myself to that. The whole effect of the sub-section proposed by the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) is to declare what is to be navigable water for trade and commerce, in order that under sub-section (1) the Parliament may legislate with regard to that water if it is navigable. Very well, this is a proviso upon it, and a statement that no state shall be prevented from using, or authorizing the use of, any such water for irrigation and water conservation. With the addendum that is proposed, that may not be so formidable as some honorable members suppose. For this reason: That if you read it as a proviso to the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn), the question arises whether the use there spoken of must not be the reasonable use. The amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Wise) says-"Nothing in the Constitution shall affect the exclusive right of each state to legislate upon subjects of water conservation and irrigation within its own territory." I take that amendment not to go a jot farther than clause 99. I do not think it has any more effect than that if it is deemed necessary in the interests of one colony, and if another colony thinking its interests will not be damaged by it chooses to assent to an amendment of that kind, it may possibly be that such an amendment should be put in the Constitution. I do not think it would improve the drafting of the Constitution or the sense of it; but the citizen-who is often called the man in the street-might be able to understand the matter better.

Mr. ISAACS. - Exclusive would not affect the question as to which should prevail.

Mr. BARTON. - Not a bit. It is simply exclusive qua the state, and clause 99 preserves every exclusive power that every state has, and every concurrent power that every state has, except to the extent that a power may either be given expressly by the Constitution or under some power given by the Constitution to the Commonwealth, there might be some effect in limiting the state law. Nothing can go further than that; so I take it that the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Wise), like that of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn), is declaratory, and I am not quite sure if the amendment of the Right Hon. Mr. Reid is not also declaratory. What is objected to by my South Australian friends is this. They say-"You defeated us on sub-section (1); you have been against putting in any of the sub-sections which we have put forward, and which others have put forward, in a very friendly spirit; you wish now by these amendments to put something in the Constitution which, after we have been defeated, will have the effect of humiliating us." I do not know how far that may go in South Australia, because I really, believe the common sense of the people in that province would not take them to that extent, and induce them to think their representatives have been humiliated. I must say, for them that no representatives of any state could have made a more pertinacious or courageous stand than they have, but the whole question seems to boil itself down to this. There is not much more of importance in any of these amendments than there is in the trade and commerce clause. Are we to put them in with the risk, as we are told by our friends from South Australia, of offending their people and of causing a prejudice against this Constitution, or are we to refrain from these amendments? I should like to be understood by the Convention, that if I take this stand, that I adhere to the trade and commerce clause without any sub-sections, it is on the understanding that my honorable friends; from South Australia shall consent to the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn),in which case I shall not vote for the amendments of the Right Hon. Mr. Reid and the honorable member (Mr. Wise). But what I say must be taken with full faith and understanding, because I do not want to have any discussion afterwards as to the meaning of it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
That is to be the final settlement?

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes. I hope this proposal of mine will be accepted.

Mr. GLYNN. -
There must be two parties to a settlement.

Yes; that is why I think this proposal of mine should be considered. I only want to say a few words more. It must be recollected by the Convention that there is a public in New South Wales to consider as well as a public in South Australia. We must have regard to the public feeling in each of our states in what we do. I believe that if you leave this trade and commerce section unimpeded, the people of New South Wales will see that their rights as to water conservation and irrigation are preserved, except to the extent that anything may be declared under Commonwealth legislation an obstruction to navigation. They will see that the power of navigation is federal, and they will consent, knowing that the whole Commonwealth is treated alike, and that the rivers of New South Wales are not singled out for exceptional treatment. I believe that will be a great factor in obtaining the consent of the people of New South Wales. I think I can appeal to the honorable member (Sir Joseph Abbott), who is intimately acquainted with the district, to say that the people of that district, who are supposed to be so very much concerned, will not have any objection to the power of legislation with regard to, navigation being exercised for the benefit of the settlers in that district to any extent to which it is likely to be exercised. Let us not magnify this difficulty. It is a difficulty with regard to public-opinion, but it is a, difficulty that events will diminish. I pointed out the other day—and I am only mentioning it now for the purpose of fortifying the position I take up—that this resort to legislation for the purpose of opening and keeping open navigation is a power that not only will be sparingly exercised in view of the rights of the various states, but it is a power that will become unnecessary to exercise as years go by, and as traction by land, with the conveyance always open-traction which is so very different from the intermittent condition of some of these rivers—as traction by land assumes the importance which it will under the Commonwealth, when it becomes as cheap as we know it is becoming daily. Because we know this, that the navigation of these rivers will be largely superseded by railways, which, even following the general run of the rivers themselves, will in various directions cut down the distance by two-thirds. We may be sure that the Parliament of the Commonwealth will be quite as much alive as we are to the fact that, as navigation becomes superseded, the likelihood of the use of these rivers will be more in the direction of water conservation and irrigation. Then we have nothing to fear from the Federal Parliament having power to develop trade and commerce, and from the development of events in future, because that power of regulating navigation and trade and commerce will become less necessary, and those who are so anxious about irrigation will find that their fears of its being hampered, or that the right of irrigation will be impaired as time goes on, were perfectly groundless. That is the remark with which I wish to conclude. I do hope, without wasting further words or attempting to make an oratorical speech, my friends from South Australia will see the justice of the position I have endeavoured to define, and that they will consent to leave the matter as I propose, so that the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) and the qualifications of it proposed by the Right Hon. Mr. Reid and the honorable member (Mr. Wise) may alike disappear, and that the federal power may be left in possession of the instrument to preserve navigation, which we know they will not exercise to an improper or dangerous extent to the states, while the states will have in this very Constitution their right to irrigation preserved by the operation of one of the strongest clauses in it.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I should like to say, in answer to the appeal of the honorable member (Mr. Barton), that I entirely concur in the views expressed by him. Having had an opportunity since the adjournment of looking into this matter more carefully than before, I am satisfied that the fears expressed, and which I gave expression to on Friday, as to the position in which New South Wales might be placed by trusting entirely to the power to regulate trade and commerce conferred by sub-section (1) were groundless. It seems to me that the fears expressed by the representatives of South Australia were equally groundless. Therefore, if the representatives of South Australia will take the course suggested by the honorable member. (Mr. Barton), and if the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) will withdraw his amendment, or consent to have his amendment negatived on the recommittal of the clause, I will be most happy to withdraw my amendment, and trust to the clause as it stands. I should like to call the attention of the committee to a passage from a paper by Mr. A.I. Clark, now laid on the table, but not yet printed. My excuse for reading it is that it cannot be printed in time to influence the division on this matter. He points out that the mere fact of constituting this Commonwealth brings all the several states into union as constituent parts of one nation. Therefore, any act upon the part of any Legislature, which, if the states were separate, would be ground for national complaint, or would be likely, if they were hostile, to lead to war-if the states were independent nations-will be a violation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth, and will, therefore, be a matter for redress by the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth. The whole fear that has been expressed on both sides is that one state by internal legislation might injure the citizens of another.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - Would not that redress be by means of some existing legal right?

Mr. WISE. - I apprehend that no state can even pass an Act of Parliament without a legal right to do so. Any Act of Parliament passed will be an assertion of a legal right, and the only question remaining is whether if a state, in the present condition of isolation of the states, should pass an Act of Parliament which injures the citizens of a neighbouring state, that Act would be allowed to have force. I will read what Mr. Clark says to put the matter beyond a doubt:

Whenever several independent states enter into a federal union such as that which is constituted by the United States of America, and which is contemplated by the Draft Bill to constitute the Commonwealth of Australia, the federated states give up their respective rights to vindicate their claims and complaints against one another by war or other act of retaliation and aggression, and a federal system of judicial tribunals is established to adjudicate their controversies; and in every case in which a previously independent state enters into a permanent federal union with previously separate states-

Dr. COCKBURN. - We are not "previously separate states."

Mr. WISE. - Not separate? I wish we were not.

Dr. COCKBURN. - No; we are all parts of one empire.

Mr. REID. - I wish I could think so when we send goods over your border. We find that we are two bodies then.

Mr. WISE. - Mr. Clark's paper proceeds:

under a Constitution which establishes a Judiciary with power to adjudicate controversies between the several states, it thereby submits the validity of an its conduct which affects the rights of citizens of the other states in the Federation to the decision of the Federal Judiciary, which is required to adjudicate by the known and settled principles of international law or municipal jurisprudence, as the particular case may demand. (See 6 Wheaton, page 380.)

Now, it will be observed that in that position there is no statement that all that is meant is an actual legal right. The question is whether that which is done affects the neighbouring states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Do you admit that the Federal Court will allow South Australia to have a share of this water?

Mr. WISE. -

I say this: That if South Australia drained all our water, whether by opening the bar of the Murray or by establishing big irrigation works, to the injury of the settlers in our territory, New South Wales or any settler within our territory could obtain an injunction from the Supreme Court to restrain her from doing so; and vice versa.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Is that something new conferred by the Constitution?

Mr. REID. -

You are always after some thing new.

Mr. WISE. -

No; it is not. Mr. Clark proceeds-

The Draft Bill to constitute the Commonwealth of Australia expressly provides that the judicial power of the Commonwealth shall extend "to all matters between states,"

It is not a matter of rights; I do not understand the meaning of rights at present.

and it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States of America that, under the provisions of the Constitution of that country, which extends the power of the Federal Judiciary to "controversies between two or more states"-

I will pause for a moment on that word "controversies." Controversies arise because two persons assert conflicting rights.

Mr. ISAACS. -

How is it to be determined? Who is to judge of it as a right?

Mr. WISE. -

one state may file a bill in equity against another state to determine the question of a disputed boundary. (Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Peters 657.) And if the Federal Judiciary of the Commonwealth of Australia will have the like power to determine a question of a disputed boundary between two states it must, as a logical sequence, have jurisdiction of the question whether any portion of the territory within the boundary of one state is to be deprived of all that makes that territory valuable by the aggressive legislation of another state. The riparian rights of the owners of land abutting on the River Murray, in the colony of South Australia, are rights of property in South Australia, and if those rights shall be infringed by any private person or any public body professing to act under colour of the authority of an Act of the Legislature of New South Wales, when both colonies are constituent parts of the Commonwealth of Australia, the citizens of South Australia whose riparian right has been violated will have a remedy in the federal courts of the Commonwealth, other for damages or for a writ of injunction to restrain the continuance of the injury, or for both. As a direct authority upon this point, I may refer to the case of the Holyoke Water Power Company v. Connecticut River Company, which was decided in the United States in the year 1884. (22 Blatchford, 131.) In that case the Legislature of Connecticut had authorized the Connecticut River Company to raise their existing dam across the river in Connecticut to improve the navigation, and also maintain the water Power of the Connecticut River Company's dam, which was about 16 miles below the dam and factories belonging to the Holyoke Water Power Company in Massachusetts, and the Connecticut River Company proposed to raise its dam in Connecticut so high that it would cause a diminution in the fall of the river above the dam for six or seven months in the year, to the detriment of the Holyoke Company, and the Holyoke Company filed a bill in equity in the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Connecticut, praying for an injunction restraining the Connecticut River Company from raising their dam to the proposed height. The court granted the injunction, and the concluding portion of the judgment of Shipman, J., runs as follows:-"The owner of land abutting upon a navigable river owns it subject to the right of the states to improve the navigation of the river, because the land is within the governmental control of the states; but, it seems to me that the state obtains by virtue of its governmental powers no right to control over or right to injure land without its jurisdiction.
Jurisdiction confers the power and right to inflict consequential injury, but where no jurisdiction exists the right ceases to exist. It is a recognised principle that the statutes of one state in regard to real estate cannot act extraterritorially. As Connecticut has no direct jurisdiction or control over real estate situate in another state, it cannot indirectly, by virtue of its attempted improvement of its own navigable waters, control or subject to injury foreign real estate. If this resolution is a bar to an action for any consequential injury to land or to rights connected with land in Massachusetts, Connecticut is acting extra-territorially. Let there be a decree enjoining the defendant against any further raising of its present dams to a greater height than the height occupied by the respective portions of the present structure.

Other authorities are given. If I may refer for a moment to the interjection of Sir George Turner that it all proceeds on a question of legal right, I reply that I fail to appreciate at present the force of that observation. What took place is this. One state—say Connecticut—in order to improve the navigation for a certain period of its own rivers, granted, by Acts of its own Legislature, authority to raise a dam. That affected the power to irrigate in a lower state, and then the lower state, by virtue of powers which we have conferred in precisely the same terms upon the Federal judicature to deal with matters between states, brought an action, the result of which was the decision that Connecticut could not exercise jurisdiction over its own waters to the injury of the territory of a neighbouring state, the states having come together in a Federation.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Did Connecticut destroy navigation?

Mr. WISE. -
They simply made the water lower for manufacturing purposes; the navigation of the river was not affected. I see what is passing in my honorable friend's mind. He is thinking of the trade and commerce subsection. The action of Connecticut did not destroy navigation; it only rendered the waterless useful for the purposes of certain mills lower down.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Manufacturing is not within the trade and commerce clause.

Mr. WISE. -
The judgment cited is not based upon that ground but upon another ground altogether—that one state cannot, after its entry into federation with other states, exercise any jurisdiction to injure the territory of neighbouring states within their own rights. That is to say, that whereas the states before the federation had power to legislate with regard to their own water, as we have to-day or South Australia has, and any grievance that arose from the exercise of that power could only be redressed by diplomatic means or by war, yet once the states come together in a federal union, any injury inflicted on neighbouring states by legislation is subject to inquiry and redeem at the hands of the Supreme Court.

Mr. LYNE. -
Do you not think that that is a reason for having something definite in the Constitution, so far as New South Wales is concerned?

Mr. WISE. -

I do not. I am prepared to trust the Federal Court to the same extent to which we expect that the other states will trust the Federal Court.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Then under that South Australia will be able to complain to the Federal Court if New South Wales so uses the water as to injure navigation in South Australia!

Mr. WISE. -

Yes, and we shall be able to complain if South Australia use the water of the Murray in a similar manner. The matter can be safely left to the Federal Court for the rival claims to be decided by the only body that can adjust them. We cannot adjust them now, because we have not the data which is necessary.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Why not put it definitely in the Constitution?

Mr. WISE. -

Because it seems to me that that would restrain the hands of the court, and I am prepared to trust the court absolutely; but I am not prepared to make a definition now when circumstances may be changing from year to year, and when the result maybe to lessen the beneficial power to be exercised for federal purposes, and those alone, by a tribunal of the highest authority. For those reasons I shall withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is not the Supreme Court of the United States that is referred to in the decision you have quoted.

Mr. WISE. -

It is a judgment by a Federal Judge.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is a different matter.

Mr. WISE. -

It seems to me that the objection is an utterly fanciful one.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You will not find the decision in any of the text-books of the United States.

Mr. WISE. -

As the case has not been appealed from it stands as law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not know that it has not been appealed from.

Mr. WISE. -

The decision was given in 1884.
Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I rise for two purposes. First of all, I wish to express the hope that the very reasonable suggestion—and I think the best suggestion that could be made—of the leader of the Convention (Mr. Barton) will be generally accepted by honorable members. It seems to me that we shall never be likely to get any proposal which will probably secure more general approval. We must recollect that Mr. Barton has adhered to his position throughout, and has since we last met had time to reconsider the matter; and he now, for the second or third time, recommends the committee to leave the whole question to the operation of the trade and commerce subsection. But I have another object in rising, and that is to express the hope that we shall not have another week's debate upon this question. I do not think that any one even amongst those who are most interested can say that the members of this Convention have not listened most patiently to the whole of last week's debate. But I really think there is a limit to forbearance, even on the part of those who are most anxious to listen to the words of wisdom which come from honorable members. I have taken the trouble to find out the number of times some honorable members have spoken in the course of the debate on this question.

Mr. SYMON. -

Do not go into statistics—refer the point to the Finance Committee.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

At any rate, from the number of times some honorable members have spoken, they should have been able to place their views distinctly before the Convention. My honorable and learned friend who interrupts has spoken seventeen times upon this question—I do not refer to interjections, but to long speeches, made with a pile of notes before him on each occasion. Seventeen times has the honorable and learned gentleman tried to teach us the merits of his case! My honorable and learned friend (Mr. Glynn) is only two points behind him, having spoken fifteen times, whilst my honorable and learned friend the Attorney-General of Victoria has spoken thirteen times. My honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) has spoken twelve times. I think that these honorable gentlemen should feel satisfied that they have placed the matter before us to the best of their ability and knowledge. There cannot really be anything in their minds in regard to this question the benefit of which they have not given us. Of course, I recognise the importance of the subject, but I think that I should hesitate before placing my views before any assembly in seventeen set speeches, no matter how important the subject. On one day I think the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) gave us no fewer than ten speeches; perhaps he is prepared to give us ten more to-day. I believe that this question can be summed up in a very few words. If the views of New South Wales are correctly expressed by one of the leading journals this morning, they are reasonable and should meet with the approval of even the people of South A

They will not put that into the Constitution.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The representatives of South Australia had the control of the Murray given to them, but they were parties to the striking out of the provision.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

The last portion of the provision to which the right honorable gentleman refers was never in print.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The last part of it goes with the first part. If you give up the control of a river you must make provision against interference with the tributaries of that river. I look upon the Murray as a federal river, and the only river in Australia that can really be called a federal river, and I am willing that it should be under federal control, and that if any of the colonies-New South Wales, South Australia, or Victoria-did anything to interfere with its navigation, the High Court of the Federal Parliament should have the right to interfere. I am altogether in favour of the proposal of the leader of the Convention, and I hope that it will be accepted, because it is the only way out of the difficulty. We all remember the fable of the dog and the shadow.

Mr. SYMON. -

The right honorable member must not quote constitutional authorities.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

In trying to get a little bit more one sometimes loses what would otherwise be willingly granted. If my honorable friends from South Australia are wise they will join with the representatives of New South Wales, and with all of us, in coming to a conclusion which will not leave any bitter sting behind, a conclusion expressed in general terms which will be applicable to all, and one which will enable them to go back to their people and say-"We are in the same position as every other state in Australia. The trade and commerce...

sub-section does not apply to us in a worse degree than that in which it supplies to any other state; we are all on the same footing." I did not rise to throw any new light on this question, because it is impossible for me to do so, but, having come from a distant colony, and having been here for nearly three weeks, the greater portion of which time has been taken up in discussing it, I think I have a right to protest, in as friendly a spirit as possible, against the prolongation of the debate. I am sure we have heard enough about the matter now, and if we can come to an amicable settlement, which will not be unfair to any one, I entreat honorable members to let us do so.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I am glad that my name does not appear in the list which the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) has just read. I have sat still for a number of days listening to the numerous speeches which have been delivered, and deploring the time occupied in the discussion, and I should not have risen to speak this morning but that I think the official position I hold demands a statement at my hands. This statement I shall make as short as I can. I listened with great attention to the speech made by the leader of the Convention this morning, and I regret exceedingly the attitude which he has taken. It seems to me that he is mixing up two matters which have almost nothing in common, and that he is seeking to make, as a condition of justice in one case, the surrender of that which he admits is of justice in another case. The position before the Convention just now is this-if I may use one other word of reply to the remarks of the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest). South Australia is content with things as they have been, since some time on Friday last, when, without division, and I think without a single voice being raised in dissent, the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) was accepted-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It went through before we knew anything about it.

Mr. LYNE. -

I protested against it at the time.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I did not hear a dissenting voice. The amendment had been in print for some days, it had been discussed, and, I think, some of the seventeen speeches which have been referred to were delivered in support of it, so that the Convention could not have been taken by surprise. Since the Convention accepted the amendment, South Australia has been content.

Mr. REID. -

The amendment was accepted under the belief that our amendment would be accepted too. That was the only ground upon which I let it go.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The honorable member (Mr. Lyne) specially mentioned that.

Mr. REID. -

Yes, my honorable colleague mentioned that.

Mr. HOLDER. -
The amendment was proposed to give effect to a declaration of policy which we had from the leader of the Convention some days ago. He told us that the sub-section upon which he relied—that relating to trade and commerce—meant so-and-so, and we were content with his assurance. We were willing to accept the position as he stated it to us.

Mr. Reid. -

You went on fighting all the same.

Mr. Holder. -

Not until something happened, to which I am about to refer. Almost immediately after this explanation we had speeches from the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) and from the right honorable member (Mr. Reid), which put an entirely different view of the case; a view which was supported to a large extent by the Attorney-General of Victoria, and which showed us that, while the leader of the Convention might be of one opinion, these other legal gentlemen were of another opinion, and therefore the statement of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Barton) was not to be accepted undoubtingly, because of the eminent authorities in the Convention by whom it was questioned. We therefore thought that we had better provide in the Constitution that the provision in respect to trade and commerce should be taken to mean what the leader of the Convention said it means, and nothing else, instead of leaving it in an uncertain condition, so that no one could say beforehand whether the decision of the High Court would be in accordance with the views of the leader of the Convention or in accordance with the views of the Premier of New South Wales. The amendment proposed by the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) went no further, however, than to declare that the federal rights in respect to trade and commerce should extend not only to rivers always navigable, but also to rivers intermittently navigable. The amendment went not a hair's-breadth beyond the declaration made by the leader of the Convention, and repeated by him again this morning. But, because we have placed beyond doubt and question the provision in respect to trade and commerce, is it to be said that a large concession has been made to South Australia in respect to the rights of New South Wales in regard to irrigation and water conservation, which must be balanced by large concessions to New South Wales? Has any concession been made to South Australia in regard to water conservation and irrigation? There has been none. There has been only the making clear of what we all say is a federal provision—the right of the federal authority to control trade and commerce upon the rivers. I appeal to the honorable and learned members (Mr. Deakin and Dr. Quick), and to other honorable members, not excluding the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest), who in the past have taken up a position not unfavorable to South Australia. When South Australia was seeking to have placed in the Constitution certain provisions which made more clear her right to a share of the waters of the Darling, these honorable gentlemen said "No." The honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin) put it very clearly. He said "I think you are right, but in spite of that let this stand upon the trade and commerce sub-section. Let us not put into the Constitution anything which will give away any of the rights of New South Wales at the present juncture." It, was not that the honorable and learned gentleman did not believe in the existence of the rights of South Australia; he counselled that course only for the sake of expediency. I ask these honorable gentlemen to take the same position to-day, when it is not South Australia but New South Wales who is seeking the establishment of rights. When every right which South Australia has asked for has been refused by the Convention, and when upon the top of these refusals New South Wales is asking for concessions I ask these honorable gentlemen to say to New South Wales to-day what they said to us last week, and to tell them:"No, you must stand upon your rights under the trade and commerce sub-section, and not ask for special rights in relation to water conservation and irrigation." If honorable gentlemen take that attitude to-day, which will only be consistent with their attitude last week, and say to New South Wales, as they said to South Australia:"Stay your hands, I have no fear but that this intended encroachment by New South Wales will be rejected by the Convention. Much has been said about the rights of this case, and I do not want to quote a number of legal decisions, which may or may not have a bearing upon it. There are piles of books upon the table which have been referred to by other honorable gentlemen; but how do we know that these American decisions, which have been quoted at such length and with such persistency, have a bearing upon the case? How do we know that the Federal High Court will take its law from the American courts? Is it not likely that it will take its law from the English courts, or more probable still that the Judges will say-

Sir JOHN FORREST. - Not at all.
Mr. HOLDER. -

I am going to mention two points which I think have been overlooked. For many years Victoria has been a great competitor with South Australia for the Darling trade. A large amount of the wool from what we call Riverina—the Upper Darling—comes down to Wentworth, and then goes up the Murray to Echuca for shipment to Melbourne, and a large quantity of stores have gone up by the same route to the Riverina country. I ask Victoria, has she all in a moment lost her interest in the Darling trade? Is it not with her to-day a vital matter? Is she not going to give her votes to help South Australia in this matter of maintaining this amendment by Mr. Glynn to protect for her as well as for South Australia the right to a share in this Riverina trade? Who developed Riverina?—Victorians and South Australians. To whom is it important that the Darling River should be kept open for the Riverina traffic? It is of importance to the stock-holders and to the others who are resident in the Darling country, and for their sakes—for the sake of Victoria quite as much as for the sake of South Australia—this amendment of Mr. Glynn's should be inserted in the Constitution, and should by no means be abandoned. But there is another point. It is admitted on several hands that we all have the same rights to the waters of the Murray, because it is said those waters flow from one colony through another. Now, much has been sought to be made of the fact that in name the Darling is purely a New South Wales river. I know that that has influenced my honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) very much, and I want him particularly to listen to me, if he will, for a moment or two, while I put a point or two which I think he will appreciate. It is said that the Darling being wholly a New South Wales river, practically beginning in that colony and ending as far as name goes, in New South Wales, that colony should be left free to do as she likes with that river and its waters. Now, what are the facts? In name the River Darling ends just below Wentworth, but what is to prevent South Australia altering the name of the Lower Murray to the Darling, if there is so much in a name? The mere alteration of that name would make the Darling, together with the Lower Murray, the main stream, and we should then have a right to the Darling waters, which to some extent are conceded to us now.

Mr. REID. -

Then we would call the Darling the Murray.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That just brings me to the point I want to make. I hoped that I should evoke some such interjection as that, to show the folly of being guided by a mere name. Now, supposing I am a land-owner, and have a stream running through my land—a stream which begins just outside one border of my land... and flows out through the other border, into another man's land—will my naming that
-Murray waters clear, coming from the mountains, fed by the melting snows; the waters of the Darling heavily clouded, having passed through the alluvial country along its course, from Queensland downwards.

Mr. GORDON. -
Yes. Discoloured with Queensland mud.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Yes; I have seen the waters of the two rivers flowing side by side, and not mingling their courses.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
But which is the main stream there?

Mr. HOLDER. -
I have seen the waters of those two rivers flowing side by side in the Murray channel when the main stream has undoubtedly been the waters of the Darling. I have seen that on more occasions than one—the greater volume of the water that which came down the Darling and the lesser volume that which came down the Murray. With these facts before us it is idle to pretend that the mere cessation of the name Darling River in New South Wales cuts off from all below the borders of that colony any right to a share of the waters of the Darling, which are so important a factor in the Lower Murray. I do not wish for a moment to make more serious the serious difficulties in which we find ourselves placed. I speak with a very heavy sense of responsibility in saying what I do. I recognise the difficulties which prevail in New South Wales, and particularly the special difficulty of getting 80,000 votes in favour of this Constitution before it can be accepted in New South Wales; but I say that this is not the difficulty of New South Wales only, but the difficulty of every member of this Convention. Our business is to frame a fair Constitution, acceptable not only by the people of the other colonies, but acceptable also by the people of New South Wales, and I ask where is, the use of our framing a Constitution which will be acceptable in the other states, if it is rejected in New South Wales? Therefore, the difficulty of New South Wales is the difficulty of every one of us, and what we have all to consider is how we can best remove that difficulty and make possible the acceptance by the people of New South Wales of the Constitution we shall frame. But, while New South Wales has its difficulties, South Australia has its difficulties, too. For many years past the river question has involved South Australia in very considerable difficulty from many points of view. It is not a question that has sprung into life and being since this Convention began to sit.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Have you not made the difficulties without any necessity up to the present?
Mr. HOLDER. -
I do not know whether the honorable member refers to the proceedings of the Convention; I cannot think he does.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
I mean as to the navigation of the river. In what way have we hitherto interfered?
Mr. HOLDER. -
I am very glad to say that in the past New South Wales has not interfered with the navigability of the river, but has, in fact, done a great deal to make it more navigable, although it has, at times, required a good deal of correspondence to bring about that result.
Mr. REID. -
But there were no cheques in the letters sent from Adelaide.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Nor would the South Australian Government allow us the use of their punts.
Mr. HOLDER. -
I am quite prepared to go on with my remarks if honorable members will permit me. I say that New South Wales has, up to the present, rendered much assistance in maintaining and improving the navigability of the Darling. But for whose sake, I should like to know?
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
For South Australia's sake.
Mr. HOLDER. -
Sir Joseph Abbott knows better than any one else in this Convention that the maintenance of the navigability of the Darling has been the one thing which has made possible the continued occupation of the Darling country.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Quite so.
Mr. REID. -
But still that does not alter the fact that we have not prejudiced the navigation.
Mr. HOLDER. -
New South Wales has behaved very well in this matter in the past, but she will not promise to behave as well in the future.
Mr. REID. -
We consider it an insult to throw any doubt on our intentions.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I want to dispose of this matter, because it is just off the point I desired to make. If New South Wales would simply prohibit herself from the unreasonable use of the waters of the Darling, which was all we asked her to do the other day—we do not go so far as that now—we had all been content on Thursday last. But New South Wales refuses to do so, so that it is the unreasonable use of the waters of the Darling that she evidently contemplates, or she would not object to be prohibited from that unreasonable use. I wish, however, to refer to a difficulty that has so long prevailed in South Australia, a difficulty which has been the subject of debates in Parliament, and which we have attempted to settle by correspondence with the Governments concerned, by attempted inter-colonial conferences, and in many other ways—this question of the Riverina trade. It has been a burning question in South Australia for years, and I do not hesitate to say—not by way of threat, nothing of the kind, I should be very loath indeed to threaten, to the last extreme I should refrain from using threats—that if we go back from this Convention with a Constitution which contains in it even the implication of the surrender of any of the rights of our people in the Riverina trade, it is hopeless to think the electors of South Australia will accept such a Federal Constitution.

Mr. LYNE. -

What about New South Wales?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I have already admitted that it is a serious difficulty in New South Wales as well as in South Australia, and my suggestion to honorable members is now—I ask them to admit that the difficulty in South Australia is as much theirs as ours, and that they should be as willing to help us to get rid of that difficulty as far as our colony is concerned as we are willing to help them to get rid of it as far as New South Wales is concerned.

Mr. REID. -

If we will see you through your difficulty, via Mr. Glynn's amendment, will you see us through ours via my amendment?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I want to go back on the first question. Mr. Glynn's amendment dealt with trade and commerce only; now we are dealing with quite another question. The way out of the difficulty that I suggest is this—the Convention has persistently refused by vote after vote, and by increasing majorities, to give South Australia the slightest advantage in the use of these waters, and if the Convention will say precisely the same to New South Wales the matter will be settled. The representatives of New South Wales can then go back to their colony without having surrendered anything on their part, and we can go back to our colony without having surrendered anything on our part. We shall both stand where we were. It will be a drawn battle, fairly fought on both sides, and drawn with honour to both sides, but without advantage to either and without loss to either. We have come to the point where we should not put anything in the Constitution. The Convention has refused to put anything in for South Australia; let it also refuse to put anything in for New South Wales. Let us have it a drawn battle, neither side to triumph over the other, neither to suffer an ignominious defeat. If the Convention will agree to that course, negative the amendment of Mr. Reid, and, afterwards, if it is proposed, the amendment of Mr. Wise, the Convention will take a course which will send the delegates home enjoying peace with honour.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Do you wish the question to be left to the Federal Parliament or the Judiciary to decide?

Mr. HOLDER. -
I am speaking of what this Convention has refused to give to South Australia, and I ask why should the Convention give to New South Wales what it has refused to give to South Australia? That is the question I want answering. That is the question we had before us last week.

Mr. LYNE. -
What about Mr. Glynn's interpretation of "navigable river"?

Mr. HOLDER. -
That does not touch the question of water conservation and irrigation. We are simply by that placing beyond dispute the interpretation of the leader of the Convention of the trade and commerce provision.

Mr. REID. -
But surely the leader of the Convention is not here to interpret the Constitution we have not yet established. Why don't you follow the leader when it does not suit you? You only follow him when it suits you. You have been fighting against him for a week.

Mr. HOLDER. -
If the leader of the Convention had disputed the force of Mr. Glynn's amendment, there would be some force in that interjection; but as he did not dispute it, but, on the contrary, as he appeared to me to agree to the insertion of the amendment, I fail to see where that interjection comes in at all. I am sorry that the leader of the Convention happens to be out of the chamber for a moment, because I am sure that he would confirm my statement on that point. Now, I appeal to the Convention to look first to the difficulty of New South Wales, and to place that colony under no disability; but I also appeal to the Convention to look next to the difficulty of South Australia, and to place South Australia under no disability. By that means we should leave this contest a drawn battle between the contesting parties, and settle, once for all that which both sides, and indeed everybody, have admitted is a federal question—the question of trade and commerce. I regret having taken up so long a time in making these observations, but, in view of the interjections, I could not occupy a shorter time. I ask the Convention to remember that there is not only a difficulty to be met in New South Wales, but also in South Australia, and I submit that the best, I think the only, course is to draw the battle between the parties.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

May I respond for one moment to the invitation of Sir John Forrest? In adding one more—a very little one—to the long list of speeches, which he in the solitude of his Sunday has so industriously compiled—I was better occupied on Sunday—

Mr. REID. -

It was a beautiful sermon.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am quite unable to check his figures, although, knowing his reputation as a great financial authority, I am quite willing to believe them to be absolutely correct. But I think he does himself injustice when he says he does not think it possible for him to throw any further light on this question, because we all feel that he speaks as an oracle when he gets up to address the Convention; and I am sure that on a subject like this, which does not interest him, and about which he does not profess to be greatly concerned, his advice is all the more valuable. Now, sir, I rose simply to say one or two words about the present position of this question. I hope that my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) will feel himself in a position to withdraw this amendment, which may not be very important in itself

Mr. Holder has pointed out, that places South Australia and the South Australian representatives in a position of very great difficulty in advocating any settlement in relation to these rivers. The conclusion which I have myself come to, on the authorities which have been referred to, and upon the best interpretation which I am able to give to this Constitution as it now stands, is that which I have already expressed; that under subsection (1) it will be within the power of the Federal Parliament, and within the power of the Federal Judiciary, to deal justly between both New South Wales and South Australia in relation to these rivers in the interests of trade and commerce. I take that view not only as a lawyer-

Mr. REID. -

There is no doubt about that. In the interests of trade and commerce there will be equality; but what about irrigation?

Mr. SYMON. -

It does not appear to me, as my right honorable friend says, that there can be any misunderstanding upon that point, even from the view of a constitutional lawyer, or from the view of one interested in the preservation of the rights of his state. I think that what my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) has said this morning puts it even more clearly than the position which it occupied before. If it is possible that that state of things can happen in America which occurred in relation to the bridge over the Ohio, we may have exactly the same position of things here. If a weir or a dam is considered to be an obstruction to the navigation, and if the Federal High Court, acting within the rigid limits of the Constitution, could declare it to be an obstruction, and require its removal, it would be perfectly competent for the Federal Parliament, in its authority to legislate with regard to the regulation of trade and commerce, to declare, either by a general or a special law, that it was not an obstruction—that it was a legal structure—and to that extent to nullify the decree of the High Court. That is the view I entertain with regard to the effect of the sub-section. Now, Mr. Glynn has moved an amendment which I think has been greatly misunderstood. That amendment declares no right; it confers no right: It simply amounts to a definition, within the four corners of the Constitution, of what we all believe the American authorities have decided a navigable river to be—what we all believe the High Court of this Commonwealth will, upon far stronger grounds, looking at the condition of things within this continent in relation to water, also decide. That is the view which I have taken all along about my honorable friend's amendment. It is a desirable amendment if you wish to lay down once for all, within the limits of the Constitution, what you believe to be the definition of a navigable river. On the other hand, it does not carry the law one atom further than that it would exist without the insertion of these words in the Constitution.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It might prove a limitation.

Mr. SYMON. -

I was going to point out, a little later on, that the danger of every definition where you are dealing with the interpretation of a Constitution, which you mean to be elastic, is that it may operate in the future as a limitation. The difference is this. If we believe, as I in my conscience believe, the words of Mr. Glynn's amendment to be a reproduction, a concentrated reproduction, of the law on the subject as we have heard it expounded by Mr. Isaacs, Mr. Barton, and Mr. O'Connor, it maybe right at this moment; but you make it irremovable and unalterable without an amendment of the Constitution. If, on the other hand, you leave it to the Federal Judiciary, which is bound to expound the Constitution in an elastic fashion for the interests of the whole nation—the general interests of the entire Commonwealth—you leave it in a position in which it may be adapted to the changing requirements of the times. Now, on the one hand, I appeal to my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) whether there is really anything to be gained by inserting this definition in the Constitution?
I agree that there is this in the first instance to be gained: That you are placing what we think is an interpretation of a navigable river, according to the American law, in the Constitution at the present moment; but, on the other hand, you are laying down a hard-and-fast rule which cannot be altered, and which may lead us into greater inconveniences and difficulties in the future. I would, therefore, ask my honorable friend to reconsider the matter. I do not ask him to give it up if he thinks and believes—and there is no doubt that he is absolutely sincere and earnest on the question—that it will be a gain to have it in as it now stands, notwithstanding the possibilities of change in the future. But I will ask him also to consider whether it will not be better to leave it out of the Constitution, apart altogether even from Mr. Reid's amendment—to leave it, as we now believe it to be, the law, and subject, if necessary, to the fluctuations that may take place hereafter.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I am not going to let the Federal Judiciary be the legislators.

Mr. SYMON. -
I think my honorable friend, if he will allow me to say so, is not taking a very just view of the situation. The Federal judiciary never can be legislators, but the Federal Parliament. It is in the Federal Judiciary, however, that is reposed the obligation of interpreting the Constitution; and the point is, whether we should put into the Constitution a provision which will tie the hands of the Federal Judiciary from doing, perhaps, greater justice to us in the future than we should obtain by inserting this rigid definition now. That is the view which I take, and which I ask my honorable friend, with all earnestness, to consider. If, by inserting this in the Constitution, we gain only a momentary certainty, with the possibility of disadvantages hereafter, I think the disadvantages would greatly outweigh the present benefits, and that it would be better for us to have regard to the future of the Commonwealth we are creating, rather than to the immediate need of the present moment. At the same time, I do not think that my honorable friends from New South Wales ought to have put the withdrawal of this amendment as a condition to their withdrawing from what I cannot help feeling would be a vicious amendment, and one that would be very serious for us to overcome. I think the Convention ought to reject the amendment of Mr. Reid, but if a majority of the Convention, those who are interested, and those who have been looking on with a view of doing justice to both sides, consider that it would be better to relieve the Constitution of both, I, for one, am prepared to take that course. I think we have had enough discussion on this subject. I agree with Sir John Forrest on that point, but I hope that, in spite of my seventeen speeches, I have not-at any rate wilfully-want only or needlessly occupied the time of the Convention. I am sure that I have no desire—I should be the last—to postpone for one moment the completion of the work which we have in hand, and if it will hasten that work and hasten the completion of this Bill in such a shape that we can disarm hostility, and will enable us to take it to our people with a fair amount of good-will, I am prepared to do anything reasonable to accomplish that end.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I have failed to understand the position taken up by my honorable friend (Mr. Wise). From what I can gather, New South Wales claims that it has unquestionably a right to the water of the Darling, and that South Australia has no right whatever to the use of that water.

Mr. REID. -

But we are willing to leave it to the Federal Court to decide the matter as its own judgment determines.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That, of course, does not carry South Australia one inch further.

Mr. REID. -

Then we must have the right.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If the right honorable member would do what I would like to see him do by way of concession—give to South Australia some little right to the use of that water, or leave it to the Federal Parliament to decide what right South Australia should, after the Federation, have to the use of the water, I think the whole difficulty would be solved. But, unfortunately, my right honorable friend will not do that. He says—"I won't submit to the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament under any circumstances;" and I think that, in that position, he is wrong.
Mr. REID. -

Is not the Federal Court a better tribunal to decide than the Federal Parliament, where there will be politicians fighting?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The Federal Court will have jurisdiction to decide existing rights, but it will have no jurisdiction to do what the Federal Parliament could, and I think ought to, do—that is, to do justice to South Australia, so that they should have some use, some fair and reasonable use, of this water, while not dealing unjustly with the other colonies. I, for one, although Victoria is vitally interested, would be prepared to leave the whole question of navigation, conservation, and irrigation to the decision of the Federal Parliament; but, if we are to leave it to the Federal Court, the Federal Court, as my right honorable friend knows, can only deal with legal rights, and cannot do what I think ought to be done—justice.

Mr. WISE. -

My contention is that each colony has a right to its own water, but that, after the Federation, neither colony would be able to exercise its right to the detriment of the other colony.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

All the rights of each state are preserved by the Constitution, but the honorable member's argument would lead to the belief that, after federation, the Federal Court would be able to so decide as to prohibit the use in New South Wales of water for conservation and irrigation, if it were detrimental to navigation in South Australia.

Mr. WISE. -

And adjust the rights of both parties.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We have heard that expression before. "Adjust the rights" means nothing.

Mr. REID. -

It means nothing if you have not a right.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It means nothing to the unfortunate colony which, it is said, has not a right, but which, in my opinion, ought to have some right.

Mr. WISE. -

To use its own waters.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

What does that concession amount to—to use the waters falling in its own colony, or to use the waters which New South Wales thinks fit to leave to it to use?

Mr. WISE. -

It goes much further than that.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The right does not go any further, and I want the Federal Parliament to be able to go a little further. That is the reason why I cannot follow the honorable member's contention. The Federal Court would have no power to give what many of us, in spite of the risks we are running ourselves in our own colony, desire to see South Australia get from this Convention—the only place from which she can get it—and, therefore, I am at a loss to understand the bearing of the argument of Mr. Wise on the difficulties which surround us in connexion with this matter. Now, the leader of the Convention has advised us to rest entirely on sub-section (1), which deals with trade and commerce, and he asks us to expunge the amendment which was inserted on the motion of Mr. Glynn. That amendment laid down in the Constitution what we had been told by several of our leading lawyers was the effect of the decisions in America, but, as I pointed out before, my difficulty is this—that while those decisions may have been given in America, under the circumstances of America, it does not follow that, in this country, our court would decide on the same lines.

Mr. SYMON. -

Do not you think it would?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I think it ought to, and therefore I say it is our duty to say that it shall. I was pleased to s

Mr. SYMON. -

Are you going to support Mr. Reid's amendment?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I intend to support it with a certain variation, which, if agreed to, would, I think, meet all the difficulty, but I am afraid Mr. Reid will not be able to see his way to agree to it, although the alteration is slight. Mr. Holder pointed out that Victoria is concerned to some extent in the Darling trade. I do not know whether he was anxious to induce us from self-interest to vote in a certain direction, or for what reason he brought that matter so prominently forward. There is no doubt that Victoria is interested to a very great extent in having the Darling navigable at all times, and by that means getting a considerable amount of trade which might otherwise go elsewhere. I have said before, and I repeat it now, that while we are anxious that navigation should be preserved we are more anxious, so far as our colony is concerned, that water conservation and irrigation should be provided for. We look upon that as the first consideration in the interest of our settlers and of the thousands and tens of thousands who in years to come will undoubtedly be dependent for their living on having a full and ample supply of water for irrigation purposes. If one or other has to give way, then I say, unhesitatingly, that navigation must give way to conservation and irrigation. That applies to Victoria, to a certain extent, but it applies to the larger colony of New South Wales to a very much greater extent.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It will always be in the power of the Federal Parliament to enact that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Our honorable leader told us that until the Federal Parliament did legislate on the question of navigation the states would retain all their rights of dealing with irrigation and water conservation.

Mr. BARTON. -

And would afterwards retain them to the extent to which they had not been dealt with by the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Of course they would retain them, unless over-ridden by the federal law. Why should that be so? Why should there still be that element of doubt? Is it to be expected that any Government, I may even say any individuals, are going to spend large sums of money on irrigation and conservation works when there will be the risk of the Federal Parliament passing a law which would render those works absolutely useless? If the Federal Parliament is, as I believe it will under the Bill as it now stands, to give first consideration to navigation, it might, after certain works had been constructed in New South Wales or Victoria, pass a law for the benefit of navigation. That law might and probably would injure those works to a very great extent. I think it is quite possible to leave a power to the Federal Parliament that would prevent any doubt or difficulty arising and that would be a power under which, unless the works were prohibited by the Parliament or were stopped by some means before they were carried into execution, no law should be passed by the Federal Parliament that would injure them or injure any existing works. If we made that provision we should go a considerable length towards meeting the difficulties of our colony and of New South Wales. Mr. Holder has fairly pointed out that our friends from New South Wales will have great difficulty in obtaining the requisite number of votes in favour of the Constitution. That applies equally to all the colonies, although New South Wales will have a larger number of votes to obtain, and there will be many opponents of federation. We know that in this colony there are many and strong opponents of federation, and they will take advantage of every point for the purpose of inducing people to vote against, or, at all events, not to trouble themselves to vote for this Bill. Supposing that in the northern districts, where the people have to depend on the water, the argument is used, as it probably will be, that we, by our action, have handed over to the Federal Parliament the power to prevent any future irrigation works, it will not be enough to tell them in reply that the Federal Parliament is not likely to do anything that will injure them. If navigation alone is provided for they will say: "We prefer to retain what we have than to trust any other body." My anxiety is, whilst I am willing to make every reasonable provision for navigation to assist South Australia and to benefit Victoria, to have such other provisions incorporated in the Constitution as will enable me to tell the people that their irrigation works cannot hereafter be interfered with for the benefit only of navigation. I think, therefore, that the amendment we have already carried should stand, because it makes certain what we are told is the law, and what we desire to have as the law. Some such provision as Mr. Reid has suggested ought also to be incorporated in the Bill, and incorporated if possible with the good will and consent of our friends from South Australia. With regard to Mr. Wise's amendment I agree with the leader of the Convention that these words, if inserted, would merely be declaratory of what we have already in the Bill. I hardly agree with our leader that the amendment proposed by Mr. Reid will not go a long way farther than any provision at present in the Bill. No state is to be prevented from using or authorizing the use of water for the purposes of irrigation and water conservation. I should like to have that, and that only, but I think it goes a little too far in the interests of South Australia, and that it should be modified. Mr. Reid proposes to modify it by adding the words "subject to any right possessed by any state." If those words were added the amendment would, in my judgment, give South Australia nothing, because the contention all along has been that that colony has no rights. I should prefer that these words should be left out, because they would be of no benefit whatever. I would appeal to Mr. Reid to modify his very strong views. Having regard to the difficulties that will be experienced not only in New South Wales, but also in South Australia and Victoria, in obtaining the requisite number of votes, I would point out to Mr. Reid that it is his duty, whilst protecting the interests of New South Wales, to assist the other colonies in getting a Constitution which their people will accept. He can do that without any great detriment to New South Wales or Victoria, because in this matter our interests run together. He might insert, instead of the words "subject to any right possessed by any other state," the words
"subject to any rights which the Federal Parliament may hereafter grant to any other state."
Mr. OCONNOR. -
That opens up the whole question again.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
It may; but if the words which Mr. Reid himself suggests are inserted we shall be giving South Australia nothing.

Mr. REID. -
Do not say "we." You mean New South Wales.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The Goulburn is a navigable river.

Mr. REID. -
The Darling and the Goulburn are two very different streams. There are no barges on the Goulburn.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I think we contribute as much, if not a good deal more, water to the Murray than New South Wales. I am quite willing, as I have been all through, that all these rivers, whether they be in New South Wales or in Victoria, should be placed in the one category. I do not want any advantages to the rivers of Victoria that are not given to the rivers of New South Wales, and I do not want any disadvantages to be placed on New South Wales that I am not prepared to see placed on Victoria. We must all enter into this Federation on the same footing. I would again appeal to Mr. Reid to consider whether he cannot couch his amendment in language that would, while protecting the rights of New South Wales and Victoria, with regard to water conservation and irrigation, to some reasonable extent protect the interests of South Australia in relation to navigation, and also to irrigation. We ought to be able to agree to some form of words that would have that effect. I would do it by leaving the matter absolutely to the judgment and discretion of the Federal Parliament, believing that they would take into consideration all rights and all interests, including any works already constructed. If works had been constructed by the states or individuals, I feel sure that they would not be interfered with without full and ample compensation being given. So far as the rights and interests of Victoria are concerned, I should be quite prepared to leave the whole subject, in the widest possible form, to be dealt with by the Federal Parliament. I am in this position, that I must assist in retaining the words already, inserted on the motion of Mr. Glynn, because I think it wise to put beyond all doubt the construction to be picked on subsection (1). I also desire to have in the Constitution a declaration that, although navigation is of great importance, water conservation and irrigation are of equal if not greater importance to the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria.

Mr. DOBSON. -

If you want that engrafted in the Constitution, must you not say that either the Parliament or the High Court shall settle disputes?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The honorable member must see that the High Court can only interfere when a complaint is made that owing to some water conservation or irrigation works navigation is being injured.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Trade and commerce are being injured.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes, trade and commerce may be injured by works that affect prejudicially the navigation of the river.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

There may be other causes apart from navigation affecting trade and commerce.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

There may be, but at present we are discussing the question only from the point of view of navigation. Trade and commerce is a wide term, but in time to come I believe that the rivers of Australia will be used very little for navigation and far more for water conservation and irrigation. I would again ask my right honorable friend if he possibly can modify his views so as to assist us all out of the difficulty? It does seem to me that the simplest and easiest plan we can possibly adopt is to have trust in the body we are going to create, a body who will probably be something like we are here; a body who, no doubt, will be disposed and will be in a position to prevent injustice from being done. My advice to my right honorable friend and to the Convention is to place the fullest possible powers we can in the hands of the Federal Parliament to deal, not alone with navigation, but also with navigation, conservation, and irrigation on an equal footing.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I intend to accept the suggestion of the leader of the Convention. I have long thought that, in our anxiety to prevent injury being done to particular colonies, we have really been putting limitations on the rights which we are creating by the general words which are used. And when in Adelaide the clause, as introduced, was cut down in the way in which it was in the Bill when we began our consideration of it at this meeting, I protested against it on the ground that it was a limitation, and said I should oppose the clause in every shape and form. The amendment which is moved by the Premier of New South Wales I addressed myself to before. As regards the amendment on the amendment, I will say that it only emphasizes his intention. He says there is no right, and he wants to declare that the states can enforce any rights they have, having previously said that no state has any right out of its own territory. I do not think that South Australia has any reason for thanking my right honorable friend for any concession in that amendment. It is rather putting an emphasis on the assertion of provincial right which he has been making all through. But if we make no amendments, leaving the clause regulating trade and commerce to stand as it is, what will be the result? We must go to the only country in which a similar clause has prevailed in order to find it out. The courts of America, Chief Justice Marshall, and the eminent men who followed him-

Mr. DEAKIN. -

There is no Marshall in our Constitution, you know.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

And no courts of America.

Mr. BARTON. -

There are stronger words in our Constitution.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

The courts of America, Chief Justice Marshall, and the eminent men who followed him founded their decisions on the common law of England. They had no statute law to assist them; the common law of England was their basis, and on that their decisions went. So it is with continental states. The international law, hard as it is to define, still existing with some degree of precision, is founded by analogy in reality on the ordinary riparian rights of persons on the banks of a stream. There the streams are navigable; the important interest is navigation; the one thing to be conserved is navigation, and navigation accordingly is always made the criterion. There is no question there of taking water for any other purpose. In America, as was pointed out very ably by my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs), in that very excellent speech in which he satisfied many of us, but the reasoning of which he has not altogether adhered to since, I think, there was a different ground for decision. There, in many instances, navigability was the test, but in the more and country, as he pointed out, navigability was not always the test; and so here under these general terms, if we leave the Parliament power of regulating trade and commerce, they will be able to regulate everything that carries trade and commerce.

Mr. BARTON. -

All the success they have had in water conservation and irrigation in America has been in face of the power to regulate trade and commerce.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes, but on rivers where the conflict could not occur.
Mr. REID. -
Where the point would not arise.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Where could you have a more eloquent illustration of the reason for the decision in America than the case which has been cited by Mr. Inglis Clark? There it was not a question of navigation, it was a question of manufactures. An interference with stream which interferes with navigation may or may not be an interference with trade and commerce. An interference with manufactures is certainly an interference with trade and commerce. What may we reasonably expect to find? Trade and commerce have to be free. The Parliament has the regulation of trade and commerce. That will deal with everything which is incidental to the well-being of the subject-matter which is included in it. It may be to keep the river navigable, it may be the method in which they think trade and commerce in these particulars may be best preserved. It may be, on the other hand, that it will destroy the navigability. It may be in the best interests of the trade and commerce they want to conserve; but, in every instance, the Parliament of the Commonwealth will have to decide, and from time to time to define, what is the best for trade and commerce. In Adelaide I opposed the clause as it was introduced, because I considered they were words of limitation, and not words of extension, and it is from that same point of view now that I feel that my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) has moved his amendment. Although I could see no objection to it, it appeared to me that it might in the result work differently from that which he intended. I say, put words broad enough to give the Commonwealth absolute power under this provision—I think they get power to do exactly what they like—and then leave the Constitution to work itself out according to circumstances, which we cannot for a moment foresee. Our vision is very limited, and although we might legislate clearly and definitely on that which we see clearly and definitely, it is quite as impossible for us to forecast the future as to be able to say what the Federal Parliament ought to do. What we have to do is to give them power to do what is best for the Commonwealth from time to time.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Have you done that?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I believe so.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I doubt it.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

In my opinion, under these regulations providing for trade and commerce, they will have all the powers which they will need to exercise. Originally, if we could have had a definition broad enough, I would have preferred trying to put something in, adding words like my learned friend (Mr. Symon) sought to do, that this should in no case be taken in limitation of powers implied in the phrase "trade and commerce." But a strong disposition has been shown in this committee to do nothing of the kind. The committee has refused to do so. The Premier of New South Wales has told us that he cannot go back to his country and advocate this, if we are too precise in our definition.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That is not the only subject he has told us that about.

Mr. REID. -

Ah!

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That is not the only subject he has told us that about.

Mr. REID. -

What was the other one?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Order.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I will support the view taken by the leader of the Convention, because I believe that in supporting that view, so far from depriving South Australia of a single right, we give the Commonwealth greater rights than will be given by the definitions which, however perfect we may think them now, may in the end prove to be mere limitations of a general power which the analogy of America shows will flow from the use of the words which are in the Bill.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I think it is most distressing that, after the days of discussion, and the multitude of amendments we have had, we really seem, from the tone of the discussion this morning, to be getting no nearer to a settlement.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Whose fault is that?

Mr. REID. -

As far as I am concerned, I allowed Mr. Glynn's amendment to go, notwithstanding my strong objection to it, simply because I had my own amendment shadowed forth to the Convention; and, although of course there was not a shadow of an understanding with any member of the Convention, still, from the trend of the discussion at that particular point, I had reason to believe, I think, that the majority of honorable members were prepared to put words in to show that irrigation and water conservation, when the two happen to conflict, must be regarded as the superior claim. I think we had got to that point, and I had no objection to Mr. Glynn's amendment with that understanding. But as matters stand now we are just as far away from coming to the point as ever we were. It is absolutely impossible for me to withdraw my amendment, and I believe the desire of the majority of honorable members is that the interests of water conservation and irrigation throughout Australia should not be left in an uncertain state. Unfortunately, this is very different from any other subject. There are many other subjects where we might adopt suggestions like that made by my right honorable friend opposite, because they would admit of exact definition, but to endeavour to establish an exact definition of a subject of this sort, with rivers unnavigable so many times in the year, is a matter of sheer impossibility; I think every one will admit that. We have, therefore, simply to choose in a broad way between navigation and irrigation. My honorable friend the leader of the Convention admits that, under these general powers, the duty of the Federal Parliament would be only as to navigation. We are charging the Federal Parliament and the Federal Executive with the duty of maintaining the navigation. We have even gone so far as to say that rivers which in fact are not navigable shall be deemed to be navigable in order to extend the jurisdiction for federal purposes over trade and commerce. I am quite agreeable to that federal jurisdiction being given for the purposes of trade and commerce. I am quite agreeable that no state should use its waters for those purposes in such a way as to distinguish between its own citizens and the citizens of another state. But we find the old difficulty staring us in the face: The water which is federal as to navigation, is state as to irrigation. And can we launch this Commonwealth Bill without some expression of our opinions as to which interest is to be the predominating interest when they clash? We hope that they will never clash? We hope that it will be possible, by improving the rivers, to maintain the navigation for all time. That will be within the power of the Commonwealth to do, but facing the uncertainties and the anxieties of the future, we have, as my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner) admits, I think rather against his disposition, to put words in. I submit that the words I have suggested, with the amendments I propose to make, are the only words which can make this right clear. I would be willing to concede, if a concession would make a certainty of anything, but it would only intensify the uncertainty of the case. I say again, if any dispute arises between the states as to these matters, the High Court is there to deal with it. My trouble is accentuated by the provision in this Constitution—a necessary provision—that where a federal law and a state law are inconsistent the federal law must prevail. If we had a state irrigation law and a federal navigation law, and the state irrigation law conflicted with the navigation law of the Federation, under an express section of the Constitution, the irrigation law would go down.

Mr. BARTON. -
To the extent of the inconsistency.

Mr. REID. -
Of course, only to the extent of the inconsistency. This danger is presented to us again under the powers of the Constitution, that a state may have a scheme of water conservation absolutely necessary to the development of its territory, and for a purpose which all Australia would applaud, but unfortunately it would imperil navigation, and just as the federal power would come along and remove a bridge which had been established by the state across a river, so the federal power might come along and veto that scheme of irrigation, on the ground that it was detrimental to navigation. Now, facing all these troubles as we have to do, I ask the Convention to come to a decision at once, without any further delay. If anything can be added to my amendment which, without creating greater uncertainty, will meet the susceptibilities of my honorable friends from South Australia, I am willing to add it. Perhaps, with consent, my amendment might now be put in this form, with the omission of the words "or citizens" so that nothing shall be done without the authority and responsibility of the state, making the state responsible for what is done. I would gladly add other words which have been suggested, only they do not seem to be accepted as conveying anything. It is useless to add words which will be considered as meaning nothing.

Mr. DOBSON. -
They mean a great deal.

Mr. REID. -
I shall be most happy to add the following words, if they are desired—"subject to any right for the use of any portion of such water for the same purposes possessed by any other state." If my amendment is established, I will propose to add those words.

Mr. DOBSON. -
That cuts away the authority, according to Mr. Clark. When we enter into the bargain, all rights we now possess should be maintained. Those words would give it over to the federal authority.

Mr. REID. -
Then you do not want these words?

Mr. DOBSON. -

No.

Mr. REID. -

Very well, I will meet your views. I wish to amend my amendment so that it will read as follows:-

but no state shall be prevented from using or authorizing the use of any of such waters for purposes of irrigation or water conservation.

The amendment was amended accordingly.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do trust that I shall not be driven into the course of supporting any of the amendments by the attitude of South Australia. I am pleased to see the attitude taken up by the honorable member (Mr. Symon) and the honorable member (Sir John Downer). I have thrown out a suggestion myself, which I think is a very reasonable one, and which has found a good deal of support. The result, of that suggestion would be that what I myself would always adhere to as a proper course would be taken here. An amendment has crept in, not improperly moved or supported by any one, but inadvertently allowed to pass by some of us who ought to have opposed it. I am not inconsistent, as the honorable member (Mr. Holder) suggests, in saying now that I wish to revert to the original position, from which, except inadvertently, I have never departed. The position is this: If South Australia persists in adhering to the honorable member (Mr. Glynn's) amendment, I have a perfect right in honour to hold myself free to support any other amendment. On the other hand, if those honorable members accept the course which I indicated this morning, I shall stand with them in not voting for any limitation or any further definition of the trade and commerce clause. I believe that is the solution which is best for South Australia, for New South Wales, and for the whole Federation, when established. Let us take this course and delay no longer. Let us do something to settle this matter as soon as we can. Why not deal with the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) at once? Take the sense of the committee whether it should remain. It will involve my moving a motion to put myself in order. If it does remain, those who wish to see it out, and who would prefer to rely on the trade and commerce clause, will have their hands untied, and will be free to support any amendment which will, in their judgment, prevent the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) from having a dangerous effect. If, on the other hand, we obtain a reconsideration, and we do away with this amendment, we who think thus will be able to stand with South Australia, and I hope that a majority of the Convention will say that the trade and commerce clause is sufficient for us, and we will support that. To do that involves us in taking a step, and that step is to get rid of the question which prevents a reconsideration at once of the amendment of Mr. Glynn. I understand I can do that. At any rate, I would be able to do so in New South Wales, and I ask the opinion of the Chairman as to whether I cannot do it now. I propose that the Chairman should leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, after an instruction to the committee has been moved and dealt with. When the Convention resumes for that purpose I shall then move the suspension of standing orders in order to move the following motion: That it be an instruction to the committee that they have power to reconsider immediately the amendment in clause 52, carried on the motion of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn). If that motion be carried, I shall then move that Mr. Glynn's amendment be struck out. If I succeed in doing that I shall stand firm to the trade and commerce clause. I intend to make that proposal now in order to obtain some finality. During the luncheon hour there will be an opportunity to consider the proposal.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I would ask the honorable gentleman not to move the motion he has indicated until I make a few remarks.

Mr. BARTON. -

In courtesy, anything that my honorable friend asks for is immediately granted, but I hope we shall be able to take a step at once to deal with this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I have not yet put the motion, so that the honorable member is in order.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I, for one, certainly would not object to any request by the leader to take any course he thinks fit. He has the responsibility; but I want to point out to him and the other members of the Convention that, even although we may omit the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) to which he objects, still I feel, and I am sure a large number of honorable members feel, that we must have some declaration in our Constitution that water conservation and irrigation shall be protected.

Mr. BARTON. -

I quite understand that. My course is to move what I have indicated, and those who do not think with me will take the opposite course.

Mr. SYMON. -

This motion will not pledge any of us to support the striking out of the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn).

Mr. BARTON. -
I beg to move—
That the Chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again after an instruction to the committee has been moved and dealt with.

Mr. Reid. -
Is this a regular stage at which such a proposition can be made?

The Chairman. -
All that the committee will do will be to report progress, and ask leave to sit again. It will be for the Convention to say whether the standing orders shall be suspended.

Mr. Holder. -
I want to say a few words before the motion is agreed to.

The Chairman. -
The motion cannot now be discussed.

Mr. Barton. -
I am quite willing that the honorable member should have an opportunity of speaking.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was reported, and leave obtained to sit again after an instruction had been moved and dealt with.

Mr. Barton. -
I beg to move—
That the standing orders be suspended to enable me to move an instruction to the committee.

Mr. Holder (South Australia). -
The point which I wish to submit is this: As it appears to me, it is quite possible now to leave the clause as it was introduced, and to strike out the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn). After that, we may have the other clause proposed by the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales put in. That is, instead of having got nearer to the end, we shall get further away, and shall inflict greater injury on South Australia. I think a much fairer way could have been adopted. I do not want to impute unfairness to the leader of the Convention or anybody else, but it would have been fairer if the Convention had taken a vote on the motion of the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales, and after that vote the Convention could have decided what it would keep in - whether it would leave out both on the motion for the suspension of the standing orders, or what it wished to have done. That would be far preferable to this motion.

Mr. Barton (New South Wales). -
I did not take this course with a view of preventing the Convention from taking any action that honorable members might think wise in their judgment. I simply took this course to bring about some finality. I think I sufficiently explained before, that, while I shall endeavour to have the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) struck out, if after that the amendment of the Right Hon. Mr. Reid is moved and carried it would be only fair to reinsert the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) in front of it. I think the amendment of the Right Hon. Mr. Reid should be supported only as a definition of the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn). I hope that will meet the views of the honorable member (Mr. Holder).

Mr. HOLDER. -
That is right.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -
It seems to me we have got rather into a tangle.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Not at all.

Mr. REID. -
You are never in a tangle if you back on what you have done.

Mr. LYNE. -
I am sorry to hear the leader of the Convention say that if the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) were struck out he would oppose the carrying of the amendment by the right honorable member (Mr. Reid). The remarks which fell from the Right Hon. the Premier of Victoria showed clearly that there should be some definition in this Bill.

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -
On a point of order I submit that the question before the Convention is the suspension of the standing orders. If the standing orders are suspended then would be the proper time to discuss whether or not an instruction should be given to the committee. Any reasons now given should be reasons as to suspending the standing orders.

The PRESIDENT. -
The honorable member (Sir Richard Baker) is perfectly right, and the honorable member (Mr. Lyne) is out of order. He must confine his remarks strictly to the question.

Mr. LYNE. -
Before you gave your decision, sir, I wished to point out that I was only following the remarks made by the leader of the Convention, and if he was out of order, of course I am.

The PRESIDENT. -
I should probably have ruled the leader out of order if objection had been taken, but I think more latitude is properly allowed to the leader of the Convention than to other honorable members.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

The objection there is against the retention of my amendment in the Bill applies with greater force to the suspension of the standing orders. It has been objected that my amendment was agreed to too hurriedly. My answer is that I had my amendment printed for four days, and it was circulated publicly as well as privately among honorable members. It was considered by the majority of the New South Wales representatives, so that the point as to want of consideration absolutely fails. We are now asked to cancel what was done on the motion for the suspension of the standing orders, which ought to be founded absolutely on urgency.

Mr. BARTON. -

I did not take the stand mentioned by the honorable member that his amendment was decided hurriedly.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I did not say that the honorable member (Mr. Barton) had urged that, because he is always perfectly fair and clear, but it has been strongly urged that my amendment was carried without due consideration, and that therefore it should be cancelled. We are now asked to strike it out without proper consideration. That position is utterly inconsistent with the arguments urged against the retention of my amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

[The President left the chair at one p.m. The Convention resumed at two p.m.]

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In pursuance of the procedure being adopted, in accordance with my former motion, I now beg to move-

That it be an instruction to the committee to have power to reconsider immediately an amendment of clause 52.

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -

In seconding the motion perhaps I may be permitted to address a few words to this Convention. The occupancy of the position of Chairman of Committees has not only debarred me from expressing my opinion upon all the important questions which have come before this great meeting, but has prevented me from making a single speech, and a portion of making eighteen speeches upon one point. Therefore, perhaps, without any intention whatever of prolonging the debate, an without any intention, as I shall show by-and-by, of going into the merits of this particular question, I crave leave to make few remarks upon the present position. Now, after having listened, I think patiently for eight days to a very long and able debate-I have come to the conclusion that if the suggestion of the leader of the Convention (Mr. Barton) is adopted, the battle between South Australia and New South Wales (if I may so express myself) will be drawn slightly in favour of South Australia. I look upon it that the striking out of sub-section (31) as it existed in the Bill when we first met in Melbourne is a distinct advantage—or it might be a distinct advantage—to the colony of South Australia, inasmuch as that sub-section was a limitation of the powers of the Fede... people of New South Wales quite as much as the difficulty of obtaining the consent of the people of South Australia. For years I have laboured in this great cause of federation, for years it has been one of the dearest objects of my life to see Australia united under a Federal Government, and I hope that when I depart hence I may have been amongst those who have contributed to that great result; but what good is it to me for the people of South Australia to consent to the Constitution if the people of New South Wales say "No"? The cause will stand just where it does now. I urge on the Premier of New South Wales that he should take the same position as has been before suggested to him, that he should consider the difficulties of the delegates of South Australia, as well as the difficulties of the delegates of New South Wales. Now, sir, I do not wish to say anything more. I am greatly tempted to give my opinions concerning the merits of this question. But, having heard everything that has been said—everything which I think it is possible to say with effect on both sides, I do not believe that I should advance the cause of federation were I to reiterate the opinions which have been so much better put by other speakers. If there is one thing which has struck me when listening, as Chairman of Committees, to this debate, it is how very true the old proverb is that, although "speech is silver, silence is golden." I am perfectly certain that if some of those honorable members who have, at such great length, reiterated, over and over again, their opinions, were to put themselves in the position of listeners, they would arrive at the conclusion that the oftener they have reiterated their own ideas, the less effective their speeches have become. I hope that this matter will be settled, at all events, so far as the present committee stage is concerned, without any further debate, and any further delay, so that we may after going through the rest of this Bill if necessary reconsider the subject as it will stand if Mr. Barton's suggestion is adopted calmly and deliberately. We can then, if it is thought necessary, amend the Bill in such manner as we may think to be demanded by the interests of the people of the colonies from which we come.

The motion was agreed to.
The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The CHAIRMAN. -

As an instruction has been given to the committee that they shall have leave to reconsider the last amendment made in clause 52, I may state that that amendment was one for the insertion of the following words:

For the purposes of sub-section (1), waters shall be deemed navigable for trade and commerce which, either by themselves or in connexion with other waters, are in fact navigated permanently or intermittently for trade and commerce with other nations or among the several states.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not propose to occupy the time of the committee at any length. I think it will be seen that it will not be necessary for Mr. Reid's amendment to be moved if Mr. Glynn's amendment be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I think the proper course will be for the leader of the Convention to move that the last amendment made in clause 52 be reconsidered.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In accordance with your suggestion, sir, I beg to move-

That the last amendment made in clause 52 be reconsidered.

In moving this resolution I will say, as I have said before, that Mr. Glynn's amendment is a direction to the High Court in place of that open right of decision which, under the trade and commerce clause, I wish to be confided to the Supreme Court. For that reason I am against it. If it is not struck out I shall have to consider whether I should not vote for the amendment of the Premier of New South Wales as a proper limitation upon it; but if the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) is struck out, I do not see any necessity for the amendment of the right honorable and learned member (Mr. Reid).

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I think that it would be fairer to the committee and to myself, as the mover of the amendment which it is now proposed to strike out, if the amendment of the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) were considered first. It should be considered upon its own merits. At present a sort of threat is held out to us; but it seems to me that this is not the way in which a matter of the most vital importance should be dealt with. I do not think an in terrorem appeal of this sort should be made to us.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I indorse the remarks of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn). His amendment stands upon an altogether higher plane than any dictation to the Federal Parliament as to the relative importance they should give to navigation and irrigation. It appears to me that there are two sets of decisions with regard to the meaning of the term "navigability," and the committee is in doubt as to which set of decisions will be followed by the Federal Court, the English set, which limits navigability to tidal waters; or the American set, which extends navigability to rivers which are only intermittently navigable. It is of infinite importance to us that the decisions of the Federal Court should run along the lines most suitable to the conditions of this country—that is, the American lines. I think, however, that, unless the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) is retained, the decisions of the English courts will be followed.

The CHAIRMAN.

The proposal is that the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) be reconsidered. The honorable member can move, as an amendment on the section, that the amendment of the Premier of New South Wales be considered first.

Dr. COCKBURN.

I do not want to have the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) reconsidered, because I think it is essential to have those words in the clause. I was pointing out, in support of what the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) said, that there is a great probability that, unless his amendment is retained, the decisions of the Federal High Court will follow, not the lines we wish to see followed—those laid down by the American courts, where the conditions are similar to those existing here but the lines of the English decisions, where the conditions are quite different from our conditions.

The CHAIRMAN.

Would not the honorable member's remarks be more pertinent to the question "That the words be struck out"?

Dr. COCKBURN.

No; because I am contending that things should be left as they are. It is probable that the English decisions will be followed, for this reason: It is contended that uniformity in legal decisions throughout the empire, so far as that may be possible, is desirable. There will still be an appeal to the Privy Council upon questions arising between the states, and unless it is clearly laid down that the Supreme Court of Australia must determine the question of navigability upon the American, and not upon the English precedents, it is likely that whenever an appeal is taken from this court to the Privy Council there will be a reversal of judgment on the plea of uniformity. This is a most important matter, because if there were a reversal of judgment every time an appeal was made, it would be disastrous. Still, unless it were laid down in the Constitution that the American precedents must be followed, the Privy Council would undoubtedly adhere to the English precedents, and thus we should have a law applied which was altogether unsuitable to our conditions.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I simply wish to point this out with regard to our procedure. If the committee take the amendment of the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) first, which I understand from the Chairman they have power to do, this state of things will arise. I the amendment of the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) is carried, it will be tacked on to that of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn), and if, upon reconsideration, it is thought better to leave out the latter amendment, it will be impossible to reconsider the amendment of the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) without going out of committee to get leave from the House to do so.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I have had an opportunity of consulting some of the representatives of New South Wales, and I really feel so great a desire to avoid, if possible, the raising of questions which create strong feeling that I am quite willing at the present time-reserving to myself the right if the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) is kept in to move my amendment afterwards-in order that the committee may for the present get away from this business, to withdraw my amendment. I am anxious to take a course which will commend itself to the committee as relieving our friends from South Australia of difficulties which are not absolutely inherent in the nature of the case. Do what we will, we are bound to have difficulties; but I am sure that we are anxious to remove as many of these difficulties as possible. If I find, after consultation with my New South Wales colleagues, that we can rest satisfied with the attitude of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Barton), I am so desirous of maintaining an attitude in harmony with his, that I shall go the length of withdrawing my amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Do I understand that the honorable and learned member withdraws his amendment temporarily?

Mr. REID. -
Yes; and I shall be very glad if I can be convinced that I should withdraw it altogether. I am not in that state of mind now; but I should be very glad to be brought to that state of mind.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -
I understand—I want to be clear upon this matter—that the Premier of New South Wales withdraws his amendment for the time being, and that if the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) is not negatived he retains the option of moving it later on.

Mr. REID. -

I retain that option in any case. Do not let there be any misunderstanding about the matter.

Mr. LYNE. -

I gathered that the right honorable gentleman is anxious to consult with other members of the New South Wales representation to see if an arrangement can be made which will prevent the necessity for at any time moving it again, but that he holds the right of moving it again if he thinks fit.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We had better settle the question now, since we have been discussing it so long.

Mr. LYNE. -

I should like to see the amendment withdrawn for the present, in order that we may know what course will be taken in regard to the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn), and whether an arrangement can be made to prevent the necessity of moving the amendment of the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) again. If no such arrangement can be made, the amendment must, in justice to the colony which we represent, be moved again.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

As I understand the position of affairs, it is this: That the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) withdraws his amendment, and that the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) withdraws.

Mr. BARTON. -

The honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) will not withdraw his amendment, but we shall try to knock it out.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

It will come to the same thing. The right honorable member (Mr. Reid) reserves to himself the right to move his amendment later on, but I hope that we shall have no more of this nonsense, and that we shall come to a final vote now. We have been talking about federation, but what has taken place reminds me of the federation of Cain and Abel. We have had one colony, the bigger colony, trying to slaughter a smaller colony. We have been sitting here now for a good many days at the expense of the communities which we represent, and the rights of both South Australia and New South Wales are clear and distinct. I say, let these colonies go to the Federal Parliament and fight out this matter there instead of doing it here, and let us come to a vote straight away instead of continuing this humbug.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I rise for the purpose of ascertaining, so far as I can, the position of the different colonies in regard to this question. I understand that the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) says, on behalf of the colony which he represents, that it is possible that he may not move his amendment again, but that if he continues in his present mind he will move it. I understand, further, from the utterances of my right honorable friend from Victoria, that it is his intention to propose an amendment of the same kind, so that in any case we shall have to fight against this proposal, whether it is moved by the right honorable member (Mr. Reid), or by a representative of Victoria. Under these circumstances, is it tolerable that we should be asked to abandon the attitude that we have taken up?

Mr. REID. -

No one has asked you to do that.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I have never intended to abandon it, but I want the position made clear.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

Suppose, upon reconsideration, the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) is struck out, and that the amendment of the right honorable member (Mr Reid) is afterwards carried.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I understand that the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) is not going to move his amendment now.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But I understand that it will be quite competent for him to move it immediately after the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) is disposed of, if he chooses to do so?

The CHAIRMAN. -

He has asked leave to withdraw it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But if the right honorable gentleman moves his amendment, and it is carried, will it be necessary to get leave from the Convention to again consider the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn)?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Certainly. The committee has obtained leave to reconsider a decision which they have arrived at, and once they have reconsidered that decision they cannot consider it again without a second time getting leave from the Convention.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

The only question I am going to ask is—Would it not be competent, after the discussion of Mr. Glynn's amendment, for the Attorney-General of Victoria to move such an amendment as Mr. Reid has moved?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Certainly.

Mr. REID. -

But I have no intention of doing so, only on the recommittal of the clause.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I said the Attorney-General of Victoria—I did not say the Premier of New South Wales.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I take it that this is the position of affairs: Supposing Mr. Glynn's amendment is struck out, Mr. Reid having first got permission to withdraw his, there may be a motion for recommittal or reconsideration of the clause. Upon that, Mr. Reid would have an opportunity of moving his amendment, but at that stage Mr. Glynn would also have the opportunity of moving his amendment again. So that, after all, the danger which Mr. Kingston foresaw to the interests of his own colony would not arise.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We should have the debates all over again, though.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think so. I think that the statistics given by my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) this morning would probably prevent any repetition of the debates. I think that the statement I have just made makes the matter perfectly clear, and that we may as well proceed to deal with Mr. Glynn's amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I hardly agree with the leader of the Convention with regard to the position of affairs at the present time. We were discussing Mr. Reid's amendment, when we were suddenly stopped, and reported progress. Then we were directed to consider another question.

Mr. BARTON. -

Not directed, but told that we had power to consider it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes, we were told that we had power to consider another question. We desire now to reconsider that other matter; but we have before us Mr.
Reid's amendment, and we cannot very well consider the question of striking out Mr. Glynn's amendment until Mr. Reid's amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BARTON. -
You will have to give Mr. Reid leave to withdraw.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Yes, in order to enable Mr. Glynn's amendment to be dealt with. But, as soon as Mr. Glynn's amendment is dealt with, without any recommittal at all, it is perfectly competent for Mr. Reid, or any other member of the Convention, to move the amendment that we were discussing at the time we reported progress.

Mr. BARTON. -
There would have to be a motion to reconsider or recommit, because, supposing Mr. Reid gets leave to withdraw, and Mr. Glynn's amendment is struck out, the consideration of clause 52, for the present time, is at an end.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Why so?
Surely not.

Mr. BARTON. -
Because the question that would be put is that the clause as amended be agreed to.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
And then somebody could move a fresh amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -
But I take it that there is no desire on the part of anybody at this stage, to move another amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
This is the position, as I understand it, and I would like it to be clearly understood by the Convention: As soon as Mr. Glynn's amendment is dealt with, it ought to be competent, and it seems to me that it is competent, for Mr. Reid or anybody else to move an amendment in the terms of Mr. Reid's present amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. -
It is competent for any member of the Convention to move an amendment at the end of the clause which is not inconsistent with the provisions of the clause as they have been passed.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -
I am one of those laymen who have been waiting very patiently for the lawyers to finish what they have to say on this subject. It seems to me that, in justice to the South Australians, we ought to vote for the retention of Mr. Glynn's amendment. Then I would vote for Mr. Reid's amendment. It appears to me that after six and a half days' discussion we will be precisely as we were if we carry only Mr. Glynn's amendment.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

It seems to me that on this point of procedure we are getting into a fog.

The CHAIRMAN. -

No; the position is perfectly clear.

Mr. SYMON. -

What is the position?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Mr. Reid has asked leave to withdraw his amendment. Any one member can object, but if leave to withdraw is given, then the question will be that the amendment of Mr. Glynn be reconsidered. If that is disposed of, I shall put the question that the clause as amended stand part of the Bill. On that question any honorable member can move any amendment at the end of the clause not inconsistent with the clause. There is no difficulty about the position. It is perfectly clear.

Mr. Reid's amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. Barton's motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move that the following words, inserted in the clause, be struck out:

For the purposes of sub-section (1), waters shall be deemed navigable for trade and commerce which, either by themselves or in connexion with other waters, are in fact navigated permanently or intermittently for trade and commerce with other nations or among the several states.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I trust that the words of Mr. Glynn's amendment will be allowed to remain, and the reason I take this position is that it simply makes what we are told is the position under the Constitution perfectly clear. I appeal to the leader of the Convention to say whether he is treating all the representatives of the various colonies with that liberality and fairness with which he generally treats us? I would ask the honorable member to consider what is the position? We all attach the greatest weight to his every word and utterance, and I shall continue under all circumstances to do so. I have been very much impressed with what I have heard from him at a variety of times, and I was to a very considerable extent guided in my action in connexion with this matter by what he said as regards what would be the construction put on this Constitution without the words of Mr. Glynn's amendment. What we have done under existing circumstances is simply to put in words which make it abundantly clear that the construction for which he has so ably contended shall be the construction accepted by the Federal Courts. That is all we have done, and nothing more. And I ask him what reason can there be for altering his attitude in reference to it on any other clause of the Bill? He has resisted us time after time in our efforts to define the relative rights of the colonies with reference to irrigation and water conservation. Are they to be decided by the Inter-State Commission, the Federal High Court, or the Federal Parliament? But he has told us practically "Don't be alarmed, you have no cause for fear, this is the meaning of the Bill." Well, we put that meaning in so many words, and he did not raise the slightest objection to the insertion of those words. They are words which were practically borrowed from the amendment of the Attorney-General of Victoria (Mr. Isaacs), and to which no exception was previously taken by the leader of the Convention in the least, or by those who were more conspicuous in acting with him. Those, words were accepted by the Right Hon. the Premier of Victoria also. All we have done is to make that clear which the leader of the Convention said with great force was previously clear, and, under these circumstances, I ask him why should he now alter his attitude? Something has been said about the difficulty we shall have in recommending this Constitution to our respective colonies. I do not want to exaggerate those difficulties in the slightest degree, but I can assure the Convention that if I go back to my colony and tell them that the construction of the Constitution we have framed at this Convention will protect them in connexion with their rights, they will be sure to ask - "What authority have you for that statement?" I shall be able to say - "We have the authority of the leader of the Convention." They will further desire to know - "Did everybody agree with his opinion?" I shall have to reply "No." They will then ask - "Were they high authorities who differed from the leader of the Convention?" and I shall have to say - "They included the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales." Their rejoinder will obviously be - "Under these circumstances, why didn't you make it perfectly clear?" My answer to that must be - "We did make it perfectly clear. We put into the Constitution, so that all who run may read, the very principles which the leader of the Convention told us would be the conclusion which the High Court would come to on the subject." And the rejoinder I shall be met with will be-"Why were they not kept there?" To which my answer will have to be-"Because the leader of the Convention suggested that those words should be struck out." So that the subject will be left in doubt and difficulty. Now, I venture to submit that a subject of such vital importance, to which we have devoted six days of discussion, ought not to be left in doubt and difficulty. We ought at least to know what conclusion we have arrived at. If we cannot tell amongst ourselves, if it is going to depend on the following of American cases, which really have no binding effect on the court that we propose shall judge and determine this question, we shall be left in a sort of slough of difficulty, from which, as Constitution builders, we ought to do our very best to extricate the future people of this Federation.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I suppose I am called on at once to answer my honorable friend as to why
I object to this amendment, not having objected to it when it was first carried. Well, I have answered that question several times in advance. I told the Convention—and I have not the least doubt my word to this Convention is trusted—that I did not object to this amendment at the time, because I did not fully grasp the purport of it, and that, after more fully considering it, I now understand it in a different way. Now, there are two things which arise on this amendment. First, I think one objection to it is that, for a certain purpose, it takes out of the hands of the High Court the decision of what is or what is not a navigable river, and I say that it is only consistent with the attitude I have maintained throughout, with regard to the trade and commerce clause, that I should leave the ascertainment of what is a navigable river entirely to the High Court. But this amendment substitutes a declaration for the ordinary scope of the High Court in respect of part of its powers of adjudication, and to that extent I have objected to the amendment ever since I grasped its purpose. There is another objection.
The amendment tends to introduce further obligations. While, on the one hand, it substitutes a declaration for the ordinary powers of adjudication of the High Court as regards rivers, it introduces another factor which may to a large extent invoke further and more difficult questions for the High Court to adjudicate on, and that is in the use of the word "waters." Mr.
Glynn proposes that waters shall be deemed navigable under certain circumstances. What "waters" does that mean? In the first place, does it include lakes? Because, so far as a lake within a state is not part of the highway of a river, the lake is entirely within the jurisdiction of the state, and is not, on the subject of navigation, under the laws of the Commonwealth, unless you make it so by an amendment of this sort.
Again, the operation of the word "waters" is very difficult in another way.
There is not only the question as to whether it means "rivers" or not. If you said "rivers shall be deemed navigable" under certain circumstances you would have a clearer expression than you have in using the word "waters," because "waters" may be deemed to include the whole course of the river, and if the river is navigable in part only, we may increase the element of doubt and difficulty of judicial interpretation by inserting limitations and declarations like this.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think I had the word "rivers" in my amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. To sum up my remarks, I my say, first, as to the question of consistency, I have several times explained that it is quite consistent on my part that I should rely on this as a principle, that the High Court shall be deemed the arbiters who are to state what are, and what are not, navigable rivers, and how far they are navigable. The whole of that question is left to the High Court in general words, but if you impose these limitations, you will remove so much of the powers of the High Court from them, and the present amendment, which covers a lot by the use of the word "waters," may impose on the High Court difficulties which were never intended to be brought before them under the trade and commerce clause. So that, whether I look at the amendment one way or the other, I have an objection to it, and I think that it is only right that I should be relieved of all charges of inconsistency in maintaining the ground of principle that I took at the beginning—that is, that the trade and commerce clause is enough for us, and that the High Court should at all times, when the question arises, decide what is a navigable river.

Sir EDWARD BRADDO (Tasmania). -

I think we might have come to a decision, and a satisfactory decision, on these matters, within five minutes or so, if the pronouncement of my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) had been more definite in its terms—if he had given an unqualified engagement to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. REID. -

Good gracious! that is the very thing I would not do, not for you or a thousand Conventions. Really, upon my word, you are driving it pretty hard.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

It is that unqualified promise to withdraw the amendment of Mr. Reid which would justify the supporters of Mr. Glynn's amendment in agreeing to its withdrawal now.

Mr. REID. -

Very well, you must not calculate on it.

Sir EDWARD BRADDO. -

Then I shall vote for Mr. Glynn's amendment.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
In answer to Mr. Barton, I did not frame the definition of my amendment until after the most ample deliberation, and after having submitted it to two or three New South Wales representatives for their opinion. Some of the objections raised by members of the Convention representing New South Wales were covered by a word changed by the leader of the Convention. In the first instance, I used the word "navigated" in the original amendment; not "navigable." My reason for doing so was this: I thought that there might be a river in New South Wales which was perhaps navigable for a mouth or two in the year, but never navigated, and as I did not wish to bring such a river under the federal jurisdiction, except so far as subsection (1) would do so, I used the word "navigated instead of "navigable."

I am inclined to think, on second thoughts, you were right there, too.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I certainly think so. In making those alterations I only wanted to meet the just sense of the committee, regardless of whether the alterations were suggested by representatives of New South Wales or the Attorney-General of Victoria. I am still willing to agree to any modification which will not frustrate the object I have in view, if the terms of my amendment are considered ambiguous, which, after a careful examination of the American decisions, I do not think they are. My amendment was framed to cover what some might consider the prejudices of New South Wales as regards possible encroachments on rivers which do not form, either by themselves or by their connexion, navigable rivers-channels of commerce. Therefore, I allowed my amendment to be changed. In the first instance, I did not use the word "waters," but the word "river," as follows:

A river shall be deemed to be navigable if at times its waters, by themselves or their connexion with other waters, form and are used as a continuous channel for commerce with other nations or among states.

In that amendment the word "river" is the dominating or governing factor of the whole proposition-it is the substantive which covers what is predicative of it afterwards. In order to meet the views of the representatives of New South Wales

I altered my amendment into the form in which I have submitted it to the Convention. I will call honorable members' attention to another point of the question. It is evident that, with a care and anxiety which does them great credit, some of the representatives of New South Wales have striven to drag the Darling out of the federal control by hook or by crook.

Mr. LYNE. -
You are trying to drag it in.
Mr. GLYNN. -
Look at clause 95. Does that clause give to the state or the federal authority the jurisdiction over the Darling?

Mr. WISE. -
It is certainly our desire, but you extremists make it almost impossible for us to take federal action.

Mr. GLYNN. -
At Adelaide the discussion was not at all up to the point of seriousness which the importance of the question deserves. The honorable member (Mr. Wise) himself, by two interjections, said that what was wanted was that a definition should be put in, but now he changes to the other side of the contest. Conduct of that sort from members of the Convention justifies the statement that was made by a great statesman—that a politician, instead of being a pillar of state, is a weathercock, exalted for his levity and versatility, and of very little use, except to indicate the shiftings of every fashionable gale.

Mr. REID. -
We do not understand that.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I have great hope of passing this amendment, so long as the right honorable gentleman does not understand it. He is evidently falling back, however, on his original intention to cut down without any definition the scope of sub-section (1). It is his manifest intention to tie the hands of the Federal Judicature, whether there is a definition or not, as to the extent they can go in the application of American decisions, and to do so by direction beforehand that they are not to go the length of the Federal Judicature in America. I certainly a that this amendment shall be retained. I honorable members look at clause 95, they will find that the Darling does not come within the scope of the Judicial Commission at all—that the river question may be reopened there if this amendment is not put in. One of the Parliaments—South Australia—has asked for an amendment of this clause, to make the whole arterial system of the rivers come within the jurisdiction of the commission. I will press the amendment to a division. It is a fair compromise, and it is one which, I am sure, notwithstanding the opinions of the delegates from New South Wales, will receive very large support in New South Wales itself.

Mr. BARTON. -
Might I mention that if you leave the matter, as it is left, to the operation of the trade and commerce sub-section, I have a strong desire to take away the limitation with reference to rivers.

Mr. GLYNN. -
All this shows the necessity for careful consideration. If clause 95 were passed in its present form, it would completely abrogate the existing rights of South Australia.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It was carried with reference to sub-section (31) as it then existed.

Mr. BARTON. -

It was all right when sub-section (31) stood, but it will have to be reconsidered now.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I understand the reason why it was put in, but it certainly does not fit in with the wisdom of the committee at present. As I always prefer to hear my own opinions expressed by some other people, the committee will excuse me for quoting the final paragraph of an article which appeared in the Sydney Daily Telegraph of Wednesday last. That article seems to have been written with a sort of instinctive knowledge that Mr. Reid's amendment was to be tabled.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It would not be in order for the honorable member to quote any newspaper comments on our proceedings.

Mr. GLYNN. -

This is a comment on the general policy of the federal movement. Of course, it could not possibly be a comment on a thing which had not yet taken place, although, as I said, there seems to have been an almost instinctive knowledge that Mr. Reid's amendment was to be submitted. The article says-

The contention that the Darling should be used exclusively for irrigation, and not treated as a navigable river, would not only deny to South Australian and Victorian traders the right of using the northern arm of the stream above Wentworth, but it would deprive the lower portion of that stream of part of its natural water supply. To the greater part of the river, which flows from the Queensland border to the Southern Ocean, New South Wales would have exclusive rights, simply because at Wentworth its name was changed from the Darling to the Murray. We may take it for granted that no Federation would permit this, nor is there any purpose consistent with federation for which we require it. The right of New South Wales to conserve the overflow waters which come down in flood time for irrigation is one thing; the right of stopping the normal flow of the river is another. That the latter right would be any use to this colony, even if we had it, is doubtful, since it is on the conservation of the waste water that irrigation depends, not on the depletion of the navigable channel. This channel must be kept navigable by some one, and the proposal to put the responsibility on to the Federation, instead of being one to "rob us of our river," is really one to relieve the colony of a burden. The Federal Government would bear the expense of a work that would otherwise devolve upon New South Wales. Whether the Federation should carry out its control of the rivers by an Inter-State Commission, as proposed, or otherwise, is only a question of secondary importance. An institution of this kind to assess the different states in proportion to their interest in the rivers might be found useful or even necessary, but that is a matter which could safely be left to the Federal Parliament. The thing that the Convention has to do is to provide a Constitution under which the navigable channels of federal rivers shall be federal property. What the Federation may do with them will then be for itself to determine.

Mr. LYNE. -
That is an article from the foreign trade paper.

Mr. GLYNN. -
The honorable member (Mr. Lyne) will again introduce his local politics into this national question. I only know this newspaper as a New South Wales organ, and it is contrary to the spirit of federal broadness with which this debate should be conducted to introduce local politics. I would ask is this question a South Australian question alone? Do not honorable members think that there is a great deal of force in what Mr. Holder has said, that the interests of Victoria are quite as much concerned as those of South Australia? Do they forget what was, said in Mr. Mathieson's evidence and in Mr. Pendleton's evidence to the Finance Committee, that by the destruction of the river traffic an investment of £200,000 in Melbourne would be destroyed? Mr. Pendleton also said that, whereas some of the trade goes to South Australia, a great deal of it goes to Swan Hill and Echuca, and that the bulk of the trade goes through Melbourne to be shipped to Europe. This has been raised as a question between South Australia and New South Wales, whereas the interests of Victoria are quite as much bound up in this amendment as those of South Australia. I ask that the amendment should be retained. It cannot be said to have been hastily considered, as it was two days in print, and it is an amendment which, without putting any limitation on the federal powers of the Judiciary, or making any extension of the powers of the Legislature, will satisfy the reasonable desires of South Australia.

Question-That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause—put.

The CHAIRMAN. -
In what I conceive to be the interests of the federation of these colonies, I vote with the Noes.
Question so resolved in the negative.
Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I desire to ask Mr. Reid whether he proposes to move the amendment standing in his name?
Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
In the interests of the subject of the amendment, I made up my mind to take a certain course, because I found the New South Wales delegation split up, and, at least half the delegation prepared to vote against me. I do not, as a rule, press things at the wrong time, when I am sure to be defeated, and, under the circumstances, I felt it necessary, in the interests of the amendment, that it should be postponed. I hoped also that I should find some method of reconciling my present fears with the policy of the leader of the Convention. I have a genuine desire, if I can, to do that, but if I find it impossible to bring my mind to the same attitude as that of Mr. Barton in the matter, it will be my positive duty to re-open the question at a later stage. The proceeding will then be a simple one. Those honorable members who are not in favour of carrying my amendment can refuse to recommit the Bill, and we need not have another ever-lasting river discussion. The question will simply be, shall we go into committee again in order to deal with Mr. Reid's amendment? If there is a majority against the amendment of which I gave notice, they will say no. I think I have taken a course in the interests of public business as well as in the interests of federation. Of course, if honorable members opposite are determined to move the amendment now, I will vote with them, but I do suggest to them that it would not be in the interests of the cause we all have at heart to do so at the present stage.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I regret I cannot agree with the right honorable member. It is evident from the way in which he puts the matter that hereafter we shall not get a straight-out vote on the question. He says that those who desire to defeat the amendment will be able to refuse permission to recommit. Many honorable members might reconcile it with their consciences to vote against the proposal to recommit, whilst they would not be prepared to vote against a straight-out amendment. In the interests of the producers a decision ought to be come to one way or another. We have discussed the question long enough, and we need not re-open it, but we should have it on record whether the Convention is prepared to put the interests of navigation before the interests of the producers.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is a vital matter.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It is, and we should have a decision upon it. I beg, therefore, to move-

That the following be added to the clause:-That no state shall be prevented from using or authorizing the use of any of the waters of navigable rivers for purposes of irrigation or water conservation.

This is Mr. Reid's amendment, with a slight alteration, necessitated by the fact that Mr. Glynn's amendment on which it was based has been struck out. If it is carried it will affirm the principle, and it will be necessary at a later stage to add words to define navigability.
Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I am entirely with the Premier of Victoria in the object that he proposes to gain by the amendment, although I am in doubt as to whether this is a time at which the right honorable member will obtain that support for it, or some modification of it, that it really deserves. The whole issue can now be summed up in the two antithetical propositions which have been submitted. The proposal to leave sub-clause (1) as it stands appears to impose upon the Federal Government and upon the Federal Parliament the obligation of dealing with those questions which affect the rivers of Australia solely with a view to trade and commerce, or, in other words, solely with a view to the carriage of goods and the navigability of those rivers. The amendment of the Premier of New South Wales, which has now been adopted, with a verbal variation by the Premier of Victoria, means that exactly the reverse principle of interpretation would apply, and that irrigation would acquire paramount importance in all places, at all times, and under all circumstances, in any interpretation which the High Court would feel called upon to give in any matters dealing with the rivers of Australia. These two views represent the opposite poles, and yet it is quite possible, having regard to the growth of Australia, to the inevitable change of circumstances, and to the vast increase of knowledge of our water resources-leading us as we may hope to a wiser use of our water than we have made in the past-that at some time, and at some places, navigation would be the paramount interest, whilst in the same places, at a later stage, and in a more developed condition of the country, irrigation would be paramount. It may well be that in one part of the stream where navigation is being maintained without loss to irrigation, navigation should always remain the paramount interest, and it also may well be, and must be in the majority of cases, that irrigation will gradually more and more and finally everywhere become the paramount and indeed the sole consideration. It seems to me that either the proposal to retain the clause as it stands or the proposal which has now been fathered by the Premier of Victoria may bear harshly and injudiciously upon the future river development and improvement of Australia. I would suggest to both parties-to those who, like the representatives of South Australia, feel that navigation is for the time being their chief interest, although they recognise the future of irrigation and to the representatives of Victoria and New South Wales, who hold that in most parts of the country irrigation is now the great interest, and navigation is secondary if not tertiary-that a sub-section might be framed which would allow of the decision as to which should be the paramount interest being determined on the facts of each case at the time. There are grave difficulties. In making this suggestion to-day to a number of honorable members, in order that it might be thought over, I put it before them in this rudimentary condition, and have not yet endeavoured to elaborate it into a form of words.

Mr. SYMON. -
Do not you think the High Court would take this into consideration?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I am coming to th

Mr. WISE. -
The honorable member forgets that sub-section (8) of clause 73 gets over all that difficulty.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
The issue need not arise between states.

Mr. WISE. -
Yes, it would, if the legislation of one state injured the other.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
That may not be the case.

Mr. WISE. -
Then there is no difficulty.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
There may be a very great difficulty. Suppose that either through individual action or through state action a question arises as to the diversion of water in the state, and that the High Court has to consider whether that diversion is justifiable, what would be the criterion which the court would apply It would look to this Act, and would say-"What we are charged to do is to maintain the trade and commerce of the Federation. That is the first principle of the Federation, and that can only be maintained by navigation. This proposed diversion, good and useful in itself, perhaps enormously more valuable than navigation, is not one of the matters referred to us; it is not a matter which we are directed to take into account, and consequently, although we recognise that, on the facts, the diversion either for conservation, or what we call in Victoria stock and domestic purposes, or for irrigation-although we recognise the enormous importance of this work, yet, as it may interfere with navigation, we are bound to hold that it cannot be carried out."

Mr. DOBSON. -
It is a very narrow view.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It may be said that it is a very narrow view, and it is. When the difference is pointed out between our circumstances and the circumstances of America, in which, when a Constitution closely resembling this as regards the sub-clause regarding commerce was first formulated, irrigation was not foreseen, we may well doubt whether a Constitution which has worked well in east of that country, but which worked very unsuitably in the west the best for us to adopt without any reference to the uses of the water. Can it be left without even a reference in the Constitution. If it be necessary, I will go to the full length with my colleague (Sir George Turner); but take this opportunity to suggest that if we had time to consider the situation, we should find it possible to introduce a sub-section which would make it clear to the High Court that it was called upon to consider questions of irrigation and water conservation as well as questions of navigation; and on the facts—that is, on the evidence as to what the state of things was at the time—as to what the interest of that particular part or the whole of Australia demanded—to decide which should be the paramount user-navigation or irrigation.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Is not that a question of policy?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Not wholly; it is a question of fact. The broad question is what should be done which will be most advantageous to those who use the water for one purpose or the other. It narrowly approaches a question of policy, but there is a dividing line. The question as to which is the most meritorious use of the water at that particular time and place is purely a matter of evidence. The quantity of water available, the time in the year for which it is available, the amount of goods to be carried upon it, and a variety of circumstances, are all matters of fact. On the other hand, as to irrigation, the quantity of water, the suitability of the land for irrigation, the means of transport for produce, are pure questions of fact. It is generally admitted that the boundary dispute between Victoria and South Australia is one of the matters which might be remitted to the Federal Court. Is not that a question of policy? Has not that been an important question of policy in the past?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
No, it is a legal definition of a parallel of latitude.

[P.639] starts here

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Many will think that it involves a question of policy.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
It would be the construction of a document.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No. The document is clear, but the difference is as to the interpretation. Take the interjection of my learned friend (Mr. Wise), that every dispute between states may be referred to the High Court. If the word "matters" embraces every dispute which occurs between states, it may easily be that matters of policy may be referred to the High Court.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Railway rates.

Mr. LYNE. -

It cannot be that, because you decline to allow railway matters to be referred.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I do not quite follow the interjection at the moment, nor is it necessary for me to do so. I say, in reply to those who urge that such an issue may possibly be an issue of policy, that issues which may embrace, at all events, quite as much policy may possibly have to go before the High Court.

Mr. WISE. -

It has been held in the United States to mean "all controversies, whatever may be their nature or subject."

Mr. ISAACS. -

Providing that they can show a law for it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Provided that they are capable of judicial decisions.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The courts cannot legislate-they interpret the laws.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I take it that this question as to which is to be the user of the water at any given place is a question of fact, a question of evidence.

Mr. SYMON. -

You could not possibly settle that in the Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I do not propose to try to settle it in the Constitution. What I say to many of my fellow representatives who are anxious to leave the decision of the question of the use of the rivers to the High Court is that the mere fact that a question of policy may be involved need not deter us from leaving to that court the determination of the question which should be the paramount user of the water at the particular time.

Mr. WISE. -

They can do that without our putting in express words.
Mr. DEAKIN. -
Possibly; but there can be no harm in adopting the suggestion of Sir George Turner, who desires to carry confidence to the settlers in the western parts of New South Wales, and perhaps in Victoria.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
All your argument has been against the honorable member as far as I can follow you.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
If my honorable friend will examine the report of my speech tomorrow, or give me an opportunity privately to expound my views, I will convince him that my proposition is not only consistent with what I have hitherto advocated, and with what Sir George Turner suggests, but is also one on which the representatives of New South Wales and South Australia may meet. It is a proposition which need carry no alarm to either. It is that we should put in the sub-section such words as would indicate to the High Court that in dealing with any questions arising out of the first sub-section so far as they affected rivers, it should be competent and proper for the court to consider the question as to how far any proposal in regard to the streams would affect irrigation or water conservation and distribution for stock and domestic purposes, as well as navigation.

Mr. WISE. -
We have been struggling for a week to find these words.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Most honorable members have been trying to do a great deal more; they have been trying to define the user beforehand, so as to bind the court to take either navigation or irrigation as the paramount use of the water. The form of words I suggest would leave it open to the court to decide which should be paramount—irrigation, water conservation, or navigation.

The only objection to that proposal is that it involves, as it undoubtedly does in some aspects, some questions which may be termed questions of policy. Nevertheless, they are questions which may be settled as questions of fact. If there is that confidence in the High Court which honorable members say they have, why should they fear to allow that body to decide which, in the circumstances of a particular place, or area, should be the paramount user of river water? If that power be already vested in the court, as some think, why object to put it in the forefront of the Constitution, in order to remove the objection which may be entertained by the agricultural population, naturally timorous, by their training compelled to be cautious, and liable at all times to take a depressed view of their own possibilities.
Why should we refuse to reassure them if, by so doing, we commit neither South Australia to forfeit any claim she thinks she has to the water, nor New South Wales to forfeit any control she has over her Darling streams, but place it in the power of the High Court to decide, on the question being raised, which should in a particular place or time be the paramount user of the water?

Mr. WISE. -

The facts are so varied and so uncertain that every form of words which has been or can be suggested will probably be a limitation on the powers of the Supreme Court, and not a direction to it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I do not think they need be. It is quite competent for my honorable friend, and I have every confidence in him-

Mr. WISE. -

I have tried and failed.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Let us simply bring before the High Court the question of irrigation and conservation, and leave it open simply on its merits. I would not attempt to decide in advance and for all cases which shall be paramount, but leave that to the High Court. Do not allow them to say that because there is no reference in this Constitution to irrigation and water conservation they are practically not to consider either, and that navigation being their sole charge everything is to be sacrificed to it. That is a construction which I cannot support, but it is a possible construction, and should be provided for. I do not wish to occupy the attention of honorable members any longer. This is only the third time I have spoken, although it is a subject with which I am as deeply concerned as with any other practical question before us. Without further developing the proposition, I submit it to my honorable friends from South Australia and New South Wales, in the hope that it will satisfy their constituents, that without setting aside their rights in any particular they may remit this question to be considered in a fair manner by that High Court, to which the leader of the Convention is always content to appeal. I am prepared to follow him, provided that the language of the sub-section is made a little more luminous and widened by the addition of words which will imply a reference of water conservation and irrigation to that tribunal.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I move-

That the committee do now divide.

The motion was negatives.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I have only to say, with regard to the suggestion of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, that after what I have already stated, and after the vote given for striking out the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn), narrow as that majority was, I feel bound to adhere to the position I took up, and to vote against this amendment. I was pleased to hear the Right Hon. Mr. Reid state that he had withdrawn his amendment, and that he would take another opportunity of considering whether he should again bring it forward. I think we may well leave the question to that consideration. I do not think that my right honorable friend is likely to bring it forward again, although he may think it necessary to bring it forward under the circumstances. I think it better to take that consideration, and now dispose of the matter by agreeing to the clause as amended.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I do not wish to take up much more time, and I should like on this occasion, as on all occasions, to fall in with the views of the leader of the Convention; but I feel that the eyes of Australia, and the eyes of Victoria certainly, are watching to see what is the determination of the Convention, and what is the mind of the Convention on this very important matter.

Mr. REID. -

We never know what the mind of this Convention is for three hours.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We have been debating this question for days, and many of us have been reproached. If we defer our decision, we shall merely open the way to further debate. That is to say, under the very best circumstances. But what may happen under the other circumstances? We may be deprived of the opportunity of ever coming to a clear decision on this question. That would be a calamitous result. During the debate on this question in the Victorian House of Assembly, I was very much impressed by a view taken by a very prominent member of that Assembly, when he stated more than once that although there were many lawyers upon the Convention, and many interests represented, yet he failed to find—I did not agree with him in this, but it was his assertion—any argument or stand taken on behalf of the producers of the colony. That statement has been watched very jealously. Apart from that statement, I think it is our manifest duty to make it clear without hesitation, and it seems to me without delay, that there shall be nothing in the way of conserving the water of Victoria for irrigation and conservation in preference to navigation. I do not want any doubt cast on that matter. I think a great deal of interest in this federal question will be lost, and a great deal of opinion will be turned the other way, by the mere fact of delay. We ought to come to a decision, and I trust in the right direction, and that we shall insist upon placing the interests of the producers—which are very serious in Victoria, as well as elsewhere—in the first position as regards the use of the water. I do not want to take up time answering certain legal Positions urged—I do not mean by the leader of the Convention, as I quite agree with his views to a very large extent, and almost wholly from a legal stand-point but I do think, whatever view may be taken of those legal positions, it is absolutely essential that we shall make clear and certain the right of the states to use their water for irrigation and conservation in the interests of the producers. I think we should only lose and not gain by deferring the determination of the question.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

Since my honorable friend insists upon taking the opinion of the Convention at the present time, which I think is very unfavorable for the success of his motion—in view of the duty which devolves upon us all to vote upon propositions according to our conscientious belief—I cannot deny the wisdom of the proposition which the honorable member puts forward. I have not concealed my belief that, as this proposition is dealt with, so will federation be dealt with, at least in one colony, and, as the Right Hon. Sir George Turner has taken upon himself the responsibility of asking for a straight vote now on the question, I certainly shall give him all the support
I can.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I shall say only one word, as my action might otherwise appear a little inconsistent. I intend to vote against this proposal, because I was always willing to confine the restriction in this matter to certain well-known rivers in certain parts of the colonies; but I certainly shall not be found giving my adhesion to a sweeping clause like this, which I believe strikes at the very principle of federation.

Question so resolved in the negative.
The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

We now, in the ordinary course of events, arrive at the financial clauses of the Bill. Honorable members will perhaps be glad to hear that there is a draft in print of the clauses founded on the suggestions of the Finance Committee, and that draft is now in the hands of the committee for consideration. I understand that by to-morrow or the following morning the clauses will be in their final shape so far as to enable them to be submitted to the Convention. In the meantime I propose that we should postpone the consideration of Chapter IV. - that is, the clauses from 81 to 98 inclusive-which will enable us to go on to the remaining part of the Bill. I therefore beg to move-

That the consideration of Chapter IV. be postponed.

If we get over Chapter V. before the financial clauses come back from the printer, I shall ask the Convention to next consider the clauses relating to new states.

The motion was agreed to.

Clause 99 was agreed to.

Clause 100. - All laws in force in any of the colonies relating to any of the matters declared by this Constitution to be within the legislative powers of the Parliament of the Commonwealth shall, except as otherwise provided by this Constitution, continue in force in the states respectively, and may be repealed or altered by the Parliaments of the states, until provision is made in that behalf by the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I propose to make one or two drafting amendments at this stage, as to do so will be a useful occupation of the time of the committee. I beg to move, first of all-

That after the word "All" (line 1), the following words be inserted:- "except as otherwise provided by this Constitution."

That is to say, I propose to remove the words quoted from the place where they are to be found lower down, and to put them after the word "All."

Mr. HIGGINS. -

What will be the effect of this amendment?

Mr. BARTON. -

The words now occur lower down in the clause, which, as it reads at present, will have the effect that the words "except as otherwise provided by this Constitution" will apply only to the phrase with which they are connected, namely, "continue in force in the states respectively," and not to the further words "and may be repealed or altered by the Parliaments of the states." But if the position of the words be altered as proposed by me they will affect the whole clause.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I should like to submit what seems to me to be a very important matter for the consideration of the leader of the Convention. This clause, as honorable members will see, is one of vital importance. At first sight I was strongly opposed to it, but I see that it is necessary that some such clause should be inserted, inasmuch as there will be state laws in force on federal matters until the Federal Parliament chooses to legislate; a period of uncertain duration—perhaps of long duration in some cases. Certainly it is necessary that a state law shall be in force until the federal law shall be enacted. It is also necessary that this clause should be inserted, because it may happen that a state law will deal with a matter which the Federal Parliament has not legislated on, and in such a case the state law should remain in force. Of course it was seen that questions might often arise as between state laws and Commonwealth laws, and the point I wish to emphasize is that the clause should be limited as to subjects within the legislative powers of the Commonwealth. I suggest that it should read—

When a law of the state upon a subject within the legislative powers of the Commonwealth is inconsistent with the law of the Commonwealth, the latter shall prevail and the former shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be invalid.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It could not be inconsistent otherwise.

Mr. REID. -

Take the matter of irrigation and navigation. The question of irrigation is not within the legislative powers of the Commonwealth, though navigation clearly is. Suppose there was a Commonwealth law dealing with navigation and a State law dealing with irrigation, as they both affect the same it the law of the Commonwealth upon some other matter infringes upon a state law affecting a matter of exclusively state concern the state law must go under.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I would suggest to the leader of the Convention that the amendment suggested by the Premier of New South Wales is not necessary. It is implied that the law of the Commonwealth is a law within the legislative power of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Otherwise it is not a law.

Mr. REID. -

It is a law until it is declared not to be a law.

Mr. SYMON. -

Clause 101 is merely declaratory. If there is any inconsistency between a law of the state and a law of the Commonwealth it is for the High Court to determine which shall prevail, and the court will, of course, be bound to consider whether the law of the Commonwealth is, or is not, within the legislative power of the Commonwealth. If it is not, it will be null and void. The clause is necessary to establish in the Constitution the principle that where the Commonwealth legislates within its legislative power its laws must prevail.
Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

It was decided in the case of Norton v. Shelby County that an unconstitutional law of Congress is no law. Any law of the United States which is unconstitutional is illegal, because it is forbidden by the Constitution, and may, therefore, be disregarded. If the law of the Commonwealth is constitutional it will necessarily over-ride the law of the state. The clause will not give a law of the Commonwealth either validity or invalidity.

Mr. REID. -

Then it is not wanted.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is merely declaratory. The clause was agreed to.

Clause 102. - (Powers to be exercised by Governors of states.)

Amendment suggested by the Legislature of Tasmania-

Before "all" insert "The powers and authority of the Executive Government of each state shall be exercised by the Governor thereof, and."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I doubt very much if the clause requires the insertion of a provision of this kind. The Constitutions of the several states provide for these matters, and except so far as this Constitution expressly touches theirs, there is no occasion for the declaration of anything contained in them. I take it, too, that the next clause saves the Constitutions of the several states in the widest form.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I should like to ask the leader of the Convention whether it would not be possible to provide in this clause that the powers and functions at present vested in the Governors of the states should continue to be so vested? The intention of the clause is to declare that nothing in the Constitution shall be taken to impliedly abrogate any of the powers or functions of these Governors, but what it really says is that these powers and functions shall not be altered except by or under the authority of the various Parliaments. I suggest that the words "as if this Act had not been passed" should be added to the clause.

Mr. BARTON. -

I will take the matter into consideration.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 103. - (Saving of Constitutions.)

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I wish to make the clause read in this way:-
The Constitution of each state of the Commonwealth shall, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, continue as at the establishment of the Commonwealth until altered by or under the authority of the Parliament of the state, in accordance with the provisions of its Constitution.

That is a mere simplification of the clause.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I think it would be better to strike out the clause, and to insert the amendment as a new clause.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I would ask is the clause necessary? There is nothing in the Constitution which gives the Federal Parliament power to alter the Constitutions of the states. The clause may merely stereotype some of the evils in the existing Constitutions. Now, by conventional usage, there is a capacity for growth in all these Constitutions.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
A Constitution remains as it is until altered.

Mr. GLYNN. -
But there are additions to Constitutions which are independent of Acts of Parliament. We have, in addition to the British Constitution, an Act of Parliament, but that does not destroy those other peculiarities of the Constitution, which are the result of repeated breaches of all rules. We can have an alteration of the Constitution without the intervention of the British Parliament. The clause provides that the Constitutions of the several states of the Commonwealth shall continue as they were at the establishment of the Commonwealth "until altered by or under the authority of the Parliaments thereof," so that the Constitutions of the states may be altered by the Parliaments of the states or by the Imperial Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -
But only "in accordance with the provisions of their respective Constitutions."

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
I have always argued against the latter part of this clause, because it is stereotype the mode of altering our state Constitutions. When this Commonwealth is called into existence the power of the various states with regard to all legislation of an external character—all legislation affecting shipping and immigration, and other legislation which concerns the empire at large—will be taken away from them, and I do not see why, under the new Constitution, the Parliaments of the various states should not have the power of altering their Constitutions in any way they desire.

Mr. BARTON. -

There is nothing to prevent that.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

At present, if any state wants to alter its Constitution, even as regards a purely local affair relating, say, to the manner of the exercise of the suffrage, it has first to have an absolute majority in its own Parliament, and then to go through the tedious process of a reference to the Imperial authorities. Now, seeing that under this Constitution all matters which really concern the outside relations of the state will be removed from the legislative powers of the state, I do not see why the states should not have the power to alter their Constitutions at their own will. They will only have power to deal with purely local concerns. I certainly think that we might very well strike out all the words after "Parliaments." That would accomplish the object I have in view.

Clause 103 was struck out.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think it might be well to adopt the amendment suggested by Mr. Symon. There is a small portion of the amendment I left out inadvertently, I now beg to propose it, as follows:-

The Constitution of each state of the Commonwealth shall, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, continue as at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or as at the admission or establishment of the state, as the case may be, until altered in accordance with the provisions of its Constitution.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

If this clause were not in the Bill at all, would not the Constitution still remain the same?

Mr. BARTON. -

I am not quite sure of that, and there are a great many people who, reading a Federal Constitution, are apt to call out, as we constantly hear them crying out in the colony from which I come-"They want to take from us our rights and liberties under our Constitution, and give us nothing back." That is to say, there is a considerable demand for an express declamation on the face of the Federal Constitution that the states shall keep their Constitutions, and also have power to alter them if they want to do so.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

You might stop at the word "altered."

Mr. BARTON. -

I think Mr. Symon's suggestion is the correct one.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The states that are established after federation will not want that.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, because they will come in under such terms as may be arranged between them and the Commonwealth, but they should come in under the same guarantee as those who originally joined, as far as their Constitution is concerned.

Mr. Barton's new clause, in lieu of clause 103, was agreed to.

Clause 104 - The provisions of this Constitution relating to the Governor of a state extend and apply to the Governor for the time being of the state, or other the chief executive officer or administrator of the government of the state, by whatever title he is designated.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I have a new clause to propose in regard to the office of state Governor.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It would be better to leave all the new clauses, except the new clauses proposed by the several Parliaments, until we have gone through the Bill. That is the practice in some Parliaments, and I think it would be more convenient if we were to adopt that course here.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Many new clauses have been dealt with to-day besides those suggested by the Parliaments of the colonies. Is that not so?

The CHAIRMAN. -

No, we have not put in any such new clause except as a matter of drafting.

Mr. BARTON. -

And they are really embodiments of amendments of clauses.

Clause 104 was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The House of Assembly of South Australia have suggested the insertion of the following new clause, to follow clause 104:-

A member of the Senate or House of Representatives shall not be capable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of any House of the Parliament of a state.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Did we not deal with this question in the early part of our debates in Sydney?

Mr. BARTON. -

No, we did not get so far as this in Sydney.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The question was discussed.

Mr. BARTON. -
No, this is the converse of the question we discussed on that occasion.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -
I trust that this amendment will not be agreed to. We are framing an Imperial Act. If the local states do not choose to enact a provision of this kind, they need not do so, and it seems to me that for us to provide they shall not legislate on the question would be an unwarrantable interference in local matters.

The amendment was negatived.

Clause 105. - The Parliament of a state may at any time surrender any part of the state to the Commonwealth, and upon such surrender, and the acceptance thereof by the Commonwealth, such part of the state shall become and be subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Commonwealth.

Amendment suggested by the Parliament of Tasmania-
Omit "the state" (line 2), and insert "its territory."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I should like to hear some explanation of this amendment.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK (Tasmania). -
I do not think I ought to be called upon to explain any of the Tasmanian amendments, inasmuch as I was not present in either House when the amendments were made. I should prefer that some honorable member who was present and who heard the arguments pro and con. should give the explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. -
This is only a verbal amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -
"Its territory" means the same thing as "the state," and we had better keep what we have got.

The amendment was negatived.

Clause 106. - After uniform duties of customs have been imposed, a state shall not levy any impost or charge on imports or exports, except such as may be necessary for executing the inspection laws of the state; and the net produce of all imposts and charges imposed by a state on imports or exports shall be for the use of the Commonwealth; and any such inspection laws may be annulled by the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

Amendment proposed by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia-
After "customs" (line 1), insert "and excise."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
On this clause there was considerable discussion in Adelaide as to the words which should be used to describe the charge that should be levied on imports or exports. Honorable members will remember that there was considerable difficulty in finding apt words which would prevent taxation legislation by a state, and at the same time not prevent the state from making such charges as might be necessary for services connected with the inspection laws, whether an article was entering or leaving the state. The words used are-"a state shall not levy any impost or charge on imports or exports except such as may be necessary for executing the inspection laws of the state." The clause might be safer if it read-"any impost on exports or imports with the exception of any charge which might be necessary for executing the inspection laws." I desire to draw the attention of the committee to the matter at the present time, because this is not so much a question of drafting as of the real intention of the committee with regard to the extent to which it will limit the power of the state-

The CHAIRMAN. -

The first amendment we have to consider is that suggested by the Parliament of South Australia to insert, after "customs" (line 1), "and excise."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The amendment, I would suggest, is unnecessary. It may be that in framing its first Tariff the Commonwealth will not impose any excise duties, but it must impose customs duties, which must be uniform. The phrase the Drafting Committee have used throughout is-"after uniform duties of customs have been imposed."

Mr. ISAACS. -

That phrase is sufficient.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. Assuming that in imposing duties of customs the Parliament exercises its powers of imposing duties of excise, that would not make this phrase a misdescription. The insertion of the words "and excise" would seem to imply a direction to the Commonwealth to impose excise duties at the same time as customs duties. That is a matter that must be left to its discretion.

The amendment was negatived.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales:-
Omit all the words after "state" (line 4) to the end of the clause.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

As far as I can gather, the Legislative Council of New South Wales wish by this amendment to strike out a salutary provision, that is the provision that, if a state chooses to levy any sort of impost on imports or exports, the proceeds shall not go to the state but to the Commonwealth. That takes away from the state any financial interest in infringing the free trade of the Commonwealth. The intention which actuates the amendment seems to be that there should be a power left in any state to defeat the financial legislation of the Commonwealth. Of course, I am not responsible for the amendment. It has only to be looked at to be negatived. If you leave to the states the power, not only to levy impost of this kind, but to put into its coffers the proceeds of them, you give the States an interest in defeating the financial legislation of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Would the clause allow a state to make regulations as to the tick pest in the case of cattle coming from one state to another?

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think it is the intention of the clause to prevent any charge that may be made for executing the inspection laws.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I mentioned the other day that it had been decided in the United States, in the case of Brown v. Houston, 114 United States Reports, 622, and in other cases, that the prohibition of this clause does not extend to goods carried from one state to another. It applies exclusively to articles imported from foreign countries. It would, therefore, have no relation to cattle coming from Queensland.

Mr. BARTON. -

So far as it is an impost.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The clause will not refer to that at all. In the United States it was decided on the words "imports or exports," and Mr. Justice Nelson delivered a long judgment. There is a definition in the United States Constitution that this may be done by the states with the consent of Congress. We have struck that out. The object was that no state should put on any customs or other duties on any goods coming from abroad, excepting for inspection or for sanitary purposes. A state must recoup itself for the expenses incidental to inspection, and the states are therefore given power to put on such charges as are necessary to cover the cost of inspection. In order to insure that a state does not go beyond this power, and to test its bona fides, if the charges originally imposed exceed the cost of inspection the state is required to pay the surplus into the coffers of the Commonwealth. The state has, therefore, no inducement whatever to make too high a charge. And further, if it chooses, under the guise of such a law, to put on a heavy duty and be content to pay the surplus into the coffers.
of the Commonwealth, the object being to keep out foreign goods, the Commonwealth has power to annul the law altogether. Now, we have carried that principle into this clause. In America they have made no provision in the corresponding clause for keeping out goods, cattle, and so on as between the states. There is a general police power, and cases have arisen with regard to Texas cattle and the pest there, and very strange conflicting decisions have been given. I think, from what I understand to be the intention of Mr. Holder, we ought to have power, if it is not clearly contained elsewhere, to use our police force to keep out pests, whether they come from another colony, or whether they come from abroad, leaving full power to the Commonwealth Parliament to annul those laws if it thinks them to be prejudicial or carried beyond the fair intent and purpose of the clause. What I want to do is to make it clear to the committee that, as the clause stands, if the American decisions were followed, it would not include the power to keep out, say, Victorian grapes from South Australia, on account of phylloxera; or, if Queensland is in the Federation, to keep out Queensland cattle—of course, if Queensland were not in the Federation it would apply—and it would not enable Western Australia to keep out Victorian apples or codlin moth. It is only fair to point that out lest some honorable members should think that it goes further than it does.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I quite agree with my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) in the opinion that we ought to have a law to enable the states to impose some charge for inspection on the borders, so that both animal, vegetable, and other pests may be kept out. In such cases I should object to see such a limitation as is included in the last two lines of the clause. I think it is quite fair that any profit arising out of any such charges should be paid over to the Commonwealth, but I do not think it ought to be possible, if a majority of the states are producers of certain things, and have certain diseases in those places, that they should be enabled by virtue of their majority to compel another state which may be free from those diseases to admit their produce within its borders. I hope that some provision will be made to allow inspection charges to be made on goods passing from one state to another, and that in such cases, at least, we shall not have the power given to the federal authority which is contained in the last two lines of the clause.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -

That view of the matter would just mean that the Federal Parliament would neglect its duties. Surely, if the Federal Parliament is doing its duty, and if the officers of the Commonwealth are doing their duty, it will be to their interest to circumscribe any pest, and to keep it within certain limits. If a pest or a disease is dangerous, the Federal Parliament will circumscribe it as quickly as possible, because it will be their bounden duty to do so. For instance, take the tick pest. The Federal Parliament, of course, would draw a cordon round the district in which it was raging, and would not allow the post to extend into other districts. And they would do that just as well—I think they would do it better and more effectually—as the state would, otherwise scares would be raised without any justification, and a great deal of trouble might be caused without any warrant for it. In these cases, if the arguments of Mr. Isaacs and Mr. Holder are adopted, then the state will have power to create difficulties, and when it is the bounden duty of the Commonwealth -

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

It is only when they do not pass a law that they can.

Mr. FRASER. -

Surely every one will recognise that it is the bounden duty of the Federal Parliament to deal with all sorts of dangers in the Commonwealth, and to deal with them more, effectually than a state can do. The Federal Parliament is the larger power, as it controls the whole Federation, and therefore it is its bounden duty to see that no part of the Federation is subject to any disability through pest or any other matter.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I think the amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and Assembly of Tasmania will probably meet all that is necessary in this case, and be more effective than any amendment of which I have yet heard. As regards what has fallen from the honorable member (Mr. Fraser), I would point out that it is impossible in all instances to make this question one of federal concern. The various states must take under their control and management certain matters which peculiarly belong to them, and which belong to them very often because of the local law, which will not be the law of the Federation. The clause as proposed by the Tasmanian Parliament provides for levying customs duties to meet the charges:—

For executing the inspection laws of the state, or by way of payment for services actually rendered in improvement of ports or harbors, or in aid of navigation.

I think that clause ought to recommend itself to the committee. The local authorities are to collect so much as is absolutely necessary for this very serious purpose, and are to hand over to the Commonwealth any surplus left after providing for this work, and, inasmuch as that covers everything so far as has been recommended, I would urge that this clause be inserted in lieu of the clause we are considering.
Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

We do not want to federate all our diseases, but at present, as far as I have been able to ascertain, there is no power either on the part of the state or on the part of the Federal Parliament to take such steps as may be necessary to prevent the passage of disease, which we are all agreed should be limited, as far as possible, from one state to another. I raised the question in Adelaide and Sydney that at present there is absolutely no power to prohibit the extension, say, of a disease like the tick; because it is not only necessary to prevent the introduction of diseased animals, but you have to make a prohibitory line over which no stock of any kind can pass from an infected district into a clean district. So in regard to phylloxera, it is not sufficient to prohibit the introduction of diseased vines, simply because you cannot possibly state by inspection whether there may not be among a number of healthy vines one diseased vine. It is absolutely necessary, in a case of this sort, to prohibit the introduction of the article named. I asked the leader of the Convention in Sydney whether he could point out any such power; but, as far as he could say at that time, there is no power either on the part of the state to protect itself against the introduction of a disease, or on the part of the Federal Parliament to prohibit the introduction of disease in this way from one state to another.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Clause 89 appears to be in favour of your view—all the trade and commerce shall be absolutely free.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

That means that trade is to pass untrammelled.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is very hard to say how widely you can extend that clause.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

In Sydney, the leader of the Convention suggested that clause 89 might be modified in some way to limit its application, and, instead of saying that trade shall be absolutely free, that the clause should read—

So soon as uniform duties of customs have been imposed trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth is not to be restricted or interfered with by any taxes, charges, or imposts. I think that implies a different application.

Mr. BARTON. -

I favour your clause, but it would weaken the operation of clause 89.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

In Adelaide I contended that the states should have this power of self-protection which is necessary to their industries. I failed in carrying that view, and in Sydney I contended that some power should be vested in the Federal Parliament to protect the states from disease. If there is no power under this Constitution, and unless we alter the clause as it stands here, or make provision in clause 52, we shall find that we have wiped away the power we have at present of confining diseases of cattle and vegetables to some particular part of Australia which is at present infected, and by these means disseminate them throughout our colonies. I think such an occurrence cannot be viewed without the deepest anxiety on the part of those interested in production throughout the colonies. I ask the leader to take this matter into consideration, and the Drafting Committee might, if they are not at present prepared to do so, devise a means of meeting the difficulty. I think the preferable plan would be to give the states this power, but if that is not adopted the power should be given to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I remember well that this question was raised in Adelaide by the honorable member (Dr. Cockburn), and there is a great deal in it. The section in the American Constitution is as follows:--

No state shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts made by any state on imports or exports shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States, and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress.

Then it goes on to other subjects, such as maintaining armies and levying war. A case which the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) mentioned appears clearly to go the length which he suggested, that is that this section as it exists in the American Constitution, or the parallel clause, does not deal with inter-state commerce but only with imports from or exports to foreign countries. That might be got rid of, as far as this clause is concerned, by a small amendment. For instance, after the words "imports and exports," we might insert "inter-state or foreign" or similar words. That will show clearly that the power was intended to be reserved to the states to deal with importation even from other colonies of such pests as have been mentioned. It might be as well between now and the next occasion upon which we deal with this clause to draft an amendment to meet the position.

Mr. Isaacs has referred me to a decision in America, in the State of Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U.S., 313, which goes this length:--

The statute of Minnesota providing for inspection within the state of animals designed for meat, by its necessary operation practically excludes from the markets of that state all fresh beef, veal, mutton, lamb, or pork, in whatever form, if taken from animals slaughtered in other states, notwithstanding the same may be sound and healthy. The result is that it thus directly tends to restrict the slaughtering of animals whose meat is to be sold in Minnesota to those engaged in such business in that state. This discrimination is an encumbrance on commerce amongst states, and is unconstitutional. It cannot be regarded as a rightful exertion of the police power of the state. A burden thus imposed is not to be sustained simply because the statute imposing it applies alike to the people of all the states, including the state enacting it.

That is a statute which applied to every animal, whether sound and healthy or not, entering the state and designed for meat. That does not apply to the case which arises under the clause with which we are now dealing. What we want here, I take it, is to see that the states retain power to deal with these pests not in the way of prohibition-and the law which was referred to in that case was a prohibition, and was therefore declared unconstitutional. But we want here a provision that the states shall be able to exercise their powers as individual states at proper places such as the ports and borders. That will not be an infringement of free-trade within the Commonwealth. The way to look at it is: Is it desirable that this power shall be placed in the Commonwealth or among the powers of the states? I am inclined strongly to the latter view. I do not think the word quarantine, for instance, which is used in the sub-section of the 52nd clause, is intended to give the Commonwealth power to legislate with regard to any quarantine. That simply applies to quarantine as referring to diseases among man-kind. I do not think it is intended to enable the Commonwealth to deal with such matters as the tick disease. It has been pointed out by the honorable member (Mr. Fraser) that the Federation should have that power. As far as I am at present advised, that would be a very unwieldy and difficult power for the Commonwealth to use at all. It requires the local knowledge which would only be possessed by the states Parliaments and Governments. I am in favour of the amendment suggested by the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs), and I shall prepare an amendment to make it quite clear that the states shall have power to deal with this matter, not by way of putting on imposts, but simply making charges to enable them to carry out inspection laws.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -

I desire to call the attention of the honorable member (Mr. Barton) to the manner in which this clause will affect harbor trusts and marine boards. I directed attention to this matter in Adelaide. I think this clause will prevent any state or body authorized by a state from levying any impost or charge on imports. We know that marine boards and harbor trusts are dependent for their revenues upon wharfage rates on imports. Although those rates are for services rendered, I am afraid that under the clause in its present form it would be impossible for a marine board or harbor trust constituted by a state to levy charges on imports. In the amendment suggested by the Assembly and Council of Tasmania there is a provision to meet this difficulty. As the honorable member (Mr. Barton) is going to amend the clause, I hope he will take this question into consideration.

Mr. BARTON. -
A wharfage rate is merely a charge for services rendered, and is no tax on imports.

Mr. HENRY. -
I shall not enter into a verbal controversy with the honorable member, but the language of this clause is that a state shall not levy any impost or charge. A wharfage rate is a charge on imports, and Mr. A.I. Clark prepared the amendment which was passed in our Parliament. That makes it quite clear that the state would have the power, when services are rendered, to levy a charge on imports. I hope that the honorable member (Mr. Barton) and other eminent lawyers will make this matter clear, so that no difficulty shall arise in future which might prevent marine boards and trusts throughout Australia from having the necessary authority to raise their revenue by means of a charge on imports.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I cannot lay my hand on the passage now, but in Adelaide I pointed out American decisions which would clearly apply to such a case as this. It was held that a charge of wharfage is not a charge on imports or exports. Here is one case, which is handed to me by my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Isaacs), the case of the Ouachita Packet Company v. Aiken, where it was held that-

A municipal ordinance which provides for rates of wharfage, to be measured by the tonnage of the vessel landing thereat and using such wharf, is not in conflict with the Constitution.

There is also the case of the North-Western Union Packet Company v. St. Louis:-

Where a municipal corporation or a state has by the law of its organization an exclusive right to make wharfs, collect wharfage, and regulate wharfage rates, it can consistently with the Constitution charge and collect such wharfage, proportioned to the tonnage of the vessel, from the owners of enrolled and licensed steam-boats landing and mooring at its wharfs constructed on the banks of a navigable river.
The effect is that wharfage is not an impost on imports, and a tax on imports is not in any sense a charge for services. A charge for wharfage made upon vessels coming into port is purely analogous to that which might be made for storage.

Mr. SYMON. -
But if designed sinisterly it would be declared unconstitutional.

Mr. BARTON. -
Quite so; but if it were a mere charge to enable the expenses of wharfage to be met—that is, for the mere use of a wharf for the time being—that would not be a charge on imports at all, and would not come under the clause. So that the objection would be met in either case. I would suggest that we might for the time being negative the amendment from Tasmania, which is a very long one, and I will see whether it is necessary to make some shorter amendment which will embody generally the same views.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The amendment before the committee is that suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales.

Mr. BARTON. -
I think the committee might very well reject that.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
The purpose of the Parliament of Tasmania will be effected by inserting the words "or by way of payment for services actually rendered in improvement or maintenance of ports or harbors, or in aid of navigation, after the word "state" (line 5). That would accomplish the meaning of the Tasmanian amendment. As regards the words proposed to be struck out by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, the position is somewhat anomalous if they are retained. Payment must be made, and the money must go to the Commonwealth; so that a man will have to pay although it will really be illegal to pay. It would be a question of payment under a law passed by the state, which law is bad. The man will

Mr. OCONNOR. -
That does not matter; he will have his action against the state.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, because the state took his money.

Mr. GLYNN. -
But the Commonwealth will have possession of the man's money, which should not have been paid at all. As Mr. Henry wishes me to do so, I beg to move—

That, after the word "state" (line 5), the following words be inserted:—or by way of payment for services actually rendered in improvement or maintenance of ports or harbors or in aid of navigation.

Suppose an improvement were made by New South Wales, by locking one of its rivers, surely it would be possible for New South Wales to charge tonnage on vessels passing through those locks? If such a charge could not be made by New South Wales, the improvement would not take place, for the reason that there could not be payment for services rendered.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I ask the committee to be rather chary of accepting the portion of the Tasmanian amendment referred to, because there is a vast difference between a charge for wharfage, which is for the maintenance of a wharf belonging to a state, and a charge in aid of navigation or for ports and harbors; because here you come upon ground on which there may be conflict with the rest of the Commonwealth. The insertion of these words might lead to such a conflict, would be very dangerous, and would not effect the desired result at all.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I beg leave to withdraw my amendment in order to give time for further consideration.

Mr. Glynn's amendment was withdrawn.

The amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales to strike out all the words after "state" (line,5), was negatived.

The amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania to omit the clause was negatived.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 107. - A state shall not, without the consent of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, raise or maintain any military or naval force, or impose any tax on property of any kind belonging to the Commonwealth; nor shall the Commonwealth impose any tax on property of any kind belonging to a state.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I do not know whether honorable members have fully considered the effect of the last two lines of this clause. The provision I refer to is:-

nor shall the Commonwealth impose any tax on property of any kind belonging to a state.

Under that provision the policy of some states would be to object to the imposition of direct taxation by the Commonwealth. If the leasing system were extended in other states as it is being extended in South Australia, the only property in those states that would be taxable would be the reversion of leases; and if the proposal were made in the Federal Parliament to introduce a tax on land, the states in which the leasing system did not exist

would say that the proposal was unfair in its incidence so far as they were concerned, because it would press upon them to a greater extent than on the states in which the leasing system had been extended. Therefore, the policy of the states so objecting would be to oppose direct taxation. The result of this would be to raise objections to direct taxation for direct burdens, which is, as it seems to some of us, a good policy.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -
I wish to ask, also, whether the particular two lines to which Mr. Glynn has referred would prevent the Commonwealth from imposing taxation?

Mr. ISAACS. -
On what?

Mr. LYNE. -
Direct taxation.

Mr. BARTON. -
It means Government property—the property of the state.

Mr. LYNE. -
It does not include taxes on private property?

Mr. BARTON. -
Not in the slightest degree.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 108. - States not to coin money.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of Tasmania—After "money" insert "unless the Parliament otherwise determines."

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -
I would like to point out a difficulty which might arise under this clause owing to the position of the bond holders of a State Bank such as that of South Australia. Under the State Bank Act the holders of mortgage bonds are entitled to pay off their debts to the bank with these bonds, but, while these bonds might be a set-off as between the parties, if there were a change of right—suppose the bank went into liquidation or assigned its debts—would the mortgage bonds still be legal tender for the payment of these debts?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
The subject of currency, coinage, and legal tender has been made a subject upon which the Commonwealth Parliament may legislate, and it will be very plain to honorable members that not only ought the coinage of a country living under a Federal Constitution to be uniform, but that its legal tender should also be uniform. The existence in a Commonwealth of a large number of varying descriptions of paper money is not desirable. It is a very wise provision that the credit of the Commonwealth, which might be seriously affected by what a state might do in this regard, should be kept within the hands of the Commonwealth. Otherwise it would be open to a state to make laws with reference to substitutes for the ordinary currency which would have a prejudicial effect upon the general credit of the Commonwealth. I take it that, so far as we can, we should prevent any such result accruing, and this clause, which is the counterpart of a provision in the American Constitution, is intended to do that. So far as bonds are concerned, I do not think that any difficulty could arise. I do not suppose that the bonds to which the honorable member has referred are actually made legal tender.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Any debts due to the bank may be paid off in the bank's own bonds.

Mr. GORDON. -

There would be no difficulty so long as there was no change of right. If, however, the bank went into liquidation the difficulty might arise.

Mr. BARTON. -

I should not think that any great difficulty would arise. The whole question would depend upon the relation of contract between the parties.

The amendment was negatived.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales-

Omit "nor make anything but gold and silver coin a legal tender in payment of debts," and insert "unless the Parliament otherwise determines."

The amendment was negatived.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 109-A state shall not make any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

An amendment of this clause, which has hitherto been passed without discussion, has been standing in my name for some time. I do not think the clause goes far enough. I should prefer the matter to be in other hands, but it is one which has excited a great deal of interest among a great many people, and it becomes all the more important because a strong effort has been made to have a reference to the Almighty inserted in the preamble of the Constitution. In the American Constitution they have gone further, and the first amendment of that Constitution contains these words:-

Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of a religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

Some people will think that it is idle at this time of day to pass a law to prevent the prohibition of the establishment of a religion; but it is not idle in the eyes of a number of people whose votes we should like to secure for the Constitution. The history of the American provision is very curious. I find that in Massachusetts, which was the home of the Puritans, there was a great discussion at the time of the Philadelphia Convention as to whether there should be a recognition of God in the Constitution. If, as seems likely, an acknowledgment of the existence of the Almighty is inserted in the preamble of our Constitution, it will be necessary to re-assure a large number of good people that their rights with respect to religion will not be interfered with.

Mr. GORDON. -

What is the honorable member's amendment?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It has been circulated for several days, and is to the effect that neither a state nor the Commonwealth shall make any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion or imposing any religious test or observance. Of course, we all know that a great effort has been made to have an acknowledgment of the Almighty inserted in the preamble. This is a very difficult subject to speak about in mixed assembly; but I must speak plainly, or not at all. This recognition of God was not proposed merely out of reverence; it was proposed for distinct political purposes under the influence of debates which have taken place in the United States of America. At the time of the Massachusetts Convention there was a long discussion as to whether the Constitution should not be rejected, inasmuch as it did not contain any reference to the existence of God, and Professor Fiske, in his work upon The Critical Period of American History, pp. 321 and 322, writes-

Next came the complaint that the Convention did not recognise the existence of God, and provided no religious tests for candidates for federal offices. But, strange to say, this objection did not come from the clergy. It was urged by some of the country members, but the ministers in the convention were nearly unanimous in opposing it. There had been a remarkable change of sentiment among the clergy of this state, which had begun its existence as a theocracy, in which none but church members could vote or hold office. The seeds of modern liberalism had been implanted in their minds. When Amos Singletary of Sutton declared it to be scandalous that a Papist or infidel should be as eligible to office as a Christian—a remark which naively assumed that Roman Catholics were not Christians—the Rev. Daniel Shute, of Hingham, replied that no conceivable advantage could result from a religious test.

[P.655] starts here
"Yes," said the Rev. Phillip Payson, of Chelsea, "human tribunals for the consciences of men are impious encroachments upon the prerogatives of God. A religious test as a qualification for office would have been a, great blemish." "In reason and in the Holy Scripture," said the Rev. Isaac Backus, of Middleborough, "religion is ever a matter between God and the individual; the imposing of religious tests hath been the greatest engine of tyrranny in the world." With this liberal stand firmly taken by the ministers, the religious objection was speedily over-ruled.
And now, sir, it will be observed that in the Constitution of the United States of America there was not any such recognition in the preamble, and it is proposed that there shall be in our preamble. I am very sorry that those who first propounded this addition to the preamble did not tell the people with what object it was to be put in. They, no doubt, were perfectly fair and honest in their object, but they had read more than most people as to what had happened in the state of America, and I think, in all frankness, the people ought to have been told that there was a direct object and purpose in view. Now, in 1892 there was a decision in regard to the New York difficulty which has put all the fat in the fire. It was this: There was a law passed by the state of New York, which was to the effect that there should be no labour imported from abroad for the purpose of employers in the state of New York. There happened to be a clergyman imported from England to fill the pulpit of a church in Broadway, in New York, and it was urged that this clergyman was a labourer imported from abroad.
Mr. SYMON. -
A labourer from the vine-yard.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
The vineyard idea strikes the honorable member forcibly, no doubt, after his experience as a vigneron. The result was that the question as to whether this clergyman had not been imported against the laws of the state of New York was brought up before several courts and gravely discussed. One court held that it was a breach of the Act to import the clergy-man from abroad, but the Supreme Court of the states, when the question was referred to it, held that it was not a breach of the law, and they also went on to say that Congress never meant to interfere with the importation of clergy-men, because that was a Christian country. And for the purposes of establishing that it was a Christian country all through the states of America they went into elaborate charters and documents to show that from the first it had been a Christian country, and of course they were able to show that most of the states had been founded by denominations for the sake of their own adherents. But what happened in consequence of that decision? There has been a recrudescence of religious strifes throughout the United States, which I could never have believed would have happened—a lifting of banners of those who wish to impose, for instance, a compulsory sabbath all through, in, and upon every state, and a lifting of the banner of those who oppose that movement.

Mr. FRASER. -

Which side are you on?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think the honorable member's interjection is beside the question, and wholly unfair. This matter may be put upon broad grounds, and not upon the matter of differences between us. I think that our feeling is that we ought not to do anything under this Constitution which will alienate from giving an earnest "Aye" to this Bill a large body of honest and good people, if we can avoid that without at the same time inflicting irreparable harm on the Constitution. I should prefer to rest on the fact that the powers of the Federal Parliament are limited under the Constitution itself, and that the Federal Parliament has no power to do anything except what is expressly given to it, or what is by implication necessary. But, although that was the case when this clause was put in, if there is inserted in the preamble an express recognition of the Almighty in the Constitution, the position which met the draftsmen of this clause will no longer be applicable, inasmuch as there will be in the preamble of this Constitution a declaration of a religious character, from which, as experience shows, a number of corollaries will be deduced, and upon which attempts will be made, from time to time, to pass legislation of a character which I do not think we intend to give the Federal Commonwealth power to pass. I think that, whatever is done in this matter, if anything is done, ought to be done by the states. I do not think we ought to interfere with the right of the states to do anything they choose, if they think fit to do anything; but I do think that in establishing this Federal Commonwealth we ought to take care to reassure people that there will be no interference with them. There is, I understand, in America, a large body of people called Seventh Day Adventists. There are a few here. Rightly or wrongly, it is not for us to judge, they hold a theory that they are not obliged to keep Sunday. They cannot afford two holidays in the week, and, therefore, they keep Saturday. Well, these people in America are excited beyond bounds at the attempts which have been made since 1892 to establish a compulsory Sunday in the United States. Here, these people are few in number, I believe—I do not know much about them—but I understand that they are exceedingly troubled over the fact that through putting the words in question in the preamble there may be an attempt to enforce the observance of Sunday upon them, whereas they observe Saturday.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Why not leave the words out of the preamble?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Well, as far as I am concerned, in order to gain for the Federal Constitution the votes of a vast number of good people, I am willing to support a proposal for the insertion of appropriate words in the preamble.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

But how many votes will you lose by doing so?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I cannot tell. Honorable members will see that in taking this course I am quite consistent. I want to do what is, at the worst, harmless, with a view to secure a great number of votes in favour of the Constitution. I say that, on the one hand, there has been, rightly or wrongly, a strong pressure brought to bear throughout these colonies in favour of the insertion of some suitable words in the preamble. At the same time, I feel that if we put these words into the preamble, without a safeguard in the Constitution itself, we shall be very likely to alienate a large force against us.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

I do not think so.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I am not sure whether the activity of mind in Tasmania is like the activity of mind that is sometimes manifested in large cities, but I can assure the honorable member that there is a good deal more of hostility which will be displayed to this Constitution, unless there is a safeguard inserted, than he thinks for. There is a tendency in these days to interfere more and more with a man's actions in all sorts of directions, to have rules of all kinds with regard to his economical relations. Well, it is not at all clear as to where the line will be drawn. If we interfere with a man's actions in his economical relations, it will be very hard to draw the line and say that he is not bound to act in a certain way with regard to religious observances. The question is an old question. Honorable members have thought it over very much, no doubt; but all I say is that we ought to put in the Bill words that will, at all events, reassure those who object to some of the words in the preamble of this Constitution. There is, however, I am bound to admit, a defect in the amendment I have suggested. My amendment, as printed, is as follows:-

After word "not" insert "nor shall the Commonwealth"; and after word "religion" insert "or imposing any religious test or observance."

I think we must qualify that in some way, because it has been said that it would void our imposing of the ordinary oaths in the courts and elsewhere.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I have an amendment to move on behalf of Tasmania, and also an amendment of my own. The clause we have before us says that a state shall not make any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion. It is quite possible that this might make lawful practices which would otherwise be strictly prohibited. Take, for instance, the Hindoos. One of their religious rites is the "suttee," and another is the "churruck," - one meaning simply murder, and the other barbarous cruelty, to the devotees who offer themselves for the sacrifice.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

The Thugs are a religious sect.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Yes. If this is to be the law, these people will be able to practise the rites of their religion, and the amendment I have to suggest is the insertion of some such words as these: -

But shall prevent the performance of any such religious rites, as are of a cruel or demoralizing character or contrary to the law of the Commonwealth.

The leader of the Convention is, I believe, in a hurry to conclude the evening's proceedings. I will leave the amendment with him, in the hope that he will be able to make something of it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The Finance Committee arranged to meet at five o'clock to-day. As we have reached our usual hour, I beg to move Mr. Chairman, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

PAPERS.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

A few days ago I laid on the table a paper containing financial and statistical facts relating to the colony of Western Australia. Since then an addition has been made to the paper. I believe that under the standing orders, it is not in order to amend or add to any document that has been laid on the table. I will, therefore, lay this amended paper on the table, and I beg to move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Papers by the Hon. Edward Pulsford, M.L.C., have been printed by order of the Convention. I find that, there are some additional papers by this gentleman that would be of considerable interest to honorable members, and I will lay them on the table. I beg to move that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention adjourned at five minutes past five o'clock.
Tuesday, 8th February, 1898.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

MONEY BILLS.

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -

I ask leave to lay on the table a paper on the powers and practices of the two Houses of Parliament (South Australia) in reference to Money Bills. It was prepared for the Constitutional Committee in Adelaide and printed, but, as that committee have never brought up their minutes before the Convention, it would not be bound with the Convention papers. In order that it may be included, I beg leave to move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF AMENDMENTS.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

In Sydney I gave notice of a new clause which has been printed on a separate paper, but it does not appear in the list of amendments. Would it not be better to insert it among the other amendments for the information of honorable members?

The PRESIDENT. -

As attention has been called to the matter, no doubt it will be attended to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on clause 109-

A state shall not make any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion.

The CHAIRMAN. -

No amendment has yet been moved.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I spoke on this clause Yesterday evening. I now want to say that, after careful deliberation, I think the wording of my amendment ought to be rectified before it is submitted to the Convention. The existing clause is-

A state shall not make any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion.
There is no application to the Federal Parliament at all in the clause as it stands. I intend to propose amendments which, if adopted, will make the clause read as follows:-

A state shall not, nor shall the Commonwealth, make any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion, or for the establishment of any religion, or imposing any religious observance.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The Commonwealth will have no power to do that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I explained yesterday evening that, in the Constitution of the United States, there is a prohibition on Congress making any law for this purpose.

Mr. SYMON. -

No.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

With all respect to the honorable member, there is.

Mr. SYMON. -

Prohibiting religion?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes. If you look at the first amendment of the Constitution you will find that there is no prohibition on a state doing this thing, but there is a prohibition on Congress against either making a law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion, or for the establishment of a religion. I add, here, "or imposing any religious observance." It is quite true, as Mr. O'Connor says, one would have thought that in the absence of an express power given to Congress to do these things, there would not be power to do them, but I had the opportunity yesterday afternoon of indicating the course of the decisions of the courts to the leader of the Convention, and he knows how very largely from single expressions used in the Constitution there have been inferential powers deduced. In consequence, for instance, merely of a decision of the Supreme Court that that country was a Christian country, there was a law passed and carried into effect prohibiting the opening of the Chicago Exhibition on Sunday, so that there is no doubt this will provide against a real subsisting danger, and I am moving this amendment with the view of reassuring a number of honest people here who, having regard to the experience of America, are gravely objecting to the insertion of any words in the preamble of the Constitution. I can foresee that that preamble will be carried, and I wish to provide against having a number of people voting against the Constitution on the ground that it will introduce a number of difficulties which, in this new country, ought to be laid for ever. I beg to move my first amendment-

That the words "nor shall the Commonwealth" be inserted after the word
Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

I think there was a good deal of force in the remarks that fell from the Right Hon. Sir Edward Braddon yesterday afternoon, shortly before the Convention adjourned. So long as this prohibition only extends to the mere mental exercise of faith, I am with Mr. Higgins; but I do not think that the prohibition should extend to interference with the exercises of faiths that are carried to lengths which are objectionable from a sociological point of view. I do not know whether any such extreme cases as those mentioned by Sir Edward Braddon would occur in this community, but it is quite likely that the faith healers who have been punished in England for failing to provide medical attendance and medicines for their sick might come here, and I would like to know whether a prohibition of this sort will interfere with faith healers who think that the cure of their sick should be made, not a matter of medical advice and medicine, but a matter of faith and prayer?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

They are subject to the English law.

Mr. GORDON. -

Yes, they are; but whether they are subject to the common law or the statute law of England, I do not know. What I would like to know is will this provision prevent such people, if they come here and act in the same way as they have acted in England, being prosecuted here?

Mr. SYMON. -

It might do so.

Mr. GORDON. -

Then I think we ought to safeguard it to this extent, directly the exercise of religious observances injures the community or any person in the community, I think that both the state and the Commonwealth ought to have the right to interfere.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I agree with the honorable member. Of course, what we want in these times is to protect every citizen in the absolute and free exercise of his own faith, to take care that his religious belief shall in no way be interfered with; but one would think from reading this clause, which appears to me objectionable in every possible way

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Do you mean the clause in the Bill?

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, I am with my honorable friend in desiring to have the clause amended. The idea of the clause is good enough—that is, the preservation of absolute freedom of religious belief, but the mode in which it is carried out in this clause seems to me to be obnoxious. The clause is either a great deal too wide, or it is not wide enough. It is a great deal too wide in saying that no law shall be enacted. I am not referring merely to the state, in what I am now saying, because undoubtedly it ought to be the Commonwealth rather than the state. However, it seems to be, prima facie, an interference with the legislative authority of the state itself. But putting it both ways—a prohibition against the state and against the Commonwealth making any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religious faith is, I think, a little beyond what any of us is prepared to go. Would it, for example, prevent or raise doubts as to whether the Commonwealth could pass a law prohibiting the exercise of such a religious creed as that mentioned by Mr. Gordon? We know what took place in Wales, in connexion with the faith healers, where most abominable cruelties were practised in the name of religion, and whilst no one ought to be allowed to interfere with the faith of these people—the creed they profess—still, the law, in the interests of the community and of humanity, ought to put a stop to the exercise of that faith in such a way as it was exercised in those cases. We are living in a very advanced age, not in medieval times, and there is no necessity for a prohibition of this kind, but if there be a prohibition there should also be a provision showing what is meant by religion, and what is meant by free exercise. Then again, whilst this is to be a prohibition against the state or the Commonwealth enacting a law interfering with the free exercise of religion, is it to be implied that the state or the Commonwealth may pass a law interfering with persons of no religion—Agnostics, Atheists, and Deists?

Mr. GORDON. -

A Deist has a religion.

Mr. SYMON. -

Some people would not admit that a Deist has a religion.

Mr. GORDON. -

A Jew is a Deist.

Mr. SYMON. -

Well, I am not skilled in the refinements of theology, but I ask the leader of the Convention whether it is necessary that the present clause should remain in the Bill at all? The points referred to by Sir Edward Braddon last night are of the very highest importance. We may be willing to admit people professing Oriental faiths, but unwilling to permit the exercise of those faiths as those people would wish to exercise them in this country, detrimental in every possible way to the cause of religion and of freedom itself. I would suggest to Mr. Higgins whether it would not be better to do away with this clause altogether, and limit the prohibition to the imposition of any religious test?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Say "observance."

Mr. SYMON. -
I do not know whether "observance" does not go too far.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
"Test" might include oaths administered in our courts and elsewhere.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
"Observance" might include Sunday observance laws.

Mr. SYMON. -
I do not like the word observance it seems to me to go a little too far. I think that the object we have in view will be sufficiently met if we prohibit the imposition of any religious test as a qualification for any public office of trust. That is as it existed in the original Constitution of the United States. If we do that, I think we are giving a sufficient assertion in this Constitution to the principle that religion or no religion is not to be a bar in any way to the full rights of citizenship, and that everybody is to be free to profess and hold any faith he likes but the Commonwealth must be the judges of when it is proper to interfere with its open exercise

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
I do not think that either the clause or the amendment should occupy the attention of the Convention very long. I consider the whole clause an anachronism, and that it applies to a state of things that can never occur in these days. At the time the American Constitution was framed, the framers of that Constitution had in mind certain events which they wished never to be repeated, and which never will be repeated in our civilization. I do not see why the states should not have the same rights of self-preservation under a Federal Constitution as they have at the present time. There is no atrocity which the human mind can devise which has not at some time or another been perpetrated under the name of religion, and the states should have the power to prevent such occurrences as those referred to by the right honorable member (Sir Edward Braddon) and others which might be mentioned ad libitum. There are a number of sects in different parts of the world whose religious observances embrace every form of horror one can imagine. I think that the clause should be struck out, and that the states should be allowed to retain the right to do what they think necessary to preserve and maintain their civilization. With regard to the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins), I think the honorable gentleman himself admitted yesterday that it would prevent a state from making laws against Sunday trading for example.

Mr. Higgins. -
No; it would only prevent the making of laws for a religious reason.

Dr. Cockburn. -
Who could determine the intention of the state? The amendment would simply prohibit the enactment of these laws.

Mr. Higgins. -
My desire is to prevent the Federal Parliament from dictating to the states in these matters.

Sir Edward Braddon. -
Are we not getting on very well as we are?

Dr. Cockburn. -
I think so. I think that we should recognise that the clause is an anachronism, and should leave it out of the Constitution.

Mr. Barton (New South Wales). -
I am rather doubtful about the amendment, because, notwithstanding the American decisions to which the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) has referred, I can scarcely conceive it possible that the insertion of a provision in the preamble acknowledging the existence of the power of the Deity could ever induce the High Court or the Court of Appeal in the old country to hold that that imported a power to make laws regarding religion. I think it is, quite clear that the Commonwealth will have no power to make any law regarding religion, even if no amendment such as that which has been suggested is agreed to. The Commonwealth will have no powers except such as are given to it either expressly or by, necessary intendment. It will have only such powers as are given to it in so many words, or as are necessary for the exercise of these powers. If we apply this principle, we must see that the Commonwealth will have no power to make laws regarding religion. The reason why the prohibition in the first draft of the Bill which was prepared in 1891 was confined to the states was that it could not, by any possibility, be concluded that it was necessary to extend such a provision to the Commonwealth, because no power was given to the Commonwealth to deal with the matter of religion. The position is the same now, and I do not think it will be substantially altered if the blessing of Divine Providence is invoked in the preamble. A preamble does not give power to anybody. The decision of the United States Court which has been referred to was something to this effect. Congress had passed a law prohibiting the importation of any person for labour or service. Of course, that law was really intended to prohibit the importation of manual labourers; but a religious corporation made an agreement under which a preacher was brought over, and a question was raised as to the legality of the agreement. The Supreme Court in the United States decided that the arrangement was legal, because the prohibition of the Act of Congress only applied to manual labourers; but it further decided, because of expressions in various charters given to plantations which afterwards became states, and in grants such as those given to Sir Walter Raleigh and others for the encouragement of colonization, that the United States was a Christian and a religious nation. Having decided this matter to their satisfaction, the Judges proceeded to say that upon that ground also the arrangement was a lawful one. The latter part of the decision was what lawyers call an obiter dictum.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But that decision has been acted upon.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, since then, as is pointed out in a little handbook which my honorable friend lent me. But the question for us to consider is whether a court like the Federal High Court or the Privy Council would ever come to such a conclusion. One would think it highly improbable. The real question that may arise under this Constitution is whether the Commonwealth can make a law establishing or prohibiting the free exercise of any religion. I take it that in the absence of a provision in the Constitution conferring that power upon the Commonwealth it will be impossible for the Commonwealth to do so. For this reason I think we need scarcely trouble ourselves to impose any restrictions. Under a Constitution like this, the withholding of a power from the Commonwealth is a prohibition against the exercise of such a power. If the amendment of the honorable member were adopted, the clause would read:-

A state shall not, nor shall the Commonwealth, make any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion, or imposing any religious test or observance.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Would that prevent the Commonwealth from insisting upon Sunday being kept as a day of rest?

Mr. BARTON. -

The honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor) pointed out that it might prevent the passing of a law for Sunday observance. The real question for-as to decide is whether the clause should or should not remains. The only difficulty I have upon the point is this: I do not anticipate any trouble from the want of a prohibition upon the states forbidding them from dealing with religious questions, but we must always recollect that humanity has a habit of throwing back to its old practices. Since a couple of hundred years ago we have been tolerably free from sumptuary laws. But there is in many quarters a great disposition to take to these laws again, and we may before many years have passed be overwhelmed with them.

Dr. COCKBURN. - And it might be a good thing.

Mr. BARTON. - It may be a good thing. Who knows that there may not be a similar throwing back in regard to religious laws?

Dr. COCKBURN. - That may be a good thing, too.

Mr. BARTON. - Yes; those who say that the people are always right might say that it was a good thing. My honorable and learned friend will have many successors, and so shall I. But if the enlightenment of this day supposes itself to be right in saying that the free exercise of religion should not be prohibited, the question arises, should not a provision to that effect be placed in the Constitution? The trouble arises when you try to insert a proviso modifying this prohibition. For instance, if it were desired to prevent the application of the clause to any fiendish or demoralizing rite, that might be done by inserting the words "so long as these observances are inconsistent with the criminal laws of the state," because if there were no criminal law in existence at the time with which these observances were inconsistent, it would be possible for the state to pass such a law, and so, to use a common expression, euchre the whole business. I think, however, that we can do remarkably well without the clause at all.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). - I agree with the honorable and learned member (Dr. Cockburn) that the clause is an anachronism, and it is inconsistent with federation. The principle of federation is that the states shall retain all such powers as they do not hand over to the Commonwealth, but this clause attempts to legislate for the states. Still they have not hitherto required any law of this kind. The Commonwealth cannot exercise any authority in the matter, because you have not bestowed it upon the federal authority.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Clause 109 commences-"A state shall not make any law." I agree with the honorable member that that provision should not be there. I am willing that the prohibition should extend only to the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - I do not think that is necessary, because the Commonwealth will have only such powers as are expressly bestowed upon it, and by no straining of collection can you find that the Commonwealth has been given any power to legislate with regard to religion.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I would like to ask my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) if he is prepared to withdraw his amendment with a view to striking out the clause, and inserting a declaration of this sort:-

No religious test shall be imposed as a qualification for any public office or trust in the Commonwealth or in a state?

I think that a declaration of that sort will be necessary if we insert the words that it is proposed to insert in the preamble.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

Although I moved an amendment yesterday with a view to making the clause reasonably safe in regard to so called religious practices, I confess that I should prefer to see it struck out altogether. Even with the qualification suggested by me, I do not know whether some occurrence which we should all deprecate might not take place and make us regret that the clause was ever put into the Bill.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I am very glad that I have called attention to this clause. I thoroughly agree that as it stands it is an anomaly, and that there should not be a prohibition upon the states. All I said was that if you prohibited the states from making laws respecting religious observance, and if you inserted in the preamble a recognition of the Almighty, it was fit that you should extend a similar prohibition to the Commonwealth. It would answer my purpose absolutely if the clause only enacted that the Commonwealth should be prohibited from passing a law of this kind. A number of honest people will have a great deal of difficulty about voting aye for the Constitution if there is no prohibition against the making of laws affecting religion by the Parliament of the Commonwealth.
What they ask is:"Why cannot we follow the example of the United States of America?" They point out that there is far more reason for a prohibition in our Constitution, because it is proposed to insert in the preamble a recognition of the Almighty.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

But the Almighty does not belong to any special religion.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I do not want to argue that question. I admit that there is a great deal of force in what the honorable gentleman says, but I have to speak most delicately on this subject, and I cannot go any further. Although it is quite true that a reference to the Almighty does not refer to any particular religion, still a reference to the Almighty in the preamble involves a recognition of Him, and it involves to a certain extent a religion. It has been found in the United States that, even though there is no reference to the Almighty in the preamble, yet it has been held that it is a Christian country, and, therefore, there was a federal law which prevented the opening of the Chicago Exhibition on Sunday. Honorable members will understand that it is not a question whether it is proper to open exhibitions on Sunday but that law was framed and enforced, and people were compelled to obey it on account of the dictum of the Supreme Court that it was a Christian country. Now, if you can enforce a good thing you can also enforce a bad thing made by the same power. All that I want to put to the Convention is this: That although I should have thought in the absence of express powers that the Commonwealth could not legislate on this subject, still I cannot but see, having regard to the decisions in the United States Court, that there is danger in an implied power. In the preamble of the United States Constitution they say-

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice,

Under the head of "general welfare," coupled with the statutory powers, they have extended the power of the Commonwealth hugely. If you are going to confer absolute power to promote the general welfare you do not know how far that will extend. First of all, the plea was to promote the general welfare; then there is power to make all laws which are necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government or proper officers of the states. Then, if you have coupled with that a declaration by the Supreme Court that this is a Christian nation, there is power to enforce Christian observances. The leader of the Convention has urged what I knew would be the chief objection to what I propose, that is, that there is no express power given; but I say that, in the face of the decisions given in the United States, it is not safe for us to assume that there may not be an inferential power in this preamble. There are hosts of people in Australia looking at that preamble to see it any safeguard will be put in. As far as I am concerned, I shall be willing to take out all this provision prohibiting the states from doing what they think fair. I think that the importance of preserving to the state the residuary powers is overwhelming; but I say that we ought to do at least the same as was done in the United States. There they provided that the Federation shall not make any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion, or for the establishment of any religion; then I want to add "or imposing any religious observance." conclusion, it has been said that this would prevent the imposing of a day of rest. My amendment would not.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
A general day of rest.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It would not; it would simply prevent the imposing of a day of rest for religious reasons.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
You want to break down religious sanction.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
A number of laws have been held to be unconstitutional in America because of their reasons and because of their motives. There was a funny case in San Francisco, where a law was passed by the state that every prisoner, within one hour of his coming into the prison, was to have his hair cut within one inch of his head. That looked very harmless, but a Chinaman brought an action to have it declared unconstitutional, and it turned out that the law was actually passed by the Legislature for the express purpose of persecuting Chinamen.

Mr. BARTON. -
That took place under the next clause in this Bill, which is a similar enactment.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I did not say that it took place under this clause, and the honorable member is quite right in saying that it took place under the next clause; but I am trying to point out that laws would be valid if they had one motive, while they would be invalid if they had another motive. All I want is, that there should be no imposition of any observance because of its being religious.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
The honorable member has stated that there are host of people who are anxiously watching what is being done with this preamble, because it may lead to certain laws being passed; He has not stated of whom the host is composed, or where it exists; but I gathered from his remarks yesterday that he was referring to the Seventh Day Adventists, a very powerful body in America, who have recently set up here and in New South Wales. That body denies the right of the State to impose any law whatever which will prevent them from working on any particular day. I believe they are earnest good people, but, in defiance of our laws, they persist in working on the day which we set aside and call Sunday. They set aside another day, Saturday, and call it the Sabbath. If that is to be allowed throughout the whole community, how can there be a uniform day of rest? And what greater harm can befall the people than to say that any sect can set themselves up and defy the State to set apart any particular day as a day of rest, whether for religious purposes or otherwise? Take the case of the Jews. Whilst they observe their own Sabbath on Saturday they never in any shape or form attempt to interfere with the recognised Sabbath of the rest of the community. The Seventh Day Adventists have defied the law in that respect. If we allow one body to do that, instead of having any uniform and universal Sabbath or day of rest, we may have six or seven such days established.

Mr. Higgins' amendment was negatived.

Amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of Tasmania, to add at the end of clause-

Nor appropriate any portion of its revenues or property for the propagation or support of any religion.

The amendment was negatived.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -
I do not intend to press the amendment which I gave notice of yesterday. The clause was negatived.

Clause 110-A state shall not make or enforce any law abridging any privilege or immunity of citizens of other states of the Commonwealth, nor shall a state deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The CHAIRMAN. -
On this clause there are various amendments proposed. The Assembly of New South Wales and the Legislative Council of Tasmania propose to omit all the words from "make" in the first line to "state" in the fourth line, and the Legislative Council of Victoria propose that we should insert, after the word "Commonwealth," in the third line, the words "or impairing the obligation of contracts." If I put the whole of the amendments suggested by New South Wales and Tasmania that were carried, it would not be competent to put the amendments suggested by Victoria. Therefore, I propose to put as a test question the amendment proposed by New South Wales and Tasmania so far as to leave out all the words to the word "Commonwealth," The question now is, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question, viz. - "Make or enforce any law abridging any privilege or immunity of citizens of other states of the Commonwealth."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I should like to have a little time to consider this question. The effect of the amendment proposed by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales would be that a state, as far as the Commonwealth is concerned, would be in a position to make or enforce any law within its Constitution abridging the privileges or immunities of the citizens of other states. This is a provision inserted in the Constitution for the equality of citizens of the Commonwealth-for the prevention of those of them who happen to reside in one state having their citizenship abridged as compared with citizens of the same Commonwealth residing in another state.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Would citizen mean an alien?

Mr. BARTON. -
No, unless he has become a citizen by naturalization.

Mr. ISAACS. -
There is no definition of "citizen" in this Bill. In the United States there is a definition.

Mr. BARTON. -
There is no deviation of the word "citizen" here, but I take it that a citizen is either a natural-born or a naturalized person possessing the ordinary political privileges of the Commonwealth, or of a state. The question is whether we should here allow anything which would enable a state to deprive citizens of the Commonwealth simply because they reside outside the borders of that state of any of the privileges and immunities which other citizens of the Commonwealth would possess.

Mr. GORDON. -
What sort of privileges put a concrete case?

Mr. BARTON. -
It is hard to put a concrete case; I think you will find some reference to cases in Baker's Annotated Constitution of the United States. But I do not want to trouble the committee at any length. It seems to me that we ought to maintain in some form of words the purpose which exists in this clause, otherwise it would, be open to a state, by imposing disabilities of one kind or another upon citizens of another state-we will not say in respect of the holding of land, but in respect of this or that privilege-to raise an inequality amongst the citizens of the Commonwealth, which would never be the intention of a Constitution such as this, and which would tend to defeat its purpose.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Could we not strike out the words "of other states"?

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
I have no doubt that the Commonwealth will legislate in regard to these matters, but in the meantime it seems to me that there will be a difficulty in regard to coloured aliens and to coloured persons who have become British subjects. In Western Australia no Asiatic or African alien can get a miner's right or go mining on a gold-field. We have also passed an Immigration Act which prohibits, even undesirable British subjects, from entering the colony. I do not know how this clause will act in regard to these matters but it seems to me that the word "citizen" should be defined. In Western Australia an alien can hold land in just the same way as he could if he were a British subject—no doubt that is the case in other colonies, probably in this colony—and he would probably think himself a citizen, whatever nationality he belonged to, having resided for a long time in the colony, and having acquired property therein. It is of no use for us to shut our eyes to the fact that there is a great feeling all over Australia against the introduction of coloured persons. It goes without saying that we do not like to talk about it, but still it is so. I do not want this clause to pass in a shape which would undo what is about to be done in most of the colonies, and what has already been done in Western Australia, in regard to that class of persons. It seems to me that should the clause be passed in its present shape, if a person, whatever his nationality, his colour, or his character may be, happens to live in one state, another state could not legislate in any way to prohibit his entrance into that state. I think there is a great deal to be said against the state being allowed to do that, but until the Federal Parliament legislates in regard to it, it certainly ought to be in the power of the state not only to maintain the laws existing, but also to legislate further if it should so desire.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

In the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales I was asked on all sides to explain what this clause meant, and I must confess that then, as now, I was incapable of giving an explanation as to what the first portion of the clause did mean. Because the members of the Assembly, as well as myself, were unable to fathom the meaning of the clause, it was proposed that that part of it which we could not understand should be omitted. I would ask the leader of the Convention to give us some instances of the immunities possessed by citizens of other states which a state might abridge by any law. I confess that it is hard for me to discover what immunities—I can discover others which may be created—are possessed by a citizen of Victoria which the state of New South Wales can abridge by any of its laws. I cannot conjecture an example of these immunities, nor do I know of privileges possessed by citizens of Victoria which are abridged by any law of New South Wales.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
There might be.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I can understand, in regard to Western Australia-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

And here, too. A Chinaman of this colony you would not allow to go into your colony, perhaps, and surely that would be abridging his right?

Mr. REID. -

Surely we would have the right to abridge his rights.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I want to know what immunity a Chinaman naturalized in Victoria possesses which he is deprived of by any law of New South Wales, or what privilege is denied to him? I can unde

Convention never contemplated. No one can doubt that the language of the clause is vague and ambiguous. The Constitution should be so framed that he who runs may read, that there should be no pitfalls on account of ambiguous phraseology. I confess that I like the proposal which has come from the House of Assembly of Tasmania, which gives in clear language something that would show what this clause, perhaps, is intended to show:-

The citizens of each state, and all other persons owing allegiance to the Queen and residing in any territory of the Commonwealth, shall be citizens of the Commonwealth, and shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the Commonwealth in the several states, and a state shall not make or enforce any law abridging any privilege or immunity of citizens of the Commonwealth, nor shall a state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws.

That language to me is clear and intelligible, but I must confess that as clause 110 is now drafted it is very difficult of comprehension. Is it directed at any system of taxation? Is it directed at those persons who hold property in one colony but reside in another? And are we to give a power to one colony to grant an immunity to its citizens from taxation at the hands of a neighbouring state? It may be, possibly, that the construction of the clause may be strained to that effect, or we may have some construction put on the clause to limit the right of Western Australia to regulate immigration to that colony. I do not pass these remarks in any cavilling spirit, but I think that the clause is one which may very well be taken in hand again by the Drafting Committee, so that we may have some clear intelligible expression of what may be the desires of the Convention after they have been expressed.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -
It seems to me that this clause is altogether unnecessary. It seems to me that everything which can be acquired by it is obtained in clause 101. There we declare that the law of a state which conflicts with a law of the Commonwealth has no effect. Now, when the Federal Parliament has legislated upon any point in connexion with citizenship, the states cannot legislate in conflict with that federal law. That seems to me all that is required. Take the question of naturalization, which is probably a question about which a difference would arise. As a separate state, a colony naturalizes an alien, and when he leaves that colony he has to be naturalized in the colony he goes to. When we have created a Commonwealth, we shall have a Commonwealth citizenship, and when aliens are naturalized, they will be naturalized as citizens of the Commonwealth. But if a state desires to make some restrictions with reference to some class within its territory, and there is no objection to it on the part of the Commonwealth, it seems unwise that we should put here a bar. If there turns out to be an objection on the part of the Commonwealth, beyond doubt the Federal Parliament will legislate on that subject, and then the state law, if it conflicts with the federal law, will have no effect. It seems to me that we have all the protection we require without this intensely ambiguous clause. I would, therefore, suggest that, inasmuch as it is unnecessary, it should be struck out. I can see no better purpose to be served by the clause than is served already in a simpler form by clause 101. With a view to test the feeling of the committee on that point, I propose to move that the clause be struck out.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
No; you must vote against it.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
There is a very great deal of force in what my honorable friend (Mr. Trenwith) has said as to whether this clause is or is not necessary. The origin of the clause, which is certainly very modified, is the 14th amendment of the American Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Which has given them a great deal of trouble.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Which is very much better, and which has been to a large extent paraphrased more, in accordance with our own requirements by the House of Assembly of Tasmania.

Mr. SYMON. -
That is the better amendment.
Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, it is very much better than the others, but I do not know that it is wanted at all. And when one recollects how the 14th amendment came into the American Constitution, one is a little surprised to think that it is necessary to put such a clause in this Bill. It was put in the American Constitution immediately after the Civil War, because the Southern States refused to concede to persons of African descent the rights of citizenship. The object of the amendment was purely to insure to the black population that they should not be deprived of the suffrage and various rights of citizenship in the Southern States. It provides who should be citizens, not of the states, but of the United States. I will read the words of the amendment:-

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof-

The words "and subject to the jurisdiction thereof" were put in so as to exempt the Ministers of State of foreign countries, and their children, and so on.

are citizens of the United States, and of the state wherein they reside.

It started by defining who a citizen was.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

What is the definition?

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is as follows:-

No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

That is the Tasmanian amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, it has been adapted by than Tasmanian Assembly to suit our altered circumstances but I want to point out that it only became necessary to pass that 14th amendment in the United States in order to provide in the Constitution for the change that was wrought by the Civil War. The rights of citizenship for the blacks and the abolition of slavery had been won by hard fighting, and this Article 14 had to be rammed down the throats of the Southern States by the military provision which I referred, to in Sydney. This, together with the 15th article, which goes with it, had to be passed. The object of it was as I have stated, and that was recognised by the United States courts in the case of Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 United States Reports, page 303. We can understand that a Constitution should say who shall be citizens of the United States or citizens of the Commonwealth. We can also understand that having constituted a citizenship of the nation, no state should be permitted to abridge that citizenship, and take away any of the privileges or immunities pertaining to citizens. What are these privileges and immunities? That very question was dealt with in what are known as the Slaughter House cases in 1872, 16 Wallace, 36, and in certain other cases. This is what the court said-

The right of a citizen of this great country, protected by the implied guarantees of its Constitution, to come to the seat of government to assert any claim he may have upon the Government, to transact any business he may have with it, to seek its protection, to share its offices, to engage in administering its functions, free access to its sea ports through which all operations of foreign commerce are conducted, also to the sub-treasuries, land offices, and courts of justice of the several states. Another privilege of a citizen of the United States is to demand the care and protection of the Federal Government for his life, liberty, and property when on the high seas, or within the jurisdiction of a foreign country; the right to peaceably assemble and petition for redress of grievances; the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus; the right to use the navigable waters of the United States, however they may penetrate the territory of the several states, and all rights secured to our citizens by treaties with foreign nations; and the right of a citizen of the United States of his own volition to become a citizen of any state of the Union by bonâ fide residence therein.

Mr. GORDON. - That covers a great deal more than the question of the coloured races.

Mr. ISAACS. - It was intended to protect the blacks. Nobody denied these rights to the whites.

Mr. GORDON. - A large number of decisions which do not touch the question of the coloured races have arisen under that clause.

Mr. ISAACS. - For 70 or 80 years, as long as the whites only were concerned, nobody found the necessity of such a clause, but, when the blacks were concerned, the Southern States refused to allow them to vote. They do that at the present time to a large extent contrary to the law, and this provision was made to secure to the blacks the rights of citizenship. While they were about it they put it in language quite large enough to cover a great deal more, than the African citizens of America. Mr. Hare, in his volume on Constitutional Law, says, on page 517, in dealing with the question of the blacks:

The main object of this amendment is clear. It was to render all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and especially the recently emancipated negroes, citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside, endowed with the rights incident to that two-fold relation, including those conferred by the second section of the Fourth Article, and also to afford the possessors of such citizenship an effectual guaranty against arbitrary or unequal legislation on the part of the several states.

That has operated no doubt, as Mr. Gordon has said, in several cases in a way quite unexpected. There is no power on the part of any of the states of the United States of America to draw any distinction such as we have drawn with regard to factory legislation, and the question was decided in a case, the name of which is significant, Yick Wo against Hopkins, 118 United States Reports, where a Chinese established his right in spite of the state legislation to have the same laundry licence as the Caucasians have. You can draw no distinction whatever, and it is as well that we should understand the full purport of the clause. In regard to that part of it which says that all citizens shall have equal protection it was held that no distinction could be drawn. You could not make any distinction between these people and ordinary Europeans. You could lay down all the conditions you liked to apply all round, but you could not impose conditions that would in effect, no matter how the language was guarded, draw a distinction between them and ordinary citizens.

Mr. GLYNN.

We have not got Article 4 of section 2 of the American Constitution under which the decision you have referred to was given.

Mr. ISAACS.

This decision was given under the amendment I have spoken of.

Mr. GLYNN.

That amendment must be read with Article 4, Section 2.

Mr. ISAACS.

That article is as follows:-

The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several states.

Mr. GLYNN.

That is not in our Bill.

Mr. ISAACS.

It really is there, because our Bill provides that the state shall not make or enforce any law abridging any of the privileges or immunities of the citizens of the other states. At all events, the 14th amendment is the one under which these decisions were given.

Mr. HOLDER. -
We have no definition of citizen.

Mr. ISAACS. -
No, not of the Federation. The question of the citizenship of a state is one that will have to be worked out. It might be held to be an ordinary member of the state, and it might not be confined to naturalized persons.

Mr. GORDON. -
It might be a question of domicile.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes. It is not wise to use the word "citizen" without any definition. They took care to define it in the United States. We might use a term that would be found to be of wider import than was intended, but, however that may be, it seems to me that it is illogical to provide that a state should not make or enforce any law abridging any privilege or immunity of citizens of other states. We ought to take out the words "other states," and say that no state should abridge any privilege or immunity of any citizen of the whole Commonwealth.

Mr. WISE. -
That is not the object. This clause has no connexion whatever with the amendment of the United States Constitution.

Mr. REID. -
Will you tell us the object?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I will wait to hear what the honorable member has to say.

Mr. REID. -
Can the state laws affect any one not in the jurisdiction of the state?

Mr. ISAACS. -
It is puzzling to me why a restriction has been made in this way, that the state is not to be at liberty to abridge the privileges or immunities of the citizens of other states.

Mr. SYMON. -
It is the essence of the Constitution that the state shall have that power within its legislative jurisdiction. Every state can do that.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes, within its legislative jurisdiction, and that consideration gives immense force to what I said at starting, and what Mr. Trenwith said. We are giving to the Federation certain powers of legislation, and we are reserving all others to the states. If the Federation chooses to exercise its legislative powers within its sphere, it can over-ride anything a state does.
Mr. SYMON. -

There is no object in the limitation of the federal jurisdiction.

Mr. ISAACS. -

None whatever; and if the state is to have reserved to itself all other powers, I cannot understand the bearing of it. I thought it my duty, therefore, to bring under the notice of the Convention the reason why it was introduced into the American Constitution. It was to cut down the powers of the state as exercised by refusing citizenship to the blacks. There have been quite a number of decisions on the subject, but it would be profitless to refer to them further. I have endeavoured to point out as briefly as I can how this matter stands, and I think it will be found in the end, subject to anything that Mr. Wise may have to say, that the basis of it all is the 14th amendment of the United States Constitution.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I do not like to speak with any confidence after such a strong expression of opinion from one so well qualified to give an opinion as the Attorney-General of Victoria, but my recollection of the reasons which led to the first part of the clause being inserted in the Draft Bill of 1891 leads me to say that the words were intended to limit the legislative jurisdiction of the states by such necessary restrictions as were thought desirable to give the Federation power to settle disputes between states arising from the exercise of the legislative authority within each state. I very much regret that Mr. Clark's memorandum, a portion of which I read yesterday, has not been returned. In the concluding part of that memorandum he draws special attention to these words, and points out that they were a necessary complement to the implied surrender of the right to claim redress by diplomatic or other means which was made by every state when it entered into an equal federation with other states. He lays down in express terms the principle which Judge Shipman used as the basis of his judgment in the case I cited yesterday from 22 Blatchford, 131, that is to say, if a state passes a law the effect of which is to injure the territory or property of persons outside the state—that may not be the intention, but if the direct effect is to inflict injury upon the territory or property of citizens in another state—then that law, although in so far as it only affects citizens within the state that passes it, it is intra vires of the Constitution, it becomes ultra vires in so far as it inflicts injury on the inhabitants of another state. That, I believe, was the intention, although I feel some diffidence in insisting upon it. This was the view which formed the basis of the judgment of Mr. Justice Shipman.
The state of Connecticut had authorized certain works which injured property in the adjoining state of Massachusetts, and it was held that that was a matter in which the Federal Court, in the interests of the Federation, was entitled to exercise jurisdiction.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Every text-book writer ignores that case; I cannot find it anywhere.

Mr. WISE. -

The object of this was by no means to deal with a set of circumstances such as have arisen in the United States, which could not have arisen here, but to deal with other matters; and it seems to me that the clause as it stands would be a powerful instrument to prevent an abuse of powers by a state, not for the purpose of injuring the citizens of that state, but for the purpose of injuring the citizens of other states.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Can you give a concrete case?

Mr. WISE. -

Well, take the case of imposing a poll tax on citizens passing from one state to another. Such a law as that would at present be within the competency of the legislation of any colony.

Mr. SYMON. -

Not if this Constitution becomes law.

Mr. WISE. -

It might be dealt with by another clause, and would also be dealt with by this clause 110. I am not dealing now with the latter part of the clause, because I admit that that is open to other objections. I am confining my attention to the first portion. The instance I have given is of course an extreme one, but it is such cases as that which, according to my recollection, it was intended should be dealt with by the first portion of this clause. I very much regret that Mr. Clark's memorandum is not in the hands of honorable members, because it deals with the first part of this clause and shows what importance Mr. Clark attaches to it as one of the draftsmen of the Bill of 1891.

Mr. ISAACS. -

How would the entry into one state by a citizen of another state be an immunity or a privilege of that citizen?

Mr. WISE. -

Let me give another illustration. Suppose an extra probate duty were imposed on Victorians who had property in New South Wales, or vice versa.

Mr. REID. -

Or an absentee tax.
Mr. WISE. -
Yes, or an absentee tax.

Mr. SYMON. -
It would be competent for the states to do that.

Mr. WISE. -
No; I mean an absentee tax making those who reside in one part of the Union pay higher—say pay a higher probate duty or legacy duty—than those who reside within the state imposing the tax.

Mr. ISAACS. -
How could that be a privilege or immunity of the citizens of the other states?

Mr. WISE. -
It would be putting an exceptional disability upon the citizens of another state, to which the citizens of the state imposing the tax were not subject.

Mr. ISAACS. -
But how is it a privilege or immunity of the citizens of another state that they should not be taxed as absentees by a particular state?

Mr. WISE. -
It is an immunity at present.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Then you can never tax a man living in another state?

Mr. WISE. -
You cannot impose exceptional treatment upon the citizens of another state; that applies to everything. It is difficult to contemplate a concrete case, but that the words themselves have a definite and clear meaning any one can see; and whether that clear power should be taken away or not is a matter of very serious consideration. It does appear to me that this clause is a powerful instrument in the hands of the federal authority to prevent any state acting in an overt manner, permitting overt acts of hostility against citizens outside its jurisdiction. For that reason I hope that the clause will be allowed to stand.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
The honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) is I think correct in the history of this clause that he has given, and this is one of those instances which should make us very careful of following too slavishly the provisions of the United States Constitution, or any other Constitution. No doubt in putting together the draft of this Bill, those who were responsible for doing so used the material they found in every Constitution before it, and probably they felt that they would be incurring a great deal of responsibility in leaving out provisions which might be in the least degree applicable. But it is for us to consider, looking at the history and reasons for these provisions in the Constitution of the United States, whether they are in any way applicable; and I quite agree with my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Carruthers) that we should be very careful of every word that we put in this Constitution, and that we should have no word in it which we do not see some reason for. Because there can be no question that in time to come, when this Constitution has to be interpreted, every word will be weighed and an interpretation given to it; and by the use now of what I may describe as idle words which we have no use for, we may be giving a direction to the Constitution which none of us now contemplate. Therefore, it is incumbent upon us to see that there is some reason for every clause and every word that goes into this Constitution. Now, I agree with Mr. Isaacs, that the 14th amendment of the United States Constitution was directed entirely to the question of the citizenship of negroes who were freed men, and it was necessary to implant something of that kind in the American Constitution, because of the fever heat which had been excited, and which was then subsiding, over the war which had convulsed the country. But how can that condition of things, or that necessity which arose then, have any hearing on our position? I take it that the best way to look on this matter is to try and forget all about the 14th amendment of the United States Constitution, and regard it as though we were framing this Constitution without any knowledge of any such provision. It seems to me that the first portion of the amendment of the

They have declared that in the amendment of the Constitution of the United States; but we have not got it here.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That shows the history of it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That shows the history of it, as Mr. Isaacs suggests. I am pointing out that there is no necessity for it in our Constitution-no necessity to point out that every person in the states is a citizen of the Commonwealth. There is no necessity for it, because citizenship follows from the rights you give every person in every portion of the Commonwealth under the Constitution. Now, is there any right which it is necessary to state that you give? I see that this provision that we are discussing now makes some reference to privileges or immunities of citizens. Quite sufficient has been pointed out to show that that might work in an exceedingly complicated way-in a way we have no conception of at the present time-if it is inserted in its present form. The only possible differences or disabilities in the states now, as affecting different classes of citizens, are those which exist in regard to aliens and coloured races. But already in clause 52 we have agreed to the insertion of a sub-section which enables the Commonwealth to deal with that matter, and there can be no question about it that in course of time the different laws that exist in the states dealing with such coloured races will be similar, and that such races will be dealt with uniformly, so that whatever privileges or disabilities exist in one state with regard to these people will exist in another state. There is only one portion of the Tasmanian amendment which I think should be preserved, and I prefer it in the form in which it stands as submitted by the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania. I think that the only portion of it which it is necessary to preserve is this-altering the wording slightly so as to make it read as I think it should read-

A state shall not deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws.

So that any citizen of any portion of the Commonwealth would have the guarantee of liberty and safety in regard to the processes of law, and also would have a guarantee of the equal administration of the law as it exists. I think Mr. Isaacs will bear me out, that in the United States it has been decided that the title to equal treatment under the law does not mean that you cannot make a law which differentiates one class of the community from another; but, as has been decided, it means that in the administration of the laws you have made, all the citizens shall be treated equally. And that should be so. Whatever privilege we give to our citizens, the administration of the law should be equal to all, whatever their colour. The case I refer to is one of the Chinese cases-I forget the name of it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The case of Yick Wo v. Hopkins.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It may be that case, or it may be another, but, at any rate, the case I mean bears out the position I have stated. There are two provisions which, it seems to me, are clearly necessary for the protection of the whole of the citizens of the Commonwealth in regard to the legislation of the states. These two are-first, that the "state shall not deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law"; and the next is that the state shall not "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws." I suggest that the best way of dealing with this question would be to strike out the clause as it stands now, and substitute for it the latter part of the Tasmanian clause which I have read. The former portion of that clause I do not think it is necessary to insert. It says-
The citizens of each state, and all other persons owing allegiance to the Queen, and residing in any territory of the Commonwealth, shall be citizens of the Commonwealth.

I do not think that is necessary.

and shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the Commonwealth in the several states;

I think that that might lead to difficulties, and it is not necessary.

and a state shall not make or enforce any law abridging any privilege or immunity of citizens of the Commonwealth.

I think all that might be left out, but I am of opinion that the latter portion of the clause, which I have previously quoted, should be substituted in place of clause 110 as it now stands.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The suggestion just made by my honorable and learned friend (Mr. O'Connor) amounts to an adoption of the New South Wales amendment first, and then the adoption of a certain number of the words of the Tasmanian amendment. So that the provision which would be adopted if the suggestion of my honorable and learned friend were carried would be this: The words proposed to be struck out by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales would be struck out, and in their place would be inserted the words-

"deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or."

It does seem to me, after the discussion we have had, that the object we have in view will be sufficiently attained by the adoption of this amendment. I do not think that the first portion of the clause-which has stood since 1891 without comment-is necessary in the peculiar condition of these colonies. Nor do I think that any such circumstances have arisen as would justify these colonies in inserting in the Constitution such words as were inserted in the American Constitution to meet the case of the freed men, of which words the early part of this clause is an application, and to some extent a constriction. So that I don't think we need put ourselves in any trouble about these earlier words. My position has been, from the beginning, that there is a necessity for some provision or other which would prevent citizens of the Commonwealth from being under any undue restriction or inequality. But taking the amendment my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) has suggested, I think that object is sufficiently provided for; and I agree with him that it is an absolute necessity that we should see that in this Constitution we do not insert any words about the meaning of which we are not quite sure, for they may receive a construction from a court hereafter which we never intended should be applied to them. I accept the amendment for striking out the words that have been mentioned, and, if it is agreed to, I shall move a subsequent amendment.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I would ask the leader of the Convention to consider one further point. Take a concrete instance, such as I was asked to give just now: Suppose the Legislature in one state passed a law to say that citizens residing in another state should not own real property within the legislating state. That is an instance that may occur, and which has occurred in the United States. For example, say the New South Wales Parliament-to take my own colony-passes a law that no Victorian shall hold real estate in New South Wales. We have that power now. It is not at all likely to be exercised, but it has been exercised in the United States, as between several states. Now, I ask, do we wish to preserve that right to the different provinces after federation? For my own part, I do not.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Do you say that an individual qua citizen of New South Wales is entitled to hold property in Victoria? Is it a privilege or an immunity?

Mr. WISE. -

I do not say that the words carry out what is suggested, but I do say that the words of the Tasmanian amendment make the matter perfectly clear, and I should prefer the whole of the amendment as suggested by Tasmania. They cover all the cases that may arise, and put a full and, in my opinion, necessary limitation on the powers of the provinces to exercise their legislative authority to the injury of any citizen of the Federation. I would ask the leader of the Convention whether his amendment, as it stands now, does anything more than protect the person of a citizen of another state, and secure that he shall be dealt with according to the due process of law, as regards any offence he has committed or any punishment to which he is likely to be subjected? We want to go further than that, and to secure that the property of citizens of the Commonwealth is to be as free from any invidious or hostile act levelled against it by the Legislatures of the several states as their persons. The amendment of the Parliament of Tasmania puts that in a perfectly clear way. It provides that citizens of the Commonwealth, by virtue of their citizenship, shall be entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, and that no state shall have power to abridge by its legislation these privileges or immunities. In other words, there is to be an equal citizenship. That is a necessity for federation, if federation is to be a reality and not a sham. I am not at all wedded to the clause as it stands. There is immense force in the suggestion of the Attorney-General of Victoria (Mr. Isaacs) just now, that the words "privilege and immunity" are not sufficient.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

How would that affect a tax on absentees?

Mr. WISE. -

It would give full power to impose a tax on absentees outside the Commonwealth, but not within it. There should be no absentees within the Commonwealth after federation. I do not see, how, after federation, a man can be regarded as an absentee at Sydney when he lives in Melbourne. If we are to have federation, the idea that when a man moves from one part of the Commonwealth into another he becomes an absentee, or ceases to be an Australian, is one that must vanish, and we ought, as far as our Constitution will permit us, to do everything to make it vanish quickly. It is a survival of the old idea that there is a distinctive citizenship in a Victorian, and a distinctive citizenship in a New South Wales man. That is the idea which I am endeavouring to destroy by supporting the amendment of Tasmania, that Australian citizenship, and that alone, shall be recognised in every part of the Federation. The way to secure that is to provide in the clearest terms, as Tasmania suggests, that no local Parliament can have any authority to, in any way, abridge the citizenship of an Australian.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I really think that the constant attempts which are being made to interfere with the rights of the states, in matters which are left to them expressly, is becoming quite alarming. There are a number of general words already in this Constitution which, I fear, may be used so as to almost destroy the independent powers of legislation of the states, with reference to every conceivable subject that they have left to them. I will deal with that later on, but, at present, look at the illustration which my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Wise) has just given. The states are supposed to be left in absolute independence of the Commonwealth as to their many powers of internal taxation. Now, my honorable friend wants, by vague words in this Constitution, to bridle the powers of the states in connexion with that matter. Why stop where he does? Why should any subject of the empire be treated as an absentee, simply because he is out of New South Wales?

Mr. WISE. -

He does not happen to be under one Government, as he would be after federation.

Mr. REID. -
That is the fallacy. As to all matters of internal taxation he will be under the local Government, not under the Commonwealth Government. I, personally, would not mind unification at all, but this is an attempt to affect to give independence to the states, while, at the same time, over-riding them in every point of the jurisdiction that is left to them. I really do not think that anything is likely to occur in the Commonwealth of an obnoxious character, for instance, as to aliens. In New South Wales we allow aliens to hold real property—we have a law of an extremely liberal character there, and I do not think that it is likely that in any state in the Commonwealth there will be any extreme laws on the subject. But really, if we go on as we are doing, I shall have to employ some antiquarian to discover where the rights of the states are. They certainly won't be in this Constitution. The power of local taxation for local purposes is left absolutely within the jurisdiction and discretion of each state, and the illustration of the honorable member (Mr. Wise) shows how dangerous it is to leave in words which were put in for one purpose, and which would be used for another purpose. I hope the very wise suggestion of the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) will be followed in this matter.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I think the honorable member (Mr. Wise) has expanded the spirit of federation far beyond anything any of us has hitherto contemplated. He has enlarged, with great emphasis, on the necessity of establishing and securing one citizenship. Now, the whole purpose of this Constitution is to secure a dual citizenship. That is the very essence of a federal system. We have debated that matter again and again. We are not here for unification, but for federation, and the dual citizenship must be recognised as lying at the very basis of this Constitution.

Mr. WISE. -

Would you give each state power to discriminate against the property of citizens in other states by taxation?

Mr. SYMON. -

The honorable member, I presume, is referring to the absentee question.
Let us take that question. Of course, there is power of direct taxation under this Constitution, but we contemplate that the exchequer of the Commonwealth will be filled for a very long time from the Customs, and the power of direct taxation of the states is not interfered with. Surely they have as much right, then, to have a progressive system of taxation on one basis as upon another—to say that taxation shall increase with the extent of property or wealth, or to say that it shall increase if a man does not live in the colony. Take the rating, for instance. The local rating varies according to the value of property, and so on. Why should it be considered, if the absentee principle is a valid one in connexion with taxation, that a man is not to be an absentee in New South Wales because he resides in Victoria, when you are dealing with a matter of local taxation in New South Wales? Why should he not be considered as much an absentee if he resides in Victoria as he would be if he resided in England? I do not see any difference between the two cases when you remember the Constitution that we are framing. If we introduce this amendment we are depriving the states of what we wish to confer upon them. Each state is entitled, at least I have always so understood, within its own legislative jurisdiction, to legislate as it pleases, and to deal with its own citizens, or any one who comes within its boundaries, in the same way as if this Constitution was never established. That is the freedom of each particular state, and that is the freedom which we desire to preserve. We do not interfere with the citizenship of the Commonwealth in any degree whatever.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Take the case of the land, for example.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes. Mr. Wise asked why should New South Wales or Victoria—to take a case which is extremely unlikely to occur—prohibit a citizen of the neighbouring colony from acquiring property in the legislating colony, or only allow him to acquire it under adverse conditions? But why not? The whole control of the lands of the state is left in that state. The state can impose what conditions it pleases—conditions of residence, or anything else—and I am not aware that a state has surrendered the control of the particular administration of its own lands, or of anything that is left to it for the exercise of its power and the administration of its affairs. I would much prefer, if there is to be a clause introduced, to have the amendment suggested by Tasmania, subject to one modification, omitting the words—"and all other persons owing allegiance to the Queen." That would re-open the whole question as to whether an alien, not admitted to the citizenship here—a person who, under the provisions with regard to immigration, is prohibited from entering our territory, or is only allowed to enter it under certain conditions—would be given the same privileges and immunities as a citizen of the Commonwealth. Those words, it seems to me, should come out, and we should confine the operation of this amendment so as to secure the rights of citizenship to the citizens of the Commonwealth. I think, therefore, that with some modification the amendment suggested by Tasmania would be a proper one to adopt.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I confess my sympathies are altogether with the remarks of my friend (Mr. Wise), and I think that the suggestion that it would be improper to interfere with such a tax as an absentee tax applied in one state to the citizens of other states is not well founded.

Mr. REID. -

Does that state right exist at present?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Undoubtedly it does.

Mr. REID. -

Then what right have you to take it away?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Because we are creating a Commonwealth in which I hope there will be a federal citizenship.

Mr. REID. -

Then take the responsibility of it.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I say we are creating a Commonwealth in which I hope there will be a federal citizenship, and I shall be glad indeed to see the powers of the Federal Parliament enlarged to enable that body to legislate, not only with reference to naturalization and aliens, but also with reference to the rights and privileges of federal citizenship.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. - What is the meaning of citizenship?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It is not defined here, but it ought to be defined in the Constitution, or else we ought to give power to the Federal Parliament to define it. And, after having defined what shall constitute Australian citizenship for the purposes of the Commonwealth, we ought to carefully prevent any state legislating in such a way as to deprive any citizen of the Commonwealth of any privileges which citizenship of the Commonwealth confers within its borders. I have the honour to come from a state which has already adopted a system of absentee taxation, but I do not hesitate to say, speaking on my own individual account, that I think the continuance of that system, applied to citizens of the Commonwealth resident in other states of the Commonwealth, would be a great mistake and an unfederal act.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If a rich South Australian went to live in Tasmania, on account of the cool climate, would you allow the imposition of the absentee tax on him?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I do not think it ought to be imposed on him.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then you think that your state should not have the right to impose an absentee tax on a South Australian residing in Tasmania if it chose?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I think that for the fostering of the federal spirit we ought to abolish, once and for all, these distinctions between the citizens of the different states, and I know of nothing more likely to strike at the root of that good feeling on which alone the Commonwealth can securely rest than the imposition of special taxation by South Australia against citizens of New South Wales who happen to own property in South Australia, or vice versa.

Mr. REID. -

We have no absentee tax in New South Wales.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

No; but from the remarks the Premier of New South Wales has made I am inclined to the opinion that he favours the state having the right to put on such taxation if it pleases. I do not think that, after we have adopted federation, the state should have such a right any more than it should have the right of passing a law disqualifying the citizen of another state from holding land within its own borders, simply because he happens to be resident outside the boundaries of that province, although residing within the confines of the Commonwealth.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Then you will have to specifically give him the right to hold land in any state.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes; this clause would not touch that case.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

What I understand those who are contending for the amendment of this clause to say is that a state should have the right to select the citizens of some other state within the Federation for special disqualification if it pleases.
Oh, no, this does not touch that.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I have listened with a considerable amount of care to what has fallen from other speakers, and I understand that they contend that any state has a legal right to impose an absentee tax.

Mr. REID. -

Yes; but not that that right will be exercised.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Then what do you want it for?

Mr. REID. -

That is a matter you must talk to me about in the local Parliament; it is rubbish to talk about it here.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Really, Mr. Chairman-

Mr. REID. -

I beg your pardon, Mr. President.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Well, after that apology, I do not think I ought to proceed to say what I was going to say; but I do trust that the right honorable gentleman will bring forth "fruits meet for repentance," and that we shall not have any more of these little ebullitions, which might be expected outside, but not here. As to these matters, I am prepared to do what I can for the purpose of establishing a common citizenship within the Federation, and giving to each citizen throughout the Commonwealth, irrespective of provincial boundaries, common rights, taking away from the states the power which it is suggested should be retained by each state of singling out the citizens of other states of the Commonwealth for special legislation or special disqualification. I go further, and I say that a matter of that sort is a fair subject to introduce into this Constitution-this federal compact. The terms of our arrangement are that we are not to do anything of that sort, but that we are to lay it down that no state shall deprive citizens of the Commonwealth of life or property, "except by due process of law." That is the term proposed to be employed.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Well, what is the meaning of it?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

First and foremost of all, I too ask, as the Attorney-General of Victoria asks, what is the meaning of it? But I go further and say-what right have you to provide in this Federal Constitution for a thing of that sort as affecting the states any more than you have in the original Constitutions of the states? There is no state Constitution, under which any state exists at present, in which we find any such provision. And there is no necessity for it. It seems to me to be a matter of purely state concern, and which, at this period of the nineteenth century, it is seriously suggested may be necessary, in order to prevent some high-handed and monstrous action on the part of the states, for which our past history gives no grounds for expectation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The object of that provision in the American Constitution was only to protect the blacks.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

The argument is the same in this case as on the religious question—there is no necessity for such a provision.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Quite so; we should leave it alone. It is a fair thing in this federal compact to provide a common citizenship, and I am prepared to assist honorable members to do that, but as to making this clause declaratory of the intention of the framers of this Constitution that the states shall not be allowed to act in that way as regards their own citizens, when there is no ground whatever for suggesting that they will do anything of the sort—a provision of that character is in no way necessary. By taking that step, we shall adopt a course, in framing the Federal Constitution, which is in no way justified, and which ought to be abandoned.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

As I understand, the clause now before us is as. follows:-

A state shall not make or enforce any law abridging any privilege or immunity of citizens of other states of the Commonwealth.

That is the first portion. Now, I ask, if you impose on the citizens of one Estate a law not applicable to the citizens of another state, is not that interfering with the privileges of the citizens of that part of the Commonwealth? The second part of this clause provides—nor shall a state deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

If Victoria imposes on me a special tax because I happen to reside in Tasmania, owning property in this colony, am I properly protected under this clause? Surely the meaning of the clause as it now stands is that the protection of the Commonwealth shall extend to all citizens of the Commonwealth, in whatever province they may own property, and in whatever province they may reside. I submit that the word citizens "here ought to be properly defined. I am at a loss to understand whether it means citizens of a particular state or citizens of the Commonwealth.
Mr. SYMON. -
Citizens of the Commonwealth.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Then, how can a state impose a special tax on a citizen of the Commonwealth because he happens to reside in another portion of the Commonwealth? The thing is absurd on the face of it. If we are to federate, let us federate in a proper spirit. What is the use of talking about the Federation if a citizen in one part of the Commonwealth may be treated differently from a citizen in another part of the Commonwealth? Unless the true spirit of federation is infused into this Constitution, we had better have no federation at all, and the sooner we depart to our respective homes the better.

Mr. REID. -
Hear, hear.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Yes, and then New South Wales will have all she wants. Let us have something straightforward. If we are to have a federal community, do not restrict us in this sort of way. I beg to move, as an amendment, that this clause be omitted, with a view to the insertion, in lieu thereof, of the following clause, suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania:-

The citizens of each state, and all other persons owing allegiance to the Queen and residing in any territory of the Commonwealth, shall be citizens of the Commonwealth, and shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the Commonwealth in the several states, and a state shall not make or enforce any law abridging any privilege or immunity of citizens of the Commonwealth, nor shall a state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws.

The CHAIRMAN. -
So that honorable members may consider all the amendments, I think the best course would be to withdraw the amendment now before the Chair, and allow the Tasmanian Assembly's suggestion to be considered, seeing that it involves the insertion of words from the very beginning of the clause.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -
In order to bring the matter to a point, I beg to move that leave be given for the present amendment to be withdrawn, with a view to the insertion, at the commencement of the clause, of the words "The citizens of each state," from the amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania. On that a test vote can be taken. Then the proposal to strike out the three lines of the Tasmanian suggestion, to which Mr. Symon has taken objection, may be dealt with. If the mover of the amendment will withdraw his proposal, that course can then be taken.

The CHAIRMAN. -

There is no mover of the amendment from Tasmania; it is a suggestion from the Legislative Assembly of that colony.

Mr. WISE. -

Then I beg to move the insertion, at the commencement of clause 110, of the words "The citizens of each state," on the understanding that if those words are carried we can then further amend the Tasmanian suggestion by striking out those three lines to which Mr. Symon objected.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Do we want this clause at all?

Mr. ISAACS. -

No.

Mr. REID. -

No; we do not want the clause at all; strike it out.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I desire also to move the insertion, after "citizens of the Commonwealth," of the words "and of the states." The Tasmanian amendment is directed almost altogether to the preservation of the Commonwealth citizenship within the states, and for that purpose it scarcely seems necessary, as the states cannot, under the Federation, abrogate the federal citizenship. But there is no protection to citizens of one state having the same right as regards citizenship as the residents in another state.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

That would never do. It would prevent an absentee tax being imposed by a State.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Why not? Why should we not prevent an absentee tax being imposed by a state?

Mr. REID. -

You are interfering in local politics with a vengeance.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The Federal Parliament can legislate to prevent the imposition of an absentee tax by a state.

Mr. REID. -

Can it?

Mr. GLYNN. -
As soon as direct taxation is imposed by the Federal Legislature, taxation must be uniform throughout the Commonwealth. That legislation must prevail. There cannot be a conflict between direct taxation imposed by the Commonwealth and direct taxation imposed by the states, after the Commonwealth has imposed direct taxation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, that does not meet the point. The Federation will impose taxation for its purposes, and the state will levy taxation for its purposes.

Mr. GLYNN. -

If the Tasmanian amendment was amended to provide for the inclusion of the effect of the Fourth Article of section 2 of the American Constitution—that is, a declaration that citizenship in one state shall apply right through the Commonwealth to citizenship in the other states, well and good, but otherwise you could really treat the citizens of one state as aliens and foreigners in another state, or, even while resident in that state, as aliens with regard to the ownership of property in that state. Section 2 of Article 4 of the American Constitution provides that—

The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That was in the original Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GLYNN. -

And also in the articles of federation, but there was no provision in the articles as regards naturalization, and the result was that they had different terms of naturalization in one state as compared with another. For instance, a year's residence in one state entitled an alien to naturalization, whereas in another state fourteen years residence was required, but a citizen in the state in which only one year's residence was required to obtain naturalization could become a citizen in the other state in which fourteen years residence was required, although he had been only one year in America. The question must be federally determined. Still, it would be open, without the American clause, which is not in our Constitution at present, for this Constitution to land us in the position in which they were landed in America, as described in the following quotation:-

In a Union composed of many states, great difficulties would arise if the citizens of one state were treated as aliens or foreigners in all the other states. Commercial transactions, the right to make contracts, or to hold lands, and travel, intercourse, and traffic between the several states, would be seriously embarrassed and obstructed. It was to prevent the occurrence of such evils that the Constitution wisely extends to the citizens of each state the privileges and immunities of citizens in the other states.
I think the best thing to do is to state that there will be a universal citizenship both as regards the Commonwealth and as regards the states.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

If the contention of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) were carried into effect it would lead us very much further than the American decisions ever went. It was decided in the Slaughter House cases, which have been referred to by the Attorney-General of Victoria, that the word "citizen" applies only to a citizen of the United States. Suppose the citizens of one state had the right to sell liquor freely, while prohibition was in force in another state, if effect were given to the contention of the honorable member, a citizen who had the right to sell liquor freely in his own state would carry that right with him if he went into the state in which there was prohibition.

Mr. WISE. -

That is expressly dealt with by a special amendment.

Mr. GORDON. -

I will give another illustration which occurs to me. Suppose in one state a whole class had an absolute exemption from service upon juries, would a member of such a class, if he went into another state, carry that immunity from service with him? Would not such a provision upset the whole policy of any state?

Mr. REID. -

Still it would be very federal.

Mr. GORDON. -

I think the two illustrations I have given put the matter in a concrete state, and prove how undesirable it is to give effect to the contention of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn). I think that the words of the Tasmanian amendment should be adopted, if the whole clause is not struck out.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

I understand that the Premier of South Australia contends that there should be no absentee taxation upon residents within the Commonwealth; while the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) contends that each state should have the right to impose such taxation.

Mr. SYMON. -

That each state should exercise its own judgment in the matter.

Mr. HOWE. -

Well, I prefer to be guided by the broad views of the Premier of South Australia. In South Australia we have a tax on absentees, but that tax has not proved a success. I believe that we are the only state in Australia which has such a tax. It was considered that persons residing out of the colony, who drew large sums of money in the shape of rents and in other ways from properties within the colony should contribute a little more to the revenue than is paid by the ordinary taxpayer. Such a proposal looked very fair upon the face, but when an absentee tax was imposed it was found that its only result was to increase the rentals of increased taxation falls upon consumers and wage-earners residing within the colony.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The committee is not now discussing the question of absentee taxation.

Mr. HOWE. -

Well, I thought this a very opportune time to get in these remarks. I congratulate the Premier of South Australia upon his broad views as to what will constitute citizenship in Federated Australia, and I prefer to follow him rather than to follow that eminent legal luminary (Mr. Symon).

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

This matter has now assumed a very serious aspect. My honorable friend (Mr. Howe) has thrown quite a flood of light upon the patriotism of the Premier of South Australia. We all know that a large number of South Australians are interested in mines which are situated in other colonies. For instance, we in New South Wales - and it generally comes round to some little federal enterprise of this kind - happen to have a very wealthy mine at Broken Hill, but the register of shares is not kept in the colony, and, according to the decisions, the property is therefore not in the colony.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That was discovered by a South Australian.

Mr. REID. -

Probably; one could rely upon a South Australian to discover anything of that sort. The result of these decisions was that persons drawing wealth from this mine, from which the New South Wales Government receive, I think, 5s. per acre per annum, found themselves out of the reach of taxation, and their estates after their death were absolutely beyond probate duties. Now, under a system of direct taxation, the New South Wales Government gets something like £15,000 a year from the Broken Hill mines. This, no doubt, is a very fine federal enterprise, to create distinctions and to abridge our jurisdiction in dealing with the wealth produced in our own colony. Personally, I am not at all in favour of an absentee tax. It cannot be said that the New South Wales income tax is such a tax. I wish, however, to direct the attention of honorable members to the very dangerous track we are going upon in not being satisfied to leave to the states that which we profess to leave to them. We profess to leave to the states their powers of local management in certain respects, but we are constantly trying to meddle with concerns which do not belong to us, and which will not belong to the Federal Commonwealth. I am afraid that this action will create a very unhappy impression in the various colonies. We are all in favour of giving equal citizenship and the equal protection of the laws to all the members of the Commonwealth. It is quite novel in Australia to hear any talk upon this point, because I think this has been universally conceded here. I am prepared to vote upon the lines laid down by the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor) in guaranteeing equality to all the citizens of the Commonwealth; but do not let us, by side devices, interfere with matters that we should leave to the management of the states.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

The honorable member (Mr. Howe) is under a very grave misapprehension, not only as to my views, but also as to the real issue before the committee. The issue before the committee is not whether we should impose a tax upon absentees.

Mr. HOWE. -

I understand that.

Mr. SYMON. -

Nor is it whether we should repeal the inefficient absentee tax. existing in South Australia. The issue is whether we are to destroy the autonomy of the states in certain respects. I am, and always have been, utterly opposed to absentee taxation, and the views which I expressed were brought out by an illustration which was used to show the effect of the clause. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise) made use of two illustrations, in dealing with which I merely pointed out that there was no earthly reason why the states should not have power to deal with these matters. I never suggested any divergence from the views of my honorable friend (Mr. Howe), and I am glad that he is with me in thinking that this useless absentee tax should be swept away.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I rise for the purpose of pointing out the position in which we stand, and to express the hope that, having discussed this matter so fully, we may soon come to a division. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise) has proposed an amendment which, if carried, will involve the declaration that the citizens of each state are citizens of the Commonwealth. I have already dealt with the general aspect of this provision, but I should like to ask the committee what is meant by the term "citizen"? What rights shall we give to a man as a citizen? If we do not give any definite rights, what is the use of placing in the Constitution a provision which will be a fruitful source of litigation?

Mr. ISAACS. -
You must also define "citizen of the state."

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Yes. In regard to what the right honorable member (Mr. Kingston) has said, I should like to say that the citizenship which is aimed at in this amendment is not to be attained by a provision of this kind, but by the comity and friendship which must ensue when we are all one people. Any declaration of the rights of the citizens, and any interference with the local rights of the states in regard to the questions referred to, would be very mischievous. I therefore intend to vote against the amendment of the honorable and learned member, and then to move the amendment which I have already indicated. One word as to the first part of my amendment, which is to the effect that a state shall not deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. In the ordinary course of things such a provision at this time of day would be unnecessary; but we all know that laws are passed by majorities and that communities are liable to sudden and very often to unjust impulses—as much so now as ever. The amendment is simply a declaration that no impulse of this kind which might lead to the passing of an unjust law shall deprive a citizen of his right to a fair trial.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is a very dangerous proposal—that the Supreme Court should control the Legislatures of the states within their own jurisdiction.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
It only provides that each citizen of the Commonwealth shall be tried by due process of law. Why should a state be allowed to pass a law depriving a citizen of this right?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
What does the honorable and learned member mean by the term "due process of law"?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
The amendment will insure proper administration of the laws, and afford their protection to every citizen.

Mr. SYMON. -
That is insured already.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
In what way?
Mr. SYMON. -
Under the various state Constitutions.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Yes. We are now dealing with the prohibition against the alteration of these Constitutions. We are dealing with a provision which will prevent the alteration of these Constitutions in the direction of depriving any citizen of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Because if this provision in the Constitution is carried it will not be in the power of any state to pass a law to amend its Constitution to do that. It is a declaration of liberty and freedom in our dealing with citizens of the Commonwealth. Not only can there be no harm in placing it in the Constitution, but it is also necessary for the protection of the liberty of everybody who lives within the limits of any State.

Mr. SYMON. -
Have we not that under-Magna Charta.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
There is nothing that would prevent a repeal of Magna Charta by any state if it chose to do so. Let us suppose that there were any particular class of offences, or particular class of persons who, at any time, happened to be the subjects of some wild impulse on the part of a majority of the community, and unjust laws were passed-

Mr. SYMON. -
Has anything ever happened that would justify such a proposition?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Yes, they are matters of history in these colonies which it is not necessary to refer to.

Mr. SYMON. -
Would it not require an amendment of the Constitution to repeal Magna Charta?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
What Constitution?

Mr. SYMON. -
This Constitution. Do you think Magna Charta would be repealed by an Act of the Federal Parliament?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I do not think so, and I did not say so. But I say that, under the Constitution of the states, as we are dealing with the Constitution, a State might enact any laws which it thought fit, and even if those laws amounted to a repeal of Magna Charta they could be carried. I admit we are only dealing with a possibility, but at the same time it is a possibility which if it eventuated, as it might, would be very disastrous, and there is no reason why we should not prevent it.

Mr. FRASER. -
    We might provide a safe-guard, at any rate.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
    Yes; therefore I intend to support both branches of the amendment to the extent I have stated.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
    I understand the only question before the Chair now is practically the adoption of the Tasmanian amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. -
    Yes.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
    I am sorry there was not a clear intimation given of the intention to practically wipe out this clause altogether, because then we might have gone fully into it. I feel that if a division is taken at the present stage there will be a great deal of cross voting. I have been trying to consider the effect of clause 110; and having listened to the debate, and remembering what I read a year or two ago upon the subject, I think we ought to hesitate before we strike out the clause. Looking at the Tasmanian amendment, which seems to be the one actually before the Chair, I think that it has been most thoughtfully framed, I think that it instils a broad federal spirit, and I do not think it will have the evil consequences that have been referred to by some speakers. For instance, the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) made a most impressive speech in the interests of his liquor-drinking friends. He said if a man is allowed to drink liquor in one state he must be allowed to drink liquor in any other state.

Mr. GORDON. -
    I said that was what I thought would be the effect of Mr. Glynn's amendment.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
    I apprehend you would apply that to the Tasmanian amendment.

Mr. GORDON. -
    If the honorable member had been attending to what I said he would know that I did not refer to that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
    We have so many propositions before us that I think it would be better to keep to the Tasmanian amendment. There is no possible danger under the Tasmanian amendment of any such right being given to a man going to another state.
Mr. GORDON. -
I quite agree with that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Then, in regard to an absentee tax, I hold, with great submission, that these Tasmanian amendments will not prevent the imposition of an absentee tax. I say that, although I think it would be most lamentable if there were an absentee tax inflicted by one colony upon the residents of any other colony. Still, apart from the merits of the question altogether, this clause does not prevent that. As I understand the question now with regard to the Tasmanian amendment, it would not prevent an absentee tax being imposed by the residents of one colony upon the residents of another. It refers to the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the Commonwealth. There is a double citizenship, and citizens of the Commonwealth have certain privileges and immunities; but there is no privilege or immunity from taxation conferred on a citizen of any state. Judge Cooley, one of the chief inspirers of Mr. Bryce, says

Mr. GORDON. -
We had that very quotation before.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I was not aware of that, and, therefore, it is not necessary for me to give the quotation.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The difference there is that a citizen of the United States is not defined as a citizen, but as being a person having a certain qualification.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

My learned friend and myself are at one on that point, but there are two citizenships. I think the Tasmanian amendments have been drafted most carefully, but what they have been addressed to is that your privileges as a citizen of the Commonwealth as distinguished from your privileges as a citizen of the state are not to be abridged. I would, therefore, suggest that as this proposal to alter the clause has been sprung upon us suddenly, we ought not, at this stage, to strike it out, but proper notice I should be given.

Mr. ISAACS. -
We can recommit the clause.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It might be recommitted, but I think that the burden ought to lie upon those who want to strike it out. According to Mr. Bryce, the 14th amendment of the American Constitution is treated as declaring finally the privileges of citizens as between the several states. It was no doubt enacted with a view to the then recent slavery disputes, but now it has a much wider purview. I appeal to the House not to strike out this clause, because we have not had sufficient notice, and if need be we should recommit it.

Question so resolved in the negative.
[The Chairman left the chair at three minutes to one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at six minutes past two p.m.]

The CHAIRMAN. -
It is proposed to omit from clause 110 the words-
Make or enforce any law abridging any privilege or immunity of citizens of other states of the Commonwealth.
Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
I do not think that these words are required. The words owe their introduction into the Constitution of the United States to circumstances of a purely adventitious character, which can never be expected to occur in Australia. The words form no part of the original American Constitution. They were introduced, as an amendment, simply as a punishment to the Southern States for their attitude during the Civil War.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No; to effectuate the results of the war.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

To inflict the grossest outrage which could be inflicted upon the Southern planters, by saying-"You shall not forbid the negro inhabitants to vote. We insist on their being placed on an equal footing in regard to the exercise of the franchise with yourselves." I do not believe that this amendment was ever legally carried. I believe it was only carried by force of arms, by placing the voting places practically under martial law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I explained how that was done.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

That is correct, is it not?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It was no part of the original United States Constitution, and it never has legally become a part of that Constitution; it was simply forced on a recalcitrant people as a punishment for the part they took in the Civil War. We are not going to have a civil war here over a racial question.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That was one mode of amending the Constitution.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

By martial law?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

We do not want to imitate that example. We do not want a clause in our Constitution which could only be carried in America by force of arms. We cannot imagine a condition of things in which we would wish to make such an amendment of our Constitution. I do not believe we shall ever have such a condition of things here as will necessitate such a clause in the Constitution. As it formed no part of the original Constitution of America, as it was only introduced by force of arms and not according to the legal limits of the Constitution, I do not think we should pay it the compliment of imitating it here.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The honorable member can vote for the present amendment to strike out certain words.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I am going to vote for an amendment to strike out words whenever I get the opportunity.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I would like to make a suggestion in order to facilitate business. It is that we should temporarily pass the amendment suggested by my learned friend (Mr. O'Connor), which I understand has the approval of the leader of the Convention, if the latter will give an assurance that the matter will be thoroughly looked into by the Drafting Committee.

Mr. BARTON. -

Undoubtedly.

Mr. WISE. -

It seems to me to be a matter of very great importance. It has not received the attention it deserves, and it is not quite possible for us in committee to go into the whole matter fully.

My. KINGSTON. - We may temporarily strike out the clause with the view to the insertion of a new one.

Mr. WISE. -

I do not advocate that course, because to my mind the retention of the clause is of very great importance. I look upon the clause as necessary to prevent the state Parliaments from being used as instruments of nullification. Some assertion of that principle is desirable in the Constitution, though the precise words of it are a matter of doubt and a matter of drafting. I would suggest that we should pass the amendment of Mr. O'Connor on the committee undertaking to bring it up again for further consideration if they think fit on the recommittal of the Bill.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I hope we will not do that. I think it is far more than a question of drafting. I think, whatever course we take, we ought to try to have the matter explained as much as possible at the present moment. If we pass the words which my learned friend (Mr. O'Connor) has suggested, we shall be raising up adversaries of the Constitution on all hands. The phrase-'the equal protection of the laws' looks very well, but what does it mean? It was part and parcel of the 14th amendment of the American Constitution; it was introduced on account of the negro difficulty. It is not something separate from the other portion, and of this Dr. Burgess says, at page 217 of the first volume of his work:

The phrase "equal protection of the laws" has been defined by the court to mean exemption from legal discrimination on account of race or colour. This provision would probably, therefore, not be held to cover discriminations in legal standing made for other reasons; as, for example, on account of age or sex, or mental, or even property qualifications. The court distinctly affirms that the history of the provision shows it to have been made to meet only the unnatural discriminations springing from race and colour. If a discrimination should arise from any previous condition of servitude, I think the court would regard this as falling under the inhibition. The language of the provision implies this certainly, if it does not exactly express it.

And the case itself, which was decided in 1879, shows perfectly clearly that it has no application to our Australian circumstances. The head-note is-

1. The 14th amendment of the Constitution of the United States, considered and held to be one of a series of constitutional provisions having a common purpose, namely, to secure to a recently emancipated race, which had been held in slavery through many generations, all the civil rights that the superior race enjoy, and to give to it the protection of the general government, in the enjoyment of such rights, whenever they should be denied by the states. Whether the amendment had other, and if so what, purposes, not decided.

2. The amendment not only gave citizenship, and the privileges of citizenship, to persons of colour, but denied to any state the power to withhold from them the equal protection of the laws, and invested Congress with power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce its provisions.

3. The amendment, although prohibitory in terms, confers by necessary implication a positive immunity, or right, most valuable to persons of the coloured race-the right to exemption from unfriendly legislation against them distinctively as coloured-exemption from discriminations, imposed by public authority, which imply legal inferiority in civil society, lessen the security of their rights, and are steps towards reducing them to the condition of a subject race.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It protects Chinamen too, I suppose, as well as negroes?

Mr. ISAACS. -

It would protect Chinamen in the same way. As I said before, it prevents discriminations on account of race or colour, whether those discriminations be by Parliament or by administration. And in the case I referred to, Yick Wo v. Hopkins, it was held by the Supreme Court that the ordinance of the San Francisco Legislature was void, and they went on to say further, even if a legislative provision is fair and apparently equal on the face of it, if it is so administered as to introduce this discrimination, it will be declared void.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
  The Act itself.

Mr. ISAACS. -
  Yes; if it admits of that infringement, and if it is so interpreted by the Supreme Court of the state as to mean that such a discrimination may be introduced, though not necessarily, it will be held to be void. That will be found on page 220 of Baker's Annotated Notes on the Constitution of the United States. If that is so, to put it in plain language, our factory legislation must be void. I put that one simple statement before honorable members, and I would ask them how they can expect to get for this Constitution the support of the workers of this colony or of any other colony, if they are told that all our factory legislation is to be null and void, and that no such legislation is to be possible in the future?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
  That is the special clause relating to Chinese.

Mr. ISAACS. -
  Yes.

Mr. GLYNN. -
  Cannot there be special legislation on the subject under clause 53?

Mr. ISAACS. -
  I forget what was done with that clause.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
  Some portion of it now appears under clause 52.

Mr. ISAACS. -
  If it is so, the question of whether we are going to prevent factory legislation of the kind I referred to will demand very serious consideration. Clause 52, by the transposition that has been made, will afford an opportunity for discriminating legislation if the Federal Parliament choose to take advantage of it.

Mr. GLYNN. -
  If the Federal Parliament does interfere, why preserve state legislation?

Mr. ISAACS. -
  If we retain this clause as it stands, we shall have done no good by transferring a part of clause 53 to clause 52.

Mr. GLYNN. -
  It is inconsistent.
Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, because we decided in transferring the provision in clause 53 to clause 52 to leave the states full power to legislate until overborne by federal legislation. If we retain this provision that no state is to be permitted under any circumstances to pass such a law, then what we have decided to be concurrent legislation becomes exclusive legislation on the part of the Federal Parliament. On that ground, and for the reasons I have stated, I say that we ought not to insert this provision as to the equal protection of the laws. That is a phrase that at once commands approbation, but when it comes to be practically applied it raises up almost insuperable difficulties. With regard to the other part of the clause, about due process of the law, there is an equal difficulty. I understand that Mr. O'Connor proposes to introduce that portion. What necessity is there for it? Under our state Constitutions no attempt has ever been made to subject persons to penalties without due process of law.

That provision was likewise introduced into the American Constitutions to protect the negroes from persecution, and dozens of cases have been brought in the United States courts to ascertain what was meant by due process of law. At one time it was contended that no crime could be made punishable in a summary way, but that in every case there would have to be an indictment and a trial by jury. That was overruled, and it was held that you might have process by information. If we insert the words "due process of law," they can only mean the process provided by the state law. If they mean anything else they seriously impugn and weaken the present provisions of our Constitution. I say that there is no necessity for these words at all. If anybody could point to anything that any colony had ever done in the way of attempting to persecute a citizen without due process of law there would be some reason for this proposal. If we agree to it we shall simply be raising up obstacles unnecessarily to the scheme of federation. I hope, therefore, that Mr. O'Connor will not press his amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I beg now to move-

That the following words be inserted after the word "not"-"deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

Why should these words be inserted? They would be a reflection on our civilization. Have any of the colonies of Australia ever attempted to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law?
I repeat that the insertion of these words would be a reflection on our civilization. People would say:"Pretty things these states of Australia; they have to be prevented by a provision in the Constitution from doing the grossest injustice."

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I have mentioned before the reasons, and they appear to me to be very strong, why these words should be retained. The honorable member will not deny that there should be a guarantee in the Constitution that no person should be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. The simple object of this proposal is to insure that no state shall violate what is one of the first principles of citizenship.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Is there not that guarantee now?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not think so. We are making a Constitution which is to endure, practically speaking, for all time. We do not know when some wave of popular feeling may lead a majority in the Parliament of a state to commit an injustice by passing a law that would deprive citizens of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. If no state does anything of the kind there will be no harm in this provision, but it is only right that this protection should be given to every citizen of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Would not the Royal assent be withheld?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not know that it would. The Royal assent is practically never refused to any Bill that deals with our own affairs, and it is highly improbable that it would be refused under any circumstances.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Suppose a state wanted land for railway purposes, and took it compulsorily, there being a provision in one of the statutes that the amount to be paid should be determined by arbitration, would not that be taking the land without due process of law?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, it would not; and, as an honorable member reminds me, there is a decision on the point. All that is intended is that there shall be some process of law by which the parties accused must be heard.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Both sides heard.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes; and the process of law within that principle may be anything the state thinks fit. This provision simply assures that there shall be some form by which a person accused will have an opportunity of stating his case before being deprived of his liberty. Is not that a first principle in criminal law now? I cannot understand any one objecting to this proposal.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Very necessary in a savage race.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
With reference to the meaning of the term due process of law, there is in Baker's Annotated Notes on the Constitution of the United States, page 215, this statement-

Due process of law does not imply that all trials in the state courts affecting the property of persons must be by jury. The requirement is met if the trial be in accordance with the settled course of judicial proceedings, and this is regulated by the law of the state.

If the state law provides that there shall be a due hearing given to the rights of the parties-

Mr. BARTON. -
And a judicial determination.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Yes, and a judicial determination—that is all that is necessary.

Mr. ISAACS. -
What is the good of it? It is an admission that it is necessary.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Surely we are not to be prevented from enacting a guarantee of freedom in our Constitution simply because imputations may be cast upon us that it is necessary. We do not say that it is necessary. All we say is that no state shall be allowed to pass these laws.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Who asks for the guarantee?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
The only country in which the guarantee exists is that in which its provisions are most frequently violated.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I think that the reason of the proposal is obvious. So long as each state has to do only with its own citizens it may make what laws it thinks fit, but we are creating now a new and a larger citizenship. We are giving new rights of citizenship to the whole of the citizens of the Commonwealth, and we should take care that no man is deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law.

Mr. GORDON. -
Might you not as well say that the states should not legalize murder?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is one of those suppositions that are against the first instincts of humanity.

Mr. GORDON. -

So is this.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, it is not. We need not go far back in history to find cases in which the community, seized with a sort of madness with regard to particular offences, have set aside all principles of justice. If a state did behave itself in that way, why should not the citizens of the Commonwealth who did not belong to that state be protected? Dr. Cockburn suggested in so contemptuous a way that there could be no reason for this amendment, that I got up to state again what had been stated before.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Not contemptuous.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I know the honorable member meant nothing personal, but I thought it necessary to state the reasons of what, had it not been for the honorable member's statement, would have seemed to be a perfectly obvious proposition. Mr. Clark, of Tasmania, thought the amendment of importance, and pointed out that it had been put in the United States Constitution. It should also be put in this Constitution, not necessarily as an imputation on any state or any body of states, but as a guarantee for all time for the citizens of the Commonwealth that they shall be treated according to what we recognise to be the principles of justice and of equality.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

The amendment suggested by the Parliament of Tasmania would have modified this clause so as to, perhaps, make it acceptable. That amendment having been rejected, I cannot but think that it would be advisable to strike the whole clause out. I think the clause as it stands is calculated to do harm rather than good. It will cause friction between the states and the Commonwealth, and also involve considerable interference with the rights of the several states. If it is to be decided that a state shall not enforce any law abridging the liberties of other citizens of the Commonwealth, and it be understood that those citizens are to have this indulgence while within the state, that will involve some danger. The latter part of the clause, which says that the state shall not "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," must involve confusion, and may involve serious disagreement. That is the way it strikes me.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I now intend to move-

That after the word "deny" the following words be inserted, "to the citizens of other states the privileges and immunities of its own citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. -
If the clause were left in that form it would be simply non-sense, because the words "nor shall a state" are left in.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Then I beg to move, first of all-
That the words "nor shall a state" be struck out.

If this be carried, I shall move the insertion, after the word "deny," of the words "to the citizens of other states the privileges and immunities of its own citizens."

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is the substance of what we have struck out.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The clause is really a one-legged one as it stands now. There is no substance in it. My amendment raises the question which was discussed this morning, and on which Mr. Isaacs took up a strong stand on the one side, and Mr. Kingston on the other-namely, that no state should be allowed to give privileges to its own citizens if it was not prepared to extend them to the citizens of other states. If some such amendment as I now propose is not made, it would be competent for New South Wales to declare that a citizen of Victoria on going to Broken Hill shall not have the same privilege of taking out a miner's right as a citizen of New South Wales has. In might induce a sort of back-handed protection.

Mr. SYMON. -

That would be prohibited under the trade and commerce provision.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I do not think so. That provision exists in America also, and, notwithstanding that, it has been decided that special laws may be passed by a state affecting the citizens of other states, as to entering into contracts, thus imposing a general limitation on the citizens of other states not applicable to the state's own citizens.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Suppose a Chinaman went from South Australia to Western Australia, would he be entitled to a miner's right?

Mr. GLYNN. -

It depends upon the state law. We have decided that state laws are to hold good until federal legislation applicable to these special races is passed.

Mr. TRENEWITH. -

You want to put a restriction in the Constitution.

Mr. GLYNN. -

There is no question of putting a restriction in the Constitution.

Mr. TRENEWITH. -

Leave the Federal Parliament to deal with the matter.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Races have been provided for already. Honorable members have races too much in their heads, I think. They are provided for under clause 53. I am dealing with the case of individuals apart from races altogether, and I say that, as regards individuals, it is inconsistent with the theory of citizenship that we are establishing, that a state should put all sorts of penalties on the citizens of other states. I think that, in this matter, we should make citizenship as wide and as basic as we possibly can under the fundamental principles of the Constitution.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
For that reason, support the striking out of the clause altogether.

Mr. GLYNN. -
But we should put something else in. I think we should insert the amendment I have proposed. If we do not put these words in, Western Australia can pass a law saying that a Victorian in Western Australia shall not be able to obtain a miner's right; and that is the sort of back-handed protection we should not permit under the Constitution, because if it be permitted we shall defeat the trade and commerce clause by enabling a state to impose special disabilities upon the men who carry on commerce.

The amendment to strike out the words "nor shall a state" was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -
It is proposed to further amend the clause by inserting, after the word "deny," the words-
"to the citizens of other states the privileges and immunities of its own citizens."

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
It seems to me that we do not altogether understand—at any rate I do not—the effect of this proposed provision. It has just been pointed out to me that under it many things might occur that we do not at the present time anticipate. For instance, there is a regulation in regard to professions in existence now in the various colonies. Solicitors cannot practise in one colony unless they conform to the laws of that colony. Other professions are in the same position.

Mr. GLYNN. -
This amendment would not affect that position at all.

Mr. GORDON. -
That has been decided.

Mr. REID. -
I think we had better agree to strike the clause out.
The amendment was negatived.
The clause was struck out.
Clause 111 was agreed to.
Clause 112-The Commonwealth shall protect every state against invasion, and, on the application of the Executive Government of a state, against domestic violence.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

I beg to move-

That the word "invasion" (line 2) be struck out, and the word "attack" substituted.

Why should the protection of the Commonwealth be confined only to invasion? We are not likely ever to be invaded, but we are exceedingly likely to be attacked.

Mr. BARTON. -

Any attack is an invasion in the sense in which the word is used in this clause.

Mr. GORDON. -

The gunning by a cruiser standing off a city is not an invasion, but it is an attack.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is an attack which is part of an invasion; if the attack succeeds invasion follows.

Mr. GORDON. -

I think "attack" is very much better. Of course, if the word "invasion" covers the ground, well and good; but while "attack" covers "invasion," does "invasion" cover "attack"? Originally, the amendment I intended to move used both the words "attack" and "invasion."

Mr. REID. -

You can repel an invasion 100 miles from the coast.

Mr. GORDON. -

But how does the honorable member know that an invasion is intended?

If there was a war between two countries, and a cruiser from the one country was approaching the other, you would know that it was not on a visit of brotherly love.

Mr. GORDON. -

They may not intend to invade the chances are that they do not intend to invade, but to attack.

Mr. BARTON. -

Do you think that the Commonwealth, if a hostile fleet appeared for the purpose of attacking, and not invading, would keep the batteries silent and the Australian fleet at anchor?

Mr. GORDON. -
Something may turn upon this. By this clause the Common-wealth is only bound to protect every state against invasion. If the Commonwealth neglected its duty, and South Australia was invaded, South Australia would have a claim against the Commonwealth. But, it appears to me, that it should have an equal claim against the Commonwealth if it was simply attacked, and not invaded. However, if the leader of the Convention thinks that "invasion" covers "attack," I am willing to leave the matter to the Drafting Committee, but I have some doubt on the point.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am perfectly satisfied that when the guns are booming there will be no discussion about the meaning of the two words.

Mr. GORDON. -

Ought the construction of this Act to be left until the guns are booming? I thought the object was to prevent the guns booming at all.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I think there is something in the point raised by my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon). We have previously used separately the terms "naval" and "military." Now, an attack would be naval, while an invasion would be military.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) press his amendment?

Mr. GORDON. -

No. If the leader of the Convention relies on his booming guns I am content.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of Victoria-

After "state" insert "or where in the opinion of the Governor-General it is necessary for the preservation of the public peace."

Mr. GORDON. -

I object most strongly to this interference with the state. The state is the proper party to ask for protection, and not the Governor-General, who is not a resident of the state, and may be badly advised.

Mr. BARTON. -

The state should be entitled to demand protection.

The amendment was negatived.

Clause 112 was agreed to.

Clause 113. - Every state shall make provision for the detention and punishment in its prisons of persons accused or convicted of offences against the laws of the Commonwealth and the Parliament of the Commonwealth, may make laws to give effect to this provision.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I think the words "or detention" should be inserted after "the detention." At present the clause reads-"The state shall make-provision for the detention and punishment in its prisons of persons accused or convicted," &c. We do not want to punish "persons accused." I beg to move-
That the words "or detention" be inserted after "detention."
The clause will then read-"For the detention or detention and punishment," &c.

Mr. Barton (New South Wales). -
I do not think that amendment would quite do. I could understand the clause being amended so as to make it read-"detention or punishment of persons accused or convicted." The object of the clause, as it stands, is to keep together the terms "accused or convicted," so, that the relation, both of accusation and conviction, to the laws of the Commonwealth may be made clear. The clause only applies to accusations or convictions in respect of laws of the Commonwealth, and, therefore, these words "accused or convicted" are kept together just before the words "offences against the laws of the Commonwealth." I think that if my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) would alter his amendment so as to make it read "detention or punishment," there can be no misreading of the clause.

Sir John Downer (South Australia). -
I think the words should stand as they are. You have to make provision for both things.

Mr. Glynn. -
Not for the punishment of accused persons.

Sir John Downer. -
Provision has to be made both for detention and punishment. I think the clause is clear enough as it stands at present.

Mr. Symon (South Australia). -
I believe that my honorable friend's (Mr. Glynn's) feeling is that, by leaving the words as they are, the clause might be interpreted to enable the federal authorities to demand from the state the detention and punishment of persons who were not convicted, but I do not apprehend that there is the slightest difficulty on that score. I do not think any court would interpret the words to mean the punishment of a person accused and not convicted.

Mr. Glynn (South Australia). -
My contention is that, as the clause stands, the words are to be read conjunctively in relation to the word "accused." The clause says that each state shall make provision for the detention and punishment of persons accused or convicted. You must read the word "punishment" in relation to "accused," as well as to "convicted." The clause should read-"For the detention, or detention and punishment, as the case may be, of persons accused or convicted," &c.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I think the clause might be amended to get out of the difficulty which has been pointed out. As it stands at present, it provides that the state shall make provision for the detention and punishment in its prisons of persons accused or convicted. Now, evidently, the detention is for those who have not yet been convicted, and the punishment is for those who have been convicted, and I think that those two classes ought to be separated.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have an amendment which I think will meet the case, and enable us to get on. I beg to move-

That the clause be amended by striking out the words after "detention" down to "Commonwealth," and substituting in lieu thereof the words "in its prisons of persons accused of offences against the laws of the Commonwealth, and the punishment of persons convicted of such offences."

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I would point out that, under the clause as now proposed to be amended, a state might make provision for whipping persons convicted, but not for detaining them in prison.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Detention may be part of the punishment.

Mr. GLYNN. -

But the punishment may not be detention, it may be flagellation. Are you going to allow a state to make provision for the character of the punishment for an offence against the Commonwealth?

Mr. Barton's amendment was agreed to.

Clause 113, as amended, was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. -

We will now go back to Chapter IV., dealing with finance, which was postponed.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the consideration of Chapter IV. be further postponed until after the consideration of Chapter VI.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

When are we to have the finance statement?

Mr. BARTON. -

The Finance Committee are now considering the drafting of the clauses, and they meet today, I believe. I need hardly remind the honorable member
(Mr. Higgins), that this is a matter which requires the greatest deliberation, and I think every necessary time must be allowed to the Finance Committee.

The motion for the postponement of Chapter IV. was agreed to.

CHAPTER VI. - NEW STATES.

Clause 114-The Parliament may, from time to time, admit to the Commonwealth any of the existing colonies of [name the existing colonies which have not adopted the Constitution], and may from time to time establish new states, and may, upon such admission or establishment, make or impose such terms and conditions, including the extent of representation in either House of the Parliament, as it thinks fit.

On this clause a great many amendments have been suggested, which it is somewhat difficult to put so that they can all be considered and voted upon, The Council and Assembly of Western Australia have suggested to omit the words "The Parliament may from time to time admit to the Commonwealth." The Council and Assembly of Tasmania have suggested to omit after "Parliament" the word "may," and insert "shall." Now, in order that both these amendments may be voted on, I will put as a test of the amendment suggested by Western Australia, the omission of the words "The Parliament." I can subsequently put the question whether the word "may" or the word "shall" shall be used.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Does not the Parliament of Western Australia propose the omission of these words with the view of substituting other words?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I may point out that the object is to make the clause read in this way:-

Any of the existing colonies may, on adopting this Constitution, be admitted to the Commonwealth, and shall thereupon become and be a state of the Commonwealth.

The amendment is in two parts, and this is the first part. I myself do not see any reason for changing the drafting of the Bill.

The amendment to strike out the words "The Parliament" was negatived.

The amendment to omit the word "may," with the view of substituting "shall," was also negatived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The next amendment is one suggested by the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania, for the insertion after the word "Commonwealth" (line 2) of the words "in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution."

The amendment was negatived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The Legislative Councils and Legislative Assemblies of New South Wales and Western Australia have suggested that we should omit all the rest of the clause after "new states." I shall now put, as a test question, as to whether the rest of the clause be left out or not, that the words "may from time to time establish new states," stand part of the clause.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Before considering that question, I desire to ask the leader of the Convention whether Queensland, if it subdivides, can come in? The right of adm

Mr. ISAACS. -

The clause provides that new states may be established from time to time.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Does that not apply to new states within the territorial jurisdiction of the Commonwealth?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No; you can take in New Guinea if you like.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I would like the opinion of the leader of the Convention on the point.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

This matter has not escaped the attention of the Drafting Committee, but so far they do not see that it is necessary to make any-alteration in this particular. The clause provides that the Parliament may, from time to time, admit to the Commonwealth any of the "existing colonies." That is, any of the colonies in their existing condition, and it also provides that the Parliament may, from time to time, establish new States. If an existing colony is sub-divided and becomes, say, instead of the colony of Queensland, three other colonies, although embracing the same territorial area as Queensland, they can be admitted to the Federation under the provision allowing the Parliament to establish new states. The admission phrase is designedly used so as to enable it to apply only to those colonies which might at first enter the Federation, and with their existing autonomy, and the remainder of the clause is intended to apply to the other colonies. However, I will give the matter reconsideration, although I think it is probable that the present wording will suffice.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
Do I understand correctly that any of the existing colonies of Australia can come in upon the terms of this Constitution, but that any new states constituted hereafter will come in under the latter portion of this clause? I take it that an existing colony coming in afterwards would not come in perhaps on the same terms as a colony that came in in the first instance. Is that the intention?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The intention is to allow to the Common-wealth, and to the state which has not at first joined the Federation, an opportunity of considering the terms of the admission of that state. Of course, it is very probable that, on the early admission of such a state as Queensland, no terms whatever would be proposed. On the other hand, if new interests grow up, and new states sought admission to the Commonwealth, these terms and conditions would become very important. It is absolutely necessary to repose power in the Commonwealth to prescribe terms and conditions to meet cases which none of us can foresee.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Every one will agree to that, because it cuts both ways. A colony which does not enter in the first instance, however, may be able to enter on more favorable terms.

Mr. BARTON. -

Or on less favorable terms, as the Parliament of the Common-wealth may prescribe.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

Am I correct in assuming that, even though Queensland is not represented in this Convention, it will be competent for that colony to come in as one of the original states, if her Parliament passes addresses to the Imperial Parliament at the same time as the Parliaments of the other colonies?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think there can be no doubt as to the competency of the Imperial Parliament, which is a sovereign Parliament, to include Queensland in the blank space where the colonies joining in the Federation have to be enumerated. Of course before that is done, it is very probable that some means will be taken to see whether the other colonies, through their respective Governments, are anxious for the admission of Queensland. It might be that some official inquiry of that kind would be made, or that inquiry might not be made. The Imperial Parliament could admit Queensland without making any such inquiry, but all precedents teach us that such an inquiry would be made, and upon the satisfactory answer to that inquiry, the petition of Queensland would be acceded to, I take it, so long as it was presented before the time when the Bill was submitted to the Imperial Parliament.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

The point which Mr. Holder raised is a very important one, and if there is any doubt about it the clause ought to be made clear. In the preamble of the Bill there is no limitation.

Mr. BARTON. -

No, it is left to the Imperial Parliament to enumerate in the Bill the colonies which are to form the Federation, according to the addresses adopted by their respective Parliaments.

Mr. SYMON. -

But there is no barrier to prevent Queensland adopting this Constitution any more than there is to prevent any of the colonies represented here from doing so.

Mr. BARTON. -

Quite so; that is involved in what I previously said.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

The only question before the Chair is as to whether the words "may from time to time establish new states" are to remain in the clause.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Yes, and that is put as a test question as to whether we are to strike out the rest of the clause.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

As attention is riveted on those words, I will do what I have not done as yet throughout the Convention, namely, direct the notice of the Drafting Committee to the way in which this clause is drawn. I cannot see why the word "establish" is used there, and I would suggest to the Drafting Committee, very respectfully, that if Queensland were divided into three colonies before the people of that part of Australia applied for admission to the Federation, it would be quite a false statement to say that the Federal Commonwealth establishes those three colonies.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, the clause speaks of establishing them as new states, not as colonies.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I only want to take care that there shall be no mystical distinction urged hereafter as between "establish" and "admit." Those three colonies would be established by the Imperial Parliament. I think that the true wording of the clause is that the Federal Parliament may admit any existing colonies or any new states hereafter created.
Mr. SYMON. -

Why not say "establish or admit"?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes; I cannot see the force of the distinction that is drawn between "establish" and "admit" in this connexion. There is a force in our ordinary parlance. However, I will not move an amendment, because the drafting of the Bill is in the hands of very competent persons, and but for the fact that these words are being specially dealt with, I would not have risen to say that the word "establish" here is not the correct word to use.

The question that the words "may from time to time establish new states" stand part of the clause was resolved in the affirmative.

Amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of South Australia-
Omit "including the extent of representation in either House of the Parliament."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think these words might safely be retained. Looking at the provisions in the Bill for the preservation of representation, I think it just as well that in a clause of this kind, which gives power to the Commonwealth to make terms for the admission of new states, power should also be given to deal with the question of their representation. I think this is one of the safeguards which should speak to the Parliament of the Commonwealth, as well as to us who are framing the Constitution. The principle that the Commonwealth when once established, in making terms with those who seek admission, should have the power to deal also with representation may wisely be implanted in the Constitution.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I think that the Commonwealth should be able to make terms with new states seeking admission, but I do not think that it should be able to deal with a matter of such vital importance as their representation in the Senate or the House of Representatives. I look upon the principle of equal representation in the Senate as one of the cardinal features of the Constitution. There is no such power given to the American Congress as is proposed to be given here, and if we, who claim equal representation in the Senate as our dearest right, allow it to be surrendered in the case of others we must look to our own position. This is a question of principle. I say that if Queensland enters the Federation as a whole, or as more than one state, each new state should enter upon the same terms in respect of representation. I look upon this as an essential feature of the great example of federation afforded by the United States, which has stood the test of time, and which excites the admiration of the civilized world.
Mr. ISAACS. -
It has caused a great deal of dissatisfaction.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
I have never heard of it. The dissatisfaction which exists in regard to the United States Senate is as to the mode of appointing the Senate, not because of the equal state representation there. I have searched into the matter very carefully, and I have spoken to representatives of American thought upon this point, and I find that there is no strong body of public opinion opposed to the principle of equal state representation.

Mr. ISAACS. -
There is a strong objection to giving Nevada one representative to every 21,000 of her population, while New York has only one representative for millions of her population.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Remarks may be made about an anomaly of that kind, but the fact that such an anomaly is necessary to maintain the principle only shows how strongly the people of the United States are attached to the principle. Unless we strike out these words we who plead for equal representation in the Senate endanger our own position.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -
Do I understand that if Queensland were divided into three states each of these states would have six representatives in the Senate?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
If the Parliament of the Commonwealth admitted them.

Mr. HOWE. -
That looks very well on the face of it; but I think the power of dealing with representation should be left to the Federal Parliament.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
It is left to the Federal Parliament, because if Queensland chose to split herself up into homeopathic parts the Federal Parliament could refuse to admit those parts as states.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -
Is it intended under this clause to allow the Parliament of the Commonwealth to carve new states out of existing states?

Mr. BARTON. -
It seems to me that that must be the intention.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I would suggest that this power should be exercised only with the consent of the Parliaments of the states.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
If the right honorable member will look at clause 117, he will see that no state can alienate any part of its territory without the consent of the state Parliament. While the Federal Parliament is empowered to establish new states, there is a condition imposed which prevents territory from being available for a new state until it has been conceded by the Parliament of the state to which it belongs.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

As the leader of the Convention has referred to clause 117, I would draw attention to the fact that the great obstacle which prevents Queensland from joining the Federation is that at the present time the colony may be subdivided upon petition to Her Majesty the Queen, and a large proportion of the people there are afraid to come under a Constitution which might take away Her Majesty's prerogative in this respect, and prevent any division of the colony without the consent of the state Parliament. That was really the reason why the Queensland Federal Bill was not passed.

The CHAIRMAN. -

These remarks will be more in order when we are dealing with clause 117.

Mr. WALKER. -

Yes; but the leader of the Convention having referred to the clause I took the liberty of mentioning the matter.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I am obliged to the leader of the Convention for this direction to clause 117; but I suggest that it might be preferable if in clause 114 we made it additionally clear that the power of establishing new states should not be exercised without the consent of the Parliament of the state affected. I only ask the honorable and learned member to consider the matter further. I have looked at the provisions of the clause to which he has called attention, but this is such a large power that I think its real extent should be placed beyond doubt.

Mr. LYNE. -

Does not the right honorable member think that it is placed beyond doubt by clause 117?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I do not.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

To be consistent upon this matter, I intend to vote in such a way as will allow new states to join the Commonwealth upon the same terms as existing states, though at the same time I am altogether opposed to the principle of equal state representation. If, however, equal state representation is allowed to Tasmania, South Australia, and Western Australia, I cannot see why new states should not be given the same privilege. This only shows to what a great extent the principle of equal representation can be carried.

The amendment was negatived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment having been negatived, I shall not put the consequent amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of South Australia.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 115. - (Provisional government of territories.)

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

There is a question as to whether the word "provisional" should remain. Where the territory is not part of an existing state, of course the Parliament might raise that territory into a state after a certain term of government; but when the territory is part of an existing state that can only be done by the consent of the state or its Parliament. As to these territories the word "provisional" is probably not an incorrect description, but the question arises whether it is a necessary word. The administration and government of a territory, are words quite sufficient to describe the process as it goes on. It might not be wise to use this word "Provisional," implying an entirely temporary government, because there might be territories which, after they became part of the Commonwealth, might not for many years, if at all, become states.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The word is not used in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BARTON. -

I fancy it is not. I think it was only introduced in the Bill of 1891. I beg to move that the word "provisional" be struck out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales- Omit the words "any territory surrendered by any state to and accepted by the Commonwealth, or."

The amendment was negatived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

There is another amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of South Australia, to add at the end of the clause the following words:-

No federal territory shall be alienated in fee simple, nor shall it be leased for a longer period than 50 years, except upon payment of a perpetual rent, which shall be subject to periodical appraisement at intervals of not more than ten years.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I promised the honorable member who moved this amendment in the South Australian Assembly to amend it in a direction that he agreed would be desirable. As it stands, I believe it is in substance the amendment moved in Adelaide by the honorable member (Mr. Wise); but it would prevent an exchange of land. It also introduces two forms of leases—one for 50 years, and the other in perpetuity. I beg to move—

That the amendment be amended by leaving out all the words after "fee simple," with the view to insert the following words:—"except by way of exchange for other territory, nor leased, except in perpetuity at its fair annual rent, subject to periodic appraisement at intervals of not more than fourteen years, in a manner to be determined by Parliament."

The amendment will amount to this: That there is to be no alienation in fee simple, and any alienation must be in the form of a lease in perpetuity, at a rent to be periodically appraised, in a manner to be determined by Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS. — Suppose it is not Crown land at all?

Mr. GLYNN. — It applies to federal territory.

Mr. HIGGINS. — It might be federal territory, and yet part of it might be owned by private individuals.

Mr. GLYNN. — That is a question affecting the original amendment, which I merely wish to amend. After the federal capital is decided upon, the Federal Parliament might have a large quantity of land which might not be used for building, the leasing of which might in the future yield an enormous amount of rent, which could be applied in diminution of taxation.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. — Let the Federal Parliament deal with that.

Mr. GLYNN. — Unless we put in this provision, goodness knows when the Federal Parliament might adopt the principle. I am not speaking on the principle at present; I believe in it, but I am not going to re-argue the question.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). — This is one of the numerous questions which might very well be left to the Federal Parliament. It opens up the whole question of perpetual leasing, which might be discussed for months. This is clearly a question for the Federal Parliament to decide. The various colonies will be represented in the Federal Parliament on this question, as on others which have been discussed here at very great length. The representatives of the different colonies will have an opportunity of airing their theories about the occupation of land, and it would be a waste of time to discuss the question now. I have not taken part in past discussions, for the very reason that I am now giving why we should not discuss this question. It seems to me that we have spent a great deal of time in deliberating upon questions which might very well have been left for the decision of the Federal Parliament. It seems to me to be specially appropriate that we should leave this subject to the Federal Parliament. No doubt the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) is quite earnest in his desire to establish the theory which he holds as to the occupation of land, but I hope that he will be content to leave it to be dealt with hereafter, and that he will not ask us to enter upon such a very wide discussion.

Mr. Glynn's amendment was negatived.

The amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of South Australia was negatived.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 116 (Alteration of limits of states) was agreed to.

Clause 117-A new state shall not be formed by separation of territory from a state without the consent of the Parliament thereof, nor shall a state be formed by the union of two or more states or parts of states, or the limits of a state be altered, without the consent of the Parliament or Parliaments of the state or states affected.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

As I have already remarked, I hope that the leader of the Convention and the Drafting Committee will see their way to alter this clause so as to provide for a contingency which I should be sorry to see arise. The event of Queensland coming into the Federation will depend upon Her Majesty's prerogative being maintained with regard to the division or separation of that colony. At present Her Majesty can sub-divide that colony upon a requisition from the inhabitants. We should, if possible, continue that power, so that if Queensland should come into the Federation, Northern and Central Queensland could, by petition to Her Majesty, have that portion of the colony, if they so desire, separated into another colony, and at the same time remain within the Commonwealth. I will not detain the committee, because, on this matter, I am only putting forward a suggestion. I do not propose to move an amendment. I think I am not equal to framing an amendment in legal phraseology, but I believe the leader of the Convention is perfectly competent to speak on this subject, having been interviewed, to my knowledge, by the chairman of the Separation Committee in Rockhampton, from which committee, by-the-bye, the Convention received a petition in Adelaide setting out the peculiar position of Central and Northern Queensland. I, therefore, ask Mr. Barton if he will kindly see whether it is possible to draft a clause by which Queensland may more readily come into the Commonwealth than I fear she otherwise would do?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
This is a very prickly subject, because if you endeavour to keep alive the present power of delimiting and subdividing Queensland without the consent of its Parliament, and import this into the Constitution, the danger arises whether, if you secure the assent of either Northern and Central Queensland to the Constitution, you may not alienate a large majority in Southern Queensland. Again, the difficulty would arise, and I confess it is still a difficulty, that if you keep in this Constitution a provision which necessitates the assent of the Parliament of a colony before that colony can be subdivided, that gives the majority in Southern Queensland powers over the minority in Central and Northern Queensland which they do not wish to be denied, and it might make the Constitution distasteful to them. As far as I am concerned, I do not like to handle the subject. It may be that before much time has elapsed Queensland will have got rid of this difficulty and will have agreed to some form of separation.

Mr. FRASER. -
They are getting rid of it now.

Mr. BARTON. -
The way of dealing with this question that my honorable friend (Mr. Walker) proposes is, I am afraid, not a way of getting rid of the difficulty. I will make him this promise: I will draft for him some such provision as will meet his views in reference to this matter. I will not move the amendment myself, but if it is the wish of the Convention to recommit the clause later on there will then be an opportunity for him to move its insertion.

Mr. WALKER. -
I thank the honorable member.

The clause was agreed to.

Chapter IV. was further postponed until after the consideration of Chapter VII.

CHAPTER VII. - MISCELLANEOUS.
Clause 118-The seat of government of the Commonwealth shall be determined by the Parliament.

Until such determination the Parliament shall be summoned to meet at such place within the Commonwealth as a majority of the Governors of the states, or, in the event of an equal division of opinion amongst the Governors, as the Governor-General shall direct.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales-

After "shall be," in line 2, omit remainder of clause, insert "in Sydney, in the colony of New South Wales."

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

Before that amendment is put, I should like to move a prior amendment, namely, to substitute for the word "Common-wealth" the word "Australia." I want the seat of government of the Commonwealth to be known as the capital of Australia, not that I have any objection to the word "Commonwealth"-I believe in the word "Commonwealth," which I wish to see retained-but because I want to see the word "Australia" used as coterminous with the word "Commonwealth." I want to see every inducement given to every state to come into the Commonwealth, in order that they may become and remain a component part of Australia. I do not want to offer any inducement to any state that she will gain prestige or increased status by standing out. I do not want, when the Commonwealth is established, to see Australia divided into two parts-the Commonwealth of Australia and a colony.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

You will never hear of a colony.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I do not know. We do not want Australia known as being divided into two parts. We want the word "Australia" to convey the highest expression of Australian life, that is to say, the Commonwealth. I want everybody who is a citizen of the Commonwealth to be able to say-"I am a citizen of Australia," without any ambiguity whatever. I do not want anybody who hails from Australia to be asked-"What part of Australia do you come from? Do you come from the Commonwealth, or from such-and-such a colony?" I want the two words to be identical in meaning and synonymous. At the same time I do not want to eliminate the word "Commonwealth," or say anything derogatory of the word "Commonwealth," because I believe that word has a meaning which carries out our wishes.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You cannot legislate against other people. Suppose Queensland remains out, it will still be entitled to call its part of the territory Australia.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

She will still remain Queensland, and we will remain Australia. I am not speaking in reference to Queensland or to any particular state. I am speaking in reference to any state which chooses to stand out from the general understanding and to remain a distinct and separate state.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You want to collar the name.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
I do not want to collar the name-it is our right.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Look at clause 4.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Probably clause 4 will be the better clause in which to move the amendment. It is a matter which I think we will have to consider. I would like to see the amendment made here, because, I think, it is a matter which very closely concerns our national life. Of course an alteration will have to be made in clause 4, and the alteration I would suggest, if I am permitted to say what the result of making the alteration will be-

The CHAIRMAN. -
We must not discuss over again what we are going to call the Constitution. The question before the committee now is what we are going to call the capital.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
I do not want to reverse the vote which has been arrived at, and with which I am absolutely in sympathy. I simply want to make Australia and the Commonwealth synonymous terms. And if clause 4 is the correct place in which to move an amendment, I would suggest that instead of the words "the seat of government of the Commonwealth" we should use the words "the seat of government of Australia."

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
How are you going to enforce it?

The CHAIRMAN. -
I do not think we ought to go back to clause 4.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
I will not go back to that clause; I will move the amendment here, and it is not antagonistic to any vote which has been arrived at, because I think it is the proper place to make the amendment. All I am asking is that our seat of government-our capital city-shall be known, not as the seat of government of the "Commonwealth," but as the seat of government of "Australia." I do not mean to speak at any length, not because I do not want honorable members to agree with me, but because I think, when they look at the matter, they will themselves see that it is the correct thing for us to do, that we have a right to do it, and that this clause is the proper place in the Bill to do it. I only want honorable members to take the matter into their consideration. I do not want to spring a surprise on the committee, or to ask honorable members to vote on the matter, of which perhaps they have not considered the bearings. I believe that when the committee takes the whole matter into its consideration, it will agree with me that the words "Commonwealth" and "Australia" should be synonymous terms, and that we should leave no loophole or ambiguity with regard to what the meaning of Australia is to be in the future. We mean Australia to be our Commonwealth-our Federation of States.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - Would it not do to use the words "and shall be the capital of Australia"?

Dr. COCKBURN. - I am not wedded to any form of words. I am only anxious to give expression to what I think will be the general feeling, and the legitimate aspiration of the people of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). - The honorable member may rely very strongly on my support, but the amendment should be made in clause 3 or clause 4.

Mr. BARTON. - Clause 4 is only a definition, and I propose to strike that definition out. There will be an opportunity of moving the amendment on clause 3.

Mr. SYMON. - That would be the proper place for the amendment, and I would ask the honorable member not to press it now. If we were to put it in here, it would be a contradiction in terms, because if clause 3 remains, the name of the Federation we are creating is not Australia, but the Commonwealth of Australia. If there were three or four colonies standing out, each of those colonies would have a right to object to our arrogating the name of Australia. If the name of Australia is to be adopted-and I give my strongest adhesion to that proposal-the amendment should be inserted in clause 3.

The CHAIRMAN. - It seems to me that we are discussing a question that has been already settled by the committee. If clause 3 is the proper place for the amendment, it can be dealt with on that clause.

Dr. COCKBURN. - I shall be quite willing to move the amendment then. I thought that this was the proper place for it.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The question before the Chair is the amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales, to insert the words "in Sydney, in the colony of New South Wales."

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -
I do not intend at this stage to speak at length on this question. It will be understood that if there was any prospect of the amendment being carried I would support it very strongly. Many objections have been raised to the federal capital being at any spot close to the seashore, or in a position where it could easily be attacked. Before discussing the question of Sydney being the capital, I should like to hear what other honorable members have to say. If this proposal is negated, I intend to submit a further amendment, of which I have given the Chairman notice, to the effect that the capital shall be in the state of New South Wales.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -
I desire to move an amendment on the amendment.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Hobart.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
That is it. It is no better joke than the suggestion that Sydney should be the capital of the Commonwealth. Nature has fixed upon Hobart as the capital. Everything points to it or some other place in Tasmania as the capital.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You must build a bridge across.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
All that would be done by the Commonwealth.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Would not Launceston do as well?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
I will not say anything against Launceston. I desire simply to move that the capital be at some suitable place in the state of Tasmania, and I am sure that honorable members who aspire to seats in the Federal Parliament will support me. They will know that in going to perform their duties at the centre of government they will be making no sacrifice of health or personal comfort.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It may be 105 in the shade in Hobart.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
No, it cannot reach that. I beg to move-
That the amendment be amended by striking out "Sydney," with a view
Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I have an amendment which will, I think, come before this amendment. I propose to insert a word before "Sydney." We undoubtedly have in this colony of Victoria a place which is well suited, by nature and by what has been done for it, for the federal capital. We possess buildings well adapted to the purpose, and we have a climate unrivalled for changes in any part of the Australian colonies. I have the honour of representing in the local Parliament a portion of this great colony of Victoria, and I should be wanting in my duty, having regard to other proposals submitted by honorable members who were just as serious probably as I am, if I failed to put forward the claims of Victoria or some part of it to be the federal capital. I propose to insert before the words "in Sydney" the words "St. Kilda."

The CHAIRMAN. -

I am afraid I cannot put that amendment, unless the Right Hon. the Premier of Tasmania withdraws his proposal.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

There is one colony which, in this discussion, has been overlooked, and it has greater claims, I think, in some

Mr. DEAKIN. -

"Where every prospect pleases."

Mr. SYMON. -

And where we hope-when the Federal Parliament sits there-the latter part of the quotation will not apply. I shall therefore move at the proper time that Mount Gambier be selected as the federal capital.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

What about the earthquake at Mount Gambier?

Mr. SYMON. -

Well, a recurrence of that event would be a pleasant variety at any rate, it would not be so alarming as the earthquakes my honorable friend sometimes creates in this chamber.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I suppose that the whole discussion on this question is more or less of a jest, and I think I must take a turn when there is a joke going on. But seriously, sir, this matter will have to be left to the Federal Parliament. If, however, we are going to argue it seriously now-if the Convention were-in a state of mind in which it could be argued seriously-I should like to point out that, from the geographical point of view, the centre of gravity of Australia lies at one definite point.

Mr. FRASER. -

Where is that?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Adelaide, which is situated on the water-way that is the most important water-way to the centre of the continent. Whereas there would be great difficulty in regard to the federal capital being situated either at Sydney or Melbourne, I do not think the same objection would hold good with regard to Adelaide. I think, speaking off-hand, that although Sydney and Melbourne would resent the necessary conditions of the federal capital being located at either place, Adelaide would consent to them. But there is another point to be taken into consideration. Judging from our debates, what has proved to be the most important part of Australia? Undoubtedly the River Murray. The Murray has proved itself to be as it were the thread which has held our discussions together. I would also like to point out, by way of analogy, that all the capitals that have for any lengthened period occupied an important place upon the page of history have been cities situated on important rivers. On these grounds, I should like to put in a claim first of all on behalf of Adelaide, and failing that for some city situated on the River Murray.

The amendment to strike out the word "Sydney" was agreed to.

The amendment for the insertion of the words "in some suitable place in Tasmania" was negatived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment now before the Chair is Mr. Lyne's amendment for the insertion of the words "in the colony of New South Wales."

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

Honorable members seem to be in a rather laughing mood in regard to this question. Now, I am not in a laughing mood.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Are you ever in a laughing mood?

Mr. LYNE. -

I am as serious in regard to this question as I have been in regard to any other, and I venture to think that the whole of the arguments are in favour of having the federal capital in New South Wales. I would not press just now a proposal that the capital should be in Sydney, because I believe that there is a great deal in the argument I have heard that Sydney is a likely place of attack. The same objection operates against the selection of Melbourne, and to an even greater extent against Hobart. All these places would be easily open to attack in case of war. But the colony of New South Wales would be satisfied to leave the selection of the federal capital to the Commonwealth, if it were determined that the place should be within the territory of New South Wales. We have, as every one knows, many sites where the climate is good, which are suitable in regard to position, and which possess all the qualities that are requisite to make any one of them an ideal spot for the federal capital. I venture also to think that the position of New South Wales, if at any future time Queensland comes into the Federation, makes her the more suitable colony to contain the federal capital. There can be no complete federation without Queensland, with the possibilities before that great country, and even if we frame a Constitution which will be acceptable to the other states, the time will not be far distant when Queensland will come into it. That being so, in selecting the position of the capital for Australia we should choose a site which will be suitable to Queensland, as well as to the other colonies, and for that purpose there can be no colony more fitted than the colony of New South Wales. We have been invited to visit Ballarat on Friday, and some one has whispered to me that this is to give the representatives a good opinion of Ballarat, with a view to its being selected as the site for the federal capital. I only hope that the climate of Ballarat is better than the climate of Melbourne has been for the last few days. If not, it will have a very poor show of being selected as the federal capital; and I should also think that the heat we have had here will place Melbourne out of the running altogether. I do not wish to debate the question at any length, because the suggestion I have made must, I think, commend itself to every member of this Convention. Albury has been mentioned as a suitable place. The climate there is not so good as it is at other places in New South Wales, but for many reasons it is a good spot. There are also many other suitable localities in New South Wales. There is a wise provision in this Bill, that there should be an area of territory around the federal capital, where-ever it may be, which shall be federal territory. It would be most difficult that that should be provided either in Sydney or in Melbourne, or in any other large city of Australia. I am also of opinion that it would not be a wise thing to select a spot where there is at present no settlement, as was done in the United States of America. We could easily select a spot where we have a settled population at present. Holding these ideas, I hope that this Convention will not treat the matter lightly, because it is an important matter for us to consider. I trust that honorable members will consent to some spot in New South Wales being selected. I have heard many honorable members say that they will agree to that. Let us now see by their votes whether they will do so.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
Will you name the place?

Mr. LYNE. -

No; I should not like to name the place at the present time.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I hope the clause will be left exactly as it stands. If my vote could establish the capital of the Commonwealth in New South Wales, I certainly would not give my vote to that effect. I hope that the time will come when New South Wales will be selected as the place for the capital of the Federation, but from the point of view of the Convention, it matters very little to New South Wales whether the capital is there or in Western Australia. In this respect, I think that the position of New South Wales is exactly the same as the position of the state of New York, the capital of which is Albany. The capital of the state of New York contains 91,000 inhabitants—that is, the legal capital of the state of New York—but the city of New York, with Brooklyn, which forms part of the same city, contains 2,500,000 inhabitants. Wherever you fix the capital of Federated Australia, I feel sure that the facilities of trade will fix the capital where those facilities are the greatest, and I am not at all concerned as to where the capital will be fixed as a matter of law, because I know where it will be as a matter of fact.

Mr. LYNE. -

You do?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Yes; insomuch as there is no other city with the facilities of Sydney, the capital will, de facto, be Sydney, although it may, de jure, be in Western Australia. I think it is a small thing to quarrel about, or devote our attention to at present. Representing New South Wales, I am perfectly prepared to leave it to the Federal Parliament to determine where the capital of the Commonwealth shall be.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I confess that I cannot follow the observations of the honorable member who has just said that he represents New South Wales, and, at the same time, I think this is not a subject upon which there should be any prolonged debate. I put it to the Convention that the colony of New South Wales is entitled to the passage of this amendment. At the same time, I do not wish to press my view upon any honorable member of this Convention. It is a matter which each member must decide for himself. I cannot conceal from myself my own belief that the great burden, the chief burden, of this future Federation will be upon the colony of New South Wales. I cannot conceal from myself the fact that the main object of this federation is to bring New South Wales within the reach of the other colonies for the purposes of intercourse and trade—very proper purposes—and, from her position in the group of the Australasian colonies, I believe that she is entitled to the passage of this amendment. I think that all those members of the Convention who are of the same opinion as myself ought to help Mr. Lyne to remove this matter from the region of doubt; but, I say again that it is not a matter on which I will presume in the slightest degree to expect any member of this Convention to be guided by me. I simply ask for a conscientious vote on this question.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales).—

I hope that there will be no vote on this question. I hope that the amendment will be negatived. I quite agree with Sir Joseph Abbott that this is entirely a matter for the Federal Parliament to determine. That has always been agreed upon, and certainly whatever hope New South Wales has in the future of having the federal capital within her borders, I do not think her chances will be improved by a discussion of the question at the present time. There is no doubt that to us this question of the capital of the Commonwealth is involved very greatly in the coming in of Queensland to this Federation. To my mind—I only give my own view—there is no doubt that if Queensland comes in, the federal capital, if we have regard to convenience and everything, will find its natural position somewhere in New South Wales, and I hope also that the capital of the Commonwealth will be located on one of the tablelands of one of the colonies, whichever may be chosen, so that it may have a healthy situation. I think, however, that it would be lamentable for us to divide on a question like this, on which we are sure to be in a minority.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia).—

I should like to know whether the mover of the amendment intends to press it to a division?

Mr. LYNE. —

Most decidedly I will.

Mr. HOWE. —

Then I feel that it behoves me, as a representative of South Australia, to say a few words on the question. I am sorry that the mover of the amendment did not listen to the words of wisdom which fell from Sir Joseph Abbott. I consider that at this juncture it would be highly inadvisable to try to get a vote on the amendment, because it would place those who are in sympathy with New South Wales in this matter in a false position. My sympathies are entirely with the mother colony.

Mr. LYNE. -
Then vote for the amendment.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
This is not the place to determine the question.

Mr. HOWE. -
I say that the mother colony-

Mr. KINGSTON. -
The senior colony.

Mr. HOWE. -
I choose to designate New South Wales as the mother colony, and I hope I will not offend my right honorable colleague by doing so. I have always done so. I say that we should consider the position of the mother colony. She has natural resources, I believe, far and away, according to her area, beyond those of any of the other colonies existing at the present time.

Mr. FRASER. -
Queensland is running her a very tight race.

Mr. HOWE. -
She has beautiful up-lands, a grand river system, and there are many places within her borders eminently suited for the federal capital; but while I say all this, and while my feelings are favorable towards the mover of the amendment and the amendment itself, I feel that this is one of those questions which, unless we are going to cause greater dissension in this camp than has ever existed before, should be left entirely to, the Federal Parliament. Consequently, I ask the honorable member, if it is not yet too late, to reconsider the matter, and not put his friends in a false position, but withdraw the amendment, and leave it to an even higher tribunal than this to deal with the matter.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I really feel, from the tone of the Convention, that this amendment is going to be negatived.

Mr. FRASER. -
That is so.

Mr. HOWE. -
You should not press it to a vote.

Mr. REID. -
Yes, I feel that now; and the main object with me in supporting my friend—and I will support him to the finish, if necessary; it is a matter for his decision—my object in asking this Convention, at this time, to carry Mr. Lyne's amendment is, I can assure honorable members, although it may seem to have rather a provincial complexion, entirely in the interests, from our point of view, of the success of this movement. I, therefore, did not press my views upon any other honorable member, because I could not press on honorable members the fact that the settlement of this question now would, in my opinion, give an immense help to us in New South Wales in securing their forgetfulness of many points in this Constitution which we and they have a strong objection to. But, now that we have brought the matter before the Convention, and now that I feel that the Convention does practically refuse to insert these words, I think that my friend (Mr. Lyne) may well save the members of the Convention from a vote which, in many cases, might be a most invidious one to give; and which might cause those who will eventually support, perhaps, the claims of the mother colony if this matter is not pressed now, not to appear in that light. At the same time, I confess my disappointment that the matter has not been received in a more favorable spirit.

Mr. HOWE. -

What about St. Kilda?

Mr. REID. -

Now I am quite prepared, under the circumstances, since I see that the feeling of the Convention is what it is, to say that I think my friend (Mr. Lyne), feeling that we have no chance of carrying this amendment, might, to that extent, save members of the Convention from going to a division on this matter, as we have practically got our answer without a division. At the same time, I very much regret that the amendment is not going to be successful, but if my honorable friend presses the matter to a division, I shall be compelled to vote with him, on the grounds which were alleged by so many members in a recent debate, with so much earnestness, that we ought to vote according to our conscientious convictions.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

There are several reasons why my honorable friend (Mr. Lyne) should withdraw his amendment. Of course, in a body like this, it is a strong reason for withdrawing an amendment if one finds that a proposition involving a matter, not of principle, but of expediency, is sure to be defeated. I wish to put another consideration to my honorable friend, which I am sure he will think a strong one. It is this: If he persists in forcing his amendment to a division, it will assuredly be taken that honorable members who represent the other colonies, and who vote against the proposal, are against the establishment of the federal capital in New South Wales.

Mr. LYNE. -
I believe that they are.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -
No.
Mr. BARTON. -
Whatever their honest opinions may be—however strongly they may hold that, while the situation of the federal capital should be determined by the Federal Parliament, it would be just and right that it should be in New South Wales—out-of-doors they will be accounted to have voted against having the federal capital in New South Wales. While honorable members will be voting against the amendment upon the ground that this is not the place to determine the matter, it will be considered that they are voting against the claims of New South Wales. The effect of this will be very serious hereafter, when the claims of New South Wales come to be debated, because it will be argued that those who have voted against the amendment, many of whom may be in the Federal Parliament, have already expressed a disinclination to see the capital established in New South Wales, and they will be taunted with inconsistency if they afterwards give another vote.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
They will have a record put up against them.
Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, and that so far from helping my honorable friend will be most mischievous. I am strongly of opinion that when the proper time comes for the settlement of this matter it should be decided that the federal capital shall be in New South Wales, and I may even vote for the amendment; but I ask the honorable member not to press it to a division, because a defeat will not only be mischievous at the present time, but will also diminish the chance of the success of his proposal in the future. If the motion is rejected, I think it ought to be explained everywhere that the bringing of it forward was a serious handicap upon the chance of New South Wales, and I am sure my honorable friend would not like to take the responsibility of having imposed this handicap.

Mr. LYNE. -
The honorable and learned member throws that out as a threat, but I am prepared to take all the responsibility which attaches to my action.
Mr. BARTON. -
It is not a threat, but I wish the honorable member to recollect how tremendously the defeat of this proposal may be used, not only against him, but what is worse, against the object he has in view. I take it that I shall be supported in this advice by nearly every member of the Convention, including the majority of the New South Wales representatives. The Premier of New South Wales has tendered the same advice as I am giving, and other representatives of New South Wales have done the same. I am sure that other honorable members think that, when the proper time comes, the honorable member's view will be carried into effect, and, in my opinion, those who hold that view—and I am sure they are not few—will concur with me in the suggestion that the object the honorable member wishes to attain will have far more chance of success if he withdraws the amendment, and trusts to the sense of equity which will prevail with the Federal Parliament to grant absolute justice to New South Wales, than if he forces the amendment to a division.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia).—

I, too, would like the honorable member to withdraw the amendment. If he persists in forcing it to a division I shall vote against it. At the same time, I should not like it to be thought that I am opposed to the claims of New South Wales. The matter, however, is one which in my opinion should be left to the Federal Parliament. No doubt a great many honorable members hold strong views in regard to the position which the federal capital should occupy, but since 1891 they have always been content to suppress them and to leave the matter to the Federal Parliament. We have met four times to consider the drafting of the Constitution, but until now no motion of this kind has been made.

Mr. LYNE. -

Yes, a similar motion was moved at the Convention of 1891.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Well, it was not much listened to, and I think that we should leave the matter to the Federal Parliament. Everyone knows that I have no feeling against the great colony of New South Wales. On the contrary, I should like to help those who are representing that colony as much as possible, because I recognise that they have an arduous task before them. At the same time, we must not forget that we are here specially at the invitation of New South Wales, and it ill becomes that colony to urge to the furthest extent a claim of this kind. I think she should be content, seeing that she will have the largest representation there, to leave the matter to the Federal Parliament. If the amendment is forced to a division, I shall vote against it; but I wish it to be distinctly understood that my vote will in no way indicate my view as to what should be the position of the federal capital.

Mr. LYNE. -

If the right honorable member is in the Federal Parliament, will he vote for the establishment of the federal capital in New South Wales?
Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

I join with the leader of the Convention and the Premier of New South Wales in urging the honorable member to withdraw the amendment. No one feels more strongly than I do that if a test vote could be taken upon the merits of the proposal it should be taken now; but I fear, with the leader of the Convention, that the votes which are given will not be given for or against the claims of New South Wales, but will be given upon the question whether we should in any way tie the hands of the Federal Parliament in the choice of its own capital. I do not believe with those who think that this is a matter which should be left to the Federal Parliament, but, at the same time, I do not think that the claims of New South Wales should be jeopardized by any unwise proceeding at this juncture. So far as New South Wales is concerned there is a very strong feeling upon this point. Without again importing into the discussion the possibility of risking the federation, because I hope there will be no risk after the explanation which will be given to the people of New South Wales by the leader of the Convention and by the Premier, I would point out that the treatment which that colony has for many years received from the people of the neighbouring colonies has bred the feeling, though it has not been expressed by retaliation at the borders, that the people of the other colonies are unfriendly towards New South Wales. That feeling largely predominates in the public mind, and it has not been created by New South Welshmen. It has been created by our fellow colonists in the other colonies.

Mr. HOWE. -

The feeling does not exist in our colony.

Mr. BARTON. -

We should not do anything here to increase that feeling.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I quite agree with my honorable friend, but I wish to point out that that feeling does exist, and that we ought to be careful to avoid doing anything to intensify it. Therefore, it should be made manifest at this juncture, if the motion is withdrawn, or if a division is taken, that in no way what-ever is the result to be taken as prejudicing the fair claims of the mother colony hereafter, and I say she has fair claims-

Mr. HOWE. -

We all admit that.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

To have this question decided in her favour in the Federal Parliament. Another motive which, no doubt, has actuated my honorable friend in moving this amendment is the probability that, if federation is accomplished at an early date, Queensland, which is our natural ally on this question, will not be represented. We shall have to face this question, which is one of the greatest points of federation, in the absence of our naturally. You may ignore it as you like, and you may be as sentimental as you like, but it will be a distinct advantage to any colony to have the federal capital situated within its limits.

Mr. REID. -
No one denies that.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
When this question is decided, in the absence of Queensland we shall be in the position of being the most distant of any of the colonies. If Sydney is proposed as the capital, it will be the most distant place for the members from all the other colonies to attend. Naturally we can see that, under such circumstances, it will be a distinct gain to federation, as far as its prospects in New South Wales are concerned, if we have this obstacle in the path removed. But, if we cannot get it removed, we must only act as sensible men, and not increase the difficulties by any injudicious action on our part at the present time. I would therefore urge the honorable member (Mr. Lyne) not to prejudice the claims of our colony by pressing the question to a division, and to accept the advice so ably given to him by the honorable member (Mr. Barton) to withdraw the motion, it being made manifest that the question is to be an open one, free from any prejudice which might be excited by action at this juncture.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I am entirely in sympathy with the object of the honorable member (Mr. Lyne), and I can well see that a settlement of this question now would make our work much easier than is likely to be the case in New South Wales, and no doubt it would aid Queensland in deciding whether or not she should enter the Federation by-and-by. At the same time, it is because I have that feeling on the question, that I agree with the advice now tendered to Mr. Lyne, not to put an issue before us which at present cannot be decided on its merits. It is quite evident that a decision now will not be upon the merits of the question, and the result of a division would do infinite harm to the cause which Mr. Lyne has at heart, and which we all have at heart.

Mr. SYMON. -
It would increase your difficulties.

Mr. OCONNOR, -
For that reason, believing as I do that Mr. Lyne has the cause of federation at heart, I say he can do no greater service to it than by recognising the present position and withdrawing his amendment.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

May I also add an earnest appeal to the honorable member (Mr. Lyne) to withdraw his amendment. I join with the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) in saying that we all recognise the anxiety which Mr. Lyne has displayed in relation to the cause of federation in the interests of his own colony, while at the same time seeing that justice was done to the states. We all know the great interest he has taken in the question of equal representation, and that no member of the Convention has given greater attention to the subject than he has. On that very account I appeal to him to recognise, feeling as he does the difficulties standing in the way, and which no one has been more anxious to point out than himself, that he, by pressing this motion to a division, is creating another difficulty which does not now exist—a difficulty which arises from the fact that the amendment is that the federal capital shall be in New South Wales territory. If that is negatived, it will be in terms a declaration that the federal capital shall not be in New South Wales territory, whereas, if we leave the matter as it stands, it will be left to the Federal Parliament to decide.

Mr. BARTON. -

Any similar motion made by a member from any other state would be similarly defeated.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is the case. I was sorry to hear the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) say that a feeling exists in New South Wales that she has been treated in a hostile manner by the other colonies.

Mr. LYNE. -

That feeling does exist.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am bound to accept the statements of those honorable members, but the very fact that such a feeling does exist leads one to the conclusion, which I think Mr. Lyne will also come to, that it is well to avoid everything which would irritate or increase that undesirable state of feeling.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

When I moved this motion I was fully prepared to take all the consequences. I recognise that there is a great deal of truth in what has been stated by the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) as to the feeling in New South Wales. Instead of my position being such as the honorable member (Mr. Barton) describes it, that I would have to take all the onus of moving this amendment—
Mr. BARTON. -
I did not say you would have to take all the onus. I said it would be a heavy onus to undertake when such objections are made.

Mr. LYNE. -
You can put it in that way if you like, but if I wanted to gain any little fleeting popularity in New South Wales, I recognise that it would be a most popular thing to press this question to a vote, and I would not have to defend myself at all. In addition to that, whether it is pressed to a vote or not, the manner in which it has been received by this Convention will have precisely the same effect. It has been received in an antagonistic spirit.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -
No, no.

Mr. LYNE. -
What chance would New South Wales have of securing that the federal capital shall be within her borders if Queensland is not in the Federation, especially after what we have seen during the last ten days in this Convention?

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -
Oh, oh!

Mr. LYNE. -
Will any honorable member tell me that New South Wales has the slightest chance with Queensland not in the Federation of having the federal capital within her borders? As far as I can judge, there will be but very little chance.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
You have had things all your own way for the last ten days.

Mr. LYNE. -
I must say that I like to see members of the Convention go to a vote. I do not like them to say that they will hereafter vote for having the capital in New South Wales, when there is an opportunity of providing for that in the Bill so that it cannot be altered.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Let us stipulate for the first Premier, and let it be Mr. Reid.

Mr. LYNE. -
And we shall stipulate that the first Treasurer shall be the honorable member (Mr. Solomon). However, that is quite a different matter. My object was to assist, if I possibly could, the cause of federation in New South Wales. I tell honorable members that the difficult fight which we shall have there would be very much lessened if the proposal I have made were placed in this Bill.

Mr. REID. -

There is no doubt about that.

Mr. LYNE. -

I know that whatever the result may be it will be a very difficult fight. Therefore, I do not think that honorable members should accuse me of moving this amendment with the intention of having a deterrent effect on federation.

Mr. BARTON. -

No one said that.

Mr. LYNE. -

My object was, and is, to make the path a little smoother to the representatives of New South Wales than it will be; and I venture to think that unless New South Wales, which has the key to the whole position, is in the Federation, there is not likely to be a Commonwealth. It is well for other colonies to talk about federation, but they will not have federation, I feel sure, unless the mother colony, which has the key, is a member of that Federation. I thought that in asking honorable members to insert this provision in the Bill I was giving very great assistance to obtaining that key which would open the door to the federation of all the Australian colonies. I understand that I shall be defeated by a large majority, that I will have about five votes with me on this question. I do not desire to place the representatives of New South Wales in an awkward position, although I dislike, when I have moved an amendment of this kind, to withdraw it; but I recognise that perhaps it is judicious on an occasion of this kind to withdraw it. I have said what I desire to say; I have tested the feeling of the Convention as well as though a division had been taken. I do not think the expressions made use of here to-day will help us. If honorable members who have spoken to-day had said that when they were in the Federal Parliament, as some of them will be, they would support a proposal to have the capital in New South Wales, that would have been an entirely different thing.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

That would be a bit previous.

Mr. BARTON. -

No one said a word to the contrary.

Mr. LYNE. -

I recognise what the words which have been uttered to-day mean; they mean nothing. I do not want them to mean nothing. I want them to mean, that when their authors enter the Federal Parliament, they will support New South Wales in her effort to have the federal capital located in that colony. I cannot conceive what induced the remarks of the honorable member (Sir Joseph Abbott). I cannot conceive why he should turn on the colony in the manner in which he did as to the capital. It is well to say that the capital of any country is that capital which is made by trade. I recognise that, but I also recognise that in the nominal capital—the parliamentary capital—we are likely to have a very strong city if not the strongest city in the colony, of any other colony where it may be fixed. As I have been so pressed by the leader of the Convention—and I do not wish to place him in a more awkward position than I can avoid—and by others who desire not to vote on the question, and, recognising that I should be in a very small minority, I do what I seldom do—I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

Before the amendment is withdrawn, I should like in two or three words to thank the honorable member (Mr. Lyne) for agreeing to withdraw it. I should have felt myself to be in a very false position indeed if he had at this juncture forced a division on the question. I may tell him, as he seems somewhat down-hearted at the reception of his amendment, that had an amendment been moved to fix on Adelaide, or any place in South Australia, for the federal capital, I should have opposed the proposal as I opposed his proposal, and I think every representative of every colony will be able to say precisely the same. The honorable member may rest content that the reception of this proposition now is not in any sense an unfavorable reception of any position in New South Wales as the site of the capital, but simply a pronouncement of the opinion, which is generally held, that this is not the proper time to decide the question.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Before the amendment is withdrawn, I should like to endeavour to remove an impression from the mind of my honorable friend (Mr. Lyne). He said that what had taken place during the last few days convinced him that the interests of New South Wales were scantily attended to, or considered, in this Convention. I think I have been as interested and as careful an observer as any one has been, and I must say that, so far as matters have gone, I cannot find that the material interests of New South Wales have been received with any less sense of justice than the material interests of any other colony. I think it is my duty to this Convention to make that statement. I do not know what may happen; but, if what happens in the future is in accordance with what has taken place during this Convention, then I have no fear that the material interests of New South Wales will be treated in any way differently from those of any other colony. I have to offer my best congratulations to my honorable friend for having agreed to withdraw his amendment, the effect of which, I think, might have been much more pernicious to the object we have in view in carrying federation than the withdrawal of it can possibly be. I am quite sure, also, that any amendment for the specification of any place or colony for the location of the capital would have been treated with a direct negative, precisely the same as this amendment would have been.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I hope that the leader of the Convention-in fact, I think he is considering the matter-will consider whether it is necessary, I cannot say at present I think it is, to make any provision for a temporary seat for the Executive.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, I am considering that.

Mr. REID. -

It is a matter which will require a little consideration. Of course, the Parliament cannot meet for some considerable time after the Executive has come into existence.

Clause 119-The Queen may authorize the Governor-General from time to time to appoint any person or any persons jointly or severally to be his deputy or deputies within any part or parts of the Commonwealth, and in that capacity to exercise during the pleasure of the Governor-General such of the powers and functions of the Governor-General as he deems it necessary or expedient to assign to such deputy or deputies, subject to any limitations or directions expressed or given by the Queen; but the appointment of such deputy or deputies shall not affect the exercise by the Governor-General himself of any power or function.

Amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of South Australia—

Omit "or any persons jointly or severally."

The CHAIRMAN. -

There are several other suggestions from the House of Assembly of South Australia which are consequent on the acceptance of this suggestion.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think we had better leave the clause as it stands.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What is meant by the expression "jointly or severally"?

Mr. BARTON. -
It does not amount to much.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I want to ask my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) to consider whether this clause will allow the appointment of deputies while the Governor is in the colony.

Mr. BARTON. -
I think it does.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I have some doubt on the point. I hope my honorable friend will consider it when he is considering the question of drafting.

Mr. BARTON. -
I will take it into consideration with the Drafting Committee.

The amendment was negatived.

Amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of South Australia-
Omit all words after "Queen" (line 11) to end of clause.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
I should like to ask the leader of the Convention what is the meaning of the expression "jointly or severally"? It seems so absurd to me that several persons should act for the Governor-General, that I really cannot understand what the term means. Surely the commission must be issued to some person, and in rotation-perhaps to several, but not to all at once.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I think the whole clause is really intended to operate more particularly when the Governor-General is within the Commonwealth, and that it relates to the appointment of a deputy or deputies, for instance, in relation to places which may be at a distance from the seat of government, or in which particular functions may be required to be carried out at a particular time.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Legal duties?

Mr. BARTON. -
These are the words:-
such of the powers and functions of the Governor-General as he deems it necessary or expedient to assign to such deputy or deputies.

It does not mean the handing over of his whole powers and functions, but only of particular ones to be performed in a particular part of the Commonwealth. That will generally be a commission issued to some person, or a deputation, as it is called, to several persons, empowering them to act for a limited time and for limited purposes. It is simply a clause of convenience, and it is similar to one which exists in the instructions to the Governors of several colonies.

The amendment was negatived.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 120. - In reckoning the numbers of the people of a state or other part of the Commonwealth, aboriginal natives shall not be, counted.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales-

After "natives" insert "and aliens not naturalized."

The CHAIRMAN. -

An identical amendment is suggested by the Legislative Council of Tasmania.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

This is not like the clause which comes under the provision relating to both Houses dealing with the reckoning of the number of electors. This has reference to the reckoning of the number of people of the states or other parts of the Commonwealth. There are various other clauses, dealing with finance and other questions, under which it becomes necessary to count the people of the states. This clause is, not the same as the clause to which the people of New South Wales probably thought it had some relation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Clause 24.

Mr. BARTON. -

No, I think it is a later clause, and it related to matters connected with elections. This has reference solely to the reckoning of the number of people of a state when the whole population has to be counted, and where it would not be considered fair to include the aborigines.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

The honorable member may be right, but, if so, the clause should be made clear. Clause 24, which deals with the House of Representatives, sets out that, until Parliament otherwise provides for the method of determining the number of members, there shall be one member for each quota of the people of the state.

Mr. BARTON. -

There is a qualification for electors.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, and the clause goes on to say that the quota shall be ascertained when necessary by dividing the population of the Commonwealth, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by twice the number of members of the Senate.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Then there is clause 25.
Mr. ISAACS. -
Clause 25 refers to the whole number of the people of the states.

Mr. BARTON. -
It relates to determining the number of members.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes, the number is to be determined by the number of people of the state.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
It was intended all along that the number of representatives should be determined by the number of people in the state. The quota is a matter that of course will be a subject of discussion. I understand that Sir George Turner desires to have clause 24 recommitted, and I shall certainly not oppose the recommittal. All the provisions relating to the quota are, and are intended to be, distinct from the provision that we now have before us. Under clause 25, in ascertaining the number of the people of the states, so as to determine the number of members to which the state is entitled, there is to be deducted from the whole number of the people of the state the number of the people of any race not entitled to vote. In other parts of the Bill, where the provision is merely for statistical purposes, it is only considered necessary to leave out of count the aboriginal races. The two provisions are for different purposes, and I think the thing is tolerably clear. After hearing Mr. Isaacs' suggestion, I shall go through the clauses again and see if there is any ambiguity.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
What do the words "or other part of the Commonwealth" mean?

Mr. BARTON. -
Territory.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Would it not be as well to insert "territory"?

Mr. BARTON. -
There would be no harm in inserting "territory" but the words used are more comprehensive. This clause would apply perhaps to the reckoning of the number of people in the capital city, which would be a district rather than a territory.

The amendment was negatived.

The clause was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again. I will ask honorable members to adopt a suggestion I have to make. The finance clauses will certainly not be ready for discussion tomorrow. They may be in the hands of honorable members tomorrow, and it may be possible to open the discussion on them on Thursday. We have still to deal with the finance clauses, clause 121 relating to amendments of the Constitution, and the schedule, but I shall move for the reconsideration of several clauses. I would ask honorable members to make up their minds this evening as to the clauses they desire to have reconsidered. There will afterwards be the recommittal stage, but reconsideration is possible at the present stage. If I am in order, I propose to further postpone the finance clauses, so as to permit of the reconsideration of clauses as soon as we have dealt with clause 121. I would make a further suggestion to honorable members, that the discussion should only be re-opened on clauses involving matters of principle.

Mr. GORDON. -
Will new clauses come in their order?

Mr. BARTON. -
I think the new clauses will probably be taken after clause 121.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The new clauses will be dealt with after we have gone through the Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -
They will probably occupy to-morrow. I would ask honorable members to consider the suggestion I have made, so that we may know in time what clauses are to be reconsidered. I do not think there will be any difficulty about the reconsideration of the dead-lock clause, and I shall not ask any honorable member to put this in his list, because I shall take it to be the desire of the Convention to reconsider it.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention adjourned at eleven minutes to five o'clock.

[P.715] starts here
Wednesday, 9th February, 1898.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I have the honour to bring up a report from the Finance Committee on Chapter IV., and beg to move-
That the report of the Finance Committee be printed.
The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
The Finance Committee's report has just been laid upon the table, and no doubt honorable members will require a little time to consider it. The last draft of the clauses is now in the hands of the chairman of the Finance Committee, and I believe that very soon they will be in a position to be distributed. Of course, under the circumstances, we cannot expect honorable members to go on with the finance clauses to-day, because even if they were distributed within the next couple of hours honorable members will require time to consider them. I therefore beg to move-
That the consideration of Chapter IV. be postponed until after consideration of Chapter VIII.

We can go on with the remaining clauses of the Bill, and then we had better take the new clauses of which notice has been given.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
There is only one point to be urged in connexion with the course proposed. The finance clauses will speak for themselves, but it might be advisable at an early date for the chairman of the Finance Committee or some honorable gentleman responsible for the clauses to give an outline of them, with any explanation thought necessary. That might be done at an early stage. It is possible that in such an explanatory statement as that, information might be given to honorable members which might have the result of expediting business and of saving time in the interpretation of the clauses. Could not what I suggest be done at two o'clock to-day?
The motion for the postponement of Chapter IV. was agreed to.

CHAPTER VIII. - AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.
Clause 121. - The provisions of this Constitution shall not be altered, except in the following manner:

Any proposed law for the alteration thereof must be passed by an absolute majority of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and shall thereupon be submitted in each state to the electors qualified to vote for the election of members of the House of Representatives, not less than two nor more than six calendar months after the passage through both Houses of the proposed law.

The vote shall be taken in such manner as the Parliament prescribes.

And if a majority of the states and a majority of the electors voting approve the proposed law, it shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent. But until the qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives becomes uniform throughout the Commonwealth, only one-half the votes for and against the proposed law shall be counted in any state in which adult suffrage prevails.

But an alteration by which the proportionate representation of any state in either House of the Parliament, or the minimum number of representatives of a state in the House of Representatives, is diminished shall not become law without the consent of the majority of the electors voting in that state.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I intend to put this clause in paragraphs, as several amendments have been suggested.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I would like to ask the leader of the Convention about one word in the first line of the first paragraph. The paragraph states that-

The provisions of this Constitution shall not be altered except in the following manner:

I would like the honorable gentleman to consider whether that will include additions to the Constitution. This is a very important question. The clause is one of the most important-in many respects the most important-in the Bill; and whether an "alteration" of the Constitution would include the addition of some clause or other provision to the Constitution, not amounting to an alteration of any existing provision, should be considered.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am inclined to think that "additions" might be included in "alterations," as additions would alter the provisions of the Constitution. I think the matter might be made more certain. If the point is considered of importance, I will move to strike out the words "the provisions of:"
Mr. ISAACS. - Perhaps the honorable gentleman had better consider it.

Mr. BARTON. - Yes, I will consider it.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). - I would suggest to the leader of the Convention that while considering the point raised by the Attorney-General for Victoria he might also consider the propriety of altering the title of the chapter from "Amendment of the Constitution" to "Alteration of the Constitution," so as to make the title and the clause agree.

Paragraph (1) was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. - The Legislative Assembly of Victoria has suggested that the word "absolute" in line 2 of paragraph (2) be omitted, and that the word "and" in line 4 be also omitted, with a view of inserting other words. I shall first of all put the question-

That the word "absolute" proposed to be struck out stand part of the paragraph.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). - It seems to me that such an enormous change as that of an alteration of the Constitution should certainly require an absolute majority of each House of Parliament. We do not want to make the Constitution too rigid, but, on the other hand, we should not go to the opposite extreme. I do not approve of the rigidity of the American Constitution, and I think that we should have a means of making an alteration if thought desirable; but, at the same time, it seems to me that a matter of such paramount importance should receive the assent of an absolute majority of both Houses of the Legislature.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). - At one of our previous meetings I called attention to the term "absolute majority, and there was a short discussion and a division on that occasion. I do not propose, if view of the result of that division, to request the Convention to reconsider the point, because this is a comparatively minor matter as contrasted with the larger amendment which I hope to see made in this clause.

The amendment to strike out the word "absolute" was negatived.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria-

Omit "and" (line 4), and insert the following words:-"or in case of difference between the two Houses be referred in manner provided by this Constitution to the direct determination of the people. If passed by a majority of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, the proposed
The CHAIRMAN. -

I am of opinion that the latter sentence of this amendment ought not to be put, as the committee has already decided that the word "absolute" shall not be struck out. I, therefore, intend to put the first part of the amendment separately. The question now is-

That the word "and" proposed to be omitted attend part of the paragraph.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

This proposal has been agreed to by the Victorian Legislative Assembly, and I venture to hope that it will be accepted by this Convention. Clause 121 does not raise the much-debated question whether it is right or wrong to refer to the final determination of the people the decisions of their Legislature as to amendments of the Constitution. That position is conceded on all hands. It is agreed already, by the wording of the clause and by its spirit, that although the trusted representatives of the people in both Houses agree, and perhaps unanimously agree, to a proposed law for the alteration of the Constitution, yet notwithstanding that, and notwithstanding all the benefits of representative government, the proposed law in such a case shall not receive any validity until it has been sanctioned by the people who are behind the Legislature. I need hardly say for myself that I regard that as a very wise provision.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Then what is the use of having a Parliament?

Mr. ISAACS. -

My honorable friend asks what is the use of having a Parliament. Not much sometimes, especially if you find the two Houses disagreeing, and it is worse than useless if they stand in the way of the will of the people.

Mr. REID. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. ISAACS. -

This provision of clause 121 requires that after both Houses have agreed to a proposed alteration of the Constitution it shall go before the people for their final ratification. What the suggested amendment of the Victorian Legislative Assembly amounts to is: Suppose one House is of opinion, and continuously of opinion it may be, that a certain change is desirable in the interests of the people, and the other House does not agree-who is to decide the question finally? Is it the House that negatives the proposal, or is it the House that affirms the proposal, or is it, as we think, neither of them, but the people themselves? That is the question that has to be answered. It is a question that has not been answered in America; it is a question that has been answered in Switzerland. There will be a clause before the Convention dealing with ordinary deadlocks, and, in connexion with that, we shall have to debate, as we have done before, whether there should be any reference to the people under any circumstances. That particular doubt and difficulty does not arise here, because we have already agreed unanimously that there shall be a reference to the people when both Houses agree. Now, what I want to know is, what possible argument can there be against this position—if you are going to refer to the people, when both Houses agree, why should you not refer to the people when one House insists that the people desire a certain provision, and the other House denies that?

Mr. GLYNN. -
That cancels the representative voice of the Senate.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It is objected that this would cancel the representative voice of the Senate—that is to say, in other words, that the states are to be over-ridden by the people. My honorable friend forgets that that is impossible, because, in this proposal, the reference is both to people and states.

Mr. SYMON. -
The reference is not to the representative voice of the people, but to the direct voice of the people.

Mr. ISAACS. -
To the direct voice of the people, both as a population and as states.

Mr. SYMON. -
You want a double referendum.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Is not that in the clause already?

Mr. SYMON. -
But you want it twice over.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I do not want it twice over. There is a provision that if both Houses agree, there shall be a reference as to final acceptance of the provision, both to the people as population, and to the states as states—both population and states are protected. All I desire to say in supporting the Victorian Assembly's suggestion is this, that if either House—I do not care which—brings forward a proposal, and the other House does not agree with it, then there shall be an opportunity, if the House originating the proposal desires to refer the proposal to the people, as a people; and to the states, as states.
This protects the states, and it protects the people;

while it avoids a catastrophe which may easily arise afterwards. It avoids what I shall point out to be the now admitted inherent defect in the American Constitution. It has been asserted on the floor of this chamber that there is no dissatisfaction with the American Constitution; but I shall bring a mass of evidence from leading statesmen in the United States, in Canada, and in England, to show that that statement is not correct. I will ask honorable members whether, in the face of that evidence-unbiased evidence—we are going to allow this Constitution to go down loaded with inherent defects, which it may be practically, if not totally impossible, to remove hereafter?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Every one admits that there is great dissatisfaction in America with the mode in which the senators are elected.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But the authorities I shall quote go much further than that. I am going to ask those honorable members who object to the referendum on principle—who object to it on the ground that it is appealing from wisdom, so called, to folly, so called; who say that it is an appeal from the well informed to the ill informed; from knowledge to ignorance—I am going to ask them, if that is the ground of their objection, why do they consent at all in this clause to have a ratification of the act of their Legislature—their united Legislature—by going before the people? Do not they see that they are giving their whole argument away? When they say that although the Senate and the House of Representatives may agree to a proposed amendment of the Constitution, they will yet permit, as they have permitted by the words of the clause as they now stand, the people, as a people, or the states, as states, to override the will of the Legislature—that the majority of the states may over-ride, not only the Legislature, but the body of the people; or that the body of the people may override the states by a negative voice—when they permit that to be done, do they not see that all their arguments about appealing from knowledge to ignorance, and from wisdom to folly, are mere idle talk?

Mr. SYMON. -

No because this refers to, an alteration of the Constitution, which must be assented to by the people.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If that is the honorable member's point, I will ask him to vote for this amendment, because all I ask for is this—an alteration of the Constitution, assented to by the people of the states and the people of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SYMON. -

And with the assent of the Legislature.
Mr. ISAACS. -

The honorable member now comes to the crucial point. His argument is that we must not permit the people of the states and the people of the Commonwealth to have their own way, unless those individuals whom the people have elected for general purposes permit them to do so.

Mr. GLYNN. -

They can try other representatives three years afterwards.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The honorable member must know that representatives are elected not on one particular question but on a variety of questions—that they are elected very often for their own personal qualifications. He must know that the main issue is frequently obscured; and if he is going to be consistent let him vote for eliminating this reference to the people altogether. If the representatives are to be trusted, let them be trusted altogether. If they can be trusted to say, No," they can be trusted to say "Yes." And if the people can be trusted to say "No," surely the people can also be trusted to say "Yes." Now, I may say that I attach a very great deal of importance to this clause, and I am sure that we all do. No words of mine can put the matter more strongly than those of the celebrated American writer, Dr. Burgess, of whom, I believe, Mr. Dobson is a devoted admirer. That writer says, on page 137 of the first volume of his work, Political Science and Constitutional Law, speaking of the amendment clause of the Constitution:

This is the most important part of a Constitution. Upon its existence and truthfulness, i.e., its correspondence with real and natural conditions, depends the question as to whether the state shall develop with peaceful continuity or shall suffer alternations of stagnation, retrogression, and revolution. A Constitution which may be imperfect and erroneous in its other parts, can be easily supplemented and corrected, if only the state he truthfully organized in the Constitution, but if this be not accomplished, error will accumulate until nothing short of revolution can save the life of the state.

Mr. DOBSON. -

How could four small states progress if they could be overwhelmed by two large states?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Who suggests that?

Mr. DOBSON. -

Your amendment does.
Has the honorable member read it? My proposal is this: If the two Houses disagree, the reference shall not be to the population only. It shall require a majority of the population to pass the proposed law, and also a majority of the states. I want it clearly understood that this does not mean the people of the Commonwealth merely. I intend that the reference shall be in the same manner as if the two Houses had agreed. I want the states to be protected in this, just the same as the people. This is no attempt to gain, by a mass vote, any change of the Constitution to the detriment of the states. The only point of difference between us is—Shall the people be consulted only when the Houses agree, or in precisely the same way when the Houses disagree? With those warning words of Dr. Burgess before us, what do we find?

Mr. GLYNN. -

What he suggests is not in the referendum, but a decision by the two Houses of Parliament sitting together.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There is no such provision with regard to an amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. GLYNN. -

On page 151 there is a suggestion by Dr. Burgess as to how amendments shall be effected in the future.

Mr. ISAACS. -

My honorable friend will be able to cite anything he pleases. I do not agree with his view of Dr. Burgess' statements on that question. I do accept the principles which I am putting forward.

Mr. SYMON. -

But we thought that Dr. Burgess was the authority on which you were resting those principles.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I shall have an opportunity hereafter of answering any objections which maybe made, and I shall take that opportunity, as this is one of the most important, if not the most important, portions of the whole Constitution. We may make mistakes in other parts; this is our means of correcting those mistakes. If the people think that there are errors and faults in the Constitution which are irremediable, they may be tempted to reject it; but, if they find that there is a fair chance of remedying those evils, they may be fairly asked to accept it. Now, the honorable member (Dr. Cockburn) has said that the dissatisfaction in America is simply as to the mode of electing senators. I will refer him, first of all, to an authority whom no one will gainsay as a standard authority on this question, Professor Goldwin Smith. I will take him as an authority from Canada.
Dr. COCKBURN. -
That is not dissatisfaction in the United States; that is in Canada.
Mr. ISAACS. -
Professor Goldwin Smith is accepted as an authority on these questions.
Mr. FRASER. -
Not in Canada; he is detested in Canada.
Mr. ISAACS. -
Professor Goldwin Smith says-
The Constitution of the United States is practically unchangeable. Sixty years passed without any amendment. Not only is the process one of extreme difficulty, but there is a lack of any authority to initiate organic change.
I want honorable members to recollect those words-"a lack of any authority to initiate organic change." The extract continues:-
In the case of the anti-slavery amendments passed at the close of the Civil War, the initiative was taken by a political earthquake. Constitutions, like every other work of man, wear out; as Bacon says, what men do not alter for the better, time, the great innovator, alters for the worse, but you might almost as well evoke an Avatar Vishnu as call for an organic amendment of the American Constitution. The article which gives Nevada an equal representation in the Senate with New York is practically immutable.
It will be seen how observant men-men not mixed up in United States politics, men of philosophical as well as statesman-like views-who notice the working of the federal system in the American Constitution, as well as in Canada, are able to express an opinion clear and unmistakeable as to matters far beyond the mere question of the mode of electing senators. Now that I have gone to Canada let me go to the United States, and let me point out what the Hon. J.G. Carlisle, an ex-Secretary of the Treasury, says on this subject. He writes, as late as November, 1897, of what he calls "Dangerous defects of our electoral system." He points out, in reference to what has always been regarded as one of the brightest features in the American Constitution-the popular election of President-that it is a myth. He points out that, although there are 45 states, a President can, under the Constitution, be elected without a majority of the people, and without a majority of the states, and he says that this can only be cured by an amendment of the Constitution, and that that is absolutely impossible. He refers to cases in which they succeeded, and in another of which they proposed to amend the Constitution by indirect means, namely, by the reconstitution of the United States Supreme Court. Then the Right Hon. Leonard Courtney, who has been Under-Secretary of State in England, says, on the same subject:-

Far the best way out of the difficulty would doubtless be to amend the Constitution, but this is almost an impossible process. The dead hands of the founders of the Republic have tied up their successors in bonds, happily few in number, from which extraction is from time to time effected by such means as Mr. Bryce has explained, as General Grant and Congress sanctioned, and as the Democratic platform advocated.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is more difficult to make an amendment of the Constitution in America than it will be here.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Very little more difficult. Mr. Courtney also says-

"Dwelling apart and at ease ourselves-
That is in England.
we must sympathize with the struggle to pass from under restrictions which, if operative, compel injustice, and we may perhaps be lenient in judgment if the way of escape is not the most direct conceivable. The great danger of the United States in the future may perhaps lie in the difficulty of obtaining the relief by constitutional means from the proved inexpediency, if not injustice, of constitutional provision. The significance of resulting changes must not, however, be overlooked. The founders of the Constitution laid down the principle of representation of states according to population, and taxation upon the same basis. The principles that command respect to-day are representation according to population, and taxation according to wealth."

The Hon. J.G. Carlisle says the same thing. He points out that it is impossible, absolutely impossible, to get an amendment of the American Constitution. Now, when we have got evidence from both sides of the Atlantic—from the United States and Canada, and from England—as to the absolute impossibility of effecting, by constitutional means, any organic change in the American Constitution, we are forced to ask ourselves how much better off we are here? The American Constitution requires a two-thirds majority of the House. Supposing we had that provision, we should want twenty members in the Senate. As it is, we want an absolute majority—that is to say, sixteen—so that there is a difference of four. That is not a very great difference on a question affecting the Constitution, and yet we have to pass the gauntlet of the two Houses. In America that is the difficulty. We know from actual experience that it is the difficulty. We know that the 12th amendment, about the election of President and Vice-President, was introduced on account of what was known as the Jefferson scandal, in 1883. Within a few years they sought to alter it. They knew it was unsatisfactory, and the majority of the Legislatures of the states passed resolutions to alter it. The House of Representatives complied with it, but the Senate refused; but from that time until the present, although, as Mr. Carlisle says, everybody is persuaded that some day a catastrophe will occur, the Senate has steadily refused to put before the people a proposal to amend the Constitution. That is the difficulty. How much better are we here? Instead of twenty votes we should require sixteen. Will any honorable member tell me that if the Senate or the House of Representatives, as the case may be, choose to say-"We will oppose this amendment of the Constitution, notwithstanding that the other House ask for it, and has repeatedly asked for it, that it is never to go to the people?" Mr. WISE.

Does the honorable member suppose that if the people wanted the amendment they would not return senators who would support it?

Mr. ISAACS.

Does the honorable member suppose that, although the people seriously want it, they may not return Houses of different views? Or does he suppose that if the election of representatives is to determine the question, and if no disturbing element of personality is to come in, that we shall ever have any differences between the Houses? If the honorable member takes the latter view, there can be no harm in putting into the Constitution a provision to meet such difficulties as we know have actually occurred in practice. We know that representatives are elected upon grounds wholly independent of the particular questions that arise at the time. Mr. Wise knows that if a man goes before his constituents even after a double dissolution he may be returned, irrespective altogether of the particular questions in debate. Let us take a case. Assuming that Mr. Wise was a member of the Senate-and I am sure that he will be a member of either the Senate or the House of Representatives-and that as a member of the Senate he defends his state on a particular question. There is a dissolution of the House, and he is opposed by some individual who differs from him on the merits of the question. Does any one suppose that his opponent will be elected? My honorable friend would go before his constituents with an unanswerable argument. He would say to them-"You have perfect confidence in me on all other subjects." You elected me not very long ago. I have served you faithfully and well. I ask you not to disagree with me on this subject, but if you do, are you going to displace me? I may have been mistaken, but I have stood faithfully by you as a state, and I have sought to maintain your interests. Are you going to be guilty of the blackest political ingratitude by turning me out?" His opponent would come forward and say-"I want to displace Mr. Wise because, on this one question, I disagree with him. You may have no confidence in me on other subjects, but on this one subject I ask you to elect me." My honorable friend would come back triumphant, and when he came back after this double dissolution his position would be strengthened tenfold. He would have no right to waive his personal opinions. He would be able to say that he had a mandate from the people, and that he would be a traitor to them if he violated his pledges. This would make the position more complex and more unbearable.

Mr. WISE. -
You assume that there is to be no such thing as responsible government. That is the basis of the whole argument.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The honorable member will perhaps explain why he voted at all for any reference to the people. We are going to have responsibility, but responsibility to whom? My honorable friend says responsibility to Parliament. I say responsibility to the people. And if the two Houses differ, and if after a double dissolution they each come back fortified in their own view as to what the people require, are we still to say that the victory is to lie with one House or the other, and that the people are to have no voice in determining the matter-that they are to have one privilege, and one privilege only, namely, that of electing the men who are to govern them?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
You are dealing with the principle, and not with the method.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I am speaking merely of the principle. It would be idle for me to put forward a series of proposals as to the method. I want the matter to be clearly understood, and perhaps it would be better if the Chairman only put the words "or in case of difference between the two Houses be referred." We could afterwards insert other words to meet the position in detail. I want no misunderstanding about this. I am not arguing now for a reference to the people only, as the people ignoring the states, nor for a reference to the states, ignoring the people. I desire to protect up to the last point the interests of the states and of the people.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
If there is a continued dead-lock.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes, if there is a continued dead-lock there would be the same reference to the people as has already been agreed to. If it is right to ask the people to say yes or no when their two political agents agree, it cannot be wrong to ask them to say yes or no when their two political agents disagree.

Mr. Wise. -
It is wholly unnecessary.

Mr. Isaacs. -
It may be, and, therefore, it would be a matter of detail whether the House which originates the question should refer it or not. I would not make it necessarily compulsory. I would leave it entirely to the House which originates it, after full debate, and after the means of conciliation had been exhausted, to either let the matter rest or to ask the people to finally decide it. I only ask, in the interests of the whole Federation, for some outlet for ill-feeling that might otherwise arise. I only ask for some ultimate means of preventing catastrophe. I only ask those honorable members who say "Trust the Federal Parliament" to go further and meet the inevitable by trusting the people who are behind the Federal Parliament. Let us trust the people whose interests are all in all to us, who have to pay the taxes, whose life, whose liberty, and whose property are at stake, and not necessarily stand by the rigid system of electing men for general purposes and of allowing those men to say finally whether the people shall ever have a voice in the matter or not. I would point out that a question affecting the Constitution is different from all other questions. It may be right-I do not think it is—to say that on ordinary matters of legislation Parliament should have its own way. On matters of Constitution it is surely right to let the people have an opportunity of expressing their opinions one way or the other.

Mr. Douglas. -
If both Houses agree?

Mr. Isaacs. -
Clause 121 already says that.

Mr. Douglas. -
You want to alter it.

Mr. Isaacs. -
No, I do not. The honorable member, perhaps, misunderstands me. I do not want to alter that provision at all. What I say is, that if it is right that there should be a reference to the people when both Houses agree, on the sole principle that the people should have a voice in determining the Constitution under which they are to live, or refuse to live, surely it is right that they should have the same opportunity when both Houses disagree. I cannot see, for the life of me, what legitimate grounds any opponent of this view has to stand on. I can understand people getting up and saying—"It will lead to hasty legislation, and the alteration of the Constitution. It must not be hastily dealt with. Stay the impulse of party passion." Do we see no party passion at the present time? Have we seen none during the last few weeks on the continent? Have we seen none in the Senate and House of Representatives in the United States, and in the Mother of Parliaments-the House of Commons? Have we seen none in our colonial Legislatures? I do say that, putting all that on one side, the moment it is conceded, as it has been, that the people have a right to have a voice in saying whether they shall live any longer under the present Constitution or shall have a new Constitution, where the two Houses of the Legislature have agreed, why should they not have the same right of giving their verdict upon the identical same question when one House of their Legislature says "Yes," and the other says "No"?

Mr. DOBSON. -
Because the fact of the Senate which is elected by the people disagreeing shows that the public are rather unripe to decide the question.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Then the public are ripe enough to elect men, and have knowledge enough on a particular question to elect men who are supposed to represent the people's will; but the people have not sense or knowledge enough to say "Yes" or "No" for themselves. Is that the idea?

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Yes.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If so, if I may say it without disrespect, it is utterly illogical and untenable. My honorable friend must see that the House of Representatives represent the people.

Mr. DOBSON. -
You argue that they do not.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is not my position.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
The Senate represents the people.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The House of Representatives represents the people.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Equally.

Mr. ISAACS. -
But if one says "No," and the other says "Yes," who is to decide?
Mr. DOBSON. -
It shows that the people are undecided on the point.

Mr. ISAACS. -
No; it shows that one side must be wrong as to what the people wish. Therefore, we should go to the people themselves and ask them. If my honorable friend is right I will go further, and say if both Houses agree it shows that the people are clearly of opinion that an alteration ought to be made.

Mr. DOBSON. -
It ought to be so, but you do not say that it is.

Mr. ISAACS. - Then why go to the people on a referendum afterwards? Does not my honorable friend see that if he accedes to the view that if both Houses are agreed you still will have the referendum? Does not that concede that both Houses may be wrong?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
The idea is not to make an alteration of the Constitution too easy.

Mr. ISAACS. -
No one suggests that that should be done, but what is to be the limit of "too easy"? Is it to withstand the people for ever? Can my honorable friend say, for an instance, what is to be the development of our representative system here? If we have senators elected from the whole state, can he foresee that the people will have an opportunity of electing the representatives they wish? Can he foresee that wealth may not act with undue weight? Can he foresee that we shall have representatives in accord with the general body of the people? Can he tell us whether a poor man will ever have an opportunity of being elected to the Senate? Can we tell how these things will develop? We may have a Senate and a House of Representatives with these huge constituencies, more especially if we retain the quota of two to one—we shall in all probability have two Houses on distinctly conservative lines; we shall have two Houses in which it will be almost impossible for a man of moderate means to find a seat. Yet he tells me that because we have periodical election by the people on a popular basis, therefore you necessarily have the views of the Legislature echoing the will of the people.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
The Senate may be the more democratic body of the two.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It may, and it may not. Both Houses may be democratic; both Houses may be conservative. What I want to preserve in this Constitution is to guard against all possible eventualities, and against any possibility of the states and of the Federation equally doing any injustice—I am not drawing any distinction in favour of one or the other in this regard—in order that the people who are behind the Houses, who are really the Federation, shall not be baulked if they desire to express in a direct fashion their own will. I do not desire to go into the merits of the referendum as a general question. I am prepared to do that hereafter when we come to the clause; but I do say that it is conceded here that the referendum is right.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

No; it is cumulative.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not care whether it is cumulative. It is conceded, and the only ground on which it is conceded, be it cumulative or not, is that the people have a right if they choose to revise, to ratify, to reverse if necessary, the acts of their legislators.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

It is a Veto; nothing more.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You can call it what you like; it may be a veto, and it may be an affirmation. If they say "No," it is a veto, if they say "Yes," it is an affirmation. My honorable friend says-"Do not trust the people by themselves; they are ignorant, foolish, unwise, and uneducated."

Mr. SYMON. -

You say the same thing, because you are willing to leave it to the Legislature at first, and only in case of a difference you go to the people. Your amendment is illogical.

Mr. ISAACS. -

My honorable friend will show that directly if he can. If my honorable friend wishes to abolish Parliament altogether, I am willing to hear his argument.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

You are abolishing Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I beg the honorable member's pardon. The people under this Constitution are to act in the first place by their agents. If those two agents agree then in ordinary federal legislation the matter is settled, but in an amendment of the Constitution it is not settled. The principal who appoints the agents says-"Your act shall not be valid until I ratify it"; but when those two agents differ—those two attorneys under power differ—then, I say, come back to the principal who has appointed them both. The argument on the other side is-"No, the people shall not have the privilege of doing more than appoint their agents. If those two agents agree, they still come back to the principal in respect of the Constitution; but if they do not agree on other subjects, then they, do not consult the principal. The people have nothing to do but to pay taxes and to obey the laws passed by their Legislature."

Mr. GORDON. -

It is an irrevocable power.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is an irrevocable power, and the people cannot act. If we choose to leave our Constitution in that state, very well. I can only say that we shall be introducing enormous difficulties in the way of the acceptance of many of the provisions of the Constitution which otherwise the people would have been content to accept, even though they disagreed with them. Therefore, if my honorable friend desires to go further; if he desires to introduce what is done in Switzerland, and introduce the initiative, there will be strong matter for debate. All I say is, that we ought not to leave it in the power of any one House to legislate-I do not care which House it is-and to be able to say once and for all that it can interpose a bar against the people making a change in their Constitution.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I agree with the interjection of my honorable friend (Mr. Symon). The position taken up by the Attorney-General of Victoria is quite illogical. Mr. Isaacs appears to assume that the Houses of Parliament will not represent the people. He forgets that they are elected by the people, elected on the same suffrage-only one House represents the states and the other represents the general body of the people.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Surely he has not forgotten that; he has put that as plainly as possible. He has not forgotten it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

The course which Mr. Isaacs suggests is practically to destroy one of the Houses.

Mr. ISAACS. -

My honorable friend is not fair in saying that; it is not right.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think Mr. Isaacs has not in his mind that the Senate shall be able through any action of theirs to claim a general referendum. I think what he has in his mind is that the House of Representatives shall be able to do that, and so bring the opinions of the bulk of the people under their control. Even if it were so, where is the efficacy-and use of it? Mr. Isaacs does not propose a general reference; he proposes a reference to population.
Mr. ISAACS. -
The same referendum as is needed for an alteration of the Constitution.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Exactly; and he proposes that on the assumption—which, I venture to say, is absolutely without justification—that whenever the two Houses disagree, that is, whenever the states and the general population disagree, one or other of them does not represent their constituents. It is a most illogical proposition. The states, as represented by the Senate, and the people, as represented by their members, may and will disagree. There is nothing in the slightest degree improbable in that. In fact, it is a circumstance that must undoubtedly arise. Supposing you do take Mr. Isaacs' view, I want to know where the benefit will be? It proceeds on an unjustifiable assumption. That is, that if they disagree, one or the other does not represent its constituents.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is the law in Switzerland, and it is not illogical there; it has worked well.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I beg leave to differ from the honorable member.

Mr. WISE. -
It would be very good if we had not responsible government.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Exactly; that makes all the difference.

Mr. SYMON. -
It does not exist in Switzerland. In Switzerland, the question goes direct to the people.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
They can get the verdict of the people even if the Houses differ.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
When honorable members finish their discussion I may be able to proceed. Our Constitution is founded on a different basis altogether, and we are in the same breath asked to insist upon having responsible government, to which we are accustomed, and the Swiss Constitution, which is inconsistent with responsible government. I look upon this proposition, that on a vote of either House the voice of the people shall be taken immediately and directly, as an absolute invasion of the first principles on which this Federation is established. Of course, the people's voice will rule. I agree with my honorable friend there. The people it is who elect the Senate; the people it is who elect the House of Representatives, but they are not the same people; that is to say, they have a different basis of representation, although their qualification as voters is the same. There can be no possible gain that I can conceive, but there is a direct invasion of the primary principles on which we ought to act if we are establishing a Parliament with all care, and if we make provisions for its representing the voice of the people. We are now asked in the same breath to say that when one of these disagreements happen, which we expect to happen—because we do not want one House to be an affirmatory voice of the other-away shall go all the provisions we have made to protect the relative rights of the people in the states, and either House can send both Houses at once to their constituents.
In the ordinary course of events, there will be regular elections in one House, and periodical elections in the other. They both go to their constituents pretty constantly, and if you say that they are not representing the voice of the people, I ask in reply—Who sent them there? If they are acting against the views and opinions of those constituents, their constituents will very soon let them know. And the duration of their term of service is not long enough to cause any serious mischief, but it is long enough for safety and caution, to give a popular wave of feeling an opportunity of dispersing, if it is not well founded. And the very basis on which we put all our state Constitutions, the very theory with which we require two Houses with different terms of office, to be a check on each other, and to prevent the voice of the people, which, in the long run, must rule, not of necessity ruling too quickly, we propose to convey by this alteration, which my honorable and learned friend suggests, and on an assumption for which there can be no justification, that the very fact of the two Houses disagreeing, although they represent different constituencies, would prove that one or other of them does not represent the voice of the people. Sir, if the two Houses did represent the same constituencies there might be much more argument for the contention of the honorable member. The position, for instance, of the Legislative Assembly and Legislative Council of Victoria would much more assist his argument?
Those two Houses of Parliament represent one colony, with a different voting qualification possibly, but not much different, representing persons who are supposed to have practically the same interests. In that case there would be much more room for his argument that if there is a difference between the two Houses of Parliament, the one or the other cannot truly represent the voice of the people. But who would think of altering the Constitution of Victoria, so as to have one House instead of two, or so as to provide, on any matter of altering their own Constitution, that when the two Houses disagreed a general vote of the people should be taken? My honorable friend would never dream of asking or contending for that in his own colony, where it might be much more logically contended for, and yet he asks us to apply it to the Commonwealth, where one House of Parliament is the people's House, representing the whole of the people of Australia, and the other House is the States House, which represents the states as entities. I hope that my honorable friend's suggestion will not be accepted. I think its adoption will deal a vital blow to Mr. ISAACS. -

Why?
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Because the honorable member is one of those who insist on responsible government applying to this Constitution.
Mr. ISAACS. -
What has that got to do with the question?
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Responsible government must, of course, put the greater power into the House of Representatives, whereas in Switzerland the Houses are practically co-ordinate.
Mr. ISAACS. -
What has that got to do with the question whether the people of Australia shall say yes or no to this Constitution?
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
The honorable member said it was agreed that the people should be referred to. We, as a precaution, for purposes of greater safety, provide that the Constitution shall not be altered without two things being done—that is, without an Act of Parliament, and without a vote of the people as well.
Mr. ISAACS. -
It is not an Act of Parliament without a vote of the people.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
The honorable member says it is admitted that a vote of the people must be taken. What is admitted is that no fundamental change should be made in this Constitution without Parliament and the people saying it shall be done, or without Parliament passing an amending law, and the people do not say the amendment shall not be made. It is a power of veto, inserted for greater safety, and to prevent Parliament altering a Constitution which concerns the people, without the consent of the people, whom Parliament may not represent in its action in the matter. I sincerely hope that this amendment will be rejected.
Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
The proposal which the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) has submitted on behalf of the Legislative Assembly of Victoria appears to me to possess, at all events, one general merit which may well claim the attention of this Convention, inasmuch as it seeks to enlarge the, to my mind, far too restricted scope of the 121st clause. No one desires that amendments of this Constitution should need to be frequent, or should be frequent, and no one desires that the amendment of the Constitution should be too easy. It should be possible at any time when the mature judgment of the people has expressed itself for an amendment of the Constitution to be obtained, but it should not be possible, at a moment's notice, to obtain so serious an Act as that which would alter for all time the Constitution of the country. That we all admit. So much by way of premiss, as calling attention to the fact that in this Constitution we have but one road, and that a very narrow road, by which it will be possible for the electors to obtain an amendment of the Constitution. My learned friend, in his speech, has cited a number of American precedents, which, with a certain allowance, all go to support his thesis—that the power of amendment of the Constitution in the United States has been found far too narrow, and that this power of amendment would very likely be found too narrow in Australia. Of course, the interjection of Mr. Wise with reference to responsible government touched an aspect of the question to which my honorable colleague has hardly allowed sufficient weight. I can quite see that this proposal, valuable as it is, would be much more valuable in the United States, and would hold out much greater hope to them of utility than it will do under a Constitution such as ours, in which responsible government is established. Under the United States Constitution, so far as amendments of the Constitution are concerned, to borrow a popular saying—"What is everybody's business is nobody's business." Amendment may be the aim of the House of Representatives, but if the Senate take a different view, there is nothing, to bring them into harmony. It may be the proposal on which the highest executive officer of the Government, the President, has obtained his office, but unless both Houses agree with him he is helpless, because he has no means of bringing pressure to bear on them. If, in the same way, the states Legislatures, which return the Senate, look at the issue from their state point of view, and decide that an amendment of the Constitution is necessary, and carry it by a majority of their representatives in the Senate, there is not, the necessary means by which they can acquire a majority in the House of Representatives also. There is no sufficient provision for obtaining unity of action between these several powers. But the conditions under which responsible government arise under such a Constitution as ours will occasion an entire transformation. Both Houses are linked together by the Executive, which is made answerable to Parliament. Consequently, the demand for reform of the Constitution that may be raised without satisfactory fruition in the United States could never be raised in any of our countries enjoying responsible government without the Ministry of the day being compelled to act upon it; compelled to use all its potencies-and they are many-to bring both Houses into agreement, and by the exercise of its authority secure the submission to the people of a direct issue on this question. It can always obtain this by means of a general election. We can thus obtain a verdict, which, if decisive, would be one before which the members of Second Chambers would be finally compelled to bow. Of course, this amendment applies equally to any proposed reform of this Constitution desired by the Senate and its supporters in the several states; and, for my own part, I can foresee under this Constitution occasions in which demands for the reform of the Constitution would come from the states, and be strongly supported in the Senate. This amendment secures them an appeal to the electors. The equity of the amendment of the Victorian Legislative Assembly now proposed is manifest, inasmuch as it is equally open to either House of Parliament to take action under it. For the reasons I have given as to the operation of responsible government, it appears to me that this provision is likely to be taken advantage of under this Constitution, but rarely. I can scarcely suppose that cases of the kind which would require this form of amending the Constitution could arise except at long intervals of time. At the same time, I am clearly of opinion that whenever it does arise this proposal not only involves no injustice, but also every provision for the fullest consideration of all the rights involved, whether they be the rights of states or of parties-that could possibly be demanded. Consequently, I shall be found supporting the proposal of my honorable friend, although I may seem to him to minimize its importance and efficacy. After his elaborate speech it is unnecessary to enter into the discussion of the case he has put so well, more especially after my warning as to the wide difference between American conditions and our own. It appears to me that too great a stress must not be laid on any particular instances that can be cited from that country. But there is one aspect of the question which I wish to commend to his consideration, as an additional argument in his favour, although, perhaps, supporting my view as to the less wide scope and less frequent fruit to be anticipated from it. The present proposals which are embodied in the earlier part of this measure for the settlement of dead-lock between the two Houses of the Federal Parliament would apply to any measure introduced for the amendment of the Constitution. There is only one new condition added, the one to which I called attention at an earlier stage-the requirement that, in regard to a measure for the amendment of the Constitution, an absolute majority of both Houses is needed. Well, in this case, an absolute majority of the House which desired a reform of the Constitution would be needed, in order to bring the proposal for the amendment of the Constitution within the scope of this particular sub-section of clause 121. But if the other House then rejected that proposal for the reform of the Constitution, one of the two proposals which we have embodied in the Constitution for the settlement of differences between the two Houses would immediately come into play.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Oh, no. The clause provides that the provisions of this Constitution can only be altered in a certain prescribed manner, or rather cannot be altered except in that manner.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

But what is the manner?

Any proposed law for the alteration thereof must be passed by an absolute majority of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and shall thereupon be submitted in each state to the electors qualified to vote.

Upon which the honorable member contends that, if a law was passed by an absolute majority of the Senate, and rejected by the House of Representatives, the provisions as to the treatment of dead-locks would not apply.

[P.729] starts here

Mr. ISAACS. -

Certainly they would not apply, because you have negative words which say that, as to amendments of the Constitution, you must follow a prescribed course and no other.

Mr. SYMON. -

But if you have a disagreement between the two Houses of Parliament you must solve it in the way prescribed by the Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

So I should say.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Do you say that the two Houses, sitting together, are to alter the Constitution?

Mr. SYMON. -

Not to alter the Constitution, but to pass a law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What law?
Mr. SYMON. -
The law that is to be submitted to the people.
The CHAIRMAN. -
Will honorable members kindly allow Mr. Deakin to proceed?
Mr. DEAKIN. -
Clause 56B, as honorable members know, commences-"If the House of Representatives passes any proposed law," and the next sub-section of the same clause also begins-"If the House of Representatives passes any proposed law," and I take it, subject to the contrary opinion of my learned friend, to which I pay the greatest respect, that probably those words include a law for the alteration of the Constitution. I should say, from the language of those two provisions, that if a measure proposing a reform of the Constitution, passed by an absolute majority of the Senate, and then sent to the House of Representatives, were rejected by the House of Representatives, then certainly the provisions of clause 56B would come into play—there is nothing to prevent it—at all events as regards the dissolution of the House of Representatives, whether it be by the alternative dissolution, or by the double dissolution. There is nothing whatever to limit the scope of 56B.

Mr. ISAACS. -
So far.
Mr. DEAKIN. -
Exactly. So that the use of these sub-clauses of 56B will be that they will, in the first instance, have a strongly moderating influence upon the House of Representatives, which I am assuming is at difference with the Senate, and will make it incumbent upon this House to be very careful to ascertain that the electors are behind them before they reject such a measure. Then we will suppose that either the alternative or the double dissolution takes place. If by this means the House of Representatives is brought into harmony with the Senate, and passes the measure about which there was a dispute by an absolute majority, the honorable member will see that all the requirements of clause 121 have been fulfilled.

Mr. ISAACS. -
But suppose that after the double dissolution the Houses still differ?
Mr. WISE. -
If the people do not care enough about the proposed amendment to take the trouble to return a Parliament in favour of it, why should it be carried?
Mr. DEAKIN. -
I fail to see how my honorable friends opposite can make even a show of opposition to a proposition of this kind. It allows the people of the states as states, as well as the people of the Commonwealth as a whole, to deliver their final verdict upon an issue which must, after all this machinery has been brought into play, have been thoroughly discussed for many months, and upon which the electors must have made up their minds.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The honorable and learned member would make the amendment of the Constitution as easy as the passing

Mr. DEAKIN. -

When my honorable friend comes to speak, he will perhaps point out what step has been omitted from this process which is required in the passing of an ordinary law. Every step that is required to be taken in the passing of an ordinary Act of Parliament must be taken to secure an amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. DOBSON. -

And something more.

[P.730] starts here

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes, and something more is required. There must be an absolute majority in favour of the amendment in both Houses, and a majority of electors in the states and the Commonwealth.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The honorable and learned member only wants a majority in one House.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I beg the honorable gentleman's pardon. Though 56B is brought into play there must be an absolute majority of both Houses. Even if advantage is taken of 56B the amendment of the Constitution, instead of being more easy, will be more difficult than the passing of an ordinary Act. Then we come down to the extremely narrow margin of cases in which, 56B not being employed, this particular course would be sought to be taken without the alternative or the double dissolution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The honorable member suggests that this process of referring the matter to the people when there is a dispute between the Houses should only be resorted to after the double dissolution?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No. I am pointing out to my honorable friend that, in addition to his proposal, there is another means under 56B by which the same end might eventually be accomplished. That is no argument against his proposal, and I am only pointing it out in reply to the objections which have been urged against it. I would go further myself. One weakness in the clause for the amendment of the Constitution is the entire absence of initiative on the part of the states. I think it is well worth the consideration of those who have state rights at heart, whether, if the Parliaments of a majority of the states united in passing a proposal for the amendment of the Federal Constitution, some means should not be provided whereby that proposal, irrespective of any action of the Federal Parliament, might be remitted to the people of the whole Commonwealth.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That is quite another question.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes; but it is following out the view I take that there should be other means of using the appeal to the people provided in clause 121 than those which now exist. I am pointing out that, as this power of amending the Constitution is limited, it not only limits what so many honorable members appear to regard with apprehension, that is, the power of amendment when sought to be exercised by the general body of the people, but it deprives the states themselves of all right of initiative.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

This does not give an initiative in any sense.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No, but it would be a reasonable demand to make on behalf of state rights that, if both Houses in a majority of the states passed identical measures for the amendment of the Federal Constitution, they should have the power of remitting their proposal to their own electors and to the electors of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But this provision will give the states power to do that through their accredited representatives, the senators.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes, and that is an argument in support of its equity.

Mr. DOBSON. -

If the honorable and learned member thinks his proposal reasonable, how can he consider that of the Attorney-General of Victoria to be equally reasonable?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Because, although the amendment of the Constitution should not be made too easy to either party-to the body of the people upon one side or to the states upon the other-additional means should be given of sending a proposal for the amendment of the Constitution to the ultimate tribunal which we have established in every case, the decision of the electors. I am prepared to couple what my honorable and learned friend is asking for with a further concession.
Mr. DOBSON. -
Yet the honorable member is not content to provide for a simple majority of both Houses.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I am; but it appears to me to be desirable, in connexion with the amendment of the Constitution, so long as sufficient time is allowed for deliberation, and a sufficient number of steps have to be taken to insure full discussion, that we should not limit the appeal to the people upon amendments to one single method. I would rather see several means of setting in motion the regular and constitutional process by which proposals for the amendment of the Constitution might be considered by the people either at the desire of majorities of the Commonwealth Parliament, or of either Federal House, or of a majority of the states Parliaments. It appears to me that the extension of the power which my honorable and learned friend proposes is very desirable and equitable. If we lay to heart the experience of America, we shall find that men of all parties unite in agreeing that a cardinal defect of the American Constitution is the difficulty of having any amendment submitted to the electors of the republic.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
Does the honorable member think that a defect?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It is not that the processes provided for in the Constitution are necessarily bad, but there is no practical means of using them, and they have remained unused except in times of war.

Mr. SYMON. -
Responsible government will cure that.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Responsible government will not wholly cure it. We should not be blind to the fact that the greatest Federal Constitution in the world has been confronted with serious difficulties and discords because its amendment can only be accomplished by a single iron-bound method.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
It is exceedingly pleasant to hear this matter discussed, and the arguments upon both sides balanced, with so much judicial fairness as has been exhibited by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin); but I think that if he had pursued the judicial method a little further he would have felt himself bound to give judgment against the proposed amendment. He said, in an indirect appeal to us, that he could not see what show of opposition we could make to this proposal; but he must have forgotten for the moment the absolutely conclusive arguments with which he furnished us for the entire destruction of it. He showed that the proposal of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) is utterly and entirely unnecessary.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I do not think so.

Mr. SYMON. -
I do not say that the honorable member said this in so many words, but his argument showed that it is entirely unnecessary to have a provision of this character, which rests for any possible merit or virtue upon the assumption that there might be a difference between the two Houses as to a proposed law which would land us in a kind of cul de sac. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin) has shown, and I humbly declare my entire agreement with him, that the provisions avoiding dead-locks seem to apply as effectually to a difference between the two Houses with regard to a proposed amendment of the Constitution as to a difference in regard to anything else within the scope of their legislative authority.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The honorable and learned member ought to strike out clause 89 altogether.

Mr. SYMON. -
My honorable and learned friend must not be petulant. We maybe wrong; but I am fortified by the remarks of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin). As the matter now stands, can any constitutional lawyer deny that the provision with regard to dead-locks will be just as effectual where a proposal for an alteration of the Constitution is concerned as where any other proposed law is concerned? It does not amend the Constitution—it merely gets rid of the difference between the two Chambers. I am rather disposed to think that in the interests of the states that is a defect, and that the ordinary dead-lock provisions should not apply to a matter so vital as a proposed amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
They were not meant so to apply.

Mr. SYMON. -
Probably not; but it is worthy of consideration whether we should not exclude from the operation of the dead-lock provisions a proposal to alter the Constitution. The only justification I can see for the proposed amendment is that it is intended to get rid of what I have described as a cul de sac, and, when there is a difference between the two Houses, to cut the Gordian knot by referring the matter in dispute to the people.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Does the honorable and learned member contend that in the case of a proposed amendment of the Constitution the two Houses should sit together and pass the law by a three-fifths majority?

Mr. SYMON. -

I think so.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Oh!

Mr. SYMON. -

But, what then?

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is my reading of it.

Mr. SYMON. -

You are not to deviate from the provisions of this clause as to proportions and so on. What I say is that there is not the slightest reason why the provisions with regard to the ordinary dead-lock, if it is desired, should not apply to a difference of opinion. I do not think they ought to apply in principle; I do not think they ought to apply in practice. Passing away from that for a moment, I interjected that my honorable friend's amendment is not logical, and he quite properly said that he should be glad if I would show that it was not logical. The provisions in regard to the amendment of the Constitution are that the alteration is to be made by a reference, through the Parliament, to the people under the provisions of clause 121. I do not say that these provisions are ample; I do not say that they are sufficient; I do not say that they may not require amendment. My learned friend (Mr. Deakin) said that one general merit of the amendment is that the suggested narrowness of the provision for the amendment of the Constitution would be widened. With that I do not propose to deal, because we all may consider that there should be some facilities given that do not exist. I do not hold that view at present, but that general merit appears to me to be greatly over-balanced by the disadvantages which attach to this amendment. At present, the proposal in the Bill as it stands is that an alteration of the Constitution shall be submitted through the Parliament to the people with certain safeguards. There is not a single honorable member but agrees that we ought not to make too easy fundamental amendments of the Constitution. The other method is that we shall go direct to the people. But where is the logic, where is the consistency, of having neither one nor the other, but having a reference through the Parliament, and then if there is a disagreement a reference direct to the people? The whole of my honorable friend's speech, if it amounted to anything, or was of any value, amounted to this—that the proper thing to do is to sweep away the necessity for taking the opinion of the Parliament at all, and to go direct to the people.

Mr. ISAACS. -
And who is to start first?

Mr. SYMON. -
The responsible Government—the Executive.

Mr. ISAACS. -
You must have a starting point.

Mr. SYMON. -
Every one of us sees that we must have a starting point, but you do not require to take a majority of the two Houses for that. Why not leave it to the Executive?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I do not want a majority of the two Houses. I want a majority of one House.

Mr. SYMON. -
Why not leave it to the responsible Government of the day? Why should we leave it to one House? Why should we introduce this, which is really neither fish, flesh, fowl, nor good red herring?

Mr. REID. -
Then what can the other be?

Mr. SYMON. -
If you say "Leave it, to the Parliament," that I can understand, and that I believe one of my honorable friends will show is the suggestion made by the authority my learned friend quoted—Burgess. I can also understand a proposal that the responsible Government of the day, responsible to Parliament, liable to have their acts called in question by the Parliament, should have the right to take an amendment of the Constitution direct to the people.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Are you willing for that to be done?

Mr. SYMON. -
I am not willing for that to be done. The other course is logical, but it is utterly illogical and a destruction of the principle underlying this Constitution if we refer it to the Parliament, and then, because the Senate on a matter of the most vital state rights happens to hold out, it is to be over-ridden by a majority of the House of Representatives, and—perhaps at a critical time, just before a general election—the whole thing is to be thrown to a referendum, when these very party questions—these very personal questions, to which my learned friend alluded as happening in an ordinary election will just as emphatically and just as forcibly occur in connexion with the referendum.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That can all be prevented by a reference to the people.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

How can it, when there will be no persons involved?

Mr. SYMON. -

Every member of the Senate will be a person concerned; every member from every state who has sought to vindicate the rights of that state will be involved, and he will go back to his state, and you will have that question of a fundamental alteration of the Constitution not fortified by an absolute majority of both Houses, but made an entirely party question, instinct with all the hot passion of the moment, dealt with by the people in the states upon grounds which will probably prevent them coming to a just and meritorious decision. My learned friend will understand that I am not using the expression with reference to his personal advocacy of it, but this proposal is really an insidious attack on the rights and powers of the Senate. The result will be to paralyze the Senate in dealing with any fundamental alteration of the Constitution.

Mr. FRASER. -

Better to have no Senate at all.

Mr. SYMON. -

Really it would be better to have no Senate at all. Suppose they differ from the House of Representatives, what will they do?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Suppose the Senate initiates the reform, and the Assembly rejects it?

Mr. SYMON. -

I am quite willing to admit the difficulties that arise, but that is not the case in my honorable friend's mind.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Do you not remember the dictum of the old English Judge-"The Devil himself doth not know what the mind of man is?"

Mr. REID. -

He was not as clever as our friend from Adelaide.

Mr. SYMON. -

I can back my friend (Mr. Reid) against that gentleman any day in many respects.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

That gentleman had no legal training.

Mr. SYMON. -
I do not say for a moment that my learned friend has advocated the amendment with that deliberate intention. But we must all reckon with our past history. I know the zeal and assiduity with which he has sought to secure all possible restrictions on the Senate.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Not unfair ones.

Mr. SYMON. -
In my learned friend's estimation, no doubt, most fair and just ones, but in my estimation, I hope I may say so, most unfair and most unjust. I do not object at all to an old proposal—this is the old old tale coming newly dressed, put in a different shape. We had it in Adelaide, we had it in Sydney, and now we have it again here. This is the beginning of it, and I dare say we will have it in different forms. I observe that my friend (Mr. Higgins) is smiling. He has, no doubt, something with which he will try our patience.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You will smile then, of course. Are you speaking with a due fear of Sir John Forrest before your eyes?

Mr. SYMON. -
No, I am speaking with a due fear of my learned friend—a much more dangerous man. At any rate, I could understand such a proposal to refer this matter of amendment directly to the people. I could understand leaving it entirely to the Houses of Parliament to decide it by a majority. Either of these two courses I think would be fairly matters of debate, but when my learned friend proposes to mutilate, it may be to narrow, as some honorable members think, the harmonious and consistent provisions inserted here, by a plan which would paralyze and destroy the influence and power of the Senate, then, I say, it is a proposal which we ought to reject without further ado.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Why does it hamper the influence of the Senate to say that their constituents shall be consulted?

Mr. SYMON. -
My friend must see that the very essence of representative government is that if the constituents do not approve of the action of their representatives they have a remedy in their own hands, and if the Senate is recalcitrant, just as if the House of Representatives in the instance put by my honorable friend (Mr. Trenwith) is recalcitrant, the constituents have the remedy and the control entirely to themselves. Nobody can say for a moment that it is not entirely in conformity with the principles of responsible government that that method should be pursued to its fair and legitimate conclusion before any other methods are attempted. My learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) said that a difficulty was that, as it now stood, it might be possible to prevent the people from being consulted. How can such a proposition be maintained for a moment, when both these Houses—the whole of the representatives at the end of three years, half the senators at the end of three years—have to go to their constituents; and when, if it was an important fundamental amendment, one in which the constituents of the states would be so greatly interested, as my honorable friend says, that they might probably vote for the amendment, then they would take care that their representatives in the Senate who were adverse to that amendment would not be returned again?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then the Houses will not differ.

Mr. SYMON. -

Very well. What is the objection to the provision?

Mr. ISAACS. -

There is no objection to it. If the Houses will not differ, my proposal will not come into force; but if they do differ, then it is necessary.

Mr. SYMON. -

My learned friend is putting a pressure on one or other of the Houses not to differ, because one House will not differ if it is likely to be sent to its constituents. Your Senate would not differ. It would say—"We do not want to go and canvass the whole of our colony upon a matter of this kind." So far as the general provision is concerned, it really amounts to this—that it will be an easy way, before a general election, to manufacture an election placard. The Government of the day, perhaps some irresponsible member, may propose, in the House of Representatives or in the Senate, an amendment of the Constitution, and yet a majority of the other House may disagree, and then we shall have, to use a common expression, a rare to-do, and we shall have the Government of the day taking it up or neglecting it, in either of which cases those who constituted the majority will be able to go with a flourish of trumpets and an election placard throughout the constituencies.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will not that happen just as well where the two Houses agree—just carrying the proposition by a bare majority? Will not the opponents of it do exactly the same thing?

Mr. REID. -

You are responsible for a good deal. You set him going again just when
The difficulties of responsible government are very great, and we cannot foresee all of them. I quite admit, with my learned friend, that there are difficulties in the way of any solution of this question. But what I say is that it is an assault on the rights and powers of the Senate, and if we carry any such amendment as this-whatever may be said about narrowing or widening the powers of amendment-we will do violence to the framework of the Constitution.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I shall strive to express anything I have to say in about five minutes. Although I admit that it is a matter of very great importance, I entirely join issue with my learned friend (Mr. Symon) in looking at this matter as one affecting either the interests of the Senate or the interests of the House of Representatives. The object is to relieve the Senate from a comparatively helpless state in reference to an amendment of the Constitution, and to place it, as representing the states, in the position of being able to appeal to the states on a question of an amendment of the Constitution. The view I take is that, instead of degrading the Senate, it puts it in a position of absolute equality with the House of Representatives in a matter which has hitherto loosely been supposed to belong more to the House of Representatives than to the Senate. What this Senate is we do not need to be told. The Senate will be a a popular body springing from the people of the states; and surely the representatives of all the states, if they agree that a certain amendment of the Constitution should be proposed to the people, should not be blocked by the representatives of the nation in the House below. Surely cash has an equal right to put an issue of that kind for the deliberate decision of the electors. Trivial proposals will, of course, stand self-condemned. The expense and the inconvenience of taking the sense of the electors of the Commonwealth over the enormous territory we will have will completely kill any trivial proposals for the amendment of the Constitution. If the proposals are serious ones, why should not the Senate have the absolute right, by an absolute majority, of asking the opinion of the people upon a proposed amendment of the Constitution? Surely the states, as represented by the Senate, have a right to take such a verdict with regard to the proposed change. I think nearly all the writers of late years on the Constitution of the United States have pointed to this difficulty of even proposing an amendment of the United States Constitution as a serious inconvenience. We know, as a matter of fact, that during the long time the Constitution has been in existence, the amendments made in it have been very few indeed.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

And the desire for them very many.

Mr. REID. -

No doubt. It does not follow that propositions for amendment would be carried, but at any rate the wisdom of seeking the opinion of the nation and the states, each having an independent voice, would follow even if the difficulty of submitting an amendment to them were greater than it is. I think that the history of the experiment which we have made in this country is decidedly encouraging to this Convention, and must lead us to believe that the collective wisdom resulting from a united appeal is vastly higher than an appeal to an independent electorate. It has been so in connexion with the elections to this Convention—except in regard to the mistake made in returning me. So far as the other representatives are concerned the remark I have just made applies. Now, the States House, as separate from the other branch of the Legislature, may well have occasion to ask for an amendment of this Constitution. In the future we know that our work, perfect as we may try to make it, will suggest the necessity for amendment. There is nothing more certain than that. Therefore, without saying another word, I will state that I do not look upon the proposal of Mr. Isaacs as a radical proposition. I look upon it as a proposal which gives the Senate a powerful right, a right of appealing directly to the states and the nation upon a matter relating to a proposed amendment of the Constitution. It is, therefore, a proposition that we can discuss without any fear of radical ideas or tendencies. I would only make this one other remark. I favour this amendment subject to one stipulation, and that is that the proposed amendment of the Constitution, if it do not pass both Houses, shall have to pass one House in two consecutive sessions, so that the matter shall be brought into thorough prominence before the people. It may be found under a provision of that kind that the reception by the people of the proposal made would be such in the first instance that it would be abandoned altogether on it being found that public opinion was against it. We should then hear no more of it. But, on the other hand, if after thorough ventilation public opinion in the states favoured the proposed amendment, the amendment might be passed again, and we should, at any rate, secure a full interval for deliberation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I have no objection to that, or even to fixing a minimum of time between two sessions.
Mr. REID. -

That is not necessary, because in the clause as it stands, after the second session, an interval of two months must elapse before a vote can be taken. Coupling these two matters together, I recommend this amendment to the Convention, not as a radical proposal, but as one which will add to the powers of the Senate, and enable the Senate to take the people into their confidence if at any time the representatives of the states think an alteration of the Constitution necessary.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

The main objection which I have to the proposition of Mr. Isaacs is, first of all, that it allows the House of Representatives to prevent the voice of the Senate being of any avail. Because the position would be simply this: If an amendment were proposed in the Senate, and on going to the House of Representatives it were objected to by the House of Representatives, what would be the result? The amendment would have to be submitted to a mass referendum; so that the House of Representatives would always be in the position of being able to reject the proposals of the Senate, and preventing their coming to the dual referendum.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You misunderstand the proposal.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The proposal of the honorable member is that the first referendum is to be a mass referendum.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No; there is to be one referendum only.

Mr. REID. -

One referendum in which the matter would appear in two ways: Expressing the opinion of the states as states, and then of the people as one nation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You count the votes of the people and the votes of the states separately on one occasion.

Mr. GLYNN. -

At any rate, my misunderstanding of the clause shows that it is ambiguous.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The honorable member perhaps did not hear what I said. I asked the Chairman only to put one portion of the words.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I remember that perfectly, but did not understand it was to clear the ambiguity. The ambiguity, however, goes to this extent also—what is to become of the proposed amendment on the reference being given? The proposal of Mr. Isaacs is open to, but not clear upon, the construction that the amendment of the Constitution becomes law without any reference back to the Senate at all. The amendment does not say that the proposed alteration of the Constitution must go back to the Senate or the House of Representatives supported by the confirmation of the people, or that it ipso facto becomes law, I quite agree, however, that Mr. Isaacs is right in his argument, which he has put with such force and supported by such precedents, as to the necessity for a further provision being made with regard to proposed amendments in the Constitution. We should be careful not to suffer the wisdom, of the present to determine the actions of the Commonwealth for many years to come. Mr. Isaacs has pointed out the difficulty which has arisen in the United States of America. Only five important amendments have been made in the Constitution of the United States throughout the whole course of 110 years; because the first ten amendments made were merely declarations of right, and not, strictly speaking, amendments at all. They were alterations referring to the security of civil and religious liberty and such matters, which were proposed as conditions precedent to the adherence of several of the states to the Union. Five amendments were subsequently carried, but they were carried under most extraordinary circumstances. Four of them were carried by means of the force of the military power of the North, and one of the five-namely, that known as the 14th amendment of the Constitution, which was referred to, in the course of the discussion yesterday, an amendment extending civil liberty and immunities to all races—was carried by what is considered by area of the writers on the Constitution to have been an illegal act. The difficulty always has been to obtain the adherence of three-fourths of the Parliaments of the states. In one case, that of Ohio, the adhesion to the proposed, amendment was first of all given, and the state then withdrew it again; but the Secretary of State, of the Union stated (thereby usurping the functions of the Judiciary) that the consent of Ohio could not be withdrawn. So that, according to some of the writers, one of the five amendments I have referred to was carried illegally, whilst the four others were carried under the domination of the military power of the North. I find that there has been a misapprehension on my part concerning the amendment of Mr. Isaacs, and that I am in concurrence with the honorable and learned gentleman as to the main object which he desires to achieve—greater facility of alteration—although I cannot, for reasons which I will proceed to explain, accept his amendment. But I am prepared to suggest another one of my own, which will I think effect the same purpose. Mr. Reid has suggested that some power of initiation should be given. In the Constitution of the Confederate States it was proposed to allow three states of the Union to suggest an amendment, and that then there should be a constitutional convention of the whole of the states sitting together, and that if they adopted the amendment it should be put to the States House, and a majority of two-thirds (not of three-fourths) should carry it. The Constitution of the United States was practically placed in a straight jacket, and it was the splitting-caused by the difficulty of alteration-of the people of America into two parties-the strict constructionists, and those who adhered to the extension put in force by the Supreme Court-which led up to the Civil War. I think we should accept the experience of America as to the wisdom of not putting in too hide-bound a form of provision with regard to amendments of the Constitution. But it seems to me that, although the amendment now in the Bill would effect an improvement upon the state, of affairs in America, yet it is one which, involving a dual referendum, I cannot agree to without an effort to render it more elastic. Now, I do not know what the number of voters in Australia is at the present time, but I can speak as to the population, and I suppose that the proportion of voters would be approximately, in each of the colonies, proportionate to population. The population in the five colonies here represented was about 3,200,000 in June last year. If the majority of states—say, Tasmania, South Australia, and Western Australia—desired to reject an amendment in the Constitution you would have this position: That it would be within the power of 350,000 people (the sum of three majorities) to disallow an amendment which had been affirmed by both Houses of Parliament, and accepted by them by absolute majorities.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And also by the majority of the people?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I say that that power is not sufficiently fluid. Beyond that I can-not accept the principle of the referendum for the reason, first, that it has the weight of authority against it. Mr. Isaacs quoted, as if supporting his position, from Dr. Burgess, whose writings come down to the year 1896, upon this question. Now, Dr. Burgess makes the suggestion that if the Houses of Congress sitting together carry a proposal for an amendment in two successive Parliaments, and it be in like manner affirmed once in the Parliament of each state, the weight of the votes of each Parliament being the same as in Presidential elections, the amendment should become law.
My objection to the principle of the referendum is that it undermines the principle of representative government. According to the principle of representative government the voice of the people is represented by the delegation of their powers to men selected by them as specialists; but it seems to me that Mr. Isaacs wishes to refer matters of great complexity and difficulty to the uninstructed wisdom of the populace in all cases, although many of the matters so referred would be amendments of the Constitution involving far-reaching consequences.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You seem to object to the people ratifying personally this Constitution.

Mr. GLYNN. -

No, I do not, as here they would have the simple issue of federation or not; but the wisdom of centuries, operated upon by the law of the survival of the fittest, has pronounced in favour of the principle of representative government, and it is now proposed to go back to the old system of referendum, such as prevails in Switzerland. The honorable member will be aware that in the United States, up to the year 1818, suggested amendments of the Constitution had to be passed by both Houses of Parliament in the states, and then had to be ratified or rejected by the people through conventions. But Massachusetts, in 1818, adopted the principle of the referendum, after passage by two Parliaments. Subsequently they appeared to have found the faults arising from this system, and several of the states in which amendments have been made in their Constitutions have proceeded on the principle of allowing majorities, simple or absolute, of the Houses of Parliament, both before and after election, to settle the question whether there is to be an amendment of the Constitution or not. Delaware, for instance, has resolved that a two-thirds majority before election, and a three-fourths majority after election, will carry an amendment, without a referendum to the people at all.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is the only state that has not the referendum.

Mr. GLYNN. -

It marks an advance from the old system. They first had a system with no referendum. In 1818, following the lead of Massachusetts, they began to abolish, to some extent, the system of conventions, and more recently the states, in recasting their Constitutions, are exhibiting a preference for the voice of Parliament by an absolute or other majority, as against the voices of the states themselves. I submit that the honorable and learned member's American analogy in support of the referendum falls to pieces, and his authority-Burgess-also does not support him as to the method to be adopted. What I would suggest is to have an alternative method of amending the Constitution. We might adopt the method at present in vogue, and also an alternative method, which I have suggested by an amendment that is in print. This is, that if an amendment of the Constitution is carried by a majority in the Senate-a majority including at least one-half the representatives for each state-and if it is also carried in the House of Representatives by a majority including one-third of the representatives for each state, then, if it is again carried, after a periodical election of the Senate, by similar majorities, it should become law without any reference to the people. If that amendment is carried, you will have the predominance of the majority of votes, and thus, to a great extent, conciliate those who believe in the principle of majority government. But, at the same time, you will give a quality to that majority which will preserve, to the extent that is advisable, state rights, because you will not allow any majority to carry an amendment in which each state has not, in the Senate, representation to the extent of one-half. Moreover, the carrying of the amendment by these majorities in the first instance will not be final, as the postponement until after the periodical election of the Senate will allow time for further consideration. Such a proposal is in thorough consonance with the federal idea. What will be the result if we do not make more elastic provision for the amendment of the Constitution? We are creating a Judiciary which will become legislators. Undoubtedly, in America, the Judiciary have been legislators to a very large extent. I would like legal members of the Convention to read an article in the Law Times of the 13th February, 1897, by a lawyer, on the effect of the undue expansion by the Judiciary, contrary to the lines of the Constitution, of the American Constitution. The article is by Mr. Seymour D. Thompson. He points out that, owing to the great difficulty of amendment, practically the elasticity of the Constitution is determined by the character of the judicial bench-that with a man like Marshall, of extraordinary forensic power as well as great liberality of thought, you have an expansion, which is necessitated by the changed conditions of the people, which could not have been anticipated 50 or 60 years before. But Mr. Thompson also points out that there are a great many evils arise from the existing state of things. He says-

To promote this expansion of power, we have seen the Legislature of a state prohibited from repealing a public grant, got from its predecessors by the most notorious corruption. We have seen the Legislature of a state prohibited from making a useful modification of the charter of an eleemosynary corporation, long after the death of all its founders; and, subsidiary to this, we have been taught the doctrine that an executed gift is a contract within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. We have seen the sovereign power of taxation bargained away by corrupt Legislatures to private corporations, and future Legislatures prohibited for all time from resuming the power. We have seen, under the name of preserving the inviolability of contracts, rights got by bribery from venal Legislatures endowed with sanctity and immorality, and placed for ever beyond the reach of the people. We have seen useful and necessary revenue laws of the states, and of the United States, suspended and nullified. We have seen the executive officers of our Governments, both federal and state, subjected to compulsory judicial process. We have seen corporations aggregate declared to be "citizens" within the meaning of the same instrument, for the purpose of enlarging the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and seizing a portion of the jurisdiction rightfully belonging to the states. We have even seen the Supreme Federal Tribunal arrogate to itself, with a general public acquiescence, the jurisdiction of deciding between two contestants which is the lawful Governor of one of the states-a question which, from its very nature, eludes federal jurisdiction and control.

Now, these are manifest evils of the difficulty of the restricted power of amendment, because the difficulty is so great that you cannot cure these defects pointed out by this legal writer. It was this which caused Jefferson to exclaim that he saw the Federal Judiciary, in the enlargement of its powers, advancing with noiseless steps, like a thief, over the field of jurisdiction. I would caution you against inserting only such a power of amendment that, hereafter, changes shall be measured only by the "dead hand;" that, while you should give some permanence to the fundamentals of the Union, and remove beyond the influence of passing phases of opinion and the caprice of party politicians, principles which, although not fundamental, are broad and basic, you should remember, at the same time, that there are other provisions which are not basic, but are more transitory;
and which, with the changes that will occur in the social conditions, relations, and modes of thought of the people

[P.740] starts here

may require to be recast. While taking security for fundamentals, the degree of elasticity in the Constitution ought to be determined with regard to conditions that are more or less of a transitional nature. We should rather prefer to risk change with regard to those that are more stable, than to impose an undue rigidity with respect to those that are more temporary in their character. We ought not to create the evil of making the Judges not merely interpreters, but the extenders of the Constitution, and we ought to give the Constitution such a degree of elasticity as will render it capable of being moulded to the changed conditions as time goes on, and prevent the dangerous alternative of judicial expansion.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I am not surprised at the honorable Member (Mr. Glynn), misunderstanding the effect of the amendment suggested by the Victorian Assembly, because, certainly, it struck me in the very same way at first, until I heard the explanation from my honorable friend the Attorney-General of Victoria. But, as I understand it now, it is in brief this: That supposing the Senate or the House of Representatives should wish to have an amendment of the Constitution, and the other House does not agree to it, then there shall be a referendum to both states and people, as to whether the amendment shall be law or not.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If that is the proposal, I shall vote for it. I think the Premier of New South Wales is quite right when he says that it is not a radical matter at all. It is not a question of liberal politics or conservatives politics, but simply a question of common sense, and it is a device that may be used either by the Senate or by the other House. If the Senate should wish to have an alteration of the Constitution, and possibly it will, I do not see why, assuming that there have been due safeguards taken, it should not have the matter referred to the states and to the people as here proposed. But, in passing, I may say that I myself think there ought to be a distinction between two classes of changes in the Constitution. I think the states are right in insisting that the powers which are conferred by clause 52 of this Bill should not be increased without very great precaution indeed. I think an alteration with regard to the rest of the Constitution, what I may call the machinery part, ought to be much easier than the forms for altering the Constitution with regard to the powers conferred by the states on the Federal Commonwealth. If a number of the states come together and say- "We are willing to surrender certain powers to the Central Government," I take it that we ought not to impose on them, against their will, without very great precautions, the surrender of other powers. I only throw that out now, because I want to see whether it would be worth while, for me, hereafter, to move an amendment in that direction. In supporting the amendment of the Attorney-General of Victoria, I do not support it in the least as being an extraordinarily liberal change. I support it simply as being a device that could be used both by the, Senate and the House of Representatives. The honorable member (Mr. Symon) said that the system proposed is not in vogue in Switzerland. Now, I have had the advantage of referring to a book, which the Attorney-General of Victoria has put into my hands, and, after looking through that book, I have no hesitation in saying that, in substance, the proposal of the Attorney-General of Victoria is to be found in the Swiss Constitution of 1890 and 1891.

Mr. DOBSON. -
They have no responsible government there.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
With all respect, it is for the honorable member to show that responsible government makes any difference to this question.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Surely it does.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I think not. In regard to Switzerland, I will refer to Articles 118, 119, 120, and 122 of the Act of 1890.

Their effect, without reading them in full, is this—that when the two Houses differ, not only is there a duty to have a change of the Constitution remitted to the states and to the people, for acceptance or rejection; but there is the additional power that if 50,000 people from any part of the republic should wish to have it referred to the people in the states, they can have it referred.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Does the Swiss referendum apply to amendments of the Constitution?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
There is not the least doubt of it. In the book which the Attorney-General of Victoria handed to me, it is shown that the Act of 1890 applies to a total revision of the Constitution, and then, because they found it convenient, they applied the system afterwards to a partial revision of the Constitution. Article 120 provides that, if either the Council or the Federal Assembly passes a resolution for the total revision of the Federal Constitution and the other House does not agree, or if 50,000 Swiss voters demand a total revision, the question whether the Constitution ought to be revised or not is to be submitted to a vote of the Swiss people. Article 122 says that the amended Federal Constitution shall take effect when it has been adopted by a majority of Swiss citizens who take part in a vote thereon, and by a majority of the cantons.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
The provision in the Swiss Constitution is not on a line with this clause.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
If I have not succeeded in showing that I have not done anything. The idea is exactly the same, which is that if the two Houses cannot agree upon a measure, it should be remitted to the people, who have today "Yes" or "No." If the majority of the people and of the cantons say "Yes," the amendment takes place. With regard to responsible government, there is a distinction that has occurred to me, and it was referred to by Mr. Reid. I have for some time been a strong adherent of the referendum, but I have never been in favour of the referendum being used until the members elected have taken the responsibility of saying "Yes" or "No" on a question. I know that there is great danger of members saying: "We will pass the measure in this House; it will do no harm, and the other House will reject it, and we can send it to the people." I object to any action of that sort. The advantage of representation is that any measure goes through the refining process first in the minds of men who have been elected for that particular responsible purpose. I should, therefore, having regard to our system of government, be strongly in favour of a suggestion that was thrown out lightly by Mr. Reid, which is that before a question is remitted to the people it should be passed not in one session of Parliament only, but in two sessions, with a reasonable interval between. A provision of that sort would be wholesome in its operation. I am not in fear of hasty legislation, but I am greatly in fear of honorable members shunting their responsibility and saying: "It will all go to the people." I want members to face their responsibility, and I want the people to have the advantage of a long discussion before they commit themselves. I want them to have the advantage of what appears in the newspapers, and of what takes place in Parliament, and on the platform.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
They will have that opportunity under the Bill as it stands.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
No.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
There will be too long a delay.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I intend to vote for the amendment proposed by my honorable friend
(Mr. Isaacs), but I hope that words will afterwards be introduced either by Mr. Reid or by some other honorable member to provide that before the referendum is taken the measure shall be passed in two sessions.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
As one who is strongly in favour of

(P.742) starts here
maintaining in every way the States House, I scrutinized this proposal very carefully at first, but, on looking into it, I see that it does not in any way strike at the influence of the Senate in the Federation. As long as we have a double referendum there is nothing whatever to fear from my point of view.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It protects the states and the Senate.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

If the Senate represents its constituents on any question of an amendment of the Constitution, it has nothing to fear from an appeal to its constituents. On the contrary, it has everything to gain, because, without being subjected to the inconvenience, and I may say the expense, of a general election, the members of the Senate will have the advantage of obtaining a direct vote of confidence by means of the referendum. I am in favour of the referendum wherever it is possible with justice to app

Mr. LYNE. -

Would not this amendment provide for a referendum of the whole people and not of the states?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

No. I understand from Mr. Isaacs that he has no such intention. It would probably be safer to say, instead of "in the manner provided by this Constitution," "in the manner provided by this section."

The CHAIRMAN. -

An amendment has been handed to me by the honorable member to insert, after "people," the words of the Commonwealth and of the states."

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Under the Constitution as it stands there is only one form of referendum, but no doubt it would be better to say "as provided by this section." In the support I have given, and shall continue to give, to the Senate, I have never regarded that branch of the Legislature as a conservative House. I do not want to see either House a conservative House that will stand in the way of the will of the people. I do not think there is any fear whatever of the Senate being the more conservative body. That House which has the largest infusion of South Australian democracy in proportion to its numbers is likely to be the democratic House. Several honorable members have said that the referendum should only take place after the due enlightenment of the people by means of a discussion in Parliament. Under this amendment there will be no referendum without very considerable discussion, and if Mr. Reid's suggestion is adopted there will be still further discussion in both Houses. That difficulty is, therefore, got rid of. After mature consideration, I intend to support Mr. Isaacs in his contention, but I would remonstrate with the honorable member in regard to a statement be made at the opening of his very able remarks. His remarks are always able and most convincing; but why did he start with the assumption that I was going to oppose? I desire briefly to refer to the statements he made with regard to the difficulty of amending the American Constitution. The honorable member knows too well for it to be necessary for me to inform him that this difficulty does not necessarily point to any analogous difficulty here. We only require an absolute majority of the Houses, whereas in America a two-thirds majority is necessary. Then again, we only require a majority of the states on the referendum, whereas in America there must be a three-fourths majority. These analogies do not therefore hold good. The honorable member's argument with regard to any general feeling of dissatisfaction as to the position of affairs in America under which Nevada has a vote did not satisfy me either. That relates to a different clause of the Bill altogether than that which the honorable member now seeks to amend, and the acceptance or rejection of the amendment would, so far as that matter is concerned, make no difference. I have still to be convinced that in America there is any solid dissatisfaction with that clause in the Constitution which provides that each state shall have equal representation in the Senate, even if the maintenance of that principle does lead to such an anomaly as that of Nevada having a vote. I still ask the honorable member if he can bring forward—and I shall be only too glad if he can—any substantial evidence that there is in the United States any large body of public opinion opposed to equal representation in the Senate?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I quoted a number of authorities in Adelaide.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

There is dissatisfaction with regard to the mode of election of the Senate, but I do not believe that there is any considerable proportion, much less a majority, of the people, who, to overcome any anomaly, would be willing to strike out the clause which provides that no alteration in the representation of the Senate shall be made without the consent of the states concerned.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I could give you numerous newspaper extracts.

Mr. REID. -

I hope the honorable member will not introduce the question of the equality of the states now.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

No, I will not. I was very much struck with the remarks made by Mr. Reid on this question. I was glad to hear him say that the Senate would be a popular House springing directly from the popular vote.
[The Chairman left the chair at four minutes to one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at six minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

It seems to me rather difficult to judge of this matter on its merits. There are two large sections of this Convention— one section who are anxious, as I think my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) is, in every possible place in this Constitution to put the principle of the referendum; and there is another section who think that the principle of the referendum should only be adopted as the last resort, and under some very peculiar circumstances. It has been said that there is a very little difference in this amendment, and that it does not mean much, but there is a great deal of difference in the manner in which you apply the referendum under various circumstances. There is a tremendous difference between asking the people to say yes or no to a piece of legislation, or an amendment of the Constitution, which has had the sanction of two Houses, and has gone through that constitutional course, and asking them in the first place to become the arbiters between the two Houses, and in the next place to practically legislate for themselves, because you say you will throw before the electors of the country a matter which is absolutely in dispute, which has not had the sanction of the two Houses of Parliament, to which they look as the essence of their Constitution for a decision upon all matters. The only reason that I can see for the amendment of Mr. Isaacs, and which probably to some extent induced him to move it, is that it will provide for the want of an initiative. There is no doubt it is quite possible that under this Constitution the voice of the people might require to be heard in some great matter with regard to the amendment of this Constitution. There is no doubt that this amendment does to a certain extent effect that object, only in an indirect way. It might practically come to the same thing; but I think it would be far more straightforward on our part to introduce that as a question to be debated on its own merits, because we cannot get away from this fact, that the referendum is not a matter which has laid fast hold on the people of these colonies. What I said once or twice before, dealing with certain matters such as compulsory arbitration, provision for the poor of the country, applies in this case—that is, we have no right to introduce into this Constitution any experimental legislation. We must look to the future to guide us, as it has guided all British communities, as to the safety of going away from the broad lines of our own Constitution. I consider that this amendment does strike a blow at the vital principle running through the whole of this clause. This clause takes it for granted that we are still under responsible government, that we are still under a system of bi-cameral government, and that the people look almost in every case to complete harmony between these two Houses for their own protection before anything is devised as a matter of legislation. I do not think it is necessary to say very much more. At the same time, I do think that this principle of the referendum ought not to be dragged in where it is not absolutely necessary. Therefore, if I have to give my decision at all, I think it is safer to leave the clause as it is. It is not a matter that requires long speeches or specious argument. The principle is simply before us whether in this case we desire the people to be arbiters between the two Houses in case of difference.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is the question.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

We are framing a Constitution which, while it is framed on popular principles, is a Constitution which we believe will last for all time, and a Constitution in which, while you have every scope for liberal enterprise in future, ought to be to a certain extent conservative in its instincts, and we ought not to fritter away this conservative element by any principles introduced into the Bill. These are my views, and I think, as a matter of safeguarding the Constitution and carrying on for the present on the lines on which we have always moved, I shall be obliged, with all due consideration for the very able argument of Mr. Isaacs, to vote against his amendment.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

This clause was framed and adopted at Adelaide after very full consideration, and with a full determination on the part of members of the Convention generally that any alteration in the Constitution should be made not too easy. It cannot be said that any reference to the people on this great question is required by reason of urgency with regard to the Government of the day. The Government could not be hampered in its functions by the refusal of either House to adopt any amendment whatever of the Constitution-

Mr. ISAACS. -

Why not?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Because all that is required for carrying on the government would surely be apart from this matter of a change in the Constitution. The Right Hon. Mr. Reid mentioned, as one argument in favour of the suggested amendment, that with the addition that he proposed to make it would give the people of the colonies an opportunity of considering, both through the press and by means of public discussion, the desirability or otherwise of this amendment. That is to say, the people would be educated to give a just vote upon the subject when they were called upon to do so. That argument applies just as much to what will happen under the clause. If one House of the Parliament objected to an amendment of the Constitution proposed by the other House, the people between one session and the next would have ample opportunity to discuss the matter, the newspapers would enlighten them as to the nature and the desirability of the proposed change, and, if the voice of public opinion were loudly in favour of the change, one House would be sure to give way. We have to remember that the great body of the people will be just as much represented in the Senate, man for man, as in the House of Representatives. Either the Senate or the House of Representatives would yield to its constituents—the whole people of Australasia—and this would save any further reference of the matter to the people. I believe in the clause as it was passed in Adelaide, and I shall support it as it stands.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I intend to support the clause as it stands. I do not think that the ground which I take in doing so need necessarily depend upon my views in regard to the referendum. I have already expressed the view, and I firmly believe, that the referendum is an expedient which should be adopted only under very extraordinary and special circumstances, such as the circumstances to which it would be applied under the clauses dealing with the amendment of the Constitution, and then it should be applied only after the fullest possible opportunity has been given for the Houses to exercise their opinion and their responsibility. I object to the proposal, because it is of the very essence of the process by which the Constitution is to be amended that both Houses of Parliament shall, first of all, express their opinion upon a proposed amendment. Of what use is it to provide that any proposed amendment shall go before them, if because they do not agree with respect to it they are to be immediately deprived of their right of decision in regard to it? What is the use of sending it to them, if, supposing they do not at once agree, it is to be afterwards referred to the people? We cannot be too careful in making it plain upon the face of the Constitution, which guarantees the maintenance of the rights of every state entering the Federation, that the Constitution will not be lightly interfered with. It would be a derogation of that principle if we were to place the alteration of the Constitution in the hands of a majority, which might be obtained at any time under the influence of some popular excitement. I had not the pleasure of hearing the speech of the Attorney-General of Victoria, but I understand that the reason he urged in favour of his amendment was that the time consumed in waiting for an agreement of the Houses upon a proposed amendment of the Constitution might be a serious obstruction to the passing of that amendment. My answer to that argument is that I hope we shall provide in the Constitution some means by which, if the Houses cannot agree, they will be sent to those whom they represent to get a fresh mandate from the people. If they come back from the people unable to agree upon such an important matter as a proposed amendment of the Constitution, the country will not be ripe for such an amendment. The Constitution, which will be a guarantee to every one of the states of the permanence of the agreement they have made, ought not to be disturbed unless there is such a large preponderance of feeling throughout the country in favour of an amendment that it can be carried under the provisions we have already inserted in the Bill. It is true that the American Constitution is somewhat too rigid in its methods of amendment, but we have gone a long way beyond the American Constitution. I cannot understand that there should be any difficulty, considering the processes which will have to be gone through in order to secure that the Houses shall represent the opinion of the country, in obtaining the agreement of the Houses in a matter of such common interest as a proposed amendment of the Constitution. It was suggested by the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) that a distinction might be made between the amendments of different portions of the Constitution. In theory, a good deal might be said for such a distinction. No doubt many amendments of the Constitution would not affect legislative or territorial rights, but would be mere matters of procedure. But, in practice, how are you going to draw a line which will separate them?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Clause 52, and perhaps clause 53, might be dealt with separately from the rest of the Bill.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

One can never tell what importance even an amendment affecting a matter of procedure may have to the contracting parties.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is not a question of importance, because all amendments would be important—it is a question of delegating certain subjects to the Central Government. The states ought not to be bound to delegate other subjects except with their own consent or with great precautions.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

As has been suggested in the course of the debate, this is not an occasion for long speeches. We shall probably have to deal with the general principles of the referendum when we come to the dead-lock clauses. I thought it necessary, however, to express my opinion upon this subject as concisely, but still as definitely, as possible. I do not think there is anything we should be more careful about than to secure the permanence of the Constitution which we are creating, and I think we shall be acting unwisely, in the interests of those who will compose the future Commonwealth, if we allow the Constitution to be altered before it has been ascertained in the surest way possible that the majority of the people desire the alteration.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

The chief objection I see to the amendment is that the clause is a most admirable one, and everything that the most democratic member of the community should require. The Constitution embodies the bargain and the terms upon which the different states will enter the Federation. The Attorney-General of Victoria and those who think with him are not content with the very wise and simple provision that before any amendment of the Constitution is made it shall be suggested by the two Houses of Parliament, although all that is required is a bare majority in each House. The honorable and learned member wishes to provide that if one House objects to a proposed amendment the people may be asked what they think about the matter. Surely if only one House considers an amendment necessary, while the other emphatically asserts that it is not necessary, there is no occasion to submit the question to the people. Am I not entitled to argue that, as both Houses spring from the people—as they are both elected upon manhood suffrage—a disagreement between them would show that the people had not made up their minds upon the question in dispute? It would be little better than a farce when the intelligent persons who represented the people could not agree about a question of this kind to go back, I will not say to the ignorant, but to the less enlightened electors, and ask them to decide it. This proposal strikes at the very root of our system of government, wherein the people admit that they have not the experience, the intelligence, or the time to govern themselves, and, therefore, they depute representatives to do it for them. Two most important questions have been raised during the debate, and I think we ought to answer them both in the same way. The first is—Do the provisions against dead-locks in connexion with ordinary legislation apply to dead-locks occasioned by a proposal to amend the Constitution? It has been asserted that they do, but I confess that I did not read the Constitution in that way. I thought that the chapter relating to the amendment of the Constitution was a chapter in itself, until it was pointed out to me that a proposal to amend the Constitution could be treated in the same way as an ordinary Bill when brought under the operation of the dead-lock clauses.

Mr. ISAACS. -
   How could it?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
   It could not. The dead-lock clauses only apply to laws passed by the Parliament.

Mr. DOBSON. -
   But some honorable members argue that they would apply to a proposal to amend the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
   No, because the Constitution is not passed by the Parliament.

Mr. DOBSON. -
   Well, I hope the provisions for amending the Constitution will be kept entirely by themselves, and that they will set out in most specific terms the process by which amendments can be made. The honorable member (Mr. Higgins) made a very important suggestion, which the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor) has dealt with to some extent. His proposal was that if you are going to have a very easy way of amending the Constitution you should divide amendments into two classes. I was very much struck with the suggestion, but I see that there would be a difficulty in drawing a distinction between these two classes. I shall not, however, consent to the amendment of the Attorney-General of Victoria. If it were carried, all that would be necessary to do to secure amendment of the Constitution would be to get a clique in one House to pass a resolution in favour of it, and then, notwithstanding the objections of the other House, appeal to the people upon it. Why, sir, the honorable member is actually giving us a popular initiative in reference to the fundamental amendment of the terms of our Constitution. Is that reasonable? Is there any common sense in it? At a time like that, disagreement between the two Houses will show that the people were not ripe for settling it. Look how many questions we have at the present day in which the quotation that Mr. Deakin gave us from that far-seeing Judge comes in-"When the Devil himself could not ascertain the minds of the people." I wish that the representatives of Victoria would bear that little quotation in mind more frequently, because on most questions the people's mind is not made up until those questions have been dealt with legislatively and practically for one, two, three or four years. Take the social legislation with regard to the factory laws now going on in this colony, for example. Will any one tell me that that question is ripe to be submitted to the people? Why, sir, I say to our friends of Victoria that that question is not ripe to be submitted to the foremost men of their colony. And a number of such questions are coming on just now in Victoria—notably the half-holiday question—in which I take a great interest. I observe that, on that question alone, 400 summonses have been issued within the past few days. The people of Victoria, like the people of New Zealand, are engaged in experiments in reference to factory and social legislation, and it will be monstrous that, the moment a disagreement arises between the two Houses of Parliament, we should provide that they must go back to the people and ask the people to make up their minds about the question at issue, when even the more intelligent men in Parliament have not been able to do so. I think that the adoption of the amendment would weaken the Senate, that it would cut at the principles of constitutional government, and would be a most dangerous provision to put in the Constitution. The clause as it stands, in my opinion, is a most admirable one, and if the leader of the Convention is going to sum up this debate in his usual clever judicial style, I hope he will point out to the Convention that there are abundant reasons why we should reject this amendment.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I shall be found recording my vote in favour of the amendment of the Attorney-General of Victoria. I did not intend to speak, but, after listening carefully to the debate, I felt that the point which has just been made—that the provisions relating to dead-locks do not affect alterations of the Constitution—rendered it absolutely necessary that we should provide some comparatively facile means by which those alterations can be made. The greater part of our deliberations during the session in Sydney was occupied in devising some means for the solution of dead-locks. A scheme was arrived at, which will probably be amended and improved here; but when we are told that that scheme, whatever its shape may be, will not apply to amendments of the Constitution, then it means that it will not afford a solution of the difficulties of a crucial character, which are likely to occupy the attention of the Federal Parliament. Now, there is no matter on which feeling is likely to run higher than on questions of the amendment of the Constitution. What is the good of providing for the solution of a difficulty of a minor character, as regards ordinary matters, which seem to me likely to sink into comparative insignificance as compared with questions of alterations in the Constitution, when you leave untouched a matter of this sort? And yet, in the one case, you are at great pains to provide a means of declaring which view shall prevail—the Senate or the House of Representatives; while, as-regards questions greater to all, in which public feeling is likely to be strongly divided, not only do you not provide the means of alteration of the Constitution, but you introduce greater difficulties. In the case of the alteration of the Constitution, if we intend to adhere to the provision as it is now proposed, the position will be this: Before the people, either by dual referendum or by national referendum, can have a word to-say on the subject, the two Houses must be agreed, and their agreement must be of such a character that it will be certified to by absolute majorities.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Well, that is all right.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I think that probably under those circumstances a reference to the people might be absolutely unnecessary; but to declare that until that agreement is arrived at there shall be no possible reference to the people seems to me to be contending for a position which cannot be seriously-supported. The view I take of the matter is this: These two Houses ought to be maintained in their respective positions as exponents, as regards the Senate, of the will of the peoples of the states; and, as regards the House of Representatives, of the will of the people of the nation. But in all questions where one House it may be, as put by the Premier of New South Wales Mr. Reid), the Senate-proposes an amendment which is rejected by the other House, and again, after an interval carries that amendment-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Oh, you have that in your mind, have you?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I have both positions in my mind, and I ask the Premier of Western Australia to deal with the matter in a similar way, and not to look at it from the position of one House or the other, but from the position of both. And if it is proposed here to give a right to the Senate which was denied to the House of Representatives, or to give to the House of Representatives a right which was denied to the Senate, I should be found dissenting from it. But the proposal is that, when either House differs from the other in a matter affecting the Constitution, and after a reasonable interval again affirms its position, instead of the dead-lock continuing, there shall be a power of appeal to the constituents of the two Houses to say what shall be done under the circumstances. Why find fault with that proposal? Does Sir John Forrest desire that the Senate should reject an amendment of the Constitution favoured by the peoples of the states?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Both Houses of the local Parliaments are continually changing their Constitutions.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
That may be, and if, through any alteration of the Constitution of either House, the difficulty is other-wise solved, well and good; but is it to be tolerated that the House of Representatives or the Senate, in defiance of the will of its constituencies, whichever House it may be, should prevent an alteration of the Constitution desired by the one House or the other being given effect to?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
The Constitution ought not to be alterable too easily.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I thoroughly agree with my right honorable friend that the Constitution ought not to be alterable too easily, but to say that it cannot be altered at all, to that the general provisions as to deadlocks shall have no application whatever to questions involving the amendment of the Constitution, and that a reference to the people by the dual referendum shall only take place when it is practically unnecessary-when the two Houses agree-is to put forward a proposal that cannot be supported.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That state of things exists at the present time in all these colonies.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
There are a variety of conditions in existence at the present time in the various colonies which we desire to amend. No doubt the Premier of Western Australia-rejoicing, as he does, in a brand new Constitution containing all the latest improvements-does not see the necessity for this provision in the same light as I do, but in a few years the Constitution of his own colony may require amendment, just as the Constitutions of other colonies not go favorably situated in that respect as Western Australia require amendment now.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We can get on very well without this.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
But the position that is put by the Attorney-General of Victoria is that on a question of the amendment of the Constitution, when both Houses of the Federal Parliament are hopelessly at issue, there should be a right of appeal to the constituencies of each, and, it seems to me to be so reasonable a proposition that I shall be found recording my vote in favour of it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I do not intend to keep the committee at any length on this subject. I have endeavoured to look at this matter in the way in which some of my friends who think differently from me view it, with the object which one always has in view—that we should endeavour to bring our opinions together as closely as possible. But I have not yet been able to see that an amendment of this kind inserted in the amendment clause of the Bill would be an improvement of the Constitution. I do not wish to put the matter on many grounds; but there are one or two broad grounds on which I think it may well be put. The Constitution, as it is at present drawn, provides that there shall be an absolute majority of the Parliament and a majority of the electors when the question is referred to them—a majority that will denote in that case that the greater number of the whole of the electors, and the greater number of the electors of the majority of the states, will be concurring powers. Now, it is said that this is too difficult a method of altering the Constitution, and we are asked to consider the difficulties that have arisen in America, because of the difficulty of amending the Constitution of the United States. Well, what is the American provision? It is to be found in Article 5 of the Constitution of the United States, and it practically amounts to this—that there shall be a two-thirds majority of the Houses. That is to say, out of every 30 there shall be a majority of 20 members, not as we propose out of every 30 a majority of 16 members; that after that has taken place there shall be a three-fourths majority of the states, shown either by their legislation or by conventions of the people. That, I think, is a brief description of what it amounts to. So with regard to that Parliament, the majority must be one of two-thirds in each state, or in the alternative there must be an application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states. Then, on this application, a Convention is to be called-

For proposing, amendments which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

With a certain proviso as to the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the First Article.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

One of those has never been used.

Mr. BARTON. -

No, but there are the difficulties in the way of the amendment of the American Constitution—first, that the matter cannot move without a two-thirds majority of both Houses of the Federal Legislature, or the applications of three-fourths of the Legislatures of the states. And when one or other of those motive processes has taken place, there can then only be a success of the amendment if the states approve by a majority of three-fourths, shown either by their legislation or by conventions of the people. That is not only a complicated process, but it is one of extreme difficulty. Let us contrast it with the method proposed in the Constitution—that there shall, in the first instance, be an absolute majority of the two Houses, not a two-thirds majority, and that there shall afterwards be a numerical majority of the electors shown as to the whole body politic and also as to a majority of the states. In either of these positions, without speaking of the difficulty of the alterations in the American Constitution, the Australian process is very much more easy than the American process for the purpose of enabling amendments to be made, in that it only interposes between the proposal of the amendment and the taking of the vote such stages as will insure the deliberation, first of Parliament, and next of the people. These seem to me to be the principles at the bottom of the amendment clause in the Constitution. It is now proposed to make this more easy still, and in what way? The proposal really amounts to this: That the matter shall be settled by the majority of the electors of the Commonwealth, and the majority of the states voting through their electors, whether the Houses of Parliament agree or disagree.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They must have one House with them.

Mr. BARTON. -

Whether the Houses of Parliament, I repeat, agree or disagree. It is said that they must have one House with them. The proposals are numerous about which you get at least one House to agree, and you very often find, not often on questions which involve a distinction between liberalism and conservatism, that the modes of reasoning which commend themselves to one House are not those which commend themselves to the other. Consequently, you get into this position under this amendment, that provided you can get a majority in one House of Parliament, it does not matter whether your Houses of Parliament agree or disagree. That is to say, if once a vote of a majority can be taken in one House with the interposition suggested by the honorable member (Mr. Reid), if that is adopted, that the thing shall occur in two consecutive sessions, then a vote shall be taken by the people. I object to this proposal; having applied my best consideration to it, I cannot get out of my objections to it. The first objection seems to me to be this—that with the one condition of getting a vote in one House of Parliament—a vote repeated if you like—it then does not matter whether the Houses of Parliament agree or disagree. It is only one degree removed from saying that it does not matter whether there is a Parliament or not.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It must be a big thing for the Ministry. A Ministry cannot leave open such a question as this.

Mr. BARTON. -

The Ministry may take sides one way or the other. They have always to take sides about everything unless they can make a question which ought to be a Ministerial question sometimes an open question.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I mean in two sessions.

Mr. BARTON. -

The Ministry may seek to avert, if you like, some impending disaster to themselves and their policy by an amendment of the Constitution, and if one of the means of seeking to avert disaster is to endeavour to obtain an amendment of the Constitution, then an, apportionment of such enormous means to so little a thing as the life of the Ministry makes the proposal still more objectionable.

Mr ISAACS. - No one rests it on that.

Mr. BARTON. - Of course no one rests it on that. But we have to consider in all these cases what are the probabilities of misuse, and there one can see a very strong probability of misuse; the more a Ministry is fighting for its life the more misuse there is likely to be made of the proposal. That seems to be one objection: That provided you get the one condition precedent, which in many cases is not a difficult one, of securing a majority of one House, and, if Mr. Reid's proposal is accepted, having that majority repeated, then from that point it does not matter whether you have a Parliament or not. I have been against the referendum on general grounds. I have been against the referendum on the ground that it is a proposal which tends to eat away the foundations of responsible government. I will not go at length into my objections to the referendum on that ground; that ought to be reserved for another part of the Bill, I think, but I must state, for the purpose of my argument, that I adhere to that objection to the referendum as applied to all ordinary legislation-of course, the objection does not inherently apply to the referendum as proposed in the amendment clause of the Bill when an endeavor is made to make the people an arbiter between the two Houses, as to a concurrent proposal of legislation, or as to the question whether legislation shall be moved or whether it shall stand. I have always taken the position that I object to the referendum, not from any inherent objection to the voice of the people being taken, but because the referendum is, under such circumstances, when coupled with the provisions of responsible government, a means of eating away the very foundations of responsible government, and rendering responsible government a myth. That may, or may not, be a right position, and it remains to be argued under another part of the Bill, but holding that opinion I have to apply it to the condition of the present proposal, and in the application of it. I find there is a further difficulty in the way of my agreeing to this proposal, because if, as I have pointed out, it is true that, provided that you get the consent of one House, perhaps once repeated, then it does not matter whether there is a Parliament in the way or not. Then the other objection, which applies to the referendum as a means of making responsible government through Parliament futile, must apply with tenfold force to a process which goes to the length of making it immaterial whether there is that very basis of the institution of Parliament or not. So that, if the objection to a referendum is sound on the ground that it tends to undermine responsible government, where the very source of responsible government is the Parliament, and if it tends to undermine the Parliament, it is ten times more objectionable. Now, that is an objection which has no application to the clause as it stands. It applies to the amendment, because with reference to the clause as it stands, taking the matter in that broad way in which you must consider political proposals, a proposal to amend the Constitution is not, in general, a question of Ministerial responsibility, and so the proposal that the people should decide on an amendment of the Constitution after it has acquired the sanction of Parliament is one which is generally independent of the ordinary objections to the referendum.

Mr. SYMON. -

The people are only asked to set their seal to what Parliament has done.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is the position of affairs; the people are asked to say whether they ratify what Parliament has done. In the first instance, the responsibility of Parliament must be exercised, and that responsibility must be exercised under conditions which show that it cannot be exercised in haste, and those conditions are imposed in this Bill. The lowest condition under which haste can be avoided in Parliament is here embodied; that is to say, the condition of an absolute majority, and not a condition, as in America, of a two-thirds or three-fourths majority. Finding that the amendment is radically different from the proposal in the Bill because it tends to make the existence of Parliament immaterial, while under the provision in the Bill the existence and the action of Parliament as a body are a condition precedent; finding that there is that radical difference between them in that respect, and finding also that there is this radical difference between them that the proposals in the Bill do not, in their essence, tend to undermine the principles of responsible government, while the proposal in the amendment not only tends to undermine them, but also tends to undermine the whole institution from which responsible government flows—holding both these opinions it seems to me that the reasons are cogent against the, amendment, and I cannot give it my support.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

I would be extremely sorry to see any amendment such as either that proposed by the Attorney-General of Victoria, or that to be proposed by the Premier of New South Wales, introduced into the clause. It seems to me that any attempt to amend this clause is an insidious attempt to whittle away the rights and the powers which have been granted by this Convention. What are the terms and conditions on which we have taken upon ourselves to enter into what may be called a partnership in this Federation? The whole of these will be contained in the four corners of this Constitution as it leaves our hands. We fought for some weeks, on different occasions, as to the state rights - as to the equal representation of the states in the Senate - and in fighting that particular question all of us who represent small states gave way a very great deal, when we were content merely with equal representation in the Senate; recognising, as we did, that in the House of Representatives, the House where the colonies will be represented on the basis of population, where the Executive Government will be, and which will hold the strings of the purse - the larger colonies will have an over-whelming majority. Now, sir, having given way to some extent what we know is a dangerous power to the larger colonies; having shown a federal spirit; believing that the personnel of the Parliament will be sufficient to protect the smaller states from any wrong in the future, it is now proposed in an under-handed way, by a side-wind, to take away the whole of these rights we have been fighting for, and to give the House of Representatives the opportunity to alter this deed of partnership without the Senate having anything like a control over it. It is all very well for the Attorney-General of Victoria to say that the alteration of the Constitution, whatever it may be, may originate in the Senate. Can any one here imagine that such a thing will be possible? Can any one imagine that the Senate will attempt to originate a proposal of this kind? Why, sir, the very groundwork of this federation that the smaller colonies are agreeing to enter upon is that the Constitution that we are now fighting for, peg by peg, and word by word, will be one which will stand, not one which is to be readily altered, not one which is to be tampered with on the slightest provocation, or on any provocation at all; but one which cannot be altered except on such terms as will secure a proper and full consideration of it, not only by the people, but by both Houses representing them. In most colonies it is provided that, in the event of an attempt to alter the Constitution Act, the amendment must be passed by the representatives in both Houses, and by an absolute majority.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That is only as regards the constitution of either House.

---

Mr. SOLOMON. -

A proposal to alter the Constitution Act must be passed by an absolute majority of both Houses.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It is the constitution of either House with us.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

In that case the representatives of both Houses are more immediately amenable to the control of the people than the representatives will be in the Federal Parliament, and even there, where the whole interest will only be perhaps a matter of sentiment, where only one side will be interested, we have safeguarded the Constitution in that way. Now we seek to safeguard the Federal Constitution by stipulating that before there shall be any amendment of the deed of partnership, it shall be passed by both Houses of Parliament, one representing the various states on a population basis, and the other protecting the states against a majority in that House. Then, even after the two Houses have agreed, for fear that the people themselves who sent us here shall agree in too much haste to an alteration of the Constitution, we provide that they, as a whole, shall have the opportunity by a referendum to give their voice, yes or no, to the proposed alteration. It seems to me that, if we are going to commence at this stage of our proceedings to whittle away these very rights we have been fighting for right through, to alter the whole Constitution, or to give an opportunity to alter the Constitution in the way suggested by this amendment, we shall be doing a most dangerous thing. What are these alterations of the Constitution likely to be? It is almost impossible for us to prophesy what questions may arise, but when we give power to alter the Constitution virtually to one House, backed up as it may be by a popular cry-virtually to the House of Representatives, because that is what it means—it means taking away, to a great extent, the power of the Senate. If we hand over these powers, as suggested by the Attorney-General of Victoria, we have to consider to what extent this amendment may lead us. It is quite possible that a majority in the House of Representatives may consider that the protection we have given to the various states by means of equal representation is too great.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
That is expressly safe-guarded in the latter part of the amendment.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I do not say that the proposal will be made that the states should not have equal representation, but I do say that a proposal leading to the same sort of thing might be made, and would cut away the bargain we are making—that is to say, some insidious amendment might be proposed by the House of Representatives, and public opinion be worked upon for the purpose of carrying it.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
So it would be.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I think it is extremely probable.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
That is the intention.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
It is possible that it would be attempted to take away the power of the states in the Senate.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The honorable member overlooks the fact that the majority of the States have to concur, and they have quite as much protection in that respect as is given to them by equal representation in the Senate.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I have not so much confidence in the referendum as the Attorney-General of Victoria has. I do not think that if the people of the states were properly placed in the possession of the facts and of the dangers there would be any fear, but, judging from the feeling which arises in the various colonies now when there is a dispute between the two Houses of Parliament upon a matter of local politics, we can form an estimate of what would be the effect in the event of a dispute between the Senate and the House of Representatives in the Commonwealth Parliament. I know that in nine cases out of ten where an appeal is made to the country getting a verdict in favour of the Lower House. And so it would be in the Commonwealth if the proposal of the Attorney-General of Victoria were carried. How simple it would be in the hands of clever men who desired an alteration of the Constitution, to whittle away some power of the Senate, by making the dispute appear to be a fight between the Upper House and the Lower House, a fight between conservatives and democrats representing the people. I venture to say that in such a case the issue would not really represent the true and well-considered opinion of the whole of the people. At any rate, without prophesying what the result would be in such a case, I think it behoves us here, especially those who represent the smaller states, to hesitate very much before consenting to giving up one iota of the safe-guards we have attained in the clause under consideration. This is entirely a new phase of our experience in this Convention. We have been content before to fight out the question of state rights.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is not a new question. It was debated and voted upon previously.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

But at that time the principle of state rights had not been so much approved of as it is now, and the question had not been before the various Parliaments of the colonies. Therefore, the discussion now has an added importance given to it beyond what it had in the earlier stages of the proceedings of this Convention. I do appeal as strongly and as earnestly as I can to those honorable members who represent the smaller colonies to safeguard this principle of equal representation in the Senate, and to stick to the clause, which has been carefully considered as it stands in the Bill. I appeal to them to follow the advice given to them by Mr. O'Connor and by the leader of the Convention, which is certainly on the side of the protection of the smaller states, and to avoid all possible danger. I hope that neither the amendment of Mr. Isaacs nor the amendment of the Premier of New South Wales—which merely seeks to alter Mr. Isaacs' amendment a little, and perhaps may influence a vote or two—will be adopted. I appeal to the representatives of the smaller states not to be led away by these arguments in any possible way, but to stand solidly by the Bill as it is, and not allow any portion of the rights which have been fought for and granted to be whittled away.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

I rise to respond to the appeal which has been made by the honorable member who has just spoken. I consider that the clause as it stands is ample for the protection of the people of Federated Australia, and I cannot help thinking—while I must admit that this amendment emanates from one of the most clearly-cut intellects in this Convention—that I look upon it with some little suspicion, inasmuch as the learned and able member who proposes it intends, I believe, to advocate equal representation.

Mr. ISAACS. - "Equal" representation?

Mr. HOWE. - Perhaps I should have said proportionate representation.

Mr. ISAACS. - What is your ground for saying so?

Mr. HOWE. - I know the tenacity of purpose of the honorable member, and that he is one of those whom nothing less than an earthquake can extinguish when he has set his mind upon a certain course. I fully expect, therefore, that he will bring forward such a proposal as I have indicated. It is admitted on all hands that we must have some departure from the American Constitution so far as its rigidity is concerned in regard to securing amendments of the Constitution. Well, we have done that. Here our Senate will be elected by the whole of the people of Federated Australia. It is quite different in America, where the representatives are elected in an altogether different way, and the voice of the people is scarcely heard in their election. Here the Senate will be elected by the whole of the people of Federated Australia, and every three years one-half of the members will have to submit themselves for re-election, in addition to which there will be special vacancies. There will, therefore, be a free flood of new blood continually from the body politic, and I do not see any reason for altering clause 121. I know that Mr. Isaacs and other honorable members representing Victoria are very much alarmed in consequence of the difficulties they have experienced in giving expression to the popular will in their colony. The Upper House has been somewhat of a stumbling-block in the way of progress.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. - Not at all. You know nothing about it if you say that.

Mr. HOWE. - It is asserted, and those who have watched Victorian politics must have come to the conclusion, that the Upper House and the Lower House in Victoria have not been exactly a happy family.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. - Yes, they have, of late years.

Mr. HOWE. - That is a revelation to me. It is the great dread of this obstacle that has impelled the Attorney-General of Victoria to move this amendment, but, as I have pointed out, the election of the Upper House of the Federation will be on an entirely different basis. There is to be no limitation or property qualification for the Senate. The House of Representatives and the Senate are to be elected by the whole of the people, and, consequently, I cannot imagine disagreements arising such as have arisen in the Victorian Parliament. A great deal has been said about the referendum. The referendum, so far as I understand it, is one of those instruments that should be exercised only in times of great emergency, and as seldom as possible. Switzerland has been held up to us continually by honorable members as being a land of liberty. When we were boys we read all about that, but what do we find now? In this vaunted land of liberty, the referendum is in full force, and recourse is had to it even to determine a question of the salary of a high official, amounting, perhaps, to £600 a year. The whole of the 4,000,000 people are asked to exercise their votes on the question of whether the salary shall be £601 a year or £599 a year. The population there is within a small area, and it is easily got at, so to speak. In a wide continent like Australia it would be very expensive indeed to put the referendum into operation. I contend, therefore, that the referendum should be the last resource.

Mr. ISAACS. - That is all that is proposed.

Mr. HOWE. - No; you make it applicable in any dispute between the two Houses, and I agree with the contention of Mr. Solomon that it would be a gradual whittling away of the power of the Senate. What is the position in this vaunted land of liberty-Switzerland? One would imagine that its people are superior to ours. Any one who takes an interest in this country must know that, notwithstanding its vaunted liberty, the people allow their women to become scavengers in the streets of the principal cities.

Mr. ISAACS. - What has that to do with it?

Mr. HOWE. - It may not have much, but it shows that civilization and the referendum do not run together. I should like very much if I could to vote with the Attorney-General of Victoria. I recognise in him a man of true liberal spirit, but I think the experience of his colony has somewhat frightened him. It is in consequence of the obstacles he has met with in the Upper House that he submits this amendment. He looks upon the Federal Senate as much the same House as the Upper House of Victoria, whereas the conditions will be altogether different. There will be a constant stream of new blood flowing into the Senate and into the House of Representatives, and they will both represent the people. For these reasons I regret that I have to record my vote against the amendment.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I very much regret that honorable members who have spoken against the amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria have not seen their way to support it. When they come to look at the matter calmly and quietly they must, I think, admit that it offers not the slightest danger whatever to the smaller states. Every honorable member, from whatever state he comes, will see that the state he represents is as carefully and as thoroughly guarded by the referendum that is proposed—the dual referendum—as it is guarded in the Senate, and that the people whose interests are concerned are quite as able to preserve them personally as by means of their representatives in the one House of the Legislature. If it were proposed for an instant that this should be a national referendum pure and simple, I could understand the position taken up by my honorable friends (Mr. Solomon and Mr. Howe), but how can it possibly weaken the Senate or the interests of the smaller states any more than it can weaken the House of Representatives or the interests of the larger states? That is more than I can understand. I have not heard one word throughout the whole debate which in any way justifies such a position. I do understand the views of those honorable members who have urged that it is inconsistent with responsible government, but I do not agree with them. I will explain in a very few words why. It is said that responsible government in this sense means that the representatives are to act and to take the full responsibility of their actions. The course that I propose is much less disastrous to responsible government than the course adopted in the clause itself. At present the two Houses may agree to any proposed amendment of the Constitution. Honorable members may say—"Well, after all, let us assent to this we have not the ultimate responsibility; the people have the right to reject it either in the states or in the Commonwealth, and we may divest ourselves of the ultimate responsibility. Our saying yes is not final." I can understand that. That is the objection that is urged in England and elsewhere against the adoption of the Swiss referendum in ordinary federal matters, not where the Houses disagree, but after they have agreed. But when we come to say to the two Houses—"You are to battle this out as best you may, and if you do not agree you will then have to consider whether you should persist in the differences. If you do persist you must accept the fall responsibility of your position and let the people decide between you"—that, to my mind, instead of being adverse to responsible government, is carrying responsible government to the very highest point.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We have got that now.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If we had we should not ask for it—the amendment would be unnecessary. It seems to me that the argument that it is adverse to responsible government has no application. Then it is said that this is a much more liberal proposal than is contained in the American Constitution. It is more liberal, but that again is not the question. The question is whether it is sufficient for the people of Australia in order to prevent dead-locks on the most important, the most vital, matters that can ever come before the Legislature. The Premier of South Australia has pointed out with incontrovertible force that, while we have carried a mode or modes of settling dead-locks in much less important matters, we have absolutely left untouched the whole question of dead-locks on amendments of the Constitution. Now, are we to go before the people of Australia and say—"Here is your Constitution, a matter that has been very expensive in time, trouble, and money. Provision is made for many things, in some degree for settling dead-locks on comparatively minor questions, but, after the best discretion and judgment that your legislators can bring to bear upon this question, if you still desire, or a great body of you may desire, an alteration in that Constitution, it may turn out from the development of that Constitution, or difficulties of election, or election on personal grounds, and other matters that you may not have an opportunity afforded you of expressing your will on that vital question," many electors, I feel perfectly confident, will hesitate to give their votes for the acceptance of a Constitution which presents a bar such as I have described to its ultimate amendment. I can well understand how many of us, and many well-wishers of federation outside this Convention, could go before the people in the various states, and say to them—"There are provisions here with which we do not agree. There are provisions which we would like to have altered, but we think you are safe in accepting them, because there is a provision in the Constitution that if, after full and fair trial, you find it almost unbearable, you will have a means of escape." But that is denied by those who oppose this amendment.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -
No, no.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
We do not want to have dead-locks manufactured.
Mr. ISAACS. -

I will point out how, because there is no provision whatever to be inserted if this amendment is lost for a settlement of any dead-lock on any Constitution question.

Mr. WISE. -

It is not possible that any dead-lock could ever arise.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Let us consider that. It is very easy to make such an assertion, but it is difficult to prove it.

Mr. WISE. -

The answer is that if the people desire an amendment of the Constitution they will return members disposed to make that amendment. If the matter is sufficiently important to require, an amendment of the Constitution the people will return men who will amend it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then there will never be any difference between the Houses, and my honorable friend might say the same thing about any other question.

Mr. WISE. -

They may have a dead-lock for a few weeks.

Mr. ISAACS. -

According to Mr. Wise, there is no necessity to provide for any deadlocks. The people are going to be at one. Therefore, there is no necessity for any Senate, because the House of Representatives will represent the whole people, or there will be no necessity for the House of Representatives, because the Senate will represent the whole of the people. There will never be anything but unanimity between the Houses.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

The honorable member did not say that.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is the effect of it.

Mr. WISE. -

Not at all.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I will show how, and I will refer to an argument which was used by the Right Hon. Sir Edward Braddon. He says this proposed amendment has not the merit of urgency. Let us look matters in the face. Suppose, as has actually happened in America-this is not conjectural, but an actual case-that it should be decided by our Supreme Court that a law passed by the Parliament that taxation for federal purposes was unauthorized by the Constitution by reason of any provision in it, that it was not uniform for instance, giving a definition of "uniform" that we did not anticipate, will Sir Edward Braddon tell me that if there were two parties in the state, one House wanting the Constitution to remain as it was, and the other House wishing an alteration, that it should never go to the people? Does Sir Edward Braddon say that?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

It would not if we did our business properly; there would be no occasion for it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

However well we may do our business, it is still open to a judicial interpretation, and the greatest urgency may arise, as has happened in America. In fact, matters of greater urgency may occur in the amendment of the Constitution than in ordinary federal legislation. Therefore, that seems to me to be an answer to the argument. Mr. Wise tells us that we cannot have any dead-lock. I hold in my hand a paper, for which I am indebted to a gentleman connected with the press, and to which I wish to call attention. It is The Speaker of January, 1898. Writing on the question of Australian federation, Professor Goldwin Smith writes from Toronto to the editor. He says-

The framing of a Constitution for a nation with a federal structure also presents great difficulties, as the Australians have found. If you have two elective Chambers with co-ordinate powers, you run the risk of a dead-lock such as they have had at Washington. The nominee Senate of Canada has no real power.

There we have a man quite outside our sphere of controversy. He is perfectly unprejudiced with regard to Australia. He has no party feeling with regard to us, and he gives us a warning as to this matter of dead-locks. On this question the Senate, of course, has co-ordinate powers.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Another theorist, Bagehot, said the same thing 40 years ago.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor) said-and I quite agree with him so far-that the referendum ought to be used only under extraordinary circumstances. I agree with that, and the proposal is that it shall only be so used. I care not what details you insert within the bounds of reason, so that you may make that appeal as difficult as circumstances warrant. But when you say in one breath that it should only be used under extraordinary circumstances, and then in the next breath say "I am going to exclude it altogether from the Constitution," it is quite another matter.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It is not excluded altogether.
Mr. ISAACS. -

It is in this respect.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It is the process that comes on after the Houses have determined.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No; with great respect to Mr. O'Connor, it is, as I explained before, simply a ratification. Nothing but a ratification. But what I want to provide against are quarrels, prolonged and sustained disputes and controversies, between the two Houses. The struggle always is, we have been told on high authority, to make the national law conform with the national will. How can we do that if we erect the two Chambers of Legislature, which ought to be our servants, into our masters? Really the fight here to-day has been simply this. That we have taken Parliament, an institution of representative government, to be "the be-all and the end-all" of this Constitution, while we relegate to an inferior position the rights and wishes of the people behind it. One of my honorable friends said that parliamentary government had been a matter of centuries. We know perfectly well that it is not so—that it was only after the Revolution of 1688 that the power of the Crown was transferred to the Parliament. It was only in the beginning of the eighteenth century that Parliament became the master, and in England Parliament remained the master until 1832. Since then there has been a gradual but a sure shifting of power from the Parliament to the people, and it was well said in the House of Commons some years ago that the people were getting tired of the deluge of debate, and were looking forward to the consultation of constituencies. This is a tendency which we cannot resist.

Every day we see the right of the people to be consulted upon their own affairs becoming more and more acknowledged. Who will stand here or anywhere and deny that right? My honorable friends who take up the position that the Federal Parliament is to be all-powerful, that the end and reason of the Constitution is to erect a representative body of that kind, are, I think, standing in the way of the development of the people. I agree that the Constitution ought to be stable, but I deny that we should sacrifice the national energy to its stability. While it is a very great thing that the Constitution should not be rudely touched or hastily altered, we must admit, if we are fair to our consciences and to ourselves, that, after all, the Constitution is being made for the people, not the people for the Constitution, and we ought not to hesitate when we are asked to pro-vide a means of outlet for angry feeling, or to insure that the political development of the Commonwealth shall keep pace with the social and commercial development of the people. We should not be afraid, as a learned writer has said, to tear a parchment more or less in the interests of the people. I am sorry that the amendment should have been resisted. If it had been accepted we should have been in a better position to go to the people, and, notwithstanding the difficulties contained in it, ask their acceptance of the Constitution with all our heart and soul. If the amendment is rejected we shall be compelled to fight upon many matters which we could otherwise have afforded to have let go untouched. In reply to the honorable member (Mr. Howe), who spoke about there being an intention on the part of honorable members to go for proportional representation, I say that I have from the first fought very hard to obtain equal representation in the Senate, in order to secure the adhesion of the smaller colonies, but I have fought for it as a concession to them, and I have no hesitation in saying that up to the present time no corresponding concession has been offered by honorable members representing the smaller states.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I think the time has arrived when we should come to a decision upon this matter. We have spent the whole day in discussing it, and the honorable and learned member has given us two excellent speeches in support of the views he entertains, although he must acknowledge that the large majority of honorable members are not in accord with him. Seeing that this is the case, I think the debate has been unduly prolonged. If every honorable member who found himself in a hopeless minority were to persist in arguing his case at great length, instead of being here a week or two we should be here for several months.

Mr HIGGINS. - The right honorable member forgets that he is at present in Melbourne, not in West Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We are accustomed to the cry that if the amendment were passed it would greatly assist some honorable members in their advocacy of the adoption of the Constitution, but on the other hand it might have the reverse result in regard to other honorable members. We cannot get away from this fact, that in the Constitution under which we live, of which the great British Constitution is the prototype, there is no provision against disagreements of the two branches of the Legislature, and we have not found that the people require all this machinery for the prevention of dead-locks, but which I think would rather encourage dead-locks. We have found that they are quite content to rely upon the good faith, the good feeling, and the sense of fair play which exists in all British communities. The object of the proposal of the honorable and learned member is to enable the popular House, as it is called, to override the Senate. If I were inclined to be frivolous, which I never am, I should suggest to him that whenever a difference occurred between the two Houses the dispute might be referred to the decision of the press of the country, or to the Ministerial organ.

Mr. REID. -

Which is the Ministerial organ in Victoria?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I do not know. I hope that we may now come to a division, seeing that there is no chance of the proposal being carried.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I thoroughly agree with my right honorable friend that, as a general rule, this is not the place for long speeches. I spoke very briefly upon this proposal this morning, and I am going to speak very briefly upon it again now. I wish to point out to my right honorable friend and to other honorable members that, whatever our individual opinions may be in regard to the proposal, the Attorney-General of Victoria, in showing the earnestness which he has displayed in regard to it, has really only shown the zeal which he feels for the success of the federal enterprise. Every member of the Convention takes credit for a desire to promote the success of federation, and surely the best way of doing this is to make an earnest endeavour to frame a Constitution which will recommend itself to the great body of the people of Australia. Although the right honorable member (Sir Edward Braddon) speaks with great authority for Tasmania, he must recollect that the inhabitants of Tasmania, however intelligent they may be, will form but a small part of the people of the future Commonwealth.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I did not speak for the people of Tasmania only.

Mr. REID. -

Nothing convinces me more of the fact that those who are looked upon as the advocates of the rights of the states feel that they have obtained a remarkably good bargain, than do their persistent attempts to throw every obstacle in the way of securing the genuine expression of public opinion in the future.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That is not fair.

Mr. REID. -

As an observer of our proceedings, I feel that it is my duty to make these remarks, but I admit that every honorable member, even if he advocates what I conceive to be extremely illiberal views, is only striving for that which he believes to be for the benefit of the whole Commonwealth.
must all feel that, however greatly our ideas on these matters differ, it is quite possible that those who differ from us have thoroughly sincere motives and designs.

Mr. LYNE. -

But did not you support equal state rights?

Mr. REID. -

Exactly. I supported equal state rights in the interests of federation, because I felt that on no other basis was federation possible. And having, I won't say granted that concession, for I admit that equal state rights in the Senate is, as far as we have gone, one of the first principles of the federal enterprise, and therefore, without any grumbling, I have accepted that principle, and I have never sought to question it; but having done that, I am concerned to find that when a proposal is made which gives the Senate absolutely equal rights with the House of Representatives, and which gives the House of Representatives only the same privileges which the Senate will enjoy, I am very sorry that, there being a public opinion to which I have to appeal-

Mr. SYMON. -

The general election.

Mr. REID. -

Other Premiers are in a happier position, I have no doubt, but in New South Wales there is such a thing as public opinion, and there are absolutely methods of making that public opinion felt in that colony. That being the case, I am very anxious indeed to make this Constitution of such a shape that the great body of the people throughout Australia will feel-"Well, if this Constitution is in some respect or other wrong, there is some feasible method of bringing it right." Surely that would recommend the Constitution to the intelligent men in any colony.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

So there is.

Mr. REID. -

I desire to point out to my right honorable friend that it will not do to make the observation which one honorable member made to Mr. Isaacs at the table a little while ago—that the people, if they want to change the Constitution, can send representatives to the Federal Parliament to bring the change about. That position is given up in this Constitution. Supposing the people sent such representatives in, and both Houses agreed to a Bill, that does not amend the Constitution. There is another process, that of referring it to the people of the colonies. Now, take the case of a difference between the two Houses. We have not left it in the good old-fashioned style in which they could wrangle, like Kilkenny cats, until there was nothing of them left; we have not got things in that sound constitutional position in this Constitution. We have provided that when that deplorable state of things occurs, if it ever does occur, the two Houses shall do a very undignified thing, at all events, as regards the Upper House, namely sit together, the Upper House with the Lower House, and consider their differences. That is in this Constitution. It is not left to the good old constitutional method of fighting it out at the polls. So that our Constitution, as we have it at present, has departed from those ancient land-marks which, according to some, were divinely planted, and ought to endure for ever. Now, unfortunately for that idea, the intelligence of humanity is growing, in spite of some opinions and of some examples to the contrary, and the feelings of the people are becoming a little stronger, and their intelligence a little keener. They have come to see that often, after the most admirably balanced parliamentary machine has been constructed, it breaks down in vital points at critical moments in such a way that the will of those, for the expression of whose will this machine was constructed, have no earthly chance of being heard. Now, the people are awakening to this old delightful state of things, and see that it is a mere mockery of intelligent men to talk of giving them a free Constitution, when, by other parliamentary institutions, you range a thousand obstacles in the way of their object being attained. And whilst I have gone great lengths in my desire to see this great enterprise successful, day after day I feel myself—and I wish to speak with the utmost frankness—in an atmosphere which is absolutely foreign to the feelings of the great majority of the people of Australia, as far as I know them.

Mr. DOBSON. -

No.

Mr. REID. -

Oh, I have no doubt I am wrong—the honorable member for Tas-mania has spoken. At the same time, I wish respectfully to state that this proposal is a crucial test in my estimation, because it is put forward in the most reasonable form, it is put forward in a form in which the States House, as representative of the majority of the states, is given an opportunity of testing state interests which may be affected in the proposed amendment of the Constitution. It gives the states power, and state interests a chance of appealing for an amendment of the Constitution straight from the Senate to the people, and yet, because of this unconquerable fear of free atmosphere being let into politics, this unconquerable aversion to allowing the will of those in whose name we legislate to be put on the statute-book-

Several HONORABLE MEMBERS. - No, no.
Mr. ISAACS. -

That is at the bottom of it.

Mr. REID. -

I do not wonder at the ejaculations which are evoked by such a phrase as "the will of the people," and yet, in solemn truth, every line of every law we have got in this country is written on the statute-book in and by the authority of the people of this country. And, although that is a basic principle of our Constitution, we find that, on this occasion, when an honorable member seeks to give even the States House a right to pass by the House of Representatives and go straight to the people of the states, as well as of the nation, under conditions which prevent a chance in the Constitution, unless a majority of the states agree to it, objection is raised to the adoption of that course. Now, I admit, considering the structure of this Constitution which permits of this reference to the people, and which compels a reference to the people, that if there were no provision in this clause that there should be a reference to the people, a very serious question would concurrently arise, one of vital principle, a vital issue between the referendum and party government, or what some think proper, constitutional government. If that question arose, I confess I should have much greater respect from those who differ from me, but under this particular clause that question does not arise, because the p

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We have given it you; that is how it comes to be in the clause.

Mr. REID. -

My right honorable friend is a man whom we all love, but we find that it goes very little further. I did not find my right honorable friend supporting me to a finish, as I had hoped he would do, the other day.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Yes, we do.

Mr. REID. -

I had always, as the right honorable member knows, a very great admiration for him, and one of his greatest merits is the fact that he does respect the time of the Convention. I feel that I owe it to him, having shown me such an excellent example, not to prolong my remarks any further. I am glad that my remarks have been so pungent that my friends who differ from me will be pleased to see me resume my seat. Putting aside that vital question, which I admit is a most arguable one, about the introduction of the referendum, seeing that it is there, I will ask the Convention to give, under proper safeguards, after passing the proposal in two consecutive sessions, this right to either House; and one of my
The strongest reasons for asking this is that the mere expense of that provision in this Constitution may prevent almost the beginning of a bad feeling between the two Houses-almost the beginning of those evils which spring from a personal collision between these two great legislative powers in the state. Each would feel under a great responsibility in connexion with an amendment of the Constitution, and, under these circumstances, I do not see a better chance for liberalizing the Constitution in a fair way in harmony with the lines you have laid down than I see in this amendment.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I had intended to give a silent vote against this proposal, because I had thought that it was one on which we might all vote, having regard only to its merits and to its place in the Federal Constitution. But some of the speeches have convinced me that a silent vote against the proposal is very liable to be misunderstood. Some of the speeches have sounded like echoes from the dead controversies in almost prehistoric days in this colony, others have sounded as if they were indications of what we are told are going to be coming events elsewhere.

Mr. HOWE. -

Next June.

Mr. WISE. -

I shall treat the proposal as a question regarding the Constitution only. I shall refer only to those arguments which have a direct application to federal matters, and omit to pay any attention to arguments of a more local application. There is no question whatever in this amendment as to the acceptance or the rejection of the referendum. The clause as it stands, for which we will be voting if we reject this amendment, is an affirmance of the principle that the people have the right, by a direct vote, to determine what shall be the limits of representative government under the Constitution. They are the only persons who can say under what Constitution they will live.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If they are permitted.

Mr. WISE. -

But in another part of this Constitution we have provided—and I fancy that the determination has met with universal approval throughout the continent—that the Constitution which is to be submitted for acceptance or rejection shall be one based on what we understand is the theory of responsible government. All that the people are asked to say is will they have the Constitution so framed, or will they reject it? If they accept it, as we hope they will do by their vote during the next two months, we are in this position—we have started a form of government that we believe to be the best, a form that we understand, a form that the people of Australia have accepted, and we say—"If you want to make any alterations in the Constitution so accepted, you shall make those alterations in a way which is not inconsistent with the fundamental principles of that Constitution, namely, responsible government and Ministerial responsibility. How can it possibly be said that this amendment offers a crucial test whether a man is a liberal or not? How is it possible, except by the grossest abuse of language, to say that those who are opposing the amendment are guided by an unconquerable fear of the free atmosphere of discussion?
Mr. SYMON. -
A most unworthy observation to make.
Mr. WISE. -
Let us see what it means. If the amendment is not carried, what will happen in the eventuality feared by my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) I suppose an amendment of the Constitution is proposed in one House and does not receive the necessary support in the other House? If the amendment is one of importance, can we understand any Ministers, at least Ministers who appreciate the doctrine of Ministerial responsibility, refusing to submit such an important question as an amendment of the Constitution to the direct issue of a general election? If they decline to accept the duty cast upon them, they will be unworthy of their positions, and if the result of the election is that the members who are returned to the Senate or to the House of Representatives, which ever it may be, still adhere to their opinions and are against the amendment—what does that prove? It proves clearly one thing only, namely, that the people are so indifferent to the proposed change in the fundamental instrument of government that they do not care to insist that the members they returned shall vote one way or the other on it. Now, if they are as indifferent as that, what idle words we have heard from various quarters in this chamber, that by insisting that there shall be a parliamentary determination on a proposed amendment before there is a direct vote we are putting an obstacle to the direct expression of the will of the people. How would this really work out in practice? I cannot imagine any Ministry—depending, as a responsible government must depend, on the support of the House of Representatives—allowing an amendment of the Constitution to be moved in the House of Representatives of which they do not approve; but if such an amendment is moved and carried through that House by the necessary majority, and thrown out in the Senate, then the Ministry, unless Ministers are going to alter very much in their high notions of self-respect and personal honour, would insist on the opinion of the constituents of both the Senate and the
Mr. REID. -
May I ask you-

Mr. WISE. -
I will put another case you.

Mr. REID. -
May I ask you -

Mr. WISE. -
I want to put this case to the honorable member, and I will answer the question when the cases have been stated. Although the words have not been spoken, there has no doubt been a covert idea on the part of many who have spoken in favour of the amendment that it will be a popular idea to put a safeguard in the Constitution that the Senate is somehow to be humiliated. Now, supposing the Senate proposes to amend the Constitution, and to amend it in a way that the Ministry, which commands the support of the majority of the House of Representatives, disapproves of, and supposing the amendment is carried, what is the result? It is that this unpopular undemocratic Senate, this assembly of rich men, has an instrument put into its hands to require the Treasurer, when it pleases, to spend £50,000 at least in getting a referendum, to decide whether the Constitution is or is not to be amended, in a matter in which it may have a hopeless chance of carrying its views.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If they have a hopeless chance of carrying their views, will they ask it?

Mr. WISE. -
I do not believe that it will ever be used one way or the other. I think that the whole amendment is one of the most trivial importance. It has only been raised into fictitious importance because the discussion has not ranged directly round the amendment, but irrelevant matters relating to past as well as future history have been introduced.

Mr. REID. -
Is it intended finally to leave in the Constitution that the Senate shall be dissolved?

Mr. WISE. -
At present it is. If the Senate is not to be dissolved, if the power to dissolve the Senate is to be struck out, I shall take a different attitude with regard to this question.

Mr. REID. -
My Position is based upon the view that the Senate should not be dissolved. I spoke entirely in that direction. If the Senate is to be dissolved, a considerable alteration would be made in my view.

Mr. WISE. -

My faith in the right honorable gentleman's democratic sympathies is beginning to be weakened when I find him opposed to the dissolution of the Senate. I expected that I should find him solid on that point at least. However, I wish to make quite clear that my observations are based upon the assumption that the Constitution in that respect is to remain as it is printed to-day, that is to say, that the Ministry of the day shall have power to dissolve both the Senate and the House of Representatives. But I want to point out that, if this is carried, it will place it in the power of either House—whichever House was opposed to the Ministry of the day, which would probably be the Senate, because we cannot suppose for an instant that the Ministry would remain in power if the House of Representatives were opposed to it—to pass a resolution for the purpose of amending the Constitution, and that would compel the Government to go to the extent of squandering public money for the purpose of having a referendum upon the subject.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If the honorable member's view is that both Houses represent the people alike, why should he assume that one House will oppose the Ministry and the other will not?

Mr. WISE. -

Because there may be differences upon other matters than amendments of the Constitution—upon matters of local politics, for instance.

Mr. BARTON. -

If both Houses are likely to be in favour of the Ministry, why does Mr. Isaacs anticipate so much disagreement?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not assume they will be.

Mr. WISE. -

What does the amendment give us if it be carried? I want to point out what a trivial matter it is supposing it were lost. What is the meaning of it? The only result if it were lost would be that there would be a delay of about six months before the amendment of the Constitution could be made; and the question is whether we should allow the referendum to be taken before we have ascertained whether the people feel that strongly on it as to bring both Houses into harmony, or whether we should insist upon having a referendum at the first outbreak of hostilities, before making any attempt to adjust those difficulties.

Mr. ISAACS. -
No one has suggested that.

Mr. WISE. -
I have listened with great attention to the speech of the Attorney-General for Victoria, who is always very lucid, and I gathered that the proposal is that if one House proposes to amend the Constitution and the other does not agree, there is to be a referendum.

Mr. ISAACS. -
At some stage.

Mr. WISE. -
At once.

Mr. ISAACS. -
No; no one has suggested that.

Mr. GORDON. -
There is no qualification in the amendment as it stands.

Mr. WISE. -
What is the referendum? If the two Houses do not agree the referendum is a dissolution, and if the people are so united they would return members to make the amendment desired; and if they will not return members to make the amendment which is proposed, it is clear that such a fundamental instrument as the Constitution should not be amended. I am in favour of having a referendum provided for in the Constitution, in order that it may be shown what form the Constitution shall take, but that is the full length to which I would go in this direction. I am opposed to any suggestion which will make it possible for the people to exercise their will in a manner inconsistent with the form of government which this Constitution is designed to provide, that is to say, constitutional government. If I could see any substantial gain to be obtained by the proposal I should be glad to support the honorable and learned member, but I see that the only gain is that the demand for an amendment of the Constitution would be pushed forward a few weeks. By adopting this amendment we shall not be obtaining a substantial reform, while we shall, at the same time, be losing what is a great benefit—the responsibility of the Ministry and the responsibility of Parliament.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales-
To omit the words-"to the electors qualified to vote for the election of members of the House of Representatives, not less than two nor more than six calendar months after the passage through both Houses of the proposed law," with a view to the substitution of the following:-
"to the state Parliament, in the manner proper for the passage of Bills, not less than two nor more than six calendar months after the passage through both Houses of the Dominion Parliament of the proposed law. And if a majority of two-thirds of the members present in each House of the state Legislature in each state shall approve of the proposed law it shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent."

The amendment was negatived.
Paragraphs (2) and (3) were agreed to.
Amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of South Australia-
To omit the following words:-But until the qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives becomes uniform throughout the Commonwealth, only one-half the votes for and against the proposed law shall be counted in any state in which adult suffrage prevails.

The amendment was negatived.

Paragraph (4) was agreed to.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I have an amendment to move in Paragraph (5) of the clause, of which I have given notice, and it is one that appears to me to be of the very gravest importance, having regard to the feeling that prevails on the subject in certain colonies. If the last last paragraph is carried in its present form, there is reason to fear that a great mass vote will be given against the Bill, and that is a consummation that I should very much deprecate. The position is this: That this last Paragraph makes absolutely rigid for all time the equal representation of the states. I do not intend, as honorable members heard my views both in Adelaide and in Sydney, to go again into the merits of equal representation. I do not, as a rule, like to take up the time of the Convention with what is a fruitless quest. This clause says that there is to be no alteration with regard to equal representation without the consent of the state affected. If there should be seven states in a Federation, and in the course of years it should turn out that six of these states had between ten and twenty millions of people, while the seventh had only between ten and twenty thousand people, the six states could not by any possibility or by any process, no matter how exhaustive, make a change in the Constitution. There could be no change, no matter how unjust the consequences were, without a revolution, and perhaps bloodshed, which would break the Constitution. You put too big a strain upon the Constitution when you leave to the people the alternative either of revolution or of submission to what may be a very grave injustice. We do not now know what will be the conditions. We have our minds fixed too much upon the present conditions of what people call colonies, but what are really simply map divisions. What you call South Australia is not, strictly speaking, a colony. There is an aggregation of certain people in the south, there are a few people in the north, and there is a great unoccupied territory between.

Mr. SYMON. -
That is the sort of argument that proves that mind is matter and matter is mind.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I am not gifted in metaphysics, and I do not intend to pursue the subject of matter and mind. We must pay some attention to the varying conditions of this continent. There may be a tremendous population in parts where iron and coal are plentiful, and where factories are numerous. On the other hand, when the mines in a district have been worked out the population may be diverted. But no matter what changes took place we could not alter this provision in the Constitution. To put it in its simplest terms, even if New South Wales had a population of 20,000,000 and another colony had a population of only twenty persons, these twenty persons could return the same number of senators as New South Wales.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Do you think ten years will make a difference?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If the honorable member desires to make it twenty years, I shall not object, but I want to have nothing absolutely rigid or unchangeable in the Constitution. From the point of view of ethics, I cannot see what right we have in this generation to dictate absolutely as to what future generations shall do. In England and elsewhere they are watching what we are doing with regard in this Convention, but I have here a short extract from the London Spectator of the 11th September last, which shows how amazed outside and independent critics are that we are repeating the anomalies and deformities of the American Constitution. The Spectator says-

An able article in the Westminster Gazette of Wednesday shows that Australia is at last becoming interested in the federation question. It is greatly to be hoped that Australia will realize that she can never take the place she ought to have in the empire unless she accepts federation. The Australian Commonwealth will be a really great and powerful State. Our only interest in the matter is that a Constitution should be adopted that will be worthy of Australia's future. To obtain such a Constitution Australia must be careful to avoid adopting the principles which have proved so harmful in America. To begin with, and this is the absolutely essential point, she must not adopt a Constitution which is practically unalterable, like that of the United States. She must not put herself into a strait-waistcoat, but into an easy-fitting jacket, capable of being altered and let out as occasion may demand.

The people of New South Wales are, we think, right in demanding that the various states, great and small, shall not have an equal representation in the Senate, but one proportionate to population.

By that time in September the vote had been taken in New South Wales, and by a majority of 59 to 4 in the Assembly they had repudiated equal representation.

Would not a reasonable compromise be one member for each state, and, in addition, one member for each 250,000 or 200,000 inhabitants in the state?

That is very like the compromise which was suggested in Adelaide, and also in Sydney.

That a referendum to the people of the Commonwealth is the best proposal for settling disagreements between the two Houses of Parliament we have no sort of doubt. If Australia adopts the suggestion, she will lead the Anglo-Saxon world as regards the solution of this standing difficulty in all states possessed of a Legislature with two Houses.

Of course, that is only the opinion of an anonymous writer in a newspaper, but a newspaper which has some weight.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Quite so; I give my honorable friends the full benefit of that. It is evident from a remark which I hear from the Right Hon. Sir Edward Braddon, that he has not followed the quotation. The point I am making is this: That the Constitution of the United States in this respect is practically unalterable, and they deprecate that. I am not dealing with equal representation, except that I read the quotation in full. What they object to in the American Constitution is that it is practically unalterable. For this purpose, I recognize the decision of the Convention by 41 to 5, and they have, without any doubt, affirmed the principle that there shall be what is called equal representation, but what Sir Henry Maine calls the most unequal representation he ever heard of equal representation of the states. I do not now at all contest that decision. I regard that as being settled by this Convention finally as far as we are concerned. The Convention has shown irrevocably on two distinct occasions that, as far as the members of this Convention are concerned, they will have what is called equal representation of the states in the Senate. But I think that those honorable members who have voted against me in the matter, and against the honorable member (Mr. Lyne) and others, will also recognise this, that that proportion of 41 to 5 is not the proportion of public sentiment in favour of the provision. Honorable members will recognise that in New South Wales and in Victoria, and, as I am beginning to find, also in South Australia, there is a growing feeling that this is a dangerous provision, and there is also a growing feeling that, even if it should be tried for a few years, it not be rendered, like the law of the Medes and Persians, unalterable under any circumstances, because they feel, rightly or wrongly, that it goes against their dearest prejudices. It conflicts with the accepted principle of majority rule and liberal parties in the large and small states, and therefore there is no danger whatever of the interests of the small states being subordinated to the interests of the large states." That is what they say. I will assume for the present that that argument is absolutely wrong. Still we have to deal with facts and sentiments that operate in the great masses of the people of Australia, and I ask those who want federation to join with me in, to a certain extent, conciliating the views of the masses in Australia. If the principle of equal representation is right, it will appear all the better as time goes on. If you believe that the principle of equal representation of the states in the Senate is a correct one, then as you gain experience the more correct the principle is the more beautiful and harmonious it will appear as the years go by. Therefore, there is no danger that equal representation will be changed as experience is gained. Of course we know it has been said that in America it has been a failure. It has been thrown over in Canada and Germany we all know. But still I will assume for the present, that in our reverting to the American precedent we are doing right. Well, if you are doing right, if it is correct, it will appear right to men twenty years hence, or even ten years. hence. What I wish to do, therefore, is to move-

That after the word "But" the following words be inserted:- "For a term of ten years from the establishment of the Constitution."

I would be willing even to put in the word "twenty" instead of "ten," if by any means I could get any conciliatory compromise.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOX. -

Put in 100 years.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I hope this will be treated with the seriousness which it deserves. It is very easy for Sir Edward Braddon, coming from Tasmania, a state which has what it wants in this respect, to speak scoffingly of this proposal, but I can assure him that it will be a very hard thing in New South Wales and Victoria, if not in South Australia, to persuade the masses of the people to accept this Constitution. I can assure honorable gentlemen that assuming they will accept equal representation, it will still be very hard to persuade them to accept equal representation from which there will be no escape under any circumstances. What I want is not to alter equal representation, not to interfere with that principle as laid down so emphatically by this Convention, but I simply want to give the next generations which follow us the same liberty to control the Constitution as we have ourselves. Why should we say that all wisdom for the purpose of constructive federation is deposited in the present generation?

Mr. REID. -

The idea is that it was deposited in some extinct generation. The present generation is all right on this point.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Why should we assume that the present generation is wiser than generations to come in this matter? I do not believe in any rigid provision, even in favour of quite a contrary provision.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We do not assume any special wisdom; we regard this as one of the terms of a compact.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Why should you not allow those who are interested in the contract to alter it?

Mr. HOLDER. -

They may by consent do so at any time.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No; they are going into the contract upon the assumption that this provision is only to be altered with the consent of the states interested, but you will not be able to get that consent. I ask why then should the other states be bound by the Constitution? Twenty years hence the principle of equal representation will have had time to reveal itself in all its beauty. From what has been said this morning it is perfectly clear that it will be very hard to change the Constitution. Suppose after twenty years it is desired to change the Constitution in this respect, the consent of the majority of the people of the Commonwealth and of the majority of the states must be secured. But in the Senate you may have the representatives of South Australia, Tasmania, and Western Australia opposed to the representatives of Victoria and New South Wales.

Mr. GORDON. -

The honorable member is now prophesying, but twenty years hence South Australia may have a larger population than Victoria.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I do not think a prophet ever speaks in the conditional mood, unless it is Mr. Wragge. Practically, any alteration will be impossible, unless the inconvenience has become so overwhelming that even the smaller states see that it must no longer continue. It has been pointed out by the text-writers that the principle of equal state representation is an anomaly. I will not urge that it is an anomaly; I will assume that it is right. But if it is right, you may safely leave the people of the future to look after themselves, because you may be sure that they will stick to it. It argues great want of confidence in the expediency of the principle that honorable members should be afraid to leave it to the judgment of future generations. I beg to move—

That after the word "But" (line 24) the words "for a term of twenty years from the establishment of the Constitution" be inserted.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

I think that the honorable member has overlooked the saving possibility which underlies this Constitution. He forgets that the breath which makes it—the Imperial Parliament—can unmake it. If such a ridiculous state of things as the honorable member contemplates came about, the request of the people of Australia that the Imperial Parliament should dissolve the Union would bring about a cure. So long as any good reason existed for the continuance of the terms of the original contract no interference by the Imperial Parliament would be likely; but if these terms became unbearable in their incidence, if the condition of affairs became so ridiculous that 10,000 people had the same representation as 10,000,000, we may confidently believe that the common sense of the Imperial Parliament would, at the request of the vast majorities in the injured colonies, step in and rectify matters. But we have no right to enter this Union upon any assumption than that which may reasonably be based upon the condition of things as they now exist. I think that my honorable friend has wasted a good deal of alarm and eloquence upon a subject which need not be further discussed.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

Having assented to the principle of equal representation as one of the conditions without which we cannot have federation, much as I regret some of the matters connected with the development of the Constitution, I feel that I cannot depart from my original position. At the same time, I fear that this principle may develop startling anomalies in the future history of the Commonwealth, such as exist in the United States to-day, where a handful of people from one state have equal power in the Senate with several millions in another state.

Mr. GORDON. -

But the American Republic has no such arbitrator as we shall have in the Imperial Parliament.
Mr. REID. -

I do not anticipate any fearful results in the shape of social convulsions from the adoption of this principle. The worst thing about it is that, from the nature of the case, it will be impossible to change it. If the republicans or the democrats proposed as part of their fighting platform that equality of representation should be taken from the smaller states, their party would be at once shattered into a thousand fragments. The slightest suggestion of such a proposal would destroy any party entirely. We must take this principle for ever, though I regret it very much, but it is impossible to have federation without it. I should like, however, to see those whom we are trusting for ever under very trying circumstances show some little consideration for honorable members on the other side, and for the legitimate rights of the majorities in the Commonwealth.

Question so resolved in the negative.
Paragraph (5) was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The question now is that clause 121 stand part of the Bill.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I would suggest to the Drafting Committee that it might be well to make clear what is meant by the word "passed" that is used in this clause, which provides that any proposed law for the alteration of the provisions of the Constitution must be "passed" by an absolute majority of both Houses of the Federal Parliament, and so on. I presume that it refers to the stage after the third reading of a Bill when the motion is put "That the Bill do now pass."

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We do not put that motion in the Legislative Assembly of Victoria.

Mr. BARTON. -

I should take it to mean the final stage of the Bill.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

As long as its meaning is made perfectly clear, well and good. I do not think it is necessary to require an absolute majority at all stages of the Bill. The practice in South Australia in regard to a measure amending the Constitution is to require an absolute majority on the second and third reading would be no room for doubt or question on the point.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I quite see the force of what the President has said on this point. Of course, "passed" might be taken to mean as having gone through the stage called passing the Bill, according to the usage of the House of Commons and the practice of some of the Legislatures here, but I believe there are some of the Legislatures here who do not go through that stage at all. I take it that this word "passed" is not used in the technical sense here, but in the sense of evidence of the passing of the Bill.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It means "finally passed."

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, I think it clearly means that.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Supposing you make it read, "passed its final stage."

Mr. BARTON. -

There will have to be several drafting amendments made in this clause. On reconsideration we find that there are several points to which different meanings might be attached, and which might be made a great deal clearer and terser. This suggestion will be taken at that stage, with a view of seeing whether there are any means by which it may be made to indicate more clearly that the final stage of the Bill is meant.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I should say that the second and third readings should require an absolute majority.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
No, the final stage of the Bill is what is meant.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
Following out the suggestion I made this morning, I will formally move the insertion of the new paragraph of which I gave notice (and which appears in the printed amendments), so that the matter may have consideration. I beg to move the addition to the clause of the following:-

A proposed law passed in each of two successive sessions of Parliament, with a periodical election of half the Senators between, by in the Senate a majority including half the members for each state, and in the House of Representatives a majority including a third of the members for each state, shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent.

The idea is to have a method alternative to the principle of absolute majorities and the referendum, so that if a vote is so composed that it contains representatives in the Senate to the extent of one-half the representatives of each state, and in the House of Representatives to the extent of one-third of the representatives of each state, and if, after a periodical election, a similar vote was given, and the Bill passed both Houses, then it might become law without sending it to the referendum.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Is not that a matter we have already settled?

Mr. GLYNN. -
I think not. It is proposed as an alternative, not as negativing what has already been done, but as an alternative to its adoption in certain cases.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I do not think the honorable member can move that amendment in this clause, which is a clause providing the mode of amending the Constitution. The words which the honorable member has just read would apply to every law.

Mr. GLYNN. -
No. I propose to put it in here so as to restrict it to laws amending the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. -
But this would apply to any proposed law which had nothing to do with the Constitution necessarily.
Mr. GLYNN. -

I will, if necessary, put in the words "for the amendment of the Constitution."

Mr. BARTON. -

Do you propose to add this to the last paragraph of the clause?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes, it will necessitate some verbal amendments in the clause. I would like to point out that I am somewhat fortified in making this suggestion by the fact that Mr. Inglis Clark, the late Attorney-General of Tasmania, has made a somewhat similar suggestion. I will move it formally, so as to get the suggestion on record, but I will omit the words "a proposed law," and commence the printed amendment, which I have already read, with the words-

Provided always that the proposed law for the amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I must oppose the amendment on this ground: Whatever my opinions are of the referendum as an engine in the process of ordinary legislation, I have no doubt in my own mind that for the making of a Constitution, or for the alteration of that Constitution, so that it becomes in part different, it is a wise and a right thing that there should be a vote of the people taken. For that reason I think that an amendment which dispenses with the vote of the people in certain cases is not desirable. Granted Parliament has fulfilled its functions, and had the requisite majorities. then there ought to be in such a case a ratification by a popular vote. For that reason, I oppose the amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

The clause was agreed to.

The schedule was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I take it that now that honorable members have been supplied with the amendments in the financial clauses which are proposed to be made, they will be prepared to hear a statement of the meaning of those clauses from the chairman of the Finance Committee to-morrow. A general desire has been expressed that that statement should be made if possible to-day, but the long discussion on the clause providing for amendments of the Constitution has, of course, prevented that from being done. I understand from my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) that he will be prepared to make a statement of the nature indicated to-morrow, and it will then be for honorable members to say whether they will proceed with the consideration of the financial clauses. Having in view the fact that they are now supplied with the clauses—and I may state that the report of the Finance Committee amounts practically to the same thing as the draft clauses, which are distributed now; and having in view the fact that there will be a part of to-day and a part of to-morrow to consider these clauses, I will put it to honorable members whether it will not be an advisable thing, before we touch new clauses, to dispose of the remainder of the Bill, and the only chapter of the Bill now undisposed of before we come to the reconsideration stage and the new clauses is the fourth chapter, which contains the financial clauses. I would suggest that this is the proper place in the Bill for them to be taken, that they should come on tomorrow, and that the discussion should proceed to-morrow. It will be a considerably long discussion, I have no doubt, but honorable members who are not prepared to vote at the beginning, will find that there will be ample time to make up their minds during that discussion. I would suggest, therefore, that, after my right honorable friend's statement to-morrow, the committee should proceed to debate the clauses. I beg to move—

That the Chairman now leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was reported.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENTS.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia).—

I would like to suggest to the leader of the Convention whether it would not be convenient that all the amendments and additional clauses to be proposed on the recommittal of the Bill should be put in print as soon as possible. Of course, we cannot carry that idea too far, because there may be amendments proposed on the spur of the moment, but I think it would be very convenient to every one if, as far as possible, those who have amendments to propose would place them on the notice-paper. We would give more attention to the amendments if that course were followed than we are likely to give if they are proposed in committee on the recommittal of the Bill. I shall be very much obliged to my honorable friend if he will comply with my suggestion as far as it is possible.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria).—

I would suggest to our leader that as soon as he possibly can he will intimate to the Convention what clauses he proposes to allow to be recommitted. There may be some clauses which some of us may desire to have recommitted, but he may object to their recommittal, and therefore it will be just as well that we should know, at his earliest convenience, what clauses he will consent to recommit.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales).-

If honorable members will give notice of their motions to recommit or to reconsider, I shall be prepared as each comes on to intimate whether I think it is a wise thing to reconsider the clause or not. These matters are not in my hands; they are in the hands of the Convention entirely.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You would not recommit the whole of the Bill, would you?

Mr. BARTON. -

My will on that subject is not a matter of very great consideration, I take it, except that I shall be able to indicate to any honorable member cases where I think it will conduce to expedition and success if we do reconsider some matters; but what I do urge upon honorable members is that they should, as soon as possible, place on the notice-paper a notice of the clauses which they desire to have reconsidered. I shall have a list made out of those which I think ought to be reconsidered. My list will be a very short one as far as I am personally concerned, because there are very few clauses that I propose to recommit, until we come to the drafting stage, which is a more technical one, and with which we are not concerned now.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Will the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of considering alterations to certain clauses, or will it be recommitted generally?

Mr. BARTON. -

There will be a reconsideration stage in committee reached after we have dealt with all the clauses in the Bill and the new clauses, and honorable members will then, under the South Australian practice, be able to propose the reconsideration of any clauses. Besides that stage, as an amendment to the motion to adopt the report of the committee, there will be an opportunity offered to move the recommittal of the Bill for the reconsideration of certain clauses, so that honorable members will not lose their opportunities. I only suggest, for the convenience of the Convention, that notice should be given by honorable members as far as possible of any amendments which it is proposed to move.

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -

According to the standing orders of the South Australian Assembly, when the Chairman puts the question that the Bill be reported it is competent for any honorable member to move either that the whole Bill be reconsidered, or that a specific clause or specific clauses be reconsidered, and on that motion the committee comes to a conclusion, and it reconsiders the whole Bill, or the specific clause or clauses, as the case may be.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I apprehend that the honorable member (Mr. Barton) will have no idea of consenting to a recommittal of the whole Bill on any such motion, but that a question on each clause which any honorable member desires to have reconsidered shall be specifically put to the committee, and then we shall have an opportunity to determine whether it shall be reconsidered before the clause itself is examined, otherwise we might be launched into a new inquiry.

FINANCIAL CLAUSES.

(New South Wales). - I wish to lay on the table a print of the financial clauses. Honorable members will have in their hands a report of the Finance Committee. The print I am now laying on the table is practically the same thing, but it will show to them the order which the Drafting Committee suggest the clauses should take in the Bill. Beyond that there is no substantial difference, but honorable members may like to have in their hands a copy of the clauses, which simply show the clauses with the desired amendments, instead of showing the text of the clauses it is proposed to deal with.

Mr. LYNE. -

I have not seen a copy of the report yet.

Mr. BARTON. -

As a matter of convenience, I lay a copy of the document containing the financial clauses on the table, and I beg to move-

That the document he printed.

Mr. LYNE. -

Is there a copy of the report available?

Mr. BARTON. -

I believe it is coming back from the printer directly. It had to be revised.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

It is highly desirable that the report itself should be sent out to honorable members as soon as possible. There was a final revision of the report a little time ago, and I expect that it will be up from the printing-office presently. Perhaps the Clerk will be good enough to see that arrangements are made for a copy to be sent to honorable members at their residences the moment it is available for distribution.

Mr. BARTON. -

Here is a copy of it.

Mr. REID. -

I have already laid the report on the table. It is now simply a question of distributing it to honorable members.
The motion was agreed to.
The Convention adjourned at five p.m.
Thursday, 10th February, 1898.

Return: Federal Finance - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

FEDERAL FINANCE.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria) laid on the table (pursuant to an order of the Convention, dated 21st January) a return showing the annual expenditure of which each colony represented in the Convention would be relieved in respect of certain services and works.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Clause 81 (Chapter IV., Finance and Trade). - All revenues raised or received by the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, under the authority of this Constitution, shall form one Consolidated Revenue Fund, to be appropriated for the public service of the Commonwealth in the manner and subject to the charges provided by this Constitution.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I understand that it is the wish of the Convention that I should make a brief statement of the work done by the Finance Committee upon this chapter. I will make the statement as short as possible; but I shall be prepared to answer any questions that may be addressed to me as I go along if there is any point which does not seem to be sufficiently clear. Honorable members will see from the report of the Finance Committee that they propose to leave clauses 81, 82, 85, 86, 88, 94, 95, 96, 97, and 98 as they stand. They suggest no alteration in them. Now, I will take up the clauses in which we do make alterations. The first of these is clause 83. The amendment made is not a very important one. It is to omit the words "and by warrant countersigned by the Chief Officer of Audit of the Commonwealth." This amendment is suggested for two reasons. The first is that it may be that in the early days of the Commonwealth there will be no such office as that of Chief Officer of Audit in existence; and the second is that it is more a matter for Commonwealth legislation than for provision in the Constitution. The next clause (84) we propose to replace by two clauses, which are marked C and D in the report of the committee. If honorable members will refer to the original clause, they will find that whilst the drafting is different the new clauses are substantially the same as it, with one exception. We thought that it would be well to fix a time within which all state bounties, if they are to be granted, should be finally settled. The effect of the provision in the now clause is that no bounty, or agreement for a bounty, shall be of any force after federation if it was made later than the 30th of June, 1898. The reason that the committee fixed next June is this, that in one of the colonies a matter of bounty, which has been a subject of negotiation for a long time, has pretty well reached a stage in which the Government are bound to complete it. We propose to give these few months so that all existing negotiations may be brought to an end, if they are to come to anything in the shape of a bounty at all. This is the only substantial alteration in the old clause 84. Of course, without express words, the duration of bounties actually granted under laws existing before that date will not be affected, although the laws under which they were given will go.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The state may go on giving bounties if the agreement is made before that date.

Mr. REID. -

Yes. If the agreements are made before that date they will remain good, although the laws or the powers under which they are made will be destroyed by the passing of this Bill. Clause 87 is omitted. Its contents are not removed from the Bill, but they are provided for by drafting in the clause I have just referred to, and also secured by clauses 99 and 100. The clause has not been altered in any way. It appears in another form. We found it necessary, in connexion with clause 89, to add a paragraph which honorable members will see, and the object of which is, I think, very well known. The customs duties of the colonies at present upon particular articles differ very much in rate. In one colony there are very few duties. It was felt that, upon the imposition of a uniform Tariff, and upon the establishment of perfect free-trade between the colonies, enterprising merchants would place themselves in a position to put the trade of the different colonies for the time being upon an unfair and unequal footing. Large quantities of goods might be imported into the Commonwealth, via New South Wales, without payment of the duties to which they would be subject if they had been imported into other parts of the Commonwealth. We think that this addition to clause 89, with possibly a verbal alteration to make its effect more clear, will secure the Commonwealth, and each of the states of the Commonwealth, against any abuse of that description. Clause 90, we suggest, should be taken out altogether, and a new clause substituted. This new clause does not differ in principle from the clause which we propose should be omitted, but it re-arranges it to a certain extent, and clears up a difficulty which might arise in administration after the Commonwealth was established. Whilst it would be perfectly clear that the actual expenditure in the services transferred on the basis existing at the time of the transfer would be charged in a certain way, there would be some doubt left as to how new works—for instance, buildings or new developments made by the Commonwealth—should be charged. We came to the conclusion, and we did not think it a matter of very great consequence so far as administration is concerned, that, as to such new developments under the Commonwealth, they should be taken to follow the principle under which the expenditure incurred in the exercise of the original powers of the Commonwealth is dealt with. For instance, supposing the Commonwealth built some permanent structures post-office, a telegraph-office, or perhaps some important fortification of a permanent character—it manifestly would not be fair to charge such works to the particular locality, especially as the system of distributing expenditure will, at the end of five years, give way to the ordinary per capita distribution. We have removed that difficulty, which would have arisen if the matter had not been dealt with. Then the committee suggest the omission of clause 91, limiting the expenditure, and do not propose anything in its place. Honorable members will understand that this report, naturally enough, does not represent in all respects the unanimous opinion of the committee upon some important points. There has been a difference of opinion in the committee, but of course perfect liberty has been left to those members who differ from the general conclusion to advocate their views in their place in the Convention. I am happy to say that these differences have not been many, and that the preponderance of opinion on every occasion has been very great. There has been, so far as I can recollect, no close division upon any one of these recommendations.

Mr. LYNE. - Do I understand that it is proposed to strike out clause 91?

Mr. REID. - Yes, that is the decision of the committee. As I have said, it does not at all follow that it is the decision or wish of every member of the committee. There is a difference of opinion on that subject.

Mr. BARTON. - You will find a clause numbered 91 in the paper.

Mr. REID. - The proposal is that clause 91 should go, with nothing to take its place. That is the effect of the decision of the committee.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Is it struck out because it is thought to be impracticable to limit the expenditure?

Mr. REID. -

It simply amounts to this: That some honorable members, and I am one of them, considered that it was of vital consequence to compel, even in a rough-and-ready way, a very economical start in dealing with finance in the Federation. On the other hand, there is a very strong argument the other way. I still retain my opinion that it would be wise to leave this clause in, but I think I may say that a very large majority of the committee were of the contrary opinion. With regard to clause 92, honorable members will see that we have gone on different lines in a new clause. The first paragraph of clause 92, as it stands in the Bill, which made it necessary that a Tariff should be constructed to return to every one of the states an amount not less than that which each of those states had received from its own customs duties in the year preceding federation has been struck out. Then the whole scheme for the distribution of the surplus Customs revenue outlined in the original clause 92 has been, upon consideration by this committee, found to be so objectionable that we have departed from it. I may say here that the committee have, as every one in the Convention, and I think outside of the Convention, must have, the very strongest desire to make the operation of intercolonial free-trade as thorough and speedy as possible. We have all felt that that was one of the cardinal points of this enterprise, and some of us, not a large number, did think that even at the risk of losses here and there we should come to a very speedy distribution on a per capita basis. But a number of us, on the other hand, in view of the very great diversity of opinion which exists amongst competent persons as to the extent of these inequalities, and the amount of injustice that might be done under a system of distribution per capita, felt it our duty to place this matter upon such a basis that there will be no room for any of those suspicions or charges which are rife, to the effect that under the scheme which is outlined in the original clause very grave injustice might be done to one or other of the colonies. I may say, with reference to New South Wales, that this matter has assumed a very serious aspect. There is a very strong body of opinion in that colony to the effect that under the method which is in the original clause she would be subjected for some, if not for many, years to an enormous loss. Then we had before us the admitted difficulty of the case of Western Australia. There is no controversy there. Every one admits that in the case of Western Australia a per capita distribution would work the grossest injustice to that colony; go having in view the great importance of leaving no just ground for these suspicions or charges or expectations, with a strong feeling that it was of the first importance to re-assure the people of the different colonies upon this vital point, with very great reluctance, fully conscious of the obstacles to intercolonial free-trade which would be involved, we nevertheless felt that we were compelled by the necessities of the case, and in order to insure justice and restore confidence, to decide that the system of bookkeeping should be maintained for a period of five years.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

After uniform duties have been imposed?

Mr. REID. -

Yes; it will be necessary under our proposal that the accounts should be kept on the borders and at the ports of intercolonial trade. Of course, we all, feel that this system will not be a perfect scheme; we all feel, as to many items, that they will never come into this account at all, and that it is impossible to keep a mathematically accurate account under the circumstances; but still we were so impressed by the difficulties of any other method, and we felt that any other method would give so much scope for attack upon this Constitution, that we were most reluctantly compelled to recommend this system to the Convention. For five years, therefore, there will be a system of bookkeeping. Of course, we all know that the substantial grievance with reference to intercolonial free-trade at present is not so much the necessity of passing an entry as the necessity of paying heavy duties. That is a serious inconvenience, and the one that people most complain of. Passing entries is an obstacle, but only a trivial one. The keeping up of these border custom houses is a regrettable necessity, but it will not involve very great expense. With reference to this account, we have taken care to so frame the clause that each colony will, so far as it is possible to keep an accurate account, get credit for all the Customs revenue it is entitled to, because under this system it will be possible to follow goods to their place of final consumption, which will be the colony entitled to take the credit. I admit here again that it will not be possible to follow every package of these goods.

Mr. LYNE. -

How can you do it for two years, as you provide in one clause?

Mr. REID. -

That is a somewhat different matter from the one I am now speaking about. I think I will be able to show later on that that can be done, although I quite admit that if any one were to say to this Convention or to the public that this method will bring out mathematical accuracy, he would be saying a very foolish thing, for it will do nothing of the kind, and I should be very sorry to put any machinery in motion that would. It would certainly lead to greater espionage and trouble than even the present system of intercolonial duties. We were quite confident that no suggestion we could make would be absolutely satisfactory to any one, except that, if we failed, it might be to those who are opposed to federation. Therefore, we faced the difficulties, and we frankly confess that it is impossible to bring before this Convention a scheme which can be received with anything like enthusiasm. Some people have been looking for flashes of financial genius in connexion with this matter, but the conditions of these problems, make genius a very unreliable guide.

Mr. BARTON. -

Nothing but the gift of prophecy would do it.

Mr. REID. -

And even that I am afraid would land us in the wrong box, because the plain matter of fact is that, under the different policies and different rates of duty which have prevailed throughout this future Commonwealth, conditions have grown up widely dissimilar in the different colonies. Even if that were not so, there is so strong a conviction that it is so that it is necessary to respect that conviction. This financial part of the Commonwealth is the part at which federation will be exposed perhaps to the keenest criticism. We do feel that under this somewhat obnoxious method of keeping books for five years, at any rate, we will secure this very great advantage that we can all go to our respective colonies and answer these various theories about the different rates of consumption in a final and satisfactory manner. By this taking of accounts we shall come to know in each of these five years the actual facts to begin with, and the incidence of the operation of the new state of things during the remainder of the five years' period. Now, we do not carry our confidence so far as to say that, even at the end of this five years' period, it may not be necessary to distribute the revenue by some other method than per capita. We earnestly hope, and I think a number of us believe, that at the end of five years matters will have come to such a point that the maintenance of this system of bookkeeping will be absolutely unnecessary; that the trend of trade towards a normal and equal state of things through the Commonwealth will become so manifest that it may be possible to throw the books aside, and either at once to begin on a per capita basis, or fix some other basis which would be satisfactory to all, and enable us to enjoy unrestricted intercourse between the different colonies. We thought it wise, therefore, not absolutely to close down the matter at the end of five years, but with the facts and experience of five years open to the Commonwealth, and to every critic in the Commonwealth, we feel satisfied that then the Federal Parliament may absolutely be trusted to place this matter for all time upon a satisfactory footing. We propose, therefore, to leave it to the Federal Parliament, after this experience of five years' bookkeeping-

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will it be possible to carry out this system of bookkeeping without tracing the destination of the goods from the moment of their introduction from any state down to their consumption by the consumer?

Mr. REID. -

That difficulty will be met in this way: On the importation of goods the presumption will be that they arrive for consumption. Of course, the honorable member is now speaking of a state of things under which there is a uniform Tariff throughout the Commonwealth. The presumption, therefore, is that the state into which these goods are received is the state in which they will be consumed, but that presumption will, of course, be open to adjustment and correction by the actual history of those goods. Whilst it will be impossible, I fear, except by tracing the entries passed by individual firms engaged in intercolonial trade, to follow each package of goods, and especially the contents of each package after their contents are broken up, still there being no motive on the part of the trader to deceive—this is entirely taken away owing to the Tariff being uniform—it is simply throwing upon the persons engaged in trade the not very onerous duty of honestly stating the fact that a portion of the goods or the whole of the goods which they are sending away at a particular time were imported from another colony. That will be the only requirement on business houses, and I think that the business houses who are exposed at the present time to the great strain of shipping in the face of the different Tariffs of the Australian colonies, will be so grateful for the relief they will receive that they will not in any unfair spirit object to take the trouble to put on an entry the history of the movements of the packages which they are sending to another colony. As I have said, there will be absolutely no motive for deceit. It will be just as simple to tell the truth as not.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Supposing imported goods are merged into some other product for instance, imported tobacco leaf mixed with colonial leaf?

Mr. REID. -

Well, that is a matter which we feel can be dealt with. It simply involves a certain amount of trouble in the office of the person shipping the goods—the trouble of describing on the entry so much Victorian value, or whatever the element of colonial value is, and so much foreign value, or so much New South Wales, so much Tasmanian, so much Western Australian, or so much South Australian value, as the case may be. It only involves a little trouble in the house shipping the goods, where the facts will be pretty well known, and the trouble of stating on the invoice how much of that mixed value is Victorian and how much is value belonging to some other part of the world. Of course, it will be a rough-and-ready method, but, being a rough-and-ready method all round, it will in the end approximate to substantial justice as closely as anything can possibly do so. There is at the present moment a system in force in countries with protective duties in which all these difficulties are solved. For instance, in an application for drawback on goods manufactured in Melbourne from imported materials liable to customs duties, there is some machinery in the Custom-house under which the officers of Customs know, or are pretty sure of knowing, that they are not giving the drawback beyond the element of imported materials in the Victorian manufacture—the element from abroad. That system is in force in the Melbourne Custom-house now and in all other protected countries. But the sort of person who requires anything like mathematical accuracy will be disappointed by any solution of this financial and commercial problem. All we can do is to bring the matter into sufficient shape to satisfy every reasonable mind. Now, going away from that point, I may say that after we had practically concluded our labours in this matter, Sir John Forrest, the Premier and Treasurer of Western Australia, brought under the notice of the Finance Committee a matter which we felt to be one of very great difficulty. Sir John Forrest showed to us that, although his Tariff is, I believe, not a very heavy one, still, as a matter of fact, the Customs revenue of Western Australia at the present time is derived to an enormous extent from duties upon Australian produce. So seriously is this the case that out of a revenue for, I think, the year 1896, of something between £1,000,000 and £1,100,000, the duties on the products of colonies which will be included, we hope, in the Federation—that is excluding Queensland for the present—the duties which were derived in Western Australia, during that year, from the products of the other colonies represented here, amounted to no less a sum than £389,000 out of a revenue of over £1,000,000. Well, we see at once that that is more than one-third of the whole Customs revenue of Western Australia, and we can also see that it is a matter which the Premier and Treasurer of Western Australia was absolutely entitled to bring under our notice, because, although the new Tariff might adjust this difference within reasonable bounds, still, it was a matter of such vital concern to the finances of that colony, that we could scarcely expect them to leave the question entirely in doubt. And we have had a great deal of difficulty in dealing with the matter. I do not say that even on this the Finance Committee was unanimous, but the vast majority of the committee felt that this proposal which we now submit to the Convention should be adopted.
There is one advantage about it that it does not involve any further trouble in the way of intercolonial freetrade: it is a mere matter of calculation upon the simple facts of trade in the future. It will not add to the inconvenience of intercolonial trade in any way. It will not require any additional bookkeeping; it will be simply a matter of calculation in the offices of the Commonwealth upon the facts of trade as they develop.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

And it is to last for five years?

Mr. REID. -

Yes, it is to last for five years only; that is all. Honorable members, no doubt, pretty well understand the clause, but I think I can put its effect in a very simple way. Let us suppose that the first year of the Commonwealth's Tariff is 1901. The facts of the trade of that year will be discovered and chronicled—that is to say, at the end of that year it will be possible to ascertain, indeed we will know at once, what the revenue actually received in Western Australia, on the basis of the uniform Tariff, is. That will appear at once, at the end of the year, as a simple matter of fact, but after that fact is discovered it will be necessary then to apply to the Tariff of Western Australia, which existed just before the uniform Tariff was created, the actual facts of the year I have mentioned, in order to ascertain whether, if the provincial Tariff had been in force that year, the Customs revenue of Western Australia would have been greater than it actually was under the uniform Tariff. If it was found that the revenue of Western Australia under its provincial Tariff would have been greater than the revenue actually was under the uniform Tariff, the two amounts would appear on calculation, and then the difference between the two, as applied to the actual revenue of the year I have mentioned, would be the proportionate net loss of Western Australia under this new state of things.
Then, in order to strike an average, the same process would have to be repeated in the case of each of the other colonies. We may throw New South Wales out of this account at once, because, of course, under any possible Tariff—any Tariff that we can conceive—there is no doubt the New South Wales revenue would not be less than it is under the very simple Tariff we have now. We have brought the Customs taxation of New South Wales down to the minimum, and consequently, under the uniform Tariff, the Customs revenue of New South Wales would reach a larger amount than it is under our provincial Tariff. Therefore, New South Wales would not be an element in this calculation at all. The only elements would be states which were found to have lost Customs revenue on the same process being applied to their case as had been applied to the case of Western Australia. And then, having thrown Western Australia into those states, with her proportionate loss, we arrive at an average net proportionate loss for the whole of the losing states. Knowing the Western Australian loss, and knowing the average loss of all the leading states, it would then be the duty of the Commonwealth to hand over an amount, if any, to Western Australia, which would be put in this position: That its average net loss was the same as the average net loss of the whole of the losing states, including Western Australia, combined.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - Supposing there was a profit to Western Australia in one year and a loss in the next, would they have to bring the profit into account?

Mr. REID. - Oh, decidedly.

Mr. ISAACS. - This clause does not say so.

Mr. REID. - If it does not say so, it can easily be put right.

Mr. BARTON. - That was not among the instructions to the Drafting Committee, very possibly because it was thought that such a contingency was not likely to arise.

Mr. REID. - It could not possibly arise; but I am perfectly agreeable that words should be inserted to make the clause quite clear on that point, because there is never any harm in providing for any contingency in a matter of that sort. The object of separating the five years as we have done is that it would never do to keep Western Australia waiting till five years elapsed to get an adjustment. Even with an adjustment every year, it will be some months after the end of the year before the adjustment can actually take place. Now, I can see, from the facts shown by the Premier and Treasurer of Western Australia, and looking at the facts of the other colonies, that during the whole of the five years there must be some amount to be made up, but I do not think, spread over the Commonwealth, that it will be an amount which we need seriously take i

If Tasmania loses more than her fair proportion of Customs revenue, would you not treat her exceptionally in the same way?

Mr REID. - Well, I may say that so strong is my objection to this proposal at all, that I did all I could, and will do all I can, to prevent its extension. I do not think that in the case of Tasmania there will be a sufficient difference to warrant us in making this exceptional treatment apply to that colony I have no hesitation in saying that the finances of Tasmania are, as we all know, at present on so small a scale that I would not seriously object to some proposal which would ease the financial position of that colony-some proposal of limited application; and I feel sure that no colony would wish to come into this arrangement unless absolute necessity compels them to do so. I do not think Tasmania would come to us on any ground of emergency unless it was an absolute fact in their financial history which they were compelled to take notice of.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If you extend this exceptional treatment, you will have to make it general—you will have to make it apply to the colonies all round.

Mr. BARTON. -

What sort of a Tariff would that involve?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We shall suffer as much as Tasmania.

Mr. REID. -

Referring to the interjection of my honorable friend (Mr. Barton), I may remark that this exceptional treatment would not affect the Tariff. But let me point out to my right honorable friend the Premier of Victoria that, as far as we in New South Wales are concerned, we could listen with perfect equanimity to the proposal that this should be extended to all the other states, because this would not affect us at all. We would not be an element in the calculation, because under no conceivable circumstances could we have a net loss of Customs revenue under the uniform Tariff.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

But you would have to help to make up the losses of the losing states.

Mr. REID. -

I do not know what my honorable friend (Mr. Lyne) will say to that. Does he support that view?

Mr. LYNE. -

I am not prepared to support any proposal which will make us responsible to pay for what we do not receive.

Mr. REID. -

As this matter has to be calculated, it will go on the total effect of the two Tariffs. Taking the total effect of the two Tariffs, there, is no conceivable Commonwealth Tariff that won't yield a larger total Customs revenue to New South Wales than her present Customs revenue. That may not be so in regard to particular items, but there is no conceivable total, as between the Commonwealth and New South Wales, under which New South Wales would figure as a loser of revenue. In the case of Western Australia, if the result of the Commonwealth Tariff is to give Western Australia as much Customs revenue as she had before, it won't matter at all what articles the revenue is derived from, Western Australia does not say-"We want money to replace these identical duties that we have lost." They do not take up such an unreasonable position. They simply say-"It is clear that, with the Tariff of the Commonwealth, our financial system will be subjected to a sudden shock and crisis; we wish some safeguard against that, and, so long as the Customs Tariff of the Commonwealth, whether by duties on articles we do not tax or not, leaves us in the total result anywhere near where we were, we have no cause of complaint or of claim." Their claim will only arise if their fears are verified by the result, and if they are confronted with a state of things under which perhaps their Customs revenue in 1901 will be 25 per cent. less in the total than the Customs revenue under the provincial Tariff in 1900.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Who pays the difference?

Mr. REID. -
The difference will be a matter of calculation between the states that lose. That is to say, every state that suffered a loss under this system would have its loss defined in figures upon the same process as that employed in the case of Western Australia. That having been done in the case of each of the losing colonies, Western Australia would be put amongst the losing colonies, a total would be struck, the proportion between the total losses and the total revenue on the first year of the uniform Tariff would be shown, the average of that would be taken, and then in the case of Western Australia, if her average loss was higher than the average of the losses of the other colonies, herself being included with all the other colonies-if, I say, her individual average showed a higher rate of loss, then an amount would be paid to Western Australia which would bring her down to the common level of loss, so that she should only lose on the same rate as every other losing colony was losing.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We have to help to make up a portion of the loss of Western Australia.
Mr. Reid. -
I did not perhaps quite state the case fully when I said that New South Wales was not affected. She is affected, because, when the total amount is ascertained that is to be paid to Western Australia, the amount will be paid out of the funds of the Commonwealth; so that the amount will have to be paid out of the funds of New South Wales, as well as out of the funds of the other colonies. New South Wales, therefore, will be a bearer of this burden in common with the other colonies. But, as I have said already, her figures won't enter into the calculation in any way. An average of loss can only be struck by putting the states together which do lose. If we were to put New South Wales into the calculation, and make the loss less by putting her gain against it, I am afraid the result would be that the difficulty in the case of Western Australia would not be met at all, because the gain of New South Wales, if the Tariff is anything like a high one, would be so great that it would probably wipe out the whole of the proportionate losses of the other states, and, therefore, there would be no substantial relief given to Western Australia at all.

Mr. Lyne. -
The matter then remains in this way: That New South Wales cannot possibly receive anything, but she may have to pay something.

Mr. Reid. -
There is no doubt that is so.

Sir George Turner. -
But New South Wales will count as one of the states in finding out what the losses of all the states would be.

Mr. Reid. -
All I can say is this, that if that is done, we really offer nothing to Western Australia. Even if the Commonwealth Tariff be a strictly revenue Tariff, as I hope it will be, it will even then, give us in New South Wales probably a much larger Customs revenue than we have.

Sir George Turner. -
It can only be those states which actually make a loss that can be considered; otherwise, Western Australia would get an immense benefit.

Mr. Higgins. -
The clause should read-Average proportionate net loss in the states which lose."

Mr. Reid. -
It might be safe to make that more precise.

Mr. Barton. -
We were under the impression in drawing the clause that all the states were to be included.

Mr. REID. -

The effect would be, as I pointed out at the time, that if New South Wales came in with her gain, it would practically nullify the arrangement with Western Australia, because taking her figures of gain as against the figures of losses, I believe that the gain of New South Wales—I do not think, of course, that it is a gain to be taxed, but I am speaking of the gain to the New South Wales Treasury—would amount to a sum (I have worked the figures out a little myself) which would pretty well obliterate all the losses of all the other states, and the result would be that we would be as we were, and we would be offering Western Australia nothing at all. Now, I do not propose to do that. Although I am not personally responsible for this clause at all in the sense of approving of it, still, if this is to be done, we must do it in a fair and straightforward way. We must not affect to help Western Australia, and practically establish a basis which gives her no guarantee at all. All these are matters which will require to be very, seriously considered by the Convention. I am at present simply endeavouring to make clear the lines upon which the Finance Committee has gone. Coming along to clause 93, it is proposed that that clause shall be struck out, under the circumstances that I have mentioned. We would have been very pleased indeed to have left that clause in. We strongly hope that at the end of five years the per capita system will be the basis of distribution. We feel sure that if the Commonwealth experience makes it at all fair, it will be chosen by the Commonwealth as the basis of distribution. But, believing all these things, we still thought that it would be better to leave this matter to be dealt with by those who will have a responsibility in dealing with it, in the light of the actual experience which they will have gone through during those five years.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Did the committee consider the advisability of fixing a period after which it must be per capita?

Mr. REID. -

Having arrived at the conclusion suggested in the clause proposed to be substituted for clause 93, we felt that it would be better, really, to leave that matter entirely to the Federal Parliament; because every one would be anxious to arrive at the time when all these accounts will disappear, and when the simple question will be a basis of population. The Federal Parliament and the Federal Treasurer will naturally be so anxious to arrive at that basis, as the permanent basis, that, I think, we can safely leave this matter in the hands of the Commonwealth Parliament.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
    It is always liable to be altered under this.
Mr. REID. -
    No doubt that is a very serious objection. I can assure honorable members that the Finance Committee will be only too glad if, with the assistance of all the members of this Convention, we may be able to improve these suggestions. We have done our best, and I feel sure that, by the time honorable members have given us the benefit of their suggestions, we shall be able to finally settle the provisions of this chapter in such a form as to satisfy the public, at any rate, that justice will be done.
Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -
    After listening to the very long and exhaustive explanation of the Right
Hon. the Premier of New South Wales—an explanation which, I may say, was absolutely necessary in connexion with this document; which appears to me, so far, very much like a Chinese puzzle—I would suggest that the debate might be adjourned.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -
    No; no.
Mr. LYNE. -
    I think it is almost impossible to follow the long speech of the Premier of New South Wales in all its details. There may be some members of the committee who understand something about this document through having seen it before, but I certainly think it would be better to adjourn the debate to enable honorable members generally to understand it. As far as I am concerned, there are some points that I do not quite understand at present, even after listening to the explanation which has been given by the right honorable member. I should like to know whether the leader of the Convention feels disposed to adjourn the debate, or desires to go on?
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
    I certainly think it would be better not to adjourn the debate at the present stage. Of course, finance is always a complicated subject, but, whatever may be taken to-day, but, subject to that, I think a continued debate will afford the best explanation of these provisions.
Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -
    I am sorry that this debate is not to be adjourned, and I should not say anything at all in reference to the matter now except that I am not likely to be present later in the day. Whatever takes place in connexion with the subject, I hope that no division will be taken, except perhaps upon amendments, for two or three days.

Mr. BARTON. -

I will ask the committee not to divide on the whole scheme before Monday.

Mr. LYNE. -

I will not detain the committee long, but I will just refer to a few points which have struck me while listening to the Premier of New South Wales. In the first place, one of the most fatal points, it seems to me, in connexion with this scheme is the striking out of the protection to the state Treasurers. The committee have absolutely struck out the safeguard we placed in previously, so that the state Treasurers should be assured a certain sum at certain periods from the Federal Treasurer to enable them to carry on the business of the state.

Mr. WALKER. -

That will not affect New South Wales.

Mr. LYNE. -

I think it will, and it will affect every other state as well. It will affect them so far as the minds of the people are concerned when it is realized that the states will be absolutely helpless directly the uniform Tariff is entered upon. For each state will be absolutely helpless under these provisions, and may be called upon to raise the whole of its revenue from direct taxation. That, as far as I can judge, is one of the grave alterations that has been made in the financial proposals previously contained in the Bill. I will ask the representatives of the various states-I will refer to Tasmania particularly-whether they are prepared to place themselves absolutely at the whim of the Federal Treasurer-

Mr. HENRY. -

No; the Federal Parliament.

Mr. LYNE. -

As to what money they shall receive. Tasmania will be placed in that position. If I remember rightly, in Adelaide no one was stronger for providing the Treasurers with some security than the present Treasurer of Tasmania. I refer to that colony particularly, because she can as little afford to lose money a any other colony.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

I did not say what you have attributed to me.

Mr. LYNE. -

I am as clear as can be with regard to the point, because Sir Philip Fysh himself stepped in and made a proposal to the effect I have stated when we were just about to come to a conclusion. Of course, if the Treasurer of Tasmania is prepared to say: "We do not want anything from the Federal Parliament, and are prepared to raise the whole of the money we want from direct taxation," I am not; and I do not think the people of New South Wales will be either. The Finance Committee has also struck out the provision that there shall be a restriction of the expenditure to be entered into by the Federal Parliament. I think the amount fixed was £1,500,000; I may be wrong, but I think that was the amount.

Mr. FRASER. -
You are quite right.

Mr. LYNE. -
The proposition now is to strike out that limitation, so that the Federal Treasurer or Government can enter into any expenditure they like. They also have to go to the cost and the trouble of keeping a record of the cost of collecting the customs in each state, and to debit each state with that cost, whilst, at the same time, they are not called upon to pay one penny to the states if the Federal Government requires the money collected for federal purposes. If honorable members and the people of the states are prepared to accept a proposal of that kind, I am very much mistaken. Reference has been made to Western Australia, and the position of the colony appears to me to be an extraordinary one. New South Wales, and New South Wales only, is placed in this position: That under no circumstances can she receive from the Commonwealth fund any amount to assist her revenue, but if any other states, or all the other states, show a low under the uniform Tariff—if it is a low Customs Tariff that is imposed under the Federation—then New South Wales has to pay her share to make up the difference.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
So have the other colonies.

Mr. LYNE. -
I say that New South Wales cannot receive, but she has to pay.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
None of the others can receive but Western Australia.

Mr. FRASER. -
The other colonies will never do what Mr. Lyne states.

Mr. LYNE. -
They will have to do it. If Western Australia is receiving, as I heard her Treasurer say some months ago, £8 per head from the Customs, and if the uniform Tariff only produces 30s or £1 a head, the other states will have to make up the difference.

Mr. GLYNN. -
She will only be repaid what she pays into the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON. -
Western Australia does not ask for the whole difference.

Mr. LYNE. -

I understand that if Western Australia receives only 30s. under the uniform Tariff, and if, on the goods which will be imported under the uniform Tariff, and to which that Tariff is to be applied, she shows a loss of about £6 per head, the other states will have to make up the loss.

Mr. GLYNN. -

She will make it up herself.

Mr. LYNE. -

Nonsense! How can she make it up herself? I am putting what seems to me to be a great possibility, and I should say that the other states would not be willing that Western Australia only should be treated in that way. Now, I never could see why there should be the great objection that was raised originally in Adelaide to fixing a minimum return for each of the states in the manner first proposed.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. LYNE. -

In the first instance it was proposed that the three years 1893, 1894, and 1895, in which all the states had customs duties and raised revenues pretty well approximate in proportion to amount (except in the extreme case of Western Australia) should be averaged; and from these three years so taken a minimum should be ascertained, by dividing the total customs duties by the population. That system would not have involved any bookkeeping; and I say unhesitatingly that it is a great blot on the system now proposed that it involves a system of bookkeeping for five years as between the states, while it secures nothing certain to the Treasurers of the various colonies. The matter was worked out in committee in Adelaide, and we came to the conclusion that under the system there proposed we should have had a uniform minimum for return to the various Treasurers after deducting the gross expenses of the Commonwealth. We should then have been able, on entering upon the Commonwealth, to wipe away the whole of our Border Duties without risk of the trouble, annoyance, and expense, and I might almost say the impossibility, of following goods that are imported from the port of importation to the states where they are sold. I should like to know how it is possible to follow down with anything like a reasonable guarantee of certainty the goods that go from one state to another? I think the Premier of New South Wales is altogether wrong when he says that under this system the merchants will have no objection to keeping a history of the goods passing through their warehouses. I will undertake to say that you will not have a merchant in one of the colonies who will take the trouble of doing so. The merchants will derive no benefit from it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

You have a bad opinion of merchants.

Mr. LYNE. -

Well, I always had; of course I speak jokingly as to that. Suppose goods are imported from outside, it is not to be expected that a merchant wants to keep a history of them. They may be imported under circumstances which may make him wish to see the last of them as quickly as possible, and he will not follow them up to see where they go to for the purpose of a bookkeeping system between the states.

Mr. REID. -

The Commonwealth Parliament will have power to provide for a history of the goods being furnished before they go forth.

Mr. LYNE. -

Then it will be more trouble for those records to be kept than it is under the Border Duties.

Mr. REID. -

Oh, no.

Mr. LYNE. -

Well, nearly so.

Mr. BARTON. -

Which system would you prefer?

Mr. LYNE. -

There is no necessity for the bookkeeping system. What I am arguing now is that it is only a bogey in the minds of some people that we could not arrive at a minimum per head to return to the states. And that is all that is wanted.

Mr. REID. -

Would you accept a per capita from the start for New South Wales?

Mr. LYNE. -

Yes; and I do not think it would make a shilling per head difference. I think that if to-morrow we had a Border Tariff in New South Wales, the purchasing power of Victoria being equal to the purchasing power of New South Wales, the importations into Victoria would be practically the same as those into New South Wales, except for the fact that Victoria is far more advanced in manufacturing her own goods, and there might consequently be a larger quantity imported into New South Wales for a time on that account, and that account only.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
New South Wales imports goods from Victoria.

Mr. LYNE. -

She does to a great extent.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

And will do so more largely henceforth.

Mr. LYNE. -

At present we import large quantities from Victoria in the south-western part of our colony. But the point is, that the purchasing power in all the colonies will be very much the same. It is nonsense to say that it will be higher in one state than in another for a continuous time, and except for the fact that we in New South Wales do not manufacture as we should in comparison with the other states we should not purchase now more per capita than any of the other states do. As I said at the commencement, the explanation given of the financial clauses h

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I did not intend to speak at this early stage, but I think that our object now is to save time as much as possible, and if I can throw any light upon the matter, and thereby economize time as far as the ultimate discussion is concerned, it is my duty to speak at this stage. I do not think that any scheme that could emanate from the mind of man would be satisfactory altogether, but I do claim that the Finance Committee has done its work well; and, although there may be a difference of opinion upon this crucial matter to Western Australia, I think that the committee have taken such a safe and generous course that there will be very little exception taken to the scheme when we arrive at a conclusion. Ever since the Federal Enabling Bill was passed in New South Wales I have given a fair amount of consideration to the financial problem, and I honestly confess that from the time I had the honour to first address the Convention in Adelaide very little light has been thrown upon the subject, so far as I am concerned. I always said this question must practically be left to the Federal Parliament, and, but for the bookkeeping system, that is the course which has been recommended by the Finance Committee. Some remarks were made by the honorable member (Mr. Lyne) to which I should like to refer. When this question was before us there were only three courses open. First, there was the giving of a guarantee to the states—a course which the honorable member now very curiously advocates seeing that it does not affect New South Wales at all.

Mr. LYNE. -

Yes it does.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Only in a direction in which we do not want it to affect that colony. It would add infinite complexity and complication to the position.

Mr. LYNE. -
The honorable member knows better than that. It is nonsense to talk like that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
There is no personal consideration which influences me in connexion with this matter, and no local politics are introduced here. I am merely dealing with the position broadly and clearly, as I have dealt with it all along, and I shall not recede from the position which I took up on the floor of the Convention, and when I was a member of the Finance Committee.

Mr. LYNE. -
The honorable member knows that it makes a difference.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
The two other courses which were open for adoption were the bookkeeping system and the course of leaving the whole question to the Federal Parliament. The honorable member does not see that the introduction of the bookkeeping system does away with the necessity of giving guarantees.

Mr. LYNE. -
It does not.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
If, out of the five colonies, two or three followed one fiscal system and the others another, there might not be an easy way out of the difficulty, but, inasmuch as four of the colonies are absolutely committed to protection, there is no necessity for a guarantee, because necessarily those colonies will have the larger share in shaping the future Tariff, and will be absolutely safe without a guarantee.

Mr. LYNE. -
Yes, but if you raise twice as much by customs duties as you raise now, there is nothing to prevent the Federal Government from spending it all.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
We all saw that for a time the bookkeeping system would get us out of our difficulties, but we wished to adopt it only in the last resort. We strained every endeavour to get away from this absurd system, but now we have come back to it, and it is proposed in effect that everything except the bookkeeping shall be left to the Federal Parliament. I am not anxious to disturb any clause that has been carefully thought out by the committee.
unless it is absolutely necessary to do so, but I should like to have seen some proviso introduced under which, if the Federal Parliament could come to some agreement with the Parliaments of the states, the bookkeeping period could be cut short. Of course, we know that under all British Constitutions, and among British people, it is not at all times necessary to create specific machinery, because the occasion creates the machinery. There is no doubt that, at any rate during the early period of our federal life, there must be close connexion between the Federal Treasurer and the Treasurers of the states, because the finance question is the one great link between the Commonwealth and the states. In all other matters we have either given the control exclusively to the federal authority or have left it with the states, but in regard to the finances we have left a very strong link between the federal authority and the states authorities. I do not know whether from a legal point of view, it is possible or necessary, but I should have liked to have seen some kind of machinery provided by which the Federal Treasurer could call together the Treasurers of the states Governments for the purpose of dealing with these matters. Although five years is a short time in the life of a nation, it is possible that circumstances may arise under which it may be advisable, with the consent of the states, to end this wretched system of bookkeeping in a shorter period.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We fixed the term at five years to give certainty to the people of New South Wales, so that they should not be afraid of being badly treated.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That is all right. I felt that there was the most generous feeling in the Finance Committee as to the difficulties and perplexities of New South Wales. What the committee has done is this: They have cleared away all the difficulty and complication which would have prevented the representatives of New South Wales from going back to their colony and saying that the financial clauses ought to be received. Certain honorable members, and certain very able people outside, have tried most assiduously to prove that the vexed question of the disposal of the surplus would be solved if the railways and the state debts were handed over to the Commonwealth. But I want again to point out that no such arrangement touches the root of the difficulty. The distribution of the surplus stands absolutely by itself, and should not be confused by any other issues. I am very glad that the committee, in their wisdom, have seen fit to strike out the clause which limits the expenditure of the sovereign power. I should have considered such a provision most unfederal. It seems to me that, since those who will represent us in the Federal Parliament will be chosen by ourselves, we need not fear that the expenditure of the Federal Government will be larger than will be absolutely necessary. To limit such expenditure for the first two or three years would be an absolutely useless precaution, while my experience of all Treasurers except myself is that if we had introduced some such qualifying phrase as "except for national exigencies" it would have been taken advantage of. I am inclined to think the new paragraph to be added to clause 89 will be of very little benefit whatever. There is to be a surveillance of the goods previously imported under the old Tariffs so as to avoid the glutting of one market and the cheating of the revenue afterwards. As a business man, I do not think that the remedy will prove effective, because I do not see how you can discriminate, and I am opposed to making my fellow men liars by Act of Parliament. On many occasions the most honest and discriminating men will not be able to answer the questions.

Mr. FRASER. -

It would only apply to goods coming across the borders.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Yes; but I say that you cannot discriminate; while if men want to rob you they will rob you. I think it would be just as well to strike that provision out. You cannot make such an enormous change as we are going to make without creating a great deal of disturbance and chaos.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Have you any alternative to propose?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I have no proposal to make. If you are going to impose duties you must fix a certain date for their imposition, and abide by the inconvenience caused. It soon passes away, but you must pay the piper. I think that the paragraph which provides that the Central Government should be paid pro rata, according to population, in connexion with new post offices and other works arising out of the services transferred, is only fair and reasonable. Now I come to the Western Australia question. So far as I can see, if you want a piece of machinery to recoup to Western Australia its loss—if you want to differentiate between that colony and the other colonies—the machinery provided will do. We only got the report of the Finance Committee yesterday afternoon, and I must say that I have not had time to consider this clause, but so far as I am able to grasp it it seems to me a simple piece of machinery for doing what is wanted. I have no objection to the position of Western Australia being considered. So far as New South Wales is concerned, with the probability of an enlarged volume of Customs receipts, any contribution will be a mere bagatelle to us. It is rather for the other colonies to say whether they will bear this burden. I take it that the Premier of New South Wales is perfectly willing to stand sponsor for his colony in any loss we may make. Therefore, this question does not affect us very materially, and I am sure that a very much larger sacrifice would be freely undertaken to get Western Australia into the Union.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Has not the provision the fault of applying an old Tariff to a new importation?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

No. I have not examined it with absolute closeness, but I think it hits the rough justice of the provision, if we are to recognise that justice; but I am willing to be enlightened upon the point by more acute members of the Convention. The only other point to, which I think it necessary to refer, taking it for granted that the bookkeeping system must be adopted, is the clause with regard to the taking over of the public debts of the states, which I am sorry has been allowed to stand in its present form. I have before dissented from the principle of this clause. I think that we must either make some complete and generous arrangement for taking over the debts of the colonies upon equitable principles, which, in my opinion, is impossible, or we must leave the matter to be dealt with subject to the approval of each state. I do not think this clause is workable. It says-

The Parliament may take over the whole, or a rateable proportion, of the public debts of the states as existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

And so on. The loans contracted by the states have been floated at different rates and under different conditions. Are you going to allow the Federal Parliament to make a law for itself in regard to these states in taking over the loans? Of course I know, as a matter of practical working, it is probable that no Federal Treasurer would attempt to take over these loans unless he could have some reasonable arrangement with all the colonies, because I think if any one colony's loans are taken over all ought to be taken over as a practical matter.

Mr. FRASER. -

It is pro rata.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That does not affect the question of the interest and other matters connected with these loans.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Do you want words introduced which will allow those elements to be considered?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I object absolutely to any arrangement by which the Federal Parliament may take over those loans without the consent of the states.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Are you afraid of being robbed of your debts?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

No. That, of course, has been said before.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I said it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

But, at the same time, it involves details, and involving those details which may be made very onerous to some of the states, I want to be perfectly clear on this question of loans. I believe in one consolidated loan system for the colonies, but there are many questions arising out of it connected with new loans, and the principle on which those new loans shall be raised, just as there are questions arising out of taking over the existing railways and the construction of new lines. My view is that all these matters should be left to the working of the future. I believe that if you leave these matters entirely for the states to give their free and full consent on a reasonable proposal, there is much more likelihood of these assets or liabilities being taken over and being worked under federal control. The principle I have always held, without being a constitutional authority, is that you must in every case, where you hand over a power to the Federal Parliament, make that power supreme; whatever is left to the local Parliament, that must be absolute and supreme. But in this case you allow, at its own sweet will, the Parliament of the Federation to come at any time it likes and say:"We will take over these loans on our own conditions."

Mr. FRASER. -

But without the power they could not take them over at all.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

But they have the power here to take over the loans, without the consent of the states, or the states agreeing to any particular arrangement. As a practical matter, I believe it would work out the same, but I think, at the same time, it is not a fair thing in this Constitution. I think it would be impossible for this Convention at the present time to make any concrete scheme for the taking over of either the railways or the debts. I hold that there is a great deal to be said in favour of both these proposals, which, as a business man, I should like to see, when we further develop the whole railway system of Australia, under one control, but I feel that this is just one of the things in which we may go too far. We are not likely, in the case of the railways, to get the concurrence of the states to this Constitution if we give federal control over them, and, as I consider that the railways and the debts are so intimately connected, I think that the debts ought to be left exactly in the same position as the railways, that they can be dealt with by the Federal Treasury, subject to the consent of all the states. The fact is this-you have a complex network of interests connected with the railways and the debts. The railways are the great revenue-producing asset of the money we have borrowed—probably in the whole of the colonies two-thirds of the debts and I do not believe that any system to be proposed in the future which will separate these two things will be entirely satisfactory.

There seems to have been a sort of idea that you can get rid of your surplus by simply allocating a certain amount of your debts. But that is a very foolish thing to think, because this Commonwealth is growing; the position with regard to our debts and with regard to every financial thing in twenty years will probably be doubled, and the plan of allocating certain debts would only get over the difficulty for a certain time. It seems to my mind that this bogey, or rather this charge—for it is not exactly a bogey by which we solve this financial difficulty, has been more or less penetrating the minds of honorable members, and led them astray, in the consideration of this great question of debts and railways. I shall certainly oppose that clause as it stands. I shall not ask for the insertion of a provision requiring the consent of each state with the idea that the debts of one state will be taken over, and not the debts of the others, because I think the practical effect would be that unless a Federal Treasurer could get all the states to agree he would not touch the debts at all.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

One state out of eleven or twelve could block the whole thing.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I cannot imagine that sort of thing. I cannot imagine that any fair scheme drawn up in regard to these colonies will be blocked by any one state unless it is very unfair to that state; and as I think that the questions of railways and debts are closely intertwined, I believe it is possible that some general scheme as to the debts and railways may be unfair to one colony, and that colony will be perfectly justified in not agreeing to it when its peculiar position is understood.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The relative values of all the debts can be easily ascertained.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I do not say for one moment that you cannot have a scheme. There is no matter in connexion with the development of our Commonwealth that cannot to a certain extent be solved by reasonable men, by reasonable compromise. We are not here to judge a question of 6s. 8d. one way or the other. I do not think I need take up the time of the committee any longer. I do not honestly think that this financial debate, after having had the report of this committee, should be very long. The only question which is new is the question of Western Australia. Every other matter has been debated and argued time after time, and it seems to me that after free and liberal discussion has taken place, and nobody of course ought to be gagged, we ought to come to a vote on these proposals as the result of the best efforts of the best men we have been able to get together for that purpose. If these men fail, then the Convention fails. It seems to me that unless there is some matter of vital principle which would in the opinion of an honorable member practically ruin the chances of the Constitution before the people of his colony we have a right to take this scheme almost in its entirety. The question of Western Australia is new, and it ought to be thoroughly thrashed out. The question of Tasmania arises, and so far as I am concerned I shall be glad to see anything done that can get that colony out of its difficulties, because I can clearly see, from the papers that were distributed by Sir Philip Fysh, that the margin on which they have to work is the smallest possible. They have strained direct taxation in that young country to the very utmost. There is only a certain limit to Customs, because if you attempt to go beyond a certain limit you destroy your own efforts. If we have a colony in which a sum of £50,000 or £100,000 is a matter of vital concern to its statesmen, then I think we ought to consider that colony of 150,000 persons in the midst of a community of 3,500,000 persons. There must be generosity in this Convention, and there must be generosity in the Federal Parliament. We do not deal on strict lines with anything in our local Government. We do not decide, if a breakwater is wanted at the mouth of a river, whether the whole of the people in that locality could not be bought out for the price of the breakwater. We say-

"There is a certain necessity to protect the people of that part of the colony; we trust to the future growth and development of things, and we will deal generously and freely, without any consideration of mere paltry, pounds and shillings." The same principle must actuate us in this financial affair. Even if this scheme bristled with more objections and greater injustice than it does, we should accept it if it is the only possible thing to do. The Federal Parliament must deal with the finances of the future on broad and liberal lines. We must recollect that so far as finance is concerned, it is practically a unification of this young empire. And, therefore, feeling as I do that the men who represent us will be practically ourselves, that this feeling for federation, for loyalty to all parts of Australia, for generous treatment of one by the other, is growing rapidly and surely in our midst, I leave the whole matter, as it had been arranged here, with confidence to the Federal Parliament.

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania).

The very kind expressions of opinion which have been offered by the two representatives of New South Wales (Mr. Reid and Mr. McMillan) lead me, as a Tasmanian, to express the hope that the financial proposals, as they now come from the Finance Committee, may receive a very cordial reception from the Convention. Whatever serious doubts may have been on my mind while sitting on the various Finance Committees, in respect to the possible position of Tasmania, and the federal financial position, they may be somewhat removed if the spirit which has actuated the speakers this morning is moving all the members of the Convention. Therefore with the full hope, when we find Western Australia being dealt with so liberally under these proposals, that wherever necessity may be shown to arise, similar sympathy will be expressed and shown in a practical spirit, I am disposed to accept the proposals of the Finance Committee, and to believe that they have done a good work, and that as a whole the proposals can hardly be improved upon by the Convention. I would like to call the attention of honorable members to the history, short though it may be, of the Finance Committee of each Convention. When their memories are refreshed as to what was done in Sydney in 1891, at Adelaide in 1897, at Sydney in 1897, and in Melbourne in 1898, in respect to the difficulties which confronted the Finance Committees, and which I believe are now overcome in these proposals, I believe the Convention will arrive at the conclusion that the alternative of those proposals cannot be accepted. The Finance Committee of 1891, after many sittings, proposed that the system of interstate accounts should be lasting, and it also purposed to charge the whole of the expenditures of the Commonwealth against the various states in the proportion in which the expenditures were made within the states. It will be in the recollection of those who attended the Convention of 1891, and of those who have made themselves familiar with the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, that the Convention altered these financial proposals, and made the expenditure chargeable per capita. The inequality or inequity of such a proposal has been exposed by Sir Samuel Griffith and others on many occasions. It possibly was one of the reasons why the financial proposals of 1891 did not find that acceptance which some of us hoped they would find. Then, after some years of experience, the press having kept us alive to the inequity of the proposals of 1891, we met at Adelaide. I am not revealing secrets when I say that day after day, for seven days, some twenty gentlemen sat round the finance table while proposals were made, and yet day after day the report of our chairman had to be relegated to the waste-paper basket. After seven days again the Finance Committee came to the conclusion that the counting house must be brought in, and that there was no equitable solution of the financial difficulty excepting that associated with inter-state accounts. The proposals of the committee came before the Convention, and the then Premier of New South Wales, although himself a party to the proposals, and Mr. McMillan, although the chairman of the Finance Committee, said that, while they could not get rid of the system of inter-state accounts, they were not at all in love with it. Mr. Reid, at the Convention, made a suggestion that the difficulty might be overcome by keeping accounts for a certain period and then attempting to adjust the various proposals by a sliding scale for five years. We have tested that plan. It has been tested by the press, and by various of our statisticians, and Treasurers, and has been found wanting. The Finance Committee were unable to face the finance difficulty at Sydney, but here we have sat for many days, and after all the experience of the last five years, with the information furnished by our statisticians before us, we have again been forced back to the original proposal that the counting-house shall come in and that interstate accounts shall be kept. The inter-state accounts are only to be kept for a period, and it appears to the Finance Committee that there is no other way of equitably solving this problem. The keeping of accounts for five years will give to the Federal Executive and to the Federal Parliament an index of what each state has been contributing during each year, and will enable the Federal Parliament to discharge the very onerous duty that is imposed upon them of thereafter finding some other equitable means of distribution. I notice that Mr Lyne strongly objects to the system of accounts, but I would ask him, as the Convention will no doubt ask itself, what is the alternative? The only alternative is the per capita distribution of all our revenue and all our expenditure. There are honorable members present whose opinion was strongly expressed at the meetings of the Finance Committee that we were not actuated by a federal spirit if we were not prepared to agree to a distribution of revenue per capita. But the difficulties of that proposal will be seen by any one who has given consideration to the abnormal conditions of finance in Western Australia, where at the present time £6 per head is collected from Customs, or to the extraordinary position in New South Wales, where from 20s. to 25s. per head covers the Customs revenue. In Tasmania the average is 40s.; in South Australia it is somewhat less; and in Queensland it is 56s. It must be apparent from these facts that a uniform Tariff collected and paid into the one pocket—the Federal Treasury—cannot equitably be divided per capita over the whole of the Commonwealth.

Mr. LYNE. -

The difference is owing to the difference in the Tariff.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

The honorable member is mistaken. Special circumstances very materially affect the amount contributed per head. That has been shown in a small degree with respect to narcotics, spirits, and tea and sugar, figures having been worked out which give the per capita contribution. In Western Australia and in Queensland there is a larger proportion of men-folk than in the other colonies, and we know they are the principal consumers, and that they contribute most to our Customs revenue so far as narcotics, spirits, tea, and sugar are concerned. The revenue from these articles throughout all Australia comes ad valorem goods, irrespective of the maximum specific duties on other goods.

Mr. LYNE. -

The height of the duty makes some difference.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Yes; but, as I have explained, the amount collected per head is in proportion to the number of men-folk in the district where you levy and collect your duties. It will be seen, therefore, that we have been driven back to the accounts system. I regret it, although this is the system that I have advocated consistently from the beginning. I have sat upon the various Finance Committees, and I have always taken the view that the Convention could only overcome this difficulty by adopting, at any rate for a period, the accounts system. I should be delighted if some honorable member could propose some other scheme that would be equitable. I have not been able to discover any other myself, nor has any other been suggested to me. By the proposals made by the Finance Committee we shall get rid of this system of keeping accounts in five years, and it will then be left to the Federal Parliament to deal equitably with the states. No provision is made that the Federal Parliament shall thereafter distribute the revenue per capita. The Federal Parliament will have to exercise its own judgment, and, seeing that it will be composed of members elected from the various states, we may say that in trusting this matter to it we shall simply be trusting ourselves. The clause with reference to the imposition of uniform duties is left intact, because the foundation of our Federation to the commercial men of the colonies is commercial unity. They desire that trade throughout the whole of the colonies should as speedily as possible be free. Without freedom of trade such a Federation fails in one of its first and most essential conditions. We have been struggling against each other for a great number of years, and it has been very truly said of us that we have been seven nurseries of petty strife. Nothing has led to more ill-feeling between us than the knowledge that, whilst we have been professedly inviting the keenest competition, we have been interposing barriers against any interchange of trade. Under this Federation we shall get rid of all our Border Tariffs in two years. In the meantime, the revenue will be collected by the Federal Executive, and the surplus returned to each state will be in proportion to the amount collected. What system could be more equitable? What more could any state desire than that it should practically be left as it is? For two years, instead of paying the revenue into our own exchequer, we shall pay it into the Federal Exchequer, and it will be returned to us less the amount expended in its collection. The result will be that each state will be left in the position it is in at the present time. No Treasurer will have any occasion to complain. He will not lose or gain, but he will lose or gain in two other respects. It is in regard to these two features of the proposals that are made by the Finance Committee that the Treasurer of each state will have to consider in what way his particular state will be affected, and in what way he can make up any deficiency that may arise. The deficiency will be caused first by reason of the state contribution to the new or original expenditure that will be incurred of about £300,000; and, secondly, by reason of the new or original expenditure which will be incurred in order to make good to Western Australia any loss that she may sustain under the arrangement now suggested. The cost of federation to the various states will, therefore, be £400,000 a year. But we must not lose sight of the other point, which each of us will have to consider seriously, that is, how far our state revenues will be affected by intercolonial free-trade. The movement of intercolonial trade has been very strange during the last five years. We have a record of the movement of that trade in 1890, which was supplied to the Convention in Sydney in 1891. That showed that there was about £850,000 of duty per annum collected by the various states upon colonial products, of which £850,000 nearly £300,000 was upon sugar, the product of Queensland. But the movement to which I was about to refer was that which affects Western Australia. Her share of duty out of the £850,000, collected within her borders on intercolonial products within that year, amounted to £90,000. Within two years we find that she was collecting £180,000 upon the same necessaries of life; and in 1896-7 we now have in formation supplied by the Statistician of Western Australia pointing out that her collection of duty upon intercolonial products amounted to £380,000 a year, or about 35 per cent. of her Customs revenue. These are the items which will concern every state Treasurer. Tasmania will have to bear her share of £40,000, and a matter of very serious consideration it will be, plus the extra expenditure to which I have already referred. Fortunately, under the present proposals of the Finance Committee, we get rid of a very serious contribution which, under the existing Bill, we should have to pay; that is, the difference between our state expenditure on the various services transferred and the Commonwealth expenditure when it will be thrown into a _per capita_ distribution. We were left, unfortunately, in the position of losing about £60,000 a year by that transfer. Now, under the more equitable proposals at the present time-That is: the proposal first to last for two years, and then for five years more, under the system of bookkeeping we shall certainly be in a better position as regards that £60,000, but we shall still stand in an unfortunate position, although not so serious as anticipated by Mr. Coghlan in his papers. The serious difficulty will confront the Treasurer of Tasmania, whoever he may be, of making good the large amount of deficiency, first in paying the _per capita_ share of the new expenditure, and second, the loss on the Tariff on account of intercolonial freetrade. Having got rid of the first two years, I will presume that the Federal Parliament shall have enacted a uniform Tariff, a presumption which I suppose I may take for granted will not be questioned. Although you may lay the duty upon the Federal Parliament of imposing this uniform Tariff it possibly might fail, but we have to ask ourselves is it likely that it will fail? When we know that its failure to impose a uniform Tariff will not only leave it high and dry without any revenue but will also leave all the other states of Australia without any Customs revenue, it must be apparent that, although we cannot enforce this responsibility on the Federal Executive, yet it is enforced by reason of the magnitude of the questions involved in the event of their failure. Seeing that those who will be elected hereafter to the Federal Parliament will be representatives of the people, knowing the necessities of each state, we can certainly trust the Federal Parliament to secure within two years the necessary uniform Tariff. I have no doubt upon the matter myself, and I should not hesitate to recommend those who may look to me for advice in a matter of this kind to accept under these circumstances whatever the responsibility may be of going into a Federation with the very extreme view that there is just a possibility of the Federal Parliament not agreeing to a Federal Tariff within two years. We shall assume, therefore, that the Tariff has been framed; thereafter for five years the revenue will be collected throughout the states on this new and uniform Tariff giving intercolonial free trade, and I think very probably giving to the states a maintenance, as nearly as possible, of the same average amount of duty which we are collecting at the present moment. It may be premature to speculate upon possibilities, but for all that, I think that it is our duty to look to possibilities, and when I know that there are Western Australia, South Australia, Tasmania, and Victoria, which are sure to be among the federated states, all of them having an absolute necessity for the full amount of revenue which they are receiving at the present time, I shall assume that if there be one state, which is desirous of cutting down the revenue to a very small sum that that one state will not prevail against the absolute necessities of the great number of states who, in fact, would not only be embarrassed, but rendered insolvent, by the fact that the revenue was not maintained by means of a good revenue Tariff—a Tariff for revenue purposes, but not for protective purposes. I will not import the question of protection into the debate; it is quite out of the question; but, for revenue purposes, the Federal Parliament will find it absolutely necessary to raise some such amount as we are finding for ourselves at present, or many of us will be left in the very serious predicament of not being able to pay our way. We shall, therefore, during those five years receive back just in the same proportion as we pay, and we continue the equity of the system to which I have referred already. We ask nothing from New South Wales or any more wealthy state. Victoria in her need asked nothing. We recognise to the full that one of the bases of our negotiations here is the principle laid down in the resolutions first moved by our leader that there shall be no surrender by any one of any right, and I presume that that meant that we are not asking any state to surrender any revenue which it may receive. Therefore that is one of the bases of our negotiations. Neither Tasmania nor any one else desires New South Wales to surrender anything. We say deliberately that New South Wales shall benefit to the amount of every penny which she collects within her own borders, and we shall take care of her even outside of her own borders if we can. Then there is the proposal which I think my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan) misunderstood. Clause 89 goes further to my mind than he explained. It is intended to add to clause 89 the new paragraph which is in print. Before uniform duties of customs have been imposed, if goods are exported into another colony, if they have paid nothing, say, in New South Wales, having been imported under her free-trade Tariff this year, and next year the uniform Tariff of the Commonwealth imposes a 20 per cent. duty, and those goods are sent down to Tasmania, Tasmania will collect 20 per cent. thereon. If they be goods which came into Victoria, and paid 10 per cent. duty this year, under the Commonwealth they will be responsible for 15 per cent. duty; then being shipped to Tasmania for home consumption the merchant importing them into Tasmania will have to pay 5 per cent. duty. First, I shall presume that every state Treasurer will, within the two years whilst the merchants and importers are waiting for the coming excitement of the Federal Commonwealth Tariff, take care to protect the revenue in some way, because unless the state Treasurer does, within six months of the coming into operation of the uniform Tariff, which may be 20 per cent. ad valorem, protect the state revenue by the imposition of some duty which he thinks will be closely allied to that which will be the federal duty, we shall find ourselves in this position. The merchants of Australia will load up the markets very considerably in a particular year when a low duty prevails, as in Victoria on some articles which are to be manufactured, and when there is no duty in free-trade New South Wales. Then the Federal Tariff for the first year will be penalized to that extent. That is so serious a point that I fancy the Treasurers themselves will bear it in mind. Take New South Wales, for example. The merchants there have loaded their stocks very heavily this year under the free-trade Tariff; when those goods are exported, they will be subjected to the Commonwealth Tariff.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
That will only apply to a few commodities.
Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
It will apply very largely to everything in the shape of ad valorem duties; they will all be subject to variations of that kind. I know, if I were in trade, I should load up in New South Wales very considerably with all those goods which are free, because I would be quite sure that they could not remain free under the Federal Tariff.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Surely the honorable member would not do such an improper thing?
Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
I would; and any mercantile man would be a fool if he did not do so.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You would load up our place with sugar.
Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
Very naturally that would be done when one might be perfectly sure that the duty on sugar will be increased from £3 to £6 per ton.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Both sugar and tea.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
Certainly; the right honorable member has supplied the very example I wanted. The merchants there knowing that sugar is an article which must be more heavily taxed hereafter, would be certain in Western Australia to bring in a six months, if not a twelve months supply, under the low Tariff.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
The honorable member seems to know all about it.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
I know all about it, just as my honorable friend does. It is one of those profits in trade to which all traders are entitled, and it frequently does very little more than equalize the losses which are made when Tariffs are reduced. This clause will not only meet that purpose, but it was designed to meet another purpose, and I hope that the Right Hon. Sir George Turner and the honorable member (Mr. Holder) will follow me. This clause was designed to meet another purpose, and, although it is not fully expressed, I am going, when we come to consider the clause - having previously consulted some members of the Finance Committee - to move the insertion of certain words which will make it meet that other purpose. We have provided for five years' bookkeeping with respect to all goods entering into one colony, where the duty is paid, and finally passing into another colony for consumption, so that the latter colony, where the goods are consumed, shall receive the credit for the customs paid on those goods, even though it was paid in another country. That is a very necessary provision. But there is no provision as far as this particular class of goods is concerned. Therefore, if the goods are subject to a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem under the Commonwealth Tariff, and they have only paid 10 per cent. on importation into New South Wales, for example, when they are sent to Tasmania for consumption, only 10 per cent. is to be collected on them in Tasmania, which colony will, of course, be entitled to the other 10 per cent. Now, some provision must be made in that clause to meet that particular purpose, because that is to be with us the purpose of the clause more than anything else. There are one or two other points on which I might speak; but I will limit my remarks to the question with respect to Western Australia, because we shall have opportunities in connexion with each clause of discussing their special necessities and their special provisions. I think, therefore, I will confine myself to clause 92, which provides for the special arrangement with Western Australia. Sir John Forrest will be able to state his own case, on the part of that colony, and I therefore need not espouse his cause, but will content myself with speaking generally as to the case of the states which may be seriously injured in their revenue by reason of intercolonial free-trade. It will remain for the Convention to give its very serious consideration under this clause to the desirability of either inserting "Tasmania" or of acting under the suggestion of Mr. Reid, and making some other special provision for that colony.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Would it not satisfy you if we put Tasmania on the same footing as Western Australia?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

It is not for me or for the representatives of Tasmania to say what will satisfy that colony. It is utterly impossible for any of us to gauge the possibilities of the changes which will take place when we have free-trade throughout the colonies.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I am only speaking of the Constitution we are framing now.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Well, personally, I am so enamoured of the one great purpose which we have in view, which is to secure union and free commerce in these colonies, that I would recommend almost any reasonable sacrifice to the people whom I represent.

Mr. FRASER. -

That is the right spirit.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

And that is the spirit I find existing amongst all the Tasmanian members of this Convention. We will all strive to our utmost to induce the people of Tasmania to come into the Federation-I must not say at any price, that would not do, but if it is at all possible. And even if we have to make some sacrifices, I believe that our losses will be made good in some other way. That is the spirit in which I now address the Convention, and, therefore, I support the proposal with respect to the special treatment of Western Australia. It would be a thousand pities if we had to wait for some later opportunity for the fullest development of this Commonwealth. It is a thousand pities that Queensland is not immediately to be one of us. I think that Western Australia, if we agree to this proposal, ought to become one of us, and I should like my honorable friend (Mr. Lyne) to follow the observations I am about to make with regard to that provision, because I feel that a few words of explanation, in addition to those which have already been given, may elucidate what seems to Mr. Lyne to be a complex piece of machinery, but which Mr. McMillan accepts as an arrangement which is as clear as could possibly be made between commercial men. In Western Australia a certain Tariff is in existence prior to the establishment of the Commonwealth and the introduction of its uniform Tariff. The Tariff of Western Australia yields a certain amount of revenue. It includes duties on butter, cheese, bacon, chaff, and potatoes coming from the other colonies. Taking the Customs revenue of Western Australia for 1896 as the basis, that colony will lose, under the first year of the uniform Tariff—assuming that all duties on articles of intercolonial produce are abolished—no less than £389,000. The proposal is that in each of the five years following the establishment of a uniform Tariff a statement will be made up to show what under her own Tariff Western Australia would have received in customs dues, and the difference between the two sums is the amount she would lose by the adoption of the Commonwealth Tariff. Now, what are we going to do to requite Western Australia in respect of that loss? We make up a similar account in respect of each of the states, and throw all the accounts into one, from which we find that all the losing states, including Western Australia, have lost a certain amount of revenue by reason of this new Tariff. Then we ascertain the difference between the two, and whatever that amount is, is due from the Commonwealth to Western Australia.

Mr. LYNE. -

But they all have to lose something.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Let me follow that out. Western Australia will not lose, in my opinion, a very considerable amount, because she admits her imported machinery, her tea, her sugar, and various other important articles at present duty free.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

She will lose nothing that intercolonial free-trade will not make up for.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

None of the colonies can presume to expect that, under the uniform Tariff of the Commonwealth, they will import machinery, tea, sugar, and various other important articles free, as is at present done in Western Australia. And if Victoria, Tasmania, and Queensland only imposed duties of 12 1/2 per cent. ad valorem, like Western Australia, on many other imports, it would land all those colonies in bankruptcy—all except New South Wales. Of course, as importation is increased consequent on lower duties the revenue would increase, but it would take some considerable time to restore the equilibrium in that way, and in the meantime all the colonies except New South Wales would be landed in bankruptcy. I certainly believe that low duties, in the long run, frequently produce as much or more revenue than higher duties, but while the transition is taking place we should suffer from loss of revenue. As the Treasurer of one of these colonies, I believe that for that period we must be protected, and, therefore, we provide that the proportionate loss of revenue from customs duties, consequent on the introduction of the uniform Tariff and intercolonial free-trade, sustained by Western Australia shall be made good by the Commonwealth. Now, I do not believe that Western Australia will lose £389,000 through the introduction of intercolonial free-trade, because part of her loss will be made good by the imposition of duties on goods at present admitted free. It is more likely that the amount which the Commonwealth will have to provide for Western Australia will be something like £100,000. But whatever the result may be, Western Australia will have this satisfaction: That she is not to be placed, under federation, for the first five years in a worse position as regards Customs revenue than she is at the present time.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No; but she will not be put in a worse position than any other colony joining the Federation.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

But Western Australia will get secured to it the same amount of Customs revenue as it now enjoys, or rather as it would then enjoy if its own Tariff had continued in operation instead of the uniform Tariff of the Commonwealth being brought into existence.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Oh, no.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Western Australia is to receive from the Commonwealth the difference between the revenue she actually obtains under the uniform Tariff after federation, and the amount she would have received from the same importations had her own Tariff continued in operation. I believe that freedom of trade between the colonies will prove to be so advantageous in a short time, that the people of Tasmania, and of the other colonies, recognising its benefits, will be glad that they have joined the Federation, and will not have cause to think that they have paid more than a reasonable sum for those advantages. There are only one or two other points I desire to comment on. There is one point which was mentioned by Mr. Lyne, and another which was put by Mr. Reid, that ought to be set right. We have certainly failed to continue the provisions with respect to the limitation of expenditure, and with respect to the guarantee of an annual surplus. Now, I corrected Mr. Lyne when he was speaking by interjecting that the proposal to secure that surplus was not mine. That proposal, and a very good proposal it is too, came from the Premier of Victoria. It seemed to me to be a very necessary proposal.

Mr. LYNE. -
You started it.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
I did not start it, but never mind, I am acknowledging that it is a good proposal. Still, with later experience and more light we may surely learn wisdom as we proceed, and I think that we have learnt this much: That if South Australia, Victoria, Western Australia, and Tasmania must maintain, in order to continue their solvency, a revenue pretty nearly equal to that which they receive at present—and I believe that those states will have in their own hands the power to compel the Federal Executive to make such proposals to the Federal Parliament as will secure to them such a revenue—then no Federal Treasurer dare show his face in Parliament with a Tariff which will not take into consideration the necessities of the various states. It has been well put by Mr. McMillan that the Treasurer of the Federation will be perpetually in touch with the state Treasurers.

Mr. FRASER. -
He ought to be.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
He will thereby be enabled to frame his proposals according to the necessities of the case, and he will have to do so, because he will be brought face to face with the representatives of the states in the Federal Parliament. Therefore, the Federal Executive may be relied on to produce before Parliament a Budget which will protect the solvency of the various states. I shall not be led into discussing the very important subject with which Mr. McMillan closed his remarks, namely, the question of taking over the debts of the colonies. I asked the Finance Committee to consider a clause dealing with that subject, but I was properly persuaded by them that it would be better to have the subject dealt with in the Convention. The Finance Committee have, therefore, not further considered that proposal. I observe that Mr. Glynn has a very similar proposal already in print, and when I have compared my proposal with his I shall either give notice myself of a fresh proposal with respect to the question of the debts of the colonies, or support Mr. Glynn's, its purpose being that the Federal Parliament may take over those debts—that we shall embrace in the contract between the states and the Commonwealth a condition that the Commonwealth shall take over the whole of the debts of the colonies joining the Federation.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
Will not the bond-holders get the benefit of that arrangement?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
I am quite prepared to discuss that point, although I do not wish to enter upon the question now, but I will content myself with the remark that, whatever benefit may accrue to the bond-holders in consequence of the Commonwealth taking over the debts of the colonies, there will be an equal benefit to the colonies themselves.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We can discuss that question by-and-by.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
With these remarks I will resume my seat, cordially indorsing what has been done, recommending it to the Convention as, I think, the only alternative to which we have found no other during the past six years while we have had this matter before the people. No one has yet found an alternative which will be satisfactory to the greater number of the people. We shall have dissatisfaction with these proposals expressed

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I am somewhat surprised at the apparently perfect unanimity among members of the Convention with regard to the scheme which has been submitted by the Finance Committee. Probably that may be taken as a very high compliment to the work performed by that committee, but it must be surprising, when we recollect that the scheme now brought forward is practically the scheme which was submitted by the Finance Committee in Adelaide, and which was quietly put under the table. The only difference between these schemes, so far as the question of distributing the surplus is concerned, is that at Adelaide we determined that at the end of five years we would follow the per capita mode of distribution, while here we leave the mode of distribution absolutely in the hands of the Federal Parliament. Now, sir, there appear to me to be one or two difficulties in connexion with this proposed scheme which we ought to carefully and thoroughly investigate before we finally approve of and accept it. One difficulty is, that under this scheme we leave the state Treasuries absolutely at the mercy of the Federal Parliament. We make no provision whatever to return to the states either a fixed sum, or a proportion of the revenue which has to be collected, and, while no doubt among ourselves it is well to say-and it is probably true that the Federal Parliament will not take any steps or impose any Tariff which will bring in such a low amount as to risk the solvency of any of the states, it may be somewhat difficult to impress that fact on the minds of the people who hereafter will have to give their vote, "Yes" or "No," with regard to this measure. It is perfectly clear to us that the Federal Parliament must make the states safe otherwise, it will endanger the existence of the Federation itself. We know that; and, if this scheme be adopted, we will have to endeavour to impress, that fact as strongly as we possibly can on the minds of the people in the various states. But I would have liked, for the sake of the people themselves, so that they might have had the knowledge that for five years, at all events, their state Treasurer could not be put in a difficult position-I would have liked to have seen some provision in this Constitution which would have required the Federal Parliament to so frame the Tariff, to so limit the expenditure, and to so collect the money, as to give back to the various states practically what they are now receiving. We cannot, and must not, conceal from ourselves that unless that be done, the state Treasurers will be placed in a very difficult and very awkward position. It has been said before, and it will bear repeating, that in nearly all the colonies, Western Australia and New South Wales excepted, taxation has gone almost to the full length that it is possible for the Treasurers in the colonies to carry taxation; and, if there are to be heavy deficiencies in the Treasury accounts, then I, for one, know of no means by which we in Victoria would be able to raise the necessary amount of money, save and except, we get permission, which was refused us some little time ago, to impose a pretty heavy land tax, to enable us to bring in the amount. Then with regard to the amounts which will have to be raised by this Federal Tariff. At the present time we have in each of the colonies a Tariff suiting our own requirements. New South Wales has merely a revenue Tariff. We, in Victoria, have what we believe to be, a scientific Tariff for our protective purposes, with an immense free list. Western Australia, while aiming somewhat at protection, has practically a revenue Tariff; other colonies have varying Tariffs, under which they raise different amounts per head of the population. I think the members of the Convention will agree with me, that the Federal Parliament will be bound to return to the states an amount equal to what they are now collecting. But, unfortunately, that is not a uniform amount. It is an amount varying in every state, and our Tariff is to be a uniform Tariff. If we so base that Tariff as to be able to return to the state with the greatest consuming power the amount that it is collecting at the present time, we will leave the state with the least consuming power in the position that it will not be able to get back nearly the amount it is collecting at present. If we follow the other course, and if we so impose the Tariff as to give the state with the least consuming power an amount equal to what it is collecting now, we will give to the states with greater consuming powers a large surplus-collected in all probability from their people which they will have a difficulty in expending unless they enter upon extravagant works. So that we must not forget the fact that the mere statement that we are to impose a uniform Tariff will not end our difficulties, because that Tariff will be very strangely constructed if it will be such as to give back to each colony what they are receiving now. It must give back to some of them far more than they are collecting at present, and give back to others far less than they are collecting. I do not know that, in this Convention, we can possibly deal-with that difficulty; but it does come before us when we are considering the question as to whether we ought or ought not, for a period of five years, to make some provision by which a certain amount, at all events, would be returned to each of the states, so that the Treasurers and the people of the states might know that no further claims for taxation would be made upon them. We cannot overlook the fact that we have to bear a portion of the extra expenditure, amounting to some £300,000 odd, and that also, whether it be a saving to the people or not, the Treasurer of the state will lose the amount of the intercolonial duties. To us, in Victoria, those duties-including the duty on sugar from Queensland-come to £300,000. If we are to lose that £300,000, or a considerable portion of it, and if we are to find our share-£100,000 or £110,000-of the federal expenditure, we will have to raise by some means, unless we can get it from the Federal Tariff, a sum of probably £450,000. Of course, I always look forward to Queensland coming into the Federation.

Mr. WALKER. -

Will there not be an excise duty on sugar?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That we do not know, but, even if so, we will have to raise £300,000, and it will be nearly as difficult to raise that amount as to raise £400,000. Therefore, I should be glad if it were at all possible for us to make some provision in this Constitution which would compel the Federal Parliament to so impose the Federal Tariff as to bring in sufficient money to give to each of the states the full amount they are collecting at the present time, thus providing for the loss of intercolonial duties, and leaving them (as I think we might fairly leave them) to pay their fair share of the expenditure. Mr. McMillan has raised some difficulty with regard to the five years fixed in this proposal for the purpose of bookkeeping. I object strongly, and always have done, to any system of bookkeeping in connexion with the Federation, because we cannot conceal from ourselves the fact that that to a great extent will postpone the full benefits to be derived from a uniform Tariff and intercolonial free-trade. I would much prefer to see the period of five years considerably reduced. If we are to have bookkeeping at all I would like to see the period limited to a much shorter time. But when that was mentioned to our friends from New South Wales, they objected that unless the people of New South Wales knew that for a definite period this system of bookkeeping would be carried out, that definite period being not less than five years, great difficulty would arise in inducing those people to vote for the scheme. Therefore, we were practically-in this matter as in regard to other matters also-forced to agree to a compromise suggested by the representatives of New South Wales. Mr. McMillan also says that clause 89 will be useless. I do not know whether he is referring to the part of the clause which provides that where goods have been imported into one colony before the imposition of uniform duties, and are exported to another within two years after the imposition of such duties, duty is to be charged when the goods are landed in the other colony; because I do not know that that clause will be either useless or unworkable.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I did not say that it would be useless. I said it would be difficult to carry it out.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It will be somewhat difficult, but at the same time I believe that we must have some such provision.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I do not deny that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Because if we do not have that provision goods will be imported into New South Wales and then exported to the other colonies, and the duties on them will be lost altogether. We know very well that many people consider that if they are "getting at" the Customs they are not committing any very great crime; but I think that the Federal Parliament will be able to model its law with regard to the Federal Tariff so as to impose some severe punishment if persons are found out in endeavouring to annul this provision. It is an absolutely necessary one in the interests of the Commonwealth's finances, and also in the interests of those colonies where manufactories have been established for some considerable time. Now, my great difficulty in connexion with these financial schemes is this-I feel that we are entering into a federation, and that as soon as we have imposed a uniform Tariff that federation should be absolutely complete. To be absolutely complete, it appears to me that we should have one purse, and one purse only, and that the proper course to pursue is to say that when we have imposed a uniform Tariff all our expenditure should be on a per capita basis, and that our balances, whatever they be, should be distributed also on that basis. We should have no bookkeeping in any shape or form, but immediately the uniform Tariff came into operation that particular division of the funds should also come into operation, in order that we may have a complete federation. But there again we meet with the difficulty arising in New South Wales.

Mr. WALKER. - And in Western Australia.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - Western Australia I have always admitted to be in an abnormal position, and it must be dealt with separately from the other colonies. I never take Western Australia into consideration in dealing with any question with regard to finance, because I admit that it is in such a position that it must have separate treatment. But I do not agree that New South Wales is in a separate position to anything like the extent that Western Australia is. But in order to assist that colony I agreed in Adelaide to a sliding scale, because gradually that would work out any anomalies which might possibly exist. I believe that for a little while after the imposition of the uniform Tariff, New South Wales may, perhaps, contribute a little more per capita than the other colonies would, but that after a year, or a couple of years, the difference would cease; and I agreed, by way of compromise, to a period of five years, which I thought was ample for all the requirements of New South Wales.

Mr. WALKER. - Suppose Queensland came into the Federation, how would she stand on a per capita basis?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - I have never closely investigated the case of Queensland, but I dare say that the uniform Tariff would work out almost the same in that colony.

Mr. WALKER. - Queensland gets about £3 10s. per head per year.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - That depends on the nature of the Tariff. A Tariff is framed to suit the requirements of a colony. We, in Victoria, could frame a Tariff that would give us more than we now collect, but it does not suit our policy to do so. No doubt, the Queensland Tariff is framed to collect as much revenue as possible, and not to encourage, as we do in Victoria, the protected industries of the colony. I fail to see how, when we have established a uniform Tariff, any great difference in the consuming power of the people can exist, or how there can be any great difference in the amount which would be paid in each colony under the uniform Tariff. With regard to New South Wales, although I admit that she might for a time pay a little more per head than we should in Victoria, that would be almost counter-balanced, and New South Wales would make it up by having her expenditure distributed on a per capita basis. Sir Philip Fysh has pointed out that very large saper capita basis, instead of with the actual figures of the colony’s expenditure.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is it larger than that of the other colonies?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes, I think New South Wales would save considerably over £100,000 a year by distributing her expenditure on a per capita basis instead of as at present, because New South Wales has a heavy expenditure in connexion with her post-office and her defences. Figures were quoted—I do not intend to use any here to-day—by various members who spoke in Sydney, and other figures appear in statistics which have been circulated, which show that if you take a number of items, such as spirits, narcotics, tea, coffee, and similar articles, you will find that the consuming power in Victoria is greater, perhaps, than in New South Wales; and I believe that if you work the matter out you will find that there is very little to choose between the two colonies. Now, I would have liked, if it were possible, to have had the whole matter treated on a per capita basis. But I feel sure, from the expressions of opinion given by various members of the Convention, that I could not carry any such proposal as that without injuring the cause of federation. But, as the matter now stands, we propose to leave for a period of five years this bookkeeping system. I do not think it is possible under that system to trace all the goods passing from one colony into another. It seems to me that it is utterly impracticable to do anything of that kind. But an Sydney and Melbourne are distributing centres, that will rather act to the benefit of New South Wales and Victoria, and detrimentally to those colonies which take goods from us, because the duties will, in all probability, be credited to these colonies, instead of to the colonies in which the goods are actually consumed. A system might be adopted by which you might put a check upon all the goods imported, but to say that any system of bookkeeping which the Federal Parliament may adopt will enable you to trace all the bulk goods and the broken goods that might and will pass from one colony to another, seems to me to be utterly impossible. So that now we propose to adopt for five years a bookkeeping system, under which each colony will get a return of its supposed collections after being debited with its actual expenditure and its per capita proportion of the expenditure of the Commonwealth. We are leaving it absolutely entirely to the Federal Parliament to say how much that body will collect. We place no restrictions upon it. The Federal Parliament may, if it think fit, collect simply enough to pay its own working expenses, and leave to the states the task of raising the rest. We then leave to them absolutely and uncontrolled the amount of the expenditure they will incur; and by that means we leave the states absolutely at the mercy of the Federal Parliament, as to what return they will get year by year on giving up the most elastic source of their revenue. We have to do that under this proposed system. The question is whether we are justified in doing that, and if we are, whether we shall be able to sufficiently explain the matter to the people of our various colonies as to induce them to see it in the light in which we see it. There is no provision in this Constitution with regard to drawbacks, but I assume that that will be a matter entirely within the power of the Federal Parliament when passing the Federal Tariff, because I think it will be found that there will be some necessity for a system of drawbacks when goods are passing from one colony to another. Another matter is with regard to bounties, and this is a somewhat serious question for the colony of Victoria. We are told that if we enter into this Federation no colony shall in the future be at liberty to give any bounty for any purpose unless the agreement to do so be entered into prior to the 30th June of this year. I should be very glad if it were at all possible to have a provision made leaving it to the states, at all events, for certain purposes—agriculture, dairying, and similar purposes—to have power to give these bounties. We know that, in the past, the giving of bounties in the different colonies has had the result of establishing a profitable trade with the old country, and we know that it will be very difficult to persuade the Federal Parliament to grant these bounties, which must be uniform throughout the whole of the Commonwealth. While I see that there is a slight danger that, by granting bounties, We might to some extent take away the benefits of intercolonial free-trade, I believe, nevertheless, that we should still continue to give the colonies power to grant what I believe to be a necessary assistance for the development of many of our industries, at the same time giving the Federal Parliament control in order to prevent a colony from passing any law or granting any bounty which might be inimical to the interests of intercolonial free-trade. I shall be perfectly prepared to accept some proposal such as that, because I do not think any colony would desire to have the power to grant bounties for improper purposes; and I think that if we take away, as it is proposed under this Constitution to take away, the power of granting bounties at all, you will be doing a great injustice to some of the colonies, and to the export trades which they have been building up for the last few years. The committee have endeavoured to deal fairly and equitably with the colony of Western Australia. The proposal of the Finance Committee, as it had been already explained, is that we should by some means endeavour to ascertain what that colony will lose by the removal of intercolonial duties and by the changes in the Tariff, and that we should compare that loss with the losses of the other colonies, and then repay to Western Australia whatever loss she may sustain over and above the average loss of the other colonies. The amount paid to Western Australia will have to be made up by contributions from the whole of the colonies, so that Western Australia will have to pay part of it. But the difficulty with us is this: That, whereas in New South Wales they will be receiving a considerably larger revenue, out of which they will be well able to pay their contribution to Western Australia, we in Victoria, with intercolonial free-trade and the changes which will be made in the Tariff, will suffer considerably. But, notwithstanding our own loss, we shall have to put our hands into our pockets to help to make up the loss sustained by Western Australia.

Mr. WALKER. -
But you will get an open market for your goods.

Mr. REID. -
And a very good market.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We shall get an open market for our goods, but it appears to me that, so far as Western Australia is concerned, we shall not have a very much larger market than we have at the present time. We do a very large trade with Western Australia in a large number of articles, and I think that, whatever customs duties may be in existence, Western Australia will continue for a considerable time to deal with Victoria, South Australia, and probably New South Wales, instead of importing largely from abroad. If we could have adopted a scheme whereby the losses of all the colonies would have been pooled and provided for equitably and rateably, the difficulty I speak of would have ceased to exist; but I was forced to admit that the people of New South Wales would raise strong objections to the adoption of a proposal of that kind.

Mr. REID. -
Hear, hear.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Seeing that these objections would have had a considerable foundation, I was bound to agree to the proposal which is recommended by the Finance Committee. If, however, it is proposed to bring in any of the other colonies, if Tasmania is going to say-'We are in an abnormal position, and must have similar treatment to that given to Western Australia,' I shall have to take up the position that all the colonies must be placed upon an equal footing. We have always admitted that the position of Western Australia entitles her to some consideration.

Mr. McMILLAN. -

What does the right honorable member estimate the probable amount which will have to be paid to Western Australia?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

My honorable friend knows, as well as I do, that it will be impossible to answer that question Until the Uniform Tariff is actually in operation. The representatives of Western Australia say, I believe correctly, that they will lose £380,000 per annum by the removal of intercolonial duties; but they will gain a large amount from duties which will probably be put upon articles which now enter the colony free, and, as the losses of the other colonies will be considerable, I hope that the amount which we shall have to make up to Western Australia will not be a very large one. As I interjected this morning, we must also take care that if Western Australia gains anything in any one year that is set off against a loss in any subsequent year. There may not be this gain, but, of course, one cannot tell. After having considered this matter in connexion with the work of the Finance Committee at different times, I am forced to the conclusion that it is impossible to adopt any scientific scheme of finance. We must deal with the subject in a rough-and-ready manner.

Mr. WALKER. -

And trust one another.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We must trust the Federal Parliament to deal fairly and equitably with all the colonies. I have no doubt that when the first five years after the union expire, pressure will be brought to bear by some of the colonies, so that they may obtain better terms. That has been the experience in Canada, and I should be glad, if it were possible, to prevent it from being our experience. I believe that the proper course to take would be to go the full length of declaring that the distribution shall be per capita from the start. That is apparently impracticable, but I hope that the committee will consider whether we should not adopt part of the scheme which we adopted at Adelaide.
Mr. WALKER. -

After five years.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am quite willing to agree to the continuation of the bookkeeping system for five years if we cannot reduce the term to three years, but after that we should not leave the system of procedure to be adopted in any doubt. We ought to declare in the Constitution that, at the end of whatever period we fix, the whole receipts and expenditure of the Federation shall be treated upon a per capita basis.

Mr. WALKER. -

You would not have a sliding scale at the end of five years?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No. I should not be willing to have five years' bookkeeping, then five years of the sliding scale, and then a distribution per capita. We should provide that after five years what is admitted upon all hands to be the true and proper mode of dealing with the question, and the mode in which it would be dealt with were it not for the fiscal arrangements in New South Wales, that is, the per capita distribution, shall be adopted. I think we should implant a clear direction to that effect in the Constitution. To guard against any danger of injustice I shall be prepared, after that direction has been implanted in the Constitution, to allow a provision to be inserted giving to the Federal Parliament the power to make an alteration. It may be said that to give the Federal Parliament the power to make an alteration is equivalent to leaving the whole matter in its hands; but I do not think it is. It would be said if any alteration were proposed-"The instructions given in the Constitution are that the surplus shall be distributed upon a per capita basis," and it would require very strong arguments indeed to induce the Federal Parliament to adopt any other mode of procedure.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Do you not think that the per capita distribution would be the most obvious principle to adopt if the conditions allowed of its adoption?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not know that. Some of the colonies will be gaining an advantage by the account keeping.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The right honorable member would simply put in a declaration to the effect that the Convention is of opinion that this principle should be adopted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I would embed in the Constitution a provision to the effect that, we think the proper mode of distribution is per capita, but I would not rigidly insist upon the adoption of that mode of distribution, because the arguments I have heard here lead me to the conclusion that it would not be wise to make any of the provisions of the Constitution too rigid, since if they will not bend they may break. I am prepared to give the Federal Parliament the power to alter the system of distribution, knowing that it will be difficult for it to do so in the face of the direction implanted in the Constitution. I feel that the financial question has been one of grave difficulty, and at one time it appeared to be insurmountable. The scheme prepared by the Finance Committee does not meet with my

After the favorable criticisms of the scheme of the Finance Committee to which we have listened it is refreshing to me to bear the somewhat adverse criticism of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner. I am one of those who do not agree with the general recommendations of the committee. I have consistently opposed the bookkeeping scheme, though I admit unreservedly that, like others, I am prepared to make a concession to what I regard as the unfounded prejudice of New South Wales, and to the pressing necessities of Western Australia. I think it desirable that we should consider what the bookkeeping scheme really means. If we reflect that to secure anything like justice to the respective colonies an accurate account must be kept of the various goods passing into the several colonies and moving from one colony to another, if we realize the difficulty of discriminating between goods of colonial manufacture made from colonial produce, and goods of similar manufacture made from raw articles which have paid duty, and the difficulty of determining the amount of duty paid upon the manufactured goods, we shall see that the scheme is full of objections and must lead to great irritation and annoyance. The more I consider it from a federal point of view,

Mr. ISAACS. -

I wish that were more universally admitted.

Mr. HENRY. -

It seems objectionable to cut up the continent into sections and endeavour to ascertain what each particular section contributes to the common purse. I admit the force of the prejudices and the necessities to which I have alluded, but I think it my duty to point out the grave objections which I have always seen in the bookkeeping system. Why are we asked to keep the accounts? Simply to secure greater equality, and in the interests of the two colonies. The first colony is New South Wales, and the second is Western Australia. We all from the first admitted the special circumstances of Western Australia, and the necessity for dealing in a special way with her finances so that she could enter the Federation. But I deny emphatically that the circumstances of New South Wales justify this bookkeeping system. This leads me to the consideration of the figures supplied by Mr. Coghlan, the Statistician for New South Wales. At Sydney
I took occasion to criticise his figures, and it seemed to me that there was a general assent on the part of the Convention, and even by the representatives of New South Wales, that his figures were not reliable as a basis. We have been treated now to an additional sheaf of pamphlets from Mr. Coghlan, with a somewhat modified result, but still, from my point of view, with the same objectionable conclusions—that is to say, fallacious conclusions as regards the contribution from each colony.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

You don't consider him a prophet.

Mr. HENRY. -

I not only do not consider Mr. Coghlan to be a prophet, but I consider that he has employed fallacious data, which has led him to fallacious conclusions in this matter of finance. Honorable members will remember the first pamphlet he issued. The honorable member (Mr. Wise) has asked on what data Mr. Coghlan has based his calculations. If I understand Mr.
Coghlan aright, he has merely dealt with the imports of the respective colonies as a whole for a common period, and has reasoned from those imports that, as New South Wales imports so much in excess of the imports of the other colonies, therefore it follows that, under a uniform Tariff, New South Wales would, relatively to her imports, contribute so much more revenue. That is the fallacy which has misled him, and which has led, in my judgment, to the introduction of what I cannot help characterizing as this irritating and mischievous proposal to keep accounts between the several states for a period of five years in the matter of Customs. What are the conclusions Mr. Coghlan arrives at? I will only deal with the two great colonies of New South Wales and Victoria. In his last pamphlet he estimates that under a uniform Tariff New South Wales would contribute £2 1s. 11d. per head of the population, while Victoria would contribute £1 7s. 8d. per head of the population, or an excess contribution of 14s. 3d. per head by New South Wales under a uniform Tariff. If my memory serves me aright, Mr. Coghlan's previous calculations made New South Wales a greater contributor than Victoria by 17s. per head of population.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That is a mistake he made.

Mr. HENRY. -

The only difference is that in one case he had taken one year's imports, and in the other case he had taken several years imports. Even his own conclusions show that the imports of a colony may vary, and his calculations vary with the imports.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

There were some errors in the calculations, too.

Mr. HENRY. -

Possibly there were some errors, though I was not aware of any. With a knowledge of the habits of the people of New South Wales and Victoria, of the wages ruling, of the purchasing power of the people, of the wealth of the two communities-with abroad knowledge of these facts before me, my common sense revolts at the conclusion that Victoria would contribute 14s. 3d. per head of the population less than New South Wales. It is very obvious to me that Mr. Coghlan is wrong. Feeling in my own mind-from taking a common-sense view of the position-that Mr. Coghlan's conclusions were fallacious when they were submitted to us in Adelaide, on my return to Tasmania I asked our respected statistician (Mr. R.M. Johnston), than whom there is no abler man in these colonies, to furnish me with some particulars that would better measure the power of the people of the colonies to contribute through the Customs than that supplied by Mr. Coghlan. After some considerable consultation with Mr. Johnston on the subject, we adopted the articles of spirits, beer, wine, tobacco, tea, coffee, sugar, and molasses, and he ascertained the consumption of these particular commodities by the several colonies for a certain period. I gave honorable members the result of his figures in Sydney, showing, as far as my memory will serve me, that there is a difference of only 1s. per head of the population as between New South Wales and Victoria in the consumption of these articles.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I am not sticking up for Mr. Coghlan now..

Mr. HENRY. -

They appealed to me as fair, as a means of measuring the consuming power of the people of the respective colonies.
He does not touch the question of manufactured goods.

Mr. HENRY. -

No, it is simply a measure of the consuming power of the people. Since I came to Melbourne my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner) has kindly furnished me with a further set of figures prepared by Mr. Fenton, the Statistician of Victoria, taking out the same articles, but for a different period, namely, from 1891 to 1895. The previous calculation I had was for the period of one year. I am well aware that, even as regards this question of imports, it is a very simple matter to get into a serious error through taking the figures for only one year. Therefore, in order to correct the figures, or to check the figures I already had, I asked Sir George Turner to allow his Statistician to take out the actual quantity of spirits, beer, wine, tobacco, tea, coffee, and sugar consumed by the respective colonies for the period from 1891 to 1895.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

And these were very bad years in Victoria, too.

Mr. HENRY. -

I have taken the Tariff of Tasmania and applied it all round, because on all these articles we have certain duties. For instance, it would not have done to take the Tariff of Western Australia, where they have no duties on tea and sugar. It does not affect the general result much what Tariff you take so long as you have duties on all the articles—I do not think it will affect the relative amounts much. It will interest honorable members to hear what the result of these figures is. I find that for the period I have named Victoria contributed £1 7s. 11d. per head, New South Wales £1 9s. 6d. per head, South Australia £1 4s. 4d. per head, and Western Australia £3 2s. 9d. per head.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What!

Mr. HENRY. -

The right honorable member will know that it is not the actual contribution.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I know that. It is only the proportion.

Mr. HENRY. -

It is merely the proportion. Tasmania contributed £1 3s. 1d. per head. These figures, as given to me for that period, are practically in agreement with the figures I already had.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

New South Wales agrees with that perfectly. We allow that in matters of consumption we are about equal.

Mr. HENRY. -

I have some interesting figures dealing with that question. It will interest the honorable member and other members to hear what the general result of these figures is. On the basis of a Tasmanian Tariff these figures will give revenue of not less than £4,200,000. Assuming that we have a revenue of £6,000,000 to make up, it is obvious that on making up the difference between £4,200,000 and £6,000,000, no such discrepancy can possibly arise as is claimed. That is the answer, I think, to Mr. McMillan's point.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I do not agree with Mr. Coghlan's figures. I only say that they indicate so much.

Mr. HENRY. -

My object is to show that all this trouble we have had—the introduction of this bookkeeping system—has been based on a fallacy. I think to attempt to measure the consuming power of a community merely by its imports, under a uniform Tariff which no one can forecast, is misleading, to say the least of it. I notice that in a very interesting letter, Mr. Pulsford—and I regret that I was not able to find another letter which I am told he wrote—gives what appears to me to be a most conclusive answer to this, when he compares the imports of Great Britain with the imports of America. The imports of Great Britain are about double the imports of the United States, and the population is one-half. If we were to take Mr. Coghlan's principle of arriving at the contributing power of the people under a given Tariff, then we would see that the people of Great Britain would contribute four times as much as the people of the United States were able to do under a uniform Tariff.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Suppose you are absolutely right?

Mr. HOWE. -

Who killed Coghlan? Henry!

Mr. HENRY. -

In connexion with this question of imports, I think every man who has studied the imports and exports, especially in connexion with the borrowing of the colonies, knows the intimate relation that the increase of both our public debt and our private debt bears to the imports. I am well aware, and every one who has studied this question knows, that in proportion as you increase your borrowing, so will your imports go up, because you bring out your borrowed money in the shape of goods. This obvious fact led me to look into the question of the relative public borrowing of Victoria and New South Wales; we all know how intimately the one involves the other. Looking back over a period of fifteen years, I find that New South Wales has increased her debt, roughly, by £40,000,000, while Victoria has increased hers by only £24,000,000. It is obvious that the increased borrowed money came out from England in the shape of goods, and to that extent increased the imports of New South Wales. Even within the last five years—Sir George Turner kindly gave me the figures for which, in going over the details, struck me as being somewhat significant and worth calling attention to. I find that in New South Wales, in 1896, gold and silver, specie and bullion, copper, tin, and lead, to the value of £2,750,000 were imported.

Mr. WALKER. -
From Queensland.

Mr. HENRY. -
A great deal of the gold was from Queensland, and some of the silver and lead from Tasmania. These minerals are sent out again, and both the imports and the exports of New South Wales are in this way swollen. But surely the importation of two and three-quarter million pounds worth of gold and silver, specie, and lead does not add to the contributing power of the people through the Customs and Excise. It may seem rather a pity that I should take up so much time in dealing with a question of this sort. I thought the matter had been settled in Sydney, but there is this sheaf of pamphlets reviving it. I trace the support of this bookkeeping system right through from Adelaide to Melbourne to Mr. Coghlan's fallacious figures.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Supposing that you are right, but that it is impossible to persuade the people of New South Wales that they will not lose, what then?

Mr. HENRY. -
I said that, as a practical man, I was addressing myself to a practical question. Although I am opposed to it, I recognise that the prejudice in New South Wales is so strong that we must concede the bookkeeping system. I was exceedingly pleased to hear Mr. McMillan suggest that the period for which it is to remain in operation might be lessened. I do hope that that will be done, or, at all events, that power will be given to the Federal Parliament, if they find that it is unjust in its operation, and that it causes so much irritation to the people of Federated Australia that it becomes intolerable, to shorten the period.

Mr. SYMON. -
Make the minimum two years.

Mr. HENRY. -
Yes. I intimated to the Finance Committee that it was my intention in the Convention to move that the period be reduced to two years. Give the Federal Parliament power, if you will, to continue it for an indefinite period. I have sufficient confidence in the Federal Parliament to believe that they will only continue it so long as they consider it advisable or necessary in the interests of the people. There is one other point that I find in my notes, and it is a point of some interest. It is claimed that because Victoria is a protective colony and New South Wales a free-trade colony, the consumers of dutiable goods in Victoria will contribute less to the federal revenue under a uniform Tariff than the consumers of dutiable goods in New South Wales. I am very desirous of having my mind enlightened on this question. I am open to conviction, but I confess that up to the present time I have failed to see why, simply because Victoria has in the past pursued a protective policy, her people are to contribute less under a uniform Tariff than the people of New South Wales. We all know that the merchants of New South Wales will, in all probability, have large stocks of goods when the uniform Tariff comes into force, and the people of New South Wales will get the advantage of these goods free of duty. There is every probability that the consumers of the same goods in other parts of Federated Australia will pay duty. For the first year or two, therefore, the free-trade colony may contribute less to the federal revenue than the protective colonies. The view I take of it is this: That once we have what we all desire, perfect freedom of interchange between all parts of Australia, Melbourne and Sydney will become in effect one in the matter of goods, the only difference being the freight. Let honorable members take any commodity that occurs to them. I will assume, for example, that the uniform Tariff imposes a duty of 20 per cent. on tweed trousers. If that duty excludes the manufactures of England or other countries, it is obvious that the extension applies to Sydney just as much as to Melbourne. They will both stand on equal terms, and the users of tweed trousers in both will be in the same position. I raise this question because I am desirous to hear some honorable member demonstrate how a dweller in Victoria, which will be a part of Federated Australia, will contribute less to the revenue under a uniform Tariff than a dweller in New South Wales.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Would not Victoria import more than at present if, as is probable, the Federal Tariff is lower than her own?

Mr. HENRY. -

That might be so. I am speaking of the time when the Federal Tariff is in full operation. For a brief period there will be some disturbances; but there has been rather too much made of this point. The traders of New South Wales will be just as sensible of the advantage of giving their customers the cheapest articles obtainable as they are now, and there will be a market for Victorian manufacturers in New South Wales. I apprehend, however, that New South Wales will rapidly overtake Victoria as a manufacturing country. There is a somewhat important point in connexion with the bookkeeping system that I would like to put to the Convention. I would ask this question: What object is to be served beyond that of satisfying the prejudices of New South Wales by fixing the period at five years? It is obvious to me that for all time there will be inequality. We cannot by the adoption of this system remove inequality. You will always have the rich and the poor amongst you, and in all human probability there will be some discrepancy between the contributions from the various divisions of Australia. Assuming that at the end of the five years you have acquired certain knowledge as to the contributions of the various colonies, where are you then? Are you any nearer your goal?

Mr. WALKER. - Yes.

Mr. HENRY. - The honorable member will perhaps be able to demonstrate that. From my point of view, you are no nearer your goal, because I hold that the changing conditions of the several colonies are such that no man can predict what the period of five years will bring forth in this matter of Customs contributions. It may be that in a lengthened period, when the country is largely populated, say, in the course of 50 years, the communities will be so settled that we shall have very few poor states, and there will be no great disparity between the poor and the rich states. But, having regard to the fact that the disparity in the contributions of the several colonies arises entirely from the number of males in the respective colonies, and, having regard to the fact with which we are all familiar, that we have in Australia a certain floating male population, according to the various mining rushes, we are constantly liable to have changes in the relative contributions of the Several colonies. Therefore, at the end of five years you have ahead of you just the same inequalities and so-called injustice. From my point of view, you might as well out up New South Wales and separate Broken Hill from the agricultural portions of the colony and trace out the individual contributions of the members of the state as attempt to separate, when we are one great country, the different states into sections and say-'This section contributes so much less than another, and we will not give this section so much as we will give the other." Are we to be a Federated Australia or not in this matter of accounts? This proposal that, because one section of the community contributes a little more than another, we are to have this system of bookkeeping inflicted upon us for a lengthened period is so foreign to the true federal spirit that I cannot help protesting against it with all my power. If our object in this bookkeeping is to avoid inequalities in this matter, what does it involve? It involves bookkeeping for ever, while we are a Federation, because I hold that we shall be constantly exposed to these inequalities; there is a recurring risk for all time in this Federation of having these inequalities. Therefore, to attempt over a short period like five years to get the data which is to guide us is to proceed on fallacious lines, and can never give us the information we want. In Tasmania, we have a rich mining population, that is, it is rich so far as contributing largely to the Customs revenue is concerned, owing to the higher wages which they receive, and the greater number of males amongst them as compared with our agricultural population. We cannot ascertain the data, it is only speculation; but, from a knowledge of the habits of the community, it is probable that, while the miners pay from £3 to £5 per head to the revenue, our agriculturists do not contribute more than £1 per head. Are we to say to the agriculturists—"We are going to deprive you of certain rights, and privileges"? The more I think over it the less tenable the proposal seems to be. I now come to the case of Western Australia. We all admit frankly the great difficulty that exists in bringing that colony into the Federation, and the necessity for dealing with it in some particular way, but it has now to be admitted that the bookkeeping in itself is insufficient, and we find that there are special terms set forth in the Western Australian clause. I do not like the provision which is made, and I am not sure that when the thing is thoroughly understood and worked out in practice it will effect for Western Australia the object aimed at. But if it does effect that object, what will be the result? As regards Tasmania, it is almost certain that the surplus that will be returned to Tasmania, under this financial scheme, will be altogether insufficient for her financial necessities I think that is admitted all round. Nevertheless, we are asked, under this Western Australian provision, to contribute out of our insufficient surplus something to make good the loss which may be sustained by a rich colony like Western Australia. The honorable member (Sir Philip Fysh) swallowed this in a very complacent way, notwithstanding the grave injustice of the proposition that a relatively poor colony like Tasmania—because our financial necessities—are extreme—should be called upon to contribute out of her insufficient surplus—something to make up the loss to be sustained by Western Australia. That is the serious objection. I desire most earnestly to see Western Australia come into the Federation, and I should like to join in any reasonable scheme to keep Western Australia right. But both as regards Tasmania and Western Australia, I would prefer that the leaders of this Convention on constitutional questions should I draw up some general clause giving the Federal Parliament the necessary power to deal with a state under exceptional circumstances, so as to preserve it from financial shipwreck. If the Federal Parliament saw that a member of the Federation had imposed sufficient direct taxation on the people of the state, and had, economized in a rigid manner, and yet was threatened with financial shipwreck, the Federal Parliament should have the power in some way to step in and save that state from shipwreck. If some such provision could be introduced it would satisfy Tasmania, and perhaps Western Australia, better than the present provision, which I should like to say to my honorable friends from Western Australia can never be understood until we see the operation of this clause in practice. No one can foretell what the loss will be to the respective colonies, or how the average will come out. We cannot tell whether there will be anything to return to Western Australia until the facts of experience can make that clear; whereas, if we provide that under particular circumstances the Federal Parliament could take steps to prevent the shipwreck of any particular state it would satisfy me much better.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Do you say that the Federal Parliament would have a sufficiently strong interest to keep each of the colonies solvent, and see that its finance was all right?

Mr. HENRY. -

In any case, I say that this Federation can never allow a colony to become insolvent. It is possible that the eminent lawyers in the Convention may be able to fell us that there is already power under this Bill to provide for such contingencies; only I can see myself that these financial proposals for the first five years are rigid, and if carried out will prevent the Federal Parliament coming to the aid of a necessitous state. It is to provide against such a state of affairs that I should like to see some provision put in to give the Federal Parliament power in this respect. I know that there are difficulties and dangers in the way of such a proposal, but I also see a danger of the states at present. I do not know that I need quote Mr. Coghlan in detail.
An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Oh, he is dead.

Mr. HENRY. -

No. I hope that no honorable member in this chamber thinks that I am talking in any disrespectful way of Mr. Coghlan, or that I question in any way his arithmetical accuracy. I recognise his great ability and talent as a statist, but like every other important man, he may make an error.

Tasmania will have to choose between standing out of the Federation and entering it with the certainty of being unable to meet her obligations.

Now, this pamphlet, by such an authority as Mr. Coghlan, has been circulated throughout Tasmania, and has found its way into the local press. In Tasmania we have enemies of federation, as you have in all the colonies, and I ask honorable members to consider what an instrument this pamphlet has placed in the hands of enemies of federation as regards Tasmania. I am sure that honorable members will credit the Tasmanian representatives with a sincere desire to see federation established, although Tasmania is sometimes talked about in a somewhat contemptuous way as only a fractional part of Australasia. I would like to acknowledge the very generous treatment which Tasmania has received to-day, especially at the hands of Mr. McMillan and of Mr. Reid, who showed a disposition-as I thought for the first time-to consider the necessities of Tasmania. I am sure that Tasmania is just as self-reliant and has as great a future before her as any colony of the group, although she is a small community. I do not wish to come here to boast, but I venture to say that Australia needs Tasmania just as much as Tasmania needs Australia, and I can say quite sincerely that I believe there is an honest desire on the part of a large number of the people of Tasmania to share in the National life of Australia. But we are not going to come into the Federation at all costs. It will be the duty of the public men representing Tasmania here to tell their people fairly and squarely what they regard as a proper arrangement.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

You will have all the markets of the Continent of Australia open to you if you join the Federation, which you have not now.

Mr. HENRY. -

I must remind the honorable member that the bulk of our products, and the increasing bulk of our products; are commodities which we have to send to England-gold, silver, lead, copper, and wool. Those are the commodities which very largely comprise the exports of Tasmania, and our mineral products will very probably, in a comparatively short period of time, constitute

[P.815] starts here
two-thirds of our entire exports. Therefore, of what interest is it to us to have open markets for those commodities in Australia, seeing that our market for them is in England?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

What about potatoes?

Mr. HENRY. -

We are very glad to sell our potatoes to our New South Wales friends, who need them so much, and they are very glad to buy them. But I repeat that Tasmania is just as necessary to Australia as Australia is necessary to Tasmania.

Mr. LYNE. -

Why? What for?

Mr. HENRY. -

I will tell the honorable member, for, although he is a native of Tasmania, it would appear that he does not know the importance of his native colony to this great Federation. I am now going to quote from a report furnished by Major General Edwardes, so recently as 1889, on the question of the defences of Australia. Remembering that defence is, next to freedom of trade, one of the paramount inducements for federation, honorable members will see that this question as to the relative position that Tasmania will occupy in regard to defence is an important one for Australia. Now, what does Major-General Edwardes say on the subject? He says that the isolation of Western Australia is a very important thing for Australia as a whole. Then he goes on to state-

If, however, the isolation of Western Australia and Port Darwin is a menace to Australia, the position of Tasmania is still more dangerous from an Australian point of view.

That is to say, it is a greater menace to Australia than even Western Australia. Major-General Edwardes proceeds-

Situated as it is within three days steaming of Adelaide, one from Melbourne, two and a half from Sydney, and four from New Zealand, it might even become necessary to send troops from the other colonies to protect it in time of war. No enemy could seriously threaten Australia until he had established a convenient base near at hand, and such a base he would find in Tasmania, with its numerous harbors and its supply of coal.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

What about our Imperial fleet?

Mr. HENRY. -

I am not going to enter, on this question of defence, into an argument with my honorable friend (Sir William Zeal) about the Imperial fleet. I rely on the Imperial fleet, under the old English flag, as much as any one, but the duty of protecting herself will devolve on Federated Australia, and the best authority we have had to guide us on the subject (Major-General Edwardes) has pointed out the necessity for Tasmania being a part of Federated Australia. That is my position on the matter. Now, sir, I come to the question of Tasmanian finance. Briefly, it may be stated thus: That there is no probability of the Federal Tariff giving Tasmania as much Customs revenue as she requires. From calculations made by our statisticians am not going to trouble honorable members with figures—we shall require about £2 6s. 3d. per head to give Tasmania back what she will lose in Customs revenue through joining the Federation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You have a very small free list.

Mr. HENRY. -
Yes, a very small free list. About 90 per cent of the goods imported into Tasmania are liable to customs duty. Our colony has the heaviest Customs Tariff of any.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It is most comprehensive.

Mr. HENRY. -
Yes, it is too comprehensive altogether, but it is our financial necessities that have led us to impose so many customs duties. We have had to meet our obligations, and pay our heavy interest bill, and there was no choice but to raise the necessary revenue by imposing duties of customs. Now, if we have to give up Customs revenue, if we have to give up what was so well called by Mr. McMillan this elastic instrument of taxation, are we to have any assurance as to what we are to get back, or are we to rely merely on what the Federal Parliament will do in the way of imposing duties of customs? There is every human probability that the Federal Parliament will not impose so heavy a Tariff as will be necessary to give Tasmania the Customs revenue she requires. Now, we are already burdened with self-directed taxation—land tax, income tax, and so on.

Mr. HOWE. -
You will have an increased value when you are a part of the Federation.

Mr. HENRY. -
No doubt; but, for the first two or three years that will not be perceptible and there will be no chance of chancing the taxation system of the colony for that time. I fear that we shall be loaded with a serious deficit under this proposition. But I am glad to know that our Customs, revenue is steadily improving, that our population is increasing, and that we have a great future before us in respect to our mines; so that it is just possible that the effect may not be as bad, as we now fear that it will be. Only it is the risk that presses upon us—the sense of responsibility as to what we shall say to our people upon this important matter of finance, as to whether we shall be able to say that we believe that there will be such a large deficit that we shall have to put on an income tax that will touch every man in the community with no exemptions at all, and that we shall have to increase our land tax. If we have to go back and tell our people that, I fear that we shall be playing into the hands of the enemies of federation, and it will be a serious question for Tasmania whether she should not stand out for the five years' period, taking the risks and waiting for the developments of events. Therefore, I ask the serious consideration of honorable members to the point whether some plan cannot be devised that will give the Federal Parliament, under exceptional circumstances, power to aid a colony if its finances are seriously embarrassed in consequence of entering into federation. I must, as one of the representatives of Tasmania, disclaim any idea whatever of taking or accepting any relief from the other colonies. We are a self-reliant people, and can pay our own way. But I want the Federal Parliament, seeing that we are handing over our customs duties, to have power to assist us in the event of the entrance into federation being disastrous to us, leaving the Federal Parliament power to made the necessary terms and conditions, but rendering them able to give us such assistance that we may be able to go back to our people and say—"The Federal Parliament will have the necessary power to help us, and we may be satisfied that in case of need they will do so," I feel that I have taken up more time than I have a right to do upon this subject, but I should like to say one or two things with regard to some of the remarks of Sir George Turner. The right honorable gentleman said that in striking out clause 92—and honorable members will recollect the fight we had to get that clause inserted—we shall be making a mistake. The clause provides that the Federal Parliament shall provide a specific sum of money, calculated on the aggregate of the customs duties returned to each colony the year before the imposition of the uniform Tariff, Now, that was a definite provision. But it is proposed to strike out that clause, so that there will be no definite obligation laid upon the Federal Parliament that such a sum shall be provided for distribution. I would, however, like to say to my right honorable friend that I think there war, no man in this Convention who was more pronounced than I was as to the necessity for laying a definite obligation upon the Federal Parliament, if we hand over our customs duties to them, to return to us a sufficient surplus. I was most pronounced with regard to that. I had—being then comparatively fresh to the subject—very positive views upon the question. But I have lived long enough and seen enough of this question since to enable me to say that I am content if the clause be struck out. And I will tell Sir George Turner my reason. He seems to regard the omission of some provision of this sort as a mistake, but I see clearly enough that the financial necessities of four out of the five federating colonies represented in this Convention are such that it is inevitable that the representative men from the several colonies, both in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, will have it laid upon them as a paramount and imperative duty that if they see that their colonies have not sufficient revenue they must protect the state Treasurers. That is what I rely upon in regard to this matter. I look to the necessities of the several colonies, and I think that Sir George Turner may rest assured that those necessities will lead them to combine, and to see that there is a sufficient amount of Customs revenue provided for the protection of the state Treasurers.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If the Federal Parliament will do that, there is no harm in putting in a clause that will help us to get the Bill accepted by our people.

Mr. HENRY. -

Well, any provision of that kind I shall be happy to assist the right honorable gentleman in getting inserted. In regard to the question of the loss of intercolonial duties through intercolonial free-trade, I do not follow those honorable members who, in discussing the question of the revenue which the respective states will lose

Mr. FRASER. -

It can be made up in some other way.

Mr. HENRY. -

That is exactly what I was about to say. In dealing with the Western Australian position it becomes necessary to consider the loss by intercolonial free-trade, but when honorable members talk of the loss of duties to the respective colonies through intercolonial free-trade I fail to follow them, because I take it that where loss of duties takes place, we give up all to the Federal Government, and it is merely a question with the Federal Treasurer as to what particular articles he is going to raise his revenue from.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

By taxing foreign imports.

Mr. HENRY. -

There is little doubt that he must raise it by levying upon foreign imports, and I have shown that on those commodities consumed by the people generally we can raise £4,200,000. There will, therefore, be no difficulty whatever. I venture to say tha

Mr. FRASER. -

The revenue can be raised easier than now.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes, but by killing our industries.

Mr. HENRY. -

I understood Sir George Turner to point out that the several states should retain control over the imposition of bounties. Now, that is obviously impossible, in my judgment, because-

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I advocated the granting of bounties, subject to control by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HENRY. -

If the Federal Parliament controls them, it has power to legislate in any direction it pleases; but it is obvious that it would never do to give the states the power of controlling or fixing bounties, because then there would be an end of the free interchange of commodities. For we all know that under a system of bounties a particular fiscal policy might be set up. I do not think that that position is tenable at all. Another point upon which much might be said, is with regard to the public debts of the colonies, but, of course, that will be discussed in due season, when we come to deal specifically with the matter. I shall not go into it here, especially as the Finance Committee have not included the subject in their report. I thank honorable members for the patience with which they have listened to me upon this somewhat dry subject.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

On behalf of the Finance Committee, I may say that it is very pleasant to find that, at all events, some of our critics have spoken somewhat favorably of the scheme which has been propounded. Personally, I indorse every word of the scheme, thoroughly and completely believing in it as an equitable scheme. It seems to me that what we want is to devise an equitable plan, by means of which each of the colonies will get back what it pays, less its proportionate share of the expenses; and how that can be ascertained otherwise than by a system of bookkeeping I have yet to learn. With regard to the remarks of the last speaker as to what object there is in adopting the bookkeeping system, I would ask which is better-to "buy a pig in a poke," or to proceed after examination? We have now no data to enable us to say what amount shall be distributed by way of surplus, but after five years of bookkeeping we shall have an idea as to what amount each colony contributes. Taking my honorable friend's last remarks, it seems to me that the five years' bookkeeping will be of advantage to Tasmania, because by all accounts, owing to her mineral resources, that colony is going ahead by leaps and bounds, and her average income during the first five years of the union will probably be very much greater than the amount she received during the last five years. The honorable member asks what is the object of the bookkeeping system? My reply is that the system has been introduced to do that which is fair and just. Some years ago, two or three other gentlemen met Mr. Tyson, the millionaire, in Townsville, and suggested to him that they should federate. Each of these gentlemen was willing to put all he had into a pool, and to consent to a per capita distribution afterwards. But Mr. Tyson could not see the advantage of the proposal, and it never came to anything. Now, I am as strong a federationist as most honorable members; but I ask how can you expect New South Wales, Queensland, and Western Australia to make an arrangement such as was suggested to Mr. Tyson? I trust, however, that common sense will prevail in the settlement of this matter. Although we are to have a uniform Tariff there is no reason why the Federal Treasurer should not recommend alterations in that Tariff if he finds that the income derived from it is not sufficient to keep the finances of the colonies in a proper state. I agree with the honorable member (Mr. Henry) that Tasmania ought to have separate and distinct treatment from the other colonies. The figures with which he has favored us show that to keep her finances in a healthy state, Tasmania will require a Customs revenue of £2 6s. 3d. a head. On a population basis of 3,600,000, assuming that Queensland will come into the Federation, that would mean that the Customs revenue of the Commonwealth would have to be £8,325,000 a year. Would it not be better for the Commonwealth, instead of raising Customs revenue to that amount, to subsidize Tasmania for a few years? Supposing £50,000 a year would suffice for the first year, the amount might be reduced upon a sliding scale by one-fifth each year, and surely in the cause of federation the other colonies would not object to assist the sister colony in this way. I would now like to take the opportunity to combat one or two of the views which have been advanced by our critics. The honorable member (Mr. Lyne) found fault with the proposed arrangement for making up to Western Australia some portion of the amount she will lose by the remission of the intercolonial customs duties; but I think that this arrangement is a perfectly equitable one, and one which should recommend itself to the Convention. In my opinion Western Australia is behaving generously in this matter, because at the end of five years she may receive only a per capita proportion of the customs duties collected by the Commonwealth, and I trust that this portion of the scheme will not be altered. The honorable member appeared to think that as soon as the Federal Tariff came into force Western Australia would only contribute 30s. a head, but I cannot understand how he made that mistake. It does not follow that because the average all round would be that, that Western Australia would not contribute more. The honorable member seems to have made some confusion between the contribution of Western Australia and what she would receive under the per capita distribution. I might point out that when the Federal Tariff comes into force we shall, in all probability, have duties on sugar and upon tea. These articles, I understand, are now admitted into Western Australia free, so that the revenue would gain to the extent of the sums collected in this way, and by any duty placed upon products which are not now dutiable. We need not fear that the colony will come upon the Commonwealth for anything like the enormous sum of £389,000, which it is alleged is received from intercolonial duties. I believe the honorable member (Mr. Holder) will be able to enlighten us as to the confusion re exports from South Australia to Western Australia, and the colonial produce sent there by South Australia direct. If this is a specimen of the way in which mistakes have arisen, we must look upon the estimate of £389,000 as a good deal beyond the actual facts. The honorable member (Mr. McMillan) alluded to clause 89, which deals with the importation of goods into the colony before the coming into force of the Federal Tariff. In my opinion it is to the advantage of New South Wales that accounts should be kept for five years rather than for three years, because during the first year after the imposition of the uniform Tariff her income is likely to be reduced owing to previous abnormal importations. I highly approve of the honorable member's suggestion that the Federal Treasurer should be able to call the states Treasurers to form a council of advice, so as to prevent as far as possible any undue interference with local finances. We shall all be represented in the Federal Parliament, and why four of the colonies should have any fear in regard to the future I do not know. The colony which has most to fear is that which I represent, but we are actuated by the federal spirit, and are prepared to modify our fiscal system for the benefit of Australia at large. I do not suppose that we are more generous than other people.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Yes, we are.

Mr. WALKER. -
Well, I think that human nature is much the same throughout the continent; but New South Wales, in consenting to the alteration of her fiscal system, is making a great sacrifice in the cause of federation.

Mr. BARTON. -

New South Wales has not yet consented to the alteration of her fiscal system,

Mr. WALKER. -

I agree with the honorable member (Mr. Henry) that the conclusions which Mr. Coghlan draws from his statistics are most misleading; but I cannot believe that the difference in consumptive power between Victoria and New South Wales is represented by one shilling per head per annum. If it be so, the bookkeeping will show it, and will also settle a great many other disputes. I cannot see why the bookkeeping system should not be adopted. It will be less troublesome than the present system of Border Duties. There will be no inspection of goods or declarations of value, and after the first few years it will be largely a matter of statistics. In Sydney I took the liberty of suggesting a way of getting over the difficulty. In my opinion, the trouble of preparing invoices in triplicate will be less than that occasioned by the passing of entries, the making of declarations, and the inspection of goods.

Mr. ISAACS. -

A great deal more trouble than that will be occasioned.

Mr. WALKER. -

Well, surely, federation is worth taking some trouble for. Roughly speaking, the new expenditure for the Federation represents about 2s. a head, so that each colony can calculate for itself what its share of the cost is likely to be. Tasmania, I understand, has a population of 170,000 persons, and if federation costs Tasmania only £17,000 a year, surely she will not begrudge that money. I trust that a clause will be inserted allowing the Federal Parliament to treat Tasmania exceptionally, on the ground that her Tariff is so high that it is much cheaper for the Federation to subsidize her for a short term than to have to submit to such an enormous Tariff. Sir George Turner referred to a uniform Tariff for a period of five years, and hoped that at the end of that time it would be arranged that there should be a per capita division of the surplus. I have no great objection to the Federal Parliament being told that if the contributions are at all approximate it might be well to have that method. My impression is that there are three modes of meeting the difficulty. The first mode is the continuation of the bookkeeping system, which none of us desires; the second mode is the sliding scale, which it seems to me might meet the case; and the third mode is the unequal distribution, on the basis of statistics obtained during the period of five years. The honorable member (Mr. Lyne) objected to the clause limiting the expenditure being eliminated. If we have confidence in the Federal Parliament, I think we ought to leave it a discretion in the matter. As regards the clause relating to the correct amount to be given back to each state, it is very evident that the finances of New South Wales will be greatly disarranged if such a large Tariff has to be submitted to as will guarantee that, because, after all said and done, there may be a considerable loss of revenue by intercolonial free-trade. What that may be we do not know. I think we had better await experience before we undertake to provide for it. Another advantage of the bookkeeping system, I think, is that it will attract Queensland to come into the Federation. That colony was very much afraid of the sliding scale, but when she sees that Western Australia and Tasmania are willing to come in, the moral force of the movement will be such that ere long she will come in, possibly as an original state. Some reference has been made to the consolidation of the debts. I am not sure that the present is the right time to refer to the question, but I have a calculation here, made by an actuary, showing that the extra expense likely to be incurred by the Federation will be much more than covered by the saving of interest in the consolidation of debts. In Sydney I had the honour of reading to the Convention a letter from a London expert in regard to the modus operandi of consolidating the debts. He said it would be a matter of actuarial calculation of a very deep and intricate nature, and on the strength of that I consulted a leading actuary, who is also a strong federationist, and he has taken the trouble to supply me with some figures. I will give a short summary of the figures he has supplied. He has taken the London prices in the Investors' Manual of all the public debts of these colonies. He has taken all the debts maturing after a certain date, because it was not worth while to consolidate the debts maturing before that date. He has taken debts aggregating £166,100,241, on which the annual charge is £6,383,363. He shows that by giving every person the full market value of all these stocks it would increase the capital sum by £17,838,297, and bring the total up £183,938,538. He allows for a sinking fund extending over 50 years, and the saving in the annual charges is £865,207. But to provide a sinking fund for the increase of £17,838,297 in the capital debt extending over the period of 50 years, the annual charge will be £158,145. The net annual saving during the period will be £707,062, presuming the new stock is issued at par. But if it is issued at 5 per cent. premium, the annual net saving will be £982,970, and at the end of 50 years, after the last contribution to the sinking fund is made, the sum will be increased by £158,145, so that a saving of over a million is shown. In corroboration of that statement the Victorian Statist has shown that as our loans mature there ought to be a saving of £1,516,000 a year. It may be said that these figures are problematical. But I mention them now to give heart to those who are always bemoaning the great expense which is going to be incurred by the establishment of federation.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Mr. WALKER. -

Yes; but you give them an option which they need not exercise unless they like.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

But suppose they won't sell?

Mr. WALKER. -

Then you are no worse off than you are now. I will only detain the committee to say that the bookkeeping system has this great advantage, that we should then be dealing with facts, and as a countryman of Mr. Henry says-

"Facts are chiels that winna ding,
And downa be disputed."

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I cannot quite say, as the last speaker said when he began his speech, that I agree with every word and proposal in this scheme; I do not, and yet I do not hesitate to recommend it to the Convention without any alteration, because I believe that while there are objections to portions of the scheme, there are greater objections to any other scheme of which I have any knowledge. I as a member of the Finance Committee, recommend this scheme to the Convention, not as a perfect scheme, but as the best scheme of which the successive Finance Committees have had any knowledge. I suppose all other members have done as I have done. We have read all the press criticisms available. We have read all the very many pamphlets issued on the subject. We have made ourselves acquainted by personal discussion, by reading the reports of the debates, and in all other possible ways, with the various phases of public opinion. And yet I say, after all these suggestions have been considered, and all the plans have been dealt with, I am prepared to recommend this scheme as possessing fewer objections to vital points than any of the many other schemes referred to. Now, honorable members will not wish me to spend more time than is absolutely necessary in dealing with the points before us, and in making them as clear as possible. I shall therefore strive to compress into the shortest time an exposition of the various points concerning which the Convention does not yet seem, judging by the speeches delivered, to be quite clear. I should have preferred very much if some other members of the Convention had spoken rather than that the members of the Finance Committee should have followed each other as they have done. I should have preferred to wait until I had heard what were the difficulties of those honorable members who were not on the Finance Committee.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We have not had time to read the report, much less to consider it.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Reports that have been wonderfully accurate have appeared in the newspapers from time to time as to what the proposals of the Finance Committee were going to be. In yesterday morning's Argus, to say nothing of any other newspaper, there was a remarkably accurate forecast of our recommendations.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

How were we to assume that some member of the committee gave the information?

Mr. HOLDER. -

No member of the committee, so far as I know, did give the information.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

We were not going to take any mere newspaper guesses.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Newspapers have a wonderful way of finding out what is going on, and they are generally successful in their guesses. I agree with what Mr. McMillan said to-day. Not only are the facts as I have stated, but there is nothing in the report, with the exception of one matter referring to Western Australia, that has not been before us since we met in Adelaide, and for a much longer period. The Bathurst gathering has been mentioned. That gathering debated at great length the plan we have before us to-day, and, except for the Western Australian suggestion, there is nothing for which the Finance Committee can claim any patent right. What has been suggested and debated before is simply formulated now, and there is really no new matter in the report of the Finance Committee that calls for any long discussion. I should have been glad if it had not been necessary for the members of the Finance Committee to address themselves to this question as they have done. I might have been able to answer criticisms or dealt with any point which it appeared from the debate had not been made clear. I have not that opportunity, and I must proceed just where I find myself. I said in Adelaide that to discover a solution of the financial problem which would be mathematically and conspicuously accurate was impossible. I also said that the problem was insoluble. I believe to-day that it is insoluble. Our recommendations admit that it is. Instead of trying to find any nostrum by which the whole difficulty could be settled we have referred the matter to accounts, and we have said that after five years' accounts have been taken the Federal Parliament, not even bound by the experience of those five years, shall be absolutely free on the information it has before it to do what it considers to be best for all succeeding years. Whatever financial acuteness we possess, we lay no claim to being prophets. We are not prepared to say what the financial conditions of Australia or any of the states will be five years hence, and we might very well have come to that conclusion long ago. How it could be possible to forecast the financial position of the Commonwealth, or the financial relationship of the states to the Commonwealth in five years, I know not. I should be sorry to attempt to predict exactly what they would be in one year hence.

Mr. BARTON. -
No man could possibly do it.

Mr. HOLDER. -
No. Supposing that five years ago we had been face to face with this problem, is there one of us who would have had foresight enough to have predicted what has taken place in Western Australia? What has happened in the past may happen in the future, and we know not in which state. We may as well, therefore, give up at once all attempts to predetermine the financial position of the future.

Mr. ISAACS. -
We are not much agreed as to what it is now.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I think we could come to a fair agreement as to the present position. I should like the honorable member to indicate the particular point on which we are not agreed. We disagree when we begin to prophesy, but we agree fairly well when we discuss actual present facts. I do not know any actual present fact concerning which there is any difference of opinion worth mentioning. If we have pronounced the problem to be now insoluble, we have suggested a way in which the various difficulties may be dealt with as they arise. We have provided a scheme which is lengthy—I wish it had been shorter—and which involves a number of points to which I must refer. I shall deal now, not only with the objections which have been taken, but also with those which can be taken to the scheme. It is only fair to state what the objections are, although I believe that the time for making much of objections has passed, and that in this, the final stage of the work of the Convention, we ought rather to seek to harmonize and to minimize difficulties, to remove them out of the path than to make much of them. In order that I may, if possible, suggest some ways by which the difficulties can be removed, I am going to refer boldly and straight forwardly to those which occur to me.

In the first place, perhaps the greatest obstacle in the way of the ready acceptance of this scheme is that already mentioned—the seven years' bookkeeping. We are to have bookkeeping for the two years which will probably elapse before the uniform Tariff is brought into force, and also for five years thereafter. I very much regret that this has to be done. The freedom of intercolonial trade is one of the charms of this Federation. Its realization is one of the chief benefits which the people of Australia will obtain from it, and I regret exceedingly that, owing to the necessity of bookkeeping, we shall have to lose some of the advantages of that freedom of trade during the seven years. At the same time, it is only fair to say that many of the difficulties which now hinder the free flow of trade and commerce will be removed, in spite of the fact that bookkeeping is to be resorted to. It is one thing to pass entries and to pay duties, and another thing to pass entries upon which no duties hang. I want to emphasize a point that, to my surprise, some honorable members dissented from when Mr. Reid was speaking. It is the fact that when there are no duties to pay on entries there can be no inducement whatever to anybody to pass false entries or to make any misstatement regarding any importation. No matter what he may say or omit to say, it will not make a penny difference to him. So far as I can see, the temptation to undervalue or to misstate facts will be removed, and the difficulty and the friction arising from the collection of statistics on the border will not be nearly so great as it has been in the past, when the payment of duty depended on the entry.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Can you rely on any of your export entries now?

Mr. HOLDER. -
No; and I do not believe that in the returns obtained from the states by the keeping of accounts we shall have anything approaching mathematical accuracy. But while parcels carried by hand, and small parcels sent in other ways, will escape the proper check, all bulk goods will be checked and the fair thing will be done. For if some goods pass without entry from New South Wales to Victoria, some goods will also pass without entry from Victoria to New South Wales, and these items may be taken to balance each other. The larger items being checked, the fair thing broadly speaking, will be done between state and state. But I quite admit, in answer to the interjection of Sir George Turner, that mathematical accuracy in this bookkeeping system there is none.

Mr. BARTON. -

And there is speculative inaccuracy in everything else.

Mr. HOLDER. -

No doubt there is. Now I come to the next obstacle referred to—that is the method of the allocation between the different states of the expenses of the Federation. It is said to be a very complicated system; that we charge the new expenses of the Federation per capita, and that we charge the cost of the works and services taken over to those states wherein the expense is incurred. It is said that this method involves some awkward and difficult calculations, and it is asked why have we not provided for an apportionment of the expenditure per capita right through, so that as soon as possible we might become, as far as expenditure is concerned, one people, one nation? There are good and sufficient reasons, at least for a time, for maintaining this difference. In some colonies the works and services taken over return a considerable profit. In South Australia our posts and telegraphs return us some £20,000 a year over and above the expenditure. There are, in some of the other colonies, other departments producing a profit. There are, on the other hand, works and services which when taken over will involve not only a loss, but, proportionately, a large loss. I do not see why we should lump all these together in a rule-of-thumb fashion, and charge outright the whole of this expenditure per capita. It is therefore fair, in respect to all these works, that to these places where the special expenditure is due, that special expenditure should be charged. Again, the qualification which appears in our recommendation appears very necessary. I can quite conceive the necessity of appointing certain officers who shall be, for instance, at the head of the Defence Force, who find no place now in any of the states, whose duties are enlarged, if not to a large extent created, by the federation of the colonies, and whose work is, therefore, in the interests of the whole Federation. It would surely be unreasonable if, from the mere accident of these persons residing in any particular part of the Commonwealth, their salaries and the cost of their offices should be allocated to that particular part of the Commonwealth. Their services are in the interests of all, and their work for the good of all, and the cost of their offices should be charged per capita over the whole of the committee. I need not refer to the matters to which the Right Hon. Mr. Reid referred this morning, such as military defence at Port Darwin, Thursday Island, and Albany. The necessity for military defence in Tasmania was pointed out in the very able speech of the honorable member (Mr. Henry), and military defences involving large expense at any of these points of strategic value ought not to be charged to the particular states in which they are incurred. Being incurred for the good of the whole Commonwealth, the charges ought to be allocated to the whole Commonwealth on a per capita basis.

Mr. ISAACS. - In this scheme are they not to be part of the original powers?

Mr. HOLDER. - Yes, and therefore they are charged per capita to the whole Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS. - That is what you advocate.

Mr. HOLDER. - Yes. It appears to me, therefore, to be necessary that these charges in connexion with works and services taken over, and charges for any of the new services I refer to, should be charged per capita over the whole of the Commonwealth, and that we have done. As to the other branch of the charges, will any one suggest with any persistence that the costs of the Commonwealth, such as those connected with the new Administration, with the High Court, or the proceedings of the Federal Parliament, should not be charged per capita? Surely in these matters it is also necessary that the per capita method should be adopted. They fall into two classes-first, works and services taken over; they go to the state in which the expense is incurred. The second class, consisting of the cost of new offices and of defence works and other matters, which are for the benefit of the whole Commonwealth, together with the cost involved in providing the new and original machinery of the Federal Government, are charged per capita. In view of these facts, the objections to what is said to be the complicated method of dividing the expenditure must fall to the ground. I now pass on to the next objection taken to the scheme before us, and that deals with a much more debatable matter—I mean the Western Australian case. The case put by Mr. Henry this afternoon for Tasmania is altogether different from that put before us by the Western Australian delegates. The case of Tasmania, which might under certain circumstances also be the case of other colonies, is that she is impoverished. I do not use that word in an offensive way, but merely to express the facts of the case. It is pleaded that we should treat the case of Tasmania as a special one, particularly, it is said, when we have treated that of Western Australia in a special manner. But the plea of Western Australia is not poverty; the plea to which the Finance Committee listened was this: A very large proportion of the goods which they consume are not brought from abroad, but from the states proposed to be in eluded in this Commonwealth. The consumption of colonial manufactures and produce in Western Australia is considerably more than double, in its proportion, what is consumed in other colonies. Therefore, Western Australia does present a condition to which Tasmania, or any other colony, affords no parallel. Western Australia is in this position, that owing to the surrender of duties upon goods of colonial produce and manufacture she must, taking that fact into consideration alone, lose a very much larger sum than from that cause can be lost by any of the other states. Of course, it is more than probable, I think it is certain, that against the loss sustained by Western Australia through the renunciation of duties upon goods of colonial produce and manufacture, there will be set the larger revenue which on certain items she will gain under a uniform Tariff. For instance I think in nearly all the other colonies there is a beer excise duty; there is none in Western Australia. That would probably return £40,000 a year in Western Australia. In nearly all the other colonies they have duties on tea and sugar; it is almost certain that under a uniform Tariff there will be duties on tea and sugar. Should they be imposed, Western Australia will obtain from items on which there is nothing charged at present £120,000 a year, so that on those three items, without spending time in mentioning others, there is a probable revenue to be realized by Western Australia in excess of any revenue which she gets to-day from these three items of about £160,000. The gain upon these items, and probably upon other items, must be set against the loss which Western Australia will suffer under intercolonial freetrade. Still, after all allowance has been made for such items, the fact that Western Australia trades so much with other states will cause her to lose a great deal of money in proportion to the loss sustained by other states. That arises from the fact that she trades with us rather than with outsiders. I do not think she should sustain a loss for such a cause; we should rather place her in a better position because she trades with, us. Is not her trade worth something to us? The Right Hon. Sir George Turner asked why should we all contribute something from our revenue to make up the loss of Western Australia? My answer to that question is, if we do not I do not think we can fairly expect Western Australia to come into this Federation. If she did not come into the Federation there would be customs duties at all her ports against the goods and manufactures of the Commonwealth. We practically say to her, under these proposals-"If you will come into the Federation, and keep your ports open free of duty to the produce and manufactures of the other states, then for five years the other states will give you a subsidy equivalent to the loss you suffer over and above the loss suffered by the other states as a return."
That is a fair thing for Western Australia, and I think it is a fair thing to the other states, who, in return for the money they pay, will secure free-trade with Western Australia.
Mr. DEAKIN. -
Is not that true of all the colonies?
Mr. HOLDER. -
Yes, but it is true to a very much larger extent, and to a very much larger amount in proportion, of Western Australia.
Mr. DEAKIN. -
But the difference is one of degree, and not of principle.
Mr. HOLDER. -
The honorable member has a very acute mind, and I must have put my views very clumsily if I have given him that impression. In the other colonies the surrender they make is about equal, but when we have balanced each other's surrenders, Western Australia stands far and away beyond all the rest as suffering a larger loss in proportion than any one of the other colonies—a loss vastly out of all proportion—and it is that excessive proportion of loss that we propose to compensate her for, and not the whole of her loss. I think that that justifies the special treatment of Western Australia which the Finance Committee have recommended.
Mr. DEAKIN. - But the point I sought to make—not that there is very much in it—is that it is not a question of principle, but a question of expediency, owing to the particular circumstances.
Mr. HOLDER. -
I think there is some principle in it, while at the same time I agree with Sir John Downer that there is also some expediency in it. It partakes of both principle and expediency. The principle is in the fact that we are acting fairly in meeting the excess of loss by Western Australia; and the expediency of it is that by making up that excess of loss, the other colonies get a very great and increasing market for their produce and manufactures in Western Australia. But it may be said that we have already a market in Western Australia, and that we shall retain that market in spite of her somewhat heavy customs duties on some of our goods. The fact that we have the market of Western Australia at present, despite her heavy Customs Tariff, is regarded by some as a proof that we shall continue to have it in the future. But I dispute that. I believe that just as these colonies, one after the other, have become independent of middle houses in respect of their importations from abroad, and just as they have gone to the cheapest rather than the nearest market, one by one, so Western Australia will come to the same stage, probably, until her own producers, whom she is encouraging wisely and well, meet her needs. Very many of the goods which Western Australia has, up to now, obtained from these colonies, because they are near, and because of the relationships that subsist between houses in these colonies and branch houses in Western Australia, will, in the near future, to a large extent, be obtained from abroad unless we retain the market of Western Australia for our own products and manufactures by some such means as these. We are gaining something very material by bringing Western Australia into the Commonwealth, and getting her ports free and open to the goods of our producers and manufacturers. Again, there is a marked difference between the cases of Western Australia and Tasmania. The case for Tasmania was put very strongly by Mr. Henry, but he has not given due weight to the present facts in Western Australia. Western Australia has an enormously large revenue from Customs and Excise, out of proportion to the other colonies, because she has within her borders an unusually large proportion of adult males, as compared with the rest of the population—an enormously greater proportion of adult males than any of the other colonies.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
About 50 per cent.
Mr. HOLDER. -
It is a very large proportion, I know. I have the figures here, but I did not wish to load my speech with them. Now, that enormous proportion of adult males is the explanation of the large Customs revenue per head of Western Australia; but as the women and children composing the wives and families of adult males also go to Western Australia, the excessive proportion of the adult male population will fall.
Mr. ISAACS. -
According to the statistics that proportion is lowering now.
Mr. HOLDER. -
No doubt it is, and it will steadily decrease as time goes by. Now, the bookkeeping system, whatever its demerits, has this merit—that it will exactly meet the requirements of the case. As the excessive proportion of adult males in Western Australia diminishes, so her participation in the surplus of the Commonwealth Customs revenue will get nearer and nearer to an equality with that of the other colonies. Now, we know that remarkable developments are taking place in the mining industry of Tasmania. Those developments have led, are leading, and must continue to lead, to very much the same condition of affairs in Tasmania as we now see in Western Australia.
Mr. HENRY. -

Oh, no; we have too good a climate there, The men bring their women and children with them.

Mr. HOLDER. -

For some time, while railway works are going on and mineral development is taking place, and large sums of money are being spent in labour and materials, there will be an influx of adult males into Tasmania out of proportion to the women and children in that colony; but all these things will equalize themselves as time goes on. For a time there will be that disproportion, and therefore, for a time, Tasmania may expect a boom in her Customs and Excise. But when that occurs, very much of the weight of Mr. Henry's plea for Tasmania will be gone. At the same time, I am quite willing to do anything that can be done fairly and reasonably to meet the needs of Tasmania. There are one or two difficulties which seem to me to stand in the way. The proposal with regard to Western Australia, as it appears in our recommendations, was originally suggested to be applicable to all the states. That is to say, that after we had provided for a certain method of the return of the surplus according to the revenue, there was a proposal that there should come in a special arrangement providing that any state which suffered more than the average amount of loss of Customs revenue through the introduction of the uniform Tariff should be subsidized to such an extent as to bring that loss down to the average amount of the loss sustained by the other colonies. That would have met the case of any state whose loss was exceptional, but honorable members will see that to put in any such provision as that applicable to all the states would take the very life and force out of the other proposal that the surplus should be returned according to revenue, and it is no use providing in one clause that the surplus shall be returned according to revenue, and then in another clause that some other principle must prevail. Either the surplus must be returned according to revenue, or upon some other basis; we cannot have two principles in the Bill. I contend that the provision we make to meet the needs of any state or states must be special and not general. Mr. Henry suggested that a provision should be inserted in this Constitution to protect any state which might find itself in financial difficulties.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Before you leave the case of Western Australia, I would like to ask, for information, can you tell me why it is provided that the basis upon which a special advantage is to be given to Western Australia is to be the Tariff immediately before the imposition of uniform duties, giving Western Australia two years after she becomes a member of the Commonwealth to fix her Tariff?

Mr. HOLDER. -

The reason of that is is this: That we might have taken the Tariff of to-day, or of any fixed date, and have said that that should be compared with the Federal Tariff; but to have done anything of that kind would have been to suggest that Western Australia would be likely to play some tricks upon us.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We have done that in regard to bounties.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Well, the provision in regard to the bounties gives a very good opportunity for any colony that wishes to play tricks with the Federation to do so. There are four months ahead. That shows that we are prepared to trust each other, and that there is no necessity for putting in any provision which would seem to imply that we mistrust Western Australia.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There is no mistrust about it.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The trend in Western Australia is towards a diminution of customs duties. We all know that the Premier of Western Australia, during a recent session of Parliament, promised to take off certain duties, and, as I said before, the trend is in the direction of taking off and reducing duties. And is there any reason why, if there be a higher Tariff there to-day than there will be within two years' time, or at any other time in the future, we should compare the facts of the uniform Tariff with the facts of a Tariff in Western Australia higher than it is necessary to compare the Uniform Tariff with? We should take the Tariff which is the ultimate form of the expression of Western Australia's thought in that particular, and compare that with the Federal Tariff.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You think, then, that Western Australia may reduce the advantage which is given to her by this clause?

Mr. HOLDER. -

What I say is that Western Australia is now reducing her Tariff, and I do not think she is at all likely to alter her local policy because of the possibility-which may be more or less remote-of the incoming of federation. Referring to the remarks which have been made as to Tasmania, I would observe that I do not think that Tasmania should ask us to put a special provision in the Constitution to the effect that the solvency or the financial strength of any state should be guaranteed by the federal authority.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
But the revenue of the states should be guaranteed.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Well, I will mention presently why I think that the revenue should not be guaranteed. If we put any clause in the Constitution to that effect, it means that the federal authority may stand more or less behind any state in its financial difficulties, and that will be a direct inducement to careless financing.

Mr. HENRY. -
Would not the Federal Parliament do so in any case?

Mr. HOLDER. -
No doubt; but the less we say about it the better, because the more we say that the Federal Parliament will be likely to stand behind any state in its financial difficulties the more the states will be liable to think that there is a big and powerful body behind them if they get into financial trouble, and so we shall be striking a blow at the absolute self-reliance of the states. I think that any such provision would have that tendency.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
What guarantee have we against careless financing on the part of the Federal Parliament?

Mr. HOLDER. -
I will refer to that point in a moment. But still, while I have said what I have said, I am impressed with the importance of doing all we can to secure the adhesion of Tasmania, and to prevent any financial calamity that we can foresee coming upon that colony or any colony; and if Mr. Henry can provide or suggest to the Drafting Committee any plan which will avoid the dangers I fear, and accomplish the ends he and I alike would be glad to gain, no one would support him more earnestly than I would.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Can you not give us a guarantee that our expenditure shall not be more than so much per head?

Mr. HOLDER. -
I do not see how that could be done. We could not insert a provision declaring that Tasmania should not pay more than so much per head, without inserting a provision which would also apply to every one of the colonies; that is to say, without providing that in no case should any state pay more than so much per head. But if we did that, we might as well give up the bookkeeping system, strike out all provisions with regard to the surplus, and, in fact, give up the whole scheme. That one solution, if it could be adopted in the Constitution, would solve the whole difficulty. But I do not think we are prepared to accept that; and if the other colonies were, New South Wales certainly would not accept such a solution of the difficulty. Replying to Sir Edward Braddon, I understand the right honorable gentleman to ask whether we could not guarantee to the states a certain amount, I think there are three objections to that proposal. The first was admirably answered by Mr. Henry in his speech. He pointed out that there are not two states with financial difficulties, and two without any, so that there might be a balance, and the weaker states might go to the wall; but that, out of five colonies here represented, four would absolutely need, under the conditions prevailing, to secure an adequate revenue by the federal authority returning an adequate surplus to the states. Supposing that if we have four to one, one of those four being a larger state, I do not think that the smaller states need be under any apprehension that their interests will not be guarded.

And that will work in two ways. The preponderating votes of four states against one in both Houses will secure not merely that the revenue of the Commonwealth shall be large, but that that Government shall be so administered, and the expenditure of it so limited, as that as large a sum as possible shall be returnable to the states. I think that that will guarantee economy on the part of the federal authority, guarantee the keeping down of expenses to the lowest limit, and guarantee the return to the states of as nearly as possible as much as they obtain from customs duties to-day. I ask another question on this head: Are we attempting the formation of a Federation whose Parliament shall be composed of Russians, whose administration shall be alien, and who shall care nothing for us at all?
Surely not! If we were so doing it would be better for us to form a Constitution much fuller of guarantees and limitations than that which we are forming. But we are forming a Federation under which our affairs will be handed over to whom? To ourselves! Surely we do not need all these guarantees and limitations. We are not even handing over our affairs to others of our own flesh and blood, but to ourselves; and I do ask that those who are so anxious to see these guarantees and limitations will realize that fact, and will see in it the strongest guarantee and the most perfect safeguard they can desire to secure.

Mr. HIGGINS.

May not the needs of these four state Treasurers induce them to press for a revenue-producing Tariff rather than a protective Tariff?

Mr. HOLDER.
I do think that the needs of the four states referred to will necessitate the Federal Government, no matter whether they be protectionist or free-trade, making a Tariff which will produce £6,000,000 a year. The Tariff may be framed either upon protectionist or free-trade lines, but no matter how framed the Federal Treasurer, whoever he may be, will be under the necessity of having a Tariff which will produce a little over £6,000,000 a year.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
But it may interfere with protectionist policy.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I do not think so.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It may.

Mr. HOLDER. -
At any rate, whether the fiscal policy be free-trade or protectionist, or whether it partake of the nature of both, what I am sure of, and I am as sure of this as I can be of anything, is that the Federal Tariff will be so framed as to produce just over £6,000,000 a year; that is, what the Tariffs produce to-day in the five states here represented. I do not think that the Federal Tariff will produce less, and I believe that the increase of duties upon foreign goods will make up for the loss of duties on intercolonial trade, so that we shall have as much to distribute then as we collect now in the, various states.

Mr. ISAACS. -
How do you make up £6,000,000 for federal needs?

Mr. HOLDER. -
By so framing the Tariff that it will produce £6,000,000.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes, but why do you say that £6,000,000 will be required?

Mr. HOLDER. -
Because I do not think that the federal expenditure can be met and a sufficient sum returned to the states upon any less total revenue. The absolute needs of at least four of the states represented here will require that the total sum available for meeting the federal expenses and for distribution among the colonies shall not be less.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I can understand the honorable member if there is to be a compulsion upon the Commonwealth to return a certain amount.

Mr. HOLDER. -
There will be this compulsion, that four out of the five states represented here cannot remain solvent unless the Federal Tariff produces that amount, and these four states will be able to out-vote the fifth state in both the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

This will put them where they are now.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Yes, with one qualification, to which I shall refer presently. There is another point with which it seems necessary to deal. Is it not clear to us all that the prosperity of the Federation will depend upon the prosperity of every state in the Union? Can the Commonwealth be prosperous and pay its way if one of the states of the Union is in a hopelessly involved condition? I think not. Therefore, for the protection of its own prosperity, for the security of its own good name and as the Federal Government will want to borrow money it must be careful of its good name—it will have to raise not less than £6,000,000 by Customs taxation.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Will it not require a Tariff almost as high as the Victorian Tariff to produce £6,000,000?

Mr. HOLDER. -

That will depend upon the class of goods upon which you place duties, and upon the number of items upon the free list.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Some honorable members seem to think that a much larger sum will be required.

Mr. HOLDER. -

If you are going to meet the needs of the weakest colony of all, and are going to accept Mr. Coghlan's figures as correct, you will want a Tariff which will produce £8,000,000 or £9,000,000; but I do not accept his figures as correct except as a matter of pure calculation. I do not dispute, though I understand that the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) does, the arithmetical accuracy of the calculations, because I have not checked them; but Mr. Coghlan makes the fatal assumption that the facts of trade as they exist to-day, with free-trade in New South Wales, high duties in Victoria, and varying duties in the other colonies, will be the same when the duties throughout the Commonwealth are uniform, and we have intercolonial free-trade. We will imagine for argument's sake that an average duty of 15 per cent. is imposed throughout the Commonwealth. Does anybody believe that with such duties in force, as large a volume of foreign goods will come into New South Wales as come in to-day? No. Does anybody believe that there will not be a larger volume of foreign goods coming into Victoria?
To assume, as Mr. Coghlan does, that the facts of trade will be the same today as under vastly different conditions in the future is to assume what no reasonable man ought to assume, and the basis of his calculation being a wrong one, his conclusions must be wrong. Therefore, what he says as to the probable insolvency of Tasmania, the difficulties of South Australia, and the heavy losses of Western Australia, falls to the ground. There may be something in his statistics indicating the probable direction of trade, but the vane upon the top of the steeple, while it indicates the direction in which the wind is blowing, does not make the wind blow. If a Federal Tariff should be imposed to produce a little over £6,000,000, New South Wales will contribute a much larger amount than she contributes to the £6,000,000 which are raised now. We are supposing, for the sake of argument, that the Tariff will be a 15 per cent. Tariff. Under these conditions New South Wales will contribute more than she does now, and the return to her must be larger, because of her larger population, and the return to the other states proportionately less. It was this consideration which led me to say, in reply to the interjection of the honorable and learned memb

the Tariff would have to produce a little over £6,000,000 a year.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It is that which is at the bottom of the trouble of Tasmania.

Mr. HOLDER. -

It is at the bottom of the whole financial trouble. It causes the difficulty which met us in Adelaide, in Sydney, and here, and which is evident in every newspaper article and pamphlet. I do not think that the revenue derived from importations into New South Wales would be so enormous under a uniform Tariff as some people imagine, because a very large quantity of manufactured goods and produce now imported from abroad would be imported from this and the other colonies. These goods would come in free, and thus contribute nothing to the revenue. On the other hand, there would be a larger importation into Victoria, because of the lowering of the Tariff, and in all probability a larger contribution to the revenue. I have been told a good many times, and with some truth, that the way to increase the revenue is to reduce customs duties, that it is possible to make the customs duties so high as to shut out articles altogether, and thus lose revenue. I must now pass rapidly on to the next point to which I wish to refer. I think I have dealt sufficiently with the ease of Western Australia, and I have pointed out that the force of her plea lies not in her poverty, but in the fact that she trades with us instead of with strangers, and that we must meet her by giving her a concession to which the whole population of the Commonwealth will contribute per capita. The next objection which may be taken to our scheme might be raised with regard to the proposal relating to bounties. I admit the force of much that is said in regard to the proposal to allow bounties to be given or agreed upon until the end of June next. It might be possible to abuse this concession. I think that the colonies which most desire to see bounties established are South Australia and Victoria, and if they pleased to do so no doubt they could pledge everything wholesale, and make such arrangements beforehand as would very materially derogate from the freedom of trade which we desire to bring about. But we trust each other, and we do not believe that either South Australia or Victoria will so shape their policy in reference to the promise of bounties as to derogate from the freedom of that trade which ought to exist between us here in these colonies. That is another matter in which we trust each other, rather than bind each other down by, a hard-and-fast rule, and saying that no bounties given after a certain date shall be of the slightest value, no matter how far various states may be pledged to them. The next objection is that there is no limit to the expenditure, as there was in the Bill as it left our hands in Adelaide. If there was one small clause more than another-not involving principles probably so much as other clauses did-which was offensive, it was that clause which tied, or attempted to tie, the Federal Parliament in leading strings. We were going to call into existence a body to which we were intrusting large powers, and yet this body was to be tied in leading strings by being told that it must not incur any new expenditure more than £300,000 a year, and must not spend in works and services taken over more than £1,250,000 in excess of their earnings. It seemed to me all through a very unworthy and profitless attempt to do one of two things-either to tie the Federal Parliament in leading strings, or to throw dust in the eyes of the electors, and because I thought so I am very glad to see that the clause does not appear amongst the recommendations of the committee. I do not abandon what that clause was intended to achieve, but we hope to secure that economy, not by this method but by the better method to which I have referred. We rely on the application of the votes of four-fifths of the states entering the Federation to secure the economical management of the whole of the affairs of the Federal Government. I have dealt with all the objections which I remember at the moment to the scheme we have brought up. It may seem to be a very formidable list of objections, but, I ask, is there any other scheme against which a more formidable list of objections cannot be brought? What are the other schemes we have had? In 1891, except for the two years before the uniform Tariff was to come into force, practically the recommendation was to trust the Federal Parliament. If I were to start to state the objections which have been raised by one and another to that plan, I think I should take a good deal longer than I have taken. We should not be able to recommend that, I am sure, without any limits to the electors whom we represent. Then it has been proposed that we should keep books in perpetuity, that we should maintain for ever a system of bookkeeping between the different states. I could very soon raise more objections to that than have been raised to the plan before us.

[P.832] starts here

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That has not been advocated.

Mr. HOLDER. -
It has been advocated in the press with a good deal of persistency in some places.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Not in this Convention.

Mr. HOLDER. -
No. Then, as regards the sliding scale, I think when things had worked themselves out, and five years had passed, we should have become aware that it, after all, would have suited us very well. There are, however, some 300,000 or 400,000 very solid objections to the sliding scale. I do not know how many more objections there are, for I forget just now the number of electors in these states. The vote of every elector who could not be made to see through all the intricacies and the final results of such a scheme is a solid reason why we should not adopt the scheme. Equitable I believe it to be, as well as fair and right in its operation, but if the electors cannot be brought to assent to it, we must abandon that which, if pressed on the people, would wreck the federal movement. I have occupied a good deal of time, but I have sought to use no word which did not appear to me to be necessary to use. I have not dealt with all the interesting points in these recommendations, but I think I have said enough to show that it is possible to answer to a considerable extent the various objections to the scheme. I hope I have said enough to show that, whatever objections may be urged against this scheme, there is no other scheme which is free from them, that our search to-day is not for a scheme which is ideally perfect, not a scheme to which no one can find an objection, but a scheme which we can most fairly and with the most reasonable anticipation of success recommend to those whom we represent, for their final acceptance, and that scheme is, I believe, the one which the Finance Committee has brought down. I would have liked to have seen the term for the bookkeeping reduced below five years; but five years is a very short period in the life of a nation. I would have liked to have seen the per capita distribution brought in earlier; but there is no blinking the enormous injustice which would be done by it to Western Australia, to say nothing of any other state. Therefore, we must waive that. I do not like, from other points of view, leaving this financial problem to be fought out after the first five years are passed in the Federal Parliament, with the possibility every year of a vote having to be taken for the allotment of the surplus to the various states. I can see that that involves a possibility of states being bought and sold in the Federal Parliament. But that is one of those matters in which I trust the Federal Parliament. If we can trust each other here to-day not to buy and sell the several states we represent, cannot we trust those who will be as honorable as we are, who will be of ourselves? Cannot we trust them five or seven years hence to be as fair and as honest as we claim to be here? I think we can. I believe we shall have to trust them, because it seems to me that to lay down any rigid plan is to wander off into the region of prophecy again, and we cannot safely do that. I hope, therefore, that the recommendations of the Finance committee, faulty though they may seem in some eyes, will yet be substantially acceptable to the Convention, and that it will be prepared at an early date to pass on to other important matters which yet remain for our decision.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Although I am, on the whole, in favour of the recommendations of the Finance Committee, and prepared, if necessary, to vote for them, subject to such modifications as may be made in the clauses, still I think it would not be a good thing that we should endeavour to close this debate today. Its relative importance, compared with that of other subjects, is so great that I think it would not be a good thing that we should endeavour to close this debate today. could not well be carried on in their absence. At four o'clock, or at the termination of any speech shortly before that hour, I propose to adjourn tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to.
Progress was reported.
The Convention adjourned at five p.m.
Friday, 11th February, 1898.

Notice of Amendments - Return: Customs and Excise - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENTS.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
Did I understand the leader of the Convention yesterday to ask that proposals to recommit clauses and also amendments thereof should be given notice of publicly or otherwise?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I expressed a desire that honorable members should give notice of their proposals in order that they might be printed and circulated.

The PRESIDENT. -
It will not be necessary for honorable members to give notice of their proposals publicly, but if they are handed in they will be printed.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I have here a return showing the average annual amount of customs and excise duties that would have been receivable under the Tasmanian Tariff from certain articles entered for consumption in five Australasian colonies, during 1891-5, and I beg to move that it be laid on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on-

Clause 81 (Chapter IV., Finance and Trade). - All revenues raised or received by the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, under the authority of this Constitution, shall form one Consolidated Revenue Fund, to be appropriated for the public service of the Commonwealth in the manner and subject to the charges provided by this Constitution.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -
I do not intend to pose as a financial expert, but I think it is incumbent upon every member of this Convention who has given any attention to the general outlines and principles of this great and important financial problem, to state his opinions; not that those opinions will necessarily be adopted at the present time, but, at any rate, to show that every possible feature and phase of this great financial question has received attention in this Convention. Otherwise it might afterwards be said that this problem, which has engaged the attention of all the friends as well as the enemies of federation for many years past, has been suddenly disposed of by a scheme being adopted without due consideration. Now, I join with those members of the Convention who yesterday expressed their general approbation of the scheme which has been propounded. I was very pleased indeed to hear several leading members of the Convention, who may justly claim to speak with authority on matters of finance, say that they see their way clear to express general approbation of this scheme. At the same time, they expressed certain reservations, and admitted that this scheme, although it represents the final conclusion of our committee of experts, is not in every respect satisfactory. That seemed to be generally conceded. I do not know whether there is any reasonable chance of making any suggestion which might tend to modify this scheme. Probably it will be hopeless, considering the state of the opinion of members of the Convention generally, to upset the scheme as submitted by the Finance Committee. Now, while I express my general approbation and satisfaction at this scheme, I feel bound to call attention to one or two points that have not been properly adjusted, which I consider is a matter for regret. I think I can at the outset congratulate the members of the Bathurst Federal Convention, of which my honorable friend (Mr. Walker) was a leading member, in drawing attention to the fact that the financial scheme recommended by the Bathurst Federal Convention has been in the main, adopted and embodied in this Constitution. In the main, I say. There are several exceptions to that statement to which I wish to draw attention. At any rate, it may be mentioned, as a tribute to the industry and thought contributed by that Convention to the federal problem that, in the main, the outlines of its recommendations have been adopted. I will point out, however, that even that scheme, as adopted, admits of criticism. Of course it must be admitted that that scheme, or rather the modified scheme embodied in these proposals, can only be regarded as a temporary expedient. As the result of my consideration of the financial aspect of federation, I have been driven to the conclusion that there are two conditions required to make a perfect financial scheme. The one condition is, in my opinion, that the states ought to be substantially indemnified for and in respect of the revenue they surrender; and the second condition is that any final adjustment of the finances ought to be based on a complete federalization of revenue and a complete federalization of expenditure. Therefore, this separate account system must only be regarded as a temporary expedient, or as a means to an end—that of getting over preliminary difficulties, and arriving at a generalization which may lead the Federal Parliament to a more perfect scheme for the federalization of revenue and expenditure. I say that the fundamental condition of a true scientific settlement of this financial question is that the states ought to be indemnified against the surrender of revenue. Now, I will draw attention to this important factor of the financial problem. It may be asked, what is the revenue surrendered? Well, I think it is not fair to select any particular year, and say that that is the revenue surrendered, because the revenue fluctuates from year to year. It was in view of that consideration that I asked for a return at Adelaide, showing the annual amount of revenue collected in each of the Australian colonies during the last ten years. That return will be found in one of the printed dapers, No. 8. Now, I think that a return based upon the revenue received during ten years may give a fair and reasonable idea of the value of the revenue-producing power surrendered by the states to the Commonwealth.
The scheme adopted at Adelaide selected one particular year—the year before the introduction of the uniform Tariff—to ascertain the basis.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
It would be rather difficult, in a continually progressive community, to follow your suggestion.
Dr. QUICK. -
I admit that, but you can thereby get at the actual value of the revenue surrendered for ten years.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
But you may have changes of fiscal policy, as well as changes of natural conditions, to take into account.
Dr. QUICK. -
A period of ten years would include changes of fiscal policy, changes of natural conditions, and changes of revenue. The return therefore gives a fair idea of what the states will have to surrender to the Federal Parliament in the shape of revenue. Shortly summarized, it shows that the average Customs and Excise revenue, not including post and telegraph and other incidental sources of revenue, for ten years, in New South Wales amounted to £2,132,185 per annum, and in Victoria to £2,360,000 per annum—a much larger sum.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
You cannot argue from these figures unless you know under what policy the revenue was obtained.
Dr. QUICK. -
The figures I have given show the amount of revenue that will have to be given up by the two colonies named. South Australia will have to give up £568,000, Western Australia £349,000, and Tasmania £321,000. If these states surrender these enormous sums to the Federal Government, ought they not to be indemnified in some substantial legal manner in the Constitution? Otherwise what security have they for the continuance of their local sources of expenditure? I am aware that it has been said that we must trust the Federal Parliament; but upon the face of this constitutional instrument that we are framing there will be nothing whatever to bind the Federal Parliament to raise revenue in excess of its own requirements. The point that strikes me is this: Ought we not in this federal instrument, which deals with such a vast surrender of financial resources, to make some provision to secure to the states an indemnity equivalent to the revenue surrendered by them? On the other hand, ought we, as is now proposed, to leave the states practically at the mercy of the Federal Parliament? I know that there are difficulties, but we ought to face this problem first. The colonies are to give up these large amounts, and they are told that they must trust the Federal Parliament. Of course we feel quite justified in using that argument; but what will the statesmen of the future have to say? They will say that this federal instrument has left the finances of the various states at the mercy of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Do you not think that the statesmen of the future will know the conditions under which we are working.

Dr. QUICK. -
Yes, but I am afraid that this provision will lead to a tremendous scuffle and struggle in the Federal Parliament, because the states representatives will try to secure for themselves that portion of the revenue which they have surrendered, while the states Treasurers will be left in a condition of doubt and uncertainty, and of dependence upon the federal authority. The danger is that this deprivation of revenue, and the uncertainty which it will cause, may lead to some extent to the degradation of the states. It will to some extent remove them from the position of independence and certainty which they enjoy at the present time. Whilst we wait to build up a Federation, we do not want to do anything which will lower the honour, the dignity, and the individuality of the states.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Does not the honorable and learned member see that any guarantee would have to be doubled in twenty years?

Dr. QUICK. -
I am aware that the amount of the indemnity should not be fixed for all time. The revenue-earning power of our customs duties increases from year to year, and consequently it might be advisable to provide that the amount of the indemnity should be readjusted every ten years.

Mr. SYMON. -

Would not that lead to a scuffle and trouble every ten years?

Dr. QUICK. -

That would not be so bad as an annual scuffle.

Mr. SYMON. -

Is not an annual scuffle better than the possibility of doing injustice now?

Dr. QUICK. -

I cannot see where there could be any injustice in giving the states an equivalent for the revenue they have surrendered. I do not want to suggest any line of policy which would be specially embarrassing to any particular state. Speaking on behalf of the colony of Victoria, I was very pleased to hear the true federal note uttered by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner yesterday; but I think it well that attention should be drawn to the fact that, under the present scheme, this colony stands to lose more than any other state represented in the Convention, because we derive more revenue from Customs and Excise than is derived in any other state. Our friends from Tasmania complain that they too will be great losers.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Lower duties often mean an increase, not a decrease, in revenue.

Dr. QUICK. -

Yes, but the scheme mentioned by my honorable friend is based upon the assumption that only £6,000,000 will be required by the Federal Government. If that amount were raised by a 15 per cent. Tariff all round there would probably be a great falling-off in the revenue of Victoria.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not think that that is at all certain.

Dr. QUICK. -

I hope that the honorable member is right, but, according to Mr. Coghlan's figures, which have been placed before of revenue, it should be subject to such terms and conditions as to economies and retrenchments as the Commonwealth Parliament saw fit to enforce. Suppose the colony of Victoria came out in the first few years with a loss of £500,000, she would be placed in a serious position, but the loss might be reduced by local retrenchments in its parliamentary, vice-regal, or other departments. The local Government might have difficulty in carrying these retrenchments and economies, but if the Federal Parliament was to indemnify them against loss, it should be able to say-"You shall have this indemnity if you effect certain retrenchments."
Mr. REID. -

Could you retrench any more in Victoria-you have been at it a long time? I fancy that you have got down to the bone now.

Dr. QUICK. -

There are certain departments, such as the parliamentary and vice regal departments, from which under federation less work would be required, but, unless the local Government were strengthened in its motive for retrenchment, economies might be very difficult to carry out. Whilst I am strongly in favour of an indemnity, to protect not merely Tasmania and Western Australia, but also Victoria and South Australia, I would not make the indemnity absolute. I would make it conditional, and I would place it in the power of the Federal Government to discuss the matter with the Treasurers of the various states. Referring now more particularly to the recommendations of the Finance Committee, I will point out one or two directions in which I think there might be some improvement, without in any way impairing the efficiency of the scheme proposed, or the principle upon which it is founded. I mentioned just now that the five years' separate account system is largely founded upon the Bathurst scheme, but there are one or two divergencies to which I desire to draw attention. Clause 90 provides-

Until uniform duties of customs have been imposed, there shall be shown, in the books of the Treasury of the Commonwealth, in respect of each state:-

I. The revenues collected from duties of customs and excise and from the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the state to the Commonwealth by this Constitution:

II. The expenditure of the Commonwealth in the collection of duties of customs and excise, and in the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the state to the Commonwealth by this Constitution:

III. The monthly balance (if any) in favour of the state.

From the balance so found in favour of each state there shall be deducted its share of the expenditure of the Commonwealth.

There is also a clause in the Bill which provides for the taking over of certain departments by the federal authority immediately upon the establishment of the Commonwealth, and it is further provided that, both during the two years before the coming into force of the uniform Tariff, and in the five years following, during which the bookkeeping or the separate account system is to be in force, each state is to be debited with its actual expenditure, without any discrimination between what may be regarded as essentially local expenditure and what may be regarded as purely federal expenditure.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is provided for in the proviso.

Dr. QUICK. -

The proviso to which the honorable member refers is that which states that-

Any expenditure of the Commonwealth not incurred only for the maintenance or the continuance of a department of the service of any one state as existing at the time of the transfer, but originated by the requirements of the Commonwealth in respect of services or powers transferred, shall be taken to be incurred by reason of the original powers given to the Commonwealth by this Constitution.

What I wish to draw attention to is that whilst the expenditure in conducting and administering the Customs and Excise departments may fairly be treated as local expenditure, as may also expenditure in connexion with posts and telegraphs, and may fairly have debited against it local state expenditure-

Mr. REID. -

That is to be so for five years.

Dr. QUICK. -

I agree with that; but what I do not think is right is that naval and military defence during the five years is to be treated as mere local expenditure.

Mr. REID. -

We have arranged for that. The wording of one of the clauses provides that any permanent work shall be treated under the original powers of the Constitution, which means that the expenditure shall be borne per capita.

[P.838] starts here

Dr. QUICK. -

The provision uses the words-

Any expenditure of the Commonwealth not incurred only for the maintenance or the continuance of a department of the service of any one state as existing at the time of the transfer,-

Does that cover it?

Mr. REID. -

Read on.

Dr. QUICK. -

but originated-

Mr. REID. -
That would be new expenditure.

Dr. QUICK. -

by the requirements of the Commonwealth in respect of services or powers transferred, shall be taken to be incurred by reason of the original powers given to the Commonwealth by this Constitution.

Does that provide for what I am contending for!

Mr. REID. -

Suppose the Commonwealth in carrying out its duty in reference to federal defence should think proper to originate a fortification somewhere, that would be undertaken under the original powers of the Constitution, and the expenditure would be borne per capita.

Dr. QUICK. -

So I understand; and if that be true, and no doubt it ought to be as regards new requirements for federal defence, the same provision ought to apply as regards existing works and the maintenance of them for the purposes of federal defence. It is all true federal expenditure, and ought to be borne as such from the beginning of the system. Defence expenditure is peculiarly federal expenditure.

Mr. REID. -

As to past expenditure, unless you treat all that is represented by works as within the scope of federal finance, you open up a question which would be far more troublesome than the money would be worth. Who is to decide which is a work that we should pay for, and which is a work that a colony itself should pay for? You could not separate the objects.

Dr. QUICK. -

I do not think there should be any discrimination in matters of federal defence. In my opinion, all matters of federal defence should be charged as against the Commonwealth, under the exercise of its original powers, from the beginning. Of course, I do not know how it would work out.

Mr. REID. -

In regard to works it will be so.

Dr. QUICK. -

I know; but why should not the Finance Committee suggest that all defence expenditure should be federalized from the beginning? Why wait for the five years? It does not affect the raising and distribution of revenue. It will be most embarrassing should any state desire to keep down its expenditure upon defence at a time when expenditure might be absolutely necessary for the defence of the state. My contention is that the Commonwealth should have the supreme control of expenditure for defence from the very beginning, because there is no more vital source of
Mr. REID. -

There was a good deal of support to your view in the committee, I might mention.

Dr. QUICK. -

I am glad to find that the point was not overlooked. Indeed, it was only to be expected that it would be considered. I would strongly urge the federalization of defence expenditure from the beginning.

Mr. REID. -

That is the true principle, no doubt.

Dr. QUICK. -

Every man, woman, and child in the community is vitally interested in expenditure for the purposes of defence.

Mr. REID. -

In money it would be a very small matter, because in the smaller colonies a comparatively small amount of money has been expended, although in the larger colonies a larger sum has been expended.

Dr. QUICK. -

I do not think there is any objection on that score. Therefore I would suggest whether the committee should not put naval and military defence under paragraph (b) of sub-section (2) of clause 90. The same argument will apply with equal force to ocean beacons and buoys, ocean light-houses and light-ships, and quarantine, because the citizens of the Commonwealth are uniformly interested in having a good system in regard to these matters. I think we should accustom ourselves to the system of federalization as far as possible from the beginning; and I feel certain that unless that be done in regard to defence, at any rate, this scheme will receive very hostile criticism outside, and probably the Convention may be accused of a want of breadth of view, as well as of a want of patriotism. There is no financial difficulty arising in regard to the distribution of the surplus in the matter of federal defence, and therefore I would suggest that the matter should be considered as one of importance. Undoubtedly, the proviso to which Mr. O'Connor has directed my attention is a very good one. It goes a long way to meet some of the points I have mentioned.

Mr. HOLDER. -

It is a half-way-house to complete federation.

Dr. QUICK. -

Yes; and I am glad that it has been put in, because it points out that, as regards new enterprises in connexion with the transfer of departments, they will be federalized from the very time of the accomplishment of them. That will remove anything like local opposition, such as might arise in a particular state against local expenditure because local expenditure would increase the local debit, and, therefore, decrease the local participation in the surplus. Consequently, the representatives of that particular state might, in order to increase the surplus share of their colony, go in for parsimonious economy. The provision referred to will remove that objection. The only other important clause which I desire to call attention to is clause 93. It sets forth what is to take place after the five years of bookkeeping. That, of course, raises a very important consideration. One can see on the face of it that the clause embodies a compromise, and leaves to the development of the future the system which shall be adopted. I join with Sir George Turner in the expression of the hope and belief that the system to be adopted after the probation period will be the true federal system, namely, the distribution of expenditure and of surplus according to population. We should do all we can to accelerate the time of the accomplishment of a true federal system. The clause leaves room for some doubt. It says that the distribution shall be-

On such basis as shall be fair to the several states, and in a proportion and after a method to be determined by the Parliament.

On the face of it, that looks extremely equitable and fair, and one cannot but hope that the Federal Parliament would, as in duty bound, deal with every state in a spirit of fairness and equity. But at the same time I do not see why we should not be able to embody in the provision something a little mo

Would it not be a dangerous thing to give the Commonwealth power to make a bargain with any state?

Dr. QUICK. -

I do not know that it would. It might be useful for the Government of a state to be able to inform its local Parliament that they would have a greater share in the federal surplus by carrying out certain local economies.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Would it not be difficult of interpretation?

Dr. QUICK. -

I do not know that it would. Of course, the suggestion is necessarily founded on the stipulation I started with. I do not think that the Federal Parliament should indemnify the states without imposing limitations making the indemnification subject to such terms and conditions as it might be thought wise to impose. Of course this, like all other matters connected with this great problem of finance, is surrounded with considerable difficulty, and I do not pretend to say for a moment that the proposal I have put before the committee is perfectly possible of accomplishment. I join with Sir George Turner in saying that, notwithstanding the objections and difficulties which I see in regard to the scheme which has been presented to the committee, and which is no doubt the result of anxious labour and consideration on the part of the Finance Committee, I, for one, shall be pleased to heartily join in recommending it to the favorable consideration of the people of Victoria.

[P.840] starts here

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I do not rise for the purpose of following my honorable and learned friend (Dr. Quick) through the very interesting details with which he has dealt in his speech, but rather for the purpose of expressing my general adhesion to the scheme which has been submitted to this committee. But I should like to say that I join with Dr. Quick in hoping that if it can be brought within the scope of the clauses here drafted the expenditure for military and naval purposes of the Commonwealth will be federalized. I should like also to express my own personal indebtedness to the speakers who have preceded me, who have dealt with the subject in detail, and with a very great deal of experience and knowledge of the conditions in their own states with regard to this question. I regret that I did not hear all the speeches; but I did hear that of my honorable friend (Mr. Henry) and that of my honorable friend (Mr. Holder), and I think we may all congratulate ourselves that speeches of so much interest and thought should have been brought to bear on this subject.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON. -

I also join with my honorable and learned friend (Dr. Quick) in sincerely congratulating the members of the Finance Committee on having been enabled to present to the Convention the report which we have before us, and on the scheme which they have been able to evolve. It seems to me, speaking generally, that that scheme is founded upon just and sensible principles. It seems to me that it breathes the spirit—at any rate, it breathes the desire—to be fair and just all round, and that, I think, is an excellent omen for its ultimate acceptance, with perhaps minor modifications. It is also a very good omen for the consideration which it will receive from this Convention. In two respects I was struck, on reading the report of the Finance Committee, with the fairness of spirit exhibited. The first was with regard to the treatment to be accorded to Western Australia. I think that where we find a condition of things such as exists there, and such as has been explained on behalf of the Finance Committee, it is only a just and proper thing that exceptional treatment should be applied; so that the possibility of severe injustice or severe inequality may be avoided. The other point which struck me, as indicating the great fairness of mind brought to bear on the subject by the Finance Committee, was the provision which had been inserted guarding against those difficulties which might possibly arise owing to imports into a free colony, before the uniform Tariff came into operation, being used in such a way as to work unfairly to the commercial interests of another colony. That is a provision which I am exceedingly glad to see embodied in this report, and to which I shall give, at the proper time, my entire assent. Now, it has always struck me that one of the most valuable contributions to this financial discussion, from the very commencement of our labours, was that expressed in the very shortest possible form by my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan), when he said that the financial problem was insoluble. I did not take him to mean that it was impossible to feel that we, in this Convention, are doing justice, if we irrevocably settle in the Constitution the basis upon which the surplus revenues shall be distributed or returned to the various states some seven years hence. In other words, that we should feel that we were doing an injustice, if we assumed to lay down, finally and definitely, the time at which the per capita contribution—which I believe with Dr. Quick is that which is most federal and which most commends itself to our judgment—should be brought into operation. After all, the question involved in the scheme that is now under consideration is not so much the mode of distribution, although upon that, undoubtedly, the Federal Parliament will have a free hand; but it is as to the time at which the federal method of distributing this surplus shall be brought into operation. It is no reflection on the Finance Committee—it is no reflection either on their genius or their financial ability—it is no reflection on this Convention, that we shrink from facing the responsibility of laying down in the Constitution a rigid rule of that kind. There are men on the Finance Committee as capable as any men in the world of accomplishing this task if it were possible; but the difficulty is that we do not possess, at this moment, the data or the materials by which we can be guided. The whole subject is purely speculative, and, in point of fact, in the proposals which have now to a large extent gone by the board the proposals of 1891, and the proposals at the Adelaide session last Year—we were really invited to a work of-prophecy, and not a work of practical statesmanship. Financers, like diplomatists, ought to strive to deal with as few matters as possible that are unknown in solving their problems, and you can no more, in dealing with a financial question, prophesy, "unless you know," than you can in any other matter affecting our daily lives. I am glad that in the scheme now proposed the attempt has been abandoned to lay down that any rigid basis of distribution shall come into operation years hence, with a changed condition of things whose outcome we cannot possibly know and cannot possibly foretell. Therefore, to the principle underlying this proposed scheme, I shall give all the support I can in connexion with the settlement of this print in our Constitution. As to the plan proposed, it was said by my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) yesterday that it was "rough and ready." Now, it seems to me that that applies rather to the circumstances, that it is rough and ready, not so far as the principle of the plan is concerned, but so far as collecting or obtaining the information to which the principle is to be applied. The principle, it seems to me, is perfectly clear and precisely defined. The only difficulty is that statistics in this, as in other things, are not obtainable with perfect accuracy. It seems to me certain that everybody will get his own, perhaps not in each particular case, but all round. The one may lose a little here; but if he loses a little here, he will gain a little there; and so in the long run the probability is that things will equalize themselves, and there will be an average of fairness, even so far as amounts are concerned, which will prevent the possibility of injustice being done. Now, my honorable friend (Dr. Quick) has put the principle that each colony should be substantially indemnified for the revenue surrendered. To that, in substance, I assent. That is what we ought to strive for—that there shall be restored to each state as nearly as possible what it has contributed, less its share of the federal expenditure. That seems to me to be a sound principle, and I think it is the principle on which we have all been proceeding, and on which the Finance Committee, in their treatment of the subject, and in the report which they have presented, have also proceeded.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Do you mean to fix that in the Constitution, or to leave it—to the Federal Parliament?

Mr. SYMON. -

I am coming to that. I may state that I am dealing with this matter not as a financier, but looking at it, as nearly as I can, from the point of view of principle; and I intend to say a word on that point in a moment. The principle to which I have referred is actually carried out up to the imposition of the uniform Tariff. Then, if the contributions of all the states were equal, per capita, and the proportion of the federal expenditure was imposed per capita, no difficulty whatever would arise. But it is admitted that the contributions are not equal per capita. Now, there are two observations which suggest themselves to me on that head. So far as that inequality depends on the varying conditions of consumption, modes of life, and so on—just as in England one county or one town does not contribute, per capita, as much to the Customs as another county or another town—so far the inequality cannot be guarded against. This is one of the incidents of union. It is one of the incidents which it is impossible to overcome, and, if we are a federal state, of which the basis financially is one national system of customs and excise duties, that particular incident must constantly apply, with the result that it will produce an inequality which no mortal man can overcome. But, so far as it depends—and this is the point to which I wish to invite the attention of honorable members—on the establishment of federation and the uniform Tariff it can, and may, to a certain extent, be obviated. It is hoped that the inequalities may adjust themselves after a series of years—that, in other words, the influence of the temporary disarrangement will cease; and that when the disturbances occasioned by federation and the uniform Tariff are at an end, that particular source of inequality may be partially, if not altogether, overcome. Now, we cannot do this by any attempt at prevision, so as to declare the time when these difficulties will be partially or wholly overcome, or sufficiently overcome, to enable us to say that a fair result has been arrived at. Therefore, the committee suggest that the determination, not so much as to mode of distribution, for a reason that I will mention directly, but as to the time when the mode of distribution shall be determined, shall be left to the Federal Parliament, because I take the essence of this recommendation to be that we are to proceed for the purpose of acquiring all necessary data for a minimum period of five years. That is to say, the Federal Parliament is to have primarily the power, and to have imposed on it the duty, of determining whether the results of those five years are enough to enable them to say that any particular method of distribution will be more just than another.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It is a temporary bridge to enable us to get over the difficulty.

Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable friend, by a metaphor, has well explained the matter. It is a temporary bridge which may cross the gulf which we are all seeking to get across; but the bridge may be found to be insufficient in length, and may have to be extended. That is an excellent description of what the position would be under those circumstances. Then it is suggested that, as it is simply a minimum, the time be abridged so as to still more enlarge the discreion of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON. -

Now, if any honorable members who are much more familiar with how these financial questions work out than I can possibly pretend to be are satisfied with an abridgment of that minimum period, I am perfectly content to go with them, and shall go with them if anything of the sort is proposed, because it simply comes to this: A large body of us in this Convention are agreed that the fairest and most federal mode of distribution is per capita. The probability is that the Federal Parliament will take the same view, and, if they do, or if we feel there is some reliance as far as method is concerned, that that will be the method most likely to be adopted in the fulfilment of the federal idea, it seems to me that the discretion we are leaving to the Federal Parliament is merely to say when they consider the data will be sufficient, and when they consider this per capita distribution ought to be brought into operation. I take no exception to the bookkeeping. I never did. I never saw the inconvenience and embarrassments which some honorable members felt in connexion with maintaining the bookkeeping system. It will involve some expense, perhaps the keeping in repair of the border custom-houses, or the places, at any rate, where the officers needed for getting information may live. But, as far as the expense is concerned, it is a mere bagatelle, and looking at the object we have in view, the duration of it is a mere drop in the bucket when you consider that this federation is to be for all time. Therefore I never could understand the objections as to the bookkeeping, and so far as regards the difficulties in relation to obtaining f

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The objection is the obstruction to traffic and business.

Mr. SYMON. -

No doubt, and I think that is the only objection. The only real and serious objection is that it causes delay and inconvenience; but even that seems to me to be a very small matter in comparison with what we look for as the result that is to be ultimately obtained. There is another matter, and I commend this to the attention of the honorable and learned member (Dr. Quick). I have always felt that if any attempt were made to give effect to the principle which he has enunciated, and with which I also agree, that it ought to be done by an addition of something of this character without unduly hampering in any way the opinions of the Federal Parliament. I would suggest the addition of some such words as the following to the provision, leaving the mode of distribution and so on to the Federal Parliament:

Having regard to the principle of giving back to each colony a fair approximation to what it contributes, less its share of the federal expenditure.

Dr. QUICK. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON. -

I do not quite feel that I should go to the extent my honorable friend has indicated in the form of words which he has suggested, because I think it would be perhaps laying down a rigid rule which might be found very inconvenient, but possibly some such form of words would express the principle upon which this Convention is proceeding, a principle to which I think the Federal Parliament would give in its adherence without its being expressed. Still, for the encouragement of doubters, as Dr. Quick says, it might perhaps be well to have that on the face of the Constitution, not as something binding in detail, but something suggesting the principle by which the Federal Parliament might be guided, indicating to them, at any rate, the principle we have in view.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Any such indication would to some extent limit their freedom.

Mr. SYMON. -

I feel the weight of the honorable member's objection, especially on account of the great care and attention he has bestowed on the subject. I merely suggest these words, at any rate, in preference to what Dr. Quick has proposed, as something which would be more likely to express the principle rather than as a limitation to the Federal Parliament in matters of detail.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Is not that the principle that must be followed?

Mr. SYMON. -

As my honorable friend puts it to me, there cannot be anything else except an affirmative answer, but the view I am expressing, and which is in the mind of Dr. Quick, is the view which has been impressed upon us in other matters-that we have to consider those outside by whose votes this Constitution has to be accepted. If we can, without derogating from the high trust we repose in the Federal Parliament, give expression to a principle of that kind, it might be an advantage to do it. I do not say that I will, when further advised, support it, but something in that shape would be the least out of place in the fabric of this Constitution. I have no apprehension and I now come to the point to which the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) directed my attention—regard to leaving this matter to the Federal Parliament. It is true, and that is the objection that may be taken to it, that even after the Federal Parliament decide upon the mode of distribution it is liable to be altered. The subject may be brought up again, and there may be those struggles to which Dr. Quick has referred, and the basis may be open to be altered. But so far as the discretion vested in the Federal Parliament is concerned, I believe that they will be as wise, as just, and as fair as we can possibly be. The highest duty of the Federal Parliament will be to maintain the honour of the Commonwealth. If I thought myself and I say so with the most perfect earnestness—that the Federal Parliament would be likely or ready to fall into such an abyss of dishonour and corruption as would be implied in the objection which the honorable member (Mr. Holder) exceedingly well paraphrased yesterday, as meaning that the states might be bought and sold, then I, for one, would resist the establishment of this Federation to the utmost of my power. It is because I do not believe that the Federal Parliament would be guilty of such a degree of turpitude that I am willing to support the Constitution as we are now framing it, and that I am willing to leave this, among other matters, to the arbitrament and settlement of the Federal Parliament. There is one remark I should like to make as to the provision of clause 93, and to call Mr. O'Connor's attention to it. Clause 93, which confers upon the Federal Parliament the discretion of dealing with this distribution when it has the data before it, says the distribution is to be month by month amongst the several states, and on such a basis as shall be fair to the several states, and in a proportion, and after a method to be determined by Parliament. Now, I invite the consideration of my honorable friends on the Drafting Committee to these points in connexion with that. I am very doubtful whether that would not import the Federal High Court into the settlement of this matter. If you say "on such a basis as shall be fair to the several states," then you immediately open up the question which was so forcibly pointed out in connexion with the removal of the Judges, as to whether or not you are withdrawing from the Federal Parliament the final determination of the subject.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The word proportion may raise the same question.

Mr. SYMON. -

That may be the case. I direct attention to it, because I do not think any honorable member will accuse me of not seeking to magnify the powers and functions of the High Court. I think it everywhere essential that those powers should be co-extensive with liberty. But this distribution is a political question. It is a question of public policy, and, therefore, whilst I desire that every right that savours of what is judicial should be dealt with by the High Court, I am utterly opposed to any question of policy being remitted to that tribunal. Of course, my doubt may be unfounded. At any rate, if there is a doubt words should be used which will remove it, and will settle this point once and for all. The matter is one which ought to be entirely within the jurisdiction of Parliament, which is the arbiter on all questions of policy, and be taken away from a tribunal to which such questions are utterly foreign.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Since the honorable member mentioned the matter to me yesterday we have prepared an amendment which will, I think, prevent the words from having that meaning.

Mr. SYMON. -

I should, I think, strike that provision out. There are portions of the Constitution in which we may naturally and not improperly use such words as fair and just, but inserted here they seem to imply that the Federal Parliament, unless controlled by some other body might possibly commit an act of unfairness in regard to the allocation of these moneys amongst the different states. It is unnecessary, it might work great injury, and it is inconsistent with the respective functions of the legislative and the judicial powers. So far as the exceptional treatment of Western Australia is concerned, I do not know what view honorable members from that colony take but exceptional treatment on the basis indicated by Mr. Reid yesterday I am quite willing to accord. But then, as Dr. Quick has pointed out, and it must be obvious to everybody, there are other risks. There are risks all round, but each colony takes the risk, and the great object we should have in view is to minimize, as far as we possibly can, these risks. I was greatly impressed, yesterday by what Mr. Henry said as to the position of Tasmania; and I was even more impressed by, what Mr. Reid said, in the very fair and liberal view which he took of their unique financial position, if I may so express it. It was gratifying to hear Mr. Reid declare that, in a matter of the magnitude of that with which we are dealing, £30,000 or £40,000. from the Commonwealth to keep a particular state out of grave financial stress would be a mere bagatelle, not to be thought of for a moment. If we seek for an adjustment that will bring, us to the uttermost farthing we shall never reach it. We shall simply be pursuing a will-o'-the-wisp that will lead us to destruction. I think that Mr. Henry is unduly apprehensive. I do not know whether he was present on what I may call the convivial or hospitable occasions the other evening, when we listened to a speech from Sir Edward Braddon, in which he declared that if Tasmania, had not already achieved she was rapidly achieving a foremost place amongst the mineral-producing, states of Australia. Now, if that is the case, is it not probable that within a very few years we shall have an immensely increased population in Tasmania? With all those favorable conditions, which have proved so satisfactory, financially, to Sir John Forrest in Western Australia—with the consuming power of all those heavily-customed articles amongst a preponderating male population—may not Tasmania, instead of sinking behind in the per capita collection of customs, go ahead of some of the other and older colonies? Tasmania's position, so far as regards exceptional treatment, is not on the same footing as Western Australia. It is quite different. Different reasons apply to it, and there is room for a great deal of consideration in reference to the remarks made by Dr. Quick as to the suggested indemnity. I think it would be, impracticable to have an indemnity. It would not only be impracticable, but it might be vicious in its operation. At the same time, it is worth considering whether there should not be in this Constitution some power enabling the Federal Parliament to go to the financial relief of a state.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It is risky.

Mr SYMON. - I admit it is risky, but the question is worthy of consideration.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

If you reduce the period to three years, the Parliament would have a free hand at the end of the three years.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes; and I am not sure that the Constitution as it stands is not elastic enough to permit of the Federal Parliament coming to the rescue of a state in a financial difficulty. It ought to be, and probably is, within the power of the Constitution to preserve a state from bankruptcy, just as much as from extinction in any other way. We have a clause in this Constitution which obliges the Commonwealth to protect the states against foreign aggression and domestic violence. That is clause 112, and financial stress may be very nearly as disastrous to a state.

Mr. LEWIS. -
Ought not that to be expressed?

Mr. SYMON. -

If there is a doubt on that subject, it might and ought to be expressed. I am not sure that it need be expressed, and for this reason. It would be within the power of the Federal Parliament to come to the rescue of a state against foreign aggression, and the serious point is whether we should not gravely consider the advisability of having a power in the Constitution to enable the Commonwealth to come to the relief of a state in time of financial disaster. The destruction of a state may just as much be involved in financial trouble or in bankruptcy as in a foreign invasion. The whole object of the Commonwealth is to maintain the existence and the prosperity of the different states. In all probability the representatives in the Federal Parliament would not stand idly by and see any state reduced to financial straits, but would find some method under the Constitution of preventing such an unfortunate result.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It might encourage reckless provincial finance.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am not at all oblivious to the difficulties that might arise, and to the objections to it. It might, of course, produce less care and less prudence in the financial arrangements of the states; but, on the other hand, each state would have the fear of the Federal Parliament before its eyes, and we know that the Federal Parliament would not take any steps which would have the effect of inducing such extravagance as would be likely to bring about an appeal to the Federal Exchequer. I do not desire to add anything further. I do not propose to enter into any details as to the figures. I have endeavoured to refer to the principles which I think underlie this scheme, and those principles commend themselves to my mind so far as I am able to appreciate them. I have made these observations in order that I might be clear as to what this scheme meant. The exceedingly interesting and instructive remarks of my honorable friend (Dr. Quick) this morning have assisted very much to make clear what really is the intention of this method. I hope, and I believe, that this scheme will be favorably received and favorably considered. On the face of it it seems to me to be a combination of prudence and of boldness. It has got rid of all the trouble involved in our endeavour to finally determine and settle now the question of how this money should be distributed at a distance of seven years from the time at which we are operating, in a country in which the changes are frequent, where ups and downs are constantly occurring, and where no man can tell what the outcome may be a year hence of either the political policy, or the social or commercial progress, at the present moment. I believe this scheme will receive general acceptance, and that it will do much, perhaps more than we can at this, moment realize, to finally settle this question, and to bring about the early accomplishment of the great issue upon which we are engaged.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I think, sir, that I should offer some observations with regard to this very important matter, although the very favorable manner in which the recommendations of the Finance Committee have been received leaves me but little ground for criticism. It must be gratifying to those who have taken so-much trouble in the preparation of this scheme to find that their recommendations have received so much support. Every one will admit that the question is a difficult one. Statistical calculations are not reliable in dealing with such a matter, because we have to assume so many things. One statist may be able to prove one result by assuming certain things as likely to be facts, and another statist may be able to prove exactly the opposite. I must at once say that my thanks are due to honorable members of the Finance Committee and of the Convention for the reasonable and generous way in which they have sought to meet the admitted difficulty that exists in regard to Western Australia. I have no desire to speak on this matter at all, so far as that part of it which relates to Western Australia is concerned. I am not, on this occasion, going to urge strongly the recommendations of the committee. Unless they meet with the approval of honorable members, I should prefer to leave the matter without any special advocacy on my part. I must admit, however, that the recommendations of the committee are based upon some suggestions that I made, modified by the suggestions of other honorable members. I felt that there was a great difficulty, and every honorable member of the Finance Committee admitted that there was a difficulty, in regard to the financial position of Western Australia. I have no desire to speak on this matter at all, so far as that part of it which relates to Western Australia is concerned. I am not, on this occasion, going to urge strongly the recommendations of the committee. Unless they meet with the approval of honorable members, I should prefer to leave the matter without any special advocacy on my part. I must admit, however, that the recommendations of the committee are based upon some suggestions that I made, modified by the suggestions of other honorable members. I felt that there was a great difficulty, and every honorable member of the Finance Committee admitted that there was a difficulty, in regard to the financial position of Western Australia. I am, I may say, in accord with the views expressed by this committee. Leaving out, for a moment, that part which refers to Western Australia, we have adopted, I think, the only course which is likely to give satisfaction here, and to meet with support outside. As has so often been said, it is impossible for us now to provide for what may be necessary some years hence. The conditions of all these colonies are rapidly changing; that one which may now appear to be lagging behind, or to be the poorest, may, in a very short time, be well in the running, or even in advance of the whole of the others. I should have preferred if the Finance Committee had not made the case of Western Australia a special one. I am still of the opinion, and it was my suggestion, that some general plan might have been devised; in fact, the plan which is contained in this report would, I think, have done very well if it had been made applicable to all the colonies. That, however, did not find favour with others, and therefore I was obliged to agree to Western Australia being treated in a special manner. I see no necessity for this difference being made. I believe that Western Australia, although her case is exceptional, has no right to be treated in a different way from all the other colonies. I think that this plan, if applied to all the colonies, would have been just and fair to all, and would have been equally just and fair to Western Australia. There have not been very many observations made during this debate which call for any criticism from me. Those who are opposed to the provision being made which is recommended by the Finance Committee, and who desire that Western Australia should form a part of Federated Australia, must remember that we have a very heavy task before us. We are, I think, in a very different position from any other colony in Australasia, for we are in a position where federation is least advantageous to us. It is more difficult to impress on the people of Western Australia that there will be any advantage at the present moment in federation than can be the case in any other colony, and for various reasons. We have only recently entered into our patrimony. We have only had self-government for seven years, and those years have been years of unexampled prosperity. During that period our population has increased from 50,000 to over 160,000, and our revenue from £400,000 to nearly £3,000,000 a year, while our trade has increased from £1,500,000 in 1890 to over £10,000,000 in 1897; and, what is still more satisfactory, the tide of prosperity seems to be still on the flood. I only mention these facts to show the difficult task those who are advocating that Western Australia should join in this Federation have before them. We have at present but few exports to send to these colonies except gold, and that, of course, is an export which is welcome not only here but throughout the world. We have certainly some of the best hardwoods known in the world, but in all these colonies you have excellent hardwoods-in my opinion not so good as ours, but still quite good enough for most of your requirements. It may be urged-"But then there is the great question of defence. Australia, as a federated dominion, will be able to defend you from outside aggression" But those who are opposed to us will say-"How can Australia defend us? our defence must come from across the seas. The only power which can defend us is the navy of the great nation to which we belong. There are 1,000 miles of unoccupied country lying between Perth and Adelaide; there are no means of communication by land except by pack-horses and camels, and, therefore, the only aids of defence will have to come from across the sea, and we know that there is no navy in existence at the present time, except the navy of Great Britain, which can defend us." I hope that no one will think, because I mention these facts, that I am opposed to federation; I only mention these facts to show the difficulty we are in. We shall be told that there is, no necessity for Western Australia to federate. But worse than that, we shall be told that there is no advantage in federating, unless it be the advantage of being a part of a nation. If, in addition to all these arguments, we also have to meet the objection that we shall lose a third of our Customs revenue-between £300,000 and £400,000 a year-and also to face the producers of the colony and to tell them that not only will we lose a third of our revenue, but that the loss of the revenue will be adverse to their interests, and that they will lose the protection which the customs duties now give them; I think every one will admit that our difficulty will be increased. Of course we can tell them, as was suggested in a journal to-day, "although you lose the protection which you have now, although you lose that revenue, it really will not be lost, it will be in your pockets, and you can raise the revenue by direct taxation on land." That, of course, will be an excellent argument for me to address to the farming community of Western Australia!!! These are the reasons why I think some special consideration will have to be shown to Western Australia. It is no advantage to us whatever that this clause should be made to apply specially to Western Australia. It would be more agreeable to me, and quite as advantageous, if its application had been made general to the whole of Australasia. I am glad to be able to record that the case of Western Australia as a special case has been fully recognised by every one on the Finance Committee, and I think must be fully recognised by every one in this chamber. I have shown the position we will have to face in Western Australia. It may be said that the representatives of these colonies will also have to face like difficulties. I will show you that that is not so. While we shall not be able to show that there will be any material gain, as far as I can see-and if I am wrong, I only hope and pray that some one will tell me, so that I may have that argument to use-while we shall not be able to show that there will be any material gain, I think the representatives of these colonies, every one of them, will be able to show to the people they represent that federation is going to give them material gain. We all know that Victoria has, under protection, for a quarter of a century, built up manufactures to such an extent that she is now longing for the time to come when she will have an outlet for those manufactures, and that free-trade throughout-the-Australian colonies will give her the markets she now absolutely requires To a smaller extent that is the case in other colonies, if not in manufactures, certainly in products. New South Wales with her immense, products, South Australia with her products is looking with eagerness all over the continent to see where she can get free admission for her products. The bar to the admission of the products of those colonies into other colonies is their protective or revenue Tariffs I would ask honorable members whether this desire for free markets on the part of the people of Victoria, South Australia, and New South Wales is a greater incentive to federation than their desire for nationhood? I put this question directly to every one in this Convention—which desire of the people of those colonies is the greater, the desire for the free markets of Australia or the desire for nationhood? I leave them to answer the question. The incentive for free markets does not, however, apply to Western Australia in the same way as it applies to every other member of this group. We are great consumers; we do not produce anything like what our people require That is not the case with any of you. You produce more than you consume, and your desire is to find markets for your surplus I do not want any one to gather from my remarks that the people of these colonies have no feeling of patriotism no desire to begin to form a nation to be a great power in the Southern Hemisphere—to build up another Great Britain. That of course, is a splendid idea—an idea that I think every true Australian must have within him—but I believe that the material interests of the people of this country are a stronger incentive to bring about Federation than the desire to become one nation which we hear so much about. Well, my object in putting this position as forcibly as I can, is to show, that the incentive of material interests is not at present with the people of Western Australia. You, cannot show them that it is. I have thought this matter over very carefully, and all I have ever tried to do is to show the people of Western Australia that they would not lose by federation. I have never attempted for a moment to try to show them, that, at the first, they will be gainers by federation. I will ask honorable members who speak after me to show, if they can, that my arguments are erroneous, and that what I have stated in regard to Western Australia also applies equally to other parts of Australia. Now, sir, what does the proposal that has been put forward by the Finance Committee mean? It means that, by the operation of the uniform Tariff, and the operation of intercolonial free-trade, Western Australia shall not lose during the first five years more, in proportion to her Customs and Excise revenue, than the average, proportional loss of all the colonies from the same cause. That is all I take it to mean—that we shall not lose more on that account than the average loss of all the other colonies.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Suppose two of the colonies lose nothing, do you reckon them in?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Yes, whether they gain or lose.

Mr. WALKER. -
Will you exclude New South Wales, because she will gain.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
No. The losses and gains will be taken, and an average will be struck.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That was never intended. It was never intended to bring in the gains.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
But otherwise you will be giving a large, amount to New South Wales. She will certainly

If you bring in New South Wales gains Western Australia will get nothing at all.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I really ask the honorable member not to exert himself in the cause of New South Wales. Under any circumstances, New South Wales will come out very well.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I have been spending a fortnight looking after your cause.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I am much obliged to the honorable member, but I do not think we will find very much opposition to this arrangement from those who represent New South Wales. It may be said that Western Australia will not lose. If that is the case, there will be no harm done, but I think every one will admit that Western Australia is likely to lose a great deal. The effect of this clause is that Western Australia is guaranteed that for five years her proportional loss of Customs revenue will not be greater than the average proportional loss of all the federated states. As I have said before, I am not here to press this arrangement on the Convention. I do not intend to say one word more in advocating this arrangement. It is for honorable members to say whether it is an equitable arrangement, whether it is based on what is right and just, and, if they say it is not, then I shall say no more about it. Now, it may have occurred to some honorable members, after listening to what I have said, that I have made some observations in the course of my speech which would mean that it is altogether disadvantageous to Western Australia to enter this Federation, and that, therefore, it is almost certain - at any rate very probable - that she will not enter it. But I think that is not the case. I think that there are ways in which all these colonies can be assisted, and in which they will be attracted towards the cause of federation. I am sure that, in making these observations, no one will accuse me of having any interested motives, because Western Australia is in this position, that her debts are not excessive, while her population, her revenue, her trade, and everything else are increasing. We have had no difficulty whatever up to the present time in meeting our engagements. But I think that the one great lever that can be used by the Convention to make this Constitution attractive to some of the colonies which may be lukewarm in the cause of federation is that the debts of the colonies should be federated. That will give relief to some of the colonies, and very probably will be a great inducement to others to join the Federation. It seems to me that one of the great practical objects, one of the great results that we expect to achieve-at any rate, it is one that I expect will be achieved from the federation of these colonies, leaving out of consideration all those patriotic sentiments, ideas, and reasons which prevail with all of us, I hope-is that we will strengthen to an immense degree our financial position in the world. Therefore, if we wish to make this Constitution attractive, we must give ample and full powers, even more full than they are in the Bill before us, for the consolidation of the debts of Australia. By that means I believe we will do a great good to every colony in this group; we will have a unified stock, which will be readily saleable, and which will result in a very large saving to the people of all the colonies of Australasia. That is the great practical object which, in my opinion, will be one important result of federation. And, of course, there are other objects to which I have on other occasions referred. One is that federation will lift us up as a people, will give us a higher political life, will broaden our views and sympathies, and make us more important in the estimation of the world. Those also, of course, are objects which we all desire to attain, and in the achievement of which we shall all assist. I hope that I have shown that Western Australia is in such a position that she does not come here to ask for anything to which she is not entitled. The committee have brought forward these recommendations not, as might be supposed, after strenuous advocacy from me, and not, as might be supposed, in order to meet strong objections on my part. The task which I and my honorable colleague had to perform was a simple and easy one. We had no difficulty whatever in showing the committee the peculiar position in which Western Australia is placed by great advance and prosperity. Even now, under these conditions, Western Australia will be a larger loser than any other colony through joining the Federation. Therefore, knowing that, and feeling that these recommendations have come forward, I might say almost without advocacy on my part, I now leave the matter with honorable members. I shall not say another word in regard to the claims of Western Australia in this matter, and if the committee, after viewing all sides of the question, come to the conclusion that this proposed arrangement is not reasonable, or is not just to all the colonies, then my only hope is that with one accord they will strike it out.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I am sure we are all exceedingly glad to have heard the sturdy and exhilarating speech of Sir John Forrest, who has put, from the federal point of view, in exceedingly clear language, the position of Western Australia, and has accentuated his sense of the desire we all knew he possessed to promote the federal movement, although he may have been conscious, perhaps, that, for the present, the advantage from union would not be as great to Western Australia as it would be to the other colonies of the Australian group. I intend to make a few observations on some detailed portions of the scheme, with that deference which is due to the great ability of previous speakers, and also to the fact that we have had some of the ablest financiers of the colonies on the Finance Committee, who have had access to data which is not accessible to us. But, just as it is between the endless jar of right and wrong that justice resides, so the truth of this matter may lie between the different views that have been expressed, may be the resultant of these opposite opinions, and discovered by a review of the position of things as it now confronts us. I would like to make a suggestion in regard to one or two clauses, more for the purpose of having my doubts cleared away, than of making any dogmatic assertion that those clauses are not clear or fair in their incidence. The provision made by the intended clause 89 is that goods imported into any state before uniform duties of customs have been imposed, and thence within two years exported into another state, are to be charged with the duty which is in force in the state into which they are exported, minus any duty previously paid. What occurs to me, as a matter requiring perhaps a little consideration, is that the Federal Executive will be in almost exactly the same position on the introduction of the uniform Tariff as a local Treasurer is at present on such an occasion. The Tariff will be drawn up after consideration by the Executive, and the moment it is delivered to parliament, the duties proposed to be imposed by that Tariff will be immediately leviable. So that it occurs to me that there is really no necessity for this clause.

Mr. HOLDER. -

What about the goods brought in before that, into New South Wales, for instance?

Mr. GLYNN. -

The importations before that will be the ordinary importations.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

They might be extraordinary, in view of the impending uniform Tariff.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I appreciate that point also, but I am merely pointing out another aspect of this question. At the same time, I think that there will not be very large importations into New South Wales in view of the impending uniform Tariff, the character and details, of which importers cannot assume.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

But it is almost certain to be higher than the existing Tariff of New South Wales.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The average of the duties may be higher, but how can New South Wales importers ascertain, with any degree of accuracy, the amount of the duty on any particular article imported under the uniform Tariff?

Mr. HOLDER. -

They can practically guess it now.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I question that prophecy also. We have two classes of Tariffs that may be proposed. There may be a free-trade Tariff, or there may be a protectionist Tariff, but the protectionist Tariffs of the colonies differ in character considerably. A free-trade Tariff is of course essentially different from a protective Tariff. In England, there are only about 40 lines upon which duties are imposed.

Mr. HOLDER. -

There are only about half-a-dozen in New South Wales.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes; and how can you with any degree of approximation ascertain beforehand what the general character of the Federal Tariff will be, beyond that it will probably be protective?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

You may take that as a certainty.
Mr. GLYNN. -

I understand perfectly why the clause has been put in, but I say that it is the result of fears as to importations which are not strongly justified by the probabilities of the case. I merely make this remark as a suggestion, because it is inadvisable to keep up artificial expedients of this sort, unless a great injury is likely to result from the absence of them. It was very well pointed out yesterday that the re-exports from one colony to another will be exceedingly difficult to follow, and Mr. Pulsford, in a pamphlet which has been sent by him to the Convention, indicates several lines in regard to which you could not say that the re-export was from another colony, or from outside the Federation. With regard to clause 90, the honorable and learned member (Dr. Quick) has very properly mentioned that in his opinion the defences of the colonies should be federalized from the very start. But, under the provisions of clauses 90 and 91, the defences and services like the post and telegraph service will not be really federalized for about seven years, because the bookkeeping system is to apply, not only to the Customs revenue and expenditure, but to all the departments the control of which is to be handed over from the states authorities to the federal authority. Although there may be a slight difference in the expenditure upon defences per head in the various colonies, that difference is to a large extent due to the differences in efficiency, and by amalgamation the comparative inefficiency of, say, the Tasmanian defences will be made up by the increased efficiency of the New South Wales defences. While Tasmania will be paying a little more towards the maintenance of the defences of the Commonwealth, she will receive, as a compensation, the advantage of the greater efficiency of the amalgamated defences. Then with regard to telegraph services. I suppose the provision contained in the clause was inserted in view of the exceptional position of South Australia in regard to her post and telegraph services. That position is one of advantage, but I, as a federalist, am prepared to surrender it in order to secure the greater advantage of federal union. According to the statistics presented to the Convention in Sydney, South Australia is the only colony which makes a profit on her post and telegraph services.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

No; Western Australia and Tasmania both make a profit out of those services.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is not shown by the figures to which I allude.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Those figures are out of date.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Well, that fact is an evidence of the uselessness of dogmatizing as to what is likely to occur in the future. If in six months there has been this variation in the receipts of one department of the service it is difficult to estimate what will take place in the future. I refer to these figures, however, as they are the last comprehensive statistics which are available to me.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The honorable member would not federalize the expenditure until he also federalized the revenue.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I would federalize the post and telegraph services and other similar departments, excepting, of course, the Customs department, from the very start, though undoubtedly South Australia would have to surrender an advantage which is not to the same extent possessed by any other colony in the group. According to statistics presented to the Sydney Convention, at the close of the financial year 1896-7, South Australia had made a profit of £15,000 upon her post and telegraph services. When these services are amalgamated throughout the Commonwealth we shall have to surrender that profit, and we must also bear our share in the total loss of £267,000, which it is estimated will occur. Why is it that South Australia is in this exceptional condition? It is because of its present anti-federal position. Its rates are, I think, on the whole, higher than the rates prevailing in most of the other colonies, and it has a great advantage by reason of its geographical position.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Is not the South Australian service credited with work done for other departments? That is not the case with the services of the other colonies.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I am not sure about that. My contention is-and I am speaking from the point of view of those who argue against South Australia-that the advantage which the colony, has at the present time is the result of de anti-federal attitude and of its geographical position. That is emphasized by the interjection of the honorable member. Referring to the statistics prepared by the Victorian Statistician, and embodied in a Blue-book presented to the Convention, I find that, in 1895, South Australia received from telegrams £89,000, New South Wales £126,000 and Victoria £95,000. If you take into account the differences in population, you will at once see that the receipts of South Australia must be due to its exceptional rates, and to its position in relation to the other colonies. Recognising this, however, I am prepared to consent to the amalgamation of the post and telegraph services from the first, feeling that there would be a compensation in other directions. For this reason I agree with the remarks made by the h instance, lines such as beer, spirits, and three or four others, from which about 50 per cent. of its total Customs revenue is realized. The consumption of whisky, alcoholic liquor, and narcotics in Western Australia is abnormal, but this abnormal consumption is not likely to keep up for more than another three or four years. We see by the statistics presented yesterday by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest that within the last few years there has been a declension in the proportion of males to females in Western Australia, and that must, to a large extent, affect the consumption I speak of. The lines to which I have referred will, therefore, cease to be so productive of Customs revenue in the near future as they are at the present time, and the character of the Tariff must be changed to meet this falling-off in revenue. I merely mention this matter for consideration in connexion with clause 92, in order that it may be ascertained whether we are really balancing upon the best method.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The percentage of Customs receipts to the whole revenue was 48-63 in 1894, and during the last half year, 37-87.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes; and it has been pointed out by Mr. Johnston that if you take the mean consumption by males of five or six lines, for the five years ending 1896, you will find that it has declined about 10s. per head. Therefore, if the revenue is to be kept up by a change in the Western Australian Tariff, you cannot ascertain, under the method suggested by clause 92, what the proportionate loss of Western Australia will be. As regards clause 93, I certainly think it is a mistake to allow the Federal Parliament to re-open the question of the payments to be made to the states. Honorable members will see, by looking at the list of proposed new clauses and amendments, that I have made a suggestion for the opening up of the financial question at the end of five years, when it is to be dealt with finally. The clause I proposed to insert for the amendment of the Constitution was this:-

The proposed law for the amendment of the financial clauses of this Convention shall, if passed by absolute majorities of the Senate and the House of Representatives within five years after the establishment of the Commonwealth, be presented to the Governor for the Queen's assent.

The effect of that provision would, I think, be this: That you would have some security against undue tampering with the adjustments made at the start, because any change would have to be made by absolute majorities, and would be final. Such a change would have to be made before the end of five years, but it might be made after the end of two years. You could make your adjustments with a view to possible changes within the next ten years, but the question could not be reopened after the expiration of five years. You could at the end of that time take into account the fact that the conditions of Western Australia were abnormal, though in my opinion they are likely to tend to an approximation to the conditions prevailing in the other colonies of the group. If, however, they were still abnormal, you could make allowance for that. I say that that seems to me preferable to leaving it possible, at the end of five years, for the whole question of finance to be opened, and re-opened again interminably, at the dictation of perhaps one or two states. What is the state of affairs in Canada from the states appealing periodically for subventions? The result, as has been pointed out by Professor Goldwin Smith, is that men go to the Dominion Parliament simply as local members, for the express purposes of seeing what they can get for their states; and this has resulted in a most extraordinary and corrupt system of log-rolling. I hope we shall not give any chance of the Canadian experience being realized here.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They are always asking for better terms.

My. GLYNN. - Undoubtedly that is so. In listening to the debate yesterday, it struck me that there were one or two propositions that could be advanced in reference to this question, of federal finance. Recognising the great ability of those who have spoken previously, the ability of the Finance Committee, and also of the writers who have addressed themselves to this question, nevertheless, I think that those who contend for mathematical accuracy of balancing are forgetting the enormous advantages which will follow from the policy of union. If, as I am inclined to do, we realize that we are not partners who are settling up the accounts of a period of partnership, when figures are everything; but colonies about to enter into a partnership, when figures are comparatively little and policy is everything, we shall not be so likely to frighten the public into thinking that federation is a matter of loss rather than a matter of gain. We should remember that federation, from its economic aspect, is a partnership that by supposition, or as a corollary to the admission of its desirableness, will render the financial and other resources of the state more effective. I think, again, that we are entitled to emphasize the fact that, viewed even apart from the economies to which it must lead, and considered merely as many are wrongly considering it as an amalgamation of certain revenues and expenditures, no balance-sheet is capable of showing anything beyond the results of a single year. I think that all recent inquiries into the subject tend to arrive at that result. You cannot predicate more than what will be the result of a single year. Again, I am entitled to say that even if the working of financial amalgamation could be inferred from the balance-sheet, of a single year, there would probably be as many different inferences drawn from it as there are men to draw them; and all calculations based on existing revenues would, even if-which is next to impossible-they were correct inferences from existing data, be upset by the Tariff of the future, of which we may guess the general character, but cannot predict either the details or working. Finally, I will say that if we prolonged our calculations till doomsday, the uncertain factors of the problem would prevent us from attaining more than an approximation to a satisfactory adjustment; there being in the way two great difficulties—one the attainment, and the other the recognition, of a fair adjustment. As to the last, the attainment and recognition of a fair adjustment, that question was suggested to me by the excellent and able speech of my honorable friend (Mr. Holder) yesterday. He has pointed out that there are many merits even in the old scheme which might recommend it for acceptance, but he has pointed out also that we have not only to deal with the fairness of the scheme, but with the possible recognition of its merits by the electors of the various states. I think that what Mr. Holder has said upon that point is quite correct. You will have probably hundreds of thousands of opinions as to the fairness of the scheme. People may not be able to recognise the fairness of the adjustment made, no matter how near to a fair adjustment we may arrive. We can never have an ideal scheme, and if we did people would never recognise it as ideal. Probably there is not one man in 5,000 who can do more than rely on the recommendations made to him by the representatives of his colony in this Convention and his political leaders, as to whether any particular scheme is to be regarded as a just scheme or not. How can we expect electors to say whether this scheme or that settles the difficulties of financial amalgamation? We cannot. But we can show them that federation will result in large economies; that it will result, for instance, in great economies in the abolition of preferential rates. Have not the three Railways Commissioners of the colonies interested in the railway problem, time after time, pointed out this fact: That there are great losses of railway revenue through the system of cut-throat competition prevailing now upon our railways, and that there will be a great gain from the new policy which we hope to inaugurate? Then, again, there must be an enormous advantage economically from the simplicity of the Tariff which will come into operation under the Federation; and, once more, the results of co-operation will lead to advantages which we cannot too often draw the attention of the public to. Now, as regards the possible approximation to normal conditions of the colonies of the group within five or ten years, I would say this: I have already mentioned the abnormal consumption of Western Australia in regard to five or six lines, such as beer and tobacco. If you compare the consumption of Western Australia with regard to spirits, beer, wine, tobacco, sugar, and molasses-tea might be included also, but I think that the duty on tea has now been abolished-with the consumption of the other colonies, you will see that the consumption of Western Australia in 1895 and 1896 has been, in regard to beer, 50 per cent. over the mean consumption of the other colonies. Her consumption of wine has been two and a quarter times as much as that of the other colonies, and her consumption of tobacco 60 or 70 per cent. more. But these conditions cannot in the nature of things endure. In less than eighteen months there has been a decline in the purchasing power of Western Australia. There will probably be always there the flush of purchasing power which we see in mining centres which we see in Broken Hill, for instance-and there is always a large consumption of these particular lines due to the irregularity of living in new settlements, especially mining settlements. But as water becomes more plentiful and more pure, as family life extends and conditions become more domesticated, men will tend to settle down to more ordinary lines of life, and the consumption of these products must then diminish. So that I say that Western Australia cannot keep up the abnormal consumption I have mentioned of alcohol and tobacco, which is suggested by these statistics. And that also leads us to the hope that in future years there will be in Western Australia something like an approximation to average conditions.

Mr. Higgins. -

Do you think that a man drinks more when he has not got a wife to help him in the drinking?

Mr. Glynn. -

I do. I am speaking from experience, too. I do not know what the honorable member's experience has been, but I think that the personal equation settles the question. In the absence of females and children the rate per head being only on consumers is necessarily high. Of course it is all very well to be critical with regard to the scheme which has been suggested to us-and which, perhaps, upon the whole will give us that approximation to justice which would render federation desirable-but it may be asked-"Have you anything to offer in substitution? "It may be regarded as presumptuous on my part to offer any solution of the difficulty, but, as coming from a tyro who speaks "with bated breath and whispering humbleness," I will suggest as a plan which has against it 99 chances of acceptance, and has probably but one chance of being adopted, a distribution of the federal revenue which may fit in with the position of Western Australia. The great difficulty, which has been emphasized by previous speakers, has been that while the payments of Western Australia will be absolute, its receipts from the Federal Government will be relative. That is to say, its payments will be absolutely because the proportion of males will determine that, and the amount is not made per capita, but distribution will depend on population. But if you take the proportionate number of males to females and children in Western Australia, and equalize it with the proportion of males to females and children in the other four colonies of the intended group, it seems to me that the Western Australian receipts will be approximately correct. What is there to prevent us from dealing with Western Australia on a proportion which will be the result of averaging the number of children and females, and fixing the average by the proportion of the children and females to males in the five colonies? The point of distribution seems to be the greatest difficulty in the case of Western Australia.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Have you printed your suggestion?
Mr. GLYNN. -
No; I have endeavoured to work it out by means of figures, but I shall not attempt to give the result to the Convention now.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
It seems complicated.

Mr. GLYNN. -
If the difficulty consisting in the per capita distribution rests in the fact that there will be an unproportionate share to be received by Western Australia in proportion to payments, you can rectify that, with some approximation to justice, by equalizing the average of females and children to males with the average in the other colonies.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Better make marriage compulsory.

Mr. GLYNN. -
There is no necessity to do that in Western Australia. I do not propose to trespass any further upon the time of the Convention, but I throw this out as a suggestion, which may perhaps help us. I will say, sir, in conclusion, that I think we should endeavour, as I mentioned at the beginning, to forcibly impress upon the public who follow the course of our deliberations that no matter upon which of the financial adjustments we may decide - and they all bear the impress of a desire for equity - there are compensating factors that the mere balance-sheet can never show, factors that are the chief recommendation of federation, and which, though ignored by the accountant, determine the judgment of the statesman. If it is not politic in the arrangements of states to view too nicely the details of figures, it is because there is another side of the question than that shown by the array of pounds, shillings, and pence, a side in the consideration of which the federal movement originated, and which indicates the great economic advantages of the policy of the union. Sir John Forrest has referred to the advantages of federation. It is these solid advantages, which are much more than compensations, that make federation desirable. They include the unification of fiscal policy, the widening of commercial intercourse, the greater reality and reputation of national solvency, the probable uniformity in some 30 odd lines of general legislation, the use of our great state resources, such as railways, as in all cases aids to industrialism rather than instruments of destructive competition, the sense of mutual dependence and co-operation, the bolder front against aggression, and the greater growth and more real significance of the Australian sentiment. If these be lost sight of in the complicated and deceptive details of financial profit and loss, the fate of federation may be imperilled by a mistaken statement of its results.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two p.m.]

Mr. GRANT (Tasmania). -

I do not propose to detain the committee very long, as I only intend to make a few remarks. First of all, I wish to express my sympathy with the remarks of Sir John Forrest, in referring to the position of Western Australia; and I certainly cannot but echo his sentiment, that it was rather objection able that, in this Bill, Western Australia should be singled out for special legislation. I can well understand that, to a generous mind, it must be objectionable to find such special significance being given to any one particular colony. I think we may all take to heart the words of Sir John Forrest, that there is no occasion for Western Australia to be singled out for special legislation. I can well understand that, to a generous mind, it must be objectionable to find such special significance being given to any one particular colony. I think we may all take to heart the words of Sir John Forrest, that there is no occasion for Western Australia to be singled out for special legislation; and that the same treatment as is proposed to be applied to that colony should also be applied to the other states. With regard to the financial clauses of the Bill, I may say that, having listened with great interest to the able speech of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, I indorse almost every word which he uttered; and, therefore, my remarks will be brief on that account. Every point which my honorable friend took has my concurrence, and, I believe, the concurrence of most of my colleagues in the representation of Tasmania. Taking the finance clauses as a whole, I think the Finance Committee may consider that they have performed a very commendable piece of work, and in a spirit loyal to the Federation. The exceptions which I have to take to their proposals are few, and I cannot but acknowledge the great consideration which they have given to the matter, and the federal spirit which underlies all their suggestions. It is easy to see, on looking through the recommendations, that the true federal spirit has thoroughly pervaded them, while the opinions of each member of the committee have had due weight, the result being that, I think we may say, a very complete piece of drafting has been submitted to us, which, I trust, will in the main receive the approval of the Convention. Coming to the clauses in detail, I notice that the Finance Committee propose that, in clause 83, the words "and by warrant countersigned by the Chief Officer of Audit of the Commonwealth" be omitted. Those words were very much objected to at a previous meeting of the Convention, as it was pointed out that they might give rise to much difficulty; and I, therefore, indorse the recommendation of the Finance Committee that they should be struck out. In connexion with clause 84, Sir George Turner called attention to the subject of bounties, which has been much discussed on previous occasions. There seems to be a very strong feeling, on the part of some members of the Convention, that the granting of bounties should be absolutely and entirely with the Federal Parliament, and that states should have nothing whatever to do with this matter. Sir George Turner very ably urged that there may be certain local productions which deserve consideration at the hands of the state, but which are really too small to be dealt with by the Federal Parliament. They may be industries of a village or a small town, certainly not matters which, I think, the Federal Parliament will be inclined to deal with. I can see no reason why, with the approval of the Federal Parliament, as expressed by an Act of Parliament, bounties of a purely local character, for purely local products, should not be granted; and I trust, when we come to consider this clause, that we shall provide that the Federal Parliament may permit all state Parliaments to grant bounties for articles of essentially local production, when this does not conflict with the general fiscal system. In dealing with the future, I think we should recognise the great importance of stimulating production, and of giving all possible assistance to the various producers to find out the articles that they can supply the markets with, and to enable them to supply those articles, as far as possible, on terms advantageous to themselves, while, at the same time, not conflicting with the fiscal policy of the Federal Government. As to clause 89, I agree with previous speakers that it would be impracticable to carry out the paragraph which is proposed to be added to the clause, and which provides that—

But goods imported into any state before uniform duties of customs have been imposed, and thence exported into another state within two years after the imposition of such duties, shall on arrival in the latter state be liable to the duty (if any) chargeable on the importation of such goods into the Commonwealth, less the duty (if any) which was paid in respect of the goods on their importation into the former state.

I think that, looking at the matter from a practical business point of view, that the proper working of this proposal is absolutely impossible. It means tracing the history of every ball of cotton, every piece of tape, every bag of sugar, and all the various little details of a storekeeper's stock. It would be utterly impossible to trace the history of those articles through the two years during which this provision is intended to have operation. In regard to piece goods of various kinds used in local manufacture, and all the various other classes of goods which are liable to be exported, it is really impossible that any identification of these goods could be carried out through a period of two years, so as to insure that a proper return was made by the exporter, and the proper rate of duty charged. I think there is the less reason for this provision, inasmuch as I believe that the bogey of New South Wales importing very largely during these two years for the purpose of avoiding the duty when exporting is not a very important consideration. I do not say that no consideration should be attached to it, but I do not think that it is very important, because we must take into account that the parties who import goods are subject themselves to various drawbacks in doing so.
They have to take into account interest on the money expended in purchasing the articles which they are holding, damage, depreciation, or deterioration of goods, the contingency of the alteration of the market value, insurance, cost of storage, and other charges which go very largely indeed towards making up the profit. This would very seriously militate against their making the full profit of the difference in duty, if, indeed, it would not leave them on the wrong side of the ledger. Therefore, I think we might very well give up a clause which appears to me to be totally impracticable, and we might well leave it to the future to determine whether articles will be exported into New South Wales and then re-exported to other places, to any extent which would seriously interfere with the collection of revenue. In clause 90 it is proposed that the expenditure of the Commonwealth shall be altered from the provisions recommended by the Finance Committee, that is, from a charge per capita to that of the actual expenditure incurred by the various states. I think on the whole that would be desirable. Although at first sight a charge per capita would appear to be the fairest and most federal, perhaps, if we are to have bookkeeping, it is just as well that the matter should be carried through in a proper and systematic manner, and that the charges in connexion with the collection of revenue, and the administration of the Federal Government in the various states, should be the cost actually incurred in those states. It is a proposal to which we cannot fairly take exception, and therefore the Finance Committee have done well in recommending that change for our acceptance. Clause 91 has received much consideration from various speakers with regard to the number of years that the bookkeeping should be maintained after uniform duties of customs have been imposed. I quite agree with the Right Hon. Sir George Turner and the Hon. Mr. Henry that a period of five years seems to be unnecessarily long. I would rather have seen the period made two years, but three years might be taken as a fair compromise. I hope that the Convention will be willing to give up the large expense and trouble of collecting these statistics during the long period of five years, and will be satisfied with the more moderate term of two or three years. I look upon these statistics as being of little value. As we have been reminded by Sir George Turner, we know that the returns given of the export of goods when not subject to any duty have been most absurd. It was pointed out many years ago, in England, that the returns of exports for statistical purposes only were not within about 200 per cent. of being correct. In my own colony we know very well that the returns made by merchants with regard to goods exported which are not subject to duty or fines have been very wide of the mark. I have no doubt that the statistical returns which will be made without payment of duty upon value during the five years will not even approximate to the truth. Therefore, the less we have of them the better, and the sooner we abandon the cost of collecting such statistics the better it will be for all parties. We should look at the matter in a far more federal spirit, and we should confine the bookkeeping to the least practicable period. At the same time, I know that the term now proposed is a compromise, and that when the matter was first considered in Adelaide a much longer term than five years was contemplated. I therefore do not say that I would oppose a term of five years if it commends itself to the general sense of the Convention, but taking into account the unreliable character of the information which we shall obtain during the term of five years, in all probability getting worse year by year, I think it would be well to reduce the term, and save the expense. We should also be acting in a more federal spirit with regard to this important matter of Customs examinations and collections. Clause 92 contains perhaps, the most important departure from the finance scheme as we had it submitted to us previously. Under that clause the Treasurers of the various colonies were, according to the former scheme, guaranteed a return of revenue out of the Customs collections sufficient to provide for their necessities. At the time, that was a most taking scheme as far as the members generally of this Convention were concerned. I do not doubt that if the matter had then been finally-settled, we should have been very glad to have adopted those terms, and would have thought that they would have been acceptable to the community generally. I do not disagree with the Finance Committee in the alteration they have made, but I agree with Sir George Turner that it might give rise to difficulties with our constituencies when they come to pronounce on the result of our labours. No doubt it is somewhat alarming that the exigencies of the various states have to be trusted entirely to the Federal Parliament. I do not feel any great concern in trusting the Federal Parliament to do what is right and just to preserve the solvency of the various states, but I must say, and perhaps it is taking a narrow view of the matter, that it would have been better if some clause had been introduced by which the Treasurers of the various states would have their revenues protected at the initiation of the Commonwealth. If any course can be proposed under which such a guarantee of the solvency of the states can be virtually given, I should be happy to support it. I must say, however, that the Finance Committee have looked at the matter in a broad and federal spirit, and perhaps in the right spirit, in trusting the Federal Parliament to do what is just in protecting the interests of the various states. We seem to be all agreed without exception in this Convention, that Western Australia requires some special treatment with regard to finance. It was not necessary that the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest should so deprecate references to Western Australia, because in the minds of every member of the Convention I think there was one fixed idea, and that was that Western Australia should be specially treated. At the same time, I am certainly grateful to Sir John Forrest for the proposal that each of the states should reserve the same treatment, and I do not know that any serious difficulty would arise if that were done. I think, as before stated, that when we come to submit the matter to our constituencies it would go far to recommend the proposed Commonwealth Bill to them if we were able to state that there were no financial difficulties likely to be encountered, because the revenues of the various states were fully protected. As it is, if no clause be introduced to guarantee the state Treasuries, we shall have to ask our constituencies to entertain a very large measure of belief in men whom, at present, they do not know. They know the members of this Convention whom they have elected, but they do not know who may be in the new Federal Parliament, and, therefore, they may have some mist rust in having to leave the whole question to the Federal Parliament with the exception of Western Australia, which certainly deserves; to be protected in this very important matter. If any clause can be suggested which will protect the Treasuries of the states in any degree, I think that it will be conducive to the interests not only of the various states but of the Commonwealth itself, and it would also involve the Federal Parliament in less controversy and less difficulty at its initiation than it will now experience, when it will practically have the whole of the finances of the states, as well as of the Federation, thrust upon it. I hope the 93rd clause, as suggested by the Finance Committee, will meet with the approval of the Convention. We felt on each previous occasion when finance was discussed that we should largely have to trust the Federal Parliament. I am glad to see that the Finance Committee have given voice to what, I think, was the general opinion of the Convention, that is, that after the expiration of the period during which we provide for a certain amount of bookkeeping in order to provide information which it will have obtained, to do justice as between the various states. I fully indorse the clause, and I trust that it will be approved of by the Convention. This brings under consideration the statistics which we have had presented to us by the very able statistician of a neighbouring colony. I cannot but regret with the Hon. Mr. Henry that that statistician should have intervened in this matter, somewhat to the prejudice of Tasmania. I have no doubt that it was done from the very best of motives, and after consultation with our own statistician during the time he was in Sydney. At the same time, the effect of these statistics cannot but be mischievous to Tasmania and injurious to us when we return to that colony and try to enlighten the public as to the effect of federation. These statistics, as pointed out by many very able speakers, are wholly fallacious in their result, as being based on data which that statistician could have no possible knowledge of, and which is not in the possession of any member of the Convention at the present time. We have not at present come to a decision, as to the taking over of the debts and the railways of the colonies, but I hope that when we come to those clauses the Convention will be favorable to their being taken over so soon as the Federal Parliament may feel competent to deal with them. I would have preferred, as I stated at Adelaide, that we had made it a cardinal point in the Draft Bill that the debts and the railways should be taken over. If we take over the one we must take over the other. I hold that they should be taken over by the Federal Parliament within a certain time, but that does not find favour with the Convention as a whole. Therefore I do not propose, even when the clause is under consideration, to press my views in that respect. But, at the same time, looking at the matter in a practical common-sense way, it will be absolutely necessary for the eventual smooth working of the Federation that the whole of the debts and the railways should be taken over. I cannot conceive that any satisfactory working of the railways can be effected unless they are under federal control. I hope that if we give the Federal Parliament power to constitute an Inter-State Commission, that commission will be composed of the general managers or chief commissioners of the various railways. They, knowing the little tricks of each other in regard to traffic arrangements, will be able to frustrate any attempt to give an improper advantage to one system of railways as against another. The question of the control of railways has been discussed at length on previous occasions. No satisfactory answer has been given to the question of how any loss could be met, or how, any ordinary

Inter-State Commission could effectually control the railways to the end that there should be perfect equality of trade. That is impossible, unless the general control of the railways be confided to the states, and presided over by a commission thoroughly versed in all the peculiarities of railway management. Clause 98 provides that Parliament may take over the whole or a portion of the debts of the states. I hope that that will be altered so as to provide that Parliament shall take over the whole of the debts of the states. Just as I contend that no portion of the railways should be taken over without the whole being taken over, so also I think that no portion of the debts should be taken over without the whole being taken over. I do not say that they should be taken on the same basis, but on a fair and equitable basis. I do not think that any trouble will arise when the matter comes to be dealt with; nor do I doubt that before many years have elapsed the Federal Parliament will exercise the powers conferred upon it with regard to this matter. The result will be not only a very large saving in interest, but also a very considerable increase in the finances of the Federation. This will afford material assistance to the state Treasurers, as it will mean the return to them of a very much larger surplus than would otherwise be available. I will not trouble the Convention by dealing with generalities, but must say for myself and for those with whom I am working that we are thoroughly honest in our desire that this federation should be accomplished on the most broad and liberal lines possible, so that no one state or no one individual should have cause to feel aggrieved. The Draft Bill has received very careful consideration from all the members of the Convention, and I feel confident that when we come to give it the final touches it will be satisfactory not only to ourselves but to the various constituencies that we represent.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I join with previous speakers in congratulating the Finance Committee, not only on the industry and ability with which they have formulated their proposals, but on the lucidity with which they have placed them before the Convention. Under the circumstances I do not intend to be long, but I would like to state shortly how their proposals strike me. It seems to me that they may be divided into two classes, one of a temporary and the other of a permanent character. As to those which are of a temporary character, affecting the period before a term after the imposition of uniform customs duties, I attach no very great importance to them. As has been well put, by other honorable members, what are five or seven years in the life of a nation? We ought to do what we can for the purpose of softening the shock of the change to the provincial Treasurers, and to the colonies generally. I think we are proposing to treat our friends from Western Australia very fairly, and I am glad that the Right Hon. the Premier of Western Australia approves of the recommendations made. But I was a little struck with a suggestion he made, and the force of which I think he hardly appreciated at the time. It was, that in endeavouring to make the loss from intercolonial free-trade uniform, and putting it that Western Australia was not to lose more than any other colony, we should have to take into consideration the fact that New South Wales would not lose anything at all.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I did not say that. It was an interjection by some other honorable member.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I thought my right honorable friend agreed to it. Under the circumstances I shall say nothing more on the point. All that is desired is that no one colony should suffer a greater loss in proportion than the others, and, no doubt, the proposals of the Finance Committee will meet that case. Then, as regards the proposition that certain statistics should be kept, and a certain basis of distribution followed, for a period of five years after adoption of the uniform Tariff, that, it seems to me, simply amounts to a provision for the collection of statistics for the future guidance of the Commonwealth in doing what is fair. I was a bit startled by a statement made by my honorable friend (Mr. Grant) that where no duties are charged it is impossible to secure that accuracy that might be desired, or that would be necessary to afford a reliable index. Where duty is charged, the desire of the importer is to undervalue his goods as much as possible.

Mr. WALKER. -

That is so.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes, I think there is no doubt about that; and under this scheme, when there are no duties charged, the condition of affairs will be just the opposite, because it will be to the benefit of the import-consuming colony to make the figures appear as large and as favorable to that colony as may be.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

To the taxpayer in the consuming colony the temptation will be to make them bigger.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

No doubt the temptation, such as it is, will be in the direction of over-valuing, but I do not attach very great importance to that point, because the regulation of this matter will be in all cases intrusted to federal officers, who will see that the interests of the Commonwealth are guarded, and at the same time that the affairs of the provinces are properly adjusted. So much for the temporary provisions. To the clauses that are to come into force after the expiration of this period, I attach the greatest importance. It is put in so many words that the matter of the distribution of the surplus is to be left altogether to the discretion of the Federal Parliament. That is a very important proposal. I am one of those who in all things necessary are prepared to trust to the uttermost the Federal Parliament, but I have some little doubt as to whether the amount of confidence which we are asked to repose in the Federal Parliament in this matter is necessary in the national interest. I am sure of this, that it is altogether against the provincial interests that it should be so reposed if it is not necessary, and for this reason: It makes the financial condition of the provinces absolutely depend on the good-will of the Federal Parliament, and that means the good-will of the Federal Treasurer. It places the question of the solvency or insolvency of the states absolutely at the mercy of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. WALKER. -

The Senate will protect the states.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It is put that it will require the consent of the states. Here is a provision which it is suggested shall remain in operation for five years. The Federal Parliament are given power to alter it afterwards, no doubt, because it is thought that it may be found to be unjust. But the position would be this, that if you could not get a majority in the Federal Parliament this provision which it is contemplated may be unjust would continue. If you can get the necessary authority an alteration may be made that may be altogether for the worse. The question I wish to put for the consideration of honorable members is this: Is it absolutely necessary that we should endow the Federal Parliament in the way proposed in the Bill? The calculations, so far as I have been able to follow them, show that under the customs duties at present existing, or under a Tariff on lines similar to those which are in force in some of the colonies, £6,000,000 will be at the disposal of the Federal Parliament and the Federal Executive. They will only want for federal purposes, looking at the matter in one way, £1,500,000. If we take into account simply the net cost of the exercise of the federal powers, they will only want £300,000. We shall, therefore, find in connexion with this Federation, what we have never found before in any similar Federation, an Executive compulsorily endowed with a surplus of between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000. This surplus, in the natural order of things, with the increase of our population and trade, will increase to a very great extent from time to time. The Federal Parliament will have the sole power of distributing the surplus according to its own will and pleasure to the several states, giving so much to one and denying it to others, whilst they will be subject to no control, not even the, control of the High Court, which some honorable members suggest should be withdrawn. Now, I would venture to ask honorable members if that is a desirable state of affairs? We have heard a good deal on the subject of surpluses. No doubt it is a difficult thing for provincial Treasurers to conduct provincial affairs at a time when they have some trouble about making both ends meet. But it seems to me that there is nothing which conduces more to the reverse of sound finance and good government than an overflowing Treasury. I think that when a Treasurer has to consider his ways and means most seriously he exhibits most discretion in the expenditure of the sum which he receives. But here we will have; as I say, a Federal Government permanently endowed with a revenue of between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000 per annum, which it does not want. What will be the result to the provincial Treasurer under such circumstances? I venture to predict that, so far as the Federal Treasury is concern, extravagance will ensue, and extravagance will ensue under such circumstances that, to some extent, the constituents of the Federation will not be affected; although to a certain extent their interests are involved in those of the states, and every penny which is wasted will be to the hurt and detriment of the finances of the province.
Mr. FRASER. -
To the disarrangement of them, probably.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
To the disarrangement of them; and I think a good many of us know pretty well what in recent troublous times a disarrangement of the finances of the province meant.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
What is the alternative?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I am pleased indeed that my honorable friend agrees with me to the extent that it is an undesirable thing if there can be no satisfactory provision made on the point. I deal with the question with considerable diffidence, because I know that wiser heads than my head, the best abilities of men long skilled in finance, have given consideration to these questions, and the proposals we are now discussing are the results of their best deliberations. I am inclined to think that it might be to the advantage of all, and certainly the result would be to afford security to the provincial Treasurers, to make some provision for a rateable division of the Customs revenue. When the Federation only wants, if may be, 1s. in the £1 of the total revenue received from Customs, in the natural order of things, to be permanently endowed with this much greater sum is a temptation to waste and extravagance. It is not as if that was their sole means of raising money. On them is conferred the absolute unlimited means of raising taxation by any other form or method which they think fit to adopt. There was attempted previously an artificial limit on the power of expenditure by the Federal Government. I think that attempt has been wisely abandoned, particularly in view of the fact that it might be necessary in cases of emergency to incur expenditure of a character and an extent which it is impossible to foreshadow. We can form a rough estimate now at to the possible wants of the Federation, and, as regards those wants which we do not estimate, they will have the other power of taxation. What, I ask my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan), will be the objection to endowing them with a proportion of the Customs revenue rather than with the whole of it?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
You fix the volume of the Federal Tariff. You see the £1,500,000 is fixed to a certain extent, and, if you make that the proportion of the whole, you absolutely fix the volume of the Federal Tariff.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Surely not, when they have other forms of taxation to rely on?
They will never go beyond Customs; nobody dreams of such a thing.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Is it not possible to fix a limit which will, at the least, amply endow them, whilst not endowing them to the extravagant extent proposed in this scheme?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

If you take £6,000,000 as the possible amount, £1,500,000 has to go to the states. If you make a proportion of that £6,000,000 you fix the absolute Tariff of the future at £6,000,000 at the least, otherwise you give no relief.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

All I was suggesting was that not a certain specific amount, but a third, an interest, a fraction, should be fixed on the most liberal scale which could possibly be desired for the wants of the Federal Parliament, and which would at the least avoid the temptation to extravagance from the wealthy endowment which is proposed here. On the other hand, it might be met by conferring on the Federal Parliament all the revenue to be received from certain sources—say, from the customs duties on spirits and narcotics.

Mr. WALKER. -

If you took over the debts it would settle the matter.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I only make these suggestions for the purpose of inviting the attention of honorable members to some of the difficulties which have struck me. I think it is the duty of all honorable members to point out, and that at the earliest opportunity, such matters as occur to them as being likely to interfere with their earnest advocacy of the scheme which we hope shortly to place before our various peoples.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I thought that the giving over of the Customs and Excise revenue as a whole had been settled, and was outside the area of our present discussion. It is a very important matter; but I understood that it was settled.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

We must undoubtedly give them the control of the Customs, and we must undoubtedly provide for a uniform Tariff.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But the whole of the money!

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I do not understand that until this Bill is passed through its final stage we have adopted any provision which will exclude the possibility of amendment, and I am sure that that position is recognised by all. But put the Bill in the shape in which you have it, and the result will be that there is, at least temporarily, withdrawn from the control of the provincial Treasurers one of the chief sources of provincial revenue; and there is no assurance given of a return which will enable the provincial Governments to cope with provincial requirements other than the confidence which we will naturally have, perhaps, in the Parliament we are about to create. I do not say for a moment that I will not be able to advocate a scheme of this sort, but I should prefer, and I know the people of the colonies would like, to see something which would render them less absolutely at the mercy of the Federal Executive. Why, sir, I could depict, and every one who has had any experience of provincial Government could depict, the pressure which will be put on the Federal Government, having this amount of money at their command, to spend it, and to spend it lavishly, and to an extent which may not be for the good of the Commonwealth. However that may be, I am far from saying that I will not most earnestly advocate this proposal at the right time. But I do trust that the difficulties which occur to me, and which no doubt occur to other honorable members, will receive every consideration, and that if some scheme can possibly be devised which will give the provincial Governments-

Mr. FRASER. - What do you suggest?
Mr. KINGSTON. - I have suggested all I can on the subject at the present moment, I regret to say. If some scheme can possibly be devised which will give the provincial Treasurers a more satisfactory assurance of no unnecessary interference with their finances, I shall be glad to see it done. My honorable friend asks me what more do I suggest. I do not know that any Federal Executive should, for all time, be placed in the position of having the power to decide on the solvency or insolvency of the states. Having this surplus of four or five million pounds, increasing in the natural order of things, for distribution amongst the states at their own will, and subject to no restriction, I am almost inclined to think that it would be better to provide that at some period, at the least, a per capita distribution should be insisted on. As regards the interval which should elapse, it is difficult to say what it should be; it is a matter of detail. But there is this other matter, and it was a question which occupied the attention of this Convention at considerable length when we were discussing the constitution of the Parliament. We were told, and I thought, there were few instances indeed in which there would be any clashing of state interests. Keep the clause in the shape in which you have it, and there is a perpetual clashing of state interests on the subject of the distribution of a very considerable and important sum of money.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
Not between large states and small states.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
Not between large states and small states, but between all states. A source of friction will be introduced into the Commonwealth for all time.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
It is not impossible that the Federal Parliament may solve it.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
It is impossible that the Federal Parliament may solve it beyond the possibility of alteration. Any Bill that they pass will be subject to alteration, but place it in this Constitution, and there is not this continual source of friction.
Mr. FRASER. -
But the amount to be returned should not be difficult to arrive at at any future time.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
There are two difficulties. There is the difficulty, first, of the amount to be returned.
Mr. FRASER. -
Approximately.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
No, absolutely. It will depend on how much the Federal Treasurer, with the approval of Parliament, chooses to spend. And there is the other and still greater difficulty of the parties to whom it is to be returned, and the proportions which each shall receive. Referring to the interjection of my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan), it may be that the Federal Parliament will solve it for a period by an Appropriation Bill of an almost permanent character. Then the evil will be less, but it seems to me that, in view of the power which the distribution of this money will confer on the Government of the day, it is highly probable that it will not be appropriated for a period, but may be made the subject of an annual appropriation.
Mr. FRASER. -
And patronage.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
And patronage, contest, difficulty, and bitterness.
Mr. FRASER. -
That is the danger.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
All which things, it seems to me, we should do our best to avoid in laying the foundation of a Federal Constitution, and it is for this reason that I have thought it my duty to draw attention to the matter.

Important as is this subject, I think it will be generally admitted that our solution of the problem will not affect any large mass vote in favour of or against federation. But there is no doubt that it is the duty of us all to try to come to some solution. I have felt throughout that, although I had given a great deal of time to the consideration of this question, it was a matter which, more than any other, depended on expert skill and the experience of responsible Ministers, especially, Treasurers. Most of our Premiers are Treasurers, and I felt that this was, of all the subjects in the Bill, the one on which we, who are not experts, ought to be guided by those who had the responsibilities of Treasurer-ship, either now or in past times. But it comes to this, then, that this new solution is put before us, and this solution may be described shortly as putting the solution of the problem upon other people. We shunt the solution on to another body after five years, and, no doubt, after having got certain statistics. Well, sir, I do not object to that, if we can get a reasonable and workable scheme in the Constitution, but if I were disposed to be satirical, I might refer to Mr. Micawber's way of settling difficulties. When one bill became due Mr. Micawber handed in another bill, and said-"Thank God, that's settled," and waited till the time it, in turn, became due. But there is no doubt that, in the meantime, in order to meet a certain timidity on the part of politicians in New South Wales, there is to be a system of bookkeeping as to the degree of consumption in New South Wales and elsewhere. And, as to that system of bookkeeping, I said in Sydney, and I say now, it is the only way, if you are to concede to the timidity of the politicians of New South Wales, in which we can possibly get to some figures on which we can work. But there is no doubt that all the colonies, in this financial matter, are taking a big leap in the dark. We are trusting a great deal to the Federal Parliament. I felt the force, the immense force, of what the Premier of South Australia has just said, that, for the states to leave to the Federal Treasurer the question of whether they are to be solvent or not is a very great trust. Mr. Henry has faced the position in his masterful speech yesterday. He says he is perfectly willing to leave that matter to the working out of our system of government. He says that the representatives from the different states will be pinned down at the hustings to pledge themselves to see there is enough money raised, by means of customs duties and otherwise, to enable the Federal Treasurer to return the necessary means to the several states, and also that the representatives from the different states will be pledged at the hustings to pin down the Federal Government to a reasonable economy. There is great force in that, but still the honorable member will admit that this is a big leap in the dark. I do not know that anybody has put this matter in the way in which it appears to me; but I venture to submit that the difficulties of our financial scheme are owing principally to the unprecedented borrowing of our Australian colonies. There is no country in the world that has borrowed so much-

Mr. KINGSTON. -
And spent it so well.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
There is no country in the world that has spent so much upon public works; but our borrowing is unprecedented in the world. That

Mr. HENRY. -
But compare us with countries that have constructed railways as largely as these colonies.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I do not know of any other countries that have constructed railways as largely as these colonies. I know that the Canadian Government have been enterprising, and have constructed many public works.

Mr. FRASER. -
But not railways.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The Canadian Government has the Canadian-Pacific Railway.

Mr. FRASER. -
Oh no, they have not.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Mr. Grant has been there, and he helped, I believe, in the construction of Government lines. At all events, he knows that the Canadian Government has built railways. I am not finding fault with the system. It is not for me to find fault with the system which has been in force, but I say that the Canadian Dominion had, a year or two ago, a debt of only £12 per head of the population, and here in the Australian colonies our average debt is between £60 and £70 per head. Now, I am comparing two states which are almost on the same level.

Mr. HENRY. -
Is the comparison fair?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It is the fairest I know of. I admit it would not be fair to compare us with the states of America, where all the railways are built by private enterprise, so I go for a comparison to a British colony, which is progressive, and which must borrow in order to extend settlement.
Mr. GLYNN. -

Nine-tenths of the Canadian Pacific Railway was built on the system of land grants, and not by the Canadian Government.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Well, I may be getting a little off the track. I only say that our financial difficulty is principally owing to the heavy interest bill we have to pay, and that heavy interest bill is owing to our unprecedented borrowing in the past. And, with regard to our unprecedented borrowing, I must say that a great deal of what we call the consuming power of the persons in the states of this Commonwealth depends upon the borrowing of those states. I might remind honorable members that in 1889, which was one of our boom years, or, at least, a year in which we still felt the effect of the boom, and when we, in Victoria, were borrowing very largely, we imported £24,000,000, and exported only £12,000,000, worth of goods and produce. Well, it is a mere question of how much you borrow, as Mr. Henry pointed out, which determines what your consuming power is. It is in that light that I want to enforce this point. I say it is a dangerous thing to return the surplus to the states, at all events, for any long time, on the basis of their consuming power. You will find the operation of that system is to put a premium on borrowing—because all these states will feel "the more we borrow and the more population we attract, the more consumption there will be, and the more money we will get back from the federal revenue." I am convinced, as far as my research has gone on this subject, that the only true federal system is a per capita distribution; and what I want to see inserted in this Bill is an amendment of the very last clause that appears in the Finance Committee's report. I want to find an amendment which will put in the Constitution a provision that after five years there shall be a, per capita distribution. If there is one fact clear throughout the Australian colonies it is this: That the people in the various colonies are very similar in their habits of life, in their modes of eating, drinking, and clothing—their manner of living—and if you take the agricultural and the mining communities, you will find that they spend, throughout the colonies, very much the same. And I say this, that just as you refuse to draw the line between Broken Hill and Berrigan in New South Wales, or between Gippsland and Bendigo in Victoria, with regard to the expending power of the people, so you ought to refuse to draw the line between the comparative consumption in Tasmania and the comparative consumption in New South Wales. Now, I take it that, for this purpose, we may regard the members of the Convention as ignoring, with all respect, not the figures but the conclusions of Mr. Coghlan on this matter. I do not know of any more complete pulverizing of Mr. Coghlan's arguments than has been given, not only by the Hon. Mr. Pulsford of New South Wales, but by Mr. Henry yesterday in this Convention. I take it that Mr. Coghlan bases his conclusions upon assumptions which never have been and never can be proved, and he has not taken into account a number of conditions which may vary from time to time. Mr. Henry pointed out yesterday-and I was very much struck by his remarks, because I was not aware of the circumstance before—that within the last nine years New South Wales has borrowed twice as much as Victoria. Of course while this borrowing goes on her consumption must be larger than that of Victoria. I think that Mr. Henry struck the right note when he said—

Are we to be a Federated Australia or not in this matter of accounts? This proposal that, because one section of the community contributes a little more than another, we are to have this system of bookkeeping inflicted upon us for a lengthened period is so foreign to the true federal spirit that I cannot help protesting against it with all my power. If our object in this bookkeeping is to avoid inequalities in this matter, what does it involve?

If bookkeeping is a proper system to employ for five years, why should it not be continued for ever, unless it is intended merely to obtain statistics for the purpose of re-assuring New South Wales?

Mr. WALKER. -

That is exactly what it is intended to do.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Mr. Henry continues:-

It involves bookkeeping for ever, while we are a Federation, because I hold that we shall be constantly exposed to these inequalities; there is a recurring risk for all time.

I should be glad if that federal spirit could be shown in other parts of the Constitution, so that we might obliterate the boundaries between the colonies for other purposes as well. We are getting nearer and nearer to that stage, and perhaps ultimately we may reach it. There is a danger with regard to this proposal to make the five years' distribution according to consumption to which I would like to draw attention. Supposing any one colony finds that by some accident she is gaining money by the arrangement, it will be hard to get her to consent to a change.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

But that would be impossible.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If you allow the bone to get into the dog's mouth it is very hard to get it out again.
Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
We are not going to let any colony get more than it collects.
Mr. HOLDER. -
Accounts give no advantage to any one.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
If the people of a colony feel that they are losing less under the account system than they might lose otherwise they will object to a change. I do not oppose the system, but I see that there are dangers connected with it. In this connexion, I would ask, if the representatives of New South Wales insist, in virtue of Mr. Coghlan's assumptions, that there should be some modification of the scheme to secure their protection, ought they not also to pay attention to his assumptions in regard to another matter? According to Mr. Coghlan, if the system of distribution according to consumption is carried out, Victoria and Tasmania will go insolvent; but no precaution is taken against that contingency. The scheme makes provision against possible loss by Western Australia, at present the wealthiest colony in the group, but does nothing to prevent what, if the conclusions of Mr. Coghlan are correct, will follow its adoption—the absolute financial ruin of Victoria and Tasmania.
Mr. SYMON. -
What would you suggest?
Mr. HIGGINS. -
I do not accept Mr. Coghlan's conclusions, but I regret that they have been given effect to in regard to the five years' bookkeeping.
Mr. HOLDER. -
Not at all. We have done the very thing that he said was useless.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
Do I understand that the honorable member thinks that, apart from Mr. Coghlan's figures, New South Wales would suffer an annual loss if there were a distribution per capita?
Mr. HOLDER. -
For a short time. How long I cannot tell.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
I admit that for the first twelve months a little more might be paid by New South Wales than in after years.
Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
The bookkeeping system dates back to 1891, which is long prior to the appearance of Mr. Coghlan's figures.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
The system provided for in the 1891 Bill has been given the go-by. The idea in 1891 was that the expenditure of the Commonwealth should be charged to the federal states in proportion to their population, not according to the amount expended in each state. That made a vast difference, but now they say if you so far federalize the revenue as to distribute it per capita, we shall be willing to have the expenditure charged per capita. The provision in the 1891 Bill embodied the monstrous proposal that until a change in the Constitution was made the expenditure should be charged according to population, although the revenue was distributable according to collection. The bookkeeping system now proposed is to be enforced for five years, with the possibility of continuation afterwards. The bookkeeping provided for in the 1891 Bill was part of the Constitution, and incidental to it the expenditure of the Commonwealth was to be charged to the states in proportion to population, although the revenue was to be distributed according to the amount collected. The idea now is not to federalize the revenue and expenditure until at least five years have passed, and then to leave the matter to the Federal Parliament. But, having regard to the almost universal opinion that the condition of the people of Australia is similar everywhere taken upon the whole, although a mining population consumes much, and an agricultural population little, I think that the distribution per capita is the ultimate solution of our difficulty. The argument of the Premier of South Australia that you should put such a provision in the Constitution as would prevent the possibility of a fight at the end of five years, or from year to year thereafter, has a great deal of force.

Mr. HOLDER. -

If you adopted such a provision you might fix an absolute injustice in the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If we found that an absolute injustice had been implanted in the Constitution, the Constitution could be amended. At the present time, however, it is recognised that a distribution per capita will give justice.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Suppose the provision were found to be absolutely unjust, but to work favorably so far as some of the colonies were concerned, what a fight there would be against any change.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Well, but the honorable member hardly realizes that there is a certain fact the other way. Suppose the five years were ending, what would happen? If the per capita were fair, no doubt there would be a strong argument in favour of having it, but I am told that if there is anything unfair about it there will be no means of rectifying it. I say that we should act according to our present lights, and assure the states that in entering the Federation there will be no distinction made between those states which consume much and those which consume little. At present it seems to me that there is a distinct premium on over-borrowing in this Constitution. To pass on to the question of Western Australia, as Sir John Forrest said, it is admitted universally that that colony must be dealt with separately; but I shall strongly advocate (and vote accordingly if I have the opportunity) the same principle being adopted with regard to the other states. It will be easy to ascertain the proportionate net loss on the same system for all the states, and having ascertained the average, we could pay back to each state whatever the difference was between the average and the excess loss. Apart from Mr. Coghlan's figures altogether, it appears to me to be obvious that Tasmania cannot enter the Federation unless something of that sort be done. Are we to exclude Tasmania from the Federation?

What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander—although I do not mean to say that Western Australia is a goose or that Tasmania is a gander; but I cannot see why there should not be the same measure meted out to Tasmania as to Western Australia. Western Australia is at present the most prosperous of all the colonies.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The difference is based on a different reason.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

On the Scriptural principle—"To him that hath shall be given."

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I am afraid that that principle has operated too much in this Convention, as well as elsewhere. But it will appear an anomaly to the Tasmanian people that even if, by virtue of the operation of this new Tariff, they lose more in proportion than is lost by the people of Victoria or of South Australia they are to have no compensation, although the people of Western Australia are to have full compensation. I admit that there are extra reasons in the case of Western Australia, which Mr. Holder has referred to.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Not extra reasons; there are other reasons.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

There is a point as to this distribution which struck me when Mr. Reid was explaining the new amendment with regard to the proportion of net loss. I will submit that, in ascertaining the net loss, it should be the proportion of net loss of all the states that lose that should be taken into consideration. Otherwise, we may be saddling the Commonwealth with very great payments indeed. I think that an amendment should be moved to say that we shall take the average upon all the states that lose.

Mr. WALKER. -
I think that is provided for.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The clause says "the proportionate net loss, if any." That does not refer to the net loss in each case.

Mr. REID. -
There is no provision where there is a gain. The clause can be made clearer if necessary.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I shall refer again to that point when the clause is reached. There is also a point which occurred to me that I see that Mr Symon has put. It is with regard to the last of the new clauses. I think that if that clause be retained in its present form it will lead to a great deal of difficulty and acrimonious legal discussion. I take it that if you are going to leave it to the Federal Parliament to settle the mode in which the distribution of the surplus shall be made, you should leave it to the Parliament absolutely, and should not insert the words "on such basis as shall be fair to the several states."

Mr. WALKER. -
Would you suggest a sliding scale?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
No. I say that if you leave these words in-and I speak as a lawyer-I can easily conceive of a distribution of the surplus which will be fair, having regard to all the circumstances, but which will not be absolutely proportionate or absolutely equal, and I can conceive that if the surplus were not so distributed, perhaps some state might be brought to financial ruin; but a man of another state might say that the distribution was not constitutional, and not in accordance with the words used here: "as shall be fair to the several states." It was owing to similar words in the Constitution of the United States of America, that the income tax was stopped. Inasmuch as the Constitution said that any direct taxation imposed should be in proportion to the number of inhabitants of a state, it was held that the income tax, which had graduations and exemptions in connexion with it, was not a fair tax. If you are to trust the Federal Parliament, you ought not to put it in the power of any particular person to impeach an appropriation by virtue of these words being in the Constitution. With regard to bounties-and this is the last matter to which I intend to refer-it was at my instance that the exceptions as to bounties for mining for gold and silver or other metals was inserted in Adelaide. I think that there is a great deal of force in what Sir George Turner said on this particular point. You ought not to prevent a state from giving bounties, providing those bounties are not so adjusted as to prevent the operation of intercolonial free-trade. There should be a power, as there will be a number of new special industries arising, for a state, if it think fit, to give a bounty to a new industry, so far as that bounty will not interfere with intercolonial free-trade.

[P.872] starts here

Mr. HENRY. -
Who is to determine that?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I should do what Sir George Turner has suggested, that is, allow the different states to give what bounties they like, subject to such regulations and restrictions as the Federal Parliament may make. I grant this, that, prima facie, every bounty should be good; but, if it infringed the regulation made by the Federal Parliament for the purpose of securing intercolonial free-trade, or if it were proved even to be devised for the purpose of interfering with intercolonial free-trade, then that bounty should be void. I take it that could be done. It would hit almost exactly the line I took with regard to the rivers, which was, that you ought to allow the states to irrigate, to conserve, and to do everything else they liked up to a certain point, but that the Federal Parliament could then interfere and say-"You shall not go beyond this line; you shall not conserve and irrigate so as to interfere with other rights." I should have been very glad indeed if the same principle had been applied to the rivers as is now proposed to be applied to bounties. I understood the leader of the Convention to invite all honorable members to speak to this question, inasmuch as the financial clauses hang so much together that he wants to know what sort of scheme to push through as a whole. He wants to see what are the general sentiments. I have, therefore, as far as in me lies, tried to meet the honorable member's intention. I feel strongly, and the more I think of it, the more strongly I feel, that we should try to establish a per capita basis of distribution at the end of five years. I say then, with regard to this financial question, that, although this is a difficult and important matter, I do not think that there is any great mass of voters who will say "Yes" or "No" to federation by virtue of any scheme which we may adopt. I feel sure that of all parts of the Bill this part is the one which can best be left to experts, who have the responsibility of the administration of the finances of their own colonies.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -
I think the Finance Committee have given us such a fair and practical scheme that, with a few modifications, it will find its way into the Constitution. I only rise to say a few words about the different aspects which are presented to us. First, a national or federal aspect, and secondly, the aspect as it affects my own colony. I take it that if there is one subject more than another in which we delegates are supposed to look after the interests of our colonies it is in the terms of the bargain with reference to finance, on which we are asked to enter into this federal partnership. As to the federal aspect of the matter, I agree with every word that the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) has just said as to the unwisdom of leaving this important matter of the starting of our finance for all time to come to the Federal Parliament. I think, as that honorable gentleman has said, that we should put in this Bill a limit after the five years' bookkeeping is over. We should put into the Constitution another five years or another three years, in which you would give the Parliament full play, but at the end of that time we should become one people not only in name, but in interest and purse. We should then do away with self-interest, and the race between state and state for the premier position. If you do not put that in your Federal Constitution-and it seems to me this has not been pointed out by any other honorable member, although the Hon. Mr. Kingston has gone to some extent in that direction-no one can foresee the perplexities, the confusions, and the animosities into which we shall be plunged by asking the Federal Parliament to do for us what we appear not to have the courage to do ourselves.

Mr. HOLDER. - They will have the information, while we have not.

Mr. DOBSON. - I admit that is a most powerful argument, and if you were talking to another Convention, or to men with judicial minds, who would take into consideration not only what was fair to each state but what was in the interests of Federated Australia, putting state interests on one side altogether, I would agree with the honorable member. But I ask myself, who will be the men who will compose the Federal Parliament? They will be exactly the same class of politicians as we have in our states Parliaments.

Mr. HOLDER. - And therefore you mistrust them.

Mr. DOBSON. - I am not going to trust them in this matter, and I will give my reasons. Whatever the Constitution may be-conservative, democratic, or radical-I shall be loyal to my fellow workers, and go back to my own colony and speak whenever I am required or asked to do so, in order to urge the electors to adopt the Constitution. Now, putting all questions of conservatism or liberalism aside, I shall be obliged to say—Here is Tasmania, with its smaller purse than the larger colonies, and it cannot afford to enter the Federation. My poverty and not my will may compel me to say—"For a time we must stand out." I now come back to the question I have already asked—Who will be the men composing the Federal Parliament? You will have the enlightened politician, the representative in every sense of the word, who would never consent to become the delegate of any constituency. Then you will have your politician who goes in as the mere delegate of a constituency. You will have the politician who desires to be a national representative, but in a rash moment on the hustings he will give one pledge—and probably the one pledge will be on this financial question—which he ought not to give. You will have other men who are always trying to catch the popular breeze and to dodge the unpopular breeze, who wish to find out before they vote how their constituents want them to vote—and that is a very important aspect of a politician's life. You will also have the politician who has once been lashed by the press, and who does not wish-to be whipped again. He will wait to see how the cat jumps before he votes. Let me say at once that I am not prepared to trust the Federal Parliament on a question of that sort as implicitly as I would trust it to do what is fair and right in matters of general legislation. Let me give an illustration of what I mean: Five men are entering into a partnership; they put in a certain amount of capital, and they arrange how they are going to draw out the profits for five years. At the end of five years they are going to leave it to a new adjustment.

Mr. HOLDER. -

They are going to adjust it according to their better knowledge.

Mr. DOBSON. -

At the end of the five years' term one will say—"I have brought all the best clients"; another man will say—"I got you that magnificent piece of business"; a third man will say—"I did the block, and kept up the good name of the partnership with the outside public"; the fourth will say—"I have done all the hard work, and I have always been found in the office"; the last man will jump up and say—"Confound you all, I have got all the brains." So you will go on, if you hand over this question to be settled by the Federal Parliament. You will have delegates from each colony trying to point out why the per capita distribution is unfair, and why we should not have a common purse. There will be a boom in one colony, and that colony will say that it must have the lion's share. Another colony may be suffering temporary depression, and
Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Does the honorable member think that no conditions could occur in which it would be necessary to give a certain larger sum to any particular colony or state?

Mr. DOBSON. -

I think it is very likely that such a condition could occur, and I am very much in favour of considering most carefully the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Henry) to put such a provision in the Constitution. But to leave it an unsettled question is quite another matter. I believe that if you did not put it in, the Federal Parliament would do so if they saw that one colony was in danger of repudiating its debts. What would be the good of them if they were afraid to overcome difficulties of that kind? I should be glad to see such a power put in the Constitution, but I am not in favour of the Convention shirking its work, and leaving the whole thing to the Federal Parliament, where you will have self-interest in operation to a greater or less degree.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Can the honorable member forecast the future seven years?

Mr. DOBSON. -

I cannot forecast the future.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Then do not settle the future for the Federal Parliament.

Mr. DOBSON. -

At the same time, I can forecast one thing. We are entering into a federal partnership—we are about to become one people. You are going to sweep away barriers as regards customs duties, but you are going to uphold barriers as regards their supposed wealth, comparing one colony with another. By what you are doing you are advising each state to measure its wealth with the other states, and to get an advantage over each other by what the Federal Parliament does; and if the Federal Parliament, in its wisdom, or patriotism, or selfishness, gives one colony the premier position—suppose it is New South Wales—that colony will hold itself up against the colony of Victoria, and say—"Did we not tell the truth all the time? Are not our manufactures and our wealth greater than yours? If we could not persuade you—if our free-trade people could not persuade you—that you were wrong the Federal Parliament have shown that we were right by what they have done. They have concluded that we are a more wealthy colony, and that you are a poorer colony, and they divide the federal revenue in unequal shares."

Mr. WALKER. -

The Senate is your safety.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I have great belief in the Senate, and possibly it would be our safety; but I am taking into consideration the fact that the Senate is to be elected on the principle of one man one vote, and also the fact that if the people of a richer colony do not feel inclined to allow the Federal Parliament to give any contribution whatever out of their funds to a poorer colony, a great many senators will find their way into Parliament simply because they pledge themselves on this financial question. I have not the power or the ability to point out what I dimly see, that the greatest hostility and confusion may and will arise by imposing this work on the Federal Parliament. I recognise that we have to give way to the forces around us. New South Wales is a richer colony, and we have to make concessions to it. I suppose also that we shall have to hold a candle to the devil, and do something for Western Australia, which is at present an exceedingly rich colony. I admit that Western Australia has made out a good case for exceptional treatment. I was particularly struck with the suggestion that there ought to be in this Constitution a guarantee to each state that it will receive the revenue necessary to keep up the services of that state. I think also that we should engraft in the Constitution, as was proposed by Mr. Henry, a provision to enable the Federal Parliament to help any colony in a time of distress. There was a clause in the Bill giving a guarantee to the state Treasurers, but it has been struck out. I am inclined to think, with all humility, that it would be wise to re-insert that clause. I know that Mr. Holder gave various reasons to show that the guarantee was unnecessary. I can quite understand that the one aim of the Federation of Australia, being made up of five or six, more or less, prosperous colonies, should be to see that every colony and every citizen is flourishing and prosperous. It will never dream of allowing any one colony to get into a position of financial distress through its blundering or its want of foresight. But are there not thousands of electors who are despondent? Are there not scores of politicians who are despondent, and who want to be re-assured on this point? If there is a guarantee in the Bill that the state finances will never be less than in the year before that in which they enter into the Federation the Constitution will be more readily accepted by the people.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Does not that mean dictating what the fiscal policy will be?
Mr. DOBSON. -

No; I was going to use the opposite argument. You ought not to tie the hands of the Federal Parliament in any way whatever, as to the mode in which they give the guarantee. I should be the last to suggest any guarantee of the kind, if it meant that the Federal Parliament were to frame a Tariff that would bring in £6,000,000, or £7,000,000. The guarantee should be of such a nature that it would give the Federal Parliament an absolutely free hand in determining the Tariff. No one save a man who has been in business all his life knows the injury that may be done to trade and commerce by the framing of a Tariff by persons who do not thoroughly understand every branch of the subject. It is of the utmost importance that the highest intelligence and the widest commercial experience should be employed in the framing of this Tariff, and there should be nothing in the Constitution which would fetter or restrict the Federal Parliament in any way in the performance of this very serious duty.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

If they do not raise the necessary sum of money in that way, would they not have to impose direct taxation?

Mr. DOBSON. -

The colonies are growing in population and in wealth every day. We cannot have a uniform Tariff for the next three or four years, and I hope that it will not be necessary then to, revert to direct taxation to keep up the state Treasuries. I desire now to say a few words as to how this scheme will affect Tasmania. It will cost that colony £16,000 or £18,000 a year to pay its share of the federal expenses. It will lose £40,000 a year by inter-colonial free-trade, but to some extent that amount will have to be made up either by the Federal Tariff or in some other way. Then comes the question whether Tasmania, with its small population and its comparatively small resources, should be dragged into further expenditure which it could not afford. I mean the extra expenditure in carrying on our services. Although I heard, with very great satisfaction and pleasure, the suggestion made by my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid), in Adelaide, to give Tasmania a little gift of £20,000 or £30,000 a year, the people of Tasmania are not so wanting in self-reliance as to accept a chaffing offer of that kind. I gathered from what the right honorable member said yesterday that he was still anxious, as many honorable members are, to consider the claims of Tasmania as a small colony. We do want to be helped over this stile. We do not ask for any exceptional terms that are unfair, but surely we may ask for exceptional terms that are fair. We are anxious to enter into this Federation, but we have all along believed in the old Roman maxim that economy is a great remedy, and we have carried on our services with the utmost economy—much more economy than has been practised in any of the larger colonies. We ask you to admit us to the Federation without dragging us into extravagant and unnecessary expenditure which we cannot afford and do not want. We can make out a good case for the insertion in the Constitution of a little clause, saying that our expenditure shall not exceed more than so much per head. As our population increases our contribution will increase. We are getting a revenue of £350,000 a year from our customs duties, and doing it at one-half the expense of any other colony. Why should we be compelled to incur any extra expense?

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
You will not be for the first five years.

Mr. DOBSON. -
No, and that is a wise provision. Other states may increase their expenditure on the local services. We may decrease it or keep it where it is. Why should we be dragged against our will into an extravagant expenditure? Defence is a different question, and I admit that there we ought to bear our full share of the federal expenditure. It is a matter for serious consideration whether we can afford to do that. I do not say that we cannot, but I do say that if we have to ask the people of Tasmania to join this Federation at a cost of anything over £20,000 per annum, they will want us to make out a debit and credit account, showing the gains on one side and the losses on the other. We, like Sir John Forrest, will probably shrink from making out such an account. I think it is rather unfederal to put it in that way, but, at the same time, I think that one might go throughout one's colony and point out the many advantages—the money advantages, the trading advantages, and the other benefits—which to a very great extent counterbalance the expenditure which we will have to make. But our finances are in such a state that we cannot afford more than about £20,000 a year for the pleasure, profit, and advantage of entering into this great federal partnership.

Progress was then reported.

The Convention adjourned at nine minutes to four o'clock p.m., until Monday, 14th February.
Monday, 14th February, 1898.

Evening Sittings - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

EVENING SITTINGS.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I desire to ask the leader of the Convention whether it is proposed to sit late upon any nights this week, and, if so, upon how many?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am not quite prepared to give an answer to that question just now. A good deal depends upon the progress we make during the next few days. But I am very much disinclined to ask honorable members to sit at night until the necessity for so sitting becomes imperative, because I have found, from experience at Adelaide and Sydney, that after a long day's sitting honorable members become very tired at night; and I think it would be impossible for any one to assert that we do as good work then as we do at the earlier sittings. Of course, there is a desire, especially on the part of those honorable members who are members of Governments, to get back to their colonies-

Mr. HOLDER. -

Some of them will have to get back soon.

Mr. BARTON. -

But if we can accomplish our work within a fortnight or three weeks-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Say a fortnight.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think we shall have done very well indeed. If I see a prospect of that I shall not ask honorable members to sit at night at all.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from Friday, 11th February) was resumed on-

Clause 81 (Chapter IV., Finance and Trade). - All revenues raised or received by the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, under the authority, of this Constitution, shall form one Consolidated Revenue Fund, to be appropriated for the public service of the Commonwealth in the manner and subject to the charges provided by this Constitution.
Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I do not propose to occupy the attention of the committee at any length, but there are one or two matters to which I desire to address myself, and about which I wish to have explanations made, with a view of obtaining a correction of some ideas that I possess on this subject, and which I have no doubt, if there be a fallacy concerning them, the members of the Finance Committee will readily clear away. I agree with those honorable gentlemen who have said that we are much indebted to the Finance Committee for the great care they have displayed in placing before us this scheme, whether it be accepted or not. I think they have made a very good attempt to, in some respects, clear away difficulties that presented themselves previously. I rise principally with the view of pointing to one or two matters that have not been made so clear to my mind as I should have wished. I think it is our duty to draw attention to those of our views, whether they be right or wrong, which are not in accordance with the views of others, and I desire to do so as shortly as possible with regard to the finance scheme as presented to us by the committee. That scheme may, I think, be considered as divided into three epochs. The first is before uniform duties have been imposed. As to that epoch, I do not think there is any difficulty whatever. The matter is very plain and simple. We have merely constituted a federal authority to collect the duties and to deduct the expenses concerning the collection, deducting also the proportionate share of each colony from the residue, and returning the balance to the states. There is no difficulty in that. The next epoch is a period of five years after the imposition of the uniform customs duties. In relation to that, I am sure that, at the beginning, one difficulty that certainly existed had to be surmounted, that difficulty being one that arose from New South Wales being practically a free trade country. Because she left the position in this way: That there was an open gateway in the Commonwealth, by means of which goods could be introduced prior to the imposition of the uniform Tariff, and after the Tariff, as matters stood previously and the result that would have followed from the first was a disorganization of the industries of those colonies that were protected, and secondly, the disorganization of the finances of the Commonwealth. Both those difficulties, I think, have been fairly and effectively met by the provision that duties shall be paid in all cases where goods that have been imported into one colony prior to the uniform Tariff shall, within two years after the imposition of such Tariff, be exported to another state, the duty then chargeable being the amount to which the goods were liable on the importation of such goods into the Commonwealth, less the duty paid on the importation of the goods into the former state. That protects other colonies from the fiscal stand-point, and leaves New South Wales in the position that if there is any loss of revenue she has to bear it in the first five years. Passing that by, we come to the question of the bookkeeping, and incidental to that to the position of Western Australia. Now, the position of Western Australia is a matter about which I cannot find myself in accord with those who have gone before me in this debate. I should specially like the attention of such honorable members as Mr. Holder, Mr. Reid, Sir George Turner, and Mr.
Henry, and others who addressed themselves to this question. Because it seems to me that there is a reason why Western Australia should not have the special and exceptional treatment that it is attempted to give to her by the provision to which I have alluded. As I said before, I feel a great deal of diffidence in expressing my view upon the matter, because I do not for a moment, attempt to put my views of finance on a par with those of honorable members who have preceded me; but I will state as plainly as I can the difficulty that occurs to my mind, and I should be glad if they would clear it away. It is provided with regard to all the colonies, including Western Australia, that during the first five years after the imposition of uniform duties, where goods have been imported into one colony or have paid excise duty in one colony, and are thence imported into another colony for the purpose of consumption in the second colony, the second colony shall be credited with the full amount of duty upon those goods.
Why is that? I think it is eminently fair, but why is it so provided? It is because the people in the second colony have actually paid the duty.

Mr. FRASER. -
They have consumed the goods.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I say they have actually paid the duty.

Mr. BARTON. -
By consuming the goods.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Exactly; by consuming the goods they have paid the duty. Although there has not been one penny taken out of the state Treasury, yet the country has paid the duty, because the individuals of the country have paid the duty.
Therefore, we say that, as the individuals of the country have paid the duty, the Treasury is to get the credit for it. Now, in the case of Western Australia, take the obverse of that position. If it be a fact that where the individuals of a country have paid the duty it is to be deemed that the country has paid, I suppose it will be admitted that where the individuals of the country have been saved the duty, the country itself has not lost it.

Mr. HENRY. -
Quite right.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Now, what is the position of Western Australia? We are told that the total customs duties under the present regime amount to £1,100,000, and that £389,000 of that comes from Border Duties, that is, duties on goods coming from other colonies. We are told that the Treasury of Western Australia is going to lose that sum. But that simply means that the inhabitants of Western Australia will not pay it. In other words, the sum of £389,000 will remain in the pockets of the people of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No one denies that.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If no one denies that-

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It is one of the conundrums we have to solve.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I admitted the fact myself.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If the people of Western Australia are to be credited on the one hand with duties that the individuals pay, why are they to be recouped through their Treasury for money which the Treasury does not get, it is true, but which those inhabitants have in their pockets?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It is simply a matter of arrangement made to induce Western Australia to come into the Federation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am told that it is merely a matter of arrangement, but, hitherto, it has been put as a matter of a question of justice, and I am asking myself where is the justice of asking the inhabitants of the other colonies, that lose in the same way, to recompense the Treasury of Western Australia for losses which the people of Western Australia do not really suffer?

Mr. HOLDER. -

They only recompense the excess above the general average.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It does not matter what it is. If the Treasurer of Western Australia loses somewhat why should he come to the other colonies to get from them what he loses as Treasurer when the Western Australian people have the money in their own pockets?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Your Victorian manufacturers will get some of the money, in consequence of the smaller duties paid on their manufactures.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There is no duty in the question at all.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Mr. Glynn means that your manufacturers will get cheaper prices.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We are now only dealing with the £389,000 Border Duties, and not with the other £700,000 odd. I am assuming that the Tariff of Western Australia in other respects does not make any difference. But with regard to the Border Duties, it is true in one sense that the Western Australian Treasury does not get a certain amount of money. And why? Because it is in the pockets of the Western Australian people. And what I want to know is: Why are the people of Victoria, Tasmania, South Australia, and, for the matter of that, New South Wales, to recompense out of their own money the colony of Western Australia, because Western Australia does not choose to ask her own people for the money they are saving? I say that you cannot defend it on principle.

Mr. FRASER. -

Because the other colonies export and import, and there is no such trade in Western Australia; it is all importing from the other colonies there.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If my honorable friend thinks that is an answer I will not place my financial knowledge in contes

Mr. BARTON. -

There is this qualification: That if it is true that the exporter of dutiable goods from abroad pays part of the duty the other colonies will save something, too.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am putting the matter in this way: That if it is fair to credit Western Australia with duties that are paid in one colony first in respect of goods ultimately consumed in Western Australia, why should we not take the converse view? Why should we give Western Australia all the benefit of that rule and none of the disadvantage?

Mr. FRASER. -

They get a rebate if they export to Western Australia.

Mr. ISAACS. -

My honorable friend does not see the point. Each honorable member will of course consider his own colony, but I cannot see one particle of justice or reason in asking the people of this colony, who are going to sustain a loss from a Treasury point of view, to help the Treasury of Western Australia.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
You allow that the Treasury loses. Supposing that Western Australia is in a state of development in which it cannot very well impose direct taxation, how is the Treasury going to make up its loss?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I say that if the Western Australian people are to keep the benefit in their own pockets, and not to make up some portion of the loss incurred by the Treasury, it is not fair to ask the other colonies to make up the loss for them.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Victoria has 40 per cent. of the trade, and it will profit by the abolition of Border Duties.

Mr. ISAACS. -
They have that 40 per cent. of the trade now, and the Western Australian people have to pay the extra duties now imposed. Are the Western Australian people only to get the benefit of the changed position?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Victoria will retain a bit of the profit.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If that is so, I shall be very glad of it, but I do not see any justice in saying that Western Australia shall retain all the profit and a little bit more.

Mr. HENRY. -
Victoria will have a better chance of retaining the large proportion of the trade that she has now.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I cannot see the justice of the arrangement. I had not heard the point put, and I thought it my duty to put it. I should like to hear some arguments advanced upon which I could fairly ask the people of this colony to accept the position. I cannot see that it is a fair position to allow Western Australia to say-"It is quite true we are to get £389,000. The money that is lost to our Treasury will be retained in the pockets of the people. We do not ask our people to contribute one penny of it. They are to get the whole of the benefit of the £389,000."

Mr. GLYNN. -

The manufacturers who export will get some of it, and the Federation will get some of it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The £389,000 is paid in Border Duties, and the assumption is that it is added on to the prices in Western Australia. If that is so, it is plain that Western Australia would not have to pay it.

Mr. HENRY. -

They may pay the same amount owing to an increased importation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They may, but I am assuming that the Tariff makes no difference in that respect. This claim is based purely on the Border Duties, and I am treating it from that point of view.

Mr. HENRY. -

It covers loss of general revenue.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not think that is quite a fair way in which to put the argument. This is the statement in the Finance Committee's report:-

The Premier and Treasurer of Western Australia pressed upon the attention of the committee the peculiar position of his colony in relation to her Customs revenue, which largely consists of duties on intercolonial products (£389,000 in a total Customs revenue of about £1,100,000), and in order to meet this difficulty the following clause is submitted for consideration.

I think I am perfectly right in saying that it is with a view of meeting the loss caused by the abolition of the Border Duties that this arrangement is proposed, and I repeat that until I hear some fair reasons advanced for displacing the conclusion I have arrived at I shall feel myself under a very great difficulty indeed in voting for a proposal that, I think, contains no element of justice whatever. With regard to the other portion of the scheme, I desire to draw attention to one or two matters, and the first is the bookkeeping. I do not like this bookkeeping. I think it will cause a large amount of inconvenience, and will prove to be in some measure impracticable. It will be almost impossible in many cases to trace goods that have been altered in condition and that have become almost untraceable in various respects, both as to the duty paid and the shape they have taken. There will be a tremendous amount of difficulty in carrying out this scheme, but I am perfectly willing, seeing that at bottom it is equitable, to surrender my views on this point to those honorable members who have devoted so much attention to it, and to whose knowledge of the subject I unhesitatingly and unaffectedly defer. As they have come forward to assure us that this is the best possible way of reaching the position, I am quite prepared to accept the proposal. But I do say this: That I am not in accord by any means with the root position that is assumed by these suggestions, either in respect of the second period, that is, the five years immediately succeeding the imposition of the common Tariff, or of the subsequent period. In my opinion, the recommendations of the Finance Committee do not meet the difficulties that presented themselves in previous schemes, such as the sliding scale and other modes of meeting the necessities of the states. They have glossed over these difficulties. They have deferred them, and done so in a way that may lead to a considerable amount of trouble in the working of the Federation. We ought to consider these proposals with the other provisions of the Constitution. We may say, on the one hand-"Leave it to the Federal Parliament to work it out," but we have, on the other hand, to ask ourselves what are the other provisions with regard to the Federal Parliament? When we look at those other provisions, and consider how differences may arise, we have to revert to the question of the financial position, and we have to say what sort of questions we are going to leave the Federal Parliament to determine. In the first place, I agree entirely with those honorable members who say that there ought to be some definite provision that will act as a guarantee to the states, and will enable the state Treasurers in every case to form something like a fair notion of the position he and his colony are going to stand in. Here I see nothing but indefiniteness.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Unless you have the gift of prophecy you cannot be definite.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Necessarily; and from the very circumstances of the case, we must leave the whole control of Customs and Excise to the Federal Parliament. If it were a mere question of revenue we should not do that. It is, however, a question of intercolonial and international trade, and there must be uniformity. We cannot secure that uniformity without giving an uncontrolled discretion to the Federal Parliament. From a fiscal standpoint, it is unchallengeable. From a revenue standpoint, it assumes a different aspect. There is no reason whatever why the Federation should have the whole of the revenue. This difficulty has been felt in other countries. My right honorable friend (Mr. Kingston) made a statement the other day that was challenged, with regard to giving the whole proceeds of Customs and Excise to the Federation. In suggesting that there might be some limitation, he was not without precedent. In Germany there is a united Customs Tariff, and the whole of Germany, with some inconsiderable exceptions—such as the city of Hamburg, and one or two other portions of the empire—is in the Customs Union. With these exceptions, the control of Customs and Excise is in the hands of the Federal Government. The Federal Government raise something like £18,000,000 sterling per annum by these means; but it is only allowed to retain about £6,500,000.

Mr. KINGSTON. - How do they fix it?

Mr. ISAACS. - It was fixed by a law passed in 1878.

Mr. HOLDER. - By the Federation?

Mr. ISAACS. - Yes.

Mr. HOLDER. - That is what we expect will be done here.

Mr. ISAACS. - I am pointing out that the difficulty has been felt, and has been provided for in other places. The £6,500,000 may or may not be sufficient to meet the wants of the Federal Government. If it is not, there is a provision under which the states are called upon to make further contributions, called the matricular contributions.

Mr. KINGSTON. - Is it a proportionate contribution or a fixed sum?

Mr. ISAACS. - I cannot go into the whole of the details. The Federal Parliament may do the same thing here, but I doubt whether they can do it in the first five years in the face of these provisions.

Mr. HOLDER. - They can do it directly afterwards.

Mr. ISAACS. - Yes. But I would point out that in Germany the Federal Parliament have to provide enough for their own wants—and this is the serious point—for the wants of the states. Here we have left the Federal Parliament absolutely at large. On the one hand, there is no provision that will guarantee to the states a sufficient amount to meet their necessities, and, on the other hand, is there any provision that will prevent the Federal Parliament from stepping beyond its Commonwealth jurisdiction? The true function of the Federal Parliament, so far as revenue is concerned, is to provide enough money for federal purposes, and not to provide money for state purposes at all, excepting in so far as it is commanded to do so by the Constitution. When I asked Mr. Holder the other day what guarantee there was that the Federal Parliament could raise £6,000,000 sterling, which is the present requirement, roughly speaking, of the states, he said"There will be four states whose necessities will compel the Federal Parliament, and they can over-ride the Bill." That was a very good answer so far as it went. The states will always be the arbiters of their own necessities. If we are to be told that the four states can compel the Federal Parliament to provide for the necessities of the states, as such, where is the limit to be fixed? Are we always going to run the risk of the Federal Parliament being made the means of raising taxes for carrying on the state Government, because there is no limit to it?

Mr. HENRY. -

How can you prevent it? - It is a difficult question.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It simply arises out of the fact that you give over to the Federation the most extensive machinery of taxation-the Customs.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am aware of the difficulty, but I should like to see a provision which would impose the duty on the Commonwealth of providing for some time, at all events, for the necessities of the states, and guarding for the future against the difficulties which I have referred to.

Mr. HENRY. -

That clause has been struck out.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Of course that did make some provision. I was saying that the reply given by Mr. Holder shows at once the strength and weakness of the whole position; it shows that we are attempting to gloss over the difficulties; that we are going to leave the difficulties to the Federal Parliament; that we are going to have a scramble and a scuffle in the Federal Parliament amongst the states, and that each state will be left to get as much as it can in its own interests.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Supposing the Federal Parliament does not raise sufficient revenue, will not the states have sufficient capacity for taxation in other directions?

Mr. ISAACS. -
There is no increase of capacity to get taxation, they are restricted in certain directions and left unfettered in other directions; but their capacity is not increased, it is rather limited by the knowledge that the Federal Parliament can come down and tax them in any way it chooses. That is the danger I see. You not only leave the Federal Parliament untrammelled, but exposed to continual pressure by the states to produce enough money, not only for federal but for state purposes, while we are asked to leave the states perfectly free to contract debts and increase them, and to enlarge their liabilities and necessities. It leaves the Federal Parliament as the one source by which pressure can be exerted on the various states to get money raised. I foresee that the states Parliaments will occupy a most unexpected position hereafter; it leaves the matter in a most indefinite and unsatisfactory position. I want to call attention to a matter which was referred to very pointedly and correctly by my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Dobson). He said the necessities of the states would in all probability compel candidates who were standing, for the position of senator more particularly, to pledge themselves on the financial question. They will go into the Federal Parliament determined, so far as they can do so, to get certain concessions, terms, and advantages from the Federal Parliament.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Does not every candidate for the local Parliaments do that now—for instance, with regard to roads and bridges?

Mr. ISAACS. -

My honorable friend must remember that the position is different in this respect, that in one state we deal only with that state, we deal with one people who pay the taxation; here it will be a question of state against state, and I agree with what has been said as to what will be the inevitable result. When we have two Houses, one of which represents 700,000 people, and the other represents 2,500,000 to begin with, are we not likely from the very inception of this Federation to have most bitter struggles as to the division of the money? Are we not likely to have most dreadful onslaughts on the Treasury on one hand, and bitter contests as to which House shall determine the appropriation of this money and the taxation? I can see no more fruitful sources of collision and dead-locks than these very financial proposals. That is one of the demerits of this scheme.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

The scramble for the surplus.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes. If you fix the amount for the first few years you take away one of the greatest probabilities of dead-locks; if you say to the Federal Parliament that they shall provide a certain amount in a certain way for the first five years you do allow the Federation to go into its first year's work with very much less chance of collision in the way that has been pointed out.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Will not all these difficulties come to an end in five years? Does it affect the logic of the question?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I understand that the bookkeeping and other provisions for five years are to enable us to see more definitely where we are going; to enable us to feel our feet and understand each other better. I think if we added to this provision something more definite which would give us these advantages, and which would take away the liability to an initial scramble, we should do very much better. I am not going to oppose this if the majority think it right, but I hold it is a pity that these proposals have not been subjected to public criticism for a longer period. I do not say that by way of blame or fault-finding, because I have no such intention, but it is regrettable that we have not had an opportunity for public criticism of these proposals.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
We have not gained much from public criticism during the last six months on the financial problem.

Mr. ISAACS. -
We have not had these proposals before us for six months. I have noted that, as speaker after speaker has addressed himself to this question, there are difficulties pointed out which did not at first arise.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Most of those difficulties came before the Finance Committee.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I have not the slightest doubt about that. I am sure that the personnel of the committee could not have been improved upon; but the outside public have not had an opportunity of considering these proposals.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
They have seen the debates for many months past.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I think my honorable friend will agree with me that we have never had these proposals before the public.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
The bookkeeping proposal was before the public for twelve months.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There are several salient differences between the proposal now submitted and what was before the public; there is the provision for Western Australia, and also the provision for collecting duties during the first two years.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The differences are not vital.

Mr. ISAACS. -

One of them is vital to Victoria, but we have disposed of that. When we consider this question of the financial problem, we must consider it in relation to the rest of our Constitution. I foresee that we shall be landed in difficulties, tussles, and contests for money in the Federal Parliament, which will enable the people of the smaller states, as represented in the Senate, to practically command the whole financial situation if they choose. We are told that their necessities compel them to take this stand. I hope some means will be found for providing a remedy for them in any event, but also for taking away the probability of it. I should like to see some provision by which security can be given to the state Treasurers, something like a definite provision which will give the state Treasurer some security in making up his Budget and Estimates. On the other hand, I sincerely hope some provision will be made by which what may be called the other terminus of the question will be made more definite. If that is done, the proposals will be much more acceptable.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -

I had not the remotest intention of speaking, but after the remarks of the Attorney-General of Victoria, I am constrained to say a few words. With regard to the intercolonial revenue derived by Western Australia, the honorable member will see that the duties amount to more than £380,000 out of a total revenue of £1,100,000. Those duties are, however, derived from the produce and manufactures of other colonies. If Western Australia sent an equal amount of produce and other articles to the other colonies, the trade would about balance itself, as is now the case with the remaining states. I do not say that there is an exact balance between the other states, but there is a balancing going on which is getting closer year by year. For instance, Queensland sends fruit here in large quantities, while we send other products to Queensland. We send vegetables to New South Wales, who also sends us some products, and in this way a balancing goes on. When people settle on the lands in Western Australia, they will be able to export to the other colonies, and then the large amount of revenue at present derived from intercolonial trade will be very much less, so that there is really nothing in the argument of Mr. Isaacs. Western Australia can place duties on other articles than produce and manufactures of the other colonies. It may be very difficult to do so, but no doubt it is possible. There is a huge consumption of chaff, hay, oats, and other articles of that kind in Western Australia. It is only by imposing an all-round Tariff that Western Australia is able to get the revenue which it requires. It is only just that the people of Western Australia should not be called upon to lose more than one-third of their revenue, and that some more equitable arrangement should be made. What is that equitable arrangement to any member of the Convention who is anxious for federation? It is only a drop in the bucket when it is divided amongst other colonies. If the revenue of Western Australia keeps on increasing by leaps and bounds, as it is doing at present, that colony will not be entitled to the refund which it is proposed to give. Therefore, the argument of the honorable member on that score falls to the ground. When the people of this colony export foreign goods to Western Australia they get a rebate, and they do not pay 1s. of duty. The duty, of course, is collected in Western Australia, where the goods are consumed. A merchant would be a very extraordinary business man if he exported goods from his warehouse after paying duty here. He does nothing of the kind. The goods are exported in bond. Even if they do pay the duty here there is a rebate granted, so that the Western Australian people pay the duty in that case. As to the guarantee to the state Treasurer, no doubt, that is a very serious matter. I myself would like to see some clause in the Bill to give the people of the states, and especially the states Governments, some guarantee that they should know with certainty that they would have sufficient money refunded to them to pay the interest on their indebtedness. But I argue with myself in this way. There is a House of Representatives representing the states, and there is a Senate representing the states. In the House of Representatives there will be, say, twelve members representing a state, and in the Senate six members representing the same state. Now, are those members going to allow their state to be robbed?

Mr. ISAACS. -

But you must see that, although the House of Representatives can pass any Bill it likes, if the Senate does not pass it the state cannot get the money.

Mr. FRASER. -

Surely the representatives of a state in the House of Representatives, and in the Senate, will take good care to see that their state is fairly treated, and you cannot expect more than that. Then there is the bookkeeping system. All of us would like to see the bookkeeping system got rid of if it were possible, but I do not see how that is possible, and I must admit, as a business man, that it is the safest, surest, and least objectionable of all the schemes that have been submitted to us. With the bookkeeping system, the amount of money that should be returned to the various states is known approximately. There can be no doubt about the approximate amount. We need not split straws over a few pounds one way or the other. Canada has suffered in this way to some extent; but would the people of Canada go back on federation because of that slight difficulty? Nothing of the kind. There is not a man, woman, or child in all Canada that would dream of going back because of this little difficulty. So, I hope, it will be with us. The country of Australia is infinitely richer than the Dominion of Canada, and, therefore, federation will be more advantageous to the people of Australia, as a whole, than even it has been to Canada, because, the wealthier the country, the more advantage is gained by federation; and the poorer the country, the less advantage is realized from federation. Hence, Australia being a marvellous country for wealth, will gain much more by federation than almost any other country that could be named. What, then, Mr. TRENWITH. -

Will this system let the Treasurer of a state know how much he will get back at the end of the year, before that time comes?

Mr. FRASER. -
The bookkeeping system will let the states Treasurers know, approximately, the amounts they are entitled to.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Not at all; you want both the bookkeeping system and the decision of the Federal Parliament, to say how much will go back.

Mr. FRASER. -
For the first two years the exact sum received is returned, less the federal expenditure.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is before the uniform Tariff.

Mr. FRASER. -
After the uniform Tariff, the business is carried on pretty, well on the same lines, the only difference being that there is the uniform Tariff. Now, I am one who believes that a uniform Tariff may probably bring in more revenue than we are aware of, because there will be such a boom all over Australia. I have interests in many parts of Australia, and I can say that there is no danger to any colony from the introduction of a uniform Tariff. Suppose one colony prospers a little more than another through federation-
I could name some that perhaps would gain more than others—still the gain to every individual colony will be so great that they will forget all about these difficulties. At any rate, the gain to Canada has been marvellous, and has enabled the people there to do wonders, which they never contemplated doing before. Is the Attorney-General of this colony going to rise, and harp and carp over the difficulties that may occur? Surely that is not the spirit in which this matter should be considered.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

And there is no alternative proposal submitted.

Mr. FRASER. -

No. If I chose I could find fault easily enough with these proposals, but I think the individual who finds fault is bound to propose a better scheme, and I do not think a better one can be discovered. When we find Treasurers and ex-Treasurers of the various states-men in whom we have the greatest confidence, men of great experience and capacity-unanimous in saying that this is the safest and best method that could be adopted, I think that lay members or professional members—I am now speaking of barristers—of this Convention may very well say "Ditto." I hope that there will be no more carping of this kind. I think that this scheme is on perfectly safe lines, and I only rose to say that I believe there is no danger attending it. Of course, I would not object if the state Treasurer had some little assurance given to him; but I am willing to accept any reasonable proposal, because I believe the advantage of federation will be so great that the people will be universally joyful after its consummation. Therefore, I hope that we will strive to the end of achieving that result throughout this discussion.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

The Attorney-General of Victoria (Mr. Isaacs) has asked three questions, which, I think, demand an answer. He has raised three difficulties, which, I think, are the only serious difficulties in the way of the acceptance of this scheme that have been raised since these proposals were submitted to us. Those difficulties I shall take in the order in which he raised them. The first is the question of Western Australia, and I admit freely, as I admitted the other day in reply to an interjection by the honorable member (Sir John Downer), that the scheme in reference to Western Australia is not logically defensible, any more than is the bookkeeping scheme; but I submit that the proposal is defensible on the ground of expediency at least, and I think, from some points of view, on a somewhat higher ground. What is the position? I will give some figures for the sake of placing the matter in concrete form before honorable members. We will assume—for all these figures are but an assumption—that the average loss of the colonies of South Australia, Western Australia, Tasmania, and Victoria, through the operation of the uniform Tariff, is 10 percent of their revenue from Customs and Excise, and that the loss to the colony of Western Australian exceeds that average by 10 per cent. more; that is to say, that the loss to Western Australia alone is 20 per cent. Then we have this state of matters to deal with: Western Australia loses £200,000 of her revenue, while the other colonies only lose, proportionately, a sum representing half of that amount. I must point out, however, that these figures which I am suggesting are the net figures, and that, before we arrive at them, we must set any gains under the new Tariff against any possible losses. For instance, as I mentioned the other day, there are no excise duties on beer in Western Australia, no duties on sugar, on tea, or on a number of other articles of lesser importance which almost certainly will, under the Federal Tariff, be dutiable.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
And bring in a very large revenue.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Yes. As I have previously mentioned, three lines only beer, tea, and sugar—would produce £160,000, and probably some other items of revenue would further increase the augmented revenue to be derived under the new Tariff by Western Australia. But, after all these have been taken into account—and not only taken into account in Western Australia, but in every other colony—in Victoria, for example, where the probabilities are that a reduction of some of the present high duties would result in increased importations, and, consequently, increased revenue—when, I say, all these increases have been taken into account, there still remains the discrepancy that Western Australia loses 20 per cent. of her revenue from Customs and Excise, while the average loss of the other colonies is only 10 per cent. Under these circumstances, does it not appear to honorable members that Western Australia is justified in the request that this 10 per cents extra loss should be made up in some way? I admit that, while it is a loss to the Treasury, it is not a loss to the people; and that is no less true of every other colony than it is of Western Australia. If in Victoria and the other colonies, as undoubtedly would be the case, a large sum is lost through the operation of intercolonial free-trade, the loss will only be a loss to the Treasuries of those colonies, but it will be a gain to the people. In spite of that fact, however, it is a loss to the state Treasury, and it cannot be supposed for a moment that, with a loss like this staring Western Australia in the face, demanding the imposition of direct taxation of a very considerable amount in order to make it up, Western Australia would come into the Federation. I do not think that is to be expected for a moment. We are, therefore, face to face with these two alternatives. First, to make some concession-you may say for expediency sake only-to Western Australia, in order to bring her in, and to give us the benefit of free entrance to her ports; or, as the other alternative, we must contemplate her staying out altogether.

Mr. ISAACS. - Why should we contemplate that in Western Australia they will not recognise the justice of making up this loss themselves? Why should Victoria, for example, have to make it up?

Mr. HOLDER. - I am coming to that in a moment. I will answer all the points which the honorable member made in his very able speech. My first answer is that, as I have shown, Western Australia must either obtain some such concession, or she must impose heavy direct taxation, or else stay out of the Federation altogether; and I think the probability is that she would determine to stay out rather than face heavy direct taxation. If her loss were no heavier per cent. than the loss of other colonies, I should say that she ought to bear it. There is no more reason why Western Australia should be assisted to bear the average loss than there is why Victoria, Tasmania, or South Australia should be assisted to bear that loss; but, when we contemplate something far in excess of the average loss, then to the extent of that excess we are contemplating a special case, and special cases need special remedies. It is a special remedy to meet a special case that is suggested in the clause with reference to Western Australia in the proposals now before us. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) wished to know why we should require the other states to contribute to make good the loss of Western Australia, and I wish to show why I think there is very good reason for our doing so. Surely the benefit which is realized through the introduction of colonial produce and manufactures into any state is not only a benefit to that state but also a benefit to those who do the trade with her. At the present time Victoria, I believe, does a little over 40 per cent. of the entire intercolonial trade with Western Australia; and, if that be so, surely Victoria will benefit very largely.

Mr. ISAACS. - But does she not get that benefit now?

Mr. HOLDER. - If Victoria will consent to transfer the whole of her intercolonial trade with Western Australia to South Australia, I believe that South Australia would willingly meet Victoria's share of the loss that would arise under the present proposal.
Mr. TRENWITH. -

You mean you would pay other people's taxes out of trade profits?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not follow the interjection.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Your suggestion is that the added trade would compensate for the cost that would be entailed.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I recognise that trade is a very important matter to any colony or state, and that we are all prepared to do a great deal to secure trade. For South Australia to secure the trade which Victoria now does with Western Australia would be worth a good many thousands of pounds to her, and, as I have said, I believe South Australia would freely pay Victoria's share of the loss in order to get that trade. Victoria, by having that trade, is realizing a very large advantage through her intercourse with Western Australia, which, I assert, judging from past experience, she will, to a large extent, lose as time goes on, unless Western Australia joins the Federation. We cannot believe that Western Australia will continue to do so very large a proportion of her trade with the other colonies for a long period of time. Why should she continue to do more trade with the other colonies than they do with each other? At the present time she does more trade with the other colonies than they do with each other, because, instead of forming business connexions with foreign parts, she has gone to places convenient and near at hand. But she will not long continue to do that, and the time is not far distant when, owing to her development, she will seek the cheapest markets, even if they are at the other end of the world. When that day comes, Victoria and the other colonies which do a large trade with Western Australia now will lose a great deal of that trade.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

This has been the history of all the colonies.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Yes, without a single exception. I do not want South Australia and Victoria to lose this trade, and, therefore, I hope that Western Australia will join the Union. When Western Australia has her ports free to all the colonies, and closed, more or less, according to the nature of the Tariff, to all other parts of the world, there will be no fear that the whole of Australia will not always possess her trade. Every Australian producer and merchant will then get the benefit of the trade of all Australia. That is what I want, and I think that the payments which the other states are asked to make to Western Australia under these proposals are justified by the special conditions of the case from the Western Australian point of view, and also from the point of view of the other states, who by no means fail to get an equivalent for their fair and reasonable contribution. The Attorney-General of Victoria and the Premier of South Australia both referred to a matter of very great importance, and that is the possibility in time to come of a periodical scramble for the surplus revenue of the Commonwealth. We all regret that, to some extent at least, the states must be dependent upon the Federation for their very life, owing to the impossibility, so far as we can yet see, of devising any plan by which the revenue of the Federation may be kept down to something very little exceeding its needs. But I do not imagine that there will be anything like an annual scramble. Just as we have sometimes contemplated the possibility of forming a scheme in this Convention to meet times which we know are seven or eight years ahead, I think that the Federal Parliament, with much more advantage, will be asked from time to time to adopt schemes for the equitable distribution of the surplus, and while we

That cannot be done for the first five years.

Mr. HOLDER. -

No, and I think it is just as well that we should have time to get acquainted with each other and with the machinery of the Constitution in the meantime.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is just the time when we want more security.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We have it. Under the Constitution there can be no scrambles for seven years.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Immediately uniform duties are imposed, a scramble will commence.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I thought I had to convince an honorable member who had mastered the details of the scheme, which would have been somewhat difficult, but I find that I have an easier task. I see that I have to convince one who has missed a fact, the statement of which will be an answer to his objections. The fact is that, under the scheme, for the two years preceding the uniform Tariff, and the five years following, the distribution of the surplus is absolutely provided for. Therefore, there can be no scramble for seven years. During seven years we shall have an entire absence of any of these sources of strife, and we can in that time become acquainted with each other and with the federal machinery, and be prepared afterwards to make equitable provision for the future.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will the honorable member state what is to be the total amount to be raised by the Commonwealth in the five years following federation?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I think I replied to that question last week, when I said that the needs of four out of five states were absolutely imperative.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is what I meant when I said there would be a scramble. There will be a scramble to get a certain amount of revenue raised, so that the states may by the bookkeeping process get back a sum which will satisfy them. The scramble will come before the end of the seven years.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The scramble to which I now understand the honorable member to refer is that in connexion with the framing of the Tariff. Whatever provisions you put into the Constitution, there will always be a big scramble in regard to that matter.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There will be a scramble so as to secure a sufficient return under the bookkeeping system to satisfy the needs of the states.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I thought at first the honorable member was referring to the scramble between state and state, so that each might obtain an advantage over its neighbour.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That would be a different scramble altogether.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I have no doubt that, in connexion with the framing of the first Tariff and afterwards, there will be struggles between free-traders and protectionists, between those who want to raise revenue through the Customs only and those who want to raise it by direct taxation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And a scramble to secure the raising of a sufficient sum to satisfy the needs of the states.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I think that that can hardly be called a scramble, because out of the five states the maintenance of the solvency of four will require the raising of a sum practically equivalent to the amount raised at present.

Mr. FRASER. -

The danger is that too much will be raised.
Mr. HOLDER. -

I think that the Commonwealth will be fair. The federal authorities will not raise much more money than they can help, and so we shall have practically a little over £6,000,000 raised annually by customs and excise duties. The raising of that amount—I do not think I can put it more effectively than I put it last week—will be guaranteed by the needs of four out of the five states. These states will possess four-fifths of the representation in the Senate, and much more than that representation in the popular branch of the Legislature. The next scramble to which I come is the fight between the different states, at the end of seven years, to secure all they can for their own Treasuries. If we may imagine that the states will act as individuals will act, we can be sure that each state will look after itself in this matter.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is the second and most important scramble.

Mr. HOLDER. -

My first point is that the Federal Parliament, in which we shall all be represented, will be in a far better position to settle the matter than we are in to-day. The honorable member wants us to settle it now. Surely it is not so easy to settle it now as it will be to settle it when the day comes for the arrangement to have force.

Mr. FRASER. -

With all the experience they will have then?

Mr. HOLDER. -

Yes, and with all the knowledge. If the honorable member had the settlement of it, he would insert in the Constitution, which is not to be amended except by a double referendum and all the rest of the machinery, a provision to the effect that when the time comes for the distribution of the surplus it shall be distributed per capita. But, instead of going forward seven years, suppose we go back seven years. Suppose that seven years ago we had met in convention, and had then determined, as we might fairly have done, that the distribution of the surplus should be per capita, where would Western Australia have been to-day? The Western Australians would be contributing nearly £8 per head, and receiving £2, while the people of South Australia would be contributing a little less than £2 per head, and getting back £2. Money raised in one state would be obviously paid away to other states, and we should to-day be face to face with a tremendous agitation.

Mr. HENRY. -

It would have been the same if the bookkeeping system had been adopted.

Mr. HOLDER. -

No; certainly not. But if this per capita distribution had been adopted, we should to-day have been face to face with a tremendous agitation for an alteration of the Constitution. Every Western Australian representative would have been pledged to secure an alteration of the Constitution which would put a stop to this monstrous injustice. Who is to say where the boom will be seven years hence? We hope that Queensland is coming into the Federation, and I can conceive of no part of Australia where a boom is more likely than Queensland. If seven years hence there were a boom in Queensland, and the Queenslanders were contributing then as the Western Australians would be contributing to-day, Queensland, supposing the per capita distribution were in force, would be upon the verge of a rebellion. I think we had better leave the distribution of the surplus to the Federal Parliament, to be dealt with, not, I hope, from year to year, but for a term of years, with this possibility—that, if special circumstances arose making the distribution which had been arranged inequitable, the Federal Parliament should be free, without a threatened revolution, to deal with the whole matter at once, and to adjust the inequality. It has been suggested that, to make the state Treasurers secure, a hard-and-fast provision should be inserted in the Constitution requiring the return of a fixed proportion of the revenue to the states. I do not think I am revealing any confidences, or doing anything other than I am free to do, when I say that both in the Adelaide Finance Committee and in the Melbourne Finance Committee I have been influenced by that thought. Some three or four weeks ago I put into writing a provision which I conceived would meet the needs of the case. My provision runs as follows:-

The Commonwealth shall return to the several states, in such proportions as may in the opinion of the Parliament be equitable, either in meeting the loss (if any) on the works and services taken over, in relieving the states of obligations in respect of loans, or in cash payments, at least seven-twentieths of the total annual revenue from Customs and Excise.

We will take the total Customs revenue to be a little over £6,000,000, and the total expenditure of the Commonwealth about £300,000, which accords with the figures supplied to us in Adelaide. If the federal authority were allowed to absorb one-twentieth of the £6,000,000 raised by customs duties it would have the £300,000 which it required.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That would not be nearly enough.
Mr. HOLDER. -
So far as the calculations are concerned, I defy any one to pick a hole in them.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Did not the honorable member object to limiting the expenditure of the Commonwealth?

Mr. HOLDER. -
I will deal with that matter presently. So far as the interjection of the Attorney-General of Victoria is concerned, the figures I have given are from the point of view of calculation absolutely correct.

Mr. ISAACS. -
£300,000 would be enough?

Mr. HOLDER. -
Absolutely. So far as the policy of the amendment is concerned, I shall have something to say about it presently. The total Customs and Excise revenue may be taken as a little over £6,000,000, one-twentieth of which amount is £300,000, which is precisely the sum that, according to the Bill as it left us after the Adelaide session, might be absorbed by the original expenditure of the federal authority. Then we provide that the balance, £5,700,000, shall be returned to the states, and we set out three ways in which that money may be returned. It may be returned to the states, first, by meeting the loss on works and services taken over. According to the estimates supplied in Adelaide, that loss would amount to £1,200,000. It may be applied, secondly, as time goes on, in relieving the states of obligations in respect of their public debts, by the payment of either interest or principal. In this case there would be no cash balance to be returned. It would all be absorbed. That can only come about, however, through mutual agreement between the states. And, thirdly, it may be returned to the states in cash payments. If the balance is to be returned to the states, it should be paid in these ways. That would amount, as I have said, to not less than £5,700,000.

Mr. ISAACS. -
For what period was that?

Mr. HOLDER. -
I put no period; I meant it to be a perpetual obligation.

Mr. ISAACS. -
To start when?

Mr. HOLDER. -
At the end of the seven years. That would meet all the arguments which Mr. Isaacs has mentioned. Honorable members will see, too, that if the loss on works and services taken over increased, or if there were any further works and services taken over, that would be provided for automatically, and, as the revenue from Customs and Excise may be expected to increase, the amount at the disposal of the Commonwealth would steadily grow, and would meet the demands of the Commonwealth.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The honorable member makes a fixed and rigid proportion for all time.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Yes; I accepted this view in Adelaide, and continued to hold it until the meeting of the Finance Committee in Melbourne. I tes

Customs and Excise, but there are some persons who do not. Some free-traders, for instance, are sanguine enough to believe that a free-trade policy will be adopted by the Federation, and that the revenue will be less than £6,000,000, and they urge that if we put this proposal into the Constitution, we practically say that the Federation shall not adopt a free-trade policy, but must adopt another policy. Now, I do not want to say that the Federation shall or shall not adopt a free-trade policy. I want to leave the Federation free, but to leave it free it is argued "You must not put this into the Constitution." And there is a good deal in that argument. Another objection raised is that, if we say that the states shall have nineteen-twentieths of the Customs and Excise revenue returned to them, and that the federal expenditure shall only have one-twentieth, what is to prevent the federal authorities saying "We do not want a revenue of which we can only have one-twentieth, so we will not trouble about Customs and Excise, but we will go in for raising our £300,000 of revenue by means of something of which we have the sole control"? And, of course, it is said, nineteen-twentieths of nothing would not be much good to the states. There would be no guarantee for the solvency of the states in such a contingency as that. A guarantee resolving itself into the possibility of the states receiving nineteen-twentieths of nothing would certainly be valueless. Although I have still some little regard for this suggestion, I do not at present intend to propose it, in view of those arguments against it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I can conceive of another objection. Supposing a very large expenditure had to be incurred by the Commonwealth for a special national purpose, although it might have nothing to do with the states, you would have to raise so much extra to distribute amongst the states, in order to provide for that special expenditure, although the extra revenue would not be wanted.

Mr. HOLDER. -

If I granted the weight of the honorable member's suggestion, I should have to admit that possibly, owing to a large expenditure for defences and other purposes, the Commonwealth may make the states insolvent. That is what the interjection may amount to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That is scarcely a fair answer.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I will give another. My answer is that if any large expenditure has to be incurred by the Commonwealth on the defences—in the erection of forts, arsenals, &c. it would undoubtedly be taken out of loan money, and, therefore, would not come into this consideration at all.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Supposing £6,000,000 is a sufficient revenue, but supposing you get £7,000,000 by your Tariff, and it is necessary to use the £1,000,000 for a general national purpose, such as defence, according to your theory you would have to raise the Tariff in order to distribute the balance among the states, or you would not be able to use what the Commonwealth required.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I can conceive of a special emergency of the Commonwealth requiring £1,000,000 of money, but an expenditure of £1,000,000 over and above the ordinary expenditure of £300,000 contemplates nothing short of a national emergency, and I should be very sorry to contemplate that. But even then there is the answer that defences are a part of the works and services taken over, and if there were a national emergency it would be quite competent, without contravening one single letter of this proposal, for the necessary expenditure on defences to be taken out of the Commonwealth funds.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Do you intend to make any proposal in this direction?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not intend to do so at present, but I wish to hold myself free to make a proposal if occasion demands. I think all the argument is in favour of leaving the proposals in the form in which the Finance Committee have brought them up, but if there must be some limitation, this is the best of which I have any knowledge. A good deal more can be said for this than for other limitations which have been suggested in the past, and if some limitation is required, I will propose this.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If it is correct, relying on the necessities of the occasion, to return £4,500,000 out of £6,000,000, why not rely on the necessities of the states being secured out of Customs and Excise revenue?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I think we can; but if that argument has weight against my suggestion, it has still greater weight against the argument of the representative of Victoria.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I am not using it as an argument against your suggestion, but as clearing away one of the objections.

Mr. HOLDER. -
It does clear away that objection; but it destroys altogether the necessity for this suggestion, and, therefore, leaves me where I was before. I have pointed out the objections that have been urged against my suggestions, and I hope I have satisfactorily dealt with them, or, at all events, that I have put points which are worthy of the consideration of the Convention.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -
I join with those who have gone before me in congratulating the Finance Committee on their work. It is good work, for which we must be grateful, and the value of which we must recognise, even if in every particular we may not agree with it. My principal reason for rising is to endeavour to show, somewhat more hopefully than one of my colleagues who preceded me, the position in which Tasmania stands in regard to this Federation. One of my colleagues (Mr. Dobson) has put it in this way-"Here is Tasmania, with a smaller purse than the larger colonies, and it cannot afford to enter the Federation. My poverty and not my will may compel me, for a time, to stand out of the Federation."

Mr. DOBSON. -
Those are not my words, without qualification. I said that if we are to be dragged into extravagant expenditure, much greater than we are now accustomed to, Tasmania may have to stand out of the Federation. You give one part of what I said without the other.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Of course I did not give the whole of the honorable member's words, but there is a sentence, and there are one or two others in the honorable member's speech, which hardly represent Tasmania. We do not stand as a colony seeking to be allowed in on sufferance-as a poor member of the group to be assisted out of our financial difficulties. I believe that, at the present moment, apart from the question of size, Tasmania is in as sound a position as any colony of the group. I need not go into the question of our revenue, but it is more than sufficient for us at the present time, and, provided that we had some sort of guarantee to give to our people that our finances would be protected in the future, I believe that Tasmania would be as willing as any colony in the group to enter the Federation, and to enter it as an independent state. The people of Tasmania are no more blind to the gain that we shall all make by federation than the people of any other state.
Whatever small sacrifices we have to make for the support of the Federal Government, the Federal Parliament, and the Federal Executive generally, there are great gains to be obtained by the freedom of our markets, which would immediately result as the consequence of our joining the Federation. But I think that the representatives of Tasmania ought to be assisted in this way—we should be allowed to go back to our constituents with such assurances as will induce them to follow us when we seek to lead them into federation. Honorable members know that Mr. Coghlan, who is accepted as an authority and is one of the leading statistists of these colonies, has pronounced the opinion, without any hesitation or any qualification whatever, that, if Tasmania enters this Federation, she must become insolvent. Of course it seems over-bold to question such an authority, but I make bold to question it myself. I do not think that Mr. Coghlan's view is correct, and I do not think the way in which he has applied his figures to the facts of the case will bear him out in that prophecy. But the prophecy exists, and we, who will be asked our opinion about federation on our return to our own colonies, are certain to be asked what we have to say to that prophecy.

Mr. BARTON. -

Mr. Coghlan bases his calculations on something that is bound to disappear, and that is the operation of five Tariffs.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I recognise that, but everybody who reads will not recognise it in the same way. One question which we are bound to be asked is how will our local finances be left if we merge our colony into the great Federation. We shall be asked if we can tell our constituents how they will stand then. What sort of answer can we make in the absence of anything like a guaranteed minimum revenue? We will have nothing to show, and therefore I hope when we come to the clauses dealing with this matter we shall obtain that assurance, and be able to go back confident that we will not be leading our people into a difficulty if we advise them to say aye when the Constitution Bill is placed before them for their acceptance. I hope that in the consideration of the Bill we may yet do something more in regard to making it mandatory on the Federal Parliament to take over and consolidate the debts of the various states in the Union. We all know how great the gain must be, even that gain which will be made by saving in the management of the consolidated debt, by having one system of management instead of many systems. There is no question to my mind that there will be relatively an immense saving in the interest charged if the Federal Parliament and Government deal with the matter in a judicious way. When I was in England in June and July last, I spoke to some bankers to whom I had spoken on the subject before. I asked them their opinion on this question, and what they thought would be the result of exchanging for our provincial bonds the bonds of the Commonwealth, and the opinion which was expressed, and which was unanimous so far as my inquiries went, was that the greater marketability given to the Commonwealth stocks would necessarily involve a considerable enhancement of their value as compared with the stocks of the various states, and such a value as would justify a hopefulness of our being able to exchange our local stocks for Commonwealth stocks at a good price. I think we may do this without any danger of giving the profits to the holders of our present stock, instead of to the country, by a suitable arrangement in the Constitution that the stocks which are now current shall not be transferred—shall not be converted—until after the acceptance of the converted stock by the stock-holders, wherever they may be. In that way it would only be when the holders of the state stock came into agreement with us there would be any question by them of the prices of the federal stock. And when they agreed to accept, by way of exchange, the Commonwealth stock for the state stock—the stock bearing the security of the whole of the Commonwealth, instead of the security of one individual state—it would only be then that a price would be fixed, and that price ought to be a very favorable one to the Commonwealth, and would relieve the Commonwealth of a considerable amount of interest. I have said all I think it necessary to say at the present time in the preliminary discussion of these financial proposals. I shall await with some anxiety, and with some little hope, the action taken by the committee in regard to one or two matters of special importance—the matter of securing an immediate revenue to the states, and some form of consolidation of our loans, which I think will go a long way towards satisfying the people of the states, especially the smaller states, and will be of itself in the nature of a guarantee of the financial position of the different states. I am sure that nobody more than the Premier of Victoria foresees the possibility of extravagance on the part of the Commonwealth Treasury, with unbounded revenue at its disposal. Only if we can assume that by some fortunate contingency the Treasurer of every state in the Commonwealth will be in the Federal Government can we hope for any efficient and satisfactory protection of the revenue which the various states will be looking to as a means for carrying on their affairs. Therefore, I hope that as to these points t

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of Tasmania—After "revenue" insert "and moneys."
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think it might be safer to insert these words, I believe the words "and moneys" were in the Bill of 1891, and that they were struck out in Adelaide. It almost seems to me that it would be safer to use the more comprehensive term.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I do not wish to deal with the suggestion of the Legislative Council of Tasmania, but I desire to say a few words on the general question. I think the question has been well discussed, but several points suggest themselves to me as worthy of consideration. The one which has attracted most attention this morning is the different treatment of Western Australia, in the event of that colony coming into the Commonwealth, from that which is to be meted out to other colonies. The representative of South Australia (Mr. Holder), in defending the proposal, admitted that it could not be logically defended, but he endeavoured to show that it was justifiable as an expedient to get Western Australia into the Federation. That seems to me to be an insufficient reason for adopting an inequitable provision. If it is urged that one colony, or some colonies in the group, will not come into the Federation unless some conditions are conceded to them which cannot be logically defended, it seems to me that it will be better to contemplate the possibility of that colony, or of those colonies, standing out until the citizens thereof arrive at a more just determination. Western Australia at present is in the position that nearly the whole of its revenue, or a very large proportion of its revenue, comes from customs duties.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

A third only.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

A very large proportion.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Not a large proportion.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

A third is a large proportion. At any rate, a third of the revenue of Western Australia, according to the right honorable member, comes from revenue duties. If a uniform Tariff is adopted by the Federal Parliament, and it should happen that in returning to Western Australia its proportion of the amount it paid, it leaves the colony without sufficient revenue to carry on the Government, there seems to me to be no justification for saying that other colonies, which have probably also been left short of the money necessary to carry on their Government, should make up what they require for the carrying on of their Government, and also make up a proportion to pay to Western Australia. If, as was pointed out by the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs), the Western Australian revenue does not benefit, the money is not paid, and the Western Australian people must have it. If they have it, and it is necessary for the purpose of carrying on their Government, they should be asked to pay it, as they are now being asked to pay it. There can be no very great injustice in that, and if they consider it a hardship that in the Federation they should be asked to meet the expenses of their own Government, how much greater hardship must it be to other states to be asked to meet the expenses of their Government and some of the expenses of the Government of Western Australia? That is the logical position which this proposal puts other states in. I must respectfully submit, in the interests, not merely of Victoria, but of the other states which propose to become a party to this agreement, that it is highly undesirable. It is inequitable, and no question of expediency, it seems to me, would justify it. The honorable member (Mr. Holder) pointed out that Victoria would derive a very large amount of revenue from the trade of Western Australia. Undoubtedly, any colony which trades with another derives a benefit from it. But both colonies derive a benefit. Western Australia will derive a benefit, I assume, from the trade which Victoria does with it, or else it will not undertake that trade.

Mr. HOLDER. -

And she will help to make up the loss.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I interjected when the honorable member was speaking-"Would you ask to take out of ordinary trade profits some money to pay the taxes of another colony?" My honorable friend could not then see the application of the question, but I venture to say, if he urges that because we get the trade we should be prepared to make up the amount suggested in these proposals, he must imagine that the trade done gives more than fair trade profits, because he proposes, in fact, that we should take out of the trade profits, because of the advantage of that trade, something to pay taxes for the people of Western Australia. This, I venture to say, is altogether indefensible, and I hope will not be adopted. With reference to the question of the guarantee to the Treasurers, I feel that it is extremely important, particularly at the inception of this Federation, that the various Treasurers should know what they will get back. I think, therefore, that there should be a provision in the Constitution that a certain fixed and known amount, based upon what they have been receiving for some reasonable period before the change is made, shall be agreed upon, so that the respective state Treasurers may know exactly what they will have to receive from the Federal Parliament. That seems to me to be desirable, and it is easily possible, without presupposing that the Federal Parliament will know exactly how much they will raise by the new system of taxation, because the Federal Parliament will have borrowing powers, and if it should happen that the system or the degree of taxation which it initiates does not bring in sufficient money for the first year or two, it can pay the money over to the states, making fresh arrangements in subsequent years by the re-adjustment of taxation to recoup itself. It is while the states and the Commonwealth are gaining experience in connexion with the matter, about which beforehand they can have very little knowledge, that their financial arrangements should not be unhinged, and if it is proposed by any means to give a guarantee to the state Treasurers, I shall certainly feel bound to vote for it. Mr. Holder has submitted a suggestion that he conceived some time ago, that nineteen-twentieths of the revenue should be guaranteed to be returned to the respective states in proportion to the amount they had contributed. He showed some very good reasons for his suggestion. Mr. Holder's argument upon the point was a very forcible one. The suggestion was made, I think, in Adelaide, that some definite sum based upon the revenue which the various Treasurers had been receiving for one, two, or three years previous should be guaranteed to them for the first five years, in order that they might learn how to make up the revenue, just as the Commonwealth Parliament might learn how to adjust the requirements of the Commonwealth. There is another point which I hope will not be lost sight of, and that is the question of bounties. It is obviously proper that the Federal Parliament, having control of Customs, should also have control of excise and of bounties. But it does not seem to me to be necessary that the Federal Parliament should be the only authority that should provide for the payment of bounties. It is highly probable that there will arise conditions within the states that will render it desirable that bounties should be given for the development of certain forms of industries, which bounties the states will be willing to pay, but which the Commonwealth Parliament would probably not undertake, whilst, however, the Commonwealth would see no objection to the states paying them. Therefore I would suggest that there should be some provision-and I hope that some of the lawyers in the Convention will formulate words that will give effect to it-by which bounties may be paid by the respective states, if they see fit to pay them, with the consent of the Federal Parliament. Thus the Federal Parliament will have control and will have the power to prevent any objectionable form of bounty, but the states will also have the power to create a bounty for some special purpose which probably the Commonwealth will not undertake, but which the state would perhaps think it desirable to undertake. I think, on the whole, that the financial proposals are the best that could be conceived the best, at any rate, that I can conceive and meet the necessities of the case. It is utterly impossible that we can definitely and accurately beforehand state what will be the financial conditions under the altered circumstances which we are about to create. And while I am distinctly in favour, after a reasonable period, of the per capita distribution of any surplus that there may be, I still see that there is great, force in the argument that we may trust the Federal Parliament to do its best according to the circumstances that may exist at any particular time. I also think it is desirable that the bookkeeping system which we are prescribing shall, if the Federal Parliament think proper, be continued. It may happen, even at the expiration of five years, that circumstances will have taught the Federal Parliament that the bookkeeping system has been so satisfactory that it may be continued for a year or two longer; or it may happen that experience will not have made sufficiently clear the state of affairs to enable the Federal Parliament to decide what system of redistribution should be adopted. It should be left, therefore, to the Federal Parliament, which we may reasonably assume will be as able and as honest as this Convention is, and which will certainly have more experience to guide it than we have to continue or discontinue keeping system as it may think proper.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I have not said anything in the course of this debate, because I was of opinion that everything that could be said had been said at our previous meetings. Having heard or read the debates that have taken place at this Convention, I am confirmed in my original opinion, because no fresh light has been thrown upon the subject by any of the speeches of honorable members who have preceded me. We have had a recognition of the difficulties which we all recognised before, and the position that faces us is, that we either have to come to the conclusion that federation is impossible, or that we shall ultimately have to trust the Federal Parliament to do what is fair and just. And we may, at all events, assume that the Federal Parliament will be as honest and as desirous of being fair as we are. For there is no question—it may be five years or it may be eight years hence—that the Federal Parliament will ultimately have to assume control, and that the Treasurers of the various states will ultimately have to trust to them in respect of the difficulties arising from the possible dissolution of local systems by the transference of the state powers of levying customs and excise to the Federal Parliament. It does appear to me to be on the face of it illogical to assume that ultimately the Federal Parliament will not be fair and honest and desirous of doing what is fair and just to every state, or that it will do any injustice to any state. And so with regard to the argument as to extravagance. From my own point of view, I was always of opinion that the clause limiting the expenditure of the Federal Parliament should not be in the Bill at all. I thought it was a mistake. I thought there should be no guarantee upon this score, except the guarantee that is given by the very Constitution, and that guarantee rests not in the limitation of expenditure which we cannot define or apportion, but in the limitation of the subjects of jurisdiction given to the Commonwealth, and the impossibility of extravagant expenditure resulting from the limitation of the area of legislation and action of the Federal Parliament. There is the real guarantee. You must take it that the Federal Parliament will be fair and honest and intelligent, and that they will do what is right and just to everyone concerned. But it will be said-"What guarantee have we that the Federal Parliament will not be extravagant in their expenditure?" I say that the way to provide against that is to give the Federal Parliament only such subjects in the control of which they cannot be extravagant in their expenditure; and, if we are not prepared to give them these, we are not prepared to trust them at all. I want to know, however, where, in this Constitution, any great expenditure can come in, either in the first five, seven, or eight years, or at any subsequent time, except, possibly, it may be in regard to defence; and, as to that, no one will be desirous of limiting the expenditure of the Federal Parliament in case of need? That was the position which I took up in Adelaide when it was proposed that there should be a guarantee that the Federal Parliament should not expend more than a certain sum. The proper limitation is to give the Federal Parliament only certain subjects within its jurisdiction, and not attempt to define its expenditure within that jurisdiction. I say, again, that we have ultimately to trust the Commonwealth Parliament, and should do so immediately. But it will be said that some provision should be made in order to satisfy the local Treasurers that they will not be placed in any great difficulties immediately. I suppose that the local Treasurers who take that view are actuated by the consideration that probably they will not be in office seven or eight years hence. The position, at all events, is quite unreasonable, for I say again that it is, on the face of it, illogical to say that you are going to trust this Federal Parliament ultimately with all jurisdiction given in the Bill, but that immediately you are going to raise cries of distrust. My view, therefore, is that the provision in the Bill - which is the same provision, practically, which we have had all through with the exception of the special treatment of Western Australia - is the only possible elucidation of the difficulty. I should not have minded if we had left out the interim provision altogether. I should have been willing to trust to the Commonwealth at once, without this interval of time during which accounts have to be kept. But we have to keep in view the interests of the great cause to which we are devoted, and I, for one, am prepared to sacrifice my own views upon points of this kind for the purpose of securing public confidence. As to guarantees, I think they are impracticable. Try and frame them and work them out, and see if you can find any that will stand the test of serious consideration. We have had it shown that none can, and I am sure that we do not want to put on the face of this Bill a provision which purports to be beneficial to the people, and which is really only a delusion and a snare, pretending to give them something whilst giving them nothing, and possibly in its result hampering the freedom of the Constitution, that must be left largely to its own evolution. As far as the special treatment of Western Australia is concerned, I listened with pleasure, as I always do, to the Attorney-General of Victoria. There was great force in his speech. It sounded thoroughly logical. It only omitted to take into consideration the present circumstances of Western Australia. Western Australia is an old colony, and yet it is a new colony. In age, it is one of the earliest of the Australian colonies, but in development it is distinctly the latest. Even now it is in a state-I hope it will not prove one of transition—but in a state which affords no element of guarantee of what may happen in the future. Western Australia is decidedly asked to make special sacrifices that she cannot properly appreciate, but which the other colonies can appreciate. The other colonies—and I agree entirely with the few words that fell from Mr. Fraser, I think he put the matter well—all have their exports and imports, their mutual trade transactions, to assist them. Western Australia's transactions are all on one side, and her population is a transitory one at present, and not fixed. I can very well understand, therefore, that without any infringement of the logical principles which the Attorney-General of Victoria laid down, the intention of this Constitution being to do what is just and fair to all, the circumstances of Western Australia may admit of some special consideration. Are we offering Western Australia too much? Victoria, it appears to me—having listened intently to the arguments—has the least possible cause of complaint of any of the colonies, and even if Mr. Isaacs' contention were established, federation will be a vast benefit to Victoria. Western Australia undoubtedly gets all the advantage of this proposed special treatment, because, as Mr. Isaacs said, her people will get their goods more cheaply. That may possibly be so. The effect of this Tariff will probably be to limit Western Australia in a large extent to local markets, and it cannot be said that she is giving up nothing to the Federation. What she does say is-"We will handicap ourselves, as far as our dealings with the outside world are concerned, for the sake of coming into the Federation." As to the general principle, I conceive that Western Australia is entitled to some consideration. With reference to the details of the scheme, I think that formulated by the Finance Committee is as good as any that can be got. If it is not, if it does involve a little more expenditure than an accountant who had all the figures before him might consider to be justified, are we to allow of any substantial delay in the founding of this great Commonwealth because of a question of whether £100,000, more or less, is to be paid here or there? I sincerely hope that this discussion, unless some honorable member has some new views to propound, will not be protracted to any great length. We have had the same subject before us at each meeting of the Convention. We have discussed it at great length. It has been shown to demonstration that nobody has any fresh light to throw upon it, and we have now reached a stage at which we ought to say yes or no to the question of whether we will have this scheme or not.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

With regard to clause 81, I quite agree with the honorable member (Mr. Barton) that the words suggested by Tasmania should go in, but I would draw attention to the fact that in its wording the clause will require considerable alteration. It is limited in this way, that the revenues and moneys are to form one Consolidated Revenue Fund, to be appropriated for the "public services" of the Commonwealth in the manner and subject to the charges provided by the Constitution. The charges, I take it, are found in the next clause.

Some of the provisions recommended in the Finance Committee's report are to the effect that a portion of this money is not to go to the public services of the Commonwealth, but to be returned to the states. I call attention to this, in order that the clause may be brought into harmony with whatever is determined with regard to the Finance Committee's report. Before sitting down I will express my acknowledgment to Mr. Holder for having put his points so clearly, ably, and well in reference to the difficulties I suggested in regard to Western Australia. The matter amounts to this, that Western Australia says that she will not make up out of her own people's pockets, and out of the benefits they receive, the amount necessary to recoup the Treasury, and that while she takes up that stand irrevocably, we are to yield to what we recognise as not logically defensible. I do not consider that a fair answer. Western Australia ought to recognise the justice of the position, and to come into the Federation taking all the benefits and risks in the same way as the other colonies. If the losses of the Treasury are great, the benefits to her people individually are proportionately great. With reference to the scramble, I think it will be seen that there will be a scramble both in the five years immediately following the institution of the uniform Tariff, and afterwards. The only difference is that the scramble comes first in the one case, and afterwards in the other case. In the one case the efforts of the various states will be directed to securing such a Tariff as will afford, under the bookkeeping system, the surplus required to meet the necessities of the states. Mr. Holder put the position as ably and fairly as was possible, and I feel indebted to him for it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I understand Mr. Isaacs to suggest that the words "public service of the Commonwealth" are not sufficiently large to cover the proposed return to the states.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

Yes, I would like the honorable member to consider that point.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I do not know what could be gained by inserting the words "and moneys." If the intention is to bring in the loan fund that would be a mistake. We should not confound the loan fund with the consolidated revenue.

The amendment was negatived.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 82. - The Consolidated Revenue Fund shall be permanently charged with the costs, charges, and expenses incident to the collection, management, and receipt thereof, which costs, charges, and expenses shall form the first charge thereon; and the revenue of the Commonwealth shall, in the first instance, be applied to the payment of the expenditure of the Commonwealth.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales-

To omit all the words after "thereon."

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I desire to draw the attention of the Drafting Committee and of the Convention to the words-

The Consolidated Revenue Fund shall be permanently charged with the costs, charges, and expenses incident to the collection, management, and receipt thereof, which costs, charges, and expenses shall form the first charge thereon.
I would ask the Drafting Committee to consider whether this would not form a permanent special appropriation of all the costs, charges, and expenses for the "collection, management, and receipt thereof." With these words in the Constitution would it be necessary to have an annual Appropriation Bill, including the cost of collection and management of the revenue? I am aware that in the main the wording of this clause has been taken from our Constitution Acts, and no doubt that accounts for its reproduction here. Some years ago, in a troublesome period in the history of Victoria, there was a strong party who contended with considerable force, and indeed I think there was strong legal authority in their favour, that these words constituted a special appropriation of all the costs and expenses of collecting and managing the consolidated revenue, and that therefore there was no occasion for an annual Appropriation Bill providing for the appropriation thereof. It is true that, by the subsequent clause 83, provision is made that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except under appropriation made by law, but it might be contended hereafter that all the costs of collecting and managing the revenue are made special appropriations by the words contained in clause 82. I do not think it is desirable that any doubt should remain on this subject, and that it should be open to be said that there is a special appropriation of the costs, charges, and expenses of collecting and managing the revenue. All this money will be paid out of the consolidated revenue, and I submit that it ought to be paid and provided for by annual Appropriation Bills. No Treasurer and no authority whatever in the Commonwealth should hereafter be in a position, owing to any doubt as to the wording, to contend that the costs and charges of collecting and managing the consolidated revenue are permanent appropriations, and are withdrawn absolutely from the control of the Commonwealth Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -

You say it was contended that an annual Appropriation Bill was unnecessary.

Dr. QUICK. -

Yes.

The amendment was negatived.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 83. - No money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the Commonwealth except under appropriation made by law and by warrant countersigned by the Chief Officer of Audit of the Commonwealth.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of Tasmania-

To omit the words "countersigned by the Chief Officer of Audit of the Commonwealth," with a view of inserting the words "as the Parliament may direct."

The CHAIRMAN. -

The Finance Committee also suggest the omission of all the words after "law."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I should like to take the opinion of the Convention upon the suggestion made by the Finance Committee. The object is to do away with the necessity of having a warrant countersigned by the Chief Officer of Audit of the Commonwealth. I think these words were first inserted in Adelaide. At any rate, the clause was amended in Adelaide, and the intention all along was that there should be some officer whom the courts could take hold of in the event of a breach of the Constitution. An honorable member has suggested that this end could be well served by passing a Bill. I am not so sure of that. I am not at all sure that it would not be desirable to fix in the Constitution some person to perform these special acts who could be dealt with by the court by way of mandamus and injunction. I would suggest, therefore, to the committee, that at this stage it would be rather unwise to leave these words out of the Bill.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I am reminded that, inasmuch as this is not an amendment suggested by a Legislature, it ought to be moved by someone.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I did not propose to go much further with business before lunch, because the chairman of the Finance Committee will be here then, and he can move any amendment he desires. I have a copy of the amendments, but I think they ought to be left to the Finance Committee; I am not in charge of the finance provisions in any way. While generally agreeing with them, I think any information could be best expounded by the chairman.

Mr. ISAACS. -

These were words put in in Adelaide?

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

In the absence of the chairman of the Finance Committee I will take the responsibility, and I beg to move-

That the following words be omitted:-

"and by warrant countersigned by the Chief Officer of Audit of the Commonwealth."
The Finance Committee considered that it was quite sufficient for us to say in the Constitution that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the Commonwealth except under appropriations made by law. Then we leave it entirely to the Federal Parliament, as the exigencies of the case may, from time to time, require to pass a law providing all the necessary ch

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

The Drafting Committee, who were, I think, responsible for these words, very carefully considered the relative conditions of the Legislature in America and as they will be in this Commonwealth under the Crown. They inserted this clause so as undoubtedly to give the High Court jurisdiction over some body or other, and by that means prevent an abuse of the Constitution.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What would they do with him? Would they put him in prison?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

They would prevent him acting, or they would make him act, as the case might be. In America this question could not arise. There the Supreme Court can enjoin anybody who invades the Constitution. There is no king or queen who cannot be enjoined, and on whom the Supreme Court cannot operate. In America the revenues are not in the hands of a sovereign, who cannot be enjoined or ordered. The American revenues are in the hands of those who can be served with a writ of mandamus.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

They can be impeached.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Yes, but they are also liable to other writs. The Drafting Committee may have arrived at an erroneous conclusion, but we gave the best that we could. We did not take the view of Sir George Turner that there need not, of necessity, be an officer of audit; we rather thought, as a matter of course, that business could not be carried on without an Audit department, and we thought that in the Audit-office all would not be equal, but that there would be a chief officer. Probably in a clumsy way, but in the best way we could think of, we endeavoured to provide machinery so that the Constitution should not be set at defiance even by the Crown.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

How would this give more power than exists at present?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

By naming a person who can be enjoined. You cannot enjoin the Crown.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Was it intended to guard state rights?
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
It has nothing to do with state rights; it is to guard the Constitution.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
It is to give control over expenditure.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
It is intended to give the High Court the authority which the Supreme Court in America has to prevent invasions of the Constitution, but upon a proper application.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The court has that power even if it is not mentioned.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
The court has to be set in motion by somebody, and there must be somebody to command. Under the colonial law at present, you could not issue any prerogative writ against an officer of the Crown.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
If he is doing an illegal act, you can enjoin any officer.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I would not like to state that proposition so broadly as my honorable friend does. On the contrary, my experience being more under common law than equity, and those writs having more regard to common law, I may say that I have found the greatest difficulty in discovering whom to fire against. I found the question of the Royal prerogative standing very much in the way. In many proceedings we have found it almost impossible to discover whom we should go against. At all events, that was the point of view that operated in the minds of the Drafting Committee in inserting this clause. It had no relation to local rights or influences.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Is it not your object to fire against or to prosecute the man who pays the money and not the man who audits the accounts?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
We want to prohibit the man who pays the money wrongly.

Mr. BARTON. -
And to prevent a person giving authority to pay the money.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The audit comes after payment.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
No doubt, but we wanted to enjoin at the very earliest possible stage, and that was at the stage when the direction was given to pay the money. If honorable members can suggest any better way of doing the same thing, or, if they do not see the difficulty, I shall be glad to hear them, but there are difficulties, and we thought of many instances where a coach and four might be driven through the Constitution, by reason of there being nobody whom the Queen's Court of Australia—that is, the High Court—would be able to exercise jurisdiction over. We do not consider that this is a matter of form at all; it is one of great substance.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

It seems to me this provision is unnecessary. I do not see why the expenditure of public money under the Federation should not be governed by the same rules as under the British Constitution, or the Constitution of any state. To propose that the High Court should have control over financial operations is impracticable and absurd.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is not proposed for a moment.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I understand that that will be the case if money is spent without legal authority.

Mr. FRASER. -

Unauthorized expenditure.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

According to this provision the Treasurer of the colony, or the Governor, if this money were paid under the Governor's warrant, could be brought up before the High Court. If that is the intention it is ridiculous.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Do you think that they ought to be able to spend all the money they like?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Yes, subject to the control of Parliament; Parliament will take care of the matter, as it does now.

Mr. HOWE. -

Suppose Parliament is told that the money is spent.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

They will be told that. It is no use trying to frame a Constitution which will not work. Suppose a great disaster came upon, the country—say an invasion by a foreign enemy—would the first thing that the Treasurer would do be to call Parliament together to get authority for the expenditure? No; he would authorize the expenditure at once, and rely upon Parliament to approve of what he did. That is what is done now everywhere, and I am certain that it is impossible under our form of government to carry on business unless that is done. Of course if things are in a very quiescent condition it may not be necessary to spend money without authority.
Mr. BARTON. -

It would be breaking the Constitution to spend money without authority.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Of course that is the case, and the honorable member, who has been a member of a Government, knows that there is no Government in Australia which has ever been able to carry on without doing so. It has to be done under every Constitution. The Government must be trusted, and the Government under this Constitution will have to be trusted. You may make the law as rigid as you like, but Governments will break it, and will have to do so unless they are unfaithful to their duties. I am not an advocate for spending money without authority, but I know it has to be done, and it is for Parliament afterwards to say whether those who spend the money shall or shall not continue in their positions. To state in this Constitution that the Treasurer or the Governor may be brought up before the High Court to answer for their doings with respect to the public expenditure is ridiculous, and it would not be tolerated by Australasia. At present the Government has to answer to Parliament, and Parliament only, and I hope that in this Constitution we shall continue that plan.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at four minutes past two p.m.]

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

The weight of argument is in favour of these words being struck out. The history of audit shows that the Auditor-General is the servant of Parliament, and not of anybody else; and it seems to me that, to make such a rigid rule in the Constitution as this, would be entirely against all the views we have generally held with regard to financial matters. Of course, Parliament might make provision for a very large advance account, which would be available under certain conditions, but, on the other hand, it would be very unwise to make an advance account which was more than necessary for ordinary circumstances. As honorable members know, we do not expect that the Federal Parliament will be sitting all the year round. The Parliament might be sitting for three months in the year, and during the remaining nine months the whole country might be in a state of convulsion through foreign invasion, or internal dissension. Therefore, to say that the Government should have no right to distribute funds for certain urgent and unforeseen necessities would be against all common sense, and, after all, finance is business, and business is common sense, and depends upon the conditions and exigencies of the moment. Again, it appears to me that the interpretation of this clause would practically make the Auditor-
General an officer of the Supreme Court. He would be, to all intents and purposes, practically an officer of that court, and he would be raised above parliamentary control, and above the control of the Executive, a thing which, I think, is absolutely foreign to our ideas of finance. Again, as has often been said in this debate, the system of responsible government in this Constitution alters entirely the view with which we must look upon most of the questions that are concerned. Moreover, we must recollect that we are not making a Constitution whose finance will have to deal with the mere parochial state. We are making a Constitution for the Continent of Australia, which will, in course of time, be a great nation, practically independent, and, therefore, we must make it sufficiently elastic to enable the Federal Parliament, or the Executive, to act rightly and rule justly. I must say that, at first, I did not see this clause in the light in which it has been recently exhibited; but I find that, in this Convention, a layman is always learning law, and we never know the legal bearing of a clause until it has been exposed by a learned member of the profession. I think it would be better, in this matter, to leave the Constitution elastic, and to trust to the common sense of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. CLARKE (Tasmania). -

The argument of the last speaker shows, to my mind, conclusively the necessity that exists for a great many lawyers being included in every Convention of this sort; because my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan) has just admitted that, until a clause is explained by a leading lawyer of the Convention, very few members of the Convention know the meaning of it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

And after it has been explained by two, none of us know the meaning of it.

Mr. CLARKE. -

I have listened very attentively to the speeches of Sir John Forrest and Mr. McMillan, and to those of a number of other honorable members, and it seems to me that the main reason that they are against the retention of these words is that they would militate against the due carrying on of the affairs of the Commonwealth in a case of great national emergency. Now, I freely admit that—as has been stated by Sir John Forrest—in England, in cases of great national emergency, the Government has not looked at all to the law of the case, but has done what it thought was right, and afterwards looked to Parliament to condone its illegal action. In a Federated Australia, if any such case arose, the Government of the Commonwealth would do the same thing, and would look to the Federal Parliament to absolve them.
afterwards from the illegality of their action. But I would point out that the words that are inserted here are not intended to apply solely to cases of great national emergency, but to apply also to times of peace; and in times of peace, when there is no great question agitating the nation, why should the Constitution which we are now framing not be rigidly and religiously observed? I advocate the retention of the words, because they will secure the observance of our Constitution, and the carrying out of our laws, during the greater portion of the life of the Australian nation, because we must recognise that the Australian nation which we are about to found will be a nation that will have a far greater period of peace than of war; and, therefore, as we look forward to times of prosperity and peace, I think the law ought to be observed. In my opinion, the words should be retained, because they will secure that the Constitution which we are now founding will be observed in one of the most important matters—monetary matters and I therefore advocate the retention of the words.

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -

If the honorable member who has just spoken had had some practical experience in dealing with Audit Commissioners, and with the rigid terms of Acts of Parliament, he would have discovered—as I find, from the speeches of honorable members who have held Executive offices, that they have discovered—that the rigid construction or rigid drafting of a Constitution like this, making the Auditor-General what the press sometimes calls him, "the watch-dog over the Administration," is not only exceedingly inconvenient, but may at times result in very serious mischief.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

How is that?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

I do not know anybody more than the honorable member who has just interrupted me who has, in his periods of office, had to act more on Ministerial responsibility rather than on a rigid interpretation of Acts of Parliament. I have heard him say, and have rejoiced at his saying it, that as a public man, administering the affairs of a Government, he would do what he thought was right—what he thought was absolutely necessary in the exigencies of the occasion—rather than look to see whether he could get the Audit Commissioner's warrant. Having to obtain the Auditor-General's warrant may, under some circumstances, lead to serious difficulty; and an Administration which was weak and timid enough to be afraid of taking the responsibility might be confronted, from time to time, with emergencies which called upon them concerned, even although they might have to appeal to Parliament thereafter to support the action they had taken. In my own experience, we have been confronted in Tasmania with small-pox; and, had we rigidly adhered to any such a clause as this, which might be in the Constitution Act, in the Audit Act, or in the Audit regulations, we should have left that foe to find its own way through the people, and have altogether disregarded the responsibility which should attach to administrative functions.

Mr. CLARKE. -

But you observed the law.

Sir PHILIP FYSHER. -

We observed the law by asking Parliament to absolve the Administration from the consequence of its breach of the law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

"The safety of the people is the highest law."

Sir PHILIP FYSHER. -

Why should we place a detail of this nature in the Constitution—a detail which it was formerly supposed was provided for by the local audit regulations or would be provided for by a Commonwealth Audit Act which must be passed? When the Commonwealth Parliament frames an Audit Act, it may perhaps be inclined to insert some such provision with regard to the authorities who shall sign warrants for the payment of moneys as we are now discussing. It occurs many times in every year that Treasurers are called upon to take the responsibility of issuing cheques, although the Auditor-General may have reported that there was no special fund against which such cheques could be charged. Why insert in the Constitution a provision which must be broken by many a strong Administration for the benefit of the public, while a weaker Administration will have to observe the law to the injury of the public? I have observed that the members of the Drafting Committee have from time to time contended that the Constitution is a matter of great principles. It is the contract between all the parties to the union, and to insert in such a contract some such detail as that the Auditor-General should sign a warrant before a cheque is issued appears to me to be doing something which it is unnecessary to do. If we insert such a provision we shall only load the Constitution, and embarrass the Ministers who will have to act under it. Let me repeat that a strong Administration will always disregard a provision of this kind, and obtain the support of Parliament for its action. Every one who has undertaken Ministerial responsibilities must know that many cases occur in which one feels it to be his duty to give instructions for the issue of cheques, even where the Auditor-General's signature cannot be procured. This difficulty is overcome by the audit regulations themselves. Men make provision for the observance of the law, but they find it equally necessary to make provision for the non-observance of the law. Hence we have emergency votes, votes with respect to lapse of time, and votes with, regard to an excess of appropriation. I am not aware of any Parliament in Australia that has checked an Administration with regard to its Supplementary Estimates, except when there has been some extravagance bearing evidence of neglect of the public interest. I am perfectly convinced that the proposed restriction is inadvisable, and I trust that the recommendation of the Finance Committee will be given the weight to which it is entitled.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

The object of having these words in the clause is to enable any person who thinks that the money is about to be drawn from the Treasury illegally to go to the Supreme Court and obtain an injunction against the responsible officer of the Commonwealth. I am afraid that such a provision would strike a serious blow at responsible government, and would introduce in a very violent form what is complained of frequently, and in an increasing degree, in America-government by injunction. If we are to intrust to the Federal Parliament such enormous powers as those which they will have in respect to the collection of revenue, surely we can trust them to see that the money when appropriated by law is properly disbursed. No Ministry could live for an instant if it did anything against the will of Parliament. I think these words are wrong in principle. I also think that occasions might easily arise when it would be impossible to draw one shilling from the Treasury if a complaint were made to the Supreme Court. For instance, if the Chief Officer of Audit happened to be ill or away no other person could do his work. It would be impossible to pass an Act of Parliament to substitute any one for him. So long as he lived and retained his office his warrant would be indispensable. If you provide that the Commonwealth Parliament may get over the difficulty by appointing some one else, you make the provision useless, because Parliament would say-"We will have a Chief Officer of Audit, but we will give him such a tenure of office as will enable the Ministry to dispose of him whenever they like." You would then have an officer filling a most responsible position without any security of tenure. On the other hand, if you gave him security of tenure, such as the Judges or our Commissioners of Audit have, you might, under conceivable circumstances, cause great difficulty to arise. Apart from these considerations, I think it would be a mistake in principle to introduce the provision. When we are introducing a system of government which shall resemble as nearly as possible the British Constitution, it is a mistake to fetter the hands of Parliament in regard to what is after all a matter of machinery, and a matter which Parliament is specially charged to look after—the expenditure of the money of the Commonwealth.

The amendment was negatived.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I wish to suggest the addition of the following words to the clause:

But section 82 shall not be deemed to constitute such an appropriation.

During the adjournment, I have been asked by several honorable members to what event in Victorian history I referred in the few remarks I made dealing with the last preceding clause. I have just hunted up the papers, and I find that that clause is exactly upon all-fours with section 45 of the Constitution Act of Victoria, which is as follows:

The consolidated revenue of Victoria shall be permanently charged with all the costs, charges, and expenses incident to the collection, management, and receipt thereof, such costs, charges, and expenses being subject, nevertheless, to be reviewed and audited in such manner as shall be directed by any Act of the Legislature.

Section 46 of the same Constitution Act then goes on to provide for certain other special appropriations, beginning with the words:

There shall be payable in every year to Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, out of the consolidated revenue of Victoria, &c., &c.

Upon the construction of that section a dispute arose in this colony in the year 1865, and the then Governor (Sir Charles Darling) invited the opinion of the Crown law officers, George Higinbotham and Archibald Michie, two distinguished constitutional lawyers, upon it. He put this question to them:

1. Is not the 45th section of the Constitution Act in effect an appropriation of the amount of "all the costs, charges, and expenses incident to the collection, management, and receipt of the revenue," such expenditure to be reviewed and audited as directed by the Legislature?

Then he goes on to express his own opinion. He also asks:

Is there any practical or legal difference between the words "The consolidated revenue of Victoria shall be permanently charged," and the words "There shall be payable in every year out of the consolidated revenue of Victoria"?

The words "There shall be payable to the Queen, out of the consolidated revenue fund of the Commonwealth," occur in two sections of this Federal Constitution—the sections providing for the Governor-General's salary and the section providing for the salaries of Ministers of the Commonwealth.
These words are similar in appropriating force to the words "The consolidated revenue shall be permanently charged." That was why the Governor of the day asked if there was any practical or legal difference between the two sets of words. I will now invite honorable members' attention to the opinion of the Crown law officers, which is dated September, 1865, and which will be found at pages 947 and 948 of vol. 2 of Papers presented to Parliament by command during the session of 1878:-

We are of opinion that the 45th section of the Constitution Act is in effect an appropriation of the amount of "all the costs, charges, and expenses incident to the collection, management, and receipt of the revenue," such expenditure to be reviewed and audited as directed by the Legislature. We are confirmed in this interpretation of the 45th section by the very plain and unambiguous language of the 55th section, which, referring, amongst others, to the 45th section, runs thus: "After and subject to the payments to be made under the provisions hereinbefore contained" (not under the provisions of any Appropriation Act)," and to any pensions now payable, &c., "all the consolidated revenue arising from taxes, duties, rates, and imposts levied by virtue of an Act of the Legislature, and from the disposal of the waste lands of the Crown, shall be subject to be appropriated to such specific purposes as by any Act of the said Legislature shall be provided in that behalf." . . It follows from the above that no annual Appropriation Act would appear to be necessary for enabling the Government to pay the costs, charges, and expenses incident to the "collection, management, and receipt of the revenue."

Referring to the point as to whether there was any difference between the two sets of words which I have already quoted, they say -

It is not very easy either to apprehend or express the difference, if any there be, between the words "The consolidated revenue of Victoria shall be permanently charged," and the words "There shall be payable every year out of the consolidated revenue of Victoria."

Mr. BARTON. -

Do the words "permanently appropriated" occur in the Victorian Act?

Dr. QUICK. -

No; "permanently charged." I hope the time will never come when any Ministry will endeavour to act upon such a special appropriation, but I suggest this addition to the clause to remove doubts about the construction of words about which there can undoubtedly be a difference of opinion. I am sure that no member of the Convention desires that the Constitution should contain a permanent appropriation of all the salaries of the public servants engaged in the collection and management of the revenues. If the words which I propose to add do not quite meet the occasion, I would ask the Drafting Committee to take the matter into their consideration.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Perhaps it would be better to leave the matter for the consideration of the Drafting Committee. I have taken down the words of the honorable member's suggestion, and we will consider them very carefully Dr. QUICK. - In view of the honorable member's promise, I will not move the amendment I intended to move.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Does not the leader of the Convention think it desirable to provide for the establishment of the office of Commissioner of Audits? The reason for the provision recently suggested, but which was struck out, was that there was no check provided in the Bill upon the expenditure of the executive officers of the Commonwealth. The question still remains to be decided whether there should not be such a check. At present, I understand, there are Commissioners of Audit in all the colonies, and they hold office upon practically the same terms as the Judges. The states are interested in the expenditure of the Commonwealth Executive just as much as is the Commonwealth Parliament, because the amount to be returned to the states depends upon the character and the extent of the expenditure of the Commonwealth Executive. A check is provided in America by a regulation which requires the publication of a return showing the receipts and expenditure; but, inasmuch as we have no provision of that kind, would it not be advisable to make arrangements in some part of the Bill to give protection to the states and to the Commonwealth by the establishment of Commissioners of Audit?

Mr. BARTON. -

The honorable member suggests that provision should be made for audit and review?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes. No doubt such a provision would be out of place here, but it might be put in as a separate clause at the end of the chapter dealing with finance.

Mr. BARTON. -

I will see that the matter is taken into consideration.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 84. - The Commonwealth to have exclusive power to levy duties of customs and excise, and offer bounties after a certain time.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Honorable members will notice that the Finance Committee suggest that a paragraph be taken out of clause 84 as it stands, and erected into a separate clause, which I think a very convenient arrangement. They also suggest several other amendments, and I should like to know from you, Mr. Chairman, what would be the correct way of dealing with them? I should like to know whether we should make the suggested transfer now, and then move the amendments which have been suggested, or move the amendments first, and provide for the transfer afterwards?

The CHAIRMAN. -

I have considered the question. Although I had some doubts upon the matter at first, I now feel that we are bound to consider the amendments suggested by the local Parliaments. Clause 27 of the Victorian Australasian Federation Enabling Act—and all the other Parliaments have passed similar Acts—is as follows:—

On the re-assembling of the Convention, the Constitution as framed prior to the adjournment shall be reconsidered, together with such suggested amendments as shall have been forwarded by the various Legislatures, and the Constitution so framed shall be finally adopted with any amendments that may be agreed to.

I do not think we can be said to have considered the suggested amendments of the local Parliaments if they are not put from the Chair, and, therefore, although it may perhaps take a little more time, I think it would be better to follow the course we have adopted from the very first, and deal with the amendments as they occur. When the question is put—"That the clause as amended stand part of the Bill," the committee will be at liberty, if they think fit, to strike it out, and put in its place any other provision which they think would be more suitable.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

It seems to me that that course, sir, will necessitate our going over the ground a second time. Would it not be competent for an honorable member to move that all the words after the first word of the clause be omitted with a view to the insertion of other words? That would render it unnecessary to put amendments suggested by the local Parliaments from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I do not think that the course which we have hitherto adopted will take much longer than the course which the honorable member suggests, and I think it would be better to continue the existing arrangement.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

It will be competent for honorable members to move their own amendments in the intervals between the amendments suggested by the various local Legislatures. That being so, I beg to move—

That the words "After uniform duties of customs" be inserted before the word "The" (line 1).

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the words "the sole power and authority" be omitted, and that the words "exclusive power" be substituted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I should like to learn exactly, if I can, the meaning of the words "subject to the provisions of this Constitution." Are we providing definitely that Parliament is to have the exclusive power of doing this, or is that power limited by anything?

Mr. BARTON. -

That is a provision which has remained in the Bill all the time.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is; but when you talk about exclusive power, you make it subject to something else.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

It is provided elsewhere in the Constitution that duties of customs shall be uniform. That is one thing that would necessitate the interpolation of some such words as those to which the honorable member has alluded. I beg to move the omission of the words "customs duties, to impose duties," and the insertion of the words "duties of customs and" in lieu thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria-

Omit "and to grant bounties upon the production or export of goods."

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I do not know that I desire to take away from the Parliament the power to grant bounties, but I do desire to continue in the state the power to grant bounties which the Federal Parliament think are not unwise, unjust, or unfair to other states.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Not unfederal.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It has been suggested that if the state retains the power to grant bounties it might, under that power, negative, to a great extent, the benefits of intercolonial free-trade. We do not want to do that, but we do know that in some of our colonies, more especially in the colonies of Victoria, South Australia, and probably also Tasmania, it is absolutely necessary, for the well-being of our farmers and producers, that the state should come to their assistance, and help them in the early stages of their industries. And if we are not prepared to do that we will kill many industries which we really desire to foster and encourage. We none of us desire the states to have a power which will enable them to take away the benefits of intercolonial free-trade, which we all desire to see embedded in the Constitution, but I feel that we are in this difficulty, that unless we can show many of our producers and our country people that they are in a position where they may obtain the benefit of help from the state, they will say "We know our position as it is, but we do not know what our position is going to be under this Commonwealth, and so we will have none of it." That is the plain language in which many of those interested in the continuation of these bounties put their case at present, and I believe it will be put in stronger and more forcible language when this question is being discussed by the people. Now, in our colony, and indeed in all the colonies, every vote is of importance, and we should not put against federation individuals, or, as I believe we are doing here, a considerable section of our people. Why should we not—if we choose, and can do it without injustice to other states—encourage production among our own people? Why should we not encourage them to enter into new industries, which will be beneficial to them and to our colony? I think we shall be doing a gross injustice to a large number of our farming and producing classes if we take away from the state the power to grant these bounties, and vest that power in a body before which they will not have the same opportunity of bringing their claims as they have before the local Parliament.

Mr. DOBSON. -

With the exception of bonuses to mining, what bonus could any state give without interfering with free-trade?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I cannot say at the present moment what industries there might be to which bonuses could be granted by a state without injuring some of the other colonies, but because we cannot tell at the present moment what industries may be established with benefit to those engaged in them, and with advantage to the state, it does not follow that in years to come industries may not arise that can be fostered by means of bounties, in, say, Victoria, without injuring the other colonies. We have such industries as the oil industry—I do not know how that would affect Tasmania or South Australia. We undoubtedly have developed the butter industry by means of bonuses, and other colonies are now following our example. We commenced to develop that industry by the grant of bounties, and having developed the trade, having opened it up, other colonies stepped forward and said: "We are glad you have opened up this trade, and we are going to follow in your footsteps." No doubt until the trade was opened up the necessity for bounties in other colonies did not exist, but if Queensland or Western Australia thought that by giving a bounty they might, within their own borders, develop an export trade with other countries without in the slightest degree injuring any of the colonies in the Federation, why should they not be able to do so? It would be somewhat difficult for the various colonies to bring all their respective claims before the Federal Parliament, which will have a large amount of work to do, more especially at the commencement, in dealing with such questions as the Tariff, the division of the surplus, and so on, and probably it will put off, from time to time, dealing with matters which affect only one colony, or, it may be, perhaps two. I fail to see why we should take away from any of the colonies the power to grant bonuses, so long as that power is not used in such a way as to injure other states in the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Leaving the Federal Parliament supreme.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am perfectly prepared to leave the Federal Parliament supreme to decide whether injustice is or is not being done. The idea which I have formed as to what we ought to do, is to add

Provided that any state may grant bounties for the protection of agricultural, horticultural, viticultural, or dairying industries, subject to the same being at any time annulled by the Federal Parliament.

I am not going to say that these are the words which the draftsman would use, but they embody the ideas which have been passing through my mind on the questions which have been brought before me by a large number of country representatives, who say that unless some such provision is made it will be very hard, seeing the other difficulties which they have to contend against, to get country people to vote for the Bill. No doubt the last words of my amendment would create a risk, but that risk you must be prepared to take in the colonies.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Ought you not to go further and get the authority of the Federal Parliament to grant them?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

No, you won't get that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No. I do not want the words for that, because there is full power already in the Bill for the Federal Parliament to grant bonuses and bounties. They must be uniform, so that every colony would have an opportunity to come and take advantage of them. Of course the Federal Parliament has to pay the bonuses. What we are anxious to get, in the interests of many country producers, is that the state shall have the power to grant these bounties, finding the money out of the state revenue independently of the Commonwealth, and doing that only so long as the state is not injuring the Commonwealth.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Ought you not to get the federal authority first to say whether your bounty is legal or not?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If we had to wait until we could got federal authority, we should be in the position of a private member who is trying to get a Bill through the local Parliament, session after session, year after year. The people would get sick and tired of waiting, and take their labours in some other direction. We are taking away from our people in Victoria, by uniform customs and intercolonial free-trade, a tax which, in some of the colonies, is looked upon as obnoxious, but which, by many of our producers, is looked upon as their salvation. We are also doing many things which our country people do not like. I therefore think, if we possibly can, we should conserve their interests to some small extent. What I ask for is very little indeed. It is simply that the state may have power to do it so long as it is doing no injustice to the Federal Parliament or to the rest of Australia.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Suppose that Parliament did annul it, your traders might have had six months' benefit of it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

They might have, but my honorable friend will see that the state Legislature and the Government of the state would be very careful and cautious, with these words in the Bill, to ascertain as fully as they possibly could that the bounty they were about to grant would not do an injustice to the rest of the Commonwealth.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Care and caution should be exercised by the federal authority, not by the local authority.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If we want to do that there is ample power for that purpose in the Bill, and I do not want these words. But in consideration of the time which it would take to get the authority of the Federal Parliament to deal with the question, I am most anxious to allow the state to proceed with these bonuses till the Federal Parliament chooses to step in and stop them. Just as under clause 52 we allow the state to continue to legislate on certain questions, till the Federal Parliament steps in and prevents them from going any further, so here I claim as a right for our producers, whose interests must be considered, that they ought to have some such provision as this in the Constitution Bill.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I quite sympathize with the position of the right honorable member (Sir George Turner), and I can well understand that there is a great deal of valuable support which might be conciliated by an amendment of this kind. But, at the same time, we are all more or less in the same difficulty in regard to these matters, and the very amendment he suggests, which might be such an aid to him, would be a very great obstacle to us in New South Wales. I speak of New South Wales only as an example, but I take it that one of the main benefits we all anticipate from this federation is that trade shall be freed from shackles and impediments of every kind, and that producers shall be put on an absolute equality, so far as they can be placed on air equality, throughout the Commonwealth. Now, what position are these persons in who have had the advantage of this bounty system up to the present time? Under the Bill as it stands, all bounties granted before the 30th June will inure, and the persons who are benefiting now will benefit to the fullest extent by the time that uniform duties of customs are imposed. Under ordinary circumstances, I suppose it is hardly possible that uniform duties of customs can be imposed before, say, two years after the establishment of the Commonwealth—it cannot be very much less than that period. During all that period there will be a notice to those who are holding these bounties, and benefiting under them, that this assistance will come to an end at the end of two years. And in addition to that, immediately that uniform duties of customs are imposed those persons, in common with the rest of the producers in the Commonwealth, will have the advantage of having the whole of the Commonwealth for a market instead of a portion of it only. Therefore, those who have been in the position of receiving a benefit from these bounties will have the benefit taken away, not by any sudden process, but by a gradual process, of which they will have notice, and in exchange for them they will have the advantage at once of the enlarged market which the freedom of trade necessarily produced under this Constitution will give them. But I would like to ask the right honorable member how it is possible that bounties upon any of the kind of products be mentioned could be imposed without affecting the position of producers in other parts of the Commonwealth? The right honorable member used the word "injustice," but whether the bounties are operating unjustly or unfairly is not the test. You cannot say that they are operating in that way, perhaps; but at the same time they may be taking away from the producers of the Commonwealth one of the very advantages which was the consideration for their entering into the Federation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Suppose you can grow a thing in Tasmania, and you cannot grow that thing in New South Wales or Queensland, How then?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
In the case the honorable member puts, I dare say the operation would not be of very much moment; but take the much more common case of an article which may be produced anywhere in the Commonwealth. Does the honorable member believe for one moment that, taking an article of common production, if you give a bounty for its production here, and there is no bounty given for its production in the rest of the Commonwealth, the person who gets that bounty is not put in an advantageous position as against every other producer of the same article in the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
The Federal Parliament will simply annul it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I will point out to the honorable member in a moment that no person in the Commonwealth ought to be put in the position of having to go to the Federal Parliament, and carry a Bill through that Parliament to declare an injustice, and thereby stop something which ought never to have been done, according to the principles which are at the bottom of our union and our freedom of trade and commerce.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Would not the courts stop it before the Federal Parliament acted?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
How could the federal courts stop it?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
If it was an interference with free-trade between the colonies.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Not if there is an express provision in the Constitution that it shall inure till Parliament interferes Mr. HIGGINS. - That is too strong.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I have held the belief all through our discussions that we ought to appeal to the court in these matters as little as possible. Keep your court only for the decision of solemn constitutional questions, and avoid, as far as possible, placing before your court the decision of matters which may be merely matters of policy, as this would be. I think the honorable member will see that, unless you put some words into the amendment which would make the decision of the question whether a bonus is or is not operating unfairly, rest with the court, the court would have no jurisdiction to interfere, and I understand that the amendment of the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) proposes to let these bounties stand till they are declared by the Federal Parliament to be unfair or unjust.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That goes too far.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

In answer to the interjection of my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin) just now-"Will they not be able to appeal to the Federal Parliament if these bounties are operating unfairly?" I say that they ought not to be put to that. There will always be a difficulty in carrying any measure of that kind through a Parliament. The vested interests involved in the maintenance of these duties no doubt are very large, and would operate exactly in the same way as other vested interests do in the obstruction of measures before the Parliament. No producers in any part of the Commonwealth ought to be put in the position of having to apply that remedy to do away with a state of things which is altogether contrary to the principles on which we enter the Federation. I am quite aware that some of the vested interests may be interfered with by taking this step, but, after all, are not vested interests interfered with all over the Commonwealth by the taking of this step, and is there any use in shivering on the brink of it? Must we not take it, and take it undoubtedly without inflicting any injury on vested interests more than is absolutely necessary? But, after all, is not the bold course the best course-to make up our minds that we are going to have freedom of intercourse right through the Commonwealth? That means not only that your custom-houses shall be done away with, but that every producer in every part of the Commonwealth shall be put on exactly the same footing in regard to the production and the sale of an article. That cannot be if these bounties are to be retained. The exceptions have already been made, and I think they are reasonable. The bounties will continue, as I pointed out, for two years. Bounties conferred after 30th of June, 1898, will be considered to be void, and the principle of the new clause, which is suggested amongst the financial clauses, is really the principle I am now advocating, that is to say, that there should be a notice to all producers in the Commonwealth that after a certain date they are to rely on the immense benefits which the opening of the whole of the markets of the Commonwealth to every producer therein will give them, and that they are not to rely on any other assistance after that date. Let us follow the principle right down in the amendment of the Finance Committee. Let us make up our minds that the principle on which we are founding the Constitution—one of the first principles of our union, one of the first advantages we can take back to our people—is that it will give them freedom of intercourse and put producers in every part of the Commonwealth on exactly the same footing. Let us not depart from that principle. Let it begin to operate immediately uniform duties of customs are imposed, and do not let us put any producer in any part of the Commonwealth in the position of ever suffering an injustice which the giving of this bounty in any other part of the Commonwealth will inflict on him, or put him to the burden of asking the Federal Parliament to declare that a bounty is an injustice, and should no longer continue. The right honorable member (Sir George Turner) may see fit to press his amendment. I quite sympathize with his position and the difficulties he is in, but, at the same time, it appears to me that our best course is the bold course of making up our minds to stand by the principle which is embedded in the Constitution, and to give up the idea of any easing off such as he proposes.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I very gladly support the Premier of Victoria in this matter. I consider that he is taking a step which is absolutely necessary in the producing interests of Australia. Almost all the arguments of the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) will be met by the inhibitory power which it is proposed to place in the hands of the Commonwealth. That will be sufficient to prevent any state from doing anything which is derogatory to the principles of equality of trade among the different states. I would like to point out that even the opening of intercolonial markets for the producer will not suffice to solve the problem that faces him, because it is well known that with any limit to the market there is always a liability to such a glut as practically spoils the enterprise of the producer, and takes away all hope of a profitable return for his labour. And it is just such fears as that, and in order to regulate production and afford a guarantee to the producer that he will have a reward for his labour, that render it necessary to make provision for export of surplus produce to the markets of the globe. And so with regard to our larger sphere of operations the same principle will obtain, and we shall have to make provision, not only for free interchange among ourselves, but also such provision as may be necessary to enable the producers jointly to exploit the world's markets.

Mr. HENRY. -
The Federal Parliament will do that.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

The honorable member has spoken of the difficulty of getting the Federal Parliament to exercise its inhibitory power when the principle of equality of trade is threatened by a bounty. How much harder will it be to gain the ear of the Federal Parliament when an industry is in its initiatory stages, and when the difficulties of production in a particular industry are only known to a part of the Commonwealth?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It will not be difficult, because every citizen will benefit by the enlarged trade.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

We do not want to stifle the initiative of a state in reference to production. We want to have the full advantage of whatever the future has in store for us. We want to say to every producer:"Exercise your power of initiative and we will not hinder the states in helping you." To say that the states are no longer to exercise their power of initiative in this matter, but that the Federal Parliament is to take the initiative, is to postpone assistance to the producer to a day when that assistance will never be realized. Assistance to industries has to be given, beginning when they are commencing on a small scale. It is only on a small scale that you are able to prove the advantages arising from a new industry. And how can you expect to get a huge body like the Federal Parliament to interest itself in a small industry in the corner of a colony? For instance, the first colony that came forward and foresaw the advantage of stimulating the butter industry was Victoria, and the result has been beneficial not only to Victoria but to all the other colonies. The action that Victoria took with regard to the butter industry has been recognised throughout the continent as not only a good thing for that colony, but for all the group. But if the butter producers of Victoria had in the beginning had to prove their case to the Federal Parliament, the time for the stimulation of the industry by a bonus would probably not yet have come. It is, only by one colony proving that an export of this kind is advantageous that a general consent can be obtained. The experiment must be tried and proved successful on a small scale at first before you can get a large body of public opinion to support it.

Mr. FRASER. -

Has not the butter industry been established in Canada?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I admit that something has been done there in the way of butter export and the establishment of creameries.

Mr. FRASER. -
More than we are doing.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I question that. But I should like to know what colony has been injured by the initiative taken in the establishment of the dairying industry by Victoria? Instead of any of us being injured by it we have all benefited. Victoria has pioneered the way in this industry. The pioneers of any industry ought to receive some public recognition for their enterprise and expenditure, because the man who feels the way in the world's markets, and opens up a road into them, has a right to expect that you will give him some recompense for constructing a road on which all can travel with advantage. The difficulties in the way with regard to this matter will be got rid of by providing that the federal authority-I do not care whether it is the Federal Parliament or the Inter-State Commission-shall have power to inhibit any step taken by any of the states which may appear to be derogatory to freedom of trade. We want neither to do anything to stop the initiative of the states, nor to discount the great future of the Commonwealth with reference to freedom of trade between the states. With regard to the proposal made by the Finance Committee that there should be some power retained by the states of granting bounties providing agreements are made to do so before the 30th June next, I do not see that anything is to be said in favour of that provision which cannot be said in favour of inserting a general power in favour of the initiative of the states. The provision suggested by the committee would mean that the states which were favorable to the granting of bounties would probably endeavour to crowd into the next six months agreements for every form of bounty they conceived could possibly be of value to them; and that would be more derogatory to the principle of freedom of trade than the present proposal, because there would be no power on the part of the federal authority to inhibit them. If agreements are entered into before the 30th June next, no matter how hostile they may be to the principle of freedom of trade, they are to be sanctioned.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

They will be formed before the Constitution is established.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

But why should they be sanctioned simply because they happen to be entered into before the 30th June next?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Because you cannot interfere with the freedom of the states to make these agreements, except under the provisions of this Constitution.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
You are offering a special inducement to the states to do what they can to institute bounties, although they may be hostile to the very principle of our federation.

_Sir John Forrest._

But the states will not do that.

_Dr. Cockburn._

But they will do it if this power be inserted; or, at all events, they may do it.

_Sir Edward Braddon._

That would show a very fine federal spirit!

_Dr. Cockburn._

Then do not place the states that want to retain the initiative in the development of the productive resources of Australia in such a position that they will be tempted to do such a thing. You say to the individual states—"No matter how anti-federal the agreements which you may enter into, we will allow them to be perpetuated if made before a certain date, but we forbid you in the future to do what may be legitimately necessary to develop your producing interests." I cannot see what objection there can be to allowing the states to grant bounties subject to the conditions that have been mentioned. I think the proposal is an eminently reasonable one.

_Sir John Forrest._

It would destroy intercolonial freedom of trade altogether.

_Dr. Cockburn._

Surely the right honorable gentleman can see that free-trade will not be destroyed if the Federal Parliament has power to intervene. The Federal Parliament will take care to maintain the principle of free-trade.

_Mr. Howe._

It will lead to the states putting on protective bonuses to operate against each other.

_Dr. Cockburn._

No, that is a mistaken view. We want to have nothing inserted in this Constitution that would enable the states to exploit one another's markets. I was going to suggest to Sir George Turner that this provision should be limited solely to exports outside Australian boundaries, and should not authorize bounties for trade within the Commonwealth. A good deal of the objection has arisen from the fear of honorable members that the local markets of one state may be glutted by imports under bounties from another state. There is no such intention, I am sure, in the mind of Sir George Turner. The object of the amendment is to encourage the formation of channels of trade to the world's market. No state can be injured by any action of another state which has this result. Each state that takes the initiative in such a matter is forming an additional road to the world's market, upon which the federal authority may eventually find it desirable to travel. If you take away this power from the states you will find that the Federal Parliament will be too large a body to take the initiative itself. If you destroy the power of building the model on the small scale, you prevent the possibility of any great public work ever being executed. There are parts of Australia that are fitted to be the birthplaces of particular industries. The states in which these favoured localities are situated should be left to take such steps as may be necessary for the encouragement of these industries, so long as they do nothing derogatory to free-trade. Other states will follow their example, and by-and-by the Federal Parliament will find it to its interests to move in the same direction. Strike out this power of initiative on the part of the states, and you take away one of those powers that will make for the future greatness of Australia. This is an elastic power of development that should be retained, and that can be retained without the slightest risk of the violation of any of our principles. Sir George Turner's amendment will serve the purpose more effectually than the amendment proposed by the Finance Committee. I hope that the amendment, modified in such a way as to provide that the bounties shall only be granted on products exported to places outside the Commonwealth, will be carried. From the first, and both in Adelaide and in Sydney, I raised my voice in favour of this system, and I did so as one who, from the peculiar nature of the work he has to do as Minister of Agriculture, recognised the necessity of it. I hope that the Convention, not with any idea of getting the vote of the producing interest-not only with that view I will say, but with a view of leaving it open to the states to grasp the opportunities of the future will carry Sir George Turner's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Sir George Turner's amendment is not before the committee now. The amendment before us is to strike out the words "and to grant bounties upon the production and export of goods." If these words are retained that will settle the matter. Perhaps Dr. Cockburn would like me, in stating the question, to divide the amendment?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Yes; and I would also like you to exercise the discretion which has proved so beneficial to the committee by not putting the question until some discussion has taken place as to the best form in which the amendment can be submitted.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

It is not my desire, any more than it is the desire of other honorable members, to introduce the question of free-trade or protection. I know that there has been great activity amongst the Ministers of Agriculture of different provinces, and that the honorable member who has just sat down feels very strongly with regard to this subject. If I recollect rightly the debate which took place in Adelaide, the whole question then was with regard to the export of produce. It was argued that the fact of giving a bounty upon the export of produce could not in any way interfere with free-trade within the colony, but it was proved, almost to a demonstration, that a bounty on the export of produce was practically the same as an import duty. We are all to be supposed to have equality of trade. Each colony, each producer, and each manufacturer is to be placed exactly on the same footing. But if this amendment is entirely confined to exports, will any honorable member who looks into the matter thoroughly say that such a bounty is not practically a bounty upon production within the colony? Will not the whole of this bounty go to help the internal trader, the producer, and seller to undersell the man in another colony? Under our system he is to be in a position of equality with every other exporter. His exports are to be governed by the state of the mark.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That is the whole question.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Honorable members are very clever. I quite see the cleverness and ability of the proposal to continue this custom until the Federal Parliament alters it. The Federal Parliament will have enormous work to do. It is not very easy to alter a system like this. The Ministers of the Crown, especially under the difficult circumstances that will surround them, will not be inclined to face so disputable a question. And then I would ask honorable members to look at the danger of this proposal. At the very time when we are going to get all the benefits of intercolonial free-trade, when we are beginning to put into operation the very biggest factor of the Federation, it will be within the power of the state Governments, by enormous bounties, to create the effect of import duties. There is no doubt about that, and it would be an enormous flaw in this Constitution if we allowed it to be introduced. No matter what the effect would be in certain industries, if we are to have what, in the simple language of this Bill, is called equality of trade, this system must be renounced, so far as local legislation is concerned.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

It appears to me that the honorable member's (Mr. McMillan's) address relates wholly and solely to what every advocate of the system of bounties will admit is a possible use, and in the case of a Federal Government a possible abuse, of the system. But to assume, as he does, that it is not possible to permit to the states any concurrent power in the way of granting bounties which would not be injurious, and necessarily injurious to any member, of the Commonwealth, is a fundamental fallacy. Consequently I was, and am, able to indorse in the general way in which they were put, the observations of the honorable gentleman. I concur with him that any claim made by the states to the right to grant bounties must be so safeguarded in the granting, and the method of its use, as to effectually prevent its abuse, in the manner in which the honorable member seems to think is its only possible exercise. That is to say, we are required to satisfy this Convention that the conditions under which that power would be exercised will be such as to effectually prevent any advantage being gained by the producers of one colony over the producers of any other colony, and such as would not derogate in any sense from the freedom and equality of trade. If that be the case, I admit that the proposal as framed by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner is open to some objection. So far as it places a power in the Federal Parliament to disallow bounties which appear to have an anti-federal operation, it is, as all will admit, an efficient power. But it certainly is a reasonable argument to contend that the Federal Parliament—a body of such magnitude—will be slowly moved, and that it is possible that in the interim some injury might be done to the producers in some part of the Commonwealth by the activity of a state in another part of the Commonwealth aiming at supporting specific classes of its producers. But that only raises the question whether an effective tribunal cannot be found which would act more promptly when federal interests were imperilled. In any opinion, such a tribunal can be found, and can be trusted to exercise, on behalf of the whole Commonwealth, the necessary powers. I would suggest as a possible tribunal the Government of the Commonwealth itself, in whom might be vested the power of disallowing, until the Federal Parliament had an opportunity of considering the question, any bounty which in their opinion would have an anti-federal effect; that is, any bounty which tended to prejudice that free and equal trade throughout the Commonwealth, which constitutes the commercial basis of the whole structure. I am not wedded to that particular form of tribunal, but if we provide some tribunal powerful and prompt enough to prevent any injury to the producers of any part of the Commonwealth by the exercise of its veto, we escape the peril which alone has intimidated certain honorable members who have addressed themselves to this question. Now, let me put the question from the other point of view. In this matter the dividing line, notwithstanding the disclaimer of Mr. McMillan, is drawn now, and will always be drawn, between politicians in the various states who approve and those who disapprove of state interference. In the Federal Parliament both parties will be strongly represented. Is it not asking an undue sacrifice of state rights to require of us when we join a Federation, giving every guarantee necessary to secure freedom and equality of trade, that the bulk of the people who in certain states are in favour of state interference are to have their local action hampered by the fact that people in other states are not in favour of state interference? It must be remembered that the people of states not in favour of state interference are not asked to make any sacrifice. It is not asked that the bounty shall come out of their pockets. If they are protected against any indirect injurious effect or unfair competition such as might arise if it were not safeguarded, but which could not arise if you place such a tribunal as I suggest in a position of supremacy, what right have they to say that the people of a more enterprising—or, if you like, more experimental—state shall not have the privilege of developing with their own money industries which may be confined to their particular state or two particular states out of the whole of the Commonwealth? Because the conditions of pastoral and agricultural life are somewhat alike in all the states, some honorable members assume that an industry which flourishes in one colony might very possibly be transported to every other colony. Even so, we have before our eyes the manifestation of a principle which will become more and more manifest in the course of time, that is, the principle of the segregation of industries and the springing up of particular industries in localities which are specially favorable to them. I am surprised to find that Mr. McMillan, and other free-traders, should now ignore the operation of that general principle of industrial development which they so often use as a powerful buttress for their fiscal arguments. I am surprised at their overlooking the natural and inevitable operation of that principle within the bounds of the Commonwealth. Within the Commonwealth we shall establish free-trade, and under free-trade, as they will admit, the inevitable tendency is that the districts most suitable for particular industries will become the centres from which these industries will be conducted, and in which alone they will probably be conducted on any large scale. If that be the tendency with all industries, more particularly will it be the case with special industries. What honorable members are asking is that all the states shall surrender the privilege of assisting industries, which may in the beginning, and which perhaps for all time, will be confined to that particular state, though they will never be sufficiently established all over the Federation to be able to get assistance from the Federal Government.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Might you not say the same with regard to your protective duties?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
No; because protective duties are imposed in absolute independence of any other state, and without the possibility of prohibition. The broad distinction is this: The Premier of Victoria has indicated his willingness to place in a particular tribunal the supreme power to negative every anti-federal bounty that might be put in force, and to negative it promptly before any injury could be done to the rest of the Commonwealth. That being so, having obtained an absolute guarantee of safety to the whole Federation, why go on to insist upon crippling the local industries of particular states?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
But you would establish the bounty first, and have the prohibition afterwards.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
No, the two things could be contemporaneous. You would have to get an Act passed empowering the Government to give a bonus.

Mr. REID. -
You could pass an item in an Appropriation Act.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
But that would be an item in an Act.

Mr. REID. -
Still, it is not an Act of the troublesome character of special legislation.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It serves my purpose if it is admitted that it must be placed in some Act. It cannot be placed in any Act without the delay and discussion involved in getting such an Act passed. During that time the Federal Government may have so made up its mind that the proposition for a particular bounty may be annulled upon the very day, or upon the next day, of its introduction, by the intimation that the granting of that bounty is prohibited pending the action of the Federal Parliament. It is idle to say that any bounty could have a prejudicial effect within a week, a month, or a year. In these colonies all bounties have in view the long life of the industry which they are intended to develop, and proceed by easy stages to assist that development. They can, therefore, be readily annulled before coming into force. Are we to render the path of federation more and more difficult in each colony? We have had requests put forward in the Convention from time to time on behalf of different colonies-
Mr. REID. -
But never listened to.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

They have been listened to in several cases, and, in the case of the colony which the right honorable gentleman represents, not only listened to but conceded in several instances. The whole system of accounts provided for in the clauses relating to finance and trade was inserted to please-

New South Wales, and not desired by any other colony of the group.

Mr. REID. -

I fancy that that system was adopted upon its merits.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes, and as the best solution possible. But every honorable member who has spoken, including the representatives of New South Wales, has admitted that the bookkeeping provision was required by New South Wales alone.

Mr. WALKER. -

And Western Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No doubt she accepted it, because she got satisfaction under it, but nevertheless, on the testimony of the Finance Committee, it was adopted to satisfy New South Wales. The right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) indicated that he did not regard this as the only means of attaining his end, and he speaks for his colony with the highest authority. When we have the requests of individual colonies properly considered, why should not the request that I am now making, and which is strongly supported, not by one colony alone, but by two colonies—South Australia and Victoria—be conceded?

Mr. HOWE. -

I suppose the whole population of those colonies support it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I do not say the whole population. The representatives of majorities in those colonies support it.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Quite right.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

And the representatives of very powerful minorities in every other colony support it. This request that the right of the states to continue bounties which shall not be anti-federal

Mr. REID. -

There is a very warm federal feeling at Ballarat.
Mr. DEAKIN. -

I believe that Ballarat is an intensely federal city. My point is this: Why should we unnecessarily raise antagonism to federation? Honorable members must see that if ample federal security be given, those who ordinarily object to the granting of bounties can have no fear.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Such a provision would raise antagonism between the Commonwealth and the states at once.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I do not agree with the honorable member, but that is a later difficulty. I am discussing the probability of the adoption of the Constitution by the electors, and pointing out that those who are opposed to state interference cannot upon federal grounds object to such a proposal so long as some federal authority is provided capable of preventing the granting of any anti-federal bounty. All supporters of state interference will hail this proposal with approbation, and, if it is denied, they will regard the denial as unnecessarily limiting state powers. They will say, as the honorable member (Dr. Cockburn), with his practical experience, has so well put it, that the Federal Government may reasonably be expected to gain much valuable experience by watching the operation of local bonuses in particular states; and when these bounties commend themselves to the Federal Government by federal considerations, they can be repealed by the Federal Government as state bounties and granted as federal bounties, at the federal expense, for the benefit of all the citizens of the Commonwealth.

Mr. FRASER. -

Can two parties be giving bounties at the same time?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No; that would not happen. The Federal Government would repeal the local bounties and grant federal bounties upon its own terms, having state experience to guide it.

Mr. BARTON. -

Why cannot the granting of the bounty in the first instance be left to the judgment of the Federal Parliament?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Because there are so many instances in which embryonic industries existing only in parts of the Commonwealth will fail to attract the attention of the Federal Parliament for many years.

Mr. HENRY. -

Will the honorable member give us some illustrations?
Mr. DEAKIN. -
I have some in my mind's eye, but to discuss them would lead too far.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Suppose there were a large bounty given in respect to a special product in Melbourne, would not an opportunity be afforded to ship that product to Sydney at a lower price than at which the same article produced locally could be sold?
Mr. DEAKIN. -
Certainly. I am not able to hold the opinion of the honorable member (Dr. Cockburn) that the giving of these bounties for purely export purposes is a sufficient guarantee for the maintenance of that free and equal trade throughout the Commonwealth which must be the supreme principle of federation. I admit that the only state bounties which the Federal Parliament can allow to exist will be such as will not interfere directly or indirectly with free and equal trade throughout the Commonwealth. The honorable member indicates that he does not think there are such industries. He does not conceive of industries which may be developed in one colony without affecting other colonies.
Mr. BARTON. -
What would be such industries?
Mr. DEAKIN. -
Such industries as would be profitable only in a particular locality or a particular state. Such an industry might be one not now existing in any colony.
Dr. COCKBURN. -
Take the pearl-shell industry in the Northern Territory.
Mr. REID. -
That would make a good Victorian industry.
Mr. DEAKIN. -
My right honorable friend's sarcastic interjection proves my case. Why should Victoria, because she cannot produce pearl shells, object to the Western Australian Government giving a bounty for the encouragement of the search for pearl shells upon her northern coast? I do not think that this is the best illustration that could be given, but it is a good illustration. If it were proposed to make such a bounty a federal bounty, the representatives of Victoria in the Commonwealth Parliament could urge that the industry was not federal, and that the only industries which the Federal Parliament should encourage were industries which were scattered throughout the several states of the Union.
Mr. HOWE. -
Would not the Commonwealth be proud to develop such an industry as the pearl-shell industry?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is not an industry to which I myself think the Federal Government might be expected to offer special encouragement. If you take time, you may get the Federal Parliament to move in regard to a great many industries, but you must wait a longer time to convince the Federal Parliament than would be required to convince a state Parliament. If the Federal Parliament sees, after an industry has been developed, that it will never prosper beyond the bounds of a single state, it will not consider it worthy of a federal bounty, though it may still consider it worthy of a state bounty. The state bounties would, no doubt, be confined to certain special industries, and perhaps confined to special states during the whole period of their history. And if that be so, and if you have an efficient guarantee that federal interests will not be impaired, why object to this concession, which will be greatly prized by the whole of the agricultural population of Victoria, by a large proportion of the agricultural population of South Australia, and by a not inconsiderable part of the population of the other colonies? Why place this additional obstacle in the path of federation, when, with an efficient guarantee, this concession may be made to the states without injury to the Commonwealth?

Mr. REID. -

How would this affect the agriculturists of Victoria?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

In several directions. The granting of state bounties has enormously improved their condition. But for the dairy industry, which was developed by means of state bounties, large numbers of the prosperous farmers of Victoria would have been insolvent.

Mr. REID. -

Are they so unenterprising as that?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

They are so enterprising that they have managed to keep the lead of the farmers of the other colonies before they had the assistance of the butter bounties and since.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

When were those bounties first granted?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

They were granted by the Victorian Parliament in 1889.

Mr. BARTON. -
Then they have been on long enough.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes, those have been on long enough, and they have been discarded. It is not a question of butter bounties, because we are not paying butter bounties in Victoria now. Those bounties have ceased, having answered their purpose.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If the Victorian farmers had had to wait for the Federal Parliament to take action in that case, they would never have got those butter bounties.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Possibly never at all. This issue involves a cardinal distinction between honorable members in the Convention and between people outside the Convention. It is idle to enter into the merits or demerits of state bounties here, because it is a question we cannot hope to settle here. There is a broad line of demarcation between us, but if we can satisfy the opponents of any state interference by inserting sufficient guarantees for the exercise of this power without injury to the Commonwealth, shall we risk the support of thousands and tens of thousands of electors who approve of state bounties? If we do, I venture to say we shall be taking an unwise, and, if I may be permitted to say so, an unfederal action.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

All through the different Conventions and deliberations we have had there has been a general consensus of opinion that matters relating to fiscal policy should be handed over to the Federal Parliament. This amendment of the Premier of Victoria is simply a proposal that that settlement of the fiscal question shall be met by a rider, which will leave to each colony the right to attempt, at any rate, to maintain its own fiscal policy, in spite of the general fiscal policy of the Commonwealth. There can be not the slightest doubt of that, and it does strike me that gentlemen who tell us they have confidence in the opinions of the vast majority of the electors of Australia, as men who are really sound protectionists, should be the last to want guarantees for the adoption of their principles in the legislation of the Commonwealth. The mere fact that this proposal is made marks, I think, a very instructive stage in the progress of the fiscal question and of the way in which it is regarded throughout Australia. The Finance Committee, by a very large, an overwhelming majority, settled this matter in the way honorable members see it in the clause, and, at the same time, we felt that the fullest liberty should be given to each colony that might have some project of the kind under negotiation—that the fullest latitude should be allowed to each colony to carry out honorably any obligation it might have undertaken in reference to any particular form of bounty. We therefore agreed that each state should have the full right up to the 30th of June next to enter into any agreement, no matter how long it might last, in the nature of a bounty. Well, I think that is surely giving the different states latitude enough. Honorable members will see that one grave objection to this proposal is that it will really lead to a renewal of the old fiscal war. As the Commonwealth Tariff is being shaped, the different Governments and the different states will see the form it is going to assume, and there will be a desperate scramble through the omission of these words, and the powers their omission will confer. Any state that wants to maintain a protective industry will immediately grant a bounty for that industry when they find that the wisdom of the Commonwealth Parliament cannot be relied on to protect it.

Mr. HOWE. -

Supposing the representatives of the smaller colonies laid their heads together in the Federal Parliament, they could very easily get a majority against the other colonies.

Mr. REID. -

That might happen. But when Mr. Deakin used the phrase "the whole of the agricultural population of Victoria," and declared that those people were intensely interested in this question of state bounties, I thought of the special kind of bounty that might turn up and take the place of the present stock tax, namely, a bounty of 30s. per head on every fat bullock, Victorian bred, that was sold in the Melbourne meat market.

Mr. FRASER. -

Or calf.

Mr. REID. -

A bounty which would apply to one class could be made to apply to all the others. Now, such a bounty would be immediately setting up something which would perpetuate, even in the attempt to carry it out, all the bad feel

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Would it not be an inducement to your people in New South Wales to send beasts to Victoria?

Mr. REID. -

No, because the beasts would have to be fattened in Victoria before the bounty could be obtained. Does not the honorable member know that there is a stock tax in Victoria? It does not speak well for the number of cattle in South Australia, if the knowledge of that tax has not spread there yet.

Mr. FRASER. -

There is a stock tax in South Australia, too.

Mr. REID. -
I should have thought so. Well, when Mr. Deakin used the phrase "the whole of the agricultural population of Victoria" and told us that they are hanging on to this proposal, I could not help thinking of the stock tax, because that is the only thing which could have prompted this proposal.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Your illustration will not work out.

Mr. REID. -
Very possibly not, but there would be attempts to use this power to the disadvantage of the other states.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Then the Federal Parliament or the Inter-State Commission. would interfere.

Mr. REID. -
Yes, and what a clumsy sort of federation we are establishing in that case. We are first beginning to frame the Constitution of the Commonwealth on the highest pinnacle of brotherliness, we are providing that all the trade and commercial intercourse of the Australians shall be on absolutely fair and equal conditions, and then we are beginning to refine it, in order to protect some interest against possible want of attention on the part of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -
Look at clause 95-No derogation from freedom of trade.

Mr. REID. -
This Bill is full of declarations which go to show that there is to be absolute equality of trade and commercial intercourse.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
We are all in favour of that.

Mr. REID. -
Yes, with a rider.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
There is not a single exception.

Mr. REID. -
Does not the honorable member know that the amendment of the Premier of Victoria would be a rider to this equality of trade and intercourse?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It would neither be a rider nor an over-rider.

Mr. REID. -
How dear this is to the lawyer's mind-something to do that you can undo. But that is not the way we are endeavouring to build up the foundation of commercial intercourse in Australia. These are the very evils that the colonies have been suffering from ever since they had separate Parliaments—ever insisting on building up and pulling down. Now, that spirit would spread and become intensified in the Commonwealth. We will, no doubt, have very bitter struggles in Australia before the fiscal policy of the Commonwealth is determined on, and how much those struggles will be embittered and intensified if, side by side with them, there are in Parliament attempts to place the colonists of one state upon a more advantageous plane than the colonists of another state possessing exactly the same industries!

Mr. Howe. -

It is simply a travesty of free-trade.

Mr. Reid. -

Talk about unfederal projects! This seems to me to be the most unfederal project we have had submitted to us since the Convention began, because it seems to spring either from the want of a full appreciation of all the evils which Australians have suffered from these warring policies, or from an infatuated desire to continue them. The one thing, I fancy, the average Australian is looking forward to in connexion with this Commonwealth is that this eternal fiscal question, with all its difficulties, shall be settled once and for all by the Federal Parliament, and that the Federal Parliament shall have the duty of settling it. If we are to have this power vested in the states, the Federal Parliament can very well say—"Oh, very well, we will leave the states to go on and fix up their own policies in connexion with this matter, because we will have the right by-and-by to annul any bounty which does not meet with our approval." Now, there we have all the evils of the old state of things reproduced in the Federal Parliament. Suppose that the bounty which it was proposed to annul was a Victorian one, we should have the representatives of Victoria clamouring for the maintenance of the bounty, saying that if the Federal Parliament annulled it it would be doing a distinct injury to Victoria. We would have in the Federal Parliament a never-ending war about this or that advantage prevailing in this or that colony, which the settlers in some other part of Australia were not enjoying, and, in order to do justice to all, we would have to get back to the old dismal state of things in which there was a ring fence put round everything in the hope that it would grow more quickly. I am prepared, and all of those who believe as strongly as I do are prepared, to take our chances in the Federal Parliament. If we find a majority of the Federal Parliament against us on any point of fiscal policy, what will our plain duty be? It will be to agitate throughout the Commonwealth for a change of public opinion in order to bring the Federal Parliament to our point of view. And so with our friends. If they find that the Federal Parliament in this great enterprise of settling this fiscal question does not do its duty to colonial industry, does not give a proper scale of bounties which will apply, and have the great merit of applying all round, so as to create no unbrotherly feeling, then there is a legitimate sphere of agitation to bring the Federal Parliament, by means of the constituencies, into a proper frame of mind, so that a proper form of policy shall prevail. At any rate, we will secure that the policies shall be uniform, and that no man in Australia shall feel in his business that the legislation of the Commonwealth is put on lines prejudicial to himself. It is to secure certainty, stability, and an Australian breadth of treatment in these matters that this Constitution is designed. Although it does not do to speak too positively against any proposal which is made, because we may be sure that there may be very good reasons in its favour, still I do feel that, under the circumstances, we shall be taking a backward step if we throw this matter into the state of confusion it is in at the present time. And when my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin) says-"If the state bounty is an anti-federal bounty it call be annulled," I do not see how any bounty of a state can be otherwise than anti-federal.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That is the whole point.

Mr. REID. -

If, for instance, the fiscal policy that my learned friend still, to a certain extent, adheres to—if it does not justify itself soon, I know he is going to forsake it—if that fiscal policy represents the deliberate convictions of a majority of the Commonwealth, do we suppose that the majority who honestly entertain these fiscal views is not a safe body to appeal to for any genuine industry which wants assistance? If the majority in the Federal Parliament scouts these artificial aids to industry, you have nothing to hope from them till you convert a majority to that view. But if, on the contrary, they are, as my honorable friends opposite hope and believe, sound on that question, then I say it shows a great want of confidence in the Federal Parliament if they believe that while they entertain these proper principles of fostering a single industry, they will prevent assistance from being given out of the Federal Exchequer as a national thing, as a national enterprise, towards any new industry in any part of the Commonwealth. And indeed I think, in the interests of those new industries, this matter is better left to the Federal Parliament, because, if the majority of the members are in favour of that form of encouraging colonial industry, they will find it difficult to defend themselves if they use their power in an unfair or unequal way. I think that if the policy is adopted in the Federal Parliament, and a colony can show to the Federal Parliament a legitimate industry for which it is particularly useful, it can surely hope that the Federal Parliament will do it justice. At any rate, we will have this certainty, if we throw the matter into the hands of the Federal Parliament, that whatever is done is done upon broad national grounds in the interests of the nation. The fatal point of the proposition of my honorable friend is that we should have a national tribunal to encourage industry oil a national basis side by side with the power in each colony to endeavour to carry out its own experiment for the benefit of its own particular citizens. There is no harmony, I think, in a Constitution based on those lines. There is no doubt whatever that those of us who hold as I do will look upon this as a very great blemish on the Constitution. We are prepared, as honorable members knew, to take all the risk, which seems to be great, that all our views will be discountenanced in the Federal Parliament, that every cherished maxim of political economy will be rejected, but still we feel that in the interests of this Federation we must take that risk, that we must remove these evils from the Australian communities. Under these circumstances, if those of us who are said to be in a minority are prepared to take all the risks of the Federal Parliament, I think that those who have always been so confident that their principles will prevail should be prepared to leave it also to the Federal Parliament. The strong point of objection to this proposal is that it leaves in the hands of two different authorities the same thing, and the proposal that in handing over this power to the Federal Parliament the states should still maintain it shows a want of confidence beforehand in the working of the Federal Parliament. Since we have given to the 30th of June, 1898, which is a period of five months; since the wise men of Victoria and the wise men of South Australia, who must be taken to know pretty well the natural resources of the different parts of their territories, have this period within which they can make an agreement which will be legally binding, however long it may be, they should not ask us to make a serious departure from the broad lines on which these clauses have been framed. I take the strongest possible view against such a thing being done, and I think, even in Victoria, there would be a feeling of disappointment if it were thought that such things could be done. It must never be forgotten that it is quite possible, in days to come, that in the colony I represent there may be a Prime Minister and a Cabinet who take the views which are now held in. Victoria, and this very power which Victorians and South Australians seem to think it is in the interests of their colonies to assert to-day-

Mr. DEAKIN. -
And every colony.

Mr. REID. -

We must each judge for ourselves, and our people are accustomed to judge for themselves. In the future my own colony may happen, in such circumstances, to be the colony which will throw most difficulties in the way of a uniform state of trade and intercourse; so that in the shifting accidents of political life, whilst to-day I am looking at my friends opposite as possible sinners in this matter, it might well be that in years to come my own colony might be the chief offender. We all want to prevent any one of the colonies, and any one of the Governments of these colonies, from entering into any kind of device to get behind the absolute equality of trade and commerce and production, which is the vital principle of this Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

This proposal has been objected to on various grounds, and by some honorable gentlemen who have preceded me it has been opposed on the ground that we should allow no assistance whatever to the producer, but that every one should stand on an equal footing. Although that objection has not been expressed by every speaker, I think it has been at the bottom of almost every one of the arguments which have been advanced against the proposal of my right honorable chief. I take it that he has been to some extent misunderstood. It has been supposed that he is desirous of the state having power to give bounties on every article of manufacture and production, and I think it has been in the minds of some honorable gentlemen who have spoken adversely to the proposal that he desires that the state shall have uncontrolled power in respect to these bounties. The clause provides that the Commonwealth Parliament shall have exclusive power in respect to bounties. Sir George Turner does not propose to amend the clause otherwise than to give the state concurrent power with the Federal

Mr. HENRY. -

You would have two powers dealing with the same thing.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is so, but it is also so with regard to numberless instances in this Bill. If the Federal Parliament, however, chooses to legislate on the subject, its mandate is paramount. We do not propose to alter that. We say that the industries which are the subject of the amendment proposed are matters not so much of intercolonial interest in their origin as matters pertaining to the development of particular states-matters of primary production. In that light it seems to me that the state should have power to stimulate production, subject to the paramount right of the Federal Parliament to over-ride its provisions in that respect, if it should come to the conclusion in its absolute discretion that the bounties granted by the state were contrary to inter-state or intercolonial policy.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

What are the industries?

Mr. ISAACS. -

They are agriculture, horticulture, viticulture, and dairying.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I would not confine the power at all.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think that if Sir George Turner has erred at all it is in limiting the scope of his amendment. I think we should leave the state free in regard to all matters of primary production, subject to review by the Federal Parliament. I should like to point out to those honorable members who have said-"Can you imagine a bounty on an industry that does not affect inter-state commerce?" that they have recognised the same principle by a provision inserted already in clause 52, namely, the power given to the Federal Parliament to grant bounties. Do they say that the Federal Parliament cannot grant bounties without interfering with inter-state commerce, and that after uniform customs and excise are established bounties necessarily interfere with interstate commerce? If they do say so, then they should strike out the provisions in clause 52. But I do not know any Constitution in the world in which exclusive power in respect to bounties is given to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN. -

But federal bounties will be applicable everywhere in the Commonwealth, and will leave the law of the survival of the fittest untouched.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They may; but the circumstances of our continent are so various, our climates are so different, and the qualities of our soil are of such diverse kinds, that it is very difficult to suppose-

Mr. FRASER. -

Circumstances are the same in respect to climate and soil in Canada.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Although in name you may make a bounty applicable all over the continent, it will in reality apply only to a particular part.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The same argument will apply in regard to protection.
I do not want to have the issue confounded at all, but I would point out that, by leaving the provision as it stands we shall be including this power for the first time in any Constitution. If we put in a power for the state to grant bounties subject to the rights of ultimate control by the Federal Parliament, we then enable the state, out of its own funds, to stimulate its own peculiar industries, not to the disadvantage of other colonies at all, but to the great advantage of the state concerned, whilst the Federal Parliament will have power to repeal or to over-ride the provision if it think fit. My honorable friend and colleague (Mr. Peacock) has just now placed in my hand a very instructive piece of evidence with regard to this matter. It is an article in The Speaker, of 9th October, 1897, headed "Sugar in the West Indies." The article is to be found on pages 394-5. It deals with the report of the Royal Commission on the West Indian Islands, and makes reference to the policy of the United States in regard to the production of sugar. The article Says-

The Sugar Trust induced the Senate to insert in the Wilson Bill a duty of 40 per cent. ad valorem on sugar. This led not merely to an increase in the production of cane sugar in the south, but to the introduction of the beet-sugar industry into some of the western states, where it has been further stimulated by state bounties.

So that we see perfectly well that this provision, which is so declaimed against as inimical to federal control, is actually in force in America, where they certainly have carried the principle of interference with state legislation, by means of decisions of the Supreme Court, very far, and are extending it to an increasing extent.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Does that mean "state" in the sense of the Federation, or the individual state?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I refer to the individual state. That is made clear by what I have read from the article.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

The article is in regard to the Royal Commission on the West Indian Islands, presided over by Sir Henry Norman.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The article goes on to say that-

Sir Henry Norman agrees with the planters who ask for countervailing duties. But Sir Edward Grey and Sir David Barbour have an overwhelming case in refusing to recommend a course which the last Conservative Government found to be impracticable. A countervailing duty would involve much greater interference with trade than most protective duties. It means an inquiry into the country of origin of every ton of sugar which enters at our ports, so as to levy the 1s. 3d. on German, the 4s. 6d. on French, and so on. In the case of America, we should even have to inquire whether the sugar came from a state which pays bounties.

So that it is perfectly clear that in America they value the principle which we are asking to have inserted here. It is not found to be inimical to the federal spirit, and there cannot be the least doubt that if we do go the very small way that we are seeking to go, we shall have gone a long way in disarming opposition to this Bill, and in influencing the state not to fear that the Federation will prevent it from legitimately developing its own resources. We are told that we should wait for the Federal Parliament. On the other hand, we are told that the Federal Parliament will be too busy to consider the repeal of a law which a state passes.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Even when large vested interests are concerned?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes. And yet we are told to wait until the Parliament can deal with the matter from the opposite standpoint. We have also to consider that when a proposal comes before the Federal Parliament for a bounty in respect to, say, some South Australian industry, or contemplated industry, opposition will be offered by other states, possibly on the ground that it will interfere with their trade. They will say-"Why should we spend federal money in developing South Australian industries?" and the proposal may fail for reasons of that kind. On the other hand, the Federal Parliament might say-
"If your state is willing to spend its own money in developing this industry, we have not the slightest objection." That is the position we want to take up. We desire, before it is too late, to have it established on the face of the Constitution that we may develop our natural industries to the fullest possible extent, not inconsistent with the higher duties of federal life, and we give for the protection of the federal life full power to the Federal Parliament to upset anything we may do that is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

The Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales attacked this proposal as if it were a distinct attempt to abrogate the provision in the Constitution for perfect freedom of intercourse. There are numbers of industries for the development of which particular parts of the continent are peculiarly suited, and in which they would be extremely profitable. Incidentally they might be advantageous to other parts of the continent, but not so advantageous to the whole Commonwealth as to induce the Federal Parliament to give bonuses for their encouragement. Clearly, no harm could be done to freedom of intercourse by saying in such a case that the state might spend its own money in developing such an industry. We have been talking for a long time about silk culture. We have not yet successfully established it, and it seems highly improbable that the Federal Parliament would undertake to give a bonus for that purpose. It is not at all improbable that a state might feel disposed to encourage silk culture within its own limits. It would not, however, have the power to do so if the clause were left as the Finance Committee submitted it to us. If the clause were amended as suggested by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, the state could use some of its own funds for the encouragement of that industry. If it were successfully developed, so far from being a cause of injury to any other part of the continent, it would be a distinct benefit, and it would not in any way restrict the freedom of trade and commerce. If the Federal Parliament had, as I think it ought to have, and will have if this amendment is carried, control over bonuses or bounties, that is all that is required to secure immunity from warring bounties. The honorable members representing Victoria are as much opposed to warring bounties, or to any conflict between the colonies, after federation has been achieved, as any persons can be, but it does appear to us that in framing this Constitution we should retain as far as possible the power of the states to do anything that can be done without injury to the federal principle. It is for that reason that we should put into this Constitution a provision empowering any state to spend money in the development of its own territory, so long as it does so in such a way as will not be prejudicial to any of the other states. When we were discussing the rivers question, Mr. Reid laid a great deal of stress upon the rights of New South Wales to so administer its rivers as to develop its agricultural industries, and I assume that he contemplated the expenditure of state money for the purpose of creating irrigation works. If a state may use state money in that way without prejudice to perfect freedom of trade, why should it not do so in others? There are a hundred and one ways in which a state can use state money for the development of domestic industry without injury to any other state, and without interference with freedom of trade. If that is so it is extremely desirable that the necessary power should be given. Sir George Turner's amendment gives perfect control to the Federal Parliament—perfect control, not necessarily administration, that is the difference. The Federal Parliament can control any movement on the part of any state to do anything unfriendly or unfederal to any other state, and if this amendment is carried it can permit a state to give encouragement to any industry that will not injure any other state. There are many industries that it would be worth the while of a state to develop, but that would be so insignificant or so isolated in their character that they would not appeal successfully to the Federal Parliament.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. -

What are they?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I have instanced one—silk culture. Wattle bark is grown in Victoria and New South Wales, and I think also in South Australia, and that is a very valuable article of commerce. It is, however, being destroyed very largely by reckless strippers. It might be advisable for a state to offer a bonus for the planting of wattle trees. I cannot conceive that such a bonus could in any way injure any other state. If it proved to be a success, the Federal Parliament might apply the principle to all parts of the Commonwealth; but at its inception it could do no injury, because it would not in any way restrict the freedom of trade, and would lead to the development of a source of national wealth. These are two instances. Others might be mentioned, but I would submit that, if no such instances did occur, the only result would be that there would be no state bonuses. The power under the Constitution to give bonuses would not necessarily lead to their being given, except inasmuch as they could be given with advantage to a particular state, and without injury to the Commonwealth.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. -

Then the Commonwealth could give the bounty.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I agree that the Commonwealth could give the bounty, but I am pointing out that there might easily occur instances where the development of an industry would only be applicable to a small portion of the continent for climatic or other reasons, and it might be inapplicable to any other part of the Commonwealth. In that case, it would be highly improbable that the Commonwealth Parliament would spend the money of the Commonwealth to develop only a small portion of the continent; but it is quite probable that the state in which that small portion was situate would be very pleased to spend its own money to develop the industry, and in such a way that it would not injure, but would probably benefit incidentally, the other states of the Commonwealth. I feel that there can be no possible danger in this proposal. It does not propose to give a state power to over-ride the Commonwealth, or power, without regard to other states, to do something in its own interests. It only says that the states may have power, while the Commonwealth Parliament has control, to give bonuses or bounties that are not objected to by the Commonwealth. Surely that can do no injury. I know that a great deal is thought of it in Victoria, rightly or wrongly, and it does not matter which for our argument. If there is a strong feeling that this power ought to remain within the state—if it is, so to speak, a state right which ought not to be taken away unless it can be shown that it is prejudicial to the well-being of the other states—it is an important question in connexion with carrying this measure in the various colonies.

Mr. DOBSON. -
   You are admitting too much.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
   I do not care. For the purposes of my argument I will admit everything I fairly can.

Mr. DOBSON. -
   If the thing is wrong, do not let us put it into the Constitution.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
   That is a different thing altogether. I did not urge that we should put it in rightly or wrongly. I urged that we should put it in if it could do no injury, and if there were a large number of people who are wrongly of opinion that it is important. I did not say that we should put it in if it is wrong. I do not hesitate to say that there are a very large number of people in this colony and South Australia, and possibly in other colonies, who think that there is a danger of giving up to the Commonwealth Parliament too many of the powers of the states. It is an opinion which I do not hold, but still it is strongly held that there is a danger in creating this new power which may be so far away from the people, and it is felt by many that the Parliament will be so far away that they will have little chance of influencing that body. Therefore, the people are jealous of handing over to it absolutely the power of controlling interests that they consider are very important. This power can be given in the way suggested, so that it may possibly do good to the states, and cannot possibly long continue to do harm to the Commonwealth. Whenever it is found that a state institutes a bounty or bonus prejudicial to the Commonwealth we know that the Commonwealth will at once legislate to restrain that state, and there will be an end to the evil. But if, as I believe will happen, bonuses may be given which will not have the slightest influence on the other states, then the Commonwealth will not interfere, and the state right will be preserved, so that the states themselves may develop their own industries with their own money, if it can be shown that it does no injury to the other states.

Sir EDWARD BRADDO (Tasmania). -
The honorable member (Mr. Deakin) argued at some length, and with great eloquence, to prove that these bonuses are, as a matter of fact, the most beneficent instruments of free-trade, and to establish the fact that concurrent legislation with regard to these bonuses, the states legislating on the one hand, and the Commonwealth Parliament legislating on the other, could go on satisfactorily.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Not on the same articles.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

No; but he wished to prove that concurrent legislation in this particular could exist without detriment to that freedom of trade which it is desired to protect. But I think that the honorable member, in the course of his arguments, provided an excellent answer. He pointed out how, if one of the states legislating for a bonus for its own particular state at its own expense, legislated so as to incur the objection of the Federal Government, that could be annulled by the action of the Federal Government, and annulled so as to involve no waste of time in the procedure. If that could be done, I would submit that if the states proposed to the Federal Government some system of bonus of which the Federal Government could approve, there would be no delay about its getting permission.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

There is the whole difference: The Federal Government will have to provide the bonus out of its own money, while in the other case the state will provide the money.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I do not want to charge the state with this, which is a matter of federal concern. There will be no such delay in that case as could imperil the prosperity of the colony: that desired the bonus.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is only a power; it is only an option; and it does not compel a state to give a bonus.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

No, but I want words put in which would prevent a state doing that which may be a danger to the whole system of Commonwealth Government. It has been said by the honorable member (Mr. Trenwith) that these bonuses might only be sought for by some particular portion of a particular state for an article which did not exist or need protection anywhere else.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

And which might not be possible of development elsewhere.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Mr. Deakin had instances in his mind's eye, but he did not produce them. Mr. Trenwith has produced some examples—for instance, sericulture. He says that is something which might exist in one colony alone, and that it would therefore need to be fed by a bounty only in that colony. All the conditions that lend themselves to the production of silk are to be found, I venture to say, in all the colonies of Australasia. I do not know whether any colony is to be excluded by reason of its inability to grow the mulberry, but in nearly every colony, and as far south as the southern extremity of Tasmania, the mulberry can be grown, and the eggs of the silkworm hatched and silk produced.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Suppose that Tasmania alone wished to develop sericulture, should she be prevented from giving a bonus because the other colonies did not care about giving bonuses?

Sir EDWARD BRADDOON. -
If Tasmania desired to establish sericulture she would establish it as she has established other industries, by the perseverance of her people, not by the giving of a bounty. In no instance in Tasmania has any industry been aided, fostered, or encouraged by bounties. Other encouragements have been given, but the bounty system has never been adopted.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
That is no reason why it should not be adopted next year.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOON. -
Well, if when the Commonwealth is established we have a good case for the granting of a bounty—and I should be sorry to advocate such a thing—we could ask the Federal Parliament for it. If we did not get it I should admit—and I dare say a good many others would agree with me—that we did not require it.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
The question is: Could there be any harm in Tasmania granting a bounty if the Federal Parliament refused to grant it?

Sir EDWARD BRADDOON. -
I do not think that any good would result. If a bounty is required there will be the necessary machinery for securing it. That is the whole case against those who advocate concurrent legislation in this matter. I think the argument has been used that as a matter of fact the granting of these bounties means the imposition of duties, and, inasmuch as we intrust the imposition of duties to the Federal Government alone, we should leave the granting of bounties to them.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I have a proposal which, I think, will practically meet the difficulties of both sides. It seems to me that a number of us are tilting at windmills. There is no wish on the part of any one to interfere with intercolonial free-trade, and the extremely vehement argument of the Premier of New South Wales was quite beside the point, having regard to the expressed intention of the Premier of Victoria. If there were any desire to interfere in the slightest degree with intercolonial free-trade, either directly or indirectly, I should not vote for this proposal; but, as I understand the idea of the Premier of Victoria, it is that if a bounty can be given by any state without interfering with intercolonial free-trade that state shall be allowed to give it. The form of the honorable member's amendment, however, has justly provoked criticism, and led to a lengthy debate. Of course it is of no use to lock the stable door after the steed is stolen, and when a bounty is granted by any state it will take a long time to move the machinery of the Commonwealth to stop it or to interfere with it. On the other hand, if you required the assent of the Federal Parliament to any proposal on the part of the states to give a bounty the process would be too cumbersome. The essence of modern commerce is promptitude. It may be desirable to seize an auspicious moment to get a product into vogue and into use, and while I should like to see all matters of this kind passed under the review of the Federal Parliament, I think a simpler course would be, seeing that we are creating an Inter-State Commission, which could act with promptitude, to provide that a state may, with the consent of the commission, grant what bounty it likes.

Mr. HENRY. -

The Federal Parliament would still have power to set aside the permission granted by the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes; and I am willing that the Federal Parliament should have that power. The point taken against the amendment of the Premier of Victoria was that a state might do a great deal of damage by giving a bonus before the Federal Parliament could interfere. I suggest that the states should be allowed to give bounties when they have the consent of the Inter-State Commission. There is already in the Constitution a provision allowing the states to give bounties for the discovery of metals, &c. That provision was introduced during the Adelaide session on my motion, and I think that there is no intention to strike it out. If an exception can be made with regard to one class of products, it is quite possible that there may be other products to which it will also be applicable. I would suggest that to the words-

This section shall not apply to bounties or aids to mining for gold, silver, or other metals,
  the following words be added:-
  or to bounties or aids to any industry, with the consent of the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Surely we are not going to make the members of the Inter-State Commission legislators.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If we in Victoria had had to wait for the consent of the Federal Parliament before we could try the experiment of butter bonuses we should never have had such bonuses. There are two classes of cases in which a bounty can be well applied without infringing the federal principle. To one class belong industries to which only one colony in Australia has a suitable climate or soil. The second class includes industries which might be developed in more than one state, but in regard to which only one state desires to experiment. I do not see why a state should not be allowed to experiment, provided that, so soon as any other state desired to develop the industry experimented upon, the question of bonuses should be remitted to the Federal Parliament. I was very much amused by the attitude taken up by the Premier of New South Wales in regard to this matter. I understood his great argument with regard to the rivers to be that the land policy belonged to the state, and that the conservation of water was part of the land policy-ergo, the whole question of rivers should belong to the state. I ask whether the development of particular industries on the land is not a part of the land policy? Why should not the state be allowed to dictate its own land policy throughout, provided always there is sufficient precaution taken to prevent the infringement of free-trade and commerce between the states? I would remind honorable members that clause 96 provides that-

The Parliament may make laws constituting an Inter-State Commission to execute and maintain upon railways within the Commonwealth, and upon rivers flowing through, in, or between two or more states, the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce.

Upon the same principle an Inter-State Commission could execute and maintain upon the lands the provisions of this Constitution as to trade and commerce. The Convention has heard about half-a-dozen Victorians speaking on this matter, and I can assure honorable members that those Victorian representatives speak with due regard to a very big vote. We have two classes in Victoria opposed to the federal scheme. The biggest will be with regard to the Constitution, but there is a very large class who will be opposed to federation on the ground that Victoria is a colony of special industries, a colony where there is a smaller area than in most of the other colonies, where there is a larger population per square mile than in any other colony, and where there is more scope for attempting to establish special industries. I have watched particularly the attitude of our Victorian farmers towards federation, and I have carefully considered the speech of Mr. McLean, one of the Victorian Ministers, and a gentleman who knows more about Victorian agriculture and the wishes of the Victorian farmers than any other man I know, and I feel that I should be grievously lacking in my duty if I did not, with such power as I have, try to re-assure the farmers of Victoria that their interests are being considered in this respect. I would not advocate this proposal if I felt that it would do any injury to the farmers in any other part of the Commonwealth. I can assure the Convention that the Victorian farmers are watching this matter very closely, and probably honorable members have received a circular from a league which has been established to protect their interests. It is true that we lawyers cannot do much in such a matter, except to ascertain and represent the views which the farmers hold. I think it was Sancho Panza who said:"A fool is wiser in his own house than a wise man out of it." No doubt honorable members may not expect a lawyer to give much information with regard to the agricultural industry and the wants of those who are engaged in it, but I have tried to study the requirements of our agriculturists, and to ascertain their wishes. And I feel that we can have this provision in the Constitution, giving a reasonable power to the states, with due safeguards, and that by means of it we will reassure a large body of the farmers.

Mr. HENRY. -

Show us how Victoria could grant a bonus on any agricultural product without injury to the agriculturists of the other colonies.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Well, assume that Victoria wished to try an experiment with scent plants, or oil plants, or even with sugar beet-root. Of course, a bounty on sugar beet-root in Victoria might interfere with the cane-sugar growers of other colonies, so I will put that away. But assuming that Victoria wants to try an experiment with scent plants or oil plants, and the other colonies say:"Oh, those are small industries; we do not want them: we have our bullocks and our wool;" well, seeing that no other colony was producing scent plants or oil plants, and Victoria was willing to go to the cost of making the experiments, what interest would the other colonies have in stopping that project? Of course, as soon as those industries were introduced into other colonies, I admit that Victoria should stop the grant of bounties to the people engaged in those industries within her own borders.
Mr. HENRY. -

Would it not be possible for Victoria to obtain the consent of the Federal Parliament?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think it would take too long a time to get the consent of the Federal Parliament. The alternative way in which I put it is this: I should prefer that any state should have power to grant a bounty with the consent of the Federal Parliament, rather than not at all; but, inasmuch as that is too cumbersome a process, I suggest, as an alternative, that the state should have power to grant bounties with the consent of the Inter-State Commission, which is supposed to see to the carrying out of the provisions of this Bill with regard to trade and commerce.

Mr. DOBSON. -

It is too large and too important a power to leave to the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Then it should be "with the consent of the Federal Parliament." But, with all respect to the honorable member, if the Inter-State Commission is to see that the provisions as to trade and commerce-establishing absolute free-trade and absolute free commercial intercourse between the different states-are carried out upon the railways and upon the rivers, I do not see why they should not be intrusted with this matter as to bounties for special agricultural and other products.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The one is a technical matter relating to rates and such things, and the other is a broad question of policy.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is not the question of railways and free-trade and commerce by means of railway rates a broad question of policy? I confess I cannot see the distinction which the honorable member seeks to draw. I think that if you trust the Inter-State Commission with those large things that are intrusted to them by clause 96, we should trust them in this matter, too; but rather than have no provision in the Bill for this purpose I should prefer to see it in, setting forth that "the state may, with the consent of the Federal Parliament," grant these bounties, only I feel that that is rather a cumbersome course of procedure. However, I make this suggestion to my right honorable friend for his consideration.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

We will assume, in this case, that the state Parliament has power to grant these bounties. In Victoria, whose representatives are going in for these bounties, there are some half-dozen bounties, not one only, already established. Now, if the state Parliament has the power to grant these bounties, and the Federal Parliament objects to such things, look what a state of affairs will be brought about when you have the Federal Parliament fighting in one direction, and the local Parliament fighting in another direction. What is the object of this proposal? Will not its adoption interfere with free-trade and commerce between the several states? The honorable member who has just spoken tries to apologize for the position he has taken up by saying-"Oh, if this power of granting bounties is given to the local Parliaments, I want to put some sort of restriction upon its exercise," and we are to get into all sorts of difficulties because some class or other wants to get a bounty on a particular product. We ought to leave this matter in the hands of the Federal Parliament. It is one of those things that ought, it appears to me, to be left in the hands of the Federal Parliament. Victoria, on account of its peculiar position in regard to certain industries which have been established by giving bounties in one direction and another, thinks that the Federal Parliament would not go in for granting bounties of so universal a character, but, of course, it would, if in the wisdom of the Federal Parliament it was deemed desirable to do so. Why not trust the Federal Parliament in this matter as in others? Why be suspicious of the Federal Parliament? One moment honorable members talk about nationality, and the next moment some of them say the state must have the power to give a bounty to a man who makes a pair of shoes, or something of that sort. What next will they want to do? These bounties may be of a trifling nature at first, and yet the whole of Australia may be overridden by a lot of bounties, without our knowing how this policy is going to affect our trade and commerce in the future. If the matter is left to the Federal Parliament, it will be argued out on broad lines of principle and policy. No doubt a particular industry may get advantage for a time from the grant of a bounty, but this is surely a matter which should be left in the hands of the Federal Parliament. The question was thrashed out in Sydney as well as in Adelaide, and it ought to have been considered as settled, but now it is brought up again, and the honorable member who has last spoken wants the Inter-State Commission to arrange these things. Why, sir, if we assent to such an arrangement, we shall be virtually revoking one of the main principles of this Bill. We must leave the matter as it is, and let the Federal Parliament deal with it. After all, everything must be referred to the Federal Parliament, and we cannot revoke the authority of that body. It would be highly inadvisable to insert in this Constitution a provision which would bring the state Parliaments and the Federal Parliament into conflict. The Federal Parliament must be the filial authority to settle a matter of this kind. The honorable member quoted from Don Quixote, who went tilting at windmills, but he is just trying to get us in the position of Don Quixote, as we shall be if we accede to his request that we should support this proposal, because it is a quixotic proposal altogether, and it is to be hoped that the Convention will not agree to it.

The amendment to omit the words-
"and to grant bounties upon the production or export of goods" was negatived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It is now proposed, by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, to add the following words to the paragraph:-

Provided that any state may grant bounties for the promotion of agricultural, horticultural, viticultural, or dairying industries, subject to the same being at any time annulled by the Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I understand that several honorable members think that my proposal is rather too wide. The proposal of my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) is rather more restricted, and he will move it as an amendment to the last paragraph. With the permission of the committee, I will withdraw my amendment.

The amendment of Sir George Turner was withdrawn.

Paragraph (1) was agreed to.

Paragraph (2). - But this exclusive power shall not come into force until uniform duties of customs have been imposed by the Parliament.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I wish the committee to omit this paragraph, as it is already provided for now by the words which have been inserted at the beginning of the clause.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

The South Australian Assembly suggests an amendment here.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It is only to insert "and excise."

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes, but it carries with it an important consideration, which I urged in Adelaide, and which I wish again to urge on the consideration of the Convention. Honorable members will recollect that by clause 55, subsection (3), we have distinguished between laws imposing duties of customs and laws imposing duties of excise, and I venture again to urge upon the Convention the wisdom, if not the necessity, of our linking together in one measure laws imposing duties of customs and laws imposing duties of excise. In connexion with many articles embraced, even in our local Tariff, and certain to be embraced in the Federal Tariff, such as spirits, a duty on the imported article has always been accompanied by a duty of excise on the article of local manufacture; that is necessary to preserve a proportion between these duties. Suppose a law imposing duties of customs to levy, as it invariably does, a heavy duty on spirits and wines, then every advocate of ultra-protection would have an additional argument for obstructing in every way, and if possible defeating, the measure for imposing duties of excise. But unless the duties of excise were passed the very heavy duties placed on spirits would operate as an enormous protective duty, far greater than any reasonable protection which ought to be extended to that industry. I take that as the most glaring instance, but other instances exist. There are other alcoholic liquors besides spirits. The duty on imported beer is always balanced by an excise duty on beer which is the produce of the colony. Under these circumstances, it appears to me highly desirable that the Federal Government should pursue the practice which has always been pursued in the colonies of placing the duties of excise and duties of customs in the same measure. It has been the uniform practice in Victoria.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We have passed that, you know.

Mr. BARTON. -
What I am pr

Mr. DEAKIN. -
As I have nearly finished what I had to say, let me add a sentence or two, in order to avoid repetition. While I have endeavoured to weigh in the interim the arguments of those who urged that duties of excise should be dealt with in a separate Bill, I have been unable to see any advantage in that plan. The one argument which appeared to have most force was that it enlarged the veto of the Senate, since if the duties of customs and the duties of excise were placed in separate measures, the Senate would have two vetos instead of one. But, inasmuch as the duties of excise on certain articles are inextricably intertwined with the duties of customs, it appears to me that this very small gain to the Senate carries with it a very much greater detriment to the public interests, and that in the interests of the whole Commonwealth it is highly desirable that whenever a duty of excise is to be imposed on any article which is the subject of a duty of customs they should both be dealt with in the same measure, so that the measure should be accepted or rejected as a whole.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I take it that when we give a power to the Parliament of the Commonwealth to make laws, we should generally trust them sufficiently to assume that they will exercise that power reasonably, and therefore we may perhaps assume that when they impose a customs duty on spirits, they will also impose an excise duty on spirits; but they should not be tied hand and foot by any provision such as is suggested.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I do not desire to make it an absolute requirement. I should be satisfied if it were put as an alternative. Give them power to deal with them, either in one Bill or in separate Bills.

Mr. BARTON. -

They have power in the Constitution to impose such duties of excise as they can get Parliament to assent to.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

But not in the same Bill as duties of customs.

Mr. BARTON. -

But they are not forced to propose them in the same Bill as duties of customs; they can do it in separate Bills. In the Money Bills clause we say-

Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of customs on imports or of excise, shall deal with one subject of taxation only; but laws imposing duties of customs shall deal with duties of customs only, and laws imposing duties of excise shall deal with duties of excise only.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That is absolute.

Mr. BARTON. -

While the Parliament has not the power to put customs duties and excise duties in the same Bill, what it has power to do is to pass Bills for these two purposes in the same session, and by way of consecutive Bills; so that, if it is part of the policy of the Government, and they have a majority, they can carry out that policy by passing two Bills instead of one Bill. What I had thought for a moment was suggested by my learned friend was something which has been suggested by a commission appointed by the Government of Victoria. Their suggestion was that the Federal Parliament should be practically forced to impose duties of customs at the same time as it imposed duties of excise, not necessarily in the same Bill, but at the same time. They suggested, as is suggested in South Australia, that the words "and excise" should be added wherever the power to impose duties of customs is given. I take it that this Convention would think twice before asserting to any such proposal, because we must leave the Federal Parliament a free hand to determine what shall be its duties, to determine whether it will impose duties of customs in the first instance, and, if so, what those duties shall be. But if we are to put into the Bill the words "and excise" wherever a reference is made to the imposition of uniform duties of customs, that is practically forcing the hands of the Federal Parliament, to deal with taxation in a particular way, and that I suggest to the committee is what we should never do.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I leave them quite free.

Mr. BARTON. -
I thought for a moment that the suggestion of my learned friend went to that length, but I see now that it does not.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I only want to give them the alternative.

Mr. BARTON. -
I think the time to adjourn has arrived. I will ask honorable members to vote for the excision of this paragraph, which is now no longer wanted, and we can deal with the other matter to-morrow.

The paragraph was struck out.

Progress was then reported. The Convention adjourned at five o'clock.
Tuesday, 15th February, 1898.

Evening Sittings - Leave of Absence to Mr. Brunker - Commonwealth of Australia Bill. - Bounties.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

EVENING SITTINGS.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I wish to point out to the leader of the Convention that it is probable that some honorable members will have to return to their homes very shortly. It is extremely important that we should have a full attendance at the final stage of this Convention, and I would ask our leader whether it would not be advisable to arrange for two late sittings this week?

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

My colleagues and myself feel as anxious as any one to get the business of the Convention completed, because we are getting into arrear with our own work. I am afraid, however, that if we sit at might, after having been sitting here for many hours during the day, we shall not facilitate business. I would make this suggestion, which I think would give us just as much extra time as we should get by night sittings, that instead of rising at five o'clock we should sit on till six o'clock, and also sit on Saturdays.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Put a time limit on speeches.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I should not object to that.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I desire to confirm what the Hon. Mr. Holder has said. Many of us are anxious to get away to our homes, and what I fear is that the Convention may be wound up with eight or ten members absent. I am sure that our leader is as anxious as anybody to yet on with the work. The Drafting Committee have had a great many hours of serious labours which most of us have not taken part in and know nothing about, but if our leader could see his way to commence night sittings almost at once, say to have one night sitting this week, if not two, and two next week, there would be a probability of members being present when the Convention reaches its final stage. No one can say what simple clause may detain-I will not say delay-us. No one can say how long the debate on the question of dead-locks may last, and when a decision is come to it may not be a final one. Some conservative or democratic member who does not like the clause may spring a new proposal upon us. I do not see any probability of the Convention concluding its business in less than three weeks without night sittings. The suggestion of Sir George Turner is worthy of consideration, but I think we ought to sit at night.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I desire to say a few words in urging on honorable members the necessity of bringing our labours to a speedy termination. If honorable members were to speak at less length, much more rapid progress would be made. We are not commencing our work. Nearly every question that comes before us has previously been thrashed out both in Adelaide and Sydney, and there is no necessity now for long laboured speeches. We want to hear what an honorable member has to say in as few words as possible, and not to listen for an hour to a repetition of arguments that have already been used and with which we are familiar. If honorable members will make up their minds to speak shortly, and to the point, we shall get on much more quickly. During the last few days very little progress has been made, and yesterday was one of the most tiresome days we have had. A number of long speeches were delivered, with really very little result, and this interminable talk must make everyone weary of the work we are engaged upon. I do hope that honorable members will assist in trying to have the Convention concluded with a full complement of members present. I will remain as long as I can. I am very anxious to be here throughout the whole of the sitting, but my presence is required in my own colony, and I do not think it will be possible for me to remain longer than the end of this month.

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -

I would urge on the leader of the Convention and on honorable members generally the desirability of having some night sittings. I felt from the commencement that we should endeavour to get on with our work with assiduity, but I did not think, although I spoke about it privately, that it would be right or proper to sit at night when the Finance Committee had such important work to do. All the committees have now concluded their labours, with the exception of the Drafting Committee, whose work goes on for ever. I think we may now appeal to them whether they cannot agree to our having one or two sittings at night each week. We have already been informed by the Hon. Mr. Barton that the Drafting Committee have got their work up to date, and, therefore, the strain which would have been placed on them, had we commenced with night sittings, no longer exists. Like my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) I do not make long speeches, and I think I have said all that is necessary from my point of view to urge on the Convention the desirability of bringing our labours to a speedy termination.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have the fullest sympathy with those honorable members who wish to see the labours of the Convention brought to a close as speedily as is reasonable. At the same time, I have a strong conviction that we may be doing a great deal of harm to the movement we are professing to support if we gave the slightest indication that we are completing our work with a rush. Every honorable member knows to what adverse comment the Adelaide session of the Convention was exposed, owing to the fact that the sittings of the Convention were hastened at the end. There had to be some haste, that is to say, we had to sit a good deal at night, in order that certain honorable members might be enabled to get away in time to attend the Jubilee celebrations in England. When arrangements were made for the present session of the Convention it was supposed that the time available would be ample, and there were a number of us who looked forward to the probability of the sittings lasting for two months. I did, myself, for one.

Mr. HOWE. -

The solution lies in shorter speeches.

Mr. BARTON. -

It may; but I am not sure that the popular favour with which the federation movement is regarded will be increased if you take the extreme step of imposing a time limit on speeches. That is a step that would be calculated to have the most harmful results.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The newspapers do not report the speeches.

Mr. BARTON. -

They do report them, and they would certainly take care to report the fact that there was a time limit. I am afraid that every evil that arises out of what is called rushing the sittings would arise out of a time limit on speeches. On the other hand, I do not wish to sit on Saturdays, because not only would the same impression be created, but the work would be absolutely too fatiguing. I am going to ask the Convention to allow me to absent myself during the greater part of this morning, because I am too fatigued for the work, which will be undertaken by one of my colleagues. The Hon. Mr. Dobson has anticipated what I intended to say. What we might reasonably do is this: We might hold a night sitting this week, and two night sittings next week. If the progress of matters is so slow as to indicate the necessity for three night sittings, I shall consent to it. Matters have improved considerably, and I think we shall make sufficient progress this week to remove the fear of more than two night sittings next week. Some members of the Convention are not as robust as others. I cannot say that of myself. I am as strong as most men, but there are some honorable members who would suffer considerably if they had to work for seven hours in the day and for three hours at night. I shall ask honorable members to adhere to the sitting from half-past ten to five o'clock. I think an hour's cessation before the evening's meal is little enough. Then I shall ask them to re-assemble at about half-past seven o'clock, and to sit for about three hours. If we are in the middle of anything important we may continue sitting for a little longer. By doing that I think we shall sufficiently expedite the work.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

On which nights will we sit?

Mr. BARTON. -

For this week I should say Thursday. I think that would be a convenient night. I would propose to sit next week only on Tuesday and Thursday nights, unless there was abundant evidence of the necessity of sitting also on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday nights.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Sir GEORGE TURNER moved -

That one week's leave of absence be granted to the Hon. Mr. Brunker, on account of illness.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on clause 84. Paragraph (3). - Upon the imposition of uniform duties of customs all laws of the several states imposing duties of customs or duties of excise, and all such laws offering bounties upon the production or export of goods, shall cease to have effect.

Amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of South Australia -

To insert after "customs" (line 2) the words "and excise."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have a new paragraph to propose, but I think it will come after paragraph (3). I wish to move the omission from this paragraph of the word "duties" before the words "of excise."

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I understood that the leader of the Convention was to consider, between the sitting last night and this morning, the question that was raised with reference to the exclusion, under clause 55, sub-section (3), of duties of excise from the same measure containing duties of customs. If the Convention, for some reason not apparent to me, desire to retain the distinction between Bills dealing with duties of customs and duties of excise, I would, at all events, suggest that articles which are subject to both duties of customs and duties of excise ought to be dealt with in a single measure. The whole policy of a Government with regard to those particular articles may turn on the combination in certain proportions of the duties of customs and the duties of excise.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Does the amendment make it necessary for them to be in one measure?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

A prior clause prevents them from being in one measure, and I intend to ask for the recommittal of that clause with a view to its amendment in the direction I desire. The amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia raises the question, and it seems to me that it might fittingly be dealt with at this stage. To my mind, articles that are to be subject both to duties of customs and duties of excise should be dealt with in one measure, which measure must either be accepted or rejected. It should not be possible to defeat the whole policy of a Government by agreeing to, say, its duties of customs, and rejecting its duties of excise. The fiscal policy of a Government is established by the difference, if any, between the duties of customs and the duties of excise on certain articles, and it appears to me, from every point of view, desirable that these duties should be capable of being dealt with in one measure.

&. - What does my honorable friend suggest?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The South Australian amendment appears to imply the capacity for dealing with both classes of duties in one measure.

Mr. BARTON. -

No; it would prevent the provisions of this paragraph from coming into force unless both customs and excise duties were introduced in one Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That may appear to some honorable members to be going too far, and I have indicated how much less might be accepted and would meet the difficulty.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

As things stand now, must both classes of duties be dealt with in one Bill?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No, they cannot be so dealt with under any circumstances. It is to that restriction that I object.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I think we have no right to dictate to Parliament in matters of policy in regard to which the future may bring about developments which we cannot foresee.

The CHAIRMAN. -

We cannot put in anything antagonistic to clause 55.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin) thinks that clause 55 should be amended, and I understand that if it is not amended he will probably favour the suggestion of the South Australian Assembly. The subsection with which we are dealing says that as soon as uniform duties of customs have been imposed all the state laws imposing duties of customs and excise and offering bounties shall cease. If the words "and excise" were added, as suggested by the Assembly of South Australia, none of the state laws of customs and excise or offering bounties could be put an end to until the Federal Parliament passed an Excise Bill as well as a Customs Bill. That is a limitation which

I do not suppose any honorable member wishes to impose upon the Federal Parliament. The difficulty arises under the provision in sub-section (3) of clause 55-

But laws imposing duties of customs shall deal with duties of customs only, and laws imposing duties of excise shall deal with duties of excise only.

This provision has been the subject of considerable discussion, and the opinion of the Convention upon every occasion has been that financial measures should be separated as far as possible, for the purpose of preventing dead-locks; that the more Governments are enabled to mix up matters of policy in a financial measure, the more they are likely to contribute to disagreements between the Houses of Legislature. I am inclined to think that the policy of the Convention is a sound one, and that there is no undue restriction. In ordinary cases it may be an excellent thing to allow the Commonwealth Government a free hand.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the honorable and learned member think that he is in order in discussing this matter now?

Mr. BARTON. -

I was simply answering the suggestion of my honorable friend. While it may be a fair thing to put as few restrictions as possible upon the policy of the Commonwealth Government, still there is a limit to the extent to which utilization of policy might provoke disagreements between the Houses, and it is that limit which the Convention has endeavoured to impose. I suggest that we should negative the amendment of South Australia, and leave the clause as it is. If, when the time for reconsideration comes, the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) wishes to have clause 55 reconsidered, I will assist him.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I would like to explain that the amendment suggested by South Australia was suggested at the instance of an honorable member who cited the report presented by Mr. Wollaston and four others to the Victorian Government, in which it was pointed out that the loss of sugar duties upon the establishment of a uniform Tariff would be £504,700, Victoria losing £266,000, New South Wales £145,000, Queensland £700, South Australia £45,000, Western Australia £10,000, and Tasmania £38,000. They realized that an all-round excise duty of £3 a ton should be imposed upon sugar. Otherwise, it was pointed out, the £45,000 lost by South Australia would go into the pockets of the producers of New South Wales and Queensland. But the net has been cast too wide, and the hand of the Federal Parliament is forced to impose excise duties upon many articles upon which excise duties should not be imposed. If the South Australian Parliament had considered the matter more fully, they would have seen the imprudence of this arrangement. I think it would be better to leave the whole matter to the Federal Parliament, and to negative the amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the word "duties" (line 2) be omitted; and that the word "or" be substituted for the words "and all such laws" (line 4).

The amendments were agreed to.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I understand that the leader of the Convention desires to insert certain words in paragraph (3), but I desire to obtain an expression of opinion with regard to the effect of the paragraph. It says that laws offering bounties upon the production or export of goods shall cease to have effect. These words seem to me very wide indeed. If a law under which a payment is made ceases, where will be the power in the state or in the Commonwealth to continue the payment of bounties already granted?

Mr. BARTON. -

The ceasing of the law will not affect any contract made under it.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I strongly support the suggestion of Sir George Turner. Before we deal with the sub-section now under consideration, I should like to point out the effect of the saving provision in the next sub-section. The sub-section with which we are now dealing provides that as soon as the uniform Customs Tariff is enacted all state laws of customs and excise, or offering bounties, shall cease to have effect. That is to say, no one will have the right to pay a shilling under those laws. Then follows the new sub-section suggested by the Finance Committee:—

But all grants of, and agreements for, any such bounty made by or under the authority of the Government of any state after the 30th day of June, 1898, shall be taken to have been of no effect.

The combined operation of the two sub-sections, it seems to me, will be this: That after the 30th of June, 1898, no grant or bounty will be valid.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

No grant can be made after that date.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, and any grant made before that will be valid only up to the time of the imposition of uniform customs duties by the Commonwealth. After that time any grant made by a state, at any time and under any circumstances, will fall to the ground. I think that that is too much.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That is not intended.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Well, that is the effect.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria—

Omit "and all such laws offering, bounties upon the production or export of goods."

The CHAIRMAN. -

In this case I will simply put to the committee the question of omitting the words "offering bounties upon the production or export of goods," because the words "and all such laws" have already been struck out.

The amendment was negatived.

The paragraph was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Before we come to the next paragraph I should like to insert the following words, which, it is suggested by the Finance Committee, should stand as a separate paragraph. I therefore beg to move that the following paragraph be inserted after paragraph 3:—

But all grants of, and agreements for, any such bounty made by or under the authority of the Government of any state after the 30th day of June, 1898, shall be taken to have been of no effect.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Will that provision render valid the bounties which have already been granted?

Mr. BARTON. -

It strengthens the implication that those which have been granted are valid. I understand the point of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs), but I think the law on the subject is this: While upon the imposition of uniform duties of customs any law of any state offering a bounty will cease to have effect, any contract made under that law will still remain alive.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What is the necessity for the next sub-section?

Mr. BARTON. -

The wish of the Finance Committee is to render void all grants or bounties and agreements for bounties made after a certain date, so that after the federation of the colonies becomes practically certain there may not be a policy carried into effect by any state which may conflict with the purpose of the union. We discussed this matter in Adelaide, and I think I remember quoting a passage from Maxwell on Statutes in regard to it to the effect that anything done under a statute up to the time of the repeal of that statute will last after that repeal, so long as it is by way of a contract conferring vested interests. I think most of my legal friends will agree with me that the law upon the subject is tolerably clear. The new paragraph would invalidate an agreement for the granting of a bounty made after the 30th June, 1898, but would strengthen the implication that those made prior to that date are valid and subsisting contracts.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What is the effect of the law between 30th June, 1898, and the date of the law imposing a uniform Customs Tariff?

Mr. BARTON. -

It is clear that if this is carried all agreements for the payment of bounties would cease if effected after that date.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Suppose that a bounty is given between 30th June, 1898, and the imposition of uniform customs duties, what effect would this have except to authorize payments of bounties?

Mr. BARTON. -

I take it that there will be no validity left in any case, except with respect to contracts made previously, and if they are freshly made after 30th June, 1898, they would have no effect.
Mr. ISAACS.-

I do not think I made myself clear to the honorable member. According to the new sub-section, all such customs and bounties laws are to be invalid, from 30th June, 1898, so far as they give power to make agreements for bounties. Under this sub-section it is clear that any agreement to pay bounties if made after the 30th June, 1898, will have no effect. Therefore, so far as the power to make grants and agreements are concerned, those laws cease to have any effect after 30th June, 1898.

Mr. BARTON.-

That seems to be intended.

Mr. ISAACS.-

Then some further effect is intended to be given under the preceding sub-section by the imposition of uniform customs duties. That further effect, it seems to me, must only be the power to make payments under them.

Mr. BARTON.-

I should say that it can be dealt with by the Drafting Committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales).-

I agree that what the honorable member has referred to is merely a matter of drafting. I think it is quite clear that the insertion of a few words would put that matter right; but there is a much greater objection to the paragraph than the honorable member has mentioned. The Premier of New South Wales said in a general strain that they made no limitation whatever to the contracts that might be made up to the 30th June, 1898. In other words, you might complete a policy in a certain direction, and that policy might be retained for twenty or thirty years. That is to say, you might give the option of renewal of a contract in a hundred and one ways, and you might fix that as the policy of the state for the future. There ought to be some qualification of that power. can see quite clearly that it is necessary, in order to do justice to certain colonies, that this clause in some shape should be introduced. But I think there ought to be a limitation in time, at the end of which the Federal Parliament would have the right to close all these contracts, even if it were done under a system of compensation. I look with alarm at this provision, in view of possible contingencies, which may not occur, and I have no doubt the Ministries in those colonies which deal with bonuses would not do anything unfair and unreasonable so as to handicap the Commonwealth; but, at the same time, I do think that there ought to be some limit imposed in this clause which would make an end to these contracts at some time or other. I do not know, of course, what the period is now for which certain contracts have been entered into, but it is possible that the Finance Ministers of the different states would be able to inform us. If the leader of the Convention agrees with me that there should be some definite limit to this power of contracting, so that the Federal Parliament could at last, within a reasonable period, come into its full rights with regard to them, I would ask him if there could not be some words inserted limiting, upon certain conditions, the contracts now in force? Probably Sir George Turner can tell us what would be a reasonable limit in view of existing contracts. I think this is a very important point, and it would be a blemish on the Bill if something of this kind were not inserted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I am afraid that if we attempt to insert a time limit in this clause we shall make it practically valueless. We must not forget that, so far, the Convention appears to be strongly against the proposal which I submitted by way of amendment yesterday, or any modification of it. I will give Mr. McMillan an instance of what might happen in Victoria during the next few months, and I will ask him how it would be possible to place a limit of this kind in the Bill, and yet carry out what is fair and legitimate work on the part of our Government. We are anxious to assist the wine industry, and one mode of assisting it is to form a company in order to establish a central cellar. That company can only be established on a sound basis by the Government being prepared to give some guarantee. We have been asked to guarantee that the company will be able to pay 4 per cent. annually on a certain portion of its capital which will be obtained in England, and the payment is to be guaranteed for twenty years. We believe that in giving that guarantee we are running no risk, because our information shows that the company will be able to pay more than the stipulated rate of interest. But if it is said that the Federal Parliament at the end of five years may cancel that bargain, is it to be thought for one moment that anybody will take up shares or advance money on the faith of our guarantee, knowing that that guarantee runs the risk of being superseded at any time within a limited number of years?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Even a term of twenty years would be better than nothing.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Is that a bounty within the meaning of this clause?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not know that it is. I am only showing what we are doing. I doubt very much whether it is a bounty.

Mr. DOBSON. -

It may never have to be paid.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That is quite true. Then we have agreed to encourage the sugar-beet industry by advancing a company £50,000 over a period of 30 or 35 years.
Mr. HENRY. -
That is by way of loan.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Yes. The word "bounty" is used because it has the widest possible meaning.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Would the honorable member be willing to limit anything to be done between now and the 30th June?
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I look upon this sub-section as a mere farce. If I had my way, I would provide that until the Federal Parliament comes into existence the state Parliaments should be allowed to go on granting bounties. Why should we put in a date which will be probably twelve months before the Act comes into operation? I felt that a large majority of the Finance Committee were against me, and I was compelled to give way, but I think they are wrong. I do not think it is any use providing for a period of four months. When you are negotiating about bounties, or giving assistance of that description, it is very hard to do anything effective within four months. I am afraid that this clause will kill all that we are anxious to do, and it puts another difficulty in the way of inducing our people to vote for the Federal Bill. As the majority is against me, I have to give way and do the best I can to get the Bill carried, but I hope no attempt will be made to put a time limit in the clause, because I see no necessity for it, and it may prejudicially affect any bargain which we propose to enter into.
Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I am glad Sir George Turner has put a concrete instance before us, because it enables us to deal with the difficulty. With regard to the case which the honorable member has put before us relating to the wine industry, it appears to me at first sight to be very doubtful whether that is a bounty at all. It only shows the variety of ways in which it may be possible to altogether avoid those rules with regard to bounties. I am not complaining of that, because if a state can assist its producers in any way without infringing upon this Constitution, there is no reason why it should not do so. But I will take the case put—that is, an agreement entered into to guarantee interest on a loan for twenty years. The passing of the Constitution Act cannot affect the validity of that agreement or destroy its effect during the term of twenty years. It will remain a contract binding on the Government.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Mr. McMillan desires to put a time limit in the clause, and I was replying to his proposal.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

My feeling is that we ought not to interfere with any vested interests or machinery. That is to say, when a contract is actually made, and is in existence, and persons are acting under it, I do not think it ought to be interfered with.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I do not propose to do that. I proposed that Sir George Turner should declare what was the longest limit which would be reasonable, and that we should fix that limit, so as to get at a time when the Federal Parliament would have full control.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The difficulty about that is that there are a variety of periods during which the contracts are running. I do not suppose that they are all for twenty years?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No; there are some for three and some for five years.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It seems to me that the true principle is this: Wherever rights have been acquired under a contract under one of these bounty laws those rights should be continued absolutely as they are. In my view the words spoken of by Mr. Isaacs will have the effect of still keeping alive any of these contracts. This contract for a guarantee of interest for twenty years is kept alive notwithstanding the passing of the Constitution Act, which will not alter the obligations of the Government of Victoria under that contract.

Mr. ISAACS. -

An Act of Parliament might alter it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

An Act of their own Parliament might alter it if passed in that express way. As the honorable member knows, one of the first principles in the construction of statutes is that you cannot by implication take away an existing right under a statute. Even if you repealed the statute under which the right is acquired, any rights that accrued before the repeal of the statute are preserved.

Mr. ISAACS. -

To clear away the doubt which I have, will the honorable member tell me what is the effect of the Act between 30th June, 1898, and the imposition of the uniform Tariff Act?
Mr. OCONNOR. -

I wish first to finish with the particular case I am dealing with. I say, with regard to the case put by Sir George Turner, that even if the Act under which the agreement was made were repealed, if the contract itself subsisted, then the contract would be binding upon the Government, and they would be obliged to appropriate money to meet the obligation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Without a saving clause in this Bill?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not think that is necessary.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We always do it in our Acts.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not think it is necessary, but there would be no objection to put such a clause in the Bill to make the matter perfectly clear. The honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) just now asked me a question with regard to what would be the state of matters between the 30th June, 1898, and the commencement of the uniform Tariff. I take it that the law will be this: That after the 30th June any contract which had been made before that date would still subsist up to the time of the passing of the uniform Tariff; or, if there was any contract which had been legally entered into before the 30th June, which had a currency even beyond the commencement of the uniform Tariff, I think that ought to be preserved also; and I believe it would be preserved under the words of this provision.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And what different position would that state law for bounties be in, after the imposition of the uniform Tariff, from what it was in six months before?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I did not quite catch the question.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What would be the difference in the effect of that state law six months before the imposition of the uniform Tariff and six months afterwards?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

There would be no difference at all.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then what is the meaning of the words stating that on the imposition of uniform customs duties these laws shall cease to have any effect?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I take it that some of these laws regarding bounties, which give the Government the right to enter into a contract subsisting for a certain number of years, will still exist, but there are other laws, I take it, which operate in this way—that they amount to an offer to give a certain amount of bounty for every article that is produced. That operates only from week to week, or from month to month, as the offer is accepted by the production of the article. I take it that this is intended to apply to matters of that kind—that after the imposition of uniform duties, any law which enables the Government to give a bounty on the production of an article ceases.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then, if an industry was started on the faith of an Act of Parliament providing for a grant, and that grant was made before the 30th June, it must stop on the imposition of the uniform Tariff?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Unless the Act has enabled the Government to enter into some binding obligation, and the Government has done so, before that period.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

How will the public understand this question at all if lawyers disagree on this important point?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is a very important question.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I think the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) will understand, from his experience of the law, that there are differences of opinion about these matters, and we only want to ascertain what the law really is. I have a very clear view about it myself, and I think the view I have is in accordance with what we will all admit to be the justice of the case. Further, if there was any doubt at all about the preservation of rights which have been acquired under any bounty laws made before the 30th June, 1898, I think that point should be made perfectly clear in the Constitution, so that those rights should be preserved. But after that date any statute which merely gives the right from day to day, as the offers under the statute are accepted, should, of course, cease on the imposition of uniform customs duties. I call the honorable member's (Mr. Isaacs') attention to a passage in Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, page 299, which states—

It is chiefly where the enactment would prejudicially affect vested rights, or the legal character of past transactions, or impair contracts, that the rule in question prevails. Every statute, it has been said, which takes away or impairs vested rights acquired under existing laws, or creates a new obligation, or imposes a new duty, or attaches a new disability in respect of transactions or considerations already past, must be presumed, out of respect to the Legislature, to be intended not to have a retrospective operation.

Then Maxwell gives a number of instances to illustrate this principle, which is very well known.

Mr. REID. -

Express words are required to make anything retrospective, to impair a contract.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is well known, and this provision, when it says the Act is to cease and have no effect, cannot possibly touch the validity of any contract which has been created while the Act was in full force and effect.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Should you not also provide for accruing rights?

Mr. BARTON. -

I will see that the clause is made quite clear with regard to all existing rights.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

There can be no doubt whatever that the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) is quite right that any actual agreements or contracts, made with specific persons or companies, would remain in force; but that is not the point raised by this amendment, and I do not think that is the point raised by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, in what he proposes to do for the development of the wine industry of Victoria. I do not take it that he means only to enter into certain contracts with companies or individuals, which would give them a monopoly if he was prevented from giving the same terms to others. What I believe the Government of Victoria would wish to do, in developing an industry of this character, would be to make a general agreement to give certain facilities, not to any one individual, which would be monstrous, but to anybody who chose to fulfil the conditions of the offer; but such general terms would not be held to be a specific contract under this clause. Of course there is no doubt that if the Government of Victoria enters into a contract with any individual or company, that would have to stand, and any law that abolished it would be monstrous; I do not care whether it was an Imperial Act or not.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

But what about entering into new contracts?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I take it that these are not contracts at all. These are grants or agreements for a bounty-the bounty not to be paid to any individual named, but to be paid to any individual or company that fulfils the conditions.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Take the case of a guarantee. Do you say that the state Government should be allowed to do that after the 30th June for other people?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Certainly; I take that to be the intention of this clause.

Mr. DOBSON. -
To enter into a guarantee with other people?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
There is no guarantee with any individual at all in this case. I have been watching this development in Victoria with some interest; but I do not take it that the Victorian Government intend to enter into any contract, only with an individual or a company. They wish to encourage the establishment of central depots for blending and maturing wine, receiving must, and so on; but they do not mean to enter into a contract only with some individual or company.

Mr. HENRY. -
Yes, that has been stated.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Of course I may be under a mistake, but I think the people would at once protest against any advantage being shown to any individual who happened to come in before the 30th June that could not be availed of by others who were willing to subscribe to the same conditions. The state should simply offer to give assistance to any of the general public or persons in the trade who desire to take advantage of the offer; otherwise the proposal would be a monstrous one.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
In the same way, you should have the right, in South Australia, to continue the bounties to others that you have given in the past, with regard to the wine industry.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Certainly; and if the colonies are to go ahead they must have that power. It must be done. You must not cripple a live colony, lest it should get ahead of those who travel at the rate of corpses. The honorable member (Mr. Solomon) must admit that it would be absolutely disastrous if we were to say that, in the future, no encouragement is to be given to any particular industry. The assistance will have to be given somehow, whatever this Constitution may say on the subject. The common sense of Australia will insist upon it, when some of the ideas of those who still maintain the laissez faire principle are exploded, as they will be shortly. The common sense of the Commonwealth, if we try to tie any ligaments round the proper development of industries, will insist on those restrictions being removed.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
That will be the whole Commonwealth.
Dr. COCKBURN. -
But the whole Commonwealth, as was well said yesterday, will never take the initiative in this respect.
Mr. SYMON. -
Why not?
Dr. COCKBURN. -
We know, from past experience, that large bodies of men do not take the initiative; that the initiative lies in the localities where the conditions are specially favorable, and where the industry first springs into birth.
Mr. SYMON. -
The interest of the Commonwealth would be to advance the prosperity of each state.
Dr. COCKBURN. -
When the industry becomes large enough to engage the attention of the Commonwealth, perhaps the Parliament may be moved in such a way as to give a bounty; but I do not think any bounty would ever be given out of the Commonwealth revenue, when an industry concerned only a particular locality, or a particular state. I do not think that is at all likely. It is a matter for the state to pay a bounty, not for the Commonwealth. It is not sufficiently a concern of the Commonwealth, but only a concern of one state, and, perhaps, only of a particular locality. We have got into our present difficulty through a clumsy attempt to do, by a side-wind, what ought to be done freely by the will of the Convention-to give any state the right to continue to afford assistance to the development of its industries; provided it does not conflict with the general principle of equality of trade. This clause, as far as it goes, is certainly most absurd in its operation. It is as much as to say to live states that are going ahead like Victoria and also, I may say, like South Australia-"You have four months to act in: Now make all the agreements that you possibly can, no matter what they are; formulate something to cover all the ground in this matter, in which you are vitally interested." The result is, that attempts will be made to cover all the ground, so that all sorts of arrangements may be made within this short time. Then see how absurdly the thing would work out. No matter how inimical these conditions might be to equality of trade, if they are made within this sacred interval of four months, they are to last for ever. Now, I ask is it not much wiser to say, that no matter when these agreements are made-past, present, or future-if they conflict with equality of trade, we should give some power to the Commonwealth to interdict them. I do not want to raise a discussion on the whole question of bounties, but I would like to say this: Suppose we, in South Australia, chose to give a bounty for the development of the ramee fibre, or for the production of india rubber, what harm should we be doing to any of the colonies of Australia?

Mr. SYMON. -

Why not ask the Federal Parliament to do it?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I know how difficult it is, even in a state Parliament, to get a body of men to take the initiative in any matter when first the necessity arises. It is very difficult indeed to get mother's milk for the infant industry just when it is required. It is no use saying-"In six month, if you live, you will get it."

Mr. SYMON. -

There should not be so much difficulty as that when there is such great dairy development at present.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Of course the opposition of the honorable member (Mr. Symon) is opposition on clearly defined ground. He does not believe in the state doing anything of this sort. He is one of the old school of laissez faire.

Mr. SYMON. -

One of the modern school.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

A number of honorable members who are opposing this are not opposing it because they fear that this power to give bounties, which obtains in the United States, would be in any way an interference with the equality of trade between the colonies, but simply because they do not believe in the state giving any assistance to any industry at all. If a division is taken on this matter, as I hope will be the case, we shall see that that division practically is between those who are in favour of the state stepping in and encouraging production, and those who are opposed to the state doing anything of the sort.

Mr. HOWE. -

That is a shameful remark to make.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It may be shameful in so far that it is not always well to speak the naked truth in the eyes of the honorable member, but I do not see any harm in making a remark which I defy any one to contradict.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Is that argument—the mere expression of opinion that people belong to the old school?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Well, the development of Australia is not going to take place by a continuation of the policy of the old school. This is a new country, and its resources could never be developed by carrying out the traditional policy of an old country. However, if I am involved in any such statement as the honorable member has attributed to me, I am not unwilling to express my approval of the action of the honorable member in calling my attention to the fact.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The strongest free traders have never been against bounties.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
My experience of free-traders has been that, when it was a question of passing protectionist duties, they have said—"Oh, give us bounties instead," as a means of defeating the protectionist duties proposed, but when taken at their word, and bounties were substituted, their opposition was equally pronounced.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Have we not discussed all these questions before?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
We have.

Mr. HOWE. -
This is provincialism nothing else.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
I do not want to get into a contention with the honorable member, and I do not wish him to get into a contention with me.

Mr. HOWE. -
I will not get into a contention with you, if you do not impute motives to those who hold views against yours on this question.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Well, probably the best way in which the honorable member can object to anything I have said is to show the absurdity of my statement, and not to assert that I have imputed motives. Let him give a proper answer to my arguments on this question, which is a question of principle, and a question of vital interest. This provision is simply a clumsy attempt to do a right thing in a wrong way. It is absurd from every point of view. It will not meet the requirements of the case. It is a sort of sop to provincialism. It is ridiculous to say that any state shall be able to do whatever it likes for the next four months, no matter how inimical its action may be to the development of trade and commerce between the colonies perhaps for all time.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

As a rule, I am sure honorable members of the Convention will give me credit, like the majority of other honorable members, for listening quietly to the arguments urged for or against the provisions of this Bill, and making very few interjections. I would not have interjected now but for the last speaker imputing motives to those who were going to vote on the contrary side to himself. I believe that I am imbued with genuine federal ideas. I have voted for every bonus proposed by any Government in the Parliament of South Australia since I became a member of that Legislature; but we are not assembled here to consider provincialism as against federation, and while I have always endeavoured by every vote I have given in the provincial Parliament to protect colonial or provincial industries, yet I think those who sent me here, and they were chiefly the producers of South Australia—if it had not been for the great producing vote of South Australia, I would not have been a member of this Convention-sent me here to help to frame a Federal Constitution on the basis of inter-colonial free-trade. Consequently, when the honorable member imputed motives to men like myself, who have always been true, provincially, to the cause of the producers, I naturally felt a little bit hurt at those remarks. Because, on every platform from which I have addressed gatherings of the people of South Australia, when seeking their suffrages to represent them at this Convention, I found that there was a consensus of opinion in favour of intercolonial free-trade, pure and simple, being made one of the chief factors of the Federation. Any obstacle that is sought to be placed in the path of the free interchange of commodities between these colonies, it is my duty, I reckon, to oppose. I have no fear that the great and vigorous producing interests will be imperilled at all by being placed in the hands of the Federal Parliament, because the Federal Parliament will be thoroughly representative of the people, which is more than we can now say of all the provincial Parliaments. The provincial producers are more likely to receive fair play at the hands of the Federal Parliament than at the hands of many of the provincial Parliaments at the present time, because, as I have said, the whole of the people will be represented in the Federal Parliament. Now, as to the matter of bounties, it seems to me that if we allow each state to grant bounties on the products of that state, this will become a matter of very serious contention between the various states. Those who advocate this policy say they are quite willing that its operation shall be regulated by an Inter-State Commission, or some other tribunal created to deal with this matter, but the very fact of their making such a suggestion shows that they believe, in their own minds, there is a tendency to evil in the proposed policy—a danger that its operation will impede the free intercourse of commerce—or they would not recommend that a tribunal should be appointed to determine whether this policy is going to be injurious to the free exchange of commodities between the various states. For that reason, when the division takes place, I shall be found voting in the interests of federation, and in the interests of the producers of the whole of Australia—I shall be found recording my vote as against that of the Hon. Dr. Cockburn.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It is not the first time you have done it.

Mr. HOWE. -

No; and I should like to do it again.

Mr. GLYNN. -

It is not the only time you have differed.

Mr. HOWE. -

No; but, at all events, I have always advocated that which I believe from my heart to be the best and soundest policy. There is no half measure about my position. I have never stood on a platform and endeavoured, by the use of oratorical language—nor would I ever do so, if I were possessed of the gift of oratory—to throw dust in the eyes of the listeners; but I have always had the good of the producers at heart, and their confidence in me—in my own colony, at all events—has always stood me in good stead. I do not like any honorable member to assume here an important position that he does not really occupy in his own province, and tell those who differ from him in opinion on the subject under discussion that they are not true to the responsibilities which the electors have intrusted to their care. When the division takes place I shall certainly, in the interests of federation and of unrestricted commerce, be found voting against Dr. Cockburn.

Mr. PEACOCK (Victoria). -

Our two friends from South Australia having settled their differences, we will possibly now be able to proceed to the consideration of the question raised by my right honorable friend the Premier of Victoria. I was guilty of making an interjection to one of the members of the Drafting Committee (Mr. O'Connor) while he was addressing the Convention, but I desire to assure him that I did not mean it in any insulting way. What I was particularly anxious about—and that is why I supported Sir George Turner's proposal by my interjection—was that the terms of this Constitution may be made so perfectly clear on this point that when the Bill is sent to the electors they will be able to understand its purport, and record their votes accordingly. It is all very well for us sitting here to say that we understand how this particular part of the Constitution is going to affect the various colonies, but the people will naturally consider how it is going to affect them individually, and they will record their votes for or against the Bill, according as it is put before them by those who support or by those who oppose federation.

Mr. HIGGINS. - That is Mr. O'Connor's object--to make the clause clear.

Mr. PEACOCK. - The Drafting Committee have promised to make it perfectly clear, and, therefore, I will say no more about the matter. With regard to the discussion on the question of state bounties raised yesterday, and revived this morning, it seems to me, after listening to the speeches of honorable members, that the difficulty we are placed in in connexion with this and many other questions is that we cannot shake off, for the time being, our own character as representatives of our respective colonies. Now, in passing, I may be allowed to say that I was glad to hear Mr. Howe state that he was not a provincialist. I really thought that he was the other day when we were discussing the river question.

Mr. HOWE. - I never spoke on the rivers question.

Mr. PEACOCK. - But you voted on the question. Well, that is our position; we cannot for a time disassociate ourselves from our characters as representatives of the different colonies, remembering that we are framing a Constitution under which the same people who sent us here will be able to exercise, through the ballot-box, their power in the Federal Parliament But I want to put the matter from another point of view, as it strikes me. It seems to me that some members of the delegation have urged that Victorian representatives have advocated Sir George Turner's proposal from a purely Victorian point of view. Representatives of other colonies, particularly free-traders, are assuming that, by some side-wind, the Victorian representatives and some members of the South Australian delegation are anxious to try to defeat the main principles on which the Constitution must rest, namely, pure intercolonial free-trade. Now, I do not hesitate to say that there is an impression gaining ground in Victoria--and I believe that from the discussion yesterday and this morning that impression, so far as our colony is concerned, will be deepened that we are giving too much attention to the interests of the mercantile community, in our deliberations, and too little consideration to the great producing interests throughout the proposed Commonwealth. Of course, in saying this, I am speaking for my own colony, but I am satisfied that the discussion which took place yesterday will do a large amount of harm. Now, as a matter of fact, not one of the Victorian or South Australian representatives who spoke yesterday want to see anything in this Constitution which will interfere with the principles of intercolonial free-trade. We know that intercolonial free-trade is absolutely essential, and that it is the main reason why we have been brought together in this Convention by our respective peoples. But why should we, in this Constitution, forbid the states to make any experiments such as have been made in South Australia and Victoria if they desire to make those experiments, and if they do not interfere with that principle of intercolonial free-trade? The Premier of New South Wales, who is one of the cleverest men in this Convention, it seemed to me, yesterday, drew a herring across the trail, when he wanted to make out that those who supported Sir George Turner's proposal were trying to interfere with this principle of intercolonial free-trade, and when he said that bounties would be given in one colony in order to interfere with the trade of another colony having the same industries and interests. Now, we do not desire to do anything of the kind.

Mr. SYMON. -

But you want to have the power to do it.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

No; we want to have a certain power left in the state Parliament. We desire that the state Parliament shall have the right to give bounties to help on any particular interest, if it so desires to make the experiment, although the Federal Parliament may not desire to try the experiment itself, as long as in doing that the state does not interfere with the principles of intercolonial free-trade. Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that this Constitution was in operation, and that we had the Federal Parliament in existence before the Victorian bonuses in connexion with the dairying industry were given, and that the people of Victoria desired that their local Parliament should give bonuses in connexion with the dairying industry. There is not a man here but will admit that in our own colony and in South Australia, which has copied our example, as well as in Queensland, the dairying industry has been the means of saving one of our great producing interests during the past few years; but if this Constitution had been adopted, without such an amendment as Sir George Turner has proposed, the Parliament of Victoria would not have been able to do anything in that particular direction, with the result that we should not have established the dairying industry and the exportation of butter on it present large basis. Would not that have been a loss to the whole Commonwealth, as well as to the particular colonies immediately concerned, and will any one say that the giving of those bonuses in connexion with the dairying industry of Victoria and other colonies has interfered with the principles of intercolonial free-trade? Now, it seems to me, judging from the discussion yesterday, that there is a tendency on the part of the Convention not to assist those who desire to leave some power of this kind in the state Parliaments. I would urge my honorable friends in the Convention (and I am quite as sincere in regard to the principles of intercolonial free-trade as they are) to give some consideration to the great producing interests; so that if any state Parliament desires to grant a bounty, so long as it does not abrogate the principle of inter-colonial free-trade, it may be within its power to do so. The large producing interests which are supporting this scheme make it desirable that consideration should be given to their request in connexion with this question. The Convention can put in any proviso they think necessary to protect the principle of equality of trade, vesting the power in that respect in the Inter-State Commission, the Federal Executive, or the Federal Parliament. I should have preferred Sir George Turner's amendment to be carried yesterday; but, although that was not done, I urge the Convention not to overlook the point, and to pay heed to the fear - which is justified to a large extent by statements made here yesterday - that the greatest consideration is being given to the mercantile community, but not sufficient to the requirements of the producing interests. We all know that whatever the views of the merchants are with reference to protection, they are enthusiastic supporters of this Bill, and will go for it under any circumstances. But we should not at the same time drive away the great producing interests, but should leave it within the power of the state Executive to give some help to them. As Dr. Cockburn said just now - he may have been rather blunt in his way of saying it - there is the fear I have mentioned with regard to our producing interests; and I do not desire to have anything inserted in this Constitution which will lead those who are engaged in them to see that there is no power given to the local Parliaments to help them. Probably numbers of people will be under the impression that it will be too difficult, with our scattered populations, to bring any pressure whatever of a successful character to bear on the Federal Parliament to induce them to grant bounties. I fully agree that the principles of intercolonial free-trade should be amply protected, but I am satisfied that that can be done whilst the Commonwealth at the same time gives the state Parliaments power to grant some assistance to the producing interests so far as the export trade is concerned. I desire the Convention not to overlook this request. If they do they will not only be doing an injury to the cause in those colonies which have export trades to maintain, but also in others which will try the experiment of encouraging trade by means of bounties, whether we federate or not.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I should like to point out to my honorable friend who has just resumed his seat, that those who are opposing this amendment are not opposing the producers of Australia. It is simply a question whether there should be two tribunals dealing with the same thing.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

It is so with regard to all concurrent legislation.

Mr. REID. -

My honorable friend must recollect that there is a vital difference between this proposition and the matters dealt with in clause 52. Up to this point the Convention has been pretty well agreed that, in matters affecting trade and the conditions of production in any part of Australia, no trader or producer should be put in a position of advantage as compared with the producers or traders of other colonies. If you fix a bonus for the encouragement of exports, it will be admitted at once that it will create a strong feeling on the part of those producers in the Commonwealth who do not share the benefits of the bonus. Suppose that the butter bonus were revived in Victoria. The effect of giving a bonus for the export of butter from a colony is to increase the price of the article in the colony. The shipping of quantities of butter would have a tendency to increase the price of the article in this colony, whilst the producers of butter in other colonies would not have the same advantage or be in the same position, and would have to send their butter down to Melbourne in order to sell it at the same price which the local producer obtained.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If our butter were sent away yours would be sent here to take its place, and would sell at a higher rate.

Mr. REID. -

That depends on a number of considerations. My honorable friend overlooks the effect of the formation of rings. For instance, it is notorious that when the butter bonus was given in Victoria the effect was that the money so given was almost entirely pocketed by middlemen in Melbourne, and the farmer and producer got very little of it at all. But the only thing I wish to impress upon the Convention is that it does not at all follow that the Commonwealth Parliament will not do its duty to the producers. The great objection urged to this proposal is that while all the other producers, those who do not believe in bounties at all, are putting themselves at the mercy of the Commonwealth entirely, taking the risk of having to live under a fiscal system of which they do not approve, our friends in Victoria are not prepared to take the same risk. They want, as far as they possibly can, to reserve the power of maintaining their own fiscal policy if the policy adopted by the Commonwealth should be out of harmony with their ideas. Let us suppose that the Commonwealth, as the result of this Constitution, does not believe in the bonus system. Does not this amendment really spring to some extent from the fear that that may be the case? But it is the position which all other members of the Commonwealth are bound by. So that, just as we in New South Wales are prepared to be absolutely bound by a protective system of duties, should it turn out that a majority of the Commonwealth are in favour of such duties, Victorians also should be prepared to take the same risk in regard to the fiscal policy of the Federal Parliament. We take the risk of having to live under a policy which opens up the possibility of having a system of protective duties, and that, to an enormous number of people in New South Wales, is one of the most deterrent agencies operating against the cause of federation there. I repeat that the risk that the Federal Parliament will inaugurate a fiscal policy which is abhorrent to a number of people in New South Wales has a strong deterrent effect, notwithstanding the realization of the good that would be accomplished by means of federation. But if these people, notwithstanding their feelings, are prepared to come into the Commonwealth and take the risk-if they are prepared to come in with the possibility of having to pay their share of bounties and duties which they detest-surely those who seem numerically in a much stronger position should be prepared to take a similar risk. As for the exercise of power for granting bounties, if the Commonwealth saw fit to adopt that system-and undoubtedly a great number of people would be in favour of bounties who would not be in favour of protective duties; there is a mark of distinction between the two things, as is obvious to any one who thinks about the matter-the bounties would be granted to all alike; and if it should be seen that the grant of a bounty would have an advantageous national effect, we may rely upon it that just as the people of New South Wales would be treated fairly if they asked for a bounty, say in the case of iron, so the producers of other colonies would be treated fairly if they desired a bounty for some other article of production. We are prepared to take our risk, being satisfied that if the Federal Parliament should adopt the bounty system, it will be administered in a fair way, and that the Commonwealth will pay attention to the circumstances of all the colonies. But my feeling is that, if this amendment be carried, there will be a strong feeling throughout Australia that the old system is to go on after the Commonwealth is established, and that the local Parliaments will have power to practically annul the provisions with regard to intercolonial free-trade. That will give rise to all sorts of complications, because, even though we decide that the Federal Parliament will have power to annul particular bounties, we may be sure that there will be a strong temptation to indulge in all sorts of manoeuvres to secure local bounties from annulment by federal legislation. It is a subject upon which there will be a great deal of distrust and bitterness of feeling if things are not made equal all round. It is a system that will be equal all round which we are prepared to enter into. We are prepared to take the risk of living under a system of protection, which we abhor. And if we are prepared to take risks our friends should do the same. If their belief that the Commonwealth will be governed by a full protective majority is to be realized, the interests of the people of Australia, if those interests are helped by bounties at all, will be well looked after, because the prevailing policy will be a policy of bounties. If the Victorians are satisfied that their policy will be the policy of the Commonwealth, they should leave their interests to be dealt with by the Commonwealth with even more security than we do ourselves, who believe that the protective policy is inimical to the genuine interests of the country. I regret, therefore, that I cannot comply with the appeal of my honorable friend (Mr. Peacock). I look upon this as a vital matter. We, in New South Wales, are prepared to give up all chance of living under the fiscal policy which we prefer, in the interests of federation. We ask our friends to give way on the same point. If we take the risk, other colonies must be prepared to take the risk in the same way.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

But you take power to give bounties on your iron industry, because the clause says that the provision with regard to bounties is not to apply "to bounties or aids to mining for gold, silver, or other metals."

Mr. REID. -

Well, I am astonished to find that that is so. I never thought of that point when the clause was being prepared. Of course I see now at once that it would apply as Sir George Turner says, but I was so blind with regard to the subject which the right honorable gentleman refers to that I never thought of it. Is the right honorable gentleman, however, certain that it would apply?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Yes, it would.

Mr. REID. -

Well, if it be so, honorable members will see the advantage of leaving it absolutely open to all the colonies to benefit from bounties in the same way, because all the colonies will be absolutely equal so far as the provision quoted by Sir George Turner is concerned. But if power is given to allow bounties to be granted by the local Parliaments, the provision suggested by my right honorable friend may raise up all sorts of sore points in the Commonwealth on this matter, upon which people are really very keen. The keen point, as my right honorable friend will admit, of federalists throughout all Australia is absolutely this—the rising of the Commonwealth is to be the death of these local struggles to get an advantage for one colony over the others, or for one colony to place its producers in a position of advantage over the producers of other parts of Australia; and it is because we look upon that as a vital point that I cannot, unfortunately, yield to the suggestion of my honorable friend (Mr. Peacock).

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We do not want an advantage over the other colonies. I never suggested it.

Mr. REID. -

But the right honorable gentleman will see that his proposal will conduce to giving an advantage to some producers over others. We, in giving up our freedom to carry out our industrial destinies in our own way, ask my right honorable friend to do the same on behalf of Victoria—to absolutely give up the freedom of his colony to carry out its industrial destinies according to its own policy, in order to submit to the broad federal policy. We may do this, feeling satisfied that the affairs of the Commonwealth will be administered in a fair and national manner, that everything affecting the colonies will be treated equitably, and that justice will be done to every member of the group. That is what we all aim at, I think, in this matter—that we should arrive at a state of things in which the Commonwealth Government will, if bounties be given, treat the producers of the nation on equal level terms. In carrying that out it may well be that incidentally a certain enterprise in a particular colony would be singled out, because perhaps that colony would have facilities for that industry which no other colony would have. Incidentally, therefore, it might be a local advantage, but just as in one respect one colony would have a local advantage, so in another respect the National Government would give the local advantage to another colony where some other industry perhaps possessed conditions which would not exist in the rest of the colonies. I quite see the reasons behind my honorable friends' appeal to the Convention. I quite appreciate them. I believe they are dictated by an honest desire to make this Bill more acceptable to the people of Victoria, and, therefore, I have the utmost respect for the position of my honorable friends as a truly federal one from their point of view. But, on the other hand, I have to safeguard the interests of people who have different opinions, and who are prepared absolutely to surrender their views to the discretion of the Commonwealth majority.

Mr. LEWIS (Tasmania). -

This discussion began in a very interesting and very important drafting suggestion made by the Attorney-General of Victoria, and has now developed into a general debate on the broad question of the giving of bounties by states or by the Commonwealth. With regard to the Drafting Committee, I concur in the opinion expressed by the honorable member (Mr. Peacock) that this should be made absolutely clear. I do not think that the clause as it comes from the Finance Committee is clear. It provides practically that grants of and agreements for bounties made before a certain date shall be binding, but it also states that laws offering bounties, for which possibly money has been expended and will be expended, but for which the contract is not absolutely complete, cease and have no effect on the imposition of uniform duties of customs. Now, that was not the intention of this commission, and it is a question which I hope will be taken into the serious consideration of the Drafting Committee, so that we shall know that laws that offer bounties and that are in force at a certain date - I do not mind what the date is - shall be binding and in force at all times, and will be available to anybody to take advantage of when he complies with the terms and conditions of the laws under which they are granted. We have heard many suggestions for dealing with this question, and they all acknowledge the absolute right of the Federal Parliament to a complete supervision over bounties, in order to maintain the great principle of absolute equality of trade and commerce in the Commonwealth. But the amendments all show the difficulties that surround it. While the Premier of Victoria, in his amendment, acknowledges that the bounties must be under the supervision of the Federal Parliament, he agrees that state bounties may be anulled by the Federal Parliament after practically the mischief has been done. I can imagine nothing which will more conduce to the unpopularity of the Federal Parliament than that it should be called upon to annul a bounty offered by a state out of its own funds, and, possibly, after a large amount of capital has been expended, and a large amount of trouble undertaken, in order to secure the advantage of the bounties. And nothing is more likely to lead to the embarrassment of the Federal Parliament. I can quite conceive cases in which they would prefer to allow a slight interference with absolute equality of trade and commerce rather than be a party to forcing a state to be guilty of what would morally be a breach of contract. Then, again, the proposal of Sir George Turner would defeat its own object. There would be an entire absence of security. No one would embark his capital, no one would enter into any engagement, no one would undertake any business to secure this bounty if he had overhanging him the fear that the Federal Parliament could at any time repeal that bounty. There would be an entire absence of security, which would defeat the very object which the representatives of Victoria have in view.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I am going to put it in a more acceptable form presently, when I am in order.

Mr. LEWIS. -
The proposal to refer it to an Inter-State Commission does not commend itself to my mind. The Inter-State Commission will probably be composed of gentlemen well versed in railway rates; they will be, in fact, railway experts, and not the proper persons to deal with the distribution of bounties. Now, the grant of a bounty is a question for a Parliament to decide, and not for an Inter-State Commission. It is a question of policy rather than a question of rates, or anything that is likely to come under the ken of an Inter-State Commission.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
To expedite the matter, would you leave it to the Federal Government instead of to the Federal Parliament?

Mr. LEWIS. -
I have a compromise to propose which I hope will meet with the approval of the right honorable member, and that is that the state should be allowed to offer bounties from its own funds, first having obtained the approval of the Federal Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That will take years to get.

Mr. LEWIS. -
The right honorable member's own proposal acknowledges that the Federal Parliament should have some supervision over the distribution of bounties by the states. I think that the sanction should be got before the bounties are given rather than that the Parliament should have the power after they are given, and after contracts are entered into and engagements made, to sweep away the bounties. If we acknowledge, and I think we all do acknowledge, that the Parliament should have the control sooner or later, let them exercise that control at first rather than at last. It was urged yesterday by, I think, the learned members (Mr. Higgins and Mr. Deakin) that an appeal to Parliament at the outset would be a cumbersome method. I do not agree in that contention. There will be representatives, and a large number of them, from each state, and if a state is ready to give its money in fostering a certain industry, and if its representatives are united in urging the Federal Parliament to sanction that expenditure, surely they will find a means and an opportunity to obtain the sanction of Parliament at the earliest moment.

Mr. HOWE. -

But suppose the Parliament refuses to give its sanction?

Mr. LEWIS. -

Of course the Parliament is the guardian of the freedom and equality of trade and commerce, and we must trust them to approve of no grant of a bounty by any state which will interfere with the equality of trade and commerce. We have trusted them in many points, we must trust them also in this point, and however cumbersome this system may be-I do not admit that it is cumbersome-it will be far outweighed by the greater security which will be given by the sanction of the Federal Parliament to the granting of this bounty, and so inducing capitalists to put in their money to develop a particular industry rather than that the state should offer the bounty subject to be annulled at any time by the Federal Parliament. I throw that out as a compromise, and I hope it will be accepted, and will solve the difficulties that are felt by various honorable members who have spoken-those who wish the state Parliament to have an absolute right of granting bounties, subject to being annulled by Parliament, and those who would not like the state Parliament to have any power to give bounties.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I should not have spoken again on this question, as I am anxious to save time but the more the discussion has gone on the more improperly, it seems to me, this clause is drafted at the present time. Now, if I understood aright, what was the mind of the Convention previously? It was not that we should make any clause to allow a bounty system to go on ad infinitum, but that we should preserve all contracts that might be made of a specific character.

Mr. REID. -

Existing contracts.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

All contracts of a specific character. It is not a contract, from my way of looking at it, if a Government introduces a measure giving a bounty on certain products. For instance, take a bounty on butter. It does not necessarily bind itself to give the bounty for a period any more than a Government that puts on a certain import duty binds itself that it will not take that duty off for a certain period. I look upon this clause as most dangerous. From that point of view, I think it ought to be entirely redrawn. Of course, I can see clearly that Sir George Turner wants to so negative absolutely the previous clause that, the Federal Parliament notwithstanding, nothing shall interfere with any bonus system which may be introduced up to the 30th June.

That seems to me to open out an enormous area.

Mr. REID. -

The clause was never intended for that. It would not include the class of cases the honorable member refers to. These words only include a specific agreement between a Government and any person.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

But the honorable member was not here when some of the speeches were made. There were speeches made-and that is my reason for rising again-in this Convention to-day which presuppose that all bounties, all general agreements, should be practically sanctioned and held alive. I will give the honorable member an instance.

Mr. REID. -

It will not be under this unless they are reduced to a specific agreement between the Government and an actual person.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That is what I want to make clear. I will give the honorable member an instance, as he was out of the chamber at the time. One honorable member said that they were just about negotiating a guarantee of 4 per cent. to some specific company in the wine business. Then a speech was made by another honorable member, which seemed to imply that that was the general policy adopted, and that any other company that desired to make the same proposal would have the same guarantee, and so on, as regards any other companies.

Mr. REID. -

That would not be valid under these words. An agreement with a given company would be valid if made on or before the 30th of June next, but no general words to enable a fresh agreement to be made after that date with persons unknown would be any good.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I only want to know clearly what the law is, because it is very evident that that is not the view taken of it by honorable members.
That is the effect of the words.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Very well, I take it that if a law is passed in the ordinary way by the state Parliament offering a bounty, and that has not gone into a specific contract, but is merely a matter of general legislation, the Federal Parliament can intervene and stop that.

Mr. REID. -

It dies. All these general laws die.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I am only anxious that that should be thoroughly understood. The whole trend of the debate has been against that principle, and it is better that we should at this stage know that that is the real position. But I think I am right with regard to what is in the minds of the delegates for Victoria. They think that they will have a perfect right to impose a general policy which, although it might not be a specific contract with individuals, would have to be carried out, notwithstanding the position of the Federal Government.

Mr. REID. -

It would not come within these words.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Then I am perfectly satisfied. I do not like the thing from beginning to end, but we must bring the discussion to a close, and I will vote for the proposal on that understanding.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

The matter of substance is so very important that perhaps I may be permitted to make an observation or two, rather with a view of expressing what is in my own mind as to the meaning of this clause than of dealing with the very large question of bounties. I take it that the meaning of sub-sections (2) and (3) in the Finance Committee's report is that on the imposition of uniform duties of customs all general laws giving bounties are absolutely to disappear. In the interval between the establishment of the Commonwealth and the imposition of uniform duties, these laws remain in force, but every specific contract or agreement with an individual or with a corporation disappears at an earlier date, namely, the 30th June, 1898.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If it be so, it is very serious. It will kill us in Victoria.

What I mean is that every contract made after that date is to be of no effect. Every contract made up to that date remains in effect during the term for which it is expressed to be in force.
Mr. ISAACS. -
Is that so?
Mr. SYMON. -
That is what appears to me to be the intention.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Although the law offering the bounty ceases?
Mr. SYMON. -
Yes; the general law under which the power is given to enter into that agreement ceases, but the agreement under it is kept alive by virtue of this sub-section. That is what I take to be the meaning and intention of it. I give my assent to the very broad views expressed by the Right H
Mr. REID. -
We give them until the 30th of June to complete any negotiations.
Mr. SYMON. -
Yes, and to enter into any further contracts under the existing law that they may think fit to make. It is obvious that there must be some limit, and some very short limit, because we know the pressure that may be put upon local Governments for the purpose of getting a continuity of these things, which, in effect, may be good for a particular colony, but ruinous to the interests of those living over the border. I say, therefore, that the period for which this privilege is extended ought to be as limited as it can be. That is what strikes me as to the meaning of these two sub-sections, and they are perfectly consistent. There is nothing inconsistent in declaring that the law shall cease at one period, and that an agreement shall not be operative if made after a certain other period. These two things together are absolutely essential if we are to carry out the policy of giving the entire control of bonuses, in common with customs and excise, to the Federal Parliament. Whilst I say that, I doubt very much if the amendment suggested by my honorable friend (Mr. Lewis), in his very thoughtful speech, would help the matter. The object of this provision is to throw into the scope of the federal legislative power the control of these bounties. The whole issue is, as to whether the control of these bounties shall remain with the states or be in the hands of the Federal Parliament. You cannot have both. It seems to me to be absolutely impossible that you can allow both the state Parliaments and the Federal Parliament to deal with bounties. Perhaps the words my honorable friend has adopted might have the effect of suggesting that the state Parliaments still retain some power, but it would be an illusory power, because before a state Parliament could do anything to which validity would attach it would have to get the prior sanction of the Federal Parliament.
Mr. LEWIS. -
All the state does is to find the money.

Mr. SYMON. -

To that part of it I should have no objection, but I think we may fairly leave that and the whole control to the Federal Parliament. I would ask my honorable friend (Mr. Peacock) to consider whether he is not proceeding upon an erroneous assumption when he says it may be suggested out-of-doors that in this Convention we are doing everything for the mercantile community and nothing for the producers.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

And the manufacturers.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes. There is not a line or syllable in the Bill to warrant any such contention. This very clause, on the face of it, has written in large letters the protection in a general sense and the advancement of the interests of the producers.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Would you object to the modification Sir George Turner suggested that the state might give bounties with the consent of the Federal Executive?

Mr. SYMON. -

I think I should object to that. It would be like keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope. It would give those who would be likely to object on that mistaken ground nothing whatever, and it would be a pity to introduce words which would cause great embarrassment to the Federal Executive. We must remember that the Federal Executive would merely be the representative of the Federal Parliament, as this is to be a responsible Government. It would greatly embarrass them, and it would not give the states that independent control of bounties for which my honorable friends from Victoria apparently contend. There must either be an unrestricted control of bounties on the part of the states, or an unrestricted control on the part of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

State bounties are given in the United States.

Mr. SYMON. -

I have not examined that part of the United States Constitution, but if it is so, it is a defect. On the face of this Bill we place a provision to enable the Federal Parliament to grant bounties on the production or export of goods. What more can be sought I do not know. And what more than that can be expected by the producers of every colony? Not only has the Federal Parliament the power, but it is practically, on the face of the Constitution, invited to exercise that power. The placing of these powers in the Bill is an invitation to the Federal Parliament to exercise them, and no doubt the Federal Parliament will do what is just. When an honorable member gets up and suggests that it is desirable to retain this power to the state Parliaments because the Federal Parliament is difficult of access, and is not likely to consider the interests of the states, I repudiate such an argument, and say that if it were to prevail we should not want federation at all. The Federal Parliament is not to control an abstraction. It is to control and forward the prosperity of every state in this Union. Otherwise, we must look upon it simply as a body created for the purpose of doing mischief. I look upon it as a body created for beneficent purposes, and one of those purposes is to encourage production in every state of the Union to the utmost of its power, and, if a majority of the Federal Parliament can be convinced that financial aid is necessary, to the utmost of its financial strength. The honorable members representing Victoria are all animated by a desire to disarm opposition. I know that, and I acknowledge the difficulties but I am sure that with their power of exposition, aided by the federal spirit which actuates them, they will have no difficulty in convincing the doubters, and in satisfying the perhaps would-be opponents of federation, that every possible precaution has been taken to safeguard the interests of the producers as well as the manufacturers and the merchants—in fact, to safeguard the interests of every citizen of the Commonwealth. I hope, therefore, that these provisions will be adopted. I believe them to be the best, in principle at any rate, which have yet been advocated, and they not only declare that the interests of production are to be secured, but they declare that in that special and exceptional class of production connected with mining this clause does not apply. Their wisdom is, I think, only equalled by their prudence and their consistency with the great objects of federation, and I trust that they will be passed.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

The honorable member (Mr. Symon) says that this is a question of giving absolute and complete control of bounties either to the states or to the Federal Parliament. That is an assertion that has not been made clear to me, at any rate, by any arguments that have been submitted, and the evidence that the Convention does not think so is given in the fact that we have made an exception in connexion with mining. If there is any interest in reference to which this might be regarded as a federal rather than a state question, it is mining, because mining is carried on in a greater or lesser degree in each of the Australian colonies. There are interests that are peculiar to the respective colonies. There is the iron industry, which has reached a considerable degree of development in New South Wales, whilst up to the present time it has not been developed in any degree, as far as I am aware, in any of the other colonies. It happens that the development of the iron industry by the state of New South Wales is possible under this clause, and therefore this is only useful as an instance in which, without any injury, but indeed with positive gain, to the other states, New South Wales might very properly give a bonus. But while that is so, though the Commonwealth adopted the policy of bounties, and gave them in connexion with interests that were somewhat general in their character, there would be considerable difficulty in passing through the Commonwealth Parliament a Bill to give a bounty for an industry located in one state only.

Mr. BROWN. - Why?

Mr. TRENWITH. - Because the representatives of the other states, which have no direct interest in the matter, would be, if not antagonistic, at least only lukewarm in regard to the proposal, and while they might admit in a general way that to give bounties for the development of a national industry was a legitimate thing to do, they might urge that the Commonwealth Parliament was not at liberty to spend the Commonwealth money in developing an industry in one state alone.

Mr. BROWN. - Do we find that selfish spirit prevailing in our local Parliaments?

Mr. TRENWITH. - Yes, in a greater or less degree. Appeals from all sections of the community are heard by Parliament more quickly than an appeal from only one section. For this reason I urge the necessity for inserting these proposals, and the absence of any danger connected with them. The Premier of New South Wales said that it appeared to be thought by some honorable members that the Commonwealth Parliament would be opposed to the granting of bounties. If that were the attitude of the Commonwealth Parliament, these provisions would not hamper it, because it is only proposed that bounties shall be given by the state with the consent of the Commonwealth Parliament.

Mr. FRASER. - The Commonwealth Parliament will not be opposed to the granting of bounties.

Mr. TRENWITH. - I think it highly probable that it will not, and that is why I feel so earnest about the matter. I feel that the general principle will be adopted by the Commonwealth Parliament, as it is being adopted by the states, but progress will be much less rapid if the Federal Parliament alone has the power to grant bounties. I feel that the progress of the states, and consequently the progress of the Commonwealth, may be very materially accelerated if power is given to the states to grant bounties. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) must know that there are a number of things which can be done by the states and by the Federal Parliament-by either at their discretion. But if something is done by a state or states in regard to which the Federal Parliament subsequently passes legislation, it is very properly provided that the legislation of the Federal Parliament shall supersede that of the states. Honorable members who profess free-trade proclivities in connexion with the methods of taxation and the control of trade appear to be afraid that this is a covert effort to obtain bounties which may be used for the restriction or prevention of freedom of intercourse. I am probably as pronounced a protectionist as there is anywhere, but I have always felt that there should be, wherever practicable, absolute free-trade between the colonies. I, for one, would be the last to render absolute freedom of intercourse between the colonies impossible, if we can have some common system of protection against countries outside Australia, which is achieved by this Constitution. It may be—but I think it highly improbable—that the policy adopted by the Commonwealth will provide for freedom of intercourse with all the countries of the world. Notwithstanding this, no one is more earnest in the desire to see absolute freedom of intercourse established between the colonies than I am, and that I think is the desire of the people of Victoria. I was going to give another illustration, which seems to me particularly pertinent as showing the desirability of leaving this power to the states, with the consent of the Federal Parliament—and, I will go the length of saying, not before the consent of the Federal Parliament is obtained. In New South Wales they have for some time been producing kerosene. I have not heard of any other part of Australia where kerosene can be produced.

Mr. GORDON. -

The honorable member has not then heard of the deposits in South Australia.

Mr. BROWN. -

And in Tasmania, too.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Then it would seem that a federal bounty might be given for the development of this industry. My impression, however, is that New South Wales is the only colony where an effort has been made to produce kerosene. If the New South Wales Government saw fit to give a bounty for the development of the kerosene industry, that could not interfere with freedom of trade throughout the colonies, and, so far as it affected the other colonies at all, it would benefit them by encouraging the local production of an article very largely used throughout the Commonwealth. It benefits Victoria very materially that a mine so rich and prosperous, so rich and so full of possibilities as Mount Lyell, should have been developed in Tasmania. The development of that mine indeed has benefited the whole of Australia, and so it would be with the development of any local industry—unless there was some counterbalancing disadvantage, such as a restriction of intercourse. Of course, the Commonwealth Parliament will be able to give a bounty when they think a bounty necessary, and they may in time be induced to do anything that a state would consider it proper to do; but while a state would move quickly, the Commonwealth Parliament would move slowly. It must always be remembered that if this provision is made for the granting of state bounties the states will not be able to do what the Commonwealth Parliament could not do, or would consider it wrong to do; but the state might do to-day, and at once, what the Commonwealth Parliament would take a long time to do.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

It was upon my motion, at the Sydney Convention in 1891, that the exclusive power to offer bounties was vested in the Federal Parliament, because it is obvious that, unless some such qualification as has been suggested by the Premier of Victoria were adopted, to leave to the states the power to grant bounties might seriously interfere with the freedom of trade between the colonies. I think that if some such provision had been made at the time it would have been accepted. Upon the principle that the greater includes the less, if the Federal Parliament has the right to offer bounties, it will have the right to give the states leave to offer bounties, having in its purview the interests of the whole Federation, and knowing that the interests of no part of the Commonwealth will be injured. It appears to me that the suggestion of the right honorable gentleman might be adopted. By the tacking on of a few words to sub-section (86A) the whole end we have in view might be achieved.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The debate has wandered very considerably from the question before the Chair, which is simply the insertion of a new paragraph suggested by the Finance Committee. We have not yet come to the amendment suggested by the Premier of New South Wales.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

It has been pointed out by the Attorney-General of Victoria that this sub-section simply preserves the existence of contracts entered into prior to the 30th of June, 1898, but if these contracts may end with the repeal of the grant, which will be repealed upon the coming into force of uniform duties of customs, the meaning of that is that you only give life to these contracts until uniform duties of customs are imposed. So that, while a contract may be made for twenty years, it may be put an end to after two or three years. The point is whether the clause should not be recast. The honorable and learned gentleman very properly suggested that the paragraph is expressed negatively instead of affirmatively. I think that the whole difficulty would be got over if an affirmative expression were provided, so as to give vitality to all contracts entered into prior to June, 1898, to the full length of their term.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I am perfectly satisfied with the assurance that we have had from the leader of the Convention, but I wish to move an amendment which will practically fall in with the observations of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn). I beg to move-

That the amendment be amended by the insertion, after the word "but,"
of the following words, "the provisions of this section shall not apply to any grant of or agreement for any such bounty made by or under the authority of the Government of any state before the 30th day of June, 1898.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

The effect of the amendment, as I understand it, is that all laws with respect to the granting of bounties in force at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth will remain in full force until the imposition of uniform duties; that all grants and agreements made under those laws before the 30th June, 1898, remain in full force and effect, notwithstanding the departure, so to speak, from the laws on the imposition of uniform duties; that in the interval between the 30th June, 1898, and the imposition of uniform duties, those laws remain in full force and operation in each state, so that each state may grant these bounties, may enter into agreements, and may do everything it pleases in the interval, except that agreements and grants arranged for during that interval cease on the cessation of the law, and the only agreements and grants that are preserved after the cessation of the law are those made before the 30th June, 1898.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There are no words expressly preserving them, and that is the danger.

Mr. SYMON. -
I was going on to say that my honorable friend's amendment is intended to make that absolutely clear. I agree with it. It is well that it should be known publicly that each state can go on during those two years granting those bounties and facilitating the operations of its producers just as before, except that at the end of two years they cease. That gives a sort of locus penitentiae. Only those grants and agreements which were made before the 30th June, 1898, remain in full operation.

Mr. Isaacs amendment was agreed to.

The new paragraph, as amended, was agreed to.

Paragraph (4). - The control and collection of duties of customs and excise, and the control of the payment of bounties, shall nevertheless pass to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth upon the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

In order to carry out the recommendation of the Finance Committee I propose the omission of this paragraph. It is proposed to make a separate clause to provide for this matter, which will be 86A. I propose to omit the paragraph, if that can be done.

The paragraph was struck out.

Paragraph (5). - This section shall not apply to bounties or aids to mining for gold, silver, or other metals.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Upon this paragraph there is an amendment necessary on the recommendation of the Finance Committee. I beg to move-

That before the word "This" the word "neither" be inserted, that the words "nor the preceding" be inserted before the word "section," and the word "not" be struck out.

The clause will then read "Neither this nor the preceding section shall apply."

The amendment was agreed to.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

When we were discussing this question, our desire was to assist mining enterprise, but I do not approve of the words as they now stand in the clause. There is always a difficulty about the construction of the words "other metals," and there is a question as to whether they do not mean ejusdem generis. Minerals would not be included under this definition, and I think it would be much better if we made the clause read so as to apply to mining for metals or minerals.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Why not stop at the word "mining"?
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That would meet my view, and I beg to move-
That all the words after the word "mining" be omitted.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
The clause as it stands was the result of a long discussion in Adelaide. It was held that bounties granted for the production of metals stood in a different position altogether from bounties granted for the production of goods which might be the objects of commerce between different states. It is because a bounty on the production of metals would have no effect on the price that this clause was agreed to. The honorable member has suggested that instead of gold, silver, and other metals, the words "other minerals" should be introduced. There is an objection to the word "mineral," because that would apply to coal.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Why not give a bonus for the production of coal?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Coal is in a different position altogether to the other metals. The policy of the Convention was based on the reason that coal is an article of commerce between the different states.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
But New South Wales has got all the coal at present.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Coal is in a different position altogether. We have enacted that there shall not be a bounty on produce of any kind, and that applies all the more strongly to the production of such an article as coal.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
This means that we are not to develop our coal resources at all. You are going too far.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
The honorable member will see that this sweeps away entirely the whole object of handing over the control of bounties to the Federal Government. If you give a bounty for the production of coal, you might as well give a bounty for the production of butter or any other natural product.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
So you ought to.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
The reason why you are not allowed to give a bounty for the production of butter, or any other article of that kind produced in a state, is because the bounty would interfere with the price and the sale in commerce between the states, and exactly the same consideration would apply to a mineral like coal, which is the subject of sale. The case of gold, silver, or any other metal is quite different. It is not the subject of trade and commerce between the different states, and that is the reason why the two things are put in separate classes. I only make that remark because Sir George Turner has suggested that the matter should be dealt with in a particular way. Exactly the same objection may be raised to leaving out all the words after the word "mining." It ought to be put beyond all question that the only mining bounties to be excepted are bounties dealing with gold, silver, and metals, so as to draw that line of distinction. The object in Adelaide was not to interfere with the grants of the different states made for prospecting purposes. In all the states these prospecting grants are given to develop the particular localities, and it was thought that they might as well continue to be given.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

For coal especially.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

So that there should be no interference with the general policy in framing this Constitution.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Why should it not apply to coal?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Coal stands in a different position altogether. The Convention at that time recognised the difference, and I hope the committee will pass the clause as it stands.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I regret that the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) has taken up this position. I will press my amendment to a division. Step by step New South Wales seems to be gaining everything, while the other colonies are getting nothing. I have a very great deal of patience, but I must tell my honorable friend that my patience is nearly exhausted.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

This applies to every colony. Why say that New South Wales gets an advantage?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

New South Wales has apparently got her coal resources developed. We cannot develop the coal resources which we probably have without assistance from the state. Is New South Wales going to play the part of the dog in the manger, and say to us-"You shall not develop your coal"?

Mr. WISE. -

Are you willing to allow us to give bounties to manufactures?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I would allow you to give any bounties you like if they do not interfere with other states. Giving bounties to manufactures is somewhat different to developing the natural resources of the colonies. We know that in our colony, in South Australia, and probably in Tasmania and Western Australia, we cannot develop our coal industries unless the Governments are prepared to give assistance. Are we to kill these industries altogether? We are doing nothing for the benefit of our natural industries in this Convention. We are doing nothing for our producers. We are only helping our merchants and manufacturers. The majority of our people will say that under these circumstances it is better for us to stand out of this Federation altogether.

Mr. SYMON. -
Do not say that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I am afraid they will say it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Is not your proposal the same as putting an import duty on coal?

Mr. WISE. -
Exactly the same.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We shall be debarred from assisting any company which desires to prospect and eventually to mine for coal. This will prevent us from giving £500 or £1,000 to help such a company. We are at liberty to do that in the case of gold, silver, and other metals; but we may discover a large number of other minerals besides coal in the different colonies.

Mr. WISE. -
Is the honorable member prepared to limit the bounties to grants in aid for prospecting and discovery? That was the attitude which was taken up in Adelaide. Then it would include coal if you like. If the grants are to be in aid of production that is altogether different.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
A grant for prospecting and discovery would, in many cases, hardly be sufficient. We must be prepared to do something to help persons to develop the coal industry. I cannot get away from the fact that, step by step, we are going a long way to kill all the natural industries in our colony, which it ought to be the desire and intention of the Government to develop. I ask my honorable friends from New South Wales, who have gained, step by step-
In New South Wales the people are jealous, and say you are robbing us at every turn.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I have not seen anything that any of the other colonies are getting. I am not going to delay the Convention by going over all the points which New South Wales has gained; but I say now, as I said at first in Sydney, that I believe New South Wales in five years' time will be the colony that will get the most advantage from federation. I have no hesitation in saying that that is now my matured opinion, after giving the question every consideration. I ask Mr. O'Connor not to oppose my amendment, but to allow the colonies the same right to assist in developing the coal industries as it is proposed to give them in developing metals. I will insist upon putting my amendment, in order to test the feeling of the Convention.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two p.m.]

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

On this particular amendment I shall have, with great regret, to vote against my right honorable, friend, the Premier of Victoria, if the amendment is pressed to a division. I can see that the amendment will be a derogation from freedom of trade within the Commonwealth; and anything which tends in that direction, as I said last night, I shall have nothing to do with. The effect of the amendment, if it is carried, will be that there will be power in Victoria and other colonies to exclude Newcastle coal-to practically give bounties on the production of coal in Victoria which will exclude coal from Newcastle; and that I take to be distinctly a derogation from freedom of trade and commerce within Australia. I hope the committee will clearly apprehend the particular amendment now before the Chair. The amendment is that a state may, without any restriction whatever, give any bounty it thinks fit upon anything. Now, the only exception which was made in Adelaide was upon my motion, and it was that the state might give bounties or aids for any metals—not minerals—but gold, silver, and other metals. There was no danger of any interference there with inter-state commerce; but when it comes to a question of minerals, without any restriction whatever, I say that proposal can be worked, within the law, for the purpose of aiding our Korumburra and other mines; and, much as I should like to see the Korumburra mines prosper, I certainly think we must take the bad with the good. We are going to have the great benefits of intercolonial freedom of commerce, and we must submit to abstain from giving the state power to grant bounties and aids in favour of coal and other minerals.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Our people may think we are paying too dear for those great benefits.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Of course, it is for our people to consider whether it is worth while to submit to that noble principle, as I consider it to be, of freedom of transit of goods between the different parts of this Commonwealth of Australia. I am quite sure that our people are as strongly federal in spirit as the people of any other colony in the group, and I am certain that they are willing to accept all the consequences of inter-state freedom of commerce. I hope it will be clearly understood that it is only this particular amendment that I take exception to. Last evening I suggested—and I am very glad to see that the Premier of Victoria has accepted that suggestion—a modification of his proposal with regard to bounties given with the assent of the federal authority. As to that, I shall support him with all my heart and soul. I think all the arguments that have been urged against that proposal, upon the ground of interference with inter-state commerce, are beside the point. I do not think they have touched the argument of the Premier of Victoria at all. The idea in that proposal is simply that a state may grant a bounty on anything provided the federal authority consents, and of course the federal authority will see in giving its consent that there is no interference with inter-state commerce. The Premier of Victoria is quite right in urging that there are plenty of articles, plenty of products, on which a bounty can be given without any interference whatever with interstate commerce, and I shall support him in that matter as heartily as I can. But as to the present amendment, I submit that, however desirable it may seem to us to help our own industries, it is an amendment which will have the effect of derogating from one of the chief commercial advantages to be derived from federation, and that is, absolute freedom of goods crossing the border. At Adelaide, the Premier of Victoria never urged what he now declaims about. In his speech just now he said that New South Wales is getting all her own way, and that she is getting it more and more, but at Adelaide she got this particular point.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

We saw it was no good opposing it.

Mr. WISE. -

It was not objected to. I have the debate here.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I objected, in committee, and also previously—not as to coal particularly, but generally.

Mr. WISE. -

It is coal we are talking about now.
Mr. HIGGINS. -

When the Premier of Victoria says that we are giving up more and more to New South Wales, the answer is that this thing was conceded without any objection on his part at Adelaide, and if it was right then it is right now.

Mr. WISE. -

Conceded! It is only a declaration that you won't ask something more from us.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The honorable member may take the expression in that form if he thinks fit. I only wish to put my position before the committee. I believe that the people of Victoria are eager for freedom of trade between the colonies, and that they are willing to take it, even with the condition that they cannot give special bounties in aid of the coal or other industries. I have thought it necessary to explain my attitude in this matter, because, as representing a Victorian constituency, and as having been elected by Victorians, I feel the responsibility of my vote on this amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I go further than the point of objecting to this amendment; I think there is grave danger in discussing this question at all.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Discussing it?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

What I mean is, that I think it is going a step beyond all reason with regard to this matter of bounties. I think that any attempt to lead up to such a discussion, involving the equality of trade in the great coal-mining industry of New South Wales, would do a great deal of harm in connexion with the debates of this Convention. Of course, I am not saying that the matter should not be debated; but it really seems to me that, if the Prime Minister of Victoria could withdraw this amendment, after the speeches which have been made upon it—because I do not think there is any possible chance of its being carried—the effect would be better. Of course, the right honorable gentleman will thoroughly understand that I do not say this in any impertinent or dictatorial tone, but simply because it appears to me that the fact that we are asked to allow a bonus to be given to the coal trade of Victoria, which would have so manifestly the effect of an import duty on coal, and be so derogatory to all the principles of that equality of trade which lies at the very basis of this Constitution—it does seem to me, that the effect of even a discussion of this kind would be bad in the interests of federation.

The amendment was negatived.
Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). - I understood that Sir George Turner was going to add certain words to this paragraph. I do not wish to take it out of his hands if he desires to do that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). - I have a feeling, from my late experience in the Convention, in moving this proposal, that it is almost hopeless.

Several HONORABLE MEMBERS. - No, no.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - My honorable friend (Mr. Wise) may smile, but I can assure him that I am in real earnest.

Mr. HOWE. - Right; we must concede something.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - I am glad to hear that, because I have not found anything conceded yet.

Mr. WISE. - You have had everything your own way.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - I have had nothing conceded to me yet.

Mr. WISE. - You are so reasonable that you have asked for nothing.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - That is just my failing. If I had been like some of the representatives of other colonies, and asked for something unreasonable, I might have got some reasonable concession.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - You are the most reasonable man in the Convention.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - I propose to add-

This section shall not apply to any bounty or aid granted by any state with the consent of the Governor-General in Council or of the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

Mr WISE. - Strike out the words "the Governor-General in Council or of."

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - Of course; strike out the only part of my amendment that I am anxious to get, and take what is practically of little, if any, use, and my honorable friends are willing to concede it. I put in the "Governor-General in Council or the Parliament of the Commonwealth," because I say this: That if we have to go with all these applications to the Federal Parliament-a body which will meet probably for three months out of the twelve, a body which, for a time, at all events, will be dealing with very large and important questions—the Federal Parliament will have little, if any time, even if it has the inclination, to deal with this question of bounties in cases where it affects only one colony. And if the proposal for a state bounty is to be brought forward by a private member in the Federal Parliament, he will be in a far worse position than a private member in one of our local Parliaments, and we all know what little chance a private member in one of our local Parliaments has of carrying a motion or of passing a Bill. Now, if we are to leave it in this way, that some representative of any colony that requires a bonus is to bring it before the Federal Parliament as a private member, I say that such concession as that would be worse than useless to us, because it would be simply misleading those of our people in Victoria who might think that they were getting what was of real benefit and advantage to them. And if the committee strike out the words "the Governor-General in Council," and it is to be left simply to the Federal Parliament, then I will vote against the proposal myself as being worse than useless—as being misleading. But if we are to be permitted to go before the Governor-General in Council—the Government of the day—during the time Parliament is not sitting, and if we can make out a good case for the bounty that our people desire, and can show that no injury will be done to any other colony by allowing that bounty to be given, why not give power to the Federal Executive to consent to the grant of that bounty? We are not asking that the Federal Executive should deal with federal moneys belonging to the Commonwealth, but simply to consent to the spending of money of a particular state by that state for the benefit of certain industries in that state, so long as that benefit is not injurious to any other part of the Commonwealth. I fail to see any reason whatever why we should not give that power to the Governor-General in Council. It is a power which that body will be slow to exercise. This proposal of mine does not go to anything like the length to which I think the Convention ought to go in this direction for the sake of many of the colonies, but, seeing that it is the only thing I have any hope of carrying, I am willing, accepting the suggestion of my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins), to submit my amendment in this altered form. By going to the Governor-General in Council a state can have its application for a bounty speedily settled one way or the other. If it has to go to the Federal Parliament, while the consent of that body is being obtained the industry it desires to assist may die. People who propose to invest their capital and energies in a certain industry, on consideration of receiving assistance from the state, will not wait month after month and year after year for a bonus of £3,000 or £4,000 to assist them in establishing that industry. And yet they may have to wait that time if the consent of the Federal Parliament is to be absolutely necessary to authorize the grant of that bounty. Those people will say-"We prefer to take our capital and our abilities to some other country, where we can get prompt assistance." I put in "the Federal Parliament" for this reason, namely, that should the Government of the day say "No" to a state's application for its consent to a bounty, the state will still have the opportunity of going to the Federal Parliament and asking the Federal Parliament to say that the Government of the day should give its consent. I submit that this is really a very little concession to give to the producers of Victoria and other colonies, and that the Convention ought to be willing to accept my amendment.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

Before this amendment is carried-

Mr. SYMON. -

Before it is put, you mean.

Mr. WISE. -

I say before it is carried-and I confess that I have at present quite an open mind on the matter-I would like this consideration to be clearly before the Convention: If the power to consent to a state bonus or bounty is put in the hands of the Governor-General in Council, which, of course, means the Ministry of the day, do we not deprive the various states, through their representatives in the Senate, of the opportunity of expressing any opinion on the question? The Ministry of the day will, of course, be responsible only to the House of Representatives. It may be that the Ministry represent one or perhaps two of the more influential states who are largely interested in the development of a particular industry, and the development of that industry may be prejudicial to competing industries of the same class in two or three of the other colonies, which, although in a minority in the House of Representatives, would be in a majority in the Senate. Now, inasmuch as the objection to state bounties is well based on the doctrine, which I believe to be sound, that you cannot have state bounties without running great risk of interfering with the freedom of commerce between all the states, it becomes apparent at once that all the states are interested in the question whether a bounty should be given or withheld. Therefore, to allow a bounty to be given by a state with the consent of Parliament, as proposed by Mr. Lewis, is perfectly fair, because that proposal insures that every state, not only the large states, who will have the predominance in the House of Representatives, but also the smaller states, who will have the predominance in the Senate, will be able to express its opinion clearly as to whether the proposed bounty should be granted or not. But if you leave it to the Government of the day, you run the risk of taking away from the smaller states, which might be vitally interested in the question, the opportunity of saying whether that bounty should be granted or withheld. I am quite in sympathy with the original view of the Premier of Victoria in holding that there should be no obstacle placed in the way of granting aids to the discovery of metals or minerals, but I am utterly opposed to the idea of bounties for production. If such bounties are necessary, they ought to be given only under circumstances of great difficulty, after full discussion, and after the opinion of every state whose commerce may be affected has been taken in the most effective manner possible.

Mr. ISAACS. -
How is it that this is done in America?

Mr. WISE. -
They do it very slightly in America.

Mr. ISAACS. -
They do it as much as they like there.

Mr. WISE. -
The Constitution of America is such that they have not been accustomed to duties between the different states there as we have been here. In America one state does not prosper by cutting out the commerce of another state. Unfortunately, we have had only that idea here, and it is an idea that has unquestionably been promoted by my honorable friends in Victoria. For myself, I will put every possible obstacle in the way of any state injuring the interests of neighbouring states, and therefore I feel that these bounties should only be allowed with the consent of the House of Parliament representing the majority of the people, and with the consent of the Senate, in which each state that may be affected will be represented.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I earnestly appeal to the committee to pass this proposal of my right honorable friend the Premier of Victoria.

Mr. WISE. -
Will you consent to strike out the words "the Governor-General in Council or of"? I will vote for the amendment if you do.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Why, that is the efficacious part of the proposal, and it is simply idle to talk about striking that out and passing something that will be worse than useless, because it will be absolutely illusory. We were told in a recent debate on the river question, that our honorable friends from New South Wales were not here to give away what would really amount to the lands of their colony. Now, I say that, in this matter, we are asked to give away the whole future development of our primary resources. We are asked, practically, to place in the hands of those who may not be at all interested in the matter, the question of whether we are to develop our mineral wealth by means of bounties.

Mr. WISE. -

Why should you find it any more difficult to develop your resources than the people in any other part of Australia?

Mr. ISAACS. -

The honorable member knows that in these matters personal and private enterprise is notable to undertake some of the gigantic operations that are necessary to the development of our resources.

Mr. WISE. -

But you would be in no worse position than the rest of Australia.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think all Australia ought to be in the same position in this respect.

Mr. WISE. -

Exactly; then leave it to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, that is not at all necessary. I think that all Australia ought to be in a position in which each state can help itself and its citizens, providing it does not do anything to the detriment of the general welfare, and I am perfectly willing to let the Federal Parliament have power to annul anything which, in its judgment, is contrary to the general welfare. But, in the meantime, we ought not to be required to move that body in order to obtain some benefit that is purely provincial, and that we are willing to pay for out of our own provincial pocket. I think that that is a reasonable and necessary request, which ought to be acceded to without any difficulty, without any hesitation, and with the best grace possible. When we say that we acknowledge that the Federal Parliament will have the power to annul anything that it considers detrimental, whether in fact it is so or not, to the trade and commerce provisions of this Constitution, I think we have reasonably surrendered all that can be fairly expected of us, and all, I believe, that our people are willing to surrender in this regard.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

If Sir George Turner and Mr. Isaacs desire this amendment to be carried they must-I say it with all humility—strike out the words "the Governor-
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I will withdraw the amendment if those words are struck out.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I think the honorable members are indulging in the language of exaggeration when they say, "if you strike out the Governor-General in Council the amendment is absolutely useless." I can imagine no more hostile, and may I say, useless criticism against the Federal Parliament than that. The other day Sir George Turner moved in the direction of allowing any state to grant bounties subject to their being annulled by the Federal Parliament, and in impressing those views on the Convention, he did not say that it would take a year or two to get the Federal Parliament to annul any state bounty which that body deemed objectionable, having regard to the interests of the states generally. Now, however, the right honorable gentleman reverses the whole thing, and objects to doing this in the only possible businesslike way we call devise, namely, by saying that a state shall not put on a bounty unless the Federal Parliament gives its consent. If the consent of the Federal Parliament is to be required, then the honorable members say their proposal is worse than useless, because, they urge, the Federal Parliament will not be able to find time to attend to the matter promptly, but will keep the state waiting.

Mr. HOWE. -

They say it will only sit three months out of the twelve, and that sort of thing. Why should not the Federal Parliament sit six months of the year, if necessary?

Mr. ISAACS. -

If either the Federal Parliament or the Federal Government dissents from our proposal it will not come into force; but under the other arrangement both bodies will have to assent, or it cannot come into operation at all.

Mr. DOBSON. -

In the interests of free-trade, of equality of trade and commerce throughout the states, ought not the control of these bounties to be absolutely in the hands of the Federal Parliament? If the words "the Governor-General in Council" are struck out, although I have been interjecting against this proposal all through, I will vote for it in order

Mr. ISAACS. -

What is the use of that to us? They have got what we are asking for in America.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Look at the confusion we shall get into if you do not strike out the words "the Governor-General in Council." The Governor-General in Council may wrongly grant a bonus which does infringe on the equality of trade, but being a popular Government—as our honorable friends in Victoria are now, I am sure—and having a large majority in both Houses, Parliament might consent to what was being done because of the popularity of the Ministry. But, take the reverse case. The Government may not be particularly strong, but may grant a bonus which is absolutely correct and right, will help to foster production, and will not interfere with equality of trade. But being a weak and unpopular Government, and being on the verge of defeat, the Houses of Parliament may absolutely negative or refuse to confirm what has been done, although it may be quite right. We all know what party government is, and you are going to make this the subject-matter of party government. If you are to have any bonuses whatever, why not give the Federal Parliament the onus of confirming or refusing to confirm a bonus which is proposed?

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I hope that this amendment will be rejected. I agree that the essence of it is the consent of the Governor-General in Council, but the latter words are simply thrown in, without having any particular effect upon the amendment. They do not carry the matter further than the first provision, which we have already dealt with. The Federal Parliament is to have power to deal with these bonuses, and to put in a provision to say that they shall be granted by the Governor in Council is an absurdity. You grant bonuses out of the coffers of the state. It can be done in a different way, but it is not necessary to put it in this Constitution at all, because if the Federal Parliament were asked by a state to give its sanction to the granting of a bonus out of the coffers of the state it would be a matter of bargain between the state and the federal authority, and it is not necessary to provide for that in the Constitution.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Under the Constitution, all those matters are in the hands of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. SYMON. -

If it is intended to extend that, and to make it clear that the Federal Parliament may, in addition to giving bonuses out of the Federal Exchequer, authorize a state to give bonuses out of its own funds, that should be done in express terms. I want to confine my attention to what I take to be the real gist of this amendment. It is to enable any state to grant bonuses if it has the consent of the Federal Executive. That I take to be the meaning of it; and the fatal objection to it, as it seems to me as a representative of one of the smaller states, is that it will absolutely exclude those who may be most deeply interested, namely, the corporate states, from having any voice in the granting of these bonuses. Because if the Governor-General in Council, which means the responsible Government, grants a bonus, that Government will be responsible, and responsible only, under the Constitution we are framing, to the House of Representatives. A majority in the House of Representatives, in defiance of the voice of the majority of the states, may sanction a bonus which may be inimical to the interests of other states. That is not a condition of things which we can contemplate with equanimity. There are, no doubt, difficulties, that have been pointed out by Sir George Turner, in bringing any matter before the Federal Parliament. But the same difficulties also occur in bringing a matter before the state Parliament. You cannot have it done in a day.

Mr. WISE. -
Besides, this is a matter in which we should hasten slowly.

Mr. SYMON. -
You may have a delay in regard to a bonus to assist a particular industry for, say, a session. Bonuses are not granted simply on the ipse dixit of the Government of the day, although granted upon their responsibility. From the point of view of the smaller states this proposal would be absolutely fatal, and it is objectionable from the point of view that the granting of bonuses in this way would have the effect of aggrandizing a particular industry in one state at the expense of another.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -
I am sorry that I cannot agree with the Right Hon. the Premier of this colony in regard to the matter under discussion. I should be very willing to vote for the state having some right in regard to this matter, but to give the Government of the day a right, independent and almost in defiance of the Commonwealth Parliament, would, in my opinion, be a very great danger. It would be quite possible for a Government in a minority perhaps in the House of Representatives to say to the representatives of New South Wales, and perhaps also of South Australia and Victoria-"Here, we will give you half-a-million of money to develop your iron mines." That might be done just on the eve of a general election.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
My honorable friend altogether misunderstands the position. I am only asking for permission for the state to spend its own money with the consent of the Governor-General in Council and the Federal Parliament.

Mr. FRASER. -
But that might lead to serious injuries to other states. Why not leave the matter to the Federal Parliament altogether? I am quite willing to go that length, not that I admit the necessity for it at all, because I hold that the Commonwealth, if it is going to answer the purpose which we believe it will do, will act as Canada did, and be lavish in regard to its bounties. I do not think there is any danger or fear that the Commonwealth will be at all slow in coming to the assistance of any industry which in any colony needs assistance by means of bounties. However, I see the danger of bringing in the Executive Council to deal with matters like this, and if there is a division I shall feel bound to vote against the amendment. If, however, it be proposed that the matter be left for the Commonwealth Parliament to deal with, although I do not think it will do any good, I shall vote for that.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I must say that I am altogether in accord with the views expressed by the Premier of Victoria in regard to this subject. It seems to me that we are asking too much if we ask that a state shall give up altogether the means within its resources of developing its territory. I can, of course, see objections to leaving this matter altogether in the hands of the Commonwealth, because the Commonwealth might be unwilling to spend its funds in striving to develop the resources of a particular state. It might be difficult to induce the Commonwealth to spend a large amount of money in prospecting for coal, or for mineral oils, or for gold, or for anything else in a distant state, or it might be difficult to induce the Parliament of the Commonwealth to try and foster a new industry in any state. The state should be left as free as possible in striving to bring into existence new industries for which its soils may be particularly suitable. Therefore, I think, so far as permitting the state to do what it likes in the direction of encouraging the development of its own resources we shall be doing-

Mr. SYMON. -

We shall not do that.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That is what we are trying to do. I object to preventing a state from developing its territory or to leaving that development to be undertaken by the Federal Parliament. That course would involve great trouble and delay. We know the difficulty of getting two Houses of Parliament to deal with a small question, and to have to refer such matters to the Federal Parliament would involve their being altogether deferred. The Governor in Council is not an arbitrary body. It is not a body that represents the individual persons comprising it.

Mr. SYMON. -
Would you not give the same voice to the Senate as to the House of Representatives?

Sir JOHN FORREST.

If the Governor in Council wanted to take a certain course it would virtually have to have the consent of both Houses. The Governor in Council represents both Houses of Parliament.

Mr. SYMON.

Only one.

Sir JOHN FORREST.

That may be so in some cases, but I think the Senate would be likely to be on the side of encouraging the states in the management of their own business; therefore it would not be necessary to obtain their consent so much perhaps as the consent of the House of Representatives. I take it that the Governor-General in Council merely represents the country during the time the Government is in office.

Mr. SYMON.

The Governor-General in Council is not responsible to the Senate.

Sir JOHN FORREST.

Not in the same degree as to the House of Representatives I admit, but that the Governor-General in Council is altogether independent and indifferent to the wishes of the Senate I altogether deny. The Governor-General in Council generally has to act in accordance with the wishes of both Houses, and I altogether join issue with those who think that the Governor-General in Council is an arbitrary body which is only going to act as its individual members desire. In my opinion, it is reasonable that if the Governor-General in Council does not prove to be what it should be, there should be some appeal, and that appeal should be to the Parliament; which means that Parliament should be altogether supreme.

Mr. SYMON.

Why not leave this matter to the Federal Parliament altogether?

Sir JOHN FORREST.

Because that procedure is cumbrous and slow. It would take a good deal of time, and would not, I think, be efficacious. It seems to me that there is a disposition amongst honorable members representing some of the colonies to hold to all they have got, and not to give up anything that they can avoid giving up. It seems to me that the Scripture is being fulfilled in this case-"To him that hath shall be given, and to him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath."

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania).
I can hardly understand the attitude taken up by the Right Hon. the Premier of Western Australia, inasmuch as he has always been an earnest supporter of state rights, and has always indicated that he would seek every means of upholding the protection of the states through the Senate.

Mr. SYMON. -

And he is now going to take state rights away.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Precisely. The Executive of the day will, certainly be representative more of the House of Representatives than of the Senate. It will have its majority, we may assume, in the House of Representatives, and may be in a minority in the Senate, and what we seek to do apparently by this amendment is to place it in the power of the Executive to ignore the Senate, and to do that of which the Senate would not approve if it were appealed to. I think the effect of this must be most deplorable in bringing the Executive of the day in direct opposition to a large section of the Parliament.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

They would not do that if there was any doubt about it.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

They might very well not have any doubt about it, but still find that they ought to have a doubt about it, because that doubt came to be fulfilled. I am quite prepared to support any reasonable amendment which will give to a state the right of aiding any of its own industries out of its own funds, with the sanction of the Federal Parliament.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

With the sanction of the Governor-General in Council?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Not with the sanction of the Governor-General in Council, but with that sanction which we ought to regard surely as the highest form of sanction for any dealing with our laws, more especially in respect to this matter, as to which we have

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You will take away everything.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

No; we will not. I hope I will not take away everything. We are proceeding to take away from the power of the Federal Parliament, which consists of two Houses, any one of which we, especially the smaller states, have the greatest possible interest in, and an interest which might be injured by the action we are seeking to take.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

As I did not speak on the proposal which was made yesterday, I hope I shall not be wasting time if I say a few words about the present one. It is proposed by Sir George Turner to make this addition to the clause:

This section shall not apply to any bounty or aid granted by any state with the consent of the Governor-General in Council or of the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

I cannot help saying that I am against the amendment root and branch. We propose in our Constitution—and the clause I am about to mention has been, I think, twice dealt with since we began to sit in Adelaide—to give to the Federal Parliament legislative powers over customs and excise and bounties, but so that duties of customs and of excise and bounties shall be uniform throughout the Commonwealth. That represents the double decision of this Convention. We propose, in clause 89, to provide that so soon as duties of customs have been imposed trade and commerce throughout the Commonwealth, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free. We propose in the second branch of clause 95 to provide that—

Any law or regulation so made by the Commonwealth or any state, or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth, or by any state, having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth, shall be null and void.

How we can take a provision of this kind and say the others are worth having been made I cannot understand. We certainly should not lay ourselves open to the reproach of being neither fish, flesh, fowl, nor good red herring. If we are to have intercolonial free-trade let us have it. I am a protectionist, sir, but if we are to have intercolonial free-trade—and I cannot conceive a Federation without the entire operation of intercolonial free-trade—then, by so much as we seek to derogate from that free-trade by such proposals as this one, we actually destroy one of the primary conditions of the Federation. We cannot get away from that position. It is very well to say that there is to be a certain degree of development which a state can undertake without infringing upon intercolonial free-trade. I can quite grant that, with regard to a certain class of bounties, such as for the production of things which are not general commodities, such as gold and silver. But I cannot grant it with regard to any matter of production which may be a matter of separate production in two or more states.

Mr. PEACOCK. - Is it not done in the United States?
Mr. BARTON. - Whether it is or is not done in the United States is not the question. I have repeatedly urged that certain things are worthy of some consideration, because in other great Federal Constitutions they have been implanted; but that argument has very frequently been repudiated by honorable gentlemen from whom such a proposal as this one comes.

Mr. SYMON. -

We are not to take these things if they are wrong.

Mr. BARTON. -

After all, though we do not presume to have the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution of the United States, we can lay claim to the additional experience of the meantime, which can save us from matters we may now consider to be mistakes. Surely it is no argument to tell us then, that simply because a thing is in another Constitution we ought to follow it. Tell us that there is a good reason for it, and then the fact that wise men have adopted it before us may be a confirmation of the reason; but unless you come to that conclusion, unless you can give us a good reason why we should derogate from the very policy which is at the root of this Constitution, then we must not follow any attempt-not insidious perhaps, not insidious certainly in its intention, but it will be insidious in its operation-to override the principle of that freedom of trade. If we are to have a Federation within which you can impose duties of customs between the goods of the various colonies, well and good. That is a Federation which some people would be in favour of. I, for one, would stand away entirely from my advocacy of federation if I thought that it involved that. But how can I reconcile my opposition to a Federation of that kind with the inclusion of principles which fairly and squarely may not be the means of as large a derogation from freedom of trade as these duties of customs would be? If we lay down in our Constitution Bill that there shall be no derogation from freedom of trade throughout the Commonwealth, what we mean is that it shall not be in the power of Judge or Parliament to sanction a derogation from it, and when we have a proposal which would allow us to sanction a derogation, from that freedom of trade at the will of the Parliament we are simply giving a negation in one part of our Constitution to the great principle which really lies at the bottom of it-that neither judicial nor parliamentary authority shall derogate from free exchange throughout the Commonwealth. If you tell me that there is any substantial difference between the position of a man who has a 6d. a pound bounty on his butter-I mean as related to the position of a similar producer in another colony-and the position of a man who has a 6d. a pound duty on his butter, I should like to have that difference explained in the attempt to convince me how it is that the one man does not have a substantial advantage over the other.

Mr. WISE. -
If you give a bounty on butter why not a bounty on boots?

Mr. BARTON. -
Of course. If this freedom of trade means anything, it means equality of trade, and it is not only in no degree concerned with, but is absolutely radically affected by, any provision in your Constitution which destroys that equality. Take the position of a state which is not so rich as another one. One state, under a provision of this kind, might be led to assist its producers almost to any conceivable extent, so long as that state was strong enough to have a preponderating influence in the Executive Government or the Parliament. What about the cost to the other state, which having similar industries to protect—and it is protection—has not the funds wherewith to protect them; and, therefore, has to stand, not only the ordinary impact of the monetary and populous influence of that state, but also the impact of its money being applied to a protection—and it is a protection—which the other state cannot enjoy?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You cannot trust the Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -
I trust the Parliament within the sphere of the legislative powers you give it, but I have never been an advocate of intrusting the Parliament with power to destroy a fundamental principle of this Constitution, and that is the answer to my right honorable friend. Trust the Parliament within its legislative powers and those legislative powers must first be within the Constitution; but plant a principle in your Constitution and then trust your Parliament to derogate from it and destroy it—never. That is a very fundamental difference. You might as well give power to the Parliament, without any consultation with the electors or any one else, and without prescribing an absolute majority, to undo every principle we have implanted in the Constitution.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It is so in the United States.

Mr. BARTON. -
My honorable friend comes in again with the United States. Have I not already pointed out that the United States Constitution is to us a lesson only so far as reason and experience have shown the value of its lesson? How can we say that, in communities situated as this one is, in colonies having gone through the processes of fiscal competition which these colonies have gone through, you are to intrust them, simply because you find that power existing somewhere else, with the power to undo the fiscal policy of the Commonwealth, so long as they can find an Executive Council or a Parliament complaisant enough to allow them to do it, or sufficiently terrorised by them and their power to be forced to do it?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Can you point to any injury done in the United States owing to the power of a state to give bounties?

Mr. BARTON. -

If we do trust the Federal Parliament, we should then trust it within the margin of its legislative powers, and if the honorable member and other members trust it within the measure of its legislative powers, then the right thing to do is to trust it to know as well when to protect an industry by an import tax as when it should protect it by a bounty. And if you are to ascribe to that Parliament, as you do by placing these powers to impose customs duties and excise duties in the Constitution, the power of balancing with the greatest nicety in regard to every one of your industries by the imposition of customs duties, and in the balancing of those duties of excise, if you concede to it power for that purpose, then it is a sorry and a curious distrust which will not concede to it the power to recognise a national industry by way of bounty. If it is to have the knowledge sufficient to enable it to know when a customs duty may be imposed, as to enable it to know when there should be a free-trade or protectionist policy-and that is the widest sphere you can possibly intrust to it-if you are going to trust it to know whether it should protect a particular industry by a customs duty so as to balance the protection it gives to that industry to some extent, or to the whole extent, by an excise duty, you impute to it then a knowledge which you deny to it of being able to deal in the same way by bounty with your industries as they can be dealt with by customs and excise. To say it can do one and not the other is in effect a contradiction of terms. Now, what is the position in matters of this sort? You place an import duty on a product. What is the object of it? I am not going to adopt the argument because I am a protectionist-of those who say that in placing that import duty on it you are taxing the whole community for the benefit of a particular industry. It seems to me that you are singling out-even if the industry exists only in one part of the Commonwealth-an industry of your Commonwealth, because you consider that the placing of an import duty on it is justifiable on the consideration that the state can recognise and support that industry as an entity within its bounds, that is to say, that the existence of the industry, wherever it exists, may be a matter worth while to study, to make some sacrifice for. That is precisely the principle which underlies the bounty. I cannot see how you can distinguish between a customs import duty and a bounty in relation to the object you have in view, which object must in either case be this—that the Commonwealth chooses to give a particular advantage to an industry for the good of the whole. If that is true with regard to a customs duty, it is true in regard to a bounty. If it is, eligible to the Commonwealth to back up a particular industry and say—"This industry is fitted for encouragement," then that is the first choice the Commonwealth makes, and it is only after it has decided that it is fitted for encouragement it will then decide that it is fitted for a customs duty or a bounty. So that, before the Commonwealth can exercise the powers which you have given to it for the purpose of putting on customs and excise duties, it will have exercised a judgment which will enable it to know whether the particular industry is better fitted for customs duties or a bounty.

Mr. SYMON. -
The customs and excise must be uniform throughout the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, and we provide that the bounties shall be uniform.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You may not have the funds.

Mr. BARTON. -
The right honorable gentleman suggests that the Commonwealth may not have the funds. I will come to that position. We propose to insert provisions in this Bill—and I understood from the debate on Thursday, Friday, and yesterday, that they were in a fair way of being carried—under which it is inevitable that the Commonwealth will have a large surplus. We are beset on all hands with arguments that there should be special treatment of certain states, because the ordinary share of the surplus will not be enough for them. Some of us were impressed with those arguments. But do they not point to the conclusion that the Commonwealth will have a surplus with which it can deal with these matters, whilst in some of the states there will probably not only be no surplus, but a necessity for further assistance. We provide in this Bill practically that the Commonwealth shall have a large surplus. Of course we do not tie the hands of the Commonwealth. But we know that any Tariff the Commonwealth is likely to impose, whether it is free-trade or protectionist, will be such as will, for the sake of the states, result in a considerable surplus. What then becomes of the argument that the Commonwealth might not have the money? Which is most likely to have the money, the Commonwealth or the state?
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

My argument is, that the Commonwealth might be unwilling to spend the money for the advantage of a particular state.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is to say, that the Commonwealth may be so conscientious in its desire to hand back to each state its share of the surplus that it will not spend a little money on an industry, but will leave it to the state to spend that money, I do not think that that will be the tendency of the Commonwealth, and it ought not to be. The Commonwealth must recognise its duty. If it adopts a free-trade policy it will have nothing to do with bounties or protective duties. If it adopts an external protectionist policy-and I hope it will-then in dealing with the question of customs duties on imports it must consider the question of whether a customs duty should be imposed, or whether a bounty should be granted instead of it. The difference is this, that when the Commonwealth grants a bounty it will grant it as uniform throughout the Commonwealth, whilst if the state grants a bounty it may do so quite independently of Commonwealth bounties, or of the effect it may have generally. In the latter case it may be granted in such a way as to result in the destruction by equalization of the fiscal policy of the Commonwealth in the one particular state. With every regard for the difficulties of others, and with every regard to the fact that we must recognise those difficulties, and must not deal in any thoughtless way with each other, I cannot but come to this conclusion—and I should not oppose this amendment so strongly unless I had come to this conclusion in an emphatic way—that this would, under certain conditions of Government and of Parliament, be a liberty to a state to undo, as far as it was particularly concerned, the policy of the Commonwealth, and in undoing it, whether that policy was free-trade or protectionist, to give itself an advantage over other states. The other states would then be practically placed in the same position as they were before intercolonial free-trade was established. That is not a position that I can look forward to with any satisfaction, and if a provision of this kind were inserted in the Bill it would largely affect my hope and confidence in the future of federation.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

As a South Australian I might, if I were to view this matter from a narrow provincial stand-point, be as anxious as the Right Hon. Sir George Turner to retain to the states the right of granting bounties. We have coal mines in South Australia which want developing, and time after time pressure has been brought to bear on candidates for Parliament to get a bounty granted or a protective duty imposed for the purpose. If we were to take up the position of Sir George Turner, it would only be on a complete...
misunderstanding of what we are seeking to do by federation. That point has been so admirably put by the Hon. Mr. Barton that I will not say anything in support of it. But I would like to call attention to the anomalous position in which we should be placed if we passed the amendment. If the Federal Executive consents to the granting by a state of a bounty, it will once and for ever have parted with the power to repeal what it has done. It will have given a power to the states that might completely destroy the effect of federal legislation. If the content is given by an Act of Parliament it will be held that it cannot be withdrawn. If a subsequent Act was passed withdrawing that consent, the court would, I think, hold that Act to be ultra vires, on the ground that a contract had been entered into. The only proper position the advocates of the bounty system could take up would be to say that this power should be concurrent. They do not say that. If it is a concurrent power, the objection taken by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest fails. His objection is that the Federal Parliament may not interfere, and he asks why should the negligence of the Federal Parliament put a ban on the power of the states to grant bounties. By making the power concurrent, the states could grant bounties until the Federal Parliament did interfere. The advocates of the bounty system do not assume that position. The position they are assuming will land us in the most extraordinary anomalies. Some honorable members have pointed to the analogy that exists under the American Constitution. They have not explained why the granting of bounties by the state is possible there. The idea of granting bounties could not have entered into the minds of those who framed the Constitution. There was no question then of bounties. What was sought was to destroy the obstacles to trade between the thirteen colonies, and to destroy the effect of the recent navigation laws of England. They never thought of granting bounties, and there is no provision in sub-section (1) of section 8 of the American Constitution giving Congress power to grant bounties at all. In consequence of that omission, which was the result of the peculiar circumstances of the time, the states have power to grant bounties.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Has it done any harm?

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is a matter of evidence. But what I want to point out is that the analogy does not apply. This is an attempt to derogate from the powers of the Federal Parliament to establish free-trade, and it is not a matter simply as between New South Wales and Victoria, as Sir George Turner has represented. It is just of as vital interest to us, and if we took up the attitude assumed by Sir George Turner it would be on a complete misunderstanding of the objects of this federation.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

A good deal has been said on the subject of state rights, and the argument has been brought forward for the express benefit of the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, in order to induce him to change his views on this question. I take it that the most important state right is the right of every state to manage its own affairs, so long as it does not interfere with the welfare of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID. -

You did not say that on the rivers question.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I did, and I shall be happy to repeat it, if we are called on to discuss the rivers question again. What is the position at present? It is proposed to take away absolutely from the states the right to grant bonuses, and to confer on the Federal Parliament the right to grant bonuses payable out of the revenue of the Commonwealth. In future there will be no power to provide for the granting of bonuses payable out of state revenue. There are, undoubtedly, in the various colonies industries which might well be encouraged by the granting of bonuses paid out of the state revenues. These industries are of a petty and provincial character, and would not affect the welfare of the Commonwealth as a whole; but, so far as the states themselves are concerned, they are worthy of encouragement, and have been successfully encouraged in the past by these aids which it is now sought to take away. The proposal is that when it is certified, either by the Federal Parliament or by the Federal Executive, that a bonus may be granted out of the state Treasury, that bonus may be so granted. We are told that the Federal Executive cannot be trusted, but I am inclined to think that the gloomy forebodings of honorable members in regard to matters of this kind are without foundation. If the Federal Executive is not to be trusted with these matters, how is it to be trusted with much larger matters of administration, which we have already remitted to it? Although I shall do my best to assist the Premier of Victoria in carrying the amendment in its largest form, I shall not reject it if it is amended by the excision of the words allowing a reference to the Federal Executive. It would then, of course, provide a smaller measure of relief, and be less beneficial in its results, than if it is accepted as a whole; but it must be remembered that the Constitution as it stands does not provide at all for the encouragement of state industries by the expenditure of state revenue. I welcome the amendment in its largest shape, but I trust that the right honorable member will not abandon it even if part is struck out. Something has been said about the experience of the United States of America. It has been well pointed out in the columns of a great journal that no prohibition of state bounties is imposed in the American Constitution, and the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) has suggested the reason for that. In the course of my reading I have not come across any criticisms suggesting that the American Constitution is defective upon this point. I trust that under circumstances such as these, when we have the history of so great a nation to guide us, we will not lightly take from the states beyond all hope of recovery the power which many infant colonies have exercised undoubtedly to the greatest advantage of their various industries. The last paragraph of the clause makes an exception in favour of bounties for the development of mining for certain metals; but let us consider what will be the position if the Bill is passed as it stands. We, in South Australia, have excellent copper mines. I can appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, upon this subject with the greatest confidence. We produce the best copper in the world, although, on the other hand, our coal mines are not quite so good. New South Wales has magnificent coal mines, but her copper—I say it almost with bated breath in the presence of the patriotic Premier of that colony—hardly equals ours.

Mr. REID. -

Yours is more easily converted into brass.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It would be competent for New South Wales to grant a bounty to protect her coal industry to an unlimited extent, but we in South Australia could do nothing of that kind to protect our copper industry.

Mr. WISE. -

I understand that since the late fire they want to develop the coal industry in Victoria for building purposes.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I leave my honorable friends in Victoria to speak upon that subject. I trust that we shall be guided in this matter by the history of other countries, and that we shall have regard to what we know of our own necessities. It is being forced upon up day after day that in many respects it is highly desirable to take infant industries under the special protection of the state. I grant that where these industries are of national concern they should be dealt with by the Federal Parliament, but there are others of less importance which may be made the subject of the benevolent care of the states themselves, and I trust that we shall hesitate before depriving the states of the power of fostering industries, which they have hitherto enjoyed and wisely exercised.
Mr. LEAKE (Western Australia). -

So exhaustive has been the debate upon this question that I should not have risen to speak had I not found myself in conflict with at least one of my colleagues.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

As leader of the Opposition you are usually in conflict with him.

Mr. LEAKE. -

I cannot help that; but we endeavour not to introduce local politics here. The arguments of the leader of the Convention seem to me to state the position exactly. When he declares, as he did in emphatic language, that the passing of an amendment would be a blow at the first principle of federation-intercolonial free-trade - it seems to me that no further argument is necessary for its rejection. Another argument of his was also impressive, and that was that the amendment would practically place the Parliament of the Commonwealth in the position of being able to over-ride the Constitution by its bare vote. I would go a step further, and suggest to the Convention that the amendment places the power of over-riding the Constitution, not only in the hands of the Federal Parliament, but also in the hands of the Federal Executive. It makes the Federal Executive paramount, and gives it power to approve of bounties which may be antagonistic to intercolonial free-trade. It is easy to speak at great length upon this subject, but I shall accept the suggestions of honorable members who have preceded me, and be brief. I express these opinions, not so much with the idea of influencing any vote, but to give my reasons for voting against the amendment.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I have a proviso, which I suggest with the concurrence of the Premier of Victoria, and which will, I think, take away all ground of objection from those who say that this is an attempt to interfere with freedom of trade between the different parts of the Commonwealth. In my opinion, the right honorable gentleman's amendment had no such scope; but "to make assurance doubly sure, and take a bond of fate," I beg to move -

That the amendment be amended by the addition of the following words: - "Provided that the bounty or aid has not the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different states of the Commonwealth."

Mr. HOWE. -

Who is to decide whether it derogates from freedom of trade?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The Federal Parliament or Federal Executive, before it allows the bounty, will have to go into the question whether it is an interference with trade or not. That is the way with all these questions. If it goes to the last resort the matter will have to be fought out, and in that case, very properly, the only judge is the Federal Court. You must have some ultimate authority, and the only means of ultimately trying these things is the Federal Court. I should be very happy if you could avoid that.

Mr. HOLDER. -

If you bring in the High Court it will kill the whole thing.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I am not bringing in the High Court. The High Court is there. It is the hinge upon which the Constitution turns. It faces you at the ultimate boundary of your Constitution. If you transgress the Constitution, or attempt to do so, there is the High Court in your way. The universal system in America is to have a question thrashed out in Congress, as to whether it is an evasion of the Constitution or not. It is very well fought out there, and in 99 out of 100 cases there is no need to appeal to the court. I answer the honorable member frankly when he asks me who is the ultimate judge. I may state, also, with regard to America that there seems to be some misapprehension. Mr Isaacs, yesterday, quoting from The Speaker, mentioned an instance of a bounty being given by a state. I was surprised at it. I cannot find any verification of the fact that a bounty is given by a state, but I find in the American Constitution that there is not one word about Congress giving bounties. There is a power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and duties of excise, which must be uniform throughout all the states, but there is no such clause as we have in this Bill that the Federal Parliament may grant bounties. If there is any authority on the matter, apparently it is by virtue of the section in Subjects of a local nature and intended only as aids to commerce, and which are best provided by special regulations, may be exercised by the states without conflicting with the commercial powers of Congress.

Although I say it with the reservation that I have not been able to verify the extract by a reference to the original authority, if that is a correct version there is not the least doubt that a state has power to grant bounties, provided the bounty does not interfere with the provision enabling the Federal Parliament to regulate trade and commerce. Therefore, with the concurrence, I understand, of the Premier of Victoria, I suggest the addition of the words I have mentioned. I admit that it will make the clause a little cumbersome, but I want to provide explicitly that there is no intention whatever on the part of my right honorable friend and ourselves to interfere in the least with trade and commerce. If that is not convincing enough, I know nothing that will convince. The honorable member (Mr. Leake) has been affected by the words of the leader of the Convention on this matter. He stated that that honorable member said that this will interfere with freedom of trade and commerce, and, ergo, we ought to refuse to pass it. This will not interfere, and it cannot interfere, with the freedom of trade and commerce.

Mr. HENRY. -

Might not a bounty be granted by the Governor-General in Council which would interfere with freedom of trade and commerce?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The honorable member has asked a very pertinent question. I frankly admit there is some force in the argument that the Governor-General in Council might strain the rule, unless he had the Federal Parliament behind him. But suppose the Governor-General in Council gave consent to a bounty which would have the effect of derogating from freedom of trade and commerce in the Commonwealth, he would be liable to be hauled over the coals in the House. He is liable to the ordinary responsibilities of a Minister. More than that, even if the whole House is with him, there is an ultimate sanction in the Federal Parliament, which will see that the law is observed.

Mr. HOWE. -

I understood Sir George Turner to say that he objected to referring the matter to the Federal Parliament on account of the great delay. Now, you propose it shall go to the High Court, which will cause greater delay.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The honorable member has totally misunderstood the position. I propose no court. I find the court there. I do not move it, I do not give it one more extra power; but the honorable member asked me who is to decide whether a bounty derogates from the freedom of trade and commerce, and I answered him as frankly as I knew how. I say, in the first place, the question will be settled by the Ministry of the day. Then it is to go through the ordeal of discussion in Parliament.

Mr. HOWE. -
It need not go to the Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
According to one suggestion, you must go to the Parliament, but in most cases, if there is any question of policy involved, the consent of the Governor-General in Council will be discussed in Parliament. It will be raised on motion in Parliament, and it will be a matter for the parliamentary majority to support him or not. Constitutionally, he will not give his consent unless he is in the majority.

Mr. REID. -
What will be the position if the Governor-General in Council approves and the Parliament disapproves?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I apprehend the effect will be that the Federal Parliament will be able to pass a law which will over-ride this particular grant.

Mr. REID. -
That is not the object of the amendment.

Mr. SYMON. -
Would not the effect of your amendment be to make the Federal High Court sit in judgment on an executive act of the Governor-General in Council?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
With all respect, no. The Governor-General in Council, as the honorable member knows as well as any one, has to obey the law as well as every one else.

Mr. SYMON. -
But suppose the Governor-General in Council grants the bonus, and suppose its operation derogates from freedom of trade, then the Federal High Court will sit in judgment on an act of the Governor-General in Council which involves a question of policy.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Does not the honorable member recognise that even the legislation of the Federal Parliament is subject to the decision of the Federal High Court?

Mr. SYMON. -
But not a question of executive administrative policy.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The Federal High Court goes still further than that. It has the function of deciding whether the Acts of the Parliament are valid or not, and why should it not have the function of deciding whether the acts of the Ministry are valid or not?

Mr. SYMON. -

That was not the intention in determining the functions of the Federal High Court.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Our British system is that every official under Her Majesty is amenable to the law—that everybody is under the law.

Mr. SYMON. -

But this is a question of Ministerial responsibility.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Of course it is; but supposing the Ministry were to consent to a bonus or bounty which interfered with freedom of trade, then the Federal High Court could be asked to interfere, and it therefore has the ultimate decision of the matter. If the court decided against a bonus or bounty, I rather think that the money would have to be refunded.

Mr. SYMON. -

Supposing the House of Representatives approves of the action of the Ministry, and the Federal High Court dissents?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Well, as the Federal High Court has to determine, in case of dispute, whether the Acts of the Parliament are wrong, so the court has to decide whether the acts of the Ministry are wrong. All this bringing in of the Federal High Court—I do not say in the mind of the honorable member, but in the minds of several honorable members—is with a view to make this particular proposal unpopular. I do not want to drag in the Federal High Court.

Mr. SYMON. -

But can you help it?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I say that, in 99 out of 100 cases, the Federal High Court, will not be appealed to; but if you ask me what body is to have the ultimate determination of the matter, I say the Federal High Court must be that body.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

In order to bring the debate to a prompt issue, I will move an amendment of Sir George Turner’s amendment, which will have the effect of testing the feeling of the Convention on this matter. I beg to move—

That the words "of the Governor-General in council or" be struck out.
I think that a large majority will be in favour of striking out those words, but I do not venture to predict how the vote will go on the question of allowing state bonuses with the consent of the Federal Parliament. I listened with very great attention and respect to the words that fell from the leader of the Convention, a gentleman whom we all regard not only as our leader in this Convention, but as our "guide, philosopher, and friend" in things generally. Mr. Barton not only spoke strongly, but he said he felt strongly on the matter. Still, I think he rather overstated his case, because one of his contentions was that the amendment of Sir George Turner would give power to a state to absolutely override the settled fiscal policy of the Federal Parliament. Now, how can that be, when the state cannot move in the matter without the consent of the Federal Parliament?

Mr. ISAACS. -

And when its action may be afterwards annulled by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Under the amendment, as I read it, you cannot take a step without the consent of the Federal Parliament. It must be borne in mind that we have got away from the amendment in which honorable members representing Victoria sought to give to the states the right to grant bonuses, subject to those bonuses being annulled by the Federal Parliament and under the present amendment a state cannot take a single step in the direction of granting a bonus without the consent of the Federal Parliament. Therefore I do not quite foresee—possibly it may be owing to my ignorance of federal principles—all the evils which Mr. Barton predicted as likely to follow the adoption of this amendment. And just as he feels warmly on the subject, so do our friends from Victoria. I do not say that I, as a representative of Tasmania, feel very warmly about it, because, although I am intensely interested in the development of this attempt to employ state aid in furthering production, I must say that I regard the granting of bonuses as an injustice. I submit that if you grant a bonus to one industry, every industry in the country has a right to expect the same thing, and I am of opinion that the granting of a bonus to any particular industry is an injustice to all the tax-payers of the colony. I would say, in answer to Dr. Cockburn, if you want to achieve industrial greatness under the Federal Government you will do it far more by rearing your industries under natural laws than by creating hothouse plants. I hardly think that the words suggested by Mr. Higgins are wanted. I quite see the reason he has proposed them, but we ought not to make a foolish provision of one of the clauses of this Constitution Bill in order to please people outside. I regard the words suggested by Mr. Higgins as absolute surplusage, and I think their adoption would be a blot upon the clause. However, I do not intend to move any amendment on those words, although, as I have said, I think they will be a blot on the drafting of the clause if they are allowed to be put in.

Question - That the words "of the Governor-General in Council or" proposed to be struck out stand part of the proposed new paragraph-put.

The CHAIRMAN. -
We have now to deal with the proviso. The question is that the words proposed to be added be so added.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

If ever there was a question upon which we ought to give our votes clearly understanding what we do, and upon which it is important that there should be no false votes given, it is this. Mr. Higgins' amendment, although I appreciate the spirit in which it is moved, appears to me to be eminently one which is calculated to mislead the public. We ought to face this question fairly. If we wish that the state should retain the power to give bonuses, let us honestly provide that that power shall be given; but if, on the other hand, we desire that in the interests of federation the power to give bonuses shall be confined to the Federal Parliament, let us vote with equal fairness on that side. The amendment of my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Higgins) obscures the issue. It will mislead a number of people outside, making them believe that they are going to get something which, in fact, they will never obtain.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is not intended for that purpose.

Mr. WISE. -

I know that; but to say that it is left for the Federal Court to determine whether the bonus which may be granted by the state may be sanctioned by the Executive of the Commonwealth is not only derogatory to the trade and commerce clause, but, as a matter of fact, no bonus will be granted upon which any body of capitalists would ever think of acting. You cannot expect that men will invest their money in an enterprise stimulated by a bonus which is subject to such conditions as these. You are telling the people that you are going to retain power to grant bonuses, whereas, if we think the matter out, every one of us will know that the power is utterly nugatory, because it is so hedged round by conditions that no man would think of spending a single sixpence in any enterprise for which a bonus so limited was to be given. I protest against this Convention demeaning itself by giving a vote upon a question of this kind. Let us face the matter fairly. I, for one, am perfectly prepared to vote against every effort to give the power to grant bonuses to the states. There are others who take a different view of the question. I do not believe in carrying the practice of putting conciliatory provisions in the Constitution too far. We may, and ought to, regard the prejudices of people outside, and we should go very far in order to recommend the Constitution to those who are supposed at present to be opposed to federation, by meeting their views in so far as we can possibly do so. But we may go too far in that respect, and we ought not, so it seems to me, to adopt any clause which we cannot ourselves honestly support, because by putting it in the Constitution we think it may go a long way towards recommending the Constitution to people who might otherwise vote against it. If we put in this Constitution provisions of which we do not approve, how can we recommend it to the people? We must trust somewhat to the intelligence of those outside. We must hope that they will say we have done our best to reconcile conflicting interests in the several colonies. But we must also recognise that there are people whom we can never reconcile, do what we may, and with regard to whom, if we remove one of their objections to federation, a hundred others will at once crop up. We must have the extremists against us. Let us meet these extremists openly. We shall have the extreme protectionist, who wants to keep to each state the right to impose protective duties. Let him be against us. Then we shall have against us the extreme free-trader, who will oppose federation because he fears that under it a protective Tariff will be imposed. Let him be against us. But do not attempt to reconcile these people by inserting a clause which will not solve, but which I fear will be found in the future to be only a witness to our own fear of facing, a difficult question.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
I should like to say that the tactics which have been employed by some honorable members during the last division-

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I rise to order. I wish to know whether we are to have a general lecture on the conduct of honorable members of the Convention in a division which is over?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It is deserved, though.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I do not think it will conduce to the benefit of the cause we are assembled here to promote for an honorable member to make remarks on the conduct of other members.

Mr. PEACOCK (Victoria). -
The only thing I should desire to say-

Mr. REID. -
Is it in order?

Mr. PEACOCK. -
I am speaking to the clause. I only desire to say a few words, and I shall speak with as little feeling as possible. I hope the public outside will take careful note of the last two divisions. I can quite understand-

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I rise to order.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
It is in order.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
The honorable gentleman must be very much frightened if he cannot stand any strictures on his conduct.

Mr. REID. -
I am not a bit afraid, it is rather the opposite; I have a bit of laurel round my brow.

The CHAIRMAN. -
What is the points of order?

Mr. REID. -

The honorable member (Mr. Peacock) is engaged in criticising the divisions of this committee, and I submit that we are not subject to that criticism at this stage.

The CHAIRMAN. -

No honorable member can animadvert on a vote given by the committee, or say that that vote is wrong unless he moves to repeal it, which he may do at the proper time.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Do I understand from your ruling, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot make any remarks with regard to the clause?

The CHAIRMAN. -

The honorable member is in order in making any remarks with regard to the clause.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

I am sorry that there is no opportunity afforded to me or to any other honorable member who holds views similar to my own of debating the question except by moving that the clause be recommitted. I can understand the position taken up by those who are opposed to state bounties, and also by those who consistently said that the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's amendment was wrong in principle. I cannot understand the position of those honorable members who believe that it is neither right for the Governor-General in Council nor for the Federal Parliament to deal with the matter, but who voted for the Governor-General in Council with the object of defeating the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The honorable member is not in order in stating why honorable members voted as they did.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

If any explanation is needed, all I can say is that I cannot understand why the honorable member takes such a strong objection to my action in voting with him.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

We heard the whispering that was going on.

Mr. BARTON. -

I thought it was a law of Parliament that only one person could hold possession of the Chair at once. The Right Hon. Mr. Reid, the Hon. Mr. O'Connor, myself, and other gentlemen voted to retain Sir George Turner's proposition as he made it himself, and I understood that he expressed a preference for it in that form.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
He said he would not have it otherwise.

Mr. BARTON. -
We voted to retain the proposition, and then we negatived it.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
That is making the matter worse.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Is the honorable member in order?

Mr. BARTON. -
I have finished upon that point. With regard to Mr. Peacock's last remark, I cannot understand why it is dishonorable or improper tactics to accept a challenge that is thrown out by an opponent, to take him at his word, and to, defeat his proposition, as we very properly did.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -
I do not understand that there is an opposition here, or any opponents on one side or another. We are all here for the purpose of doing what we conceive to be the beat in the interests of this Constitution. I think we have a right to object when anything in the shape of tactics is adopted.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I rise to order. I wish to know whether even the most exalted personage in this Convention is to be allowed to transgress a rule you have made I The right honorable gentleman is evidently referring to a recent vote, and I shall certainly have to claim a right to reply to these remarks.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We should like to hear the justification.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The question before the Chair is that the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill. I have already ruled that it is not in order to refer to the motives which actuated honorable members in voting on former divisions. I must ask the right honorable member and other honorable members not to transgress that rule.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Mr. Chairman, I bow most cheerfully to your decision, but I do trust that if we adopt the clause as it stands an early opportunity will be afforded to us of ascertaining what really is the wish of the majority of the committee on the question of whether the Federal Parliament should have power to authorize the state Legislatures to grant bonuses. I do not think, owing to an unfortunate combination of circumstances

Mr. ISAACS. -
Of what?

Mr. KINGSTON. - Of circumstances

Mr. ISAACS. - Oh!

Mr. KINGSTON. - That that opportunity has hitherto been afforded.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). - I also hope that, in future, in dealing with this matter there will be no possible cause for even, these irregular observations. The Right Hon. Sir George Turner and his friends could have voted the other way, and have saved their position, but they chose to stay with us.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). - I hope no early opportunity will be given of entering into a matter which seems to produce so much irritation to honorable members opposite.

Mr. PEACOCK. - Justly so, and you know it, too.

Mr. SYMON. - That is a matter of opinion, and, of course, I do not want to add to the irritation which they exhibit by expressing a difference of opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. - The question is, that this clause stand part of the Bill, and it is altogether irregular and out of order to discuss the point of whether or not, at some future stage, we will reconsider the clause.

Mr. SYMON. - The one sentence which I uttered, and in which I was interrupted, was as to whether the clause should stand, and as to whether some early opportunity should be given of reconsidering it. I hope that no such early opportunity will be given or taken, but that the clause will be allowed to stand, with the consent of the honorable members representing Victoria. My right honorable friend stated this morning that if the provision with regard to the Executive Council were struck out, he would himself have voted against the clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). - I do not intend to impute motives to any honorable member, no matter what I may think, but with regard to the clause as it now stands, I feel somewhat inclined to vote against it altogether. We have dealt to-day many severe blows at the federal cause.

Mr. SYMON. - Oh, no.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.
And I believe we have only lately dealt the most severe blow to the federal cause that has been given to it since we first met in Adelaide.

Mr. REID. -

This must be the stock tax.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It is not the stock tax. Perhaps if I added a little bit to that tax I might describe the right honorable gentleman and something that has happened here lately. I do not intend to do that, because I should be out of order. My difficulty—and I desire to consider the question as carefully as I can—is whether I am now justified in the interests of federation in voting for the clause at all. We give the Federal Executive power to deal with many matters. I am quite satisfied that it should have exclusive power to deal with customs and excise, but I am quite satisfied also that we should give to nobody exclusive power to deal with bounties. Whilst this clause contains much that is good, it contains something that is very bad. The doubt in my mind is whether what is bad in the clause does not more than counterbalance what is good. I do regret that the clause stands as it is at the present time, and I hope yet to have an opportunity before the Convention closes its labours of reconsidering it. That is about the only ground on which I will vote for it—that we will have another opportunity, when we will be able to get a fair and straight vote, and to show the people in this colony, at all events, that we are prepared to protect their interests to some little extent.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In order that the paragraph omitted from clause 84 may stand as a substantive clause, I beg to move—

That the following words stand as a clause of the Bill—

On the establishment of the Commonwealth, the collection and control of duties of customs and of excise, and the control of the payment of bounties, shall pass to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth.

Mr. GORDON. -

I thought that the new clauses were to be taken after we had dealt with the clauses which are to be reconsidered.

The CHAIRMAN. -

We are now dealing with the whole system of finance and adopting a new scheme, and, if we did not take the new clauses suggested by the Finance Committee as they come, we could not do that.

Mr. GORDON. -

I have no objection, so long as honorable members who, like myself, have new clauses to move, are assured that other new clauses will not be taken until the proper time comes.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I might explain that this is not a new clause; it is merely a transposition of part of clause 84, which it was thought by the Finance Committee should occupy a place in front of the other provisions of that clause.

The new clause was agreed to.

Clause 85. - Upon the establishment of the Commonwealth, all officers employed by the Government of any state in any department of the public service the control of which is by this Constitution assigned to the Commonwealth, shall become subject to the control of the Executive Government of the Commonwealth; and thereupon any such officer shall, if he is not retained in the service of the Commonwealth, be entitled to receive from the state any gratuity or other compensation payable under the law of the state on abolition of his office; but if he is retained in the service of the Commonwealth he shall be entitled to retire from office at the time and upon the pension or retiring allowance permitted and provided by the law of the state on such retirement, and the pension or retiring allowance shall be paid by the state and by the Commonwealth respectively in the proportion which his service with the state bears to the whole term of his service, and all existing and accruing rights of any officers so retained in the service of the Commonwealth shall be preserved.

Amendment suggested by the Parliament of Tasmania-
After "state" (line 3), insert "or by any authority constituted by a state."

The amendment was negatived.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia-
Line 10, after "Commonwealth" insert "and unless he is appointed to some other office in the, state."

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

The reason why the amendment was suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia was that it was considered that it might be a hardship to retire an officer upon a pension when there was some other office in the state which he could reasonably fill.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not quite follow the reason for this amendment.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

Under the clause as it stands the Commonwealth may either take a man into its service or leave him out. If he is left out, the state must pay him a pension.

Mr. BARTON. -

The unfortunate result of the amendment would be that if an officer were receiving a salary of £500 or £600 a year the state, instead of pensioning him if his services were no longer required, could save money by appointing him to an office worth £50 a year.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

To meet the case, I beg to move-

That the amendment be amended by the insertion of the words "of equal emolument" after the word "office."

The amendment was amended accordingly, and agreed to.

Amendment suggested by the Parliament of Tasmania:--
Line 20, add "a" to "proportion."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I will ask the committee to keep the clause as it stands, because I have an amendment prepared which, I think, will meet the whole case. I propose to make the clause read in this way:-

If he is retained in the service of the Commonwealth all his existing or accruing rights shall be preserved, and he shall be entitled to retire from office at the time and upon the pension or retiring allowance permitted and provided by the law of the state on such retirement, and the pension or retiring allowance shall be paid by the state and by the Commonwealth respectively in the proportion which his service to the state bears to his service with the Commonwealth.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Is there not some ambiguity about these words:-

If he is retained in the service of the Commonwealth he shall be entitled to retire from office at the time and upon the pension or retiring allowance permitted and provided by the law of the state on such retirement?

To what time does the clause refer? The date of the establishment of the Commonwealth, or the date of the actual retirement?

Mr. BARTON. -

An officer will be entitled to complete his service up to the time at which, under the law of the state, he would be entitled to retire.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The law of the state might be changed in the meantime. The point is, is an officer to be entitled to retire upon the compensation to which he is entitled at law at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not think a law passed to affect an existing state of things in that way would be given an ex post facto operation.
Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I should like to point out to the leader that the amendment suggested by Western Australia, which in similar to that suggested by Tasmania, is intended to provide for this difficulty. An officer formerly employed by the state may enter the service of the Commonwealth, and during a long period when he is in the service of the state his salary might be only, say, £200 a year. Many years after he enters the service of the Commonwealth he may attain to a salary of £1,000 a year. Under this clause a portion of his pension based on £1,000 a year would be charged to the Commonwealth and the state, according to the proportion of his services in each. It will be seen that the state will then be burdened with a much larger portion of the pension than ought to be the case. That has occurred in our own colony. Therefore, I think it would be well to insert the words proposed by the Western Australian Assembly, which are to the effect that in calculating such pension or retiring allowance the proportion payable by the state shall be calculated on the salary at the time he was transferred to the Commonwealth, and the balance, whatever it may be, shall be paid by the Commonwealth. Otherwise, it will be seen that the state might be charged with a very large amount of pension for which it had received no services. I drafted the words of the amendment by our Assembly myself, and I believe they will entirely carry out the object in view. I hope they will commend themselves to honorable members, and particularly to our leader.

Mr. LYNE. -

Do I understand the honorable member to mean that up to the retirement of the officer from the service of the state, the state must be responsible for the pension or retiring allowance which has been incurred up to that time?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Yes.

Mr. REID. -

Suppose the Commonwealth does not establish a system of pensions at all

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Then the state is only liable for the time during which the officer has been in its service.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is provided for in the clause.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Has the honorable member followed me with regard to the rest of my statement?
Mr. BARTON. -

Yes.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It is an important matter, and a case of the kind has occurred in our own colony, where it was sought to put a burden on Western Australia for services at a much higher salary which were rendered years afterwards.

The amendment to strike out "proportion" and insert "proportions" was negatived.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am prepared to pass the clause as it stands, and to consider the amendments which have been mentioned in the Drafting Committee.

Amendment suggested by the Council and Assembly of Tasmania-

After "state" insert "and his service with the Commonwealth."

The amendment was negatived.

Amendment suggested by the Western Australian Assembly-

After "service" insert "and in calculating such pension or retiring allowance the proportion payable by the state shall be calculated upon the salary paid to the officer at the time of his transfer to the Commonwealth."

The amendment was negatived.

Amendment suggested by the South Australian Council-

At end of clause add "No pension or retiring allowance shall be payable to any servant of the Commonwealth who is not entitled to such pension or retiring allowance under the law of the state from which he has been transferred."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

This raises a large question of policy. When first looked at, it might appear to be only a provision in the nature of drafting, but it is really imposing a serious trammel upon the Commonwealth. It is a question of policy whether or not pensions should be granted. We had a strong argument the other day upon a question of policy as to whether or not old-age pensions should be granted. It was strongly urged that there should be a power of granting old-age pensions. That was rejected on the argument that it was a matter not for the Commonwealth to deal with, but for the several states in connexion with their social and domestic policy. But the question as to how you should deal with the public officers of the Commonwealth is purely a question for the Commonwealth itself. It stands in a very different position, because, unless the Commonwealth provides for pensions for its own servants, there is no other power on earth to do so. I am not standing here to argue that there ought to be pensions for the servants of the Commonwealth, or that there ought not to be. It seems to me very extraordinary if we cannot say that those who come after us, who will be the electors of the Commonwealth, will be perfectly competent persons, just as competent as we are, to decide what shall be the policy of the Commonwealth in this matter. It would be departing from our ordinary principle in dealing with this measure if we were to give all these wide powers of legislation to the Commonwealth, and then turn round and say that the Commonwealth shall not deal with any question of pensions for its servants.

Mr. GORDON. -

By the clause as it stands you are binding the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON. -

You are to a certain extent, for this reason, that if you do not give power to the Commonwealth in this matter, they will have no power at all to do justice. What is sought by the amendment is to deprive the Commonwealth of any power of dealing with this subject, when under its general powers it will have the duty of dealing with its public servants; will have the control of departments, and the power of legislating with respect to those departments; and under another provision in the Bill it would be able to deal with everything incidental to the carrying out of its powers. It would, therefore, be entitled to deal with this question of pensions. It need not legislate unless it liked. That is the proper position. Give these powers of administration and legislation, and leave the Commonwealth a free hand to legislate as may be necessary in relation to those powers. But this amendment goes back on our tracks and asks us to do what would be entirely contrary to the policy of the Bill. If we carry this amendment we will simply be saying that the Commonwealth shall not be allowed to determine whether there shall or shall not be pensions. On that ground I object very strongly to the amendment.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I would direct the serious attention of the leader to the point as to whether this clause would not force a system of pensions on the Commonwealth in respect to officers taken over. My reason for doing so is in the interests of the officers themselves. It might happen that, in the first Commonwealth Parliament, there will be members who have a very strong feeling of opposition to pensions, and the necessity of taking over a pension system might militate very much against the unfortunate officers who happen to be in the employment of the states. The feeling might be so strong that the Commonwealth Government might start with officers of its own. I should not like the Constitution to be passed in such a way that those officers might perhaps be put in that position, whereby their prospects would be imperilled owing to the necessity of giving them pensions if taken into the service of the Commonwealth. I know that in some quarters of Australia there is a strong, perhaps a growing, feeling against pensions.

Mr. GORDON. -

We have not got one pension in South Australia.

Mr. REID. -

No. As the result of that strong feeling, these officers may perhaps be put in a very unfortunate position. They might not be employed by the Commonwealth, if employing them compelled the Commonwealth to recognise the pension system.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It would be hard on the states, too.

Mr. REID. -

In redrafting the clause that point should be considered, for I am afraid that it might work against some of those officers, especially the older officers, who might not be taken over by the Commonwealth in view of the pensions accruing to them.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

When this clause was considered in Adelaide I was strongly against the policy of the whole provision. It certainly does, to a large extent, bind the Commonwealth to a line of policy. It would be perfectly proper to allow the Commonwealth to grant pensions, if it so pleases, but this clause, which binds the Commonwealth to grant pensions that are now accruing in various colonies, will lead to a most undesirable state of things. All our Post-office officials in South Australia, who are not to get pensions, will be doing the same work as officers of the corresponding departments in other colonies who are to get pensions. Now, I think that the Commonwealth ought to be allowed to start with a clean sheet as regards pensions, and that each state ought to commute the pensions of its officers who are transferred to the Commonwealth, so that the Commonwealth may take over those officers clear of all liabilities. Then the state will assume the liabilities it has undertaken, and the Commonwealth may grant pensions or not, as, in its wisdom, it thinks fit. Why should officers of our post office, or our Defence department, from the Commandant downwards, and officers of all the departments that will be transferred to the Commonwealth, be required, although getting no pensions or retiring allowances, to do the same work, for the same or perhaps less remuneration as officers of the same classes in other colonies who are to get pensions and retiring allowances? I venture to submit that such a policy would lead to a most undesirable state of things—that it would create a great deal of dissatisfaction, jealousy, and confusion, because the Commonwealth will have to take over five different policies of as many different colonies in regard to their public servants, or, at any rate, as many as enter the Federation, and the Commonwealth will thus have a complex and mixed service with respect to pensions and retiring allowances, which would be most undesirable.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Because one man gets a pension which he is entitled to, what has that got to do with another man who is not entitled to a pension?

Mr. GORDON. -
The honorable member would not like to be working without a pension side by side with a man who was doing the same work and was entitled to a pension.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
If the officer who has a pension accruing is only paid compensation in respect thereof up to the time of his transfer to the Commonwealth, what objection can you have?

Mr. GORDON. -
That would be perfectly correct, but this clause makes no such provision.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
But I understand there is to be a redrafting of the clause on those lines.

Mr. GORDON. -
If so, I shall then be willing to support it. If not, and if the clause is allowed to remain practically as it stands, I shall vote against it.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I would like to point out to Mr. Gordon that if we wish to understand this clause we must go back to the object of it. Its object is not to confer pensions, but to set right the gross injustice which must accrue to the servants of the several states who join the Commonwealth, which will take over their services, and will thereby put an end to their services with the states. No doubt in taking over those servants of the states, it will be very much to the interests of the Commonwealth, in most cases, to continue their services, because those servants know the work of their respective departments, and their knowledge and experience will be of inestimable value to the Commonwealth in the early stages of its existence. Therefore, it will be for the benefit of the Commonwealth in most cases that the services of those men should be taken over. Now, the Commonwealth, in dealing with those men, might have to face a different condition of things in each of the colonies. In some of the colonies the officers receive pensions, but in others they do not. The only reason why compensation, in the nature of a pension, is to be given is this: A man serving the Government in South Australia, where there are no pensions to public servants, has no right to a pension, either accrued or accruing; therefore, in taking him over, the Commonwealth puts him in no different condition. By breaking his service with the state, the Commonwealth takes away no right from him. But another man who is serving the Government of another colony under conditions which give him the right to a pension, is put in this position, that he cannot refuse to accept service with the Commonwealth, and as the time at which he has a right to a pension has not actually accrued, he cannot demand anything from the state. If the Commonwealth takes possession of the department in which he is employed, and thus prevents his pension right from accruing, it is only common justice, under those circumstances, that his case should be considered, and if the Commonwealth takes over his services, not for his benefit, but for its own advantage, he certainly should not lose his right to a pension. That is the reason why—as those two classes of public servants exist—we must treat them differently. In the one case, where there is no pension accrued or accruing, the officer taken over by the Commonwealth loses no right, and therefore there is no necessity for compensation; in the other case, where there is a pension right accruing, you take away that right, and therefore the officer should be pensioned, always remembering that these officers are taken over, not in their own interests, but in the interests of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID. - But this question ought to be considered: In some of the colonies the public servants pay so much per cent. of their salaries into a pension fund. Now, in those cases this awkwardness will arise—are they to get from the Commonwealth their full pension rights without the liability to further contribute anything to a pension fund?

Mr. OCONNOR. - The Commonwealth will have to settle for itself what compensation it will give them.

Mr. GORDON. - This clause fixes it.

Mr. OCONNOR. - Of course it must be calculated on the basis of the pensions to which the officers in question are entitled under the laws of the states. With respect to the question put by Mr. Reid, I presume there will be no more difficulty in ascertaining the proportion which the Commonwealth will have to pay than the state would have in ascertaining the same proportion if the state wished to pay the officer his pension. In some cases the amount of the contribution would have to be deducted. Where the public servants pay into a fund, the percentage payment is deducted from their salaries.

Mr. REID. -

The clause, as drafted, gives officers who have previously contributed to a pension fund the right to a pension from the Commonwealth, after they are taken over, without the liability to contribute anything for the remainder of their service. That is a point to be considered.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

As a matter of fact, they have already contributed up to the point at which they have been taken over by the Commonwealth. However, that is a detail which it seems to me it would be quite impossible to provide for in the Constitution, but I think that in dealing with these officers, whose rights are taken away through no fault of their own, we can well afford to treat them not only fairly but generously; and although there may be a case which possibly does not come under this provision, I think that, in the great operation of taking over the whole of these departments and their officers with them, that is a matter which need not cause trouble either to the states or to the Commonwealth. I think, therefore, that it is rather misleading to suppose that this is a matter dealing with pensions or establishing a system of pensions in any way. It is simply a matter of fair compensation to officers who have been deprived of their rights through no fault of their own.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I think this matter can be looked at from three points of view. There is, first of all, the point of view of the civil servants who may be taken over by the Commonwealth; secondly, there is the point of view of the state; and, thirdly, the point of view of the Commonwealth. We shall not properly understand the matter unless we look at it from all these points of view. From the point of view of the civil servant, I suppose we shall agree that he should have all his rights preserved to him. Though we have no pension list in South Australia, we have a retiring allowance, which is to be paid to certain officers on their retirement from the service; and if any officers were taken over from the South Australian service, as undoubtedly many would be, they would be taken over with any rights which they possess to-day; or if taken over from any of the other colonies, as undoubtedly would be the case, they would be taken over with all their rights. That disposes of the matter from the point of view of the civil servants. To do less than that would be to do them a gross injustice, which this Convention, I am sure, would never for one moment contemplate. From the point of view of the state, if the suggestion of Mr. Gordon were adopted, that on the service of officers with the state ending, and their being taken over by the Commonwealth, the state should commute any right to retiring allowance possessed by the servants so taken over, that would involve a very heavy burden being cast suddenly upon the states.

Mr. GORDON. -

Not upon South Australia.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Yes; upon South Australia. There would be in each colony some hundreds, if not thousands, of officers taken over, and I am sure that in South Australia if, in entering into the Commonwealth, the Treasurer had to find retiring allowances to be paid to several thousands of men, he would have to raise a very large sum of money somewhere.

Mr. GORDON. -

Nothing like the amount you contemplate.

Mr. HOLDER. -

But I know perfectly well what I am speaking about.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The money would not become due till the service terminated.

Mr. HOLDER. -

But under Mr. Gordon's proposal it would become due upon the officers becoming officers of the Commonwealth. And it is to be remembered that many of the officers taken over would be heads of departments, such as the heads of the Customs department, naval and military officers, and the heads of the Post and Telegraph department.

Mr. GORDON. -

There would not be much due to Defence officers and officers in the Post and Telegraph department in South Australia.

Mr. HOLDER. -

But in the other colonies there are very large sums due and, to refer again to South Australia for a moment, there is one officer at the head of the Postal department to whom a very large sum is due, and another at the head of the Customs department. Altogether a large amount—many thousands of pounds—is due in South Australia, and a great many thousands more in the aggregate in the other states. I do not think it would be a fair thing, from a state point of view, to suddenly make a call upon the states for these moneys. Nor do I see why they should commute pensions. They have a right to the services of these officers so long as they choose to retain them, which in many cases would be for a number of years, and the officers would be able to do good work for the money which they would get. Why, then, should a state be called upon to commute pensions which would not become due in the ordinary course of things for many years, and then only in return for further years of service? I do not think it would be fair to make a commutation of these pension claims a condition precedent to the officers being taken over by the federal authority. I agree with the proposition that there should be no policy of pensions under the Commonwealth. We have managed to get rid of the pension system in South Australia, and I think the Federation would be unwise if it adopted a system involving a heavy pension list.

I think it is an unlikely thing that it would do so.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I think so, too, but we should leave the federal authority free, either to keep clear of pensions, or to adopt the pension system, if it choose to take what appears to me to be an unwise course. Concerning these officers taken over, I see no injustice at all. Why should an officer feel that he is hardly dealt with if he retains the rights he previously had without any addition or subtraction? Why should any of those taken over from South Australia feel it a hardship to have to work beside officers taken over from some other colony, so long as they are allowed to maintain their right undiminished and unincreased?

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is the same in the states now. We have officers who are entitled to pensions working beside officers who are not.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Quite so. I hope the clause will not be materially altered. I rise to protest against it being altered in the direction of casting on the states a heavy cash obligation, which I do not think they should be called upon to meet.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

One very small point remains to be made. The provisions of this clause relate only to those officers of the Commonwealth who become officers of the Commonwealth consequent upon their departments being taken over. But it may also be the desire of the Commonwealth, in connexion with some of its new organizations, or in regard to its parliamentary machinery, to obtain the assistance of men of experience in the states. Now, no provision is here made for the protection of the rights of such officers whose service the Commonwealth may desire to acquire.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is a different case.
Mr. ISAACS. -
They are not compulsorily taken over.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
But it may be worth the consideration of the Drafting Committee.

Mr. BARTON. -
It seems to be rather a matter of policy.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It is, but it is likely to relate to some men who may be among the chief officers of the Commonwealth, and who may be taken over in connexion with certain departments. There are in our different services officers who have held high offices in certain departments, and have been transferred to some other departments.

Mr. BARTON. -
You are alluding to officers who may be taken over on the transfer of departments?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Exactly. - The other cases are those as to which the Commonwealth has to make new departments, and it may choose to administer those departments by means of officers taken over from the civil services of the other colonies. There is no provision for protection for the officers who may be so appointed, who may be willing to be taken over, and whom their states may be willing to spare. There should be compensation made to them for the sacrifice of their existing rights.

Mr. BARTON. -
The Commonwealth can make such terms as it sees fit.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Undoubtedly; but if a particular officer be an officer of some years' standing, as he may be-

Mr. BARTON. -
If he have pension rights, the Commonwealth would have to take notice of them as a matter of justice.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
The question is whether the state should be able to escape all its obligations, and whether the Commonwealth is to assume them all.

Mr. BARTON. -
I will consider the point.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
That is what I desire.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
The idea that permeates the amendment suggested by Western Australia is whether the state should have power, in case the Commonwealth does not take over certain officers, to retain their services in some other departments, instead of necessarily paying compensation. But I would like to draw the attention of Mr. Barton to the position of these words in the clause. I think the words ought to be placed somewhere else, because, as they stand now, it seems to me, on consideration, that the Commonwealth would not have the power to take over the officer if the state chose to retain him.

Mr. BARTON. -

They are struck out.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, they are inserted. Unless he is appointed to some other office, the Commonwealth may take over his services. The idea is right, but the provision is clearly in the wrong place. I am not quite clear about the compensation which the officer is entitled to receive if he is not retained by the Commonwealth or the state. What he is entitled to get is the compensation payable under the law of the state on abolition of his office. I am not acquainted with the laws of the various colonies. There are cases where an officer is entitled to compensation on the abolition of his office. But there may be cases where an officer is not entitled to compensation on the abolition of his office, but has an inchoate right to go on and earn his pension in a few years more. I think it is a matter deserving of our consideration, whether there may not be many cases of officers who will be deprived of their present right to compensation because it does not happen to be compensation merely on abolition of office.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

86. All lands, buildings, works, vessels, materials, and things necessarily appertaining to, or used in connexion with, any department of the public service, the control of which is by this Constitution transferred to the Commonwealth, shall, from the establishment of the Commonwealth, be taken over by and vest in the Commonwealth, either absolutely, or, in the case of the departments controlling customs and excise and bounties, for such time as may be necessary.

The fair value thereof, or of the use thereof, as the case may be, shall be paid by the Commonwealth to the state from which they are taken over. Such value shall be ascertained by mutual agreement, or, if no agreement can be made, in the manner in which the value of land, or of an interest in land, taken by the Government of the state for the like public purposes is ascertained under the laws of the state at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Western
After the word "used" (line 3) insert the word "exclusively."

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

In Western Australia, and, I suppose, in the other colonies, there are departments—for instance, the Post-office department—to be taken over which occupy only a portion of the public buildings. It might not be in the interests of the state, and the state might not desire to part with a big block of public buildings. Therefore we propose that, unless the building is exclusively used for a purpose taken over by the Commonwealth, the Commonwealth should not have the right to take it over. In our case, for instance, we have one principal block of large buildings used by the post-office and all the departments of the Government. It would be very inconvenient indeed, if the Commonwealth took over the whole of that block of buildings, and it would be equally troublesome, perhaps, to take over a portion of the building.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You will get the value of the building.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I know that we will, but even with the value of the building I do not know that it would be altogether convenient to take it over.

Mr. SYMON. -

They would arrange all that.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

This clause says that they shall take it over.

Mr. SYMON. -

They would not take it over if it were a white elephant.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It would not be a white elephant, and the state might desire to retain it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I may point out to my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest), if he will allow me to interpose in his speech, that if the Commonwealth does not find it necessary to take it over—and it would not find it necessary to take it over in the case he puts-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Why not?

Mr. BARTON. -

My right honorable friend has instanced the case of a large Post-office department, which is part of a large block of public buildings. I think in that case, it would be quite possible to so much of the buildings as were used for the specific purpose of the Post-office, leaving the rest, so far as t

Mr. ISAACS. -
Does not this make an investiture in the Commonwealth?

Mr. BARTON. -
It does make an investiture in the Commonwealth. There is that difficulty occurring, and I am inclined to think that it may be necessary to amend the clause to a certain extent.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Say with the consent of the state or something of that sort.

Mr. BARTON. -
You cannot say with the consent of the state, but you may make it necessary for the Commonwealth to pay the proper valuation of that which its necessities require that it should take over, and I do not know that you should bind the Commonwealth to a greater extent than that.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You want to have it all one-sided.

Mr. BARTON. -
No.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You can leave it if you like.

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not think it is a one-sided thing to make a man pay for what he gets, but the Commonwealth is not bound to take over those things which it does not want. My view is that we ought not to bind it to take over such matters. It ought to be in a position to exercise some option-some discretion—but not in respect to such matters as are necessary for the actual taking in of the early revenue, which will, in the first instance, be confined to Customs and Excise. We have found a great difficulty from the very beginning in dealing with the clause. Not only has the Convention found it a great difficulty, but my honorable friends who are assisting me with the drafting find the same difficulty as to whether there should be a complete and compulsory investiture in the Commonwealth of everything used by a state in connexion with transferred departments, or whether there should be some provision for an option on the part of the Commonwealth to take over a portion at a fair valuation.

Mr. SYMON. -
That is practically what the clause does.

Mr. BARTON. -
That is really more a matter of policy than anything which Sir John Downer, Mr. O'Connor, or myself has to do with. I am inclined to think that it might be made a little clearer that there should be an option to the Commonwealth to take over only such things as are absolutely necessary, that the state should have no more disturbance than it is necessary for the Commonwealth to disturb them. But, on the other hand, the feeling of the Convention in Adelaide when they touched this clause— they did not touch it in Sydney— was rather strong in making the clause go its whole length. I am inclined to think that the policy I have suggested is the right one. The buildings which are not exclusively used are the only ones you may want to deal with. It has been suggested, I think, inferentially, by Mr. Symon, that while there is apparently a statutory investiture there is the maxim that any one can renounce a law which is introduced for his own benefit. As the clause is introduced for the benefit of the State in its larger extent, it will be competent for the State to renounce that benefit. Unless, after all, there is some proceeding between the state and the Commonwealth there can be no difficulty under the clause. I do not think we should insert the word "exclusively." I think it is better to leave the clause to be dealt with, and I will make a suggestion, notwithstanding that it is a matter of policy, to the Convention in connexion with the whole matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Don't make it too tight.

Mr. BARTON. -
Not make it too tight?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Not on one side.

Mr. BARTON. -
A great many of the clauses, I am afraid, are too loose.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I would point out to my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) that if the word "exclusively" is inserted it may cause very great inconvenience. You might put the Commonwealth under the obligation of taking over the management of particular departments—Customs and so on—and have no premises in which to carry on the work, because you might have half of your buildings used, not exclusively, but for various purposes such as have been indicated. It might be a very awkward position indeed. The only question is whether we may well leave it to be adjusted between the Commonwealth and the states as to what parts of the buildings should be taken over when they are used for different purposes, or whether we should leave the state in a position to say—"Well, now, you had better not take over this part of the building used for several departments, but we will give you another building, on the other side of the street, which may be exclusively used for your particular work."

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I was going to suggest, following the remarks of previous speakers, that some difficulties may arise if you provide for compulsory vesting. I would suggest to the leader of the Convention that he might make this provision read-"may from the establishment of the Commonwealth be taken over by the Commonwealth, and, if so taken over, may vest." All I would suggest is that it should not vest without election on the part of the Commonwealth. If you pass the provision as it stands at present it is open to that objection.

The paragraph was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I now beg to move, Mr. Chairman, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

BOUNTIES.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I desire to mention that, at the proper time, I shall ask that clause 84, having reference to the question of bounties, be reconsidered.

The Convention adjourned at two minutes past five o'clock p.m.
Wednesday, 16th February, 1898.

Petitions - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I have the honour to present a petition from John Robertson, of Moonee Ponds, Victoria, relative to the banking, currency, and legal tender clauses of the Bill, and I beg to move that it be received and read.

The motion was agreed to.

The CLERK read the petition, as follows:-

The Petition of John Robertson, of Moonee Ponds, in the Colony of Victoria.

Apropos of the currency, banking, and legal tender clauses in the Commonwealth Bill now before you, your petitioner would respectfully draw your attention to the following matter, and would request your careful consideration of it:-

1. The Australian banks hold, on the average, of gold some £25,000,000, more or less.

2. The great bulk of this gold is, to all intents and purposes, fixed capital of rather a dead kind. It would be quite safe so to denominate at least £18,000,000 of it.

3. By the use of well-proved devices and principles adopted from English and Scotch banking, it is possible to replace these superfluous millions of gold by prime interest-bearing securities of assured stability and liquidity of value.

4. It is possible to make this change in a safe, simple, and equitable manner, and without the State engaging in banking business properly so called, and without interfering with the gold standard of value or the general use of gold for cash purposes, and the settlement of balances.

5. It is possible, further, to do this without the printing of legal tender notes, and without interfering with free banking or the free coinage of gold.

6. Your petitioner placed in outline the exact principles on which these things could be done before the Victorian Banking Commission of 1894-5, partly in print, partly in writing (the latter not being printed).

Your petitioner is of opinion that the achievement of the reform he urges on your consideration, and which could be equitably achieved in say five years, would facilitate and compel free, economic, and stable federation by... furnishing a common interest and a most infallible indicator of where the balance of interest lay in any given case. He believes, further, that the existence of an Australian Federal Bank would greatly facilitate the work of federal government, and also for these reasons urges the matter on your consideration.

And, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of the president and executive officers of the Victorian Christian Endeavour Union, comprising a membership of over 20,000 residents of the colony of Victoria. The prayer of the petition is that the Convention will introduce into the Federal Constitution a definite recognition of Almighty God as the Ruler of Nations and the Supreme Source of all Righteous law, rule, and authority. I beg to move that the petition be received.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on clause 86, as follows:-

All lands, buildings, works, vessels, materials, and things necessarily appertaining to, or used in connexion with, any department of the public service, the control of which is by this Constitution transferred to the Commonwealth, shall, from the establishment of the Commonwealth, be taken over by and vest in the Commonwealth, either absolutely, or, in the case of the departments controlling customs and excise and bounties, for such time as may be necessary.

The fair value thereof, or of the use thereof, as the case may be, shall be paid by the Commonwealth to the state from which they are taken over. Such value shall be ascertained by mutual agreement, or, if no agreement can be made, in the manner in which the value of land, or of an interest in land, taken by the Government of the state for the like public purposes is ascertained under the laws of the state at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of South Australia-

After "over" (paragraph 2) insert "and payments may be made by the assumption by the Commonwealth of an equivalent part of the public debt of the state."

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I hope the committee will consent to this amendment. The object of the South Australian Assembly is to avoid the difficulty which will face the Federal Parliament at the very start if it has to pay something like £9,000,000 or £10,000,000 for the departments that are to be taken over from the states. In Sydney, at the instance of Mr. Walker, a return was presented to the Convention showing that if the whole of the departments were taken over at a fair value, and the Commonwealth had to pay cash for those departments, the amount required would be £10,260,980.

Mr. HOLDER. -

But the Commonwealth would be sure to relieve the states of debt instead.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Well, I want to make that obligatory on the states, should the Commonwealth desire it. It is just as well that we should see that it is to be done in that way, because there is no obligation on the states to do it in that way at present. The states, the Constitution as now drafted, could call on the Federal Parliament to pay cash for the departments taken over. That is the effect of this clause as it stands, and the object of the South Australian amendment is to relieve the Federal Parliament of the obligation to pay cash. The proposal made is to pay a fair value for all the departments except the Customs department, which are by the Bill excepted from purchase, are to be taken over, I suppose, by a leasing of the premises. If you deduct, therefore, the value of the Customs departments, which is put at £733,175, the balance to be paid by the Commonwealth to the states will be, in round numbers, £9,500,00. Now, that is a very large outlay for the Parliament of the Federation at the very start. It will necessitate the floating of a federal loan, a thing that we ought to avoid at the very inception of the career of the Commonwealth. It will also lead to this inconvenience, that there will be given over to the states Treasurers adventitious sources of revenue, which will not affect or would not be taken into account in relation to their annual balances. Taxation could not, in anticipation, be remitted for a year or so. Now, these adventitious sources or revenue-these windfalls-very often lead to extravagance; at all events, it is not wise, if we can possibly avoid it, to hand over a sum, say, in the case of New South Wales, of between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000 for the various departments which are to be taken over by the Commonwealth. The suggestion made by the South Australian Legislative Assembly is that payments may be made by the Commonwealth assuming an equivalent part of the public debts of the states whose departments are taken over. The Commonwealth could not, of course, take over a capital amount of debts equal to the value of the departments taken over, because the debts have varying currencies, and varying rates of interest. You must, therefore, convert the debts taken over into this equivalent value. Of course, honorable members will see that a loan of £1,000,000, with a twenty years currency, at 4 per cent. So that the object of the South Australian amendment is not that the Commonwealth shall take over a capital amount equal to the amount of the purchase money of the departments taken over by the Commonwealth, but that an equivalent amount of the debts of the states shall be assumed by the Commonwealth. What the amount shall be is a matter of mathematical calculation, which could be done in half-an-hour.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Do you want to make it compulsory to do this?

Mr. GLYNN. -
No, not compulsory. The object of the amendment of the South Australian Assembly is to allow the payment for the state departments taken over by the Commonwealth to be made, if the Federal Parliament so desire, by the Commonwealth assuming equivalent amounts of the debts of the states. As the clause at present stands, the states could demand payment in cash, and oblige the Federal Parliament, at the very start, to float a loan so as to raise money to pay the states in cash. The object of this amendment is that the payment may be made by taking over an equivalent amount of the public debts of the states.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
But you don’t propose to make it mandatory, do you?

Mr. GLYNN. -
No, not mandatory. If the second paragraph of the clause is amended as proposed, the first sentence will read as follows:

The fair value thereof, or of the use thereof, as the case may be, shall be paid by the Commonwealth to the states from which they are taken over, and payments may be made by the assumption by the Commonwealth of an equivalent part of the public debt of the state.

Mr. BARTON. -
Substitute or for and in the amendment, and then it will be clear that the payment could be made in cash or by taking over an equivalent amount of debt.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Very well, if the leader of the Convention wishes it, that amendment can be made. I do not know that it is absolutely necessary. The clause might be made to read that the amount shall be paid by taking over an equal value of state debt or otherwise. That would leave it optional. The object of putting it in that way is that up to the minimum value of the departments of the state-say, Tasmania—there might be an amalgamation. The value of the Tasmanian departments taken over by purchase would be something like £350,000. Now, there might be an amalgamation or cancellation of purchase moneys up to that point, because there will be no loss there. That, therefore, would leave, instead of £9,500,000 to be paid by the Commonwealth, something like £8,000,000, because five times £350,000, the amount of the lowest value of these departments in Tasmania, deducted from the total amount to be paid the Commonwealth, would leave the amount a little less than £8,000,000, and to that extent there might be a calculation of purchase money, but the excess over the valuation of the Tasmanian departments taken over must be paid for either in cash or by the Commonwealth assuming an equivalent amount of state debt. The suggestion I make, therefore, is that you should amalgamate the purchase moneys up to the lowest amount, which is that of Tasmania, and pay the balance of the valuation money either in cash or by taking over a proportionate amount of state debt. It has been objected to the compulsory taking over of the states debts—it was objected in Sydney with considerable force, although I do not acknowledge that it is a conclusive answer to compulsion—that you might be giving up a benefit to the bond-holders. The federal security being greater than the state security, there would really be a premium surrendered to the bond-holders if there is a compulsory taking over of state debts by the Commonwealth, because the value of their bonds would go up according to the additional value of the federal security as compared with the state security. Bond-holders would also have a greater knowledge of the character and value of the stock they were dealing in owing to the fact that it would be Australian stock. Of course, that objection would not apply to this amendment, be taken over as against the value of the departments would be only about £8,000,000. Therefore no bond-holder could say—My bond is the one to be taken over. Arrangements could be made with the bond-holders to pay a slight premium, giving the Federal Parliament security over their particular bonds. There would be no danger in regard to the premium because you could select a particular sum to be taken over and make terms with the bond-holders. In fact, £8,000,000 of debt might be put up in England as being changeable from a state liability to a federal liability. The objection that might be made to a loss of premium by taking over an amount of debt compulsorily does not hold good here, because with the large indebtedness of the Australian colonies, only a particular portion of bonds would be taken over; the particular bondholders would be selected by the Federation, and they could be made to pay a premium for the privilege granted to them of taking federal security instead of state security.

Mr. SOLOMON. - Would it not be better and less complicated if the Federal Parliament floated a loan, and allowed the state Parliaments to pay off what portion they liked?

Mr. GLYNN. - I do not think so. It would have the evil I have suggested, of beginning the career of the Federal Parliament by floating an outside loan and incurring a debt. In the one case you have to float a loan and pay interest on an extended currency, but by adopting the course I have suggested you would be wiping off the purchase money by a method more resembling deferred payments. As a matter of fact, it will amount to that. I think it will be better to adopt this suggestion, and I trust that the committee will accede to it. Otherwise, the liability will be so great at the beginning of the Commonwealth that we shall be landed in embarrassments. This has been made clear by the gentlemen who form the accounts committee appointed by the Victorian Government. They say that some debt should be taken over, and the suggestion is also made by them that payment should be made by instalments extending over a series of years, at 3 per cent. compound interest. I believe that by agreeing to this amendment the committee will get rid of other embarrassments. I might also mention that it would be well if the leader of the Convention would look into the effect of this on the new clauses.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). - It would be well, I think, if the Treasurers would express to the committee their views with regard to the point put forward by Mr. Glynn. There seems to me to be a good deal in the suggestion, and while it might allow something to be done to prevent what might be the proper means of forwarding the transfer, there is a good deal to be said for making an arrangement whereby the states may be relieved of interest on public debt, applicable to lands, buildings, or works taken over. Otherwise, the Commonwealth is bound to pay the fair value thereof, as the clause stands. But I take it that it would not be the intention that the Commonwealth should be bound to pay cash for its lands, works, and buildings, but that as far as possible it should pay what the states had undertaken the obligation of paying, with this difference, that it would be responsible for not merely the cost of the works, but for the fair value of them, which might be more or less of the original cost. At any rate, I think there is a good deal in the suggestion that the clause should not be left as it stands, but that some provision should be made of a character akin to the suggestion by Mr.
Glynn, although I would not bind myself to those words.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I quite concur that it is not wise to adopt the clause as it stands, but it seems to me that it is not wise to put in any complicated system as to what should be done. I would leave the matter as open as it is possible to leave it, letting the Federal Parliament and the states make their own bargains with regard to terms. No state Treasurer, if he were at all sensible, would ask the Federal Parliament to pay him two or three millions of money right off. What could he do with it if he got it? If he had that amount of money in hand the chances are ten to one that he would not be able to take up any loans, nor would he be able to put the money aside for that purpose. Pressure would be brought to bear upon him to spend it for reproductive works, and when loans fell due the money would not be available. What I would suggest is this—if the Federal Parliament has to pay in cash it must raise the money. Raising the money at once would mean that interest would have to be paid. Now, the states would have to pay that interest, because the amount of it would be deducted from the surplus returnable to them from time to time.

Mr. HOLDER. -

They would have to pay twice.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The result would be that we should be paying the English bond-holders interest on the loans out of which these works were probably constructed, and also paying interest upon money borrowed by the Federation. The state would have the money paid to them by the Federation on account of the works, but what would they be able to do with it? They might put it in the bank; but judging from our past experience we should not get any interest upon it then.

We should thus be paying interest twice over. The course that would probably be pursued if the state and the Federal Parliament were left to make their own arrangements would be that they would come to terms such as that, if in five or ten years time the state had loans becoming due, the Federal Parliament would issue its own stock for an equivalent amount, and hand it to the state.

Mr. BARTON. -

Giving to the state the value in stock of the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Giving the value in stock of the Commonwealth; and when the loan which the state desired to take up became due, the Commonwealth stock would be realized, and the money applied to taking up the particular loan.
That is one way. I have no doubt, however, that the Treasurers of the states could agree to some other plan with the Commonwealth Treasurer which would be as effectual and more simple. There is no doubt that the Federation would have to create a stock of its own. It must, almost from starting, incur debts, and the creation of stock is a necessity. They will not be able to carry on out of revenue merely. No doubt when a stock is being created, various means may be suggested by the financial men of the day for carrying out this system in a fair and satisfactory manner. I would urge, as a suggestion to the Drafting Committee, that the wider we leave this matter the better will it be. Let it be left absolutely to the Federal Treasurer, who will not seek to incur any more expenditure for interest than is absolutely necessary; and the states Treasurers, if they are sensible men, certainly will not desire to have two or three million pounds handed to them in cash, unless they know that they can employ it for paying off the debts of their states.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
I wish to add my testimony in the same direction as Sir George Turner has spoken. We are framing a Constitution, and all these matters which are not of permanent concern at all will be better if left to be the subject of bargaining between the states and the Commonwealth at the beginning of our federated career. That will be better than creating a cast iron fixed system. I want to see this provision left as open as possible, so that there may be room for negotiation. Let it be said that the state shall be paid in cash or securities as may be agreed upon. If that be done, I have no doubt the right course will be taken, and it will be far better than imposing a cast-iron provision which, if it comes into operation, might work in a different way to what we intended it should do.

Mr. BARTON. -
If this amendment is negatived I will prepare an amendment which will meet the case and be as wide as possible.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I hope that the Convention will accept the suggestion of the leader of the Convention.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I think that the views of the finance committee appointed by the Victorian Government (to, which Mr. Glynn has referred) are well deserving of consideration upon this particular point, and I do not think that sufficient attention has been given to that report considering the importance of what the committee have to say upon this very subject. I think that, for the sake of convenience of reference, it may be well for me to quote a passage. This is what the committee say (page 262 of the
We desire, however, to make some remarks upon the method of handing over the bulk of the properties, namely, those pertaining to Defence, Post and Telegraph offices, &c. The value of these we cannot ascertain; but the value of the whole of the properties to be handed over was, according to some figures supplied to the Sydney Convention of 1891, £10,500,000; and is, according to an estimate made by the Assistant Government Statist, £10,450,000, including lands. The deduction of the value of the Custom-houses would not make a great difference; but we do not think these figures represent the present value, and believe that about £6,000,000, worth of property would be handed over to the Commonwealth at its inception. The purchase money for these properties would be due on the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth, when the Treasurer would have no funds. The only way out of the difficulty would be for the Commonwealth to raise a loan to meet its obligation to the states, which loan would, in a sense, be a second mortgage on the same security. Supposing this method to be adopted, the payments to the states would be greatly deranged by the receipt of large sums of money, and the Commonwealth would begin under very bad auspices. The difficulties are so great that we cannot conceive this method of paying for the properties being adopted. Further, we have considered the possibility of the states being reimbursed by the Commonwealth taking over a portion of the debt of each state equal to the value of the properties transferred. This method was adopted in Canada, and proved practicable; but we can find no provisions in the Bill under which a similar course could be taken here.

It should be recognised that, whether buildings, &c., are transferred or not, they remain, in a sense, the property of the state. The cities of Sydney and Melbourne cannot be deprived of the benefits of their post-offices, forts, or other public buildings, unless the Commonwealth should sell them, and this could easily be provided against. The only change made by a transfer without any payment whatever would be that the Central Government would have the duty of maintaining them, and the states would be relieved of that expense.

Presuming, however, that payment of the value is a settled policy, we would hazard a suggestion that, in order to embarrass the Central Government as little as possible, and to provide against a derangement of the state finances by the receipt in a lump sum of the capital value, the properties should be acquired by a system of deferred payments. Such a system we are ready to submit if required, but it is not within the limits of our instructions.
I had a conference with the members of the finance committee upon the subject, and they made a further suggestion, which is to be found recorded on page 265 of the Blue-book. They there say in their memorandum—which is signed by Dr. Wollaston, the permanent head of the Customs department:—

In reference to this subject I would venture to submit, however, that there does not seem to be any adequate reason why the states should expect the Commonwealth to purchase these properties. What difference will it make to Victoria, for instance, if our Post-office in Bourke-street be nominally federal property? It will still be our Post-office, and used as such; it cannot be taken away or disposed of. If the Commonwealth closed it they would have to build another. All that could be argued is that these buildings have been built out of loan moneys, and form security therefor. As regards such, the most that could apparently be fairly required would be that on transfer to the Commonwealth the latter should pay the interest on the loan money expended thereon.

Then they give a short extra memorandum embodying a scheme. They say—

The following scheme is submitted for the transfer of property from the states to the Commonwealth, as being better in its working than that proposed in the Bill, and not so likely to disarrange the finances of the various states:—

Assuming that 3 per cent. is the fair annual value of the properties, it is suggested that the Federation should pay to the states 4 per cent. on the capital value thereof until such time as the extra 1 per cent. would, if funded, with compound interest at 3 per cent., amount to the purchase money. This, it is reckoned, would be in a little over 47 years. In other words, the Federation would, under this scheme, pay to the states 4 per cent. on the capital value of the properties taken over from them for 47 years, and those properties would then become the absolute property of the Commonwealth.

I have referred to this because I think that it is really deserving of serious consideration, and ought to be discussed. I agree with those honorable members who find fault with the clause for being far too rigid. I understood Mr. Barton to say yesterday that the clause would be reconsidered, with the view of depriving it of that extreme rigidity. I understood it would be so dealt with in regard to this question of fair value just as in other respects. It is quite plain that if cash has to be paid at once, and no loan is to be borrowed out of which it is to be paid, it would have to be raised out of taxation. It would be absurd to tax

Ought not the money authorized in that way to be handed back to the states to be taken off their existing debt?

Mr. ISAACS. -

If it is raised by taxation, the people will not be prepared to raise £10,000,000 in addition to the ordinary expenses of government both of the states and of the Federation. It would be so burdensome that it could not be borne. It is a matter which ought to be looked at by the committee. There is another view which the Drafting Committee might, I think, take in the framing of this clause. There is, I understand, now under their consideration the question whether a clause should be put in enabling the Commonwealth to acquire property. In connexion with that, no doubt they will consider the question of eminent domain, and how far the power intended to be given by this clause exists independently of that. When this clause comes to be refrained I hope the committee will give attention to this aspect of the case—that it should be framed only in terms by which the power of eminent domain, which is inherent in the sovereign power, will not be limited.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I do not want to add to what has been said. I think Sir George Turner put the clause plainly before the committee. Everything which has been said in this debate shows more and more how useless it will be to put a concrete scheme into the clause. After all, what will the different states require? Simply security for payment of the interest; then the time will come when by arrangement their debts will be reduced by a certain amount when the debt falls in. There are innumerable schemes which can be adopted; for instance, the Commonwealth might issue Treasury-bills to the different states purely as a matter of security. The only difference I see that might arise is that under the Public Purposes Land Resumption Act, which we have in our colony, there is a fixed rate of interest which is to be charged in the interval between resuming the land and completing the operation of acquiring the property.

Mr. REID. -

It would be too large in this case.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That is why I think there would be anomalies.

Mr. REID. -

There would be.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That is why I think some fixed rate of interest should be put in. At any rate, something should be put in which would remove this rigid construction. This arranges very properly for a modus operandi which has been very effective in different colonies in order to arrive at a valuation; but it also includes a proposal for the payment of a certain rate of interest. That might be very awkward in dealing with this matter. The whole clause might be recast in some way. I agree with Mr. Holder that we should adopt some simpler plan; we should simply leave the arrangements to be made between the states and the Federal Government, and that would answer all purposes, because we cannot imagine that anything unreasonable would be done. I am certain that no colony wants a large amount of money connected with its loan funds to be paid down at once; it would be more embarrassing than otherwise.

Mr. BARTON. -

I would suggest that we should recast the amendment so as to leave scope for the redrafting of this clause.

The amendment was negatived.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 87. - Until uniform duties of customs have been imposed, the powers of the Parliaments of the several states existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth, respecting the imposition of duties of customs, the imposition of duties of excise, and the offering of bounties upon the production or export of goods, and the collection and payment thereof respectively, shall continue.

Until uniform duties have been imposed, the laws of the several states in force at the establishment of the Commonwealth respecting duties of customs, duties of excise, and bounties, and the collection and payment thereof, shall remain in force, subject to such alterations of the amount of duties or bounties as the Parliaments of the several states may make from time to time; and the duties and bounties shall continue to be collected and paid as theretofore, but by the officers of the Commonwealth.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendments suggested by South Australia have been already disposed of by the committee, and therefore I shall not put them.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The omission of this clause is a suggestion of the Finance Committee, with which the Drafting Committee entirely concur; in fact, I think, the suggestion first came from the Drafting Committee, and it was afterwards acceded to by the Finance Committee. The first part of this clause is sufficiently provided for by clause 99, and the second part is sufficiently provided for by clause 100, for by clause 99 all powers which belong to the Parliaments of the colonies at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth which are not vested in the Commonwealth by its Constitution remain vested in the Parliaments of those colonies. According to clause 100, which is parallel to the second portion of clause 87, all laws in force in any of the colonies on matters declared by the Constitution to be in the legislative power of the Commonwealth are to continue in force in the states, and may be repealed or altered by the Parliaments of the states until provision is made by the Parliament of the Commonwealth, so that all constitutional powers, among which the power of making customs laws, being concurrent powers, are embraced, are actually continued in and remain in the Parliament of each colony until the imposition of uniform customs duties; that is to say, until the Commonwealth has legislated on the subject. With reference to the laws of the colonies-and that is parallel to the second part of the clause-those laws are also preserved by clause 100, so that there is no use, as far as I can discover, for this clause, except with reference to payments of duties and bounties, and they are to be attended to by the officers of the Commonwealth. The portion of clause 44 which we erected into a separate clause-86A-provides for that sufficiently:-

The collection and control of customs and excise, and the control of the payment of bounties, shall pass to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth on the establishment of the Commonwealth.

So it appears quite clear that, as regards the collection and control of excise, customs, and bounties, this clause is unnecessary. With regard to the power of making laws it is unnecessary, and with regard to existing laws it is also unnecessary. For every reason the Drafting Committee is quite satisfied that this clause is unnecessary. I have all the more pleasure in saying this, because I think I suggested the second part of the clause in 1891.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I quite agree with the leader of the Convention that we ought not to have repetition in the Bill. But we cannot forget that on several occasions this clause has been the subject of warm discussion with regard to a few words in it. It will be very serious indeed to the states if we find later on that while we are waiting for the imposition of uniform customs we cannot alter our existing customs laws. In Victoria, I hope that we have no intention of interfering with our customs laws for two or three years; but it might so happen that through force of circumstances we should have to raise money even temporarily, and we might desire to put on some tax or charge through the customs for a year, or two or three years, and if after this Bill has become law, and has been passed by the English Parliament, we find that we are absolutely blocked from making any alterations or from putting on any new charge through the Customs it will be a very serious matter indeed to us. There must have been some strong reason in 1891 for inserting this clause. It has been continued up to within the last few days, when the Drafting Committee suggested to the Finance committee that there was no particular necessity for this clause in consequence of the other clauses which had been passed. Of course, we must be guided to a large extent by the Drafting Committee, but I wish to point out, and put it on record, that it would be very serious if we find later on, when we desire to make some alteration in the customs laws, that we are blocked for want of some such provision as this.

Mr. BARTON. -
   We have quite satisfied ourselves on the point.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
   There is no doubt the draftsman of the Bill of 1891, apparently on the suggestion of Mr. Barton, thought that these words were necessary for the purpose.

Mr. BARTON. -
   I thought that they were necessary, but Sir Samuel Griffith thought that they were not. I find now that he is right.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
   As far as I am concerned, I am willing to be guided by the members of the Drafting Committee in a matter of this kind; but I only repeat that, if it does turn out afterwards that this clause is necessary, some of the colonies may be placed in a very serious position.

Mr. LYNE. -
   I should like to have some more information before this clause is omitted; perhaps the leader of the Convention will give us some information?

Mr. BARTON. -
   The effect of the Bill will be exactly the same without this clause as it will be with it. It is a mere redundancy.

Mr. LYNE. -
   I have read the clause.

Mr. BARTON. -
   Has the honorable member read clause 99 and clause 100 in connexion with it?

Mr. LYNE. -
   Yes. I do not pretend to be able to interpret those clauses as well as my honorable friend, but there seems to me to be some doubt as to whether clauses 99 and 100 will cover this clause. The best way to ascertain how this proposal will affect the states is to consider what will take place supposing the Bill is accepted by the people and passed by the Imperial Parliament in the two years before the uniform Customs Tariff is, agreed to. Supposing that Victoria or New South Wales, or any of the other states, wish to reduce or increase their customs duties, I fail to see that there would be any power for them to do so.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, under clause 99. Powers which are vested in the Parliament of the colony, and which by the Constitution are not exclusively vested in the Commonwealth, remain in the power of the state.

Mr. LYNE. -

That is the point. This Constitution Bill continues every right, as far as I understand, existing at the time it is approved of by the British Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -

Will the honorable member have regard to the word "exclusively"? The customs legislation is not exclusively vested in the Commonwealth, so that up to the time that the Federal Parliament passes the uniform customs laws the colonies can pass such laws as they like.

Mr. LYNE. -

I am quite prepared, as the Premier of Victoria is, to take the interpretation placed upon these clauses by the leader of the Convention, but I would suggest that when the Drafting Committee revises the whole Bill they should look into this matter again, so that there may be no possible misinterpretation or misunderstanding. I do not think that it is intended that the states shall not interfere with their Customs Tariffs for two years, or until the uniform Tariff is established. That is all I wish to be certain about, so that there shall be nothing to prevent the alteration or variation by any of the states of their Customs Tariffs in the interval between the passing of a Constitution Act and the passing of a uniform Customs Tariff Bill by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

This matter has been the subject of most careful consideration by the Drafting Committee, because we all recognise, as Sir George Turner has said, the extreme importance of making it very plain that the po

All laws in force in any of the colonies relating to any of the matters declared by this Constitution to be within the legislative powers of the Parliament of the Commonwealth shall, except as otherwise provided by this Constitution, continue in force in the states respectively, and may be repealed or altered by the Parliaments of the states, until provision is made in that behalf by the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

That states precisely the same thing, no more and no less than is provided for in the second paragraph of clause 87. The second paragraph of this clause merely repeats as to a particular matter the general statement made in clause 100, and to have a repetition of that kind would be simply a blot in the form of the Constitution, and could convey no additional validity whatever to the power that is preserved. The first portion of clause 87 is provided for in exactly the same way in clause 99. That provides expressly:

All powers which at the establishment of the Commonwealth are vested in the Parliaments of the several colonies, and which are not by this Constitution exclusively vested in the Parliament of the Commonwealth, or withdrawn from the Parliaments of the several states, are reserved to, and shall remain vested in, the Parliaments of the states respectively.

I think that the honorable member (Mr. Lyne) in looking into the matter will see that there is not the slightest risk, but that the provisions of clause 87, which we admit ought to be in the Constitution, are contained in clauses 99 and 100.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I take it that the limit of two years for the imposition of uniform customs duties was placed there to prevent any unnecessary delay in the adoption of a Uniform Tariff, and I venture to think that if the Bill is accepted by a sufficient number of states, it will not be two years, or ought not to be two years, before there are uniform customs duties.

Mr. REID. -

There will be a period of six months to start with before the Federal Parliament can be brought together.

Mr. LYNE. -

Possibly so. In discussing this matter in the Finance Committee at Adelaide, when it was first proposed, I know that the reason for inserting the provision was to prevent undue delay in getting a uniform Customs Tariff. Two years was considered at the time to be the outside period for the imposition of the uniform Customs Tariff, and I do not think that more time should be necessary. Of course, however, we have to depend in a great measure on the interpretation placed upon these clauses by the Drafting Committee, who understand the reason for the insertion of every word in the clauses; and as the leader of the Convention and Mr. O'Connor have both assured the committee that there is no danger in the proposal they have made, I, for one, am quite content to leave the matter in their hands.
Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I think it is only right, as this is a matter of great importance, that any of us who have given attention to the subject should state our adhesion to the view which has been expressed by my honorable friends (Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor), and should give their assurance any possible support that we can. I entirely agree with the view expressed by those honorable members. The matter can be put in one sentence—the event which determines the control of the states over their customs duties and bounties is the imposition of the uniform Tariff. Until that event happens they have, under clauses 99 and 100, all the powers they possessed before the establishment of the Commonwealth. It is the exclusive granting of the power to the Federal Parliament which determines the cessation of the powers to the states; and that does not happen until the imposition of the uniform Tariff, and until then, therefore, the powers of the states in relation to these matters remain in force.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I may state that I satisfied myself on that point before I made the statement in the Finance Committee's report, to the effect that these two clauses provide for what is desired. The clause was struck out.

Clause 88. - Uniform duties of customs shall be imposed within two years after the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

This is a clause the object of which is very patent to everybody, but it seems to me that in many respects it is a very questionable clause. We all hope that, within two years at most after the establishment of the Commonwealth, there will be a uniform customs law. But, underlying this clause or proposal there is a suspicion—I think an unworthy suspicion—that this great matter, which is the main factor, together with defence, of the whole Federation, would be tampered with—that there might be influences brought to bear upon the Commonwealth Parliament by certain states who do not want to come to a uniform law of customs. There are two reasons why the clause seems to me unnecessary. In the first place, I think it will be clear to all of us that, after having got together the absolutely necessary machinery of the Federal Government, the first question, under all circumstances, must be the discussion of the Tariff. Then why should we strike a blow at this system of deliberation, caution, and adjustment which is so essential to all our legislation? Further, it seems to me that it is a very difficult thing to fix a particular time. I know that in America the session of Parliament ends by law on a certain date, no matter what stage the business may have reached; but that has always seemed to me to be a very drastic kind of regulation. Here we are asked to fix a certain time for the imposition of uniform duties of customs. It is not that I think that two years would be too long, but the fixing of any time is what I object to. We are told-"Here is a certain fixed time, at which you must either finish your work, or you must throw the whole country into confusion.". And it is just possible that with the various interests which, for the first time, will become arrayed against each other-the interests which may be more or less hostile between the two Houses-the state interests as they are called-may be somewhat in conflict with other interests; and we must recollect, too, that we do not want, under the Federal Parliament, to have a Tariff on which the shadow of change may rest every year. We want a Tariff which will be of such a character as to give stability to all interests that may be concerned in it. Therefore, it does seem to me-I do not know what to call it, unphilosophical or unparliamentary-at any rate, against the very essence and spirit of our institutions, to make a drastic regulation at starting that uniform duties of customs must come into force within a certain time. We cannot foresee the difficulties that may arise, and I say most plainly that, although I think everything ought to be fixed up in two years, it would be better to be for three years engaged in this work and that is very unlikely-than to have a mere temporary arrangement, in which there was not, it might be said, a cessation of hostilities, but simply a truce. Therefore, while I quite appreciate the whole spirit and intention of this clause, as it was proposed in the Finance Committee, I still think it is a very questionable provision. I admit that I gave it my adhesion in the Finance Committee, seeing that there was a majority in favour of it, and I shall also give it my adhesion now, if there is a majority in favour of it. Still, I think it is a very doubtful provision, and one very alien to the whole spirit on which these clauses have been drafted, as to matters which are entirely the prerogative of the Federal Parliament. I think it will be broader, and, if I may use the word, more statesmanlike, to omit this clause, and to leave to the Federal Parliament full and unfettered discretion in this matter, as we have done in the case of all other powers handed over to it.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I want to go just a little further than the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) has gone, and to point out that the main reason why, at any rate, New South Wales is coming into this Federation is that there shall be intercolonial free-trade all over this continent. This is the vital object for which we are coming into this Federation, and I believe that remark applies with absolute truth, and with equal force, to every other colony that is represented in this Convention. There is an unanimous—so far as you can have unanimity in national affairs—an unanimous desire that when we go to our constituents we shall be able to give them something like a definite assurance as to when they are to enjoy the benefits of intercolonial free-trade. Now, I think my honorable friend has sufficient knowledge and experience of the vast difficulties of framing a Tariff, even for a single colony, not to fail to realize how these difficulties will be intensified a thousandfold when we have to settle a Tariff out of all the diverse elements of electoral Australia that will command the majority of two Houses of Parliament, especially of two Houses elected on the basis on which these two Houses will be elected. The conclusion has been forced upon my mind that, unless there is the necessity of legal compulsion to frame a Tariff within a reasonable time, the people of Australia may find themselves year after year, through this or that difficulty, left without the vital benefit for which they united. The clash of opposing interests, and, apart from political forces, the force of private interests, all engaged in this subject, will be so tremendous that, unless we brand on the very face of this compact the necessity of finishing this work within a given time, I tell you honestly that there is no guarantee that we shall have intercolonial free-trade within ten years.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

What will be the actual time, in the first instance, which you think will be needed for a settlement of the Tariff?

Mr. REID. -

This will mean, first of all, that any Government coming into power will find the duty staring them in the face of piloting through the Federal Parliament a Tariff within two years.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

But there will be the six months immediately following the establishment of federation.

Mr. REID. -

During that time the brains of the Ministers need not be dormant. The Executive can set to work planning a Tariff from the first instant of its existence.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

But there can be no discussion for six months. The real work will come with the discussion.

Mr. REID. -

Yes; but I think it would take any Ministry six months to put before the public of Australia a well-considered Tariff, even if that Tariff were only a revenue Tariff. So far as a protective Tariff is concerned, I think that the honorable member (Mr. Lyne) would be the first to admit that it would require the fullest inquiry, in fairness to protection itself. After these six months there would be eighteen months for parliamentary discussion. My feeling is that this provision will keep Parliament sternly alive to the necessity for giving Australia intercolonial free-trade. It is not a uniform Tariff so much as that free intercourse between the colonies which a uniform Tariff will give that we require. Until the uniform Tariff comes into existence the various colonies will be in a state of conflict, even under the banner of federation. That would be an unnatural situation for the members of a Federal Commonwealth, and the sooner it was terminated the better it would be for every one.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The honorable member (Mr. Lyne) agrees with the right honorable gentleman, but for a different reason.

Mr. REID. -

So long as he agrees with me, I do not care what his reasons are. It is vital to the industrial interests of Australia that this matter should be settled as soon as possible. Every man engaged in manufacture, in production, and in commerce will be thrown upon his beam ends until he knows what the fiscal policy of the Commonwealth is to be. Upon that ground alone, in mercy to the people, we should do what we can to compel the Federal Government and the Federal Parliament to make the work of framing a uniform Tariff their first great work. Unless we put a direction of this kind into the Constitution I am afraid-and I think the very fear should be enough to influence us-that, whilst nominally we may be one people, we may be left exposed, year after year, to the play of warring policies and clashing interests, until at last the bright promise of our federal union will have entirely disappeared. It is not so much the need for a uniform Tariff, as all that it means to the Federation, that leads me to earnestly appeal to the Convention to retain the clause as it stands.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

The honorable member (Mr. McMillan) says that I am in favour of this restriction for different reasons from those which operate with the Premier of New South Wales. Possibly, to some extent, that is so, but if the imposition of a uniform Tariff were delayed, if the other states tried to block it, it would be compulsory upon New South Wales to put on a high Tariff in order to force the Federal Parliament to do something.
Mr. REID. -
That would be a calamity from the federal point of view.

Mr. LYNE. -
Yes. It is my desire to prevent any undue delay, and to make it imperative that a uniform Tariff shall be agreed upon at the earliest possible date, especially after the remark of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) that the control of the Customs will not take effect upon the coming into force of the Constitution, and not until the uniform Tariff is agreed to. That is a very strong reason why there should be an imperative direction to the Federal Parliament to come to terms in reference to this matter as soon as possible. I recognise that some time will be required by the Ministry of the Commonwealth to enable them to frame a Tariff for submission to the Federal Parliament, and I do not think they could do better with the six months following the coming into force of the Constitution than to use it in framing the best Tariff they can conceive. If six months is given by the Ministry to the preparation of this Tariff, surely eighteen months will be sufficient for its discussion by the Federal Parliament. I think that six months discussion will be quite sufficient. I also recognise that the Tariff must be, or at any rate should be, the first thing to engage the attention of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
The session will not conclude until the work is completed.

Mr. LYNE. -
That may be so, unless circumstances arise to prevent it. Some of the states may think that they cannot afford to lose their Tariff for any length of time, and that may be a reason for not unduly prolonging discussion. If the clause is passed as it stands, I think it will give a great safeguard to all the states. That is practically the only reason why I favour the restriction which it contains. If there is one thing more than another for which we are anxious, it is intercolonial free-trade. As the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) said, intercolonial free-trade and the federation of our defences are the two chief things that we desire to see carried into effect as early as possible.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 89. - So soon as uniform duties of customs have been imposed, trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia.

Line 3, omit "throughout the Commonwealth," insert "between the Honorable members will recollect that when in Adelaide I placed considerable importance upon the necessity of altering the wording of this clause. I drew attention to its enormously wide verbiage, and to the dangers which I considered attended its adoption in its present form. I pointed out that the term "trade and intercourse" included everything relating to commerce and trade-taxes, licences of all kinds, publicans' licences, auctioneers' licences, hawkers' licences, municipal licences. It is in consequence of the almost unlimited meaning attaching to these words in the United States Constitution that the Supreme Court there exercises such unbounded control over the subject. I am not going to repeat in detail what I said in Adelaide, because honorable members will find it in the report of the debate. But I wish again to press the matter upon the attention of the committee, and I have to state, with a good deal of pleasure, that Sir Samuel Griffith, in his able paper upon the question, has drawn attention to the same point. His observations upon the subject are these:-

I venture, before passing from this subject, to suggest a doubt whether the words of section 89 (which are the same as in the Draft Bill of 1891) are, in their modern sense, quite apt to express the meaning intended to be conveyed. It is, clearly, not proposed to interfere with the internal regulation of trade by means of licences, nor to prevent the imposition of reasonable rates on state railways. I apprehend that the real meaning is that the free course of trade and commerce between different parts of the Commonwealth is not to be restricted or interfered with by any taxes, charges, or imposts. Would it not be better to use these or similar words?

He then considers what should be done if it is intended to include interference with the railway rates. I should like to point out why the danger of the expression to which I have drawn attention is so very great. The words "trade and intercourse" are almost unbounded in their meaning when you apply them to the relations of trade and commerce, and, under the proper heads, Baker's Annotated Constitution is full of instances showing how far-reaching these words are. Then, take the words "throughout the Commonwealth." The meaning of those words is not restricted to between the states; they refer to every part of the Commonwealth, and I would refer honorable members to earlier portions of the Bill where the same meaning will have to be given to them. If honorable members will turn to clause 52, which deals with the powers of the Parliament, they will find that in sub-section (2) the Federal Parliament is empowered to legislate in regard to customs, excise, and bounties, which shall be uniform "throughout the Commonwealth." That is, within every state and every part of a state. "Throughout the Commonwealth" is the largest expression that can be used. In the next sub-section it is provided that all taxation shall be uniform throughout the Commonwealth. An income tax or a property tax raised under any federal law must be uniform "throughout the Commonwealth." That is, in every part of the Commonwealth. In clause 89 we find the same words again, and there can be no reasonable doubt that their meaning is the same in one clause as in all. Clause 89 provides that all trade and intercourse of every kind throughout the Commonwealth, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free. Free of what? Free of everything.

Mr. LYNE. -
    Not free of freight charges.

Mr. ISAACS. -
    No. They are charges for services. The clause means that the Commonwealth is not to put a restriction upon trade in any way whatever, not merely by means of customs or excise duties, but you are to leave every person absolutely free of any limitation of his common law right of carrying on his trade. As I have said, Sir Samuel Griffith has pointed that out again, and I do think we shall be taking a wrong course if we leave so important a matter in doubt. It is very important, even at the present time, because it means in licence-fees alone some £350,000.

Mr. LYNE. -
    Why do you say licence fees?

Mr. ISAACS. -
    Because that is trade and intercourse. If a man goes into an hotel and says-"I want to purchase liquor from you," that is trade and intercourse. If the hotel-keeper is told that he must not sell the liquor unless he pays the licence-fee he will turn to this clause and say-"You have no right to charge me a licence-fee."

Mr. LYNE. -
    Do not you give all these licence-fees to the local bodies.

Mr. ISAACS. -
    If that construction is possible under the clause there will be no power in the local body, the state Parliament, or the Federal Parliament to authorize such a charge.

Mr. LYNE. -
    I quite see that; but it is a fact that you do give licence-fees to the local bodies.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That may be so. It all depends on the law of the particular state.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Do not the words "whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation " restrict the operation of the clause to transit?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I should say not, and even if it did it would apply within the states to hawking. What we want to do is to establish free-trade between the different parts of the Commonwealth, and I would press my honorable friends to consider again the words of Sir Samuel Griffith.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

What page?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Page 354 of the Victorian Blue-book. I am perfectly willing to leave the matter to the Drafting Committee. It is important now, and it will increase in importance as time goes on. We do not know what questions may arise, and the meaning of the clause is bound to be tested almost on the first opportunity in the Federal Court. We should be in a very sorry plight if a decision were given following the American decisions which carried us much further than we anticipated, and there had to be a referendum of the states and of the people to get the clause altered. We want to get inter-state freedom of trade, and I am sure that we are capable of expressing that intention. I am willing to leave it to the Drafting Committee, but, as a basis, I think Sir Samuel Griffith's words are very good.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I should not like, anxious as I am that the work of the Convention should proceed, to see a step of this kind taken without the opinions of honorable members being ascertained upon it. It is not a matter that can be disposed of at once. I admit that my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) has put his contention with force, as he puts everything, but a great deal may be said in favour of the present form of the clause. Whether the expression used is open to the danger of being construed so as to apply to matters affecting the internal regulation of trade within the states is a point upon which I have not made up my mind, and upon which I desire to preserve an open attitude. This term has remained in the draft from the beginning. It is, I think, Sir Samuel Griffith's own term, although he offers some criticism upon it now, and it corresponds with the uniformity provision,
Any law or regulation made by the Commonwealth, or by any state, or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth, or by any state, having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth, shall be null and void.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Would not that be almost sufficient in itself?

Mr. BARTON. -

I want to put the matter judicially, and I admit that the existence of these words in clause 95 may somewhat strengthen the honorable member's contention. I was going to suggest, when the time came, that clause 95 should be omitted in favour of a clause to read somewhat as follows:

Any law or regulation of commerce or trade made by the Commonwealth, or by any state, giving a preference to one state or any part thereof over another state, or any part thereof, shall be null and void.

I think that that would be rather in accord with the view the honorable member has put.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That raises a much larger question-that of railways.

Mr. BARTON. -

No doubt; and that is a matter that will have to be discussed. I express my anxiety that this question should be the subject of some discussion, because it is of such supreme importance. Looking at it fairly, my views are rather in favour of Mr. Isaacs' contention. There might be greater safety in adopting some provision of the kind he suggests. We ought to be very chary about adopting any provision that would interfere with any internal regulations that do not pertain to trade and commerce. The regulation of trade or commerce specified in subsection (1) of clause 52 is with foreign countries, and among the several states. It is therefore defined in the first subsection as inter-state commerce. The question is whether we should consent to a form of words remaining in this clause which might have the effect of extending the operation of inter-state commerce to matters of internal regulation within a state which, as long as they do not necessarily affect the commerce between one state and another, are entirely under the cognisance of that particular state, and it is not the purpose of any Federal Constitution to interfere with trade of that character. If we once grasp that fact, the contention of my honorable and learned friend is again strengthened. I leave the matter now to be discussed, and I am perfectly prepared to accept the general sense of the Convention. My inclination is in favour of Mr. Isaacs' view.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I am very glad to hear the tone in which the leader of the Convention received the observations of my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs), because, like himself, I have been considering these words since the Adelaide meeting of the Convention. The more I consider them the greater weight I feel disposed to attach to the honorable member's criticism. In order to express what is really intended, it would be better to use the words "between the states" instead of the words "throughout the Commonwealth." The latter words seem to be sufficiently comprehensive to include every locality within the Commonwealth, and they might be construed to include a prohibition of auctioneers' and pedlars' licences. I am sure that no such thing is intended. Whilst we are anxious to provide for absolute freedom of trade on the frontiers between the colonies, there is no desire to interfere with the local regulation of trade once the packager, of goods, wares, and merchandise have arrived within the state territory. It would certainly be inimical to the success of this Constitution if an impression got abroad that there was to be any prohibition of local regulations, such as auctioneers' and pedlars' licences. These are reasonable regulations of trade upon the arrival of goods, wares, and merchandise within the state territories.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - Is not the other expression more comprehensive?

Dr. QUICK. - It is too comprehensive. It follows the packages beyond the frontier. What you want to secure is free passage across the frontier.

Mr. BARTON. - Free passage across the frontier and freedom from all preferences.

Dr. QUICK. - Yes; freedom from all preferences or obstructions. The danger is that the words "throughout the Commonwealth" would attach restrictions or disabilities to the local authorities. The words "between the states" seem to give expression to what is intended. We should not leave room for doubt hereafter. I therefore support the suggestion made by the Attorney-General of Victoria, and I am pleased to notice the tone in which it has been received by the leader of the Convention.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). - I desire to call attention to the fact that in Canada the provision is "the regulation of trade and commerce." That comes closer to the spirit of clause 89, and it appears in the section in the Canadian Act which corresponds with clause 52 in this Bill.

Mr. BARTON. - Clause 52 says, the regulation of trade and commerce with foreign countries and among the several states.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The Canadian Constitution stops short at the word "commerce," and may mean any part of the Dominion of Canada. In Wheeler's book on the Confederation of Canada a number of decisions are given as to the effect of this provision. One of them was that a local licence which amounted to prohibition of trade was illegal. That throws considerable light on the meaning of clause 89 in our Bill. In America the provision applies to the regulation of trade between the various states, and under that it was held that it was quite competent for a state to make trade regulations between the different parts of its own territory. It we fall back on the American system, we may put it in the power of one colony to, grant trade concessions that may derogate from the freedom of trade between the various states. As between one part of New South Wales and another, concessions might be granted on traffic, although the goods did not cross the border. These concessions would have the same effect as if they extended beyond the border, because they might apply over a considerable distance, and only cease at a point within 2 or 3 miles from the border.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I think that the object of this clause is clearly only to infer that there shall be no duties of customs, or charges of that character, upon the transit of goods from one state to another. I do not think it means anything more than that. I quite agree with the criticisms of Mr. Isaacs as to the generality of the clause. I have read the valuable criticism of Sir Samuel Griffith, and it appears to me that we might very well adopt something in the nature of his suggestion as to defining the meaning of this sub-section. That is, we might use some such words as "the free course of trade and commerce between different parts of the Commonwealth is not to be restricted or interfered with by any taxes, charges, or imposts."

Mr. ISAACS. -

Section 121 of the Canadian Act provides that-

All articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any one of the provinces shall from and after the union be admitted free into each of the other provinces.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That is narrower still.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The reference Mr. Isaacs has just made would be completely followed by the adoption of some such words as Sir Samuel Griffith suggests. I would urge that this clause should be passed in its present form, and that the Drafting Committee should undertake to alter its wording in the way Sir Samuel Griffith recommends.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I like the clause as it stands. There is nothing more important than to have a clear and explicit declaration like this in the Constitution. It is unmistakable. The clause declares that-

So soon as uniform duties of customs have been imposed trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free.

Any limitation that needs to be placed on that should be placed on it as a limitation. If the clause covers licence or anything else that ought not to be covered by it, then insert a limitation accordingly in the Bill, but do not alter this provision, which contains a cardinal principle of our Commonwealth in favour of absolute free-trade within its borders.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Make it "between the states."

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

No; it should remain as it stands-"throughout the Commonwealth." Those words are quite clear.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The Commonwealth is all one territory.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Exactly. As far as the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth is concerned, all the states are one. They are formed into one Commonwealth, and when we say "throughout the Commonwealth," we mean throughout this aggregation of states. In this clause you have a broad general declaration, which is good for all time, whereas if you endeavour to put in an accurate definition of what you precisely mean it would probably be found as the result that something has been left out, something that we have not thought of at the present time. I say, rather let us leave these broad general words to stand exactly as they are, and if we can think of any necessary limitations at present let us put them in. Above all things, do not take out of the Bill what I consider to be one of its best declarations-that after this Commonwealth Tariff is established, there shall be no possibility of tampering with the absolute freedom of trade throughout the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We are all willing to provide for absolute free-trade between the states-for inter-state free-trade-but this means a lot more than that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I cannot foresee. I cannot pretend to have the gift of prescience which would enable me to know how ultimately a coach and four may be driven through this Constitution. But I say let those who want limitations propose their insertion in the Bill. I would prefer to leave the main enactment in this clause exactly as it stands. It may be that the words of Sir Samuel Griffith represent all he can think of. Perhaps they may represent all that can be wanted at any time; but it is just possible that something may be omitted from them something which might derogate from this freedom of trade which we intend to have throughout the Commonwealth. Then, I ask honorable members to consider this: Although the clause says that trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth shall be absolutely free, you have to look through this Constitution at the other provisions, which show clearly what is the intention. This is a broad central declaration; the rest you gather from a perusal of other provisions of the Bill. I think the fears of Mr. Isaacs in the particulars he mentioned are not well founded.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

There was no occasion for this clause in the Constitution of the United States.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

No; but many times during the discussion of this Bill we have been referred to this clause as being a strong clause—a clause strengthening this Constitution as compared with the Constitution of the United States. Because it is in this Constitution, and it is not contained in the Constitution of the United States, this clause has been referred to over and over again as one of the broad declarations clearly made in this Constitution, but which has got to be inferred from the Constitution of the United States. It is a broad declaration that was necessary for the foundation of the Bill, and which makes any superstructure that may be built upon it absolutely safe and secure. I hope that, on consideration, this clause will be allowed to stand as it is. If limitations are necessary, let them be put in as limitations, but let the broad declaration in this clause remain.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I think it is fortunate that we have had the advantage of hearing one of the legal members of the Convention say all that possibly can be said in support of the terminology of this clause. The vagueness of the reasons offered by the honorable member who has objected to the proposed amendment, on the ground that we do not know what may happen, should be noted. He is not able to point to anything that would happen which would not be met by the proposed amendment. It is ample to meet the case. Perhaps the honorable member was not present when the leader of the Convention called attention to the fact—and it appeared to me a final answer to all his objections—that this clause requires to be read with clause 95, and that, taken together, they afford complete protection against any possible interference with freedom of trade and intercourse. Clause 95 puts an absolute prohibition on anti-federal action by any state, and might be considered in itself ample for all requirements. It sets forth that—

Any law or regulation made by the Commonwealth, or by any state, or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth, or by any state, having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth shall be null and void.

That in itself, it appears to me, is ample for all requirements. At the same time, to meet the view, which the honorable member very reasonably expressed, that in this Constitution we should put beyond all doubt a prohibition that is a matter of inference and construction in the American Constitution, we add, in addition to clause 95, this provision. With the verbal amendment suggested nothing is withdrawn from the force and efficacy of the clause as it stands. This clause will put beyond all question the determination of this Convention, and of the future Constitution, that trade and intercourse in all parts of this Commonwealth shall be absolutely free. And that end being attained by the amendment, what need have we to go beyond that, as evidently we do, by using words in this connexion which elsewhere in the Bill are used with a wider jurisdiction? Why use a vague expression which may possibly seriously interfere with state administration in some minor departments, which have been up to now, and always will be, expressly left to the states?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). —

I should like to hear the honorable leader of the Convention say whether this clause as it stands might not interfere very materially with the carrying out of certain state laws in regard to the internal trade of a state? That is to say, whether it would not absolutely, as a fact, prevent any one state from exercising its law in regard to hawking goods about the country? It might very well be that one state would have a law absolutely prohibiting hawking in every shape and form. Well, clearly, such a law as that would seriously interfere with the provision which says that any goods transported from one end of the Commonwealth to the other shall be absolutely free. Now, there is another point which will be of some importance to a large body of people, and that is the question of alcoholic liquors - the question whether they are free under this clause as it stands to pass from one state into another, and from one part of that state to another part, without any regard whatever to the local laws relating to alcoholic liquors.
I think that we ought to be satisfied on these points, and satisfied that if we leave the clause as it now stands there will, at any rate, be some proviso inserted which will safeguard the states in the carrying out of any of their state laws over which the states are to be supreme even under federation.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

Quite apart from the question of trade between state and state, is it not necessary that the Commonwealth itself should have some power for the restriction and the regulation of trade? The words "absolutely free" are infinite in their application, and they seem to me to take away from the Commonwealth the power to restrict and regulate trade within the confines of the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

We are not at those words yet; we are considering the words throughout the Commonwealth."

Dr. COCKBURN. -

But the whole clause is before the committee, and it goes a great deal further than any of its advocates clearly intend. I support the remarks of Mr. Isaacs in urging that some such limitation should be inserted, not only with the view of seeing that the clause goes no further than is desirable in the restriction of the states, but also in order that it shall not tie the hands of the Commonwealth itself, but shall allow it to impose such restrictions and regulations of trade throughout the Commonwealth as may, from time to time, in the interests of the people, appear to be necessary.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In answer to my right honorable friend (Sir Edward Braddon), I have no hesitation in expressing my opinion. I thought I had expressed it clearly before. There is at any rate the possibility, even taking this clause with other parts of the Bill, that it might be so read as to interfere with a state's own right of regulating that kind of internal trade which is quite unconnected with interstate commerce. It is for that reason that I thought there was so much force in the remarks of Mr. Isaacs. I should not like to be taken to concur in any suggestion that it is intended that there shall be any power in the Commonwealth to restrict trade in any part of the Commonwealth. I think it should be laid down in terms which no Parliament can over-ride that there shall be absolute unrestricted trade between all parts of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Does the leader of the Convention propose to take the sense of the committee upon the substance of the words—that the words "throughout the Commonwealth" be left out, and that the words "between the states" be inserted—leaving it to the Drafting Committee to redraft the clause
Mr. BARTON. -

Yes; I will take the vote of the committee upon that matter.

The amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia, to strike out the words "throughout the Commonwealth" and to substitute the words "between the states" was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It is suggested to add some words to the end of the clause. There are three suggestions—one from the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, one from the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of South Australia, and one from the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia. They are practically identical.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

There is a suggestion from the Drafting Committee which I think should come first. Accordingly I beg to move—

That the following words be added as a new paragraph at the end of the clause:
