Something has been said by Mr. Holder about placing us in a worse position, and giving the bond-holders all the benefit of the conversion. That is partly true and partly not true. There is no doubt to my mind that it is probable that there will be no great system of conversion for some years to come, because we have floated our loans for a certain period, and many of them have been floated on such magnificent terms for the investor, as compared with the rate of interest that is paid now, that it is not likely that any bond-holder will allow a system of conversion unless such terms are given to him as would increase the capital debt of the respective colonies to an extent that could never be permitted. On the other hand, I agree with what Mr. Holder has said, that while we are leaving the debts of the colonies, and while I make that remark about the improbability of conversion at present, we must not shut out from our minds that there might be a conversion under certain conditions. But I say that, if there ever is a conversion, that conversion will be much better done when the Federal Treasurer takes the thing in hand quietly, perhaps secretly, negotiating with the different states, holding all the strings by mutual consent, and then says in one flash to the English creditors: "We offer you so-and-so; take it or leave it." If that conversion is not determined upon, you will have to wait until your loans expire. But I quite agree with the honorable member that if there is any benefit in consolidating those loans, the moment you try to do it you increase credit, and make future conversion almost impossible. That is the logic of the whole affair. I have always felt that in this Constitution we are dealing with that which requires a great deal of reserve and caution. We hear very much about the necessity for courage and about want of pluck, but it is far better to be on the safe side in matters of this kind. We do not want to pile up obstacles to this federation, and I do not myself, as a man of some experience in these matters, think that we shall do any good by interfering at the present stage with our debts and our railways, which form the key to the credit of these colonies, and the key to our development and economy. These questions are too intricate for this Convention to settle upon any concrete scheme. Therefore the amendment which I have introduced is of the simplest possible character. It is to allow the Federal Parliament to take over a part or the whole of the debt of any state, with the consent of the state, on terms that may be agreed upon. Now, I do not introduce the provision with regard to getting the consent of the states with the idea that there shall be any partial taking over of loans, but I feel that you must get the consent of each state, and that we have no right to arrogate at the present moment these terms to the different states. I hold that it is unfair to say that the Parliament shall take over the whole of the different loans. Our safest plan is to leave that matter just as we have left the question of the railways under section 52. It is there provided that the Parliament may take over the railways on terms that may be agreed upon, and that that may be done after the Federal Constitution has been a year or two in working, and when you have all the strings, and all the knowledge, and all the ability which is necessary for a great transaction of this kind. I believe that that will be the time to face it, and that it will be wiser not to attempt to do it at the present moment. I am perfectly certain that we might go on arguing here for several weeks with regard to different schemes for taking over the debts and consolidating them, but we must either say that the debts are to be taken over at their present rate of interest, and that the Federal Parliament shall make itself responsible, or we must leave the matter as it is. But again, just as in the case of the railways, we want to know what about future construction.

So this involves the question of future borrowing. Are you going to have one consolidated loan, or are you going to simply take over these loans, and allow the colonies to borrow independently, and have two systems?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We cannot do that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Nobody thinks of such a thing for a moment; but that shows you the great difficulties, and who is going to say to anyone of these states-unless there is one well-laid scheme about future borrowing and future action between these states and the Federal Parliament in these matters-who is going to say that any state is not going to borrow for certain local purposes? If you take over the state debts now, and before some scheme can be properly adopted by the Federal Parliament, are you going to have a hiatus in this matter, so that the states cannot borrow for their own necessities. If you leave the whole thing as it is some scheme may be arranged by the Federal Parliament involving not merely the terms of taking over these loans, but the conditions upon which future loans shall be raised, and also for properly meeting the debts or loans which must be met during the next few years. It seems to me that will be a much more reasonable and practical way of dealing with the subject. I would, therefore, urgently beg of the Convention at this stage not to attempt to solve a puzzle, but to leave the matter as it is, and allow that federal spirit and that federal ability which must be concentrated in the Parliament of the Commonwealth to ultimately solve it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Why do you want the consent of the state?

S (Western Australia). - From what has been already said, I think we should all come to the conclusion-at any rate, I have-that any attempt to make this clause with regard to the public debts one of finality at the present time, is not likely to be successful. It seems to me that this clause as it is, if you amend it to some extent, ought to meet the requirements of every one. If the clause were amended so as to allow the Parliament to take over the whole or a rateable proportion of the public debts of any of the colonies with the consent of the state, from time to times whether these debts existed at the time the Commonwealth was instituted or not, it should meet all the requirements of the case.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

If you take my proposal it will cover everything practically.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I was not present when the honorable remember read it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I will move it as an amendment to Mr. Glynn's.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I have no objection to the honorable members moving it, but it seems to me that the proposal in the Bill with a little modification, as suggested by me, making it a little wider, will really meet the whole case.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The honorable member will not submit his own Assembly's amendment.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No, although I have given the matter a great deal of consideration, and will have a word or two to say with regard to it before I sit down. The debts of the various colonies are so unequal, whether in regard to the population or with regard to the male adults, or with regard to the male and female adults, that it would be impossible to take over all the debts of the colonies on an average even with regard to the population or the adults without giving to some states the right to borrow a considerably larger amount, so that they might come up to the average, or to leave to many of the states a considerable portion of their debts. The public debts of the various colonies run from £41 per head, or something like it, in the case of Victoria, to £67 per head in Queensland, £69 in South Australia, £50 in Tasmania, and something like £45 or £48 for Western Australia, and £46 for New South Wales.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

In Victoria does that include borrowing for the deficit?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It does not include that; it only includes the public debt and not the accrued deficit.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It amounts to about £41 per head of the population in Victoria. The average of all the debts of Australia is about £50 per head. If we take the adult males the average is £166 per head. If we take the adults, male and female, the average is £96 per head. I have had a table prepared which shows that the lowest average per head of adult males and females is about £76 per head, that is, in the case of Victoria. If we were to take an equivalent of that. per head of the population of the various colonies we should leave a large amount of debt to many of the colonies. I think the only colony that would not have borrowed up to the amount of £76 per head would be my colony—the debt of which would be £750,000 under the amount. I do not think it will be satisfactory to adopt such a plan. The various colonies would not care to hand over a portion of their debt, and be responsible for another portion. There are great difficulties, as far as I am able to judge, in the way of converting the debts from one scheme to another, unless they are near maturity. We had an excellent speech on this subject from Mr. Holder, in Sydney, and he quite convinced me that we should be playing into the hands of the stock-holders by giving them a better security while not getting any reward for the colonies. We do not desire that to occur. If we talk for two or three days on this matter, as we have on many others, I am sure we shall not be able to come to a satisfactory conclusion at present with regard to taking over the debts at the institution of the Commonwealth. Therefore, I hope the clause as it is in the Bill will be approved of. If I had my way I should like to have it widened. I do not think that the Federal Parliament should interfere with a state's finances unless the state desires that that should be done. I think the words "from time to time" should be inserted in the clause, so that it would refer to the date of the institution of the Constitution or any time afterwards. It should not apply to the existing debts only, It should apply to the debts at any time. I would make the clause read-"The Parliament may, with the consent of the state, from time to time, take over the whole or a rateable proportion of the public debts of such state." I would strike out the words "as existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth," and then I would let the remainder of the clause stand. That I think, would give full power to the Commonwealth, and would meet all the requirements of the states. If we attempt at present to bind the Commonwealth to take over the debts we shall never come to a common agreement. The question is too complicated, and the time would be inopportune; whereas, if we give power to the Commonwealth whenever it likes, with the consent of the state, it will be able to take advantage of certain conditions and circumstances when the debts mature, or at any other favorable opportunity for conversion. By that means, while we shall be reserving to the states the full control over their debts, while we shall be prohibiting Parliament from interfering with the public debt of any state without its consent, we shall be giving full power to the Commonwealth from time to time to deal with this matter, with the consent of the states, in any way that will be to the advantage of the states and of the Commonwealth.

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -

I have listened with very much pleasure, as usual, to the admirable speech of Mr. McMillan, but I could not help arriving at the conclusion that he had surrounded this question by a maze of difficulties which he was not himself disposed to see the way clearly out of. He has left us with a maze around us, and it is for us to clear away that maze. I think the maze

[P.1554] starts here in which he has left us arises from the fact that he has complicated the question very unnecessarily If honorable members will read carefully the amendment which I shall propose presently, they will see that we need not complicate the question with conversion. There is no necessity just now to speak about the possible future conversion of our debt. There is no necessity just now to inquire why that debt was incurred. It was incurred in some instances for railways which give a profit—a direct profit—and in some instances for railways which give only an indirect profit, to the people of the country. It was incurred, as Mr. McMillan has said, sometimes at 6 per cent., sometimes at 5, 4, and even down to 3 per cent. It has a currency of from 1 to 30 or 35 years. But these are all complications which had better be swept away. We do not need just now to inquire into the question as to when the Federal Parliament will attempt to convert, and I do not know that we need do more than consider the great and important question of consolidation. Conversion must come, and it must come at the time that will be most convenient to the Federal Executive. The amendment which I am about to propose will reserve fully to the Federal Executive the power to choose its own time. We shall thus have disposed of the difficulty—not a difficulty to me, but a difficulty in the minds of very many—that directly this Convention includes in its compact an agreement that the Federal Parliament shall consolidate and convert, that moment it gives to the consolidated or federal debt a higher value than it has at the present time. I propose to overcome that difficulty by leaving it optional with the Federal Executive to take its own opportunity for such conversion, and if it takes that opportunity, then we shall have disposed, at any rate, of one of the most important difficulties of the maze in which we have been left. Surely it is of no importance to consider, as a Federation, just now, whether Tasmania, which only earns 1.15 per cent. from its railways over their working expenses, has deemed it prudent to construct these railways for the auxiliary advantages to its people. It is not necessary surely that I should now attempt to prove that for every £1,000 the state loses in the shape of interest its people are gaining £2,000 or £3,000. There would be no difficulty in showing that. And if South Australia earns 3 per cent. beyond her working expenses, while Tasmania only earns 1.15 per cent., we can show that our people have realized more of the advantages or as much of the advantages as the New South Wales or South Australian people have realized on their lines. The great question, therefore, just now is not conversion, and I hope honorable members will dismiss that from their minds. Do not let us embarrass our present considerations by the possibilities of future conversion. Neither need we embarrass ourselves with the consideration of the fact that the debt has various currencies. As to those various currencies, if honorable members will turn to a paper which was lately issued above the name, I believe, of Mr. Fenton, the Government Statist of Victoria, they will find that as to currency all the colonies have been working upon various lines. The proportionate debts of each of the colonies due in 1900, 1905, 1910, and so on, are as nearly as possible approximate. We shall not, therefore, upon such lines be unequal, and certain it is that as to the question of the rates of interest paid there is no, or very little, inequality between the whole of the colonies. We all began at 6 per cent., and Tasmania is now wiping off the last £100,000, this or next year, of her 6 per cents., and we are coming down to 31/2 and 3 per cent. We shall find, if we investigate the figures laid before the Convention, that in that respect also each of the states stands in nearly the same position—that the face rates of interest we are paying are approximately the same. But, turning to another important point, and that is not the question of the face value, but the question of the effective rate which is being paid in the world's money market, we shall find that, for the whole of Australia, according to the figures that I took out, we are getting our money at £2 18s. 6d. per cent. That is the effective rate—the rate which is received by our various investors from all Australia.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That is on the present market values?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Yes, on the recent market values. As far as Tasmania is concerned, I am in the proud position of not being troubled at all in that respect, because our effective rate is £2 16s. 6d. But since these figures were taken out we have had the extraordinary example of Western Australia, popular in its stocks, which has raised money at £3 per cent., and whose £3 face rate is now running down, so that its effective rate will be even less than £2 18s.
6d. in a very short time, So that the figures to which Mr. McMillan referred may be all swept away. We need not trouble ourselves with respect to the amount of Customs revenue which each state has collected; that has very little to do with the matter in one respect, because New South Wales pays her interest out of her earnings, while Tasmania, which stands at the other extreme, is compelled to raise Customs revenue in order to pay the interest upon her indebtedness. We have all found it necessary to raise Customs revenue except New South Wales.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

She raises nearly £2,000,000 of Customs revenue.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Here is Victoria earning her 3 per cent. also on her lines, and she has found it necessary to raise a Customs revenue. New South Wales does not find it necessary to raise a Customs revenue, because of her immense territorial revenue.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
She raises a large amount from Customs.

Sir PHILIP FYSHER. -
Only about 20s. or 25s. per head-not a million and a quarter.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
About a million and a half.

Sir PHILIP FYSHER. -
Under a Tariff which is to be still further reduced; and when Mr. Reid's free-trade Tariff is in full operation, I think the amount will not be 25s. per head, or a million and a quarter altogether. So we may wipe away all these difficulties, get out of this maze, and come back to the one question-the question that was before us in 1891, and again at Adelaide. The mind of the Premier of Western Australia is harping back to what was done in 1891. We could then only agree to the proposal that the public debts of the colonies should be taken over, subject to their consent; but where would that provision land us? New South Wales or Victoria might object to her debts being taken over. Of course, South Australia would agree to the consolidation of her debts. That colony is in an extraordinary condition. Her Customs revenue only makes up about three-fourths of the amount of interest due upon her public debts, while Tasmania, on the other hand, makes up by her Customs revenue the whole of the interest upon her public debts and £50,000 in addition. The purpose of the amendment which I propose to move is to get rid of these inequalities, and to provide a balance of loss upon the services taken over, so that there will remain £5,500,000 for them to play with. We have trusted the Federal Parliament in regard to the disposal of this money, because it will be composed of representatives from each state, and we believe that they will take care that the Federal Executive does not squander the revenue. If this contract is to secure the position of the people of the various states, let us charge upon the Federal Executive the most important of all our responsibilities-that of honestly paying our debts in the sight of all men.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We are doing that now.

Sir PHILIP FYSHER. -
Yes, we are using our revenue to do that now, but if we federate it may be difficult for the right honorable member to continue to do that.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
How will you do it?
Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

I will come to that presently. When we federate, Western Australia will have to give up a part of her revenue to the Federal Parliament, and she will get back just what the Parliament pleases. In my opinion, it would be better to impose upon the Federal Parliament the responsibility of upholding the credit of the states before all the world.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The honorable member would have them pay for us £1,000,000, and return £550,000.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

I would have the Federal Parliament make provision to pay to South Australia £963,000 of interest, with its share of the original expenditure-£40,000, that is the per capita distribution, and its share of the £1,250,000 loss upon various departments. As the Federal Executive would thus receive only £750,000, there would be a deficiency of £400,000 so far as South Australia is concerned. One of the difficulties of the honorable member who sits below me is that we must base our calculations as to the future position of South Australia-which colony, unfortunately, in this respect stands in the worst accountant's position of any-upon the supposition that there will be a Federal Tariff which will return to all the colonies not less than they are receiving at the present time. It is admitted that the Federation will be unable to maintain the credit of the various colonies except upon a Tariff which will return to each of them as nearly as possible £2 per head. In that case, so far as my present figures are concerned, South Australia will be the amount behind that I have referred to. She is the only colony in that unfortunate position. What is the position of the honorable member (Mr. Holder) now? It has suited South Australia, whether by probate duties or from profit upon telegrams-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

From probate duties lately.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Yes.

Mr. REID. -

How is it that you have run so deeply into debt in Tasmania? I see that your public debt is equal to £50 a head.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

To benefit our people, to lift Tasmania out of the Cinderella's position that she has hitherto occupied, to give her roads, and to develop her railways and mines. Now, we are reaping the great advantage of having exported £1,100,000 worth of metallurgical minerals last year.
That is a good financial operation.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

It is a good one. And we have raised our Customs rates, during the last four years, by 50 per cent.

Mr. HOLDER. -

You are now the beautiful princess of the group.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

I hope the Chairman will call to order honorable members who are interjecting.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You charge 20 per cent. all round.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

I do not think it would be wise to go into the Tariff question just now. Tasmania is a free-trade colony, trying to keep pace with New South Wales. Mr. Holder led me off the thread of my discourse. I have just said, that so far as South Australia is concerned, it is admitted that that colony is making good the deficiency out of other sources, and she can continue to do so. We are not going to take away any state rights, and we shall have a claim on that colony for £400,000 or £500,000, which she will be as well able to pay as she is able to-day to maintain her credit before the world. Under the same circumstances Tasmania will be deficient £40,000, and that is, as nearly as possible, what I find from figures for past year, she collected on the products of her labour. In order that we may live as we profess to do, as brothers on this great continent, Tasmania is prepared to abandon that £40,000. Tasmania is in the happy position of being able to do that and yet have a magnificent surplus. South Australia does not say there is any difficulty about finding the money, and so far as Tasmania is concerned there is no difficulty. I do not ask the Convention to consolidate the debts, nor do I ask that conversion should be immediately considered. All I say is that the Federal Executive will have a surplus of £5,500,000, and will be charged with the responsibility of paying away £6,000,000, or half-a-million more than her surplus; the amount of interest which each colony would otherwise have to pay. It will simply be paid by the Federation instead of by individual states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That will not make the Federation raise any particular amount of money, because whenever the Federation is short it will be charge against the states.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
New South Wales and Victoria will have a handsome surplus.

Mr. Reid. -
Call it a credit balance.

Sir Philip Fysh. -
I am always assuming that Queensland will be with us. Queensland would be deficient £400,000; New South Wales would have a credit balance—I will use Mr. Reid's words—of about £80,000, and Victoria would have a credit balance of about £300,000. Western Australia would have a balance of £30,000, while South Australia and Tasmania would have a debit balance.

Mr. Holder. -
What rate have you put down for the Customs and Excise of New South Wales!

Sir Philip Fysh. -
I have put down as a basis the Tariff which must be obtained to keep the various colonies solvent, namely, 40s. per head.

Mr. Holder. -
How much will New South Wales contribute?

Sir Philip Fysh. -
It will contribute about £2,260,000. We all know that New South Wales has been the bete noire of federation.

Mr. Reid. -
Don't say that.

Sir Philip Fysh. -
I do not use the word offensively, but, if my honorable friend objects, I will use the word "difficulty." An honorable member has said that a proposal of this kind will force New South Wales to a Tariff beyond her needs at the present moment. How often have we listened to that remark by Mr. Reid and other representatives of New South Wales? Has that not been the great difficulty hitherto—that, whatever Tariff is necessary for the other colonies, we give to New South Wales an excess of revenue which she does not want? That has been our greatest difficulty.

Sir John Forrest. -
What is your proposal?

Sir Philip Fysh. -
The proposal is—
The Commonwealth shall, when fair terms can be obtained for conversion of any stock, consolidate such stock or any part thereof into "Australian Federal Consols."

Sir John Forrest. -
That is not different to the clause in the Bill.
Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

It is a little unfortunate that my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) interjects so often. The clause in the Bill simply gives power to the Federal Parliament to do so when it finds it convenient. The clause says that the Federal Parliament "may." But here it is provided that the Commonwealth "shall," provided the terms to be got in the money market are satisfactory.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Satisfactory to whom?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Satisfactory to the Federal Executive-to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. REID. -

You don't say so in this.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Under what authority would the Federal Executive act, and to whom would the Federal Administration be responsible?

Mr. REID. -

Have an Act to define what would be fair terms for the consolidation of the stock.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

The words are there for the purpose of meeting the objection that the Federal Executive shall do something, with a proviso. I do not object to the terms that the Federal Parliament shall consolidate the debts.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Without consulting the state?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Yes.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Oh no, they can't do that.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

The right honorable member last year agreed to this very clause which says that the Federal Executive may.

Mr. HOLDER. -

With the consent of the state.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

There was nothing about the consent of the state.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We altered that.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

We altered that in Adelaide this year. There has been an evolution in this matter, as in everything else. The only thing is, that in this evolution I find myself rather beyond some of my honorable friends. The evolution did not commence in 1891, but long prior. A gentleman, whose name I forget, but who occupied an important position in the financial world, as a prominent member of the London Stock Exchange, paid us a visit a few years ago.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Mr. Westgarth.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Ah, that is the name. I had forgotten it for the moment. He impressed upon every Government of Australia the desirability of taking the step to which I now refer. The contents of his pamphlets will ever be fresh in my mind. I have been watching this subject very closely. The financial press, not only of England, but of Europe, has been giving attention to it for years past, and all this has led to the conclusion that we cannot very much longer delay consolidating our debts. The colonial press has been following on the same lines. It is only when I come to consult the honorable members sitting below me that I find there are so many difficulties to be surmounted. There has been an evolution in this matter. Year by year we have had examples of the advantages that will accrue to us from the adoption of this plan, but we have not yet heard what are the disadvantages. I am hoping to hear from Mr. Reid what the disadvantages are.

Mr. REID. -
I have to go to Sydney to-night; how long are you going to be?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
What time does your train go?

Mr. REID. -
About eight o'clock.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
Oh!

Mr. REID. -
I mean five o'clock.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
It is very unkind of my right honorable friend to address me in these terms, because I have taken as much care as any man to conserve the time of the Convention.

Mr. REID. -
Hear, hear; you have been getting this up.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
No; it is a subject I have been familiar with for a number of years. Whilst some of my honorable friends have been taking a great interest in rivers, I have been devoting my attention to the consideration of statistical information about national debts. Mr. Westgarth's pamphlet so impressed me with the desirability of our acting as one people in this respect that I have never forgotten what he said.

We talk of being Australians, but we hear a great deal about New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Western Australia in our discussions. I want honorable members to put out of their minds the fact that we are six separate peoples. We ought not to be six separate peoples with six separate interests, but one people with one interest.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

And one debt.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Yes, and one financial agency. Although we have not yet got to that true federal position in which we would throw the whole of our revenue into a pool and divide it per capita, still we have advanced so far that we recognise that instead of going into the world's money markets, competing against each other as we do, from time to time, it would be to our advantage to consolidate our debts.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We are not competing in the money markets.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

We have been, and we shall continue to do so.

Mr. REID. -

There is room for competition.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

There is no room for competition in this respect. A partnership of commercial men would scout the idea. They would say-"We will work for one common object, and that is the benefit of the whole." In this matter of our debts we have heretofore been working with separate objects, and with what results? The six colonies of Australia maintain six financial agencies in England. We are paying six separate rates for the flotation and management of our debts, from £100 per £1,000,000 per annum up to £600 per £1,000,000 per annum. We have been paying in England for work which we could very well do for ourselves.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We get our money very cheaply.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

We could get it more cheaply. I would call the right honorable member's attention to his own statistics. He raised money the other day at a little over £100, but the flotation of the loan did not cost him less than £2 or £2 10s.
per cent.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
   No, £1.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
   The reserve was £96 or £97. Western Australia has at the present time a 3 per cent. loan which is quoted at over £100.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
   No.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
   I saw it quoted at, I think, £100 6s., and I will venture to say that the flotation of that loan cost Western Australia from £2 to £2 10s. per cent. In addition to that it cost her for banking expenditure in connexion with the flotation of loans, the payment of interest, and the paying off of loans, a sum of money which was somewhat appalling when one came to consider it. I had an opportunity, some time ago, of calling the attention of the Federal Council to the actual facts, and I was able to point out that the Australian colonies are expending not less than £200,000 unnecessarily in consequence of their having these six separate agencies. That money, would be saved to the colonies if there was one federal agency empowered to do in England what the French people do with respect to their debt-receive the money across the counter without any expenditure. I have been able to set an example on a small scale in the colony which I have the extreme felicity of owning as my adopted home—Tasmania. I might almost say, from my long association with it, that it is my native home. It is as good to me as a native home, and I am proud of the country and of its people. By having a federal agency in London we could save the large sum of money I have mentioned. In addition to that, by consolidation we should give to our debts the joint and several guarantees of six states instead of one, and we should attract a class of investor whom we have never had before. I allude to the trustee investor.

Mr. DOBSON. -
   I hope so.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
   For these investments the consent of the Lords Judiciary would have to be obtained. And directly you do that you have a class of investor who will come across your counter, as I have said, and invest without the intermediary of the London Stock Exchange, or the syndicates who charge you so much. On a matter which concerns £170,000,000, on which the colonies are paying £7,000,000 a year, we hesitate, but with respect to ocean beacons and lights, patent laws, and many unimportant matters, we consider it necessary to include them in the powers of the Parliament. My right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) objects to inserting in the Constitution as a power of the Parliament that they shall take over the debts of the various colonies and consolidate them. I am very anxious to hear the objections which may be raised by my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid), and when I have heard those objections, on another occasion I will take advantage of my right to address the committee again. I therefore defer the amendment which I have to make, although I had intended to traverse the proposal of Mr. Glynn, and wished to fully explain the amendment which has been suggested by the Tasmanian Parliament. Mr. Glynn has spoken for himself, and I hope that Mr. Henry will relieve me by presently stating the reasons which have induced a majority of the Tasmanian Parliament to recommend a proportionate taking over of the debts, or the whole of them, under certain considerations. I have made a proposal that the whole of the interest on the debts shall be paid by the Federal Parliament; the remainder must follow. I do not follow that out to its sequence. Having done that, I hope that we will make an arrangement by which no state which is not well in credit with the Federal Executive will make a further borrowing. We shall, no doubt, have the Federal Executive compelled to borrow. If you have the six states each borrowing that is seven, and to superload that with the right reserved to others to load up further debts, unless they are in a position of credit with the Federal Executive to do so, will be a very gross piece of extravagance and a great mistake. But there we come to that very important question of state rights. We must advance stage by stage. Let us charge against the surplus which the Federal Executive will hold all the responsibility for our interest. We shall know then that we have each secured our solvency. Surely we can leave it to the Parliament of the Federation to make a proper provision as to what shall be the future borrowing. Knowing that my honorable friend (Mr. Henry) is desirous of taking up the other amendment which has been proposed by the Tasmanian Parliament, for the present I will leave the matter with that proposal.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I regret that my honorable friend (Sir Philip Fysh) has brought his interesting address to so abrupt a termination, as we are all anxious to fully understand the reasons which induced him to bring before us the proposition which I see on the notice-paper. I really feel that it would be unfair to criticise my honorable friend's speech when I came to the conclusion, as I must, that I have only heard the introductory matter, from which he intended to advance into a consideration of the whole subject. I cheerfully recognise the labour which he has bestowed on this most important matter. There is no member of the Convention who has given more time or attention to this subject than he has, and I am not forgetful of the very able addresses which he has delivered in Tasmania in very strong advocacy of this particular proposal. I have the utmost respect for the views he has enunciated, and I think when the matter is fully considered in the Federal Parliament we shall be found not to differ very seriously. But, at present, I am afraid that we cannot very well put in this proposed clause, or anything like it; and, as that is the general feeling of the Convention, I do not feel called upon, in a climate like this, to make any very arduous or strenuous attempts to reply to my honorable friend. I think it is generally felt that the Commonwealth cannot be given this arbitrary power of taking over the debts of the states without the slightest reference to the states themselves.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

We have done it already in clause 98.

Mr. REID. -

Does clause 98 do that without the consent of the states?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Yes.

Mr. REID. -

Then I am all the more strongly inclined to support the proposal of Mr. McMillan, which I see on the notice-paper. I was not aware that it was done in clause 98, but I see that it is. I should certainly have been opposed to that clause remaining in its present form if I had noticed that provision.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The clause is now under consideration.

Mr. REID. -

We have got away from it a little, and I am much obliged to you, sir, for reminding me of it. I see that, in clause 98, the Federal Parliament may take over the whole or a rateable proportion of the public debts of the states without any consent. I fancy that I had left Adelaide before the clause was considered.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

You were in it.

Mr. REID. -

I do not think so.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It was in the Finance Committee, I think.

Mr. REID. -

I think my honorable friend will recollect that I strongly opposed it in the Finance Committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Yes.

Mr. REID. -

I had forgotten all about that. I have the strongest possible objection to such a clause. And I have a very grave doubt as to whether the solvency of the states can in any healthy sense be said to be promoted if there is a transfer of liabilities without some corresponding transfer of assets. Whoever heard, for instance, of a business partnership being allowed to be constructed on the principle that the partners shall make away with all the assets before they enter into business?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

The Customs revenue is an asset.

Mr. REID. -

In one sense it is an asset, but it is not an interest-bearing asset.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Yes, it is.

Mr. REID. -

It is not an interest-bearing asset; and then that raises fiscal questions. As has been pointed out before, why should we be tied down to raise revenue in a particular way in order to meet a certain view entertained by the honorable gentleman? As far as the railways are concerned, we know that the most of the interest is due on loans obtained for their construction, and they are interest-bearing. If the liability is put off on the Commonwealth while the assets remain with the states, I fancy that there will be considerable opposition to such a scheme in the Imperial Parliament. I am not speaking without a certain amount of information. This project of handing over the debts of the states, while keeping the interest-bearing assets in respect of which those debts were incurred, is not viewed at all favorably in some circles amongst our creditors in the old country. I certainly do not wish this Constitution to be burdened with matters or details that can safely be left to the future; therefore, I cordially support the proposition of Mr. McMillan. It is short, it is clear, and it will enable all the delicate financial incidents of such a transaction to be carried out in a proper way. Now, any project for making the Commonwealth Legislature decide when the Stock Exchange is favorable, or when it is not, would be a most extraordinary method of dealing with delicate financial operations. The clause says-"The Commonwealth shall, when fair terms can be obtained for conversion," and so on. How infinitely better it would be to leave out words of that description! What Executive would convert a stock unless fair term were offered? In what conceivable way could the Commonwealth pass an Act in order to describe what would be fair terms? Perhaps a certain state of things would exist when the Act was passed, and one week afterwards those terms would shift and vary. Those are matters which must be left to the Executive.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Then comes in your objection that you have forfeited the premium on your stock.

Mr. REID. -

Leaving out all those words will not hurt anybody. It will not leave out the brains of the Treasurer who has to conduct the particular operation.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

It is not the words but the spirit we are anxious about.

Mr. REID. -

I utterly oppose the proposal that the debts of a colony shall be taken over by the Commonwealth without that colony's consent. I think that this project of consolidating the stock of the colonies, whilst one that is certain to come in due course, is one on which the most visionary and rashest prognostications are indulged in. There seems to be an idea that the consolidation of stock itself will yield a rich return, but that is a perfect delusion. If a man has got £10,000 worth of state stock at 4 per cent., he is not going to accept Commonwealth stock at 3 per cent. in exchange for it.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

You are talking now of conversion.

Mr. REID. -

Is not that a conversion?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

But you were talking just before of consolidation.

Mr. REID. -

What charm is there in consolidation if it is not accompanied by some change of conditions between the debtor and the creditor? It is only conversion that can bring about any change-converting one security at a certain rate of interest into a better security at a lower rate of interest.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

You would secure trustees' investments by consolidation, and is not that a gain?

Mr. REID. -

Certainly that would be a gain, I admit, by consolidation, but still the project would be a very lame one unless it went a little further, and made the new stock a genuine Commonwealth stock.

Mr. HOLDER. -
You could not consolidate unless you converted.

Mr. REID. -
I have such confidence in my honorable friend the Treasurer of Tasmania, in regard to matters of finance, that I am afraid I am inclined to follow him without reflection.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
It is your conversion he is thinking of just now.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
Ah, that will be a hard matter.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
But simple consolidation must precede conversion.

Mr. REID. -
Supposing the holders of the debentures that you want back won't give them up, where is your consolidation? It is a mere idle operation, the printing of new paper that the debenture-holder will not take.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
Do you mean to say that a debenture-holder will not take the joint and several guarantee of six states instead of one state? Why, he would give the one state debenture up directly in exchange for the other.

Mr. REID. -
A debenture-holder might give up the bonds of Tasmania for such a joint and several guarantee, but the holders of New South Wales bonds would not give them up for anything. As a matter of fact, if any colony like New South Wales, South Australia, or perhaps even Tasmania wants a loan it can get the money on the London market at something like 3 per cent. per annum, and what a wonderful proof it is of the solvency of these colonies when they can raise money on such terms. There is not much margin for a very great profit to be made by conversion at the best of times, and the only chance of converting to advantage will be when the debentures to be converted are nearly ran out. Then there is a chance of getting a new set of debentures placed at a lower rate of interest, leaving some substantial profit, and the conversion honorable members talk about will no doubt take place on those lines. If the Commonwealth gets power from the state to take over and consolidate their loans, that consolidation will be effected, and as each loan falls in the Commonwealth will get the benefit of converting it into new stock bearing a lower rate of interest. Because the individual who has been reaping interest from a debenture which he is just about to lose will have to fall back, when the loan is repaid, on British consols bearing a much lower rate, and, under those circumstances, he will take your new bond at a lesser rate of interest than he received before; but so long as his debenture has ten or five years to run, at a comparatively high rate of interest, he is not going to give it up. He wants the same interest, if he can get it, and, of course, he can retain it by keeping the bond.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Or by an extension of the term.

Mr. REID. -

That only operates when the bond is running out. Under all these circumstances, I think that we are simply wasting our time in going into all these calculations about operations that cannot possibly be effected for some time to come. It is only because I wanted to show my great respect for the attention and industry which Sir Phillip Fysh has devoted to this subject that I have made these observations, I can assure him, and, however earnest we are to bring about this consolidation and conversion, we cannot load this Constitution with matters of that sort. We can simply give a power which will enable the state and the Commonwealth to come to some arrangement.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Should that be with or without the consent of the state?

Mr. REID. -

With the consent of the state, certainly. Any state would absolutely resent the insertion in this Bill of the power to manage its own financial affairs without its consent.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

But one colony may stand out and spoil the whole scheme. That is the difficulty to my mind.

Mr. REID. -

It is a difficulty, but, as far as the internal finances of the states, are concerned, we cannot lay our hands on their independence in this Constitution. We cannot propose to do that.

Mr. DOBSON. -

But you take away the revenue that pays the interest on their debts.

Mr. REID. -

There is nothing in that between solvent communities.

Mr. DOBSON. -

There is nothing in giving over your revenue to the body who has taken over your liability.

Mr. REID. -

In other words, you would make the states the absolute financial creatures of the Commonwealth. No state that has got any financial strength will occupy such a position. Of course, if a state feels itself on its last legs it will creep into any hole it can get into, but New South Wales is not in that position, and no Australian colony is. If I thought that some Australian colony was in such a desperate condition it might alter my view of this matter, but I look on each of these colonies as absolutely sound. I admit that in the future we may save large sums of money in the shape of interest, considering the enormous total of our debts, by adopting the operation Sir Philip Fysh suggests.

Mr. DOBSON. -
But if in the course of the conversion of the debts of the colonies you have on each occasion to get the consent of each state, one state may object, and the whole scheme may fall through.

Mr. REID. -
But if any state gets into a difficulty-

Mr. DOBSON. -
We are not in a difficulty.

Mr. REID. -
I have just said so. But if in the future any state, say New South Wales, gets into a difficulty, Mr. McMillan's proposal will enable it to be assisted.

Mr. DOBSON. -
It will enable one state to stop conversion.

We must not lose sight of the fact that the sovereignty of the states is being left to them under this Constitution. We seem to be continually endeavouring to do things as though the states were mere puppets of the Commonwealth. But, as a matter of fact, the absolute sovereignty of the states is left to them, and they will not give up their sovereign position with regard to their debts to the Federal Parliament without being consulted. The proposal is so preposterous that it is not really worth discussing.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
You do not consult the people about the policy of taking over the customs duties.

Mr. REID. -
What is remitting the Bill to the people but consulting them? We have agreed to take over customs duties because we cannot federate without them. But we can federate without taking over the debts. We put the customs matter in because it was one of the essentials of Federation. We could not possibly leave it out. But you do not put everything in this Constitution on the same principle. If this were one of the essentials of union, I should say at once - "It must go in;" but it is not.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Is it not to the advantage of the states?

Mr. REID. -

It is to the advantage of every state to decide for itself as to its own debts.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -

I rise principally for the purpose of making clear to this Convention the terms of the suggestion submitted by the Tasmanian Parliament. My colleague (Sir Philip Fysh) has left me to discharge this duty. My honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) has outlined the proposal, but I think he left one or two rather important points untouched, and I propose, in the first instance, making them clear as far as I can. The proposal is really, first of all, that the whole of the public debts shall be taken over by the Commonwealth, but that whatever is found to be the lowest debt per head in any colony shall be the amount of which each and every colony shall be relieved. Thus, assuming that Victoria has a debt of £40 per head, and that that is the lowest debt in the Commonwealth-I do not say that it is so; I believe Victoria's debt is now £41 per head-then the whole of the colonies would be relieved of debt to the amount of £40 per head, under these resolutions; and the excess of debt in each colony over £40 per head (where there was an excess) each colony would itself be liable for. Thus in the case of South Australia the debt is about £65 per head. So that South Australia would be relieved of £40 per head, and would herself become liable to the Federal Parliament for the difference of £25 per head. It is due to my valued friend and colleague (Mr. Inglis Clark) to say that he is the author of these resolutions—not the author of the ideas in them, because we are all fairly in accord with the principle, but he framed the resolutions, and suggested certain thoughts now embodied in them, which are well worthy of the consideration of the Convention. I regret that I was not here when Mr. Reid spoke—having been called away on other business—because there may have been some points in his speech which I ought to touch upon.

Mr. REID. -

I simply favour Mr. McMillan's proposal.

Mr. HENRY. -

One of the interesting points in this scheme is as to the mode by which the states Treasurer would indemnify the Federal Treasurer for the loss of interest in the first instance. The proposal is that the states Parliament shall grant to the Federal Parliament Commonwealth bonds for the amount of their debts in excess of whatever the lowest debt may be. Mr. Higgins, while Mr. Glynn was speaking, interjected a rather pertinent question as to how the Federal Parliament was to compel a state to pay a debt. That difficulty has been discussed by our Parliament, and is met in these
It is simply this: That in the event of any state neglecting to pay the amount of interest on the bonds granted to the Commonwealth, then the Federal Parliament shall have power to levy a special tax on that state to recoup it for the loss. And it seems to me that in the event of any state repudiating an obligation to the Federal Parliament this proposal would be effectual. Of course we must all admit that it is exceedingly objectionable to give the Federal Parliament power to levy a special tax on any state, but under the exceptional circumstances I do not think that it would be objected to. The power might not be used, but it should be there, to enforce payment in ease of need. There is another ingenious and perfectly just contrivance in these clauses for dealing with the increase of population and the consequent reduction of liability of states to the Federal Parliament. Obviously these proposals in the first instance are based on the population of each colony. That is, the Federal Parliament is to relieve the states Parliaments or the states Treasurers of a certain amount per head of the population, so that all the states may be treated equally. It is obvious that, as the colonies develop, there may be a greater relative increase of population in one colony than in the others, so that clearly it would be necessary to make some provision for that increase. I think the proposal here meets that difficulty effectually. It is that every five years there shall be a census taken, and whatever the increase of population shown in any state, the Federal Parliament shall relieve that state of an amount of debt proportionate to the increase.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Taking a census every five years would be rather expensive.

Mr. HOWE. -

Every ten years, then.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We do it every ten years as it is.

Mr. HENRY. -

That is a matter of detail. The principle is what is important. I think myself that it is very possible that the ordinary statistics of population might be taken as a basis. That is, roughly, the Tasmanian proposal; and I would like to say in connexion with the proposal of Mr. Glynn that one portion of it seems to me to be a necessary addition to the Tasmanian proposals. Recognising the necessity of taking over the public debts of the colonies at this stage, I should be very glad to see Mr. Glynn's proposal incorporated in the proposal of Tasmania. That is the portion of it which proposes to reduce the debts to what is a just and equal proportion to be borne by each. I understand Mr. Glynn's proposal is this, and it is a thoroughly equitable one, put forward to meet the obvious distinction between the various classes of debt. One colony may have a larger amount of debt at a high rate of interest falling due shortly, another colony may have a large amount of debt with a long currency and a low rate of interest. It is, therefore, obvious that a per capita proportion of the debt is not strictly equitable, but by reducing it, as in Mr. Glynn's proposal—and I suppose it is an actuarial calculation, taking in the currency of the debt and the rate of interest—it could be reduced to a perfectly equitable sum.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Do you pay regard to the market value, the length of terms, and so on?

Mr. HENRY. -
I do not know that I will deal with the market value. What strikes me with regard to Mr. Glynn's proposal is the absolute necessity of reducing things to equality. I believe he successfully deals with that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Would not that be a matter for the Federal Parliament to legislate upon?

Mr. HENRY. -
We can lay down the principle.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Is it wise to lay down a principle that will not work out in practice?

Mr. HENRY. -
If the principle is sound it must work out in practice. I thoroughly sympathize with Mr. Glynn's object, and I see the necessity for securing equality in this matter. I have no doubt of the soundness of the principle enunciated by the honorable member. I have now outlined the Tasmanian proposal, and I propose to deal with the general question. Several objections were raised with the force and clearness which always distinguish Mr. McMillan's utterances, and they certainly deserve the respect and consideration of every honorable member. The first objection he urged was that in making it compulsory on the Federal Parliament to take over a given amount of the public debts, or, in other words, to become liable in the first instance for the whole of the interest, it is to be regarded as a mandate to the Federal Parliament to raise a large amount of revenue. I admit that unhesitatingly. But I say that the safety of the state Treasuries demands that a definite obligation should be laid on the Federal Parliament to provide sufficient revenue to relieve us of our responsibility. That is my answer to that objection. When honorable members object to laying a definite obligation on the Federal Parliament, by putting it in the Constitution Bill, they are blinking the real position, because the financial necessities of four out of five of the states are such that it is absolutely necessary, if we are not going to make the several states insolvent, that a very large amount of revenue shall be raised from Customs, an amount certainly equal to what is required to pay the interest on the public debt. Does any honorable member, or any one who has given any attention to the subject, doubt the necessity of the Federal Parliament raising this amount of money?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The objection is a sentimental one. We all know we must raise enough for the interest on the debts.

Mr. HENRY. -

We all know it, and with that fact staring us in the face, why object to the proposal to place such an obligation in the Constitution Bill? It is indisputable that the money must be raised in this way, and are we to believe that honorable members who object to laying this obligation on the Federal Parliament are prepared to wreck the state Treasuries? That seems to be the only conclusion. It has been contended, and it was referred to by Mr. McMillan, that the railways and the debts are inseparable; that if the debts are taken over the railways must be taken over also. I cannot see the force of that contention. It is claimed that the railways are a portion of the security for the debts, that they are the real assets for the large amount of money which English capitalists have lent to us so liberally. As a matter of fact, however, the real security to those capitalists lies in the willingness and the ability of the people to pay taxes to meet the demands for interest. There is no doubt that when the railways are taken over by the Federal Parliament it will somewhat complicate the financial position; but that is a matter which we can safely leave to the Federal Parliament, which will be the best body to deal with such questions. I have no doubt about the Federal Parliament having the necessary ingenuity to deal equitably with this question.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The great argument against this proposal is that the question can be better dealt with by the Federal Parliament if we give them power.

Mr. HENRY. -

That does not apply to this question of the debts, because we can lay down the lines on which the debts can be taken over, and the question appears to be perfectly simple. I was very much interested in what Mr. McMillan said regarding the conversion of the debts. It is unnecessary to say that I distinguish between conversion and consolidation, but it is well to be clear on that point, because I sometimes think the two things are mixed. I understand that we will convert our debts first by a consolidation of all our state debts, and then the Federal Parliament will change the amount of interest by making it all one stock with a uniform rate of interest.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That can only be reached by conversion.

Mr. HENRY. -

It might be reached gradually; the distinction is this, as to whether an attempt should be made to convert the whole of the stocks at once before they mature, or should we await the maturing of the stock, and let the conversion be made gradually. Mr. McMillan urged, with very great force, several objections to the practicability of converting our debts, but I was somewhat surprised that, after arguing strongly against the possibility or practicability of converting our debts, he went on to say that the conversion was possible. I listened with great interest to what Mr. Glynn said, because it so entirely corroborated my own views about the debts. I would like to put it in a practical way to honorable members as to whether conversion is possible at all on fair terms. Obviously, the holders of colonial stocks, no matter what colony's stocks they hold, will require to be paid the value of those stocks, and in all probability they will not be prepared to part with them unless some additional advantage is given to them. How are you going to bring about an arrangement which will give an advantage to these bond-holders, and at the same time a profit to the state? The honorable member (Mr. Glynn), with his usual industry and research, has looked into this question from the historical point of view, and he tells us that all the conversions which have been made have been conversions of short-dated stocks. When a Government can say to its bond-holders-"We will pay you off in twelve months unless you accept certain terms," it is possible for it to force the acceptance of those terms, but where a Government has entered into contracts with bond-holders to pay interest for 20, 30, and 40 years, and then to return the full value of the stock, is it credible that the bond-holders will not know the value of the stocks they hold and refuse to convert, them into something less valuable

By conversion the bond-holders get a more valuable stock.

Mr. HENRY. -

How can they get a more valuable stock? Will any one say that the federal stock will be more marketable than the state stocks are now? I think no one will question the saleableness of Australian stocks at the present time, so that the right honorable member's interjection does not seem to meet the case at all.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Are not Australian stocks below Canadian stocks?

Mr. HENRY. -

I admit unreservedly that it is not only possible but probable that the federal bonds would stand higher in the market than the bonds of any single colony, but that does not touch the question. If you cannot convert without either loading futurity with an increased amount of debt or making some sacrifice at the present time, what advantage do you get from the conversion? The bond-holders may get an advantage, but the taxpayers of Australia will not get any advantage.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

The larger the amount of debt the greater will be the saving.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

The federal stock will have greater currency than the state stock has.

Mr. HENRY. -

Quite so. All these are, of course, elements in the consideration of the question. It is a question whether issuing bonds of a greater currency would be of advantage to the bond-holders, and, of course, it would be a question of calculation with them. If they were informed, upon the advice of actuaries, that they might obtain advantage from it, they might agree to the conversion. But probably such an arrangement would be very much against the interests of the authority issuing the bonds. Seeing that, in my judgment, conversion is not possible with any advantage to the Commonwealth, we must either increase the amount of the stocks, and give the bond-holders some advantage in the form of increased stocks, or we must give them an advantage in some other way. I fail to see how the state can get a profit, and how the bond-holders can also get a profit. Then we come to this consideration. If conversion is not possible at an advantage to the Federation, why should we postpone the imposition upon the Federal Government of the responsibility for the whole of the public debts of the colonies? It has been urged as one of the strong reasons why the federal authority should not take over the public debts of the colonies that possibly the colonies themselves might be able to make better terms with their bond-holders than could be made by the federal authority. I think, however, that I have disposed of that objection, at all events from my point of view. Now I come to what it has struck me are the advantages to be gained by allowing the federal authority to take over the debts of the states. In the first place, I have always held that it is most desirable that when the states have given up their Customs revenue, upon which they now largely rely to pay interest upon their debts, the Federal Parliament should relieve them of the burden of this interest. Up to 1895, the total Customs revenue of Australia was about equal to the total annual interest charges of the various colonies.

Mr. HENNING. -

The states would all be represented in the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HENRY. -

I am familiar with that argument, and I have urged it myself both in my own Parliament and here. I am aware that the financial necessities of the various states will be the best security that we can have for the proper disposal of the surplus revenue of the Commonwealth. Honorable members have talked a great deal of wanting to go back to their colonies with some assurance which will induce the people there to enter into this Federation. I hold that it would be a very great inducement to the people of the various states to enter into the Federation if their representative here the press were to say-"The Federal authority has taken over your customs duties, but at the same time it has relieved you of your liability for the interest upon your public debts," or for a considerable portion of those debts, say, to £40 or £41 per head, as might be determined. By laying this direct obligation upon the federal authority you, to some extent, relieve the state Treasurers of an obligation they would otherwise have to meet after they had given up the revenue which they require in order to meet it. Mr. McMillan has stated, very justly, that this proposal to deal with the public debts does not dispose of the federal surplus. I am aware of that. But we have already determined how the surplus shall be dealt with for the first five years. To me, what appears to be the advantage of an arrangement enabling the Federal Parliament to take over the whole of the liability of the states in regard to public debts is the saving that would probably be effected by the paying off of these debts as they mature. I believe that that would be how any real saving would be secured—not by conversion. This work would, of course, have to be done gradually. The Federal Government should have the power, as various bonds matured, to pay them off, and the earlier that was done the better. By laying this definite obligation on the Federal Government we secure two objects. We give a definite assurance to the state Treasurers that a portion of their liabilities is certain to be met, and we put into the hands of the federal authority an instrument for effecting a saving of interest. I am afraid that the proposal of my honorable friend and colleague (Sir Philip Fysh) is not practicable. I certainly very much prefer the scheme proposed by the Parliament, of Tasmania. Sir Philip Fysh assumes that, as a first step, there should be a conversion when fair terms can be obtained. It was interjected by Mr. Reid that the difficulty lay in determining what fair terms are. The words are loose and indefinite, and I do not think they would do.

I am not in the habit of criticising mere verbal expressions, or the terms of a clause, but the difficulty I have pointed out strikes one at once. The proposal implies that there shall be a conversion before there is a consolidation of the stock. That may be necessary, but, in my opinion, the, taking over of the stock should be immediate, whereas the proposal of Sir Philip Fysh puts the time off indefinitely, and does not make it immediately compulsory on the Federal Parliament.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

On an important subject like this, it would scarcely do to call on honorable members to speak in the few remaining minutes. I therefore move that progress be reported.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

The Convention adjourned at eight minutes to five o'clock p.m., until Monday, 28th February.
Monday, 28th February, 1898.

Right of Appeal to the Privy Council - State of Business - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at twenty minutes to eleven o'clock a.m.

RIGHT OF APPEAL TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I desire to lay on the table a copy of a resolution passed by the Launceston Chamber of Commerce, and by all the banks in Tasmania, against the abolition of the right of appeal to the Privy Council; and I beg to move-

That the resolution be printed.

A similar resolution has been passed by the Hobart Chamber of Commerce, but it has not yet reached me.

The motion was agreed to.

STATE OF BUSINESS.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I should like (although I am very sorry to have to speak upon this subject more than once) to ask the leader of the Convention whether we cannot make an effort to finish the work which we are engaged upon? I have arranged to stay in Melbourne for another week, but I must leave on the 9th of next month, and most of my colleagues are compelled also to return home on that date. We all desire very much that our work shall be practically completed before we leave, but absolute necessity prevents us from staying beyond the date I have mentioned. I think most honorable members are getting somewhat wearied of the length of this session, and the difficulty we have had this morning in getting a quorum emphasizes that view. I think that, if a little more in the way of conference took place between the leaders of this Convention, the work might be expedited. I am, of course, averse to rushing through the important work we are engaged upon.

Mr. HOWE. -

Curtail the speeches.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

At the same time, I suppose I am not singular in having important duties in my own colony. Therefore, if some arrangement could be made by our leader to expedite the work, even if we had to sit every evening and on Saturdays too, I should be very glad. To adjourn on Friday until Monday, when our work is so urgent, and when many of us have such important duties to do in our own colonies, seems to me to be too long an interval. I really do not see why we should not sit every evening and on Saturdays till we have finished our work. At any rate, I have stayed much longer than I had anticipated, at great inconvenience to myself and to my colony, and I am absolutely compelled to leave on the 9th. I do not wish to appear anxious that we should push this work unduly, but, at the same time, I hope that our leader will be able to suggest some means by which our labours might be terminated as quickly as possible.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

So far as I am concerned, I must confess that I feel to some extent an inability to suggest any means by which our procedure can be expedited, except that we should do what we can not to speak unnecessarily. I do not know any other means. It has been suggested that we should sit every night and on Saturdays, but my right honorable friend has already spoken of the weariness and fatigue of honorable members under the stress of our present work, and I am quite sure that to increase the burden of the work being done would scarcely conduce to the quality of it. What we, above all, are concerned with is to endeavour to make this Bill, as far as we are concerned, as good a Bill as possible. If we adopt the procedure which, from mere lassitude and weariness, leads to faults remaining in our work we know what sort of a reception it will meet with throughout Australia. We certainly ought not to run any risk of that sort. I take it that if honorable members will in the future combine to shorten matters so far as possible by adhering merely to the legitimate point under discussion, and not repeating any argument that has already been used, that is all that can be expected of them. To ask them to sit every night and to sit on Saturdays is too much. I recognise the extreme willingness of every member to get the work done properly, and I sympathize with my right honorable friend who has to return to his own colony before we shall have completed our labours. If I could in any way assist him I should be only too glad to do so, but I must not assist any one at the expense of the quality of the work of the Convention. If honorable members desire to sit oftener at night than on Tuesdays and Thursdays this week, which, I think, is almost enough, I should like to be informed of the fact.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Could we not have a short sitting on Saturday?

Mr. BARTON. -

We might sit on Saturday morning.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Sit all day.

Mr. BARTON. -

If honorable members desire it we can sit half the day or all day. Some honorable members desire to have certain clauses reconsidered and other clauses recommitted. I mentioned this matter before, and it has been suggested that I should do so again. It would be an advantage to the Convention if in these cases notice was given, so that a notice-paper might be prepared. Several honorable members might desire the reconsideration of the same clause or clauses, and if notice were given unnecessary trouble might be saved.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

What is the difference between recommittal and reconsideration?

Mr. BARTON. -

In moving for recommittal it is necessary to state the purpose, but not in moving for reconsideration.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will the honorable member inform us whether reconsideration would cover the reconsideration of proposed clauses that have been rejected?

Mr. BARTON. -

That I do not know. This procedure by way of reconsideration does not exist in the New South Wales practice. Sir Richard Baker might tell us whether it extends to the reconsideration of proposed clauses which have been rejected.

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -

Under the practice we have adopted there is really no difference whatever between reconsideration and recommittal. It is a difference in procedure. In one case the Bill is not taken out of committee, and the same committee reconSIDERS the work it has done. In the other case a report is made to the House, and the House is asked to recommit the Bill. In asking to recommit it is usual to give reasons. Sometimes a Bill is reconsidered without any reasons being given. An honorable member may say that he desires to have, clause so-and-so reconsidered or it may be moved that the whole Bill be reconsidered. In the latter case the practice is not to go through the Bill clause by clause, but to ask honorable members which clauses they desire to have reconsidered. If an honorable member says that he wants clause 13 reconsidered, and no honorable member asks for the reconsideration of an earlier clause, that clause is taken, and you cannot afterwards go back again.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That is not the practice of the House of Commons, is it?
Sir RICHARD BAKER. -

I do not know. We are acting now under the practice of the Legislative Assembly of South Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It is a great mistake.

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -

I do not think it is right to argue that question here. I am not sure that it is a mistake.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

There is no finality.

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -

How can an honorable member say it is a mistake when he knows nothing about it, and has not seen the practice brought into operation? I rose, in answer to the request of our leader, to explain the practice. I understand from his statement that what it is proposed to do is this: When we have considered the new clauses, and the Bill has been reported pro forma, the standing orders will be suspended. The procedure will then be the same as was adopted in Sydney, and we will consider the drafting amendments in globo. We shall afterwards get a new print of the Bill, and that will be the time for honorable members to say whether they wish for the reconsideration or the recommittal of certain clauses. The Bill has been so altered that I think it will be impossible for any honorable member to say what clauses he desires to have reconsidered until he sees a reprint.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

Might I ask Sir Richard Baker to inform us whether it will be competent for any honorable member on the recommittal or reconsideration to again submit any clause that has already been considered and rejected?

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I should like to point out, as the matter is an exceedingly important one, that that would really be proposing a new clause. The honorable member's remarks have reference to clauses that have already been eliminated from the Bill. So far as those clauses are concerned there is nothing in the Bill as it stands for reconsideration. The re-insertion of these clauses would, therefore, one would think, come under the procedure relating to new clauses. I would ask Sir Richard Baker to consider the point, because it is important. I myself wish to reinstate one clause that has been struck out. It would be well to know whether it will have to be dealt with as a new clause or not.

The PRESIDENT. -

I would like to state that reconsideration is a matter for the committee, and recommittal is a matter for the House. The whole Bill can be recommitted or only certain specified clauses. On recommittal new clauses can be proposed.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

In the standing orders under which we are working there is a vital difference between reconsideration and recommittal. It has always been ruled that the same committee cannot consider again any matter it has already determined. In the same committee the consideration of matters that had been already considered is therefore impossible. To enable such matters to be considered again, recommittal is necessary, and for that purpose it is essential to get power from the House for a new committee to sit. Reconsideration means dealing with matters that have been slipped over, and concerning which there has not been a vote taken—matters that are new to the committee, and the determination of which does not involve any reversal of any decision previously arrived at by that committee. Reconsideration really means the consideration of matters on which the committee has not deliberated. Recommittal means the consideration of matters on which the committee has deliberated.

The PRESIDENT. -

I was not proposing to discuss the question of reconsideration at all, because that is a matter for the ruling of the Chairman of Committees.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

It seems to me that, between reconsideration and recommittal, we are likely to get into a greater fog than we have ever been in before. The simpler plan would be to have nothing to do with reconsideration. As soon as we have got through the Bill, let our leader say what clauses he proposes to recommit, and let those who desire other clauses to be recommitted tell him so. I have no doubt that he will fall in with their views. Those honorable members who wish to propose new clauses can then give notice of them. If we have a reconsideration stage, which no one seems to understand, the probabilities are that we shall lose the opportunity.

Mr. BARTON. -

We had a reconsideration stage in Adelaide, and it caused no trouble.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We are told now that reconsideration means the consideration of something we have not considered before.

Mr. BARTON. -

How can you reconsider something you have not considered before?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not know, but if we take the recommittal stage only, I think we shall avoid difficulty and trouble.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I will endeavour to bear in mind the suggestion Sir George Turner has made. In Adelaide we had a reconsideration stage, and a certain degree of latitude was allowed by the Chairman of Committees, with the result that it involved no difficulty or trouble whatever. In Adelaide, whether rightly or wrongly, we dealt with matters on reconsideration which we could have dealt with on recommittal. On this, the last stage of the Bill, we have to be very careful, and no harm can be done by having a reconsideration stage, and afterwards a recommittal stage. I do not think we should be erring on the side of safety by restricting the procedure to a recommittal, and for that reason I should be loath to suggest that we should forego the reconsideration stage.

The PRESIDENT. -

I would point out to honorable members that until we report the Bill we cannot get a clean print of it. I think they would desire to have a clean print as early as possible.

Mr. BARTON. -

My intention, as soon as the new clauses have been dealt with, is to have the Bill reported, in order that it may be reprinted. We could then take either the reconsideration stage, or, if that is impossible, the recommittal stage, and we could again recommit if necessary. I do not intend to make any suggestion now which would limit the power of the committee in dealing with the Bill.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

We seem to be using two words when the standing orders only use one. There is no word like reconsideration in the standing orders.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, in Standing Order No. 294.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is not the procedure that we are dealing with. Standing Order No. 308 has reference to recommittal. There are two stages of recommittal—one on the motion for the adoption of the report, and the other on the third reading of the Bill.

The PRESIDENT. -

I do not think there will be any practical difficulty in connexion with the matter.

APPEALS TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria) presented, pursuant to an order of the Convention (dated 22nd February, 1898), a further return relating to appeals to the Privy Council, and moved that it be printed.
LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia) moved -
That seven days' leave of absence be granted to Mr. James, on account of urgent private business.

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -
I do not wish to oppose this motion, but at the same time it seems to me that any honorable member who accepts the exceedingly important and responsible position of delegate to a Convention intrusted with the framing of a Constitution for Australia is not warranted, from any considerations of private business, unless of the most urgent character, in absenting himself from his duties, more especially when a means has been provided whereby somebody else can be appointed to take his place if he cannot attend. I am not sure whether it is so in Western Australia; but in connexion with all the other colonies, if any delegate resigns, or is unable to attend, somebody has been elected to take his place.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We have not that provision.

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -
Then my remarks lose a great deal of the force they might otherwise have had, but I do protest against any honorable member lightly departing from the Convention before the great work which we are assembled to do has been completed. I would perhaps not have risen at all had I known that the provision to which I have referred is not in the Western Australian Act. I hope that we shall not have any members of the Convention departing to their own colonies until we have practically completed the work that has been intrusted to us.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from Friday, 25th February) was resumed on clause 98 (see page 1540), and on Mr. Glynn's amendment thereto (pages 1540-41).

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -
We have heard economics called the dismal science, and judging by the dryness of financial debate we may presume that finances have a similar characteristic. Having addressed the Convention at Adelaide and at Sydney on the subject of the consolidation of the debts, I do not think it is necessary to speak at very great length on the present occasion, more especially as the Premier of Western Australia and his colleagues desire that the work of the Convention may be brought to a close in time for them to get away next week. I am in favour of amalgamating Mr. McMillan's amendment with the clause as printed, leaving it to the Drafting Committee to work the two clauses together. It seems to me to be very undesirable to put into the Constitution anything likely to raise debatable points, which had better be left to the Federal Parliament for determination, and I therefore agree with the Premiers of New South Wales and Western Australia that consolidation of debts should only be undertaken with the consent of the states. It must not be supposed, from what I have just said, that I am opposed to the consolidation of debts. On the contrary, I have always been a great advocate of consolidation of debts, as well as of the federalization of the railways, and I look on it as a mere matter of time when both these steps will be taken.

Mr. Higgins. -

How can you make Mr. McMillan's amendment consistent with clause 98?

Mr. Walker. -

I mean only that portion of Mr. McMillan's amendment which says that the Parliament may take over all or any part of the debts of any state, "subject to the consent of the state, on conditions to be agreed upon." That is the portion. However, even then I trust that the last sentence of clause 98 will be deleted. That sentence reads as follows:

The rateable proportion of the debts of the several states to be taken over is to be calculated on the basis of the populations of the several states, as ascertained by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth.

I think that sentence should be deleted, because the rateable proportions should depend on the value of the security, irrespective of population. It seems to me that we must distinguish between adult population and general population, when we deal with the debts of the states. I observe that one of the local morning papers issued today states that the population of Victoria has diminished by 3,000 persons during the last three years, within which period 50,000 adults have left the colony, and their places, in the population statistics, with the exception of 3,000, have been filled by births. Surely, therefore, we must discriminate between adult and general population. I combat the proposed amendment of Tasmania, because in that amendment they go on the assumption that each unit of the population is an equal revenue producer. The framers of that amendment apparently forget that the population of the other states will be increasing at the same time, so that if their amendment was adopted the amount of the debts taken over by the Commonwealth from a state would be necessarily larger per capita at the time its debentures were cancelled than in the case of the other states. I recognise, however, that by taking over a portion of the debts the difficulty of dealing with the surplus is considerably mitigated, because it would be largely absorbed by paying interest on the debts; in fact, the surplus would not be sufficient for that purpose unless the duties were considerably increased, which I should not desire to see. If the Commonwealth is to take over the debts of the states, it must get an indemnity from each state, and that indemnity in opinion should take the shape of the hypothecation of a portion of the railway revenue, in which case the Commonwealth would practically not run any risk in accepting the liability. I can scarcely imagine that any state Legislature would object to pass an Act giving such an indemnity. The hypothecation of a portion of the railway revenue would probably cause state loans to be raised through the Commonwealth, and it would be to the advantage of the states, when borrowing after federation, to borrow through the Commonwealth rather than direct in the home market, because others than the Commonwealth would practically be advancing in what might be called a second charge on the revenue of the states. A great deal can be said in favour of postponing the conversion of the loans until the Commonwealth gets Imperial sanction to include Australian consols in the list of trustees' securities. There is a tendency for capital to accumulate so largely for safe investment that, in the course of the next 25 years, I shall not be surprised to see Australian consols at par, even if they only carried 2¼ per cent. interest. Now, as each quarter per cent. on £180,000,000 means £450,000 a year saved in interest, and, therefore, a reduction of one-half per cent. would amount to £900,000 per annum, a very material difference as compared with 3 per cent. In this connexion I think we owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Glynn for his great assiduity and for the trouble he has taken in collecting data relative to conversions of magnitude between 1749 and 1888. I doubt if any other member of the Convention has given such great attention to the subject, and I feel that, as members of this Convention, we are much indebted to him for the information he has given us on the question. Should we, however, merge the debts of the states before the inclusion of Australian consols in trustees' securities, I presume the colonial Treasurer for the time being will see that certain special reservations are made for securing conversion at a lower rate on that event coming about, so that the Commonwealth will get the advantage of the inclusion of the stocks in the list of trustees' securities. A clause might be inserted to provide for that contingency. Supposing a loan were taken for 25 years, although many persons seem to think it is a mistake to have a terminable stock in the present state of affairs, there might be a reservation clause by which the Commonwealth, say, by giving twelve months' notice, could convert one-fourth of the loan in ten years, one-fourth in fifteen years, one-fourth in twenty years, and the remaining fourth in 25 years. That would, at all events, enable us to get some of the advantages arising from the falling value of money. It is very, evident, however, from what I have recently heard that even actuaries occasionally differ as to the probable savings to be effected through conversion, but, admitting that they do differ on the point, we may recognize the fact that they believe in what is called the actuarial equivalent of a future gain. For instance, the Victorian Government Statist estimates that if the existing loans (£174,000,000) are renewed on the respective due dates up to 1945, the saving in interest at that time will exceed £1,500,000 per annum. Surely the actuarial equivalent of that at the present time must be something substantial. And it may be well to remember in this connexion the old proverb that "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." At present it is very desirable we should keep down our annual charges as much as possible. In fact, at the initiation of the Commonwealth Government a substantial saving will greatly simplify the finances, and give relief. My argument is that the present population will proportionately receive as much benefit from the earlier conversion of the debts as the increased population 40 odd years hence will then get. And although I believe in looking ahead, I do not think that we owe much to posterity while we are doing a great work from which they will receive great benefit, and consequently we may reasonably expect them to bear a portion of the burden. I see in a recent article on "Federal Finance," in the Insurance and Banking Record, some r

Under a sufficiently comprehensive system the functions of the Commonwealth Government should include-

1st. The guaranteeing and the administration of the public debts of the colony.

2nd. Some effective form of control over the working of the railway systems, even without control over fresh construction.

3rd. The collection of sufficient revenue to cover the annual charge on the public indebtedness.

More than one reference has been made to Mr. R.L. Nash, who has given great consideration to the matter of the conversion of loans, to which he refers in a letter he addressed to me on the 29th December last, a short
A popular conversion looks to the relative market value of the principal only. Take Victorian 4 per cent. 1908 (£2,000,000) as an example. The market value is £106. If you can offer the holder the equivalent of £107, he will, as a rule, convert. Australian 3 per cent. consols should be worth £104 at the outset, and the present holder must be offered, say, £103 new 3 per cent. stock for each existing £100 stock. In that way the addition to the principal would be £60,000, but the saving in annual interest would be £18,200 per annum, a very important matter, as it would be immediate. That the Commonwealth will need all the revenue and all the savings it can muster in the first years of its establishment is so certain that these savings are really a vital consideration. A heavy deficiency in the early years of the Commonwealth would injure its credit greatly.

I think there is no doubt about that. At Sydney I had the honour of reading to the Convention a letter from Mr. David George, of London, but there is one little paragraph which I will take the liberty of reading again to refresh the memory of honorable members. I will preface it by saying that this is not merely Mr. David George's own view, but is indorsed by a leading firm of stock-brokers. Mr. George says-

Thirdly, as to bringing about a consolidation into Australasian consols, at once of all the various debts of the colonies.

This we believe to be the best plan; but in order to carry it out a large conversion scheme would have to be introduced. The whole question depends upon terms—that is to say, the quid pro quo that would be offered to the holders of the different stocks to induce them to exchange their present securities into stock of the consolidated fund. This, of course, will be a difficult and delicate matter to arrange, and it will require to be placed in the hands of actuarial experts of great experience and skill to ascertain the relative values of the different loans of the separate colonies to a single interminable consolidated inscribed stock, and the most influential medium will have to be employed to launch the scheme, and to find an opportune time for the purpose. The varying dates of maturity, and rates of interest, and the feeling existing here as to the position which the different colonies afford as security for their loans, would all have to be taken into account. Present holders cannot be compelled to exchange their securities, and, therefore, sufficiently liberal terms will have to be offered to induce the great bulk of them to fall in with a conversion scheme. The different merits and values of the loans of the various colonies will make it difficult to ascertain an all round satisfactory basis of exchange. Holders, for instance, of New South Wales securities, owing to their superior credit-
I do not know that that is quite true at the present moment.
will require a greater inducement to exchange their present holdings, while it may suit holders of Victorian, South Australian, and Tasmanian stocks to accept a security of a Federated Australia much more readily.
Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
Does not that writer put forth very forcibly an extension of the term rather than an increase of the sum as the chief thing trustees look for?
Mr. WALKER. -
Yes. The late much-respected Mr. Westgarth, of the London Stock Exchange, was a strong advocate of the consolidation of the debts, as referred to by Sir Philip Fysh.
Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
And of the extension of the term.
Mr. WALKER. -
Yes. We must also remember that the prospective gain in future loans is not to be overlooked-the expense to be saved by inscription, floating, conversion, and payment of interest through our own High Commissioner.
All through I have been of opinion that the High Commissioner should be the financial representative of the colony, and then we should save an immense sum which at present is paid for commission. It would add to the popularity of the stock if holders could transfer it from the colonial register to the London register, and vice versa. There is an enormous amount of trust funds seeking investment in Great Britain, and if they could invest in our stock at home, how much happier would many trustees be. The Statist of Victoria makes a very valuable suggestion, that is, that once our securities are available for investment by trustees the home Government should be asked to forego the stamp duty of 12s. 6d. per cent., as in the case of British consols, because investors would be largely the residents of Great Britain, and it is to the advantage of people there to get safe investments which will yield a moderately reasonable return. There are two classes of stock-holders-temporary or speculative holders, and permanent holders. The former would be the easier class to deal with in any conversion scheme, because the latter class do not wish to change their investment unless it is considerably to their advantage. If one had to summarize the advantages to the investors of conversion of the various stocks, we might enumerate the following amongst others: The greater marketability-there is no doubt about that. Simplification of investments-having one instead of six or eight stocks as at present. Another great advantage would be if interest were made payable quarterly instead of half-yearly. We all know what an advantage it is to have incomes coming in regularly once a quarter instead of half-yearly.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Is there any other stock which pays interest quarterly?

Mr. WALKER. -

No, but on some stocks interest is payable in January and July, and on others in April and October, and trustees very often divide their investments so that they actually get dividends quarterly. It is a singular thing in this connexion that those stocks which have their dividends payable in January and July are relatively higher than those whose dividends are payable in April and October. We should endeavour to pay our interest quarterly, and thereby we should offer an inducement to convert.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Is not your argument in favour of making the interest payable in January and July?

Mr. WALKER. -

No; the difficulty is got over at present by investing in two stocks instead of one. Under my proposal it would only be necessary to invest in one stock in order to get quarterly dividends. I have mentioned the advantages to the holders of stock; now I will mention the advantages to the Commonwealth or to the states, through the Commonwealth. There will be greater simplification of accounts, reduction in charges for floating, inscription, and payment of interest, the option to the Commonwealth of paying off or renewing in whole or in part on giving the prescribed notice to the stock-holders; and I also think there ought to be a reservation in anticipation of Australian consols being included in trustees' securities. Once federal finance is fairly and successfully grappled with—and I think we are in a fair way to do so—may we not as representatives of rival colonies hope to see a fulfilment in the Southern Hemisphere of that happy state of affairs predicted in connexion with an older civilization than our own when it was said—"Judah shall not vex Ephraim, and Ephraim shall not envy Judah"?

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I promised Mr. McMillan that this question should be put in such a way that his amendment could be decided, as well as my proposed addition. If a division were taken on the word "Parliament" it would test the question whether my words should be inserted or not.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The way I shall put it will be to insert the words before the word "Parliament," and not to strike out anything.
Mr. GLYNN. -

That will practically meet my views.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am not going to detain the committee on this question. I prefer Mr. McMillan's amendment to Mr. Glynn's, because Mr. McMillan's amendment gives the power in perfectly wide terms, with sufficient liberty to the Parliament to make such an agreement as may be necessary with the states in the circumstances that may arise. It is better to do that than to bind Parliament down by any strict rule, because circumstances may arise under which a departure from any particular line of management laid down in the Constitution might become so necessary that the power given under the Constitution would be completely worthless under these circumstances, it would be unwise to make too strict a line of limitation for the exercise of powers by Parliament. Therefore, as Mr. McMillan proposes to give power in wider terms, I prefer his amendment.

Mr. Glynn's amendment was negatived.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

At Mr. McMillan's request, I beg to move-

That after the word "Parliament" the following words be inserted:-"may take over all or any part of the debt of any state, subject to the consent of the state on conditions to be agreed upon."

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -

I very much regret that in a very thin House like this we are about to retrace our steps to 1891, without giving to this very important subject the time and consideration which it deserves.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I am prepared to defend this proposal in half-an-hour's speech, but I want to save time.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

The only defence I want is with respect to the consent of the states. In 1891 that provision was made. After many years' consideration, not by members of the Convention, but by the financial world generally, and the conclusions arrived at were not those of our individual opinions-I wish honorable members to understand that I do not stand here to express my own opinions, but to express whatever opinions I may hold after being fortified by the very strong opinions given to us by those who have influence with the financial world-after seven years, we struck out in April last the words, "with the consent of the states," because it was apparent that that would be the Marplot of the whole proceedings. Now, after a very little consideration... in the Convention, we appear to be falling back upon the purpose of 1891, forgetful of the lessons which we have been learning in the meantime or ignoring the teaching which ought to have come to us in the meantime, and we are going back to the extent of allowing any state to interfere.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Will you explain how the consent of a state being made requisite will be a Marplot?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

I will take New South Wales, with about £70,000,000 of debt. You may be making an arrangement to take over the debts of two or three or of all the other colonies. You would still leave the position such that New South Wales, with her large amount of indebtedness, could step in and be a competitor at any time with the Federation in floating another loan. You would still maintain the extravagant expenditure and procedure as far as that colony is concerned. Of course, she has more interest in that than anybody else, but so far as federation is concerned, she will be a Marplot, because we shall have two agencies in London for the same purpose. I forebore on a late occasion to go into the question of conversion at all. I did not think that was a proper occasion, and I fear the occasion will not now serve us. I limited my remarks on Friday last to the desirability of consolidation, and of securing a unified debt to the whole of the colonies. I gave several reasons, which I will not repeat now, but I ask honorable members to give their attention to the proposal to reinsert the words "with the consent of the states," and to refresh their memories with what has taken place during the last seven years. Is it wise to ask us to retrace our steps in this way? I would ask honorable members to maintain the words in the clause as they are, so that the Parliament may take over the debts regardless of the states. We will not make it compulsory. The objection that you will at once raise the value of the stocks against yourselves does not hold good, because the Federal Executive will not take over the debts until it has materially good reason for doing so. Therefore, I should prefer that the words of the clause might be left exactly as they are. The objection to our movement in a proper direction comes to a great extent from the large colony of New South Wales.

Mr. WALKER. -

They will very soon come in.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

There is that to be said for the proposal, that so surely as the Federal Executive undertakes the very inviting proceeding of securing all the advantages which will come to the Federation by reason of a consolidated unified debt, New South Wales, if she chooses to hold out, will soon see the advantage of giving in her allegiance, but in the meantime mischief will be created. We have been issuing our stocks probably with a currency of 30 or 40 years, and if we look at Mr. Fenton's list we shall see that at the end of every five or ten years a material portion of the debts falls due. At the end of these periods it would be a favorable opportunity for the Treasurer of the future to bring about a conversion.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Who will object to that?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

The state which has not joined simply stands in the position of your competitor.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We are not afraid of that.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

It is rather a serious matter that you should have two conversions in existence in a small community of 3,500,000 or 4,000,000, where one-third is represented, say, by New South Wales, and that one-third is indisposed to join in the unification or consolidation, and stands against the Federation when you might have the two of them going into the market at the same time. I have satisfied myself by expressing my opinions on the subject, and I shall wait to see the developments. I am convinced that the Federal Treasurer will be wanting such an opportunity as I am striving to give him, and that we shall regret our position if we do not give him that very strong hold which he should have to enable him to consolidate the whole, and not merely a part, of the debt.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I will state in a few sentences my view of the position, in reply to Sir Philip Fysh. The honorable member suggests that some state might refuse to allow its debts to be consolidated. There is only one possible condition of affairs under which such a refusal would be likely: That is, when the consolidation was about to be carried out in a way prejudicial to the interests of that state. Under such conditions, would it be tolerated for a moment that the federal authority should have power, to the injury of any state, to step in and take over the debts of that state and consolidate them, or do anything else with them? I do not think such a contingency is likely to occur. No Federal Treasurer is likely to propose to consolidate any debts to the injury of any state. I therefore strike away all the force of the honorable members argument, because if it can be shown that the consolidation of debts is very much to the advantage of the Federal Treasurer and of the states their consent will be given as a matter of course.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Then why put in any provision about the consent of the States?

Mr. HOLDER. -

Because it would prevent injustice in a possible, but not likely, contingency.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Then why put in these words?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not like to discuss details which are far better left to the Federal Parliament, which should have a free hand to do what at the time seems wisest and best. There is a great deal in what has been said by Mr. Glynn, Sir Philip Fysh, and Mr. Henry. Those schemes are all very valuable, and, no doubt, will be considered very carefully with a view to the adoption of one of them by the Federal Treasurer at any time when he contemplates the conversion and consolidation of debts. We ought not now, some years in advance, to lay down all these rules and say to the Federal Parliament-"No matter what new light you may have, no matter how circumstances may change, you shall convert or consolidate upon this system and upon no other." Therefore I am against the adoption of this or any other scheme which may be suggested to prevent the Federal Treasurer from having a free hand in regard to these matters. If he is a man worth his salt he will take action at the earliest moment. I should like, however, to see a provision inserted in the Bill making it necessary for the federal authority, before taking action in connexion with the consolidation or conversion of loans, to obtain the consent of the states interested. If what is proposed by the Federal Parliament is worth doing, the consent of the states will at once be forthcoming. I hope that the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) will be agreed to because it practically summarizes in two lines the sixteen lines of clause 98.

The CHAIRMAN. -

As some honorable members may not be aware of the position of the various amendments, I should like to say that the amendment now before the Chair is to insert, after the word "Parliament," the words "may take over all or any part of the debt of any state, subject to the consent of the state on conditions to be agreed upon." If this amendment is negatived, the next amendment to be put is one suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia to strike out the word "may," and insert the word "shall."

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -
I think that the honorable member (Mr. Holder) has given us abundant arguments in favour of negativing the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan). I believe he is one of those who pointed out, with a great deal of common sense, that it would not be necessary for the state Treasurers to have a guarantee from the federal authority, because it would be the duty of the federal authority to maintain the credit, and to uphold the sovereignty of the states. Now, however, the honorable member argues that the consent of the states to any consolidation scheme proposed by the federal authority would be granted as a matter of course. He also argued that the Federal Treasurer should have a free hand in regard to these financial transactions. This, however, should be an argument against the insertion of words making it necessary for the federal authority to obtain the consent of the states. When a Government wants to enter upon a large financial transaction of the kind we are discussing, it is necessary to wait for the right psychological moment. The Government gets the advice of its bankers in England, and does not approach the London money market until it is informed that the time is favorable. I take it that, not only will the federal authority be interested in consolidation or conversion schemes affecting £170,000,000 of borrowed money, but that it will also have to go into the market for fresh loans. But no Government would like to go into the money market just at a time, when, say, the Chinese wanted to borrow £16,000,000, or Greece £6,000,000, or just after a European war when there was a great demand for money. Any Government would like to be able to go into the market just at the proper time. The honorable member (Mr. Holder) asked in what way it would delay an affair of this kind if it were necessary for the Federal Parliament to obtain the consent of the state Parliaments. But while it might be that the federal authority would be informed by its financial advisers that within three months would be a suitable time for the floating of a loan, it might take eight or nine months before the consent of the various states could be obtained, though, as the honorable member (Mr. Holder) pointed out, this consent might be given as a matter of course. The honorable member stated that the consent of the states was bound to be given as a matter of course if the scheme was one to which, in the interests of the states, effect should be given. It is inconceivable that a great scheme of this kind, which, I believe, would gave £500,000 or £600,000, would be entered upon by the Federal Government unless it was believed to be to the advantage of every state concerned. If there could be a case where you should trust the Federal Parliament it is a case of this kind. But it is not proposed to trust the Federal Parliament now. We are asked to agree to a proposal which will clog its freedom of action, and which will practically prevent what, ten years ago, was considered the great aim of federation—the consolidation of the state debts. It is not that anyone state may wilfully stand out of a conversion scheme; but the Federal Parliament might be pressed by its financial advisers to put its scheme upon the market at once, and in order to do so it might be necessary to leave out some state, because there would not be time to get its consent. If one state were left out, and had afterwards to consolidate or convert its debts, it might not get such favorable terms as were obtained for the other states by the federal authority. Although it may have been left out through no fault of its own, it might have to accept worst terms than the other states. What would happen then? The question would arise whether the Federal Government should not, out of the taxes of the whole Commonwealth, reimburse that state, at least to some extent, for the loss which it had incurred by being left out of the transaction, possibly against its will.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

It seems to me that the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) will allow the federal authority to deal with the states individually. It will be able to say to Victoria—"We will take over your bad loans." By bad loans, I mean loans obtained at high rates, or short-dated loans, and it may discriminate between the states. Some of the states may think that they are being treated unfairly and improperly, because some of their loans, which they may regard as good, may be taken over by the federal authority, while loans of the other colonies, which they regard as bad, may also be taken over. I think it is a mistake that we should allow the Commonwealth Parliament to deal in this way with the states. If I had my way I would at once transfer to it the whole of the debts of the states. I should throw the onus upon the federal authority of paying the interest upon the state debts, because I believe that by doing so we should, in the future, prevent the extravagance which the Federal Treasurer might otherwise be forced into against his will, simply because there would be a surplus. We all know what the experience of these colonies has been in regard to surpluses, and that Treasurers are forced to spend surplus revenue in a way in which they know it ought not to be spent. I believe that if we took the proper course we should at once hand over to the Federal Parliament the liability for the payment of the interest upon the state debts. Under the Constitution we do not compel the Federal Parliament to raise any specified amount of revenue, but I wish to insert some provision which will have the effect of making the Federal Parliament expend its revenue instead of, what I am afraid it may do, squandering it. If I thought it would meet the views of the majority of honorable members, I should feel inclined to move the omission of the word "may," with a view to the insertion of the word "shall," in order to test the feeling of the Convention in regard to this matter. I think that the provision in the Bill as it stands is better than the proposal to allow the Federal Parliament to take over the debts of any one state. The proposal in the Bill as it stands is that the Federal Parliament may take over the whole or a rateable proportion of the debts of the states. That provision compels the Federal Parliament to treat all the states alike. The Federal Parliament will be able to say-"We will take over so much of the debts of all the states," but it will not be able to say to one state-"We will take over a certain portion of your debts," and to another state-"We will not take over any of your debts." I think, too, that it would be a grave mistake to insert the words "with the consent of the states." If we are leaving this matter to the Federal Parliament, we should take care to insure that when the time comes for conversion or consolidation, the Federal Treasurer will have a free hand, so that he will be able to take advantage of the state of the money market, and to avail himself of the advice offered to him by his proper advisers. In my opinion, no Federal Treasurer would dare to take over the debts of one state without taking over the debts of another; but to make it necessary to obtain the consent of all the states might mean the loss of a great deal of time when expedition was required. The Federal Treasurer might want to consult the states at a time when their Parliaments were not in session, and his hands would be tied most inconveniently. Besides, one state might object to the transaction, and thus spoil it altogether. We know how touchy the money market is, and if it were cabled to England that Victoria or New South Wales, or any other state, wished to stand out of the consolidation the people there would say-"There must be something at the bottom of this," and they would not touch the transaction without further inquiry. Besides, to get the consent of a state it would be necessary, I suppose, to obtain a resolution in favour of the proposal submitted from both Houses of Parliament, so that the vote of either House might block proceedings, or, if the voting were close, one individual member might prevent anything being done. Surely we are not going to put the Federal Parliament and the Federal Treasurer into such a position as would render it impossible to take advantage of the money market and to insure that the transaction should be a good one. If we do what is right and proper, we will hand over all these debts at once to the Federal Parliament, and then let the Treasurer make the best terms he can for consolidation and conversion. If we do not do that I hope we will leave the Bill as it is, and simply say that the Parliament is to take over the whole or a rateable proportion of the debts of the states. I do not agree with my honorable friends that, if we are to make it compulsory on Parliament to take over those debts, we are going to add immensely to the value of our loans. I do not believe that we will. The persons who have lent us money know that they have as good security as they can possibly have. The only advantage they will get by having one large consolidated stock is that it will be more easy to deal with it in the money market in London. By that means it will make it a little more valuable in London, but the security is as good now as it will be when it has the Commonwealth at its back, because the Commonwealth will be composed of the people of the various states, and it is the people of the various states who are now responsible for the whole of the debts and the interest. I think it will be just as well to place on record that we have discussed the question of handing over the whole of the debts. Therefore, in the Bill as it stands or, in Mr. McMillan's proposed amendment, I propose to substitute "shall" for "may"

Mr. DOBSON. -

Will you say something about future state borrowing, and the exact security which the Federal Parliament will give for that consolidated stock?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If we once hand over the whole of the debts to the Federal Parliament, then, I think that all future borrowing must be through the Federal Parliament. The Federal Parliament will be bound to borrow money before it has been in existence many years. And it will never do to have the Federal Parliament borrowing on Australasian consols, and each state borrowing its half-million or its million for its public works. I am perfectly prepared to trust the Federal Parliament to borrow the whole of the money, and to lend it out to the states when they are satisfied that the states wish to borrow the money for legitimate purposes.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Do you propose that the Federal Parliament shall only give as security the Customs revenue?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The Federal Parliament will give no security on the Customs revenue. It will do simply what a state Parliament does now: It will borrow on the credit of the Commonwealth. We do not give any security when we borrow. We do not pledge our railways or our public works. The creditor in England looks to the people of the colony, their ability to raise by customs duties or some other mode of taxation the interest on the loan, and the knowledge that our kinsfolk in England have that those who have come from British Stock are not likely to ever repudiate the payment of the interest on their debt. That is the security on which the money is lent.
Mr. DOBSON. -

Then the security of New South Wales will be better than the security of the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No; the security of New South Wales, to my mind, is as good as the security of the Commonwealth, but it is no better. New South Wales has power to tax, but the Commonwealth has power to tax for any purpose by any mode of taxation; and when the Commonwealth puts on its tax it, no doubt, will take priority over any state tax. I am not prepared to say that the security of New South Wales is better than the security of the Commonwealth, although, in my opinion, it is equally as good. Under these circumstances, I think it is well to test the feeling of the committee in regard to this proposal. Therefore, I beg to move-

That the word "may" be omitted, with the view to the insertion in its place of the word "shall."

By that amendment I mean that the Commonwealth has to take over the liability, has to pay our interest, has to appropriate our surplus for that purpose, and has to collect from the states whatever balance there may be due to the Commonwealth, or pay over to the states whatever surplus there is after paying the interest. It does not make it compulsory on the Commonwealth to convert the loans. It does not make it compulsory on the Commonwealth to consolidate the loans. The Treasurer will take his own good time to do that, and, no doubt, will take full advantage of the money market when he thinks that the advantage ought to be taken. I would give him power to do it. I would not say that it would be compulsory on him to do it, because that might be a mistake. If we simply give him power to do it, compelling him in the meantime to pay the interest, I think we will be taking a step which will be in the interests of the whole of the colonies.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I support my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner) in the course he is taking as a via media in this matter, which secures to a great extent the compulsory character of the proposal, and also to some extent will prevent the stock-holders from obtaining all the value of the conversion when it is made. I know that amongst the people of Tasmania there is a very strong and widespread feeling in favour of the consolidation of our debts, especially in favour of the Federal Government being responsible for the payment of the interest on those debts.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No, doubt.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Is it not a very proper feeling to entertain? As the honorable member (Mr. Henry) said on Friday, we are going to give up to the Federal Government that great source of revenue to which mainly we look for the payment of our interest. It is only right in the revenue sense, it is only right for the prevention of possible extravagance on the part of the Federal Government, that we should make the one transfer contingent on the other. There is no doubt whatever in my mind, from recent inquiries I made in London, that the effect of consolidating our debts, when they come to be converted, will be to give an increased value to the Commonwealth stock. The main reason urged by London financiers for that was that there would be a much greater marketability about that stock, that it would be a stock which could be placed and disposed of on the Stock Exchange and elsewhere much more readily than the stock of the several states. But if we make this stock contingent-as we shall do if we accept my right honorable friend's proposals-on something which is to befall hereafter, giving the Federal Government full scope to act in regard to conversion as they think fit-to proceed with their conversion when they can get favorable terms-then we have nothing whatever to fear in that direction, and all we require will be secured to us. I hope Sir George Turner will move such an amendment as will secure this result for us.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I agree with a great deal of that which has fallen from the Premier of Victoria, but I confess that, as regards the proposals he made, I shall not be able to follow him altogether. I particularly object to the suggestion that the states should be prohibited from future borrowings. I am inclined to think that a proposal of that sort would be fatal to the development of Australia.

[2556]
Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
They represent the foundation of these colonies.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Ours represent profitable investments-works of development of which we have every reason to be proud, and which are returning a very fair interest on the money. If the colonies are to be told that, as regards the sources of development, we in future are to be prohibited from having recourse to these loan funds which they have applied so profitably in the past, I cannot help thinking that it would be a very difficult matter to obtain their assent to the suggestion. I trust, therefore, that Sir George Turner will not consider that when some of us support him in his first proposal, we intend to follow him to the end in the direction which he suggested. I, for one, must at the earliest moment indicate my intention to oppose any such suggestion. We ought to do something for the purpose of providing for the application of the surplus revenue for the benefit of the states, and I think a great deal may be done in that direction by requiring the repayment of the interest on the state borrowings out of the Customs revenue, which is handed over to the Federation. Possibly we hardly appreciate the extent to which we are going in handing over that revenue. The Customs revenue, I suppose, represent fully 25 per cent. of the total revenue of the states, and say about 50 per cent. or more of the net revenue of the states. That is proposed to be handed over entirely to the Federal Government, and we place no limitation on their powers of expenditure. On the contrary, forming the best estimate we can under the circumstances, we come to the conclusion that they will be possessed, after satisfying all ordinary federal requirements, of a sum of between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000 at the outside, increasing as the prosperity and the population of Australia increase. I am appalled, and I use the word advisedly, at the contemplation of the possibilities which may arise on such a state of things. The temptation to waste and extravagance is almost shocking. However honest the Federal Parliament and the Federal Government may be—and I attribute to them every honesty—with a sum of between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000 to work upon, we know full well there are possibilities, if not probabilities, of waste to the states which are interested in the surplus, and we shall be failing in our duty if we do not attempt to provide against that so far as we possibly can. I therefore welcome this suggestion in connexion with the debts. I shall support it to the very utmost. Either you must, in so many words, limit the expenditure of the Federal Government—

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is impossible.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Which is, if not impossible, very difficult, and very objectionable from some points of view. Either you must limit the expenditure of the Federal Government, or you must throw on the Federal Government responsibilities in proportion to the huge revenue with which you endow them. I think we can do that by throwing on the Federal Government some duties in connexion with these debts. My honorable friend and colleague (Mr. Holder) has put it, and I think strongly, that if you give to the state creditor at the outset, without any question of arrangement, the security of the Federal Government to his bond in addition to that which he possesses, you make him a present of whatever difference in value there would be between the state bond and the bond of the Commonwealth. Difficult as it may be to estimate what that difference may be, it does appear to me that a bond of the Commonwealth would command a higher figure, and if you are to give the additional security you ought to get something in the nature of a quid pro quo from the lender. I think, however, we will be doing all that is necessary at the present moment if, instead of declaring that the Federation shall take over the debts, capital and interest, we provide that they should either pay the interest direct to the lender, or return an amount to the states equivalent to their requirements in this respect. I think if that is done you will to some extent meet the force of the objection of my honorable friend (Mr. Holder).

Mr. FRASER. -

We have already decided against that.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I do not think, Sir Richard, at the present time, in connexion with this clause we have decided anything in particular.

The CHAIRMAN. -

We have decided nothing.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I am very pleased, indeed, that the whole matter is before us in a tentative condition, so that we may do our best under the circumstances. I am satisfied that this is one of the most important questions in connexion with the whole of federation. When we go back to our people, and dilate on the advantages of federation we shall be met by the matter-of-fact business inquiry: What will it cost? And if we return with a Bill in the shape proposed, we shall be compelled to tell them that we do not know. We shall have to admit that the whole of our Custom revenue is handed over to the Commonwealth, and that, as regards the expenditure of the Federation, we do not know what that will be-how much is coming back to the states, how much is available for distribution, or in what proportion the surplus will be distributed. Under these circumstances, there will be a natural reluctance, as I think there ought to be—however much we may desire the accomplishment of Australian union—to rush into it too hastily, unless we know what it is going to cost.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The people will look more at that than at anything else.

Mr KINGSTON. - Undoubtedly they will look more at the cost than at anything else. It is the price of the article that will be considered, and however attractive the article may be, unless we know what it is going to cost us it would be very difficult to induce any individual—and especially difficult to induce the majority of the electors throughout the states—to enter into a bargain in connexion with which they do not know their pecuniary responsibility. Unless we have some more precise provision on this subject, the states will be absolutely at the mercy of the Federation. They will be nothing more nor less, so far as their revenue is concerned, than dependencies of the Commonwealth. We are told that finance is government, and that government is finance. We have been at great pains to provide for the proper representation of the states, but all these constitutional provisions seem to me to be of little importance indeed so long as you leave the absolute control of the state purse-strings in the hands of the Federal Treasurer; and that is what you do unless you provide for something in the shape of a distinct return to the states. As to the proposal of Mr. McMillan, it has been well pointed out by Mr. Holder that a state is not likely to raise any substantial objection to its debts, its liabilities, its responsibilities, being taken over any more than an individual would do. There is no doubt about that; but pass the clause as proposed by Mr. McMillan, and what do you do? You place a tremendous power in the hands of the Federal Government and the Federal Parliament in enabling them to regulate the mode of distribution of whatever surplus they may have left amongst the various states. But in passing the clause proposed by Mr. McMillan you go a great deal farther. We know the proportions to which state debts have already arrived, although I am perfectly satisfied that they are well invested, and that we can even indulge in greater borrowing. But give to the Federal Government and the Federal Parliament—although all the states may desire that some, if not all, of their debts should be taken over—the power to deal with one state to the exclusion of the others, just as they please, and you put, in my opinion, in the hands of the Federal Government and the Federal Parliament a power which is greater than they ought to possess. It would be infinitely preferable that they should be able to take over either all, or a rateable proportion, of the debts. Enable them to discriminate between one state and another in this respect, and it seems to me that you introduce a fertile subject of difficulty, which it is well should be eliminated, if possible, from a Federal Constitution. I observe that in the Canadian statute a provision is made for the payment of the interest on the debts—for taking over the whole of the debts. It is a second charge on the federal revenue from the initiation of the Constitution. I see also, that in the South African Act—though of course not much has been done with regard to that so far—there is a similar provision extending to debts which are to be ascertained by Executive order—"At or after the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth." I think that we would do well to proceed on lines somewhat of this character; and I trust that, however late may be the period of our deliberations, we shall not exhibit anything in the shape of undue haste in connexion with this all-important matter. When we go back to our people we must admit to them that, as regards their chief source of revenue, it will be taken from them, and I think we are hound to be able to give them an assurance that a fair share of the responsibilities of each province shall be assumed by the Commonwealth. I trust that some provision of the kind suggested by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner will be accepted.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria).—

From my reading of the clause as proposed by Mr. McMillan in substitution for the clause in the present Bill, it appears to me that Mr.
McMillan's proposal is preferable. It gives a wider scope to the Federal Parliament; it does not hamper it in any way. I said in Adelaide, and I say here, that so far as I can judge, there is no probability, or very little probability, of the Federal Parliament making a profitable conversion of any loan unless the loan is maturing. If honorable members will look at the return of the debts of Australia they will find that within the next ten years there will be many millions of loans coming due, and when loans are falling due is the time for the Federal Parliament, with the sanction of course of the states concerned, to make the necessary arrangements for conversion, or for renewal, or for any other process that will be most profitable to the Federal Parliament and to the states concerned. In my opinion, it is not possible to make a profitable conversion years before the debentures mature. I do not know of any such case in past history, except one or two, such as that of Mr. Goschen. Even in that case, as Mr. Glynn pointed out the other day, the loans were on the eve of maturity; and I think we ought to bear in mind the fact that the Federal Parliament can only make a profitable transaction on the eve of maturity. Then, of course, they have a clear field, and can tell the debenture-holders, whoever they may be, that if they don't like to convert on certain favorable terms the open market will be used for negotiating fresh loans. We cannot too strongly bear that in mind, and I think we must leave out of the question the idea of converting vast millions of the public debt of Australia. That must be done gradually as the loans mature, and can only be done gradually in that way. It cannot be done in globo, as some honorable members appear to imagine. Mr. McMillan's proposal is that Parliament may take over all or any part of the debt of any state, subject to the consent of the state, on conditions to be agreed upon. Does not that give ample power? Are you going to take over the debt of a state without the state's consent? I think that would be a very unwise thing. You may have a crank as Treasurer in the Federal Parliament who would make ducks and drakes of the whole affair if you give him absolute power. If he has uncontrolled power, I do not know what he might not do.

Mr. HIGGINS. - It must be done by the Parliament.

Mr. FRASER. - But of course the Treasurer of the day pretty well represents the Parliament. At any rate, the debts belong to the states: The states are responsible for them, and I hold that the states should be consulted in any negotiation for the transfer of those debts, because the states have to pay the interest. Are you going to give the Parliament power to take over the debts on terms not agreed upon by the states? I repeat that would be a most imprudent thing to do. How are you going to transfer properly the debts of the states to the Federal Commonwealth in defiance, perhaps, of the wishes of the states, who are vitally concerned in the matter-who are responsible for the due and prompt payment of the interest on their debts every half-year? Surely you ought to give the states power to say yes or no in such a matter as that.

Mr. ISAACS. - Where is it suggested that the Commonwealth may fix terms?

Mr. FRASER. - If the Commonwealth has imperative power-mandatory power to take over the debts of a state, the state is ignored.

Mr. ISAACS. - What will the state lose if the Commonwealth has no power to fix terms?

Mr. FRASER. - Suppose the Commonwealth makes a very bad bargain-can you not suppose such a thing?
Can a state be any worse off if some one else becomes responsible for its debts?

Mr. FRASER. -

According to the clause, the state is responsible for its debts. If the Commonwealth is bound to pay over to the states sufficient of the surplus so that the states will be under no responsibility, I grant you the position is different.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No one has suggested any terms being imposed on the states.

Mr. FRASER. -

But the clause, as proposed to be amended by Sir George Turner, would make it compulsory that the Commonwealth shall take over the whole debt. I understand that would be compulsory. I want to be instructed on the point, seeing that there are so many legal members around me.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Do not ask them; they will quarrel amongst themselves over anything.

Mr. FRASER. -

Certainly they do a lot of straw-splitting; but I look upon this provision as compulsory, and I think that it is a danger. I would far prefer, as a business man, the clause proposed by Mr. McMillan. It is the same clause with a much wider scope, and I see no danger in it. To make the creditors a present of a rise in the price of the stock which would necessarily take place on the Federal Parliament taking over the debts would be a most foolish thing, and, therefore, it would be foolish to convert stock long before maturity. In ten years' time some twelve millions of money is becoming due, and that will be the time when conversions can be effectually made.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

The Federal Government need not give the stock-holders any advantage.

Mr. FRASER. -

The federal guarantee would be an advantage to the debenture-holders provided the loans had some years to mature, because the stock would rise in value in a short time, the debenture-holders would sell out, and of course the state would get no benefit from the profit. That is what I wish to avoid. It would be absurd to attempt to prevent the states from borrowing. The states must borrow and must be allowed to do so. The shire councils now borrow, and are we going to give less power to the states than we give to our shire councils?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We could legislate in the state Parliament to prevent the shire councils from borrowing.

Mr. FRASER. -

You can?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Of course.

Mr. FRASER. -

I tell you that you cannot.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What would prevent us?

Mr. FRASER. -

The shires would not allow you to do it. That may seem a strange thing to say, but it is true.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The rate payers in the shires would be very glad for us to exercise a strong control over their borrowing.

Mr. FRASER. -

Apparently the Parliament of the state has unlimited power, but it derives that power from the people, and it cannot, now or at any time, fly in the face of the people. It would be absurd to try and prevent the shires from borrowing. They are responsible for their loans, especially when they are made by Act of Parliament to contribute to a sinking fund. The shire councils borrow at the present time, and I say that it would be absurd to prevent the provincial Parliaments from borrowing. There may be very good and valid reasons for doing so in a young country like this. Of course there is no doubt that it would be very satisfactory to the various local Parliaments for the Commonwealth Parliament to give them back sufficient to pay their interest, but, as I indicated by way of interjection when Mr. Kingston was speaking, we have already passed clauses in the Bill which do not give that power. Of course I have no doubt that we can review such decisions, but we have already voted, and, so far as my judgment goes, we could not very well go back on what we had said. I only rise, however to say that any conversions of the loans m

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I hope sincerely that the committee will support Sir George Turner in his amendment, and I should like to mention one or two considerations which seem to me to show the vital weakness of Mr. McMillan's scheme. The idea of Mr. Holder and those who follow his train of thought is that, by rendering this matter optional, terms can be made with the creditors to get a portion of the premium, the whole of which would otherwise go into their pockets. Under Mr. McMillan's proposal the position would be this: The Commonwealth would have to bargain with the states about taking over their debts, and the moment these negotiations were instituted, the outside creditor would at once know that a particular state's debts would be likely to be taken over. The result would be that the price of the bonds would go up. But even if the negotiations were carried on in secret, a Bill would have to be brought into Parliament for the purpose, and the moment the Bill was brought in up would go the price of bonds.

Mr. FRASER. -

That would only be upon the maturity of the debt.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I agree with Mr. Fraser's position upon that point, but it is alleged that before maturity, if you were about to give the federal security instead of the state's security, there would be a premium in the market upon the existing bonds. I am merely now taking the position of my opponents, who say that no matter what length of time a loan might have before it was about to mature, the moment the Commonwealth took over the debts the loan would be at a premium.

Mr. FRASER. -

Would my honorable friend allow me to explain? That would only occur if you propose to take over a debt years and years before it would mature in the ordinary course. But if you only propose to take over the debts as they mature, there can be no possible rise in price.

Mr. GLYNN. -

My honorable friend (Mr. Fraser) forgets that I am not arguing against what he has stated, but against what has been stated by Mr. Holder, and, in order to argue against that position, I am restating it so that I may show its weaknesses. If a premium were likely to accrue from the federal security being better than the state security, then the moment you applied Mr. McMillan's provision you would allow the public to know that the state was about to take over a debt belonging to a particular state, and then, I say, the tendency would be for the price of the loans to be taken over to rise. Therefore, you could not get, as a consideration for the federal security, the premium you expect, because the market would have been forestalled.

Mr. FRASER. -

The taking over is not compulsory.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I know it is not, but I am pointing out that, between the optional method of Mr. McMillan and the optional method proposed by the Bill, there is a fatal weakness which operates against Mr. McMillan's proposal. The weakness is that under Mr. McMillan's proposal you must let the public know at once that certain specific debts are to be taken over, so that the premium will have been forestalled by the action of the bond-holders or the rise in anticipation. Under the Bill, as it now stands, however, suppose it were intended to take over debts to the extent of £40,000,000 out of £140,000,000, you would not specify what particular bonds were to be taken over. You would say to the bondholders that tenders would be received for the taking over of so much stock by the Commonwealth, and the bond-holders wishing to, convert would offer a premium; and the biggest premiums would be accepted.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Would the Commonwealth ever act under Mr. McMillan's proposal except under pressure from the states? And is not that a signal of weakness?

Mr. GLYNN. - I say that under the Bill, as it stands, the stock you are going to take over will not be specified, but the Commonwealth would call for tenders as to which stock should be converted, and would thus secure the premium if one exists; so that there is absolutely no choice as to the financial reasonableness between the Bill as it stands and Mr. McMillan's proposal, which is a most retrograde step. And I would point out, in favour of the compulsory taking over of debts, that at the beginning of the Commonwealth Parliament there will, in all probability, not be much difference, if any, between the position of the Commonwealth bonds in the London market and the position of state bonds. For instance, I find that Canadian 3½ per cent. stock, payable in 1934, was on the 1st January, 1898, according to the Economist, at £108 10s.

Mr. FRASER. - What rate of interest?

Mr. GLYNN. - 3½ per cent. stock, payable in 1934. Now, take for the purpose of comparison a South Australian Stock-3½ per cent., payable in 1939. That stock was at £109 11s., as against the Canadian stock at £108 10s., on the 1st January, 1898. So that the difference in five years is covered by the 21s. additional price for South Australian stock. I might also say that Tasmanian 3½ per cent. stock, payable in 1920-40, was at £109 11s., as against the Canadian stock mentioned at £108 10s. on the same date. The same thing is observable throughout the whole scale of the colonial stocks. So that honorable members who think that the premiums will be realized are imagining that something will take place which the existing comparison between the Canadian and our own Australian stocks show will probably not be realized, at any rate at the beginning of federation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Do you mean to say that, if the creditors in England knew that Tasmanian bonds were being backed up by the Commonwealth, those bonds would not sell for a higher price?

Mr. GLYNN. -

"Backed up" by the Commonwealth? That is not the proposal.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The bond-holder will know that the Federation has promised to pay these bonds.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The honorable member means that you will have two persons promising to pay instead of one? But that is not the position. The position is not that the bond-holder will have two securities, but that one security will be divided into two. I would also point out that you are bringing sources of revenue to the Commonwealth which will rather have the effect of detracting from the value of the stocks in the London market. The probability is that our stocks will go back because you have taken from the states the control of the Customs revenue which they formerly possessed, so that the states will not be in as good a position to pay as they were in before.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Going back would not injure us except that we should get worse terms when we went to borrow more money.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is the real position. I am answering the objection to Sir George Turner's proposal, but I do not believe in that objection for a moment. The position of Sir George Turner is the correct one, and I hope that the committee will not consent to Mr. McMillans amendment, because it is, in my opinion, the most retrograde step in financing which I have seen proposed to this committee.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

This question must, I think, convince us as being one of which we are only at the threshold. I feel confident that it will be very difficult for us, with our conflicting views, and with the, to a large extent, meagre information we have, regarded from the point of view of reliability, to arrive at a settlement that can be accepted readily by any of the colonies. Now, I quite approve of proceeding with this work as far as we fairly can, but we must remember that there is considerable doubt and danger in finally closing the discussion upon the financial question, considering that we have staring us in the face the necessity of leaving the Bill for acceptance or rejection by the various colonies.

If it were done, when 'tis done then 'twere well
It were done quickly.

But we know there is considerable danger in the undertaking, and we may find the matter done in a way we do not wish. I join with my right honorable friend and colleague (Sir George Turner) in thinking that the proposal of Mr. McMillan is not at all acceptable. It is not acceptable, because it offers us no solution whatever of the financial question in any aspect, and it is not only open to that objection, but also to another one, which is that it leaves another opening for more struggles for the surplus. It is open to the objection also-to which the Bill would have been open if the proposed amendments from Tasmania were accepted, in which it was sought to be provided that financial aid might be given by the Commonwealth-that it might be an indirect means of allowing a state to go to the Commonwealth and ask for financial aid by means of taking over some of its debts, without regard to any of the other colonies whatever. And, as Mr. Kingston said, it is a mode of access to the federal purse that cannot be too jealously guarded and provided against. I think, therefore, that there ought to be some such provision as Sir George Turner suggests, to compel the Commonwealth to take over the debts as they exist at the time of the establishment of the Union without any terms. I agree with my honorable friend (Mr. Fraser) that if it was suggested that the Commonwealth might, of its own volition, impose terms in any state without the state having anything to say in the matter, that would be very unjust.

Mr. FRASER. -
Will the state have any voice in the matter?

Mr. ISAACS. -
The Commonwealth will have no power to impose any terms upon the state. All that would happen under the proposal, which is rather bare at present, is that the Commonwealth would come in and pay the debts of the state. That is no hardship to the state. Certainly the state would have to indemnify the Commonwealth, and it would be in no worse position than if the Commonwealth did not pay the debts at all. I cannot go with Sir George Turner when he says that it follows as a corollary that there should be no more state borrowing. That is unnecessary, and it would, I think be equivalent to saying that no state undertaking of any kind should be embarked upon unless the Commonwealth found the money for it. That would mean closing up the states altogether, and it would show that we had-gone a very clumsy way about unification. We are committing to the Commonwealth only certain powers and jurisdictions, and providing the money to carry out those powers, and we are leaving to the states everything connected with their internal development. We must not take away from the states the money required to carry on that internal development. What was done in Canada has been briefly referred to by my right honorable friend (Mr. Kingston), but he did not go quite far enough.
It is true it is provided in the Canadian Act, section 104, that the annual interest of the public debts of the several provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the union shall form the second charge on the consolidated revenue of Canada. What is to say, it is second to the charge for collecting.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
Expenses?
Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
Is that interest only?
Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes. But in section 111 it is distinctly provided that Canada shall be liable for the debts and liabilities of each province existing at the union.
That is the principle, and it does not rest there.
Mr. HOLDER. -
Is that what you wish us to do?
Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes; I think that the Commonwealth should be liable for the debts of the states as existing at the union. Then, to show that it is not necessary that the states should cease to borrow on their own responsibility, sub-section (3) of section 92 provides that the provinces shall have th
Mr. HIGGINS. -
That is what Mr. Glynn proposed.
Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes, something of the kind. Section 112 of the Canadian Act provides that Ontario and Quebec conjointly shall be liable to Canada for the amount, if any, by which the public debts of the provinces exceed, at the union, 62,500,000 dollars, and shall be charged with interest at the rate of 5 per centum. per annum thereon. Section 113 has reference to some assets Of Ontario and Quebec. Section 114 provides that Nova Scotia shall be liable to Canada for the amount, if any, by which its public debt exceeds at the union 8,000,000 dollars, and shall be charged with interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum thereon. Section 115 provides that New Brunswick shall be liable to Canada for the amount, if any, by which its public debt exceeds at the union 7,000,000 dollars, and shall be charged with interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum thereon. Then Section 116 makes a per contra provision. It is that in case the public debt of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick do not at the union amount to 8,000,000 and 7,000,000 dollars respectively, they shall respectively receive, by half-yearly payments in advance, from the Government of Canada, interest at 5 per centum per annum on the difference between the actual amount, of their respective debts and such stipulated amounts. It is evident, therefore, that some careful calculation was made and that a basis was agreed to on which the Federation should start. Under the Canadian Act certain facts are made clear. The first is that a Federation may fairly start by taking the responsibility of the existing debts, and that it is possible to make a fair allowance, either for excess or deficiency above or below the standard; and the second is that each state may be left to borrow for its own provincial purposes. If you make the state indemnify the Federation then the state is checked in its borrowing by that consideration, because the Commonwealth may insist upon the fulfilment of the indemnity, and no doubt would. There is no chance of any favour being shown to the state.

Mr. GLYNN. -
The indemnity should only be in relation to excesses.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is a matter on which I do not pretend to say anything very definite, but these are the broad lines upon which Canada went. We cannot apply these particular provisions to our circumstances. All that we can do is to take the principles.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Was there a provision for the division of the surplus like our provision?

Mr. ISAACS. -
No; in the Canadian Act that question was dealt with in section 118, which provides that the following sum shall be paid to the several provinces in support of their Governments and Legislatures: - Ontario, 80,000 dollars. - Quebec, 70,000 dollars; Nova Scotia, 60,000 dollars; New Brunswick, 50,000 dollars; in all, 260,000 dollars. The section also sets out that an annual grant in aid shall be made to each province, and then it goes on to say what that grant shall be based on. In Canada this system has not been found to work satisfactorily. Efforts are continually being made to obtain what are technically known in Canada as "better terms." We are all aware of the fact that a few years ago a meeting was held of the Premiers, and certain responsible Ministers of the various provinces, at which strong complaint was made of the treatment of the states. The position of the whole Federation seemed to be very risky at that time. If we are to preserve the Federation, and not to expose the states to annihilation, and that is what complete control of the revenue might lead to, we ought to be very careful to do what I sought to do in some way the other evening. I should have been very glad if on that occasion Mr. Kingston had made the speech he has delivered today. I should have been very glad to have heard him or any other honorable member put in those extremely forcible terms the absolute necessity, if the consent of the states is to be obtained to a Commonwealth Constitution, of the states being made in some way secure from annihilation. It has been pointed out in the Victorian Blue-book prepared by the Government Statist (Mr. Fenton) that the Customs revenue, which now amounts to £6,000,000 or £7,000,000 per annum, will probably in a century's time amount to something like £70,000,000 per annum; and to ask the states to enter the Federation without any sort of security is too much. We know very well that faith will move mountains, but it seems to me that we are making a mountain of dimensions that it will take a very strong faith to move. I would earnestly press on the committee, not the desirability, but the absolute necessity, if the consent of the states is to be obtained, of providing some means by which the states and the state Treasurers shall receive a guarantee that they will not be deprived of their revenues, and left in a most terrible state of uncertainty with regard to meeting their liabilities.

Question-That the word "may" proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause-put.

The committee divided-

Ayes ... ... ... ... ...8
Noes ... ... ... ... ...25

Majority for Sir George Turner's amendment ... ... ... ... 17

AYES.
Barton, E. Holder, F.W.
Brunker, J.N. Walker, J.T.
Cockburn, Dr. J.A.
Fraser, S. Teller.
Higgins, H.B. O'Connor, R.E.
NOES.
Berry, Sir G. Grant, C.H.
Braddon, Sir E.N.C. Henry, J.
It is evident that the clause cannot be left as it is, because it reads-"Parliament shall take over all or any part of the debt." It could therefore be complied with by taking over six penny worth of the debt of each state, and the value of the word "shall" would then be exhausted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The clause will, of course, have to be remodelled.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
The Finance Committee can remodel it.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I am a member of the Finance Committee, and I could not undertake to remodel the clause. I do not yet know what the majority want. I was anxious to save time, but I think it possible that if a few more speeches had been delivered the unfortunate vote that has, been given might have been avoided. However, I must now speak of what I gathered to be the purpose of those who voted with the majority just now. Even to compel the Parliament of the Federation to take over the whole of the debts would not accomplish the chief object which the majority have in view-the settlement of the honorable member's difficulty.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
If Mr. Holder will allow me to move a further amendment, it may give him a basis for his arguments. I beg to move-

That after the words "Parliament shall" the following words be inserted:-
"be liable for the public debts of the states existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth."

That amendment, of course, may require alteration later on. I am merely moving it tentatively as an amendment on which we may base our arguments.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Could not you limit it to the interest?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am moving it in the widest possible form to facilitate the discussion of the question. My amendment follows on the lines of the Canadian Constitution, which also adds "and liabilities," but I do not like those words, because I do not know exactly what they mean. However, on my amendment we can discuss the whole question, and determine whether the liability shall be in respect of the principal and interest or only of the interest. My own idea is that, if we make it apply to the interest only, we shall go as far as we ought to go; but, as I have already said I move it in the larger form so as to facilitate the full discussion of the question.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

When the full effect of Sir George Turner's amendment is seen, it will make it quite certain that the Convention cannot pass it. It declares that the Commonwealth shall be liable for the public debts of the states existing at the establishment of federation, which must be twelve months hence. Now, if, in the meantime, any state pleased, on the faith of the Commonwealth being established, it might involve itself in a very large debt, and no matter if it were beyond the state's own capacity to pay that debt, the Commonwealth would be liable for it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

What was the interval in Canada between the passing of the Act and the time of the union?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I cannot say on the spur of the moment, but my argument holds good in the present case. I must apologize for repeating what I said in Sydney. I took it for granted that the arguments I there used would be fresh in the minds of honorable members, and that I need not repeat them; however, I now find it is necessary to do so. The insertion of the words suggested by Sir George Turner would make the federal authority liable for the principal and interest of the public debts of the various states, and that would put the best security which Australia had to offer, not only at the back of the best she now offers in the London market, but at the back of the worst. Some of the Australian stocks are a good deal higher than others.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

There are not very many points between them, if you take into consideration the currency of the loans.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Taking into consideration the currency of the loans, and everything else, there is a difference between the 3 per cents. of one colony and another, where the circumstances are practically equal, of 5 1/2 per cent. to-day, according to the latest figures I have any knowledge of.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

There is very little difference on the 3 1/2 per cents.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Well, I am not discussing the 3 1/2 per cents., I am speaking of the 3 per cents., which are most like the probable stock of the Commonwealth, and I am saying that the difference in those 3 per cents. between one colony and another is 5 1/2 per cent.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is there a difference of 5 1/2 per cent. where the term is the same?

Mr. HOLDER. -

Where the terms are not materially unlike, there is a difference of 5 1/2 per cent. The moment we consolidate the debts of the colonies and issue a unified stock we shall, of course, raise the general level of all. If the 3 per cent. stocks of the several colonies average about par today, I take it that, the 3 per cent. stock of the Commonwealth would stand at not less than 104 per cent. I will take those figures to argue on. Now, what are we really going to do if we carry this proposal? By one stroke of the pen in this Constitution, if we carry so unfortunate a proposal, we shall make a present to the bond-holders who hold stock in the London market now worth 96 per cent. of the difference between that and par, and taking the colonies' 3 per cent. stocks, which now stand at 101 1/2 we shall be giving them the difference between that and 104. Now, are we going to do that? Have we so many millions of money that we can afford to scatter them far and wide among the people who hold Australian stocks today? I believe that the Commonwealth 3 per cent. stock will be worth 104, and is the Convention prepared to throw away the millions of money the difference represents by a stroke of the pen or of the printing press in this Constitution? I hope and believe that the Convention will not do anything of the kind. The next difficulty. which it is proposed by this suggestion to overcome is the difficulty connected with the surplus—the financial difficulty. Now, I take it that there are two alternatives before us. First, it is proposed in the amendment that we shall lay on the federal authority the whole responsibility for the principal and interest of these Australian debts. What will be the result, if we adopt the amendment? In New South Wales they have a Customs and Excise revenue of £2,219,402. I am taking the latest figures available, and the amount I have mentioned is the average for the three years 1893-4-5. In the same colony they have a debt obligation of £2,158,170. So that there is not much of a difference there. In Victoria, the average Customs revenue for the same period was £1,871,000, and the debt obligation, £1,840,000. Now, coming to the next case, that of South Australia, I may say that I should be very glad—if I had only an eye for South Australia, and not for the scheme as a whole—to adopt this proposal, for whereas the revenue of South Australia from Customs and Excise was £525,000, its debt obligation was £931,573, so that, if this principle is adopted, the Federation will be making a present to South Australia of £400,000 a year.

Mr. GORDON. -

The state would be liable for the debt.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

In each case the balance would have to be struck.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I will discuss that too, but I am not going to refrain from putting all the facts and points before the Convention, and I am bound to put the point I have just referred to. It has been suggested that the debts and annual charges on those debts shall be taken and placed against the Customs and Excise revenue. But if that is done, I have pointed out what will be the result in the case of three colonies. While, in the case of some of the colonies, the proposers of that course are not far astray, as a matter of figures, in the case of South Australia, its adoption would make to that colony a present of £400,000 a year, which has to come out of somebody else's pocket, and the particular pocket out of which it has to come is the pocket of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I will vote with you at once.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I knew that the right honorable gentleman would vote with me as soon as he understood the matter. The revenue from Western Australian customs and excise duties for last year was £1,100,000.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We have no excise duties in Western Australia.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Well, the Customs revenue of Western Australia last year was £1,100,000. It will be observed that I have departed from the taking of the three years' average in the case of Western Australia, and that is necessary, because only the latest figures will serve the end we have in view.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Does not Mr. Deakin's amendment alter the position?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I will come to that presently. I am only pointing out these facts, lest, by some extraordinary combination, this amendment might be carried, as I can conceive anything might be carried after the last vote. Now, whilst the Customs revenue of Western Australia last year was £1,100,000, its debt obligation was only £179,000, so that Western Australia would be paying the piper for the rest of us to the tune of many hundreds of thousands of pounds a year.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That won't do at all for Western Australia.

Mr HOLDER. - I knew that Sir John Forrest would say that, even if some of the other representatives did not. The effect of adopting the proposal that has been made would be that, while the totals correspond about accurately, the details making up those totals utterly fail to correspond, and federation on those lines would be such a partnership as we might imagine, if our imaginations were wild enough to conceive of such a thing, between two men in the street, one of whom had £1,000 in his pocket and the other a debt obligation of £1,000 hanging round his neck. Of course, the two amounts exactly balance in the total, and in the total it is all right; but when you come to analyze the details it is altogether wrong. And yet that is the kind of federation that people suggest who want us to set Customs and Excise revenue against the debts and the interest due by all the states, and they suggest that simply because the totals agree without regard to the details.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I did not propose to do that.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Well, that has been proposed in this Convention and outside of it, and therefore I felt bound to answer the position as I have answered it. With what Sir George Turner expressly proposes, I shall deal when we come back after lunch.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. HOLDER. -

I was putting to the committee, when it rose, one of three points of view from which, according to the different methods of agreement or arrangement, this question of setting the Customs revenue against the debts of the states might be disposed of. It appeared that the particular plan I was criticising first was not that which was in the minds of honorable members, and I therefore come to the second, which may prove to be that of which they were speaking. The second is: That there shall be a setting aside of the debts-I put it that way shortly, for the annual charge of those debts-against the annual Customs and Excise.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
That is in the wording of this clause.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I am not saying one word which I can avoid saying-I am not overlooking that it is in the clause.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
That is quite correct; but what you are going to discuss is naturally in the minds of honorable member because it is in this clause.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I am going to show that honorable members have not thought it out properly, otherwise they would see that there are two different plans floating in their minds. The two plans are these: One keeping an account between the states and the Commonwealth, under which account every state shall be under an obligation to make up to the federal authority anything which its revenue may fall short of the annual interest charge, and under which account system the federal authority shall make good to any state by returning in cash any amount of its revenue in excess of the annual interest charge. The amount to be made good by a state, or to be returned by the Commonwealth Parliament, will be an uncertain amount-being the sum which, from time to time, under the fluctuations of revenue or the annual interest charge, may be the balance for or against the state. That is one plan. The other plan, to which I shall come a little later, is: That instead of keeping an account and making a calculation, which shall fluctuate from year to, year and be an uncertain amount, that we should first set out in this Constitution a fixed sum which shall, without any variation, no matter how circumstances may change-

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
This is a very important question, and I think if we are to fairly understand the objections of my honorable friend, honorable members and the Treasurers ought to be present. I therefore call attention to the fact that there is not a quorum of members present.

A quorum having been formed,

Mr. HOLDER resumed. -
If we adopt the former of these two plans and provide for an account being kept of the fluctuating balance by which we shall determine the amount to be paid to or by the states, from year to year, I want to put as clearly as I can to Sir George Turner the fact that his proposal to overcome the financial difficulty will be entirely defeated.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not say it, would overcome the difficulty. The only hope I have from it is to prevent the Federal Treasurer from being too extravagant.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I want to show that it will not even do that. I am as conscious of the difficulty of which the honorable member is thinking as he can be. I know the danger connected with entrusting any Treasurer with a surplus, and the danger of leading him into extravagance, If I could see an way, through the debts or any other method, of preventing him from having a large unappropriated surplus, I would adopt every means to attain that object, but I do not think that can be attained by this proposal, because, as soon as you provide that the fluctuating difference shall be paid to or by the state, you find yourself in this position: Then the Treasurer can expend as much as he likes, and he may spend almost nothing, or he may spend the whole; he simply has to make a larger or smaller levy upon the state account, according to the circumstances.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That is where the difficulty is.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Therefore the proposal made by the honorable member is no protection.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The people will not be taxed more than a certain amount. It affects the destination of the money.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I wish I could grasp the whole meaning of that interjection.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It is simply this, that the Federal Treasurer will be very careful about having to make up too large an amount, knowing that the whole question will have to be fought out in the states Parliaments. Therefore, this proposal will be of some little assistance, although it does not go as far as I should like to.

Mr. HOLDER. -

If the revenue of a state is £100,000 less than the Treasurer will require, the question will not then be whether the state shall pay £100,000. It is to be a debt to the Commonwealth, and it is to

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I cannot get the other, and therefore I shall be glad to get this.

Mr. HOLDER. -

This is a very important matter, and it ought to be possible for us to understand each other. Either I ought to be able to convince the honorable member or he ought to be able to convince me. I should like to put it again. One of us must be right, and the other wrong. Is the state in any conceivably better position when it is resisting a charge made upon it by the federal authority for £100,000 a year, which is due to the federal authority, than it would be in if it were insisting that the federal authority had to return £100,000 from the surplus? I cannot see that there is the slightest difference between the two. If the honorable member can see that there is any difference I should like him to let us know what it is. If there is any difference then what the honorable member proposes might be a safeguard to the state, but if there is no difference at all his provision is no safeguard.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Except in this way that the Treasurer will be very loath to spend his £100,000 when he knows that he will have to get it from the state.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

He will be more afraid of the people to be taxed.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We will take the case of a colony whose returnable surplus under ordinary conditions would be £500,000. The question is should the Commonwealth Treasurer return £500,000 a year to that state, or should he spend £100,000 more than that amount, and require the state to return £100,000 to the Commonwealth? I really fail to see how much stronger a state would be in insisting upon its not having to pay £100,000 than in insisting upon its receiving £100,000 more than it would receive under other circumstances.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

The state will be represented in the Commonwealth Parliament, and will be able to defend itself. Surely it will take care that it is not over-charged.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I think it would be as well able to take care that it got back its full surplus.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That assumes a limit to the expenditure. You are going in a circle.
Mr. HOLDER. -
The honorable and learned member seems to me to be arguing in a circle.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If the Treasurer knew that he had certain payments out to make, he would be very careful of his revenue to that extent.

Mr. HOLDER. -
And if he had to make certain payments out he would be careful of his surplus.

Mr. ISAACS. -
One set of payments he could regulate, the other he could not.

Mr. HOLDER. -
No. He could not regulate a payment to the Commonwealth Treasurer unless it was subject to the state legislation, which, I think, is inconceivable. If a debt is due to the Commonwealth, it must be beyond the control of the state Legislature.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I was referring to the Commonwealth Treasurer, not to the state Treasurer. The Commonwealth Treasurer will get the Customs and Excise revenue of all the states, and if he knows that he has certain liabilities to meet—say, the interest on the public debts of the states—to that extent he will regard his revenue as appropriated, and will be careful of his other expenditure.

Mr. HOLDER. -
It is not appropriated at all if the account between the state and the federal authority is a fluctuating amount; it is appropriated only under the condition that there is a fixed charge.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I was speaking of it in that sense.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Well, I shall deal with that later on. What I am discussing now does not concern a fixed charge, but a fluctuating amount. If the account between the federal authority and the state be a fluctuating charge, to depend upon the necessities of the Federal Treasurer and upon the contributions of the state, there is no greater obligation laid upon the federal authority to return anything to the state than there would be under the provisions of the Bill as it stands. I will put the position again in another way. The Federal Treasurer will have, say, £6,000,000 of surplus after paying the federal expenditure. That is rather more than he will have, but let us take that amount as roughly correct for the purpose of illustrating my argument. Let us imagine that the Federal Treasurer has in any one given year £6,000,000 of surplus. What difference can it make to him whether he has to return the whole of that sum to the various states in cash, or whether he must return it partly in cash and partly in interest payments?

Mr. ISAACS. -

You assume a fixed amount for the federal expenditure. It may be more extravagant under the one system than the other.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That does not affect the point in the slightest degree. If the Treasurer has £6,000,000 to return, it cannot make any difference to him or be any more complete an appropriation of his funds whether he has to return that amount partly in interest charges and the balance in cash, or whether he has to return it all in cash. Now, take the case of a fixed amount. What can it matter to, the Federal Treasurer, to "limit his expenditure," whether he has to return £6,000,000 in the way of surplus or £4,000,000, when he knows that whatever he is short will certainly have to be made up by the states? He knows that if, instead of leaving himself a free surplus of £6,000,000, he leaves himself only £5,000,000, he has £1,000,000 more to go upon the states for. That does not embarrass him in the slightest degree.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will it not embarrass him when he has to ask the people of the Commonwealth for the money?

Mr. HOLDER. -

The people will have to find the money in any case. Suppose that it is conceivable that under the Bill as it stands he might diminish this surplus, the states would have to make up the amount that he was short. If, on the other hand, he diminished the amount available for payment of interest, the states would also have to make up that amount. It does not matter what provision you make, the states will have to make up the amount that the Treasurer is short. If the Federal Government is extravagant, what difference does it make whether the states contribute this money by payments to the Federal Treasurer, or by payments to the bond-holders of the states? If the Federal Treasurer is extravagant, the states will have to make up any shortage.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The idea is, that if this arrangement will not give the Treasurer too much, he will not be extravagant.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Hear, hear; that is the whole point.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I am told that that is the whole point. But if the Federal Treasurer is extravagant the states will have to make up any deficiency. Can it make any difference to the states whether they have to make up this deficiency by payments to the Federal Treasurer or by payments to the foreign bondholders? That leads me to this point. With the fact staring us in the face that extravagant and undue expenditure upon the part of the Federal Treasurer will mean difficulty for the states, we may conclude that the Federal Treasurer will not be extravagant. We often talk here as though the proposal were to hand over the management of our finances to a foreign power. Let us conceive that instead of being members of this Convention we are sitting here as members of the Federal Parliament. The Federal Parliament of course includes the Federal Treasurer, who could take no step against the wishes of the Federal Parliament. Is it conceivable that the Federal Parliament, which would be representative as we are, would take a step which must inevitably lead to the ruin of a state or states? It is absolutely inconceivable. I am not going to suggest that any one state is more awkwardly placed in respect to its finances than any other state, but if the Federal Parliament were extravagant, we may be sure that the weakest state must go to the wall first. Can we imagine that a body like the Federal Parliament, with a sense of responsibility such as we have, would deliberately take action which would lead to the insolvency of the weakest state of the group, and then, having ruined that state, would go on to ruin another, and when it had ruined two states would go on to ruin a third? Such a thing is inconceivable. I cannot imagine in my wildest thoughts that any action of that kind is likely to be taken by the Federal Parliament. That is our safe-guard, and a far better safeguard than any provision which has yet been suggested. I think that I have shown that any settlement which makes the amount to be paid to or by the states a fluctuating amount does not give a guarantee. Now I go on to my third point, the consideration of the proposal which would make the amount to be paid to or by the state a fixed amount, as in the case of the Canadian Constitution. Is that practicable? Before that can be done you must be able to fix the amount of revenue that will probably be derived from the various states under a uniform Tariff. Unless you have that information upon which to work you cannot say how much each state will contribute, and, therefore, how much each state ought fairly to be credited with. You must get that information before you can lay down any definite lines as to the exact amount to be paid to or by the states. Have we not by deliberate votes agreed that the revenue for the next five years cannot be determined, that we know so little about it that we are convinced that accounts must be kept for five years, and we are not quite convinced that at the end of five years we shall be certain as to what the contribution of the various states ought to be? The states are not all on the same footing now, and we do not know whether they will be on the same footing in five years' time. It is impossible for us to lay down any definite lines as to what the contributions of the states will be, or what returns will be made to them. Therefore, the Canadian plan is impossible to us. In Canada, they were able to agree as to what the probable contributions of the states would be, and therefore they could say that such a state should receive back so many dollars. We admit that we do not know what the various states will contribute, and we therefore cannot say what amounts will have to be returned to them and what the relations of each state to the Federation will be.

Mr. ISAACS. - We know what it will be absolutely necessary to return to each state in order to keep it right.

Mr. HOLDER. - We know our needs. If we are going to determine this matter according to our needs, it will mean that the rich must help the poor. That is not the principle upon which we have gone hitherto.

Mr. ISAACS. - Each state must get at least a sufficient amount to pay its interest.

Mr. HOLDER. - That is a new line of argument.

Mr. ISAACS. - No, it is not. Victoria owes so much. She gets a sufficient revenue now to meet those obligations, and under the Federation she must not be left with a gap between her revenue and her liabilities.

Mr. REID. - Victoria must be all right before the bargain is struck, and then she will consent to enter the Federation.

Mr. ISAACS. - Every other state must be in the same position. Victoria wants no special consideration.

Mr. HOLDER. - This is quite a new line of argument. I find that others who were strongly opposed to it have agreed to it.

Mr. ISAACS. - It will be necessary to see that each state contributes a sufficient amount to meet its liabilities.

Mr. HOLDER. - This new suggestion is like a plaster upon the suggestions which we already have, and makes all that we have hitherto done utterly unnecessary. If we adopt it we shall have to reverse every vote we have already given upon the financial provisions of the Bill.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
What does the honorable member want?

Mr. REID. -
It is for those who are up-setting everything that we have done to say what they want.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I will say in a moment what I want, and what I think we ought to do, but I wish first to dispose of these other proposals. In my opinion, it is desirable that I should clear the ground by dealing with these suggestions, and especially with the suggestion that the distribution of the surplus should be made according to the needs of the states, and not in proportion to their contributions.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
No one made that suggestion.

Mr. ISAACS. -
We do not want a penny of revenue that is not our own, we only want to make sure that we shall be able to pay our debts.

Mr. HOLDER. -
These two principles will not harmonize. If I say that a certain amount is to be distributed among certain persons in a certain way that is intelligible. I am trying to point out that these two suggestions are utterly irreconcileable. A plan to distribute the surplus among the states in accordance with their needs is quite intelligible.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We have already objected to that.

Yes, I know that. The proposal to make the return to each state in proportion to its contribution is also intelligible. But you cannot put these two proposals together; they are mutually destructive. You can distribute the surplus in one way or in the other way, but not in both ways. What is now sought is a direct reversal of what we have been trying to do, and will be utterly impossible to carry out unless we recommit the Bill and strike out the financial proposals to which we have already given so much attention, and upon which we have had so many divisions.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I never made any suggestion of the kind you were speaking about.
Neither did any one else.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The right honorable member did not make the suggestion, but the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) did.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Certainly not. All I said was that we wanted some guarantee that the return to the states would be sufficient to enable us to pay our liabilities.

Mr. REID. -

That sounds rather dicky.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I think that means what I have said.

Mr. REID. -

Hear, hear. It is exactly the same thing.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Then it means that we ought to put into the Constitution a minimum Tariff. But it would be better, instead of putting in a minimum Tariff, to put in an actual Tariff. I ask, however, if honorable members are prepared to sit here long enough to frame a Tariff as an appendix to the Constitution, or to adjourn for three or four months to enable some one else to frame such a Tariff for approval? I ask honorable members if they think the Convention has information enough before it to enable it to frame a Commonwealth Customs Bill, or whether, if we did it, there is the slightest probability of the people of these colonies accepting a Constitution which has a hard-and-fast Tariff within its four corners? The thing is an absolute impossibility. This is possible; this is what we ought to insist on; this we can get with the confident assurance that the Federal Parliament can raise such revenue by such methods as it may devise as will meet its own peculiar expenditure-the expenditure connected with the original powers of this Constitution-and that there shall be enough after that has been made to keep the states solvent. That cannot be put in express words in the Constitution unless you put in a minimum Tariff. But it can be assured if you simply take leave to believe that those who will be in the Federal Parliament will be men who will have at heart the interests of the Commonwealth, over whose destinies they will preside. Surely it is inconceivable that any Federal Parliament can be elected which will not have at heart the interests of each separate colony? We might say that the interests of the Federal Parliament will be apart from the interests of the state Parliaments; that the members of the Federal Parliament may wish to degrade, to weaken, the state Parliaments. It is conceivable that they may, but in the interests of the Commonwealth itself, if it is to live and prosper, if it is to live at all, it can only continue through the maintenance of the solvency of each separate state. That is our assurance; and if we believe that the Federal Parliament is to be a body of sane men, a body having at heart the interests of this Commonwealth, we have that assurance, and can go back to our constituents with this sure conviction, that, as the only alternative to providing sufficient revenue for the various states is the insolvency of those states, sufficient revenue will be provided. I ask honorable members, what more can be desired than that? I do not know that I need proceed any farther. I trust that the resolution which was attempted to be arrived at just now, that the Commonwealth shall take over the debts, and to be followed by the further proposal before us, will not be adhered to by the Convention. I can assure honorable members that, anxious as I am to prevent any extravagance on the part of the Federal Treasurer, that is not the way to prevent it; that, anxious as I am to assure the solvency of the states, it is not by any such pledges as are being put that that solvency can be secured. I hope that we will leave the taking over of the debts at the earliest possible moment to the wisdom of the Federal Parliament, giving it the largest possible power as to how and when it will take over all the debts, but that we shall not dictate to it as to how and when it shall be done, but leave it to the wisdom of the Parliament of the day, and the conditions of the hour. That is my counsel, and I do hope that we will not proceed in the entirely wrong course in which we took the first step just before lunch.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

It appears to me that the vote taken to-day emphasizes a great difference which divides this Convention. The clear and consistent statement just made by my honorable friend (Mr. Holder) has put in a manner, beyond misconception, the position as some see it. It appears to me that he correctly states the problem when he says that we have not, by the amendment which we have carried, solved the problem which we clearly desire to solve. We are faced by a problem with three faces. It presents in point of fact three knots, no one of which can be safely untied unless the two other knots are untied at the same time. Those three knots are the taking over of the railways and their financial obligations, the dealing with the debts and their obligations, and the guarantee to the states of the revenue which they are sacrificing in handing over certain of their services to the Federal Government. These three problems go together, and the more we examine them the more we will see that no one of them can be satisfactorily solved from the federal, stand-point unless the two others are also solved. The amendment which has been carried, standing by itself, is an incomplete and unsatisfactory adjustment of the one problem which it seeks to solve, unless it be regarded in its necessary relation to the other two. If it is so regarded it indicates-on the part of the members of this Convention-a change in the attitude they have been assuming, a change which is becoming more and more marked as we proceed in our attitude towards the other two problems which are not immediately before us, but which are inseparably associated with the financial question with which we are now dealing. A consideration of the time and urgency which attend our sittings prevents me from elaborating this question in detail. I venture to assume we all recognise that no federation is complete without the federalization of the railways, that no federation is complete without the federalization of the debts, and that no federation is complete without a guarantee to the several states that they shall not be losers by this new bargain into which they are entering.

Mr. REID. -

And when did we discover this, because we have been going on different lines?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

We have. At Adelaide there was a comparatively small minority who held that view, but since then there is a larger body, and there is now very nearly a majority of the Convention at the present time in favour of that view.

Mr. REID. -

I am sorry.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

We have been slowly approaching it, and the vote which has been recently taken cannot be understood unless it is regarded as expressing the vague dissatisfaction which exists in the Convention with the proposal so strongly supported by Mr. Holder, to remit all these questions to the Federal Parliament. I, for one, happen to share his federal confidence and his federal enthusiasm. It does appear to me that he is not forecasting the future with any unduly sanguine anticipation when he says that the Federal Parliament-and in this he has been supported even by the Premier of New South Wales-will be bound by the very sanction of its position, though not by the express obligations in this charter, to preserve the solvency of the states. It cannot afford to see their solvency imperilled. Then we have had Mr. McMillan and many of the strongest opponents of the federalization of the railways declare that their federalization is not only essential, but is bound to take place. In the same way we have the opponents of any guarantee to the states, which is one method of maintaining their solvency, admitting that their solvency must be maintained. Consequently, we are in this position: All round the Convention, almost without exception, it is acknowledged that the future of federation in these colonies implies, as a necessity the federalization of the railways, the federalization of the debts, and the protection of the solvency of the several states. We are only divided into two parties on the question how far it is possible to go, further than we have yet gone, in giving either directly or indirectly, to the Federal Parliament an indication of the judgment of this Convention, and an outline of the policy which the Federal Parliament is to follow. The honorable member (Mr. Holder) addressed to us an argument of great force when he pointed out that these issues, or, at all events, the one we are now debating, which may be taken as typical of the other two, involves the dealing with many details which it is not only impossible, but probably undesirable, to attempt to provide for in a Federal Constitution. So far, I am inclined to agree with him. But the position is, that while we are to lay before our constituents in the several colonies a perfectly blank sheet of paper in regard to the federal solution of these three problems, we shall say to them that, in our opinion, the inevitable working of such a Constitution, absolutely controlled as it will be by the democracy of Australia, is certain to result in these three federalizations.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is a blank sheet as to our certain liabilities.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is, so far as it implies a direction in the Constitution to the Federal Parliament to undertake the tasks of federalizing which we all admit it will be compelled to undertake by the very necessities of its being and by the interests of the people whom it will be created to protect, and for whom it will legislate. That being the case, we shall be met with the statement that we should have gone further in the way of expressing, so far as it may be advisable in this Constitution, a direction to the Federal Parliament as to the line which it should adopt in these cases.

Mr. FRASER. -

Give them a free hand, and then they will be able to do it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Is it enough to give them a free hand? I d

Mr. REID. -

That is what you are beginning to forget.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No, that is what I am trying to remember.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is what we are all trying to remember.
Mr. REID. -

Is it? Thank you.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Objection is urged, and properly urged, against putting what are called mere placards in the Constitution. To that we may agree; but there may be instructions which are more than placards, although they do not go the whole length of providing in £ s. d. as to the obligations to be assumed or discharged. And the difference which divides the Convention, and which was indicated by the last division, is that, as the Constitution stands, we are leaving it altogether too much a matter of inference and assumption as to what course will be followed in regard to railways debts and the guarantee. While we, as old parliamentarians, familiar with the method in which Parliaments work, are, by our very experience of these circumstances, inclined to rely almost absolutely on the Federal Parliament, we have to remember that we shall be addressing thousands whose acquaintance with these methods is necessarily not so close as our own. They will look into this document and seek to find within its four corners all the policy which is sought to be embodied in it. Under these circumstances we are not forgetful, but are remembering the electors, when we say that there should be within this Constitution some clearer and more definite provision upon this vital question. We should define the relations which the several states shall bear to the Commonwealth, and the responsibilities which shall be assumed by one and the other, rather than leave the whole to implication and inference from the document which we will lay before them. Now, if I am correct in my surmise, the last division was significant, and is not likely to be reversed. It is quite possible that a means can yet be found which shall leave to the Federal Parliament that freedom which is a necessity of its being, and which is especially insisted on by the Premier of New South Wales, whose great anxiety on all these matters is not to tie its hands. While admitting that the views which he and many others hold must be given their due weight, it appears to me, for one, that they have been given too much weight, and that there has been less distinctiveness in the policy we have laid down in the Constitution than we may fairly put into it without impairing its efficiency as a Constitution, without indulging in placards, and without unduly tying the hands of the Federal Parliament. If we one and all mean and believe that the Federal Government and the Federal Parliament will necessarily undertake their federal responsibilities and discharge them in a federal spirit as to the railways, and debts of the several states, why should not that be indicated on the face of the Constitution more distinctly than it is, where, indeed, it is a mere option? Now, leaving that general view without further elaboration for reasons already mentioned, allow me to put to my honorable friend (Mr. Holder), not merely as a financial expert, but as a politician of experience, the question whether the position remains the same so far as the finding of the money is concerned, if the Commonwealth, now or at any time, assumes the responsibility for our debts, and charges the states with them, or if the states themselves are left to find the interest on those debts? While theoretically that is the same position in practical politics, it is by no means the same thing. He has every year within his command the Budget of South Australia while he remains its Treasurer, and it might be said to him that the special appropriations made in his colony have no effect on his policy, that it does not matter in the least what special appropriations are made, because it is only a question of levying fresh taxation on the people and obtaining the necessary sum.

Mr. HOLDER. -
If you make the amount fixed and definite, your argument is complete, but if the amount is fluctuating it is useless.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I agree with my honorable friend that if the amount is fixed and definite my argument is complete. I do not altogether agree with him that even if it is fluctuating it is insufficient.

On the contrary, it is worth something, and in practical politics it is worth a good deal. For this reason: If the Federal Treasurer has placed upon his shoulders the responsibility of finding the interest of our debts, it will really mean that the disposable sum in his hands will be diminished by that amount. As a practical matter of experience, whether they are taxed through the states, or taxed through the Commonwealth, the taxpayers of the Commonwealth in a rough-and-ready way have a certain limit to the amount of the taxation they can or will bear; and if that taxation be specially devoted to certain ends by the Commonwealth, those taxpayers will be less likely to permit his indulgence in any fresh schemes involving a large expenditure of money. First, he would be limited by the practical necessities of taxation, and secondly, even in the minor matter, the altogether surface matter, by the apparent sum at his disposal. The obligation which he is placed under even by a mere paper statement, although it may not have any effect as regards the pounds, shillings, and pence in his coffers, actually operates to some extent as a brake on his wheels in regard to extravagant expenditure.
An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
   Would it not be more agreeable to put it on the states Treasurers?
Mr. DEAKIN. -
   I think if he only had himself to consider he probably would, but as the representatives who maintain him in power, and give him his majority, are also the representatives of the states concerned, and are also taxpayers of the states, they will take care that he is not more exigent in his demands on the state than they can help.
Mr. REID. -
   Is that not a strong argument for doing without any device?
Mr. DEAKIN. -
   It is a strong argument, but I don't think it is a sufficient argument. There is something in making the obligation of the Commonwealth Treasurer clearer and more direct. By making him responsible for the discharge of the interest upon the debts of the states-a responsibility he must discharge in the face of representatives of every state in the Union-there will be on his part a less free handling of the balance of the federal finances than there would be if he had no such obligation. I agree with Mr. Holder, that if we work it out as a mere matter of £ s. d., as a mere matter of theoretical responsibility, there is practically no difference between the two situations. The money all comes from the taxpayers and has to be paid, whether by the Treasurers of the states or by the Treasurer of the Commonwealth to the state; so that theoretically the positions are identical. But, as a matter of practical working, I would put it to Mr Holder whether they really are identical; whether, for instance, if he had transferred to him the liabilities of all the municipalities of South Australia, that burden, even if accompanied with the rates at present paid, would not, by casting upon him a heavier financial load, tend indirectly-and that is all Sir George Turner contends for-to restrict his dealings with the other funds over which he has control, render him more economical in expenditure, and cause the taxpayers to watch him more jealously? By dividing up the responsibility, by having the local, state, and Federal Governments, you are able to do the work more efficiently; and one of the accompaniments of that is that you extract more from the pockets of the taxpayers than you could do under a unitary form of government. A taxpayer will, under three or four different forms of local and state government, face greater works and greater endeavours, and consequently pay more money, than if he were under a simple unitary government, like an Eastern despotism. I do not, however, desire to dwell unduly on that argument. The whole force and weight of the amendment lies not in its relation to this problem simply, but lies in its relation to the other two problem with which it is bound up. Therefore, I voted with great satisfaction for the amendment, recognising at the time its very narrow limitations and its imperfect achievement, but looking at it as a finger-post pointing this Convention onward to its duty to reconsider this problem in its three pleases, so as to provide, if it be possible, in this Constitution for the taking over of the railways, for the taking over of the debts, and for an absolute guarantee in money.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You cannot leave the state Treasurers to mere chance.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

There is one thing we could do without trespassing beyond the proper limits of this Constitution. We must leave the Federal Parliament to settle all details as to taking over the railways, because they involve multifarious considerations as to the construction of new railways, the development of existing lines, and so on. We must also leave to the Federal Parliament the taking over of the debts of the several states, because that question involves a choice of times and modes and many financial considerations. The states are not all on the same financial level, and no one state should be given an advantage at the expense of the others. What is aimed at is to enable the states by collective action to carry the financial burden of their loans better than they are now doing as separate states. I seek to place in this Constitution-I say this in answer to Mr. Reid-no provision which shall provide for an advantage to Victoria or any other single colony at the expense of the rest of the group. If there be an exception at all, it is the exception we have made in the case of Western Australia with regard to the retention of her customs duties, and we did that deliberately because of her special circumstances. But putting that aside, I would be no party to any proposal which had for its end a benefit to be gained by one colony at the expense of one or more of its neighbours. Therefore, Mr. Reid may be quite reassured that in the railway transfer, or in the taking over of the debts, no advantage is sought to be taken of his colony. I will go further, and say that while, for one, I agree with those who consider that the state Treasurer should not be left in blindfold dependence on the Commonwealth Treasurer, I add at the same time that the guarantee which is sought to be given to those states which have a deficiency should not come out of the coffers of the Treasury of New South Wales or of any single state. Any guarantee to be given-and I am a strong supporter of a guarantee-must be a guarantee which is buttressed by a proviso enacting that the money to be raised to discharge the guarantee shall come fairly and equally from all members of the Commonwealth, and that no one state or group of states shall obtain any advantage at the expense of any member of the sisterhood.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Do you propose that the Commonwealth shall simply guarantee to the states the payment of their interest, or that the public debts shall be taken over absolutely?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is possible there may be two steps. If the honorable member asks the first step that is to be taken, I am comparatively indifferent. If he means the ultimate goal at which I aim, it is the second of his alternatives.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I mean what is to be proposed in the Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Personally, I am indifferent. A great deal can be said for simply guaranteeing to the states the amount of their interest. From the point of view of Mr. Holder and other honorable members, that is a much more acceptable proposal, and it fulfils the present needs of the situation; but the other and fuller proposal is that at which the Federation must ultimately aim. In the future the Federal Government must become the sole debtor to foreign creditors. I trust I have made myself clear on this question, and, though speaking longer than intended, let me point out that the matter is one of the utmost importance.

To sum up, it seems to me that the railways must be federalized, but we cannot embody in the Constitution the details of the terms of that federalization. Still, we should put in the Constitution something tending to show that the federalization of the railways is a duty to be undertaken by the Commonwealth. In regard to the second question—the federalization of debts—I do not think we could accomplish that at once by any provision in this Constitution; but, at the same time, we should place here an explicit direction which shall require the Federal Parliament to undertake the federalization of the debts as one of its paramount obligations. In regard to the third matter, while it seems to me to be, perhaps, premature for us to seek to place in the Constitution of the Commonwealth a definite obligation to pay so many pounds, shillings, and pence per head from the Commonwealth to the severa

Mr. HOLDER. -

They would not have tolerated the five years' bookkeeping if they could have done that.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Certainly not. It is with the desire of sweeping away the five years' bookkeeping that I have always regretted that the Finance Committee did not present some scheme on the subject.

Mr. WALKER. -

We are not prophets—we could not see where the money was to come from.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I have heard a good deal from the honorable member that would seem to indicate that he either is a prophet or thinks he is. We might have tested his powers of prophecy by his putting, in pounds, shillings, and pence, what he thinks would be a fair return to the several states for a given period, say, ten or twenty years. Not being a member of the Finance Committee, I am perhaps at liberty to believe that they might have solved that question. In their wisdom they have decided not to solve it, and as they have not done so, it is idle for us to attempt it here. Still, I think we might place in this Constitution a plain direction to the Federal Parliament that what we all deem to be an obligation on the Commonwealth—to preserve the solvency of the federated states—should be something more than an implied obligation—that it should be an expressed obligation. I believe that if we put in this Constitution, even if we do not descend to details, an expression of our decision, which shall be beyond mistake, that the Federal Parliament should undertake amongst its first labours the federalization of the railways, the federalization of the debts, and the guaranteeing of the several states, we shall have done more to recommend the Constitution to thousands and tens of thousands of electors of the states than we have done by any step we have taken for some time past in this Convention.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -

I, as one of the members of this Convention who have always held that it is desirable to lay some definite obligation on the Federal Parliament in the matter of finance, seeing that we are parting from our customs duties, certainly rejoice at the decision given this morning. It was an emphatic declaration that that obligation shall be laid on the Federal Parliament. I would like to direct the attention of Mr. Holder to some points raised by him, which I desire to call the attention of the Convention generally to. The first is, that while we have simply decided with regard to the word "shall," we have certainly not committed ourselves to the whole clause; but I think it was plain that in deciding that the word "shall" shall be introduced into the clause, the intention was that it should be followed by subsequent amendments.

Mr. REID. -

To make it mean anything else?
Mr. HENRY. -

No. It means, as I understand, that a definite obligation shall be laid on the Federal Parliament of paying the interest on the debts of the colonies.

Mr. SYMON. -

I did not take it from that point of view.

Mr. HENRY. -

That is how I regarded it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Sir George Turner's amendment made the Federal Parliament accept the obligation with regard to the principal also.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

But I said I only proposed that so that we might have a full discussion upon it.

Mr. HENRY. -

If you have provided that for all time the Federal Parliament shall pay the interest, you have practically provided that it shall pay the principal, too. I have no doubt that subsequent amendments will follow the adoption of these words to carry out the intention of the Convention. Now, I desire to call attention to certain objections raised by Mr. Holder, to whom I, in common with other honorable members, always listen with care and attention. I cannot agree with him in several important points. In the first place, Mr. Holder laid great stress on the heavy loss sustained by the whole of these colonies in laying this obligation on the Federal Parliament—a loss that would accrue from the increased value of our stocks when they became federal instead of state stocks. The honorable gentleman assumed—it is merely an assumption of figures—taking the stocks worth £101 to-day, that they would increase in value to £104 when they became federal; and he further pointed out that, seeing the difference in value of the several stocks in the market, it would be a very difficult matter indeed to adjust their values in an equitable manner.

Mr. HOLDER. -

You would not have them adjusted by making a present of the whole accrued value to the bond-holders?

Mr. HENRY. -

The amendment submitted to this Convention by my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) deals amply with that point, and provides to my mind a perfect remedy for any inequality existing. And I would say this: The value in the market of our stocks does not appear to have any force at all in regard to the matter of adjustment.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Should not the Federation get the benefit of the increased value?
Mr. HENRY. -

Assuming that one colony's 31/2 per cent. bonds are worth £110, and another colony's only £107, the taking over of the debts does not in my judgment cause that difference to enter into the adjustment. Now I come to the material point raised by Mr. Holder. He said we should be squandering millions by throwing upon the Federal Parliament the obligation of paying the whole interest on our debts. But, inasmuch as the effect would be to raise the value of the federal stocks beyond the average value of the present stocks, I would ask the honorable member, or any other honorable member, in what sense should we squander millions of money among the bond-holders and make them a present? As I understand the meaning of making a present, it is giving away something which you have, so that the giver is made so much poorer by the gift. In what sense do we give away anything by our stocks increasing in value?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Are you not giving away a lever by means of which the Commonwealth could get good terms?

Mr. HENRY. -

I am coming to that. The value of our stocks in the market varies periodically, and we do not save or lose through the depreciation of our stocks or the increase of their value except when we want to go on to the money market. It is then that the value of our stocks immediately affects us.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Will the honorable member allow me to explain what I mean?

Mr. HENRY. -

I shall be happy to hear the honorable member's explanation.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

The answer to the point is as clear as it can be. I will take a concrete case. Suppose some bond-holder holds 3 per cent. Western Australian stocks of the face value of £100, worth to-day in the market, say, £96. The Commonwealth, by backing up that £100 bond, would raise its-value we will say from £96 to £104. I think there is not much doubt that the value of a bond would be raised to that extent. Well, now, is not that making a present of all the difference between £96 and £104 to that bond-holder?

Mr. HENRY. -

No.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It spoils conversion.
Mr. HOLDER. -

I am afraid that the honorable member (Mr. Henry) did not follow me. Let me put the case in another way. If the honorable member himself had £100 in Western Australian stocks, which to-day were worth £96, and if the Commonwealth came and indorsed his bond, and made it worth £104, would not that be making him a present of £8? There is no doubt about it. The honorable member would be £8 richer than he was before the Commonwealth backed his bond. Instead of putting that endorsement on the back of that bond by virtue of this Constitution, I contend that we should simply empower the Federal Treasurer to go to work, so that he could say-"You, Mr. Henry, have a bond worth £96, and I want to convert that into consolidated stock; I do not ask you to convert your bond for nothing, but I will give you stock worth £104 per cent. in the market for your bond worth £96 per cent., and I will give you a £1 bonus on the transaction." The honorable member would then have £97 for his £96 bond, and the Commonwealth would have made a profit of the difference between £97 and £104; a profit of £7. Well, now, that is only £7 on £100. What would it be on £160,000,000 of the debts of these colonies? That is the present which I do not want to be given to the bond-holders.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

The honorable member is quite wrong.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -

The honorable member (Mr. Holder) has explained the process by which he is going to make a present to the bond-holders of the several states. In the first place, he assumes that the bond-holders of the several states would be prepared merely on the chance of a rise in the value of the stocks, without any other equivalent, to do what he asks; that they would be prepared, because we thought we were going to make a saving on the chance of a rise in the value of the stocks as marketable commodities, to accept the terms that he offered. It all rests, in my judgment, on the possibility of a conversion scheme, if what has been proposed by Mr. Holder were the only bait thrown out to the bond-holders to induce them to do what? To part with their stocks and take a less rate of interest. And what is the advantage to them? Now, I would ask honorable members whether the mere chance of getting an increased value for the federal bonds is going to induce the bond-holders to accept a lesser rate of interest for the new bonds? Is that practicable? To my mind it seems to be utterly impracticable. The holders of the bulk of our long-dated stock are men who have invested their money in those stocks in order that they may get an assured income for the balance of their lives. Will those men, merely that they may have a chance of getting a profit on one set of bonds, be prepared to part with their bonds and reduce their income? That is highly improbable, and if the proposed conversion scheme is to rest on that basis it will, I think, prove to be utterly impracticable. Any saving by the Federal Government in taking over the debts will be effected in renewing them.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

It will minimize the loss.

[P.1610] starts here

Mr. HENRY. -

If conversion be possible you may do that; but it has been demonstrated that conversion is not a practicable scheme. Even Mr. Holder admits that.

Mr. HOLDER. -

If you throw away the only bait you have got.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If you convert you may have to pay £104 instead of £97.

Mr. HENRY. -

These are all pure assumptions as to what the value of the federal bonds may be. Having thus placed my views on this somewhat important point before the Convention, I will proceed to another aspect of the question that was dealt with by Mr. Holder. Mr. Holder, in speaking of the absurdity of this proposal, said that it would relieve South Australia of the payment of some £400,000 interest. I think the honorable member must have misread the clause, inasmuch as it provides that the state shall indemnify the Federal Government the full amount of interest. How then could South Australia get a gift of £400,000? I am sure that Mr. Holder is the last person who would raise up a straw man for the purpose of knocking it down, and I attribute that statement to inadvertence or to a misconception of the clause. We have discussed Mr. Glynn's amendment and the amendment suggested by the Tasmanian Parliament, but it has never been proposed that any such gross inequality as has been suggested by Mr. Holder should be allowed to exist. It has been generally recognised that, owing to th

Mr. REID. -

Why not put that in the Constitution, so as to make everything perfectly safe?

Mr. HENRY. -

I understand the right honorable member's sneer, but we are content with one thing at a time. It is quite possible that the Federal Treasurer may make a miscalculation, and he should be responsible for any deficiency arising from it. Mr. Holder, in his closing remarks, said that the whole of the financial proposals as passed by the Convention were being reversed by the throwing of this obligation on the Federal Parliament. I regret the honorable member did not elaborate the point, and show up, how such a result could follow. I fail to see in what way this definite proposal can be destructive to, or can interfere in any way with, the proposals of the Finance Committee up to the present juncture. The suggestion that the Convention should enter on the task of preparing a Tariff I took to be mere ridicule. I am entirely in accord with the honorable member's views as to the confidence we have in the Federal Parliament doing its best to safeguard the finances of the several states, and I hold that the insertion of this provision in the Constitution will be an assurance to the several states that, to a certain extent, at all events, they will be relieved of their liabilities. It will certainly be of assistance to us in Tasmania, where difficulties have been created owing to the publication of the leaflets by the Statistician of New South Wales. I hope that we shall have an opportunity of dealing with the last pamphlet issued by that gentleman before the Convention adjourns.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

We have spent many days, sometimes, discussing matters of comparative unimportance, and it was indeed a surprise to me to find that, during my unavoidable absence this morning, one of the most important matters which could be considered, and upon which a large number of other important matters that have taken up a great deal of time depend, was suddenly introduced, discussed, and decided between half-past ten and twelve o'clock today. Unfortunately, the express from Sydney did not arrive until half-past twelve o'clock to-day, so that I was, just by the mere force of fate and accident, deprived from either the opportunity of being heard on this matter or of giving myself the privilege of voting upon it. But it does appear to me that, instead of joining with those who seem inclined to advocate another meeting of this Convention, it would be infinitely better for us to get our work done as speedily as possible, because the further we go the more we seem to get mixed. Now, the other day there was a provision in this Bill which sought to guarantee the financial position of the states. It was inserted, against the strong opposition of myself and others, by the Finance Committee which sat in Adelaide. It appeared in the Bill, and remained in the Bill until the other day. When it came on for consideration, after I had made some pretty strong observations on the subject, there was no opposition against me, and that proposed guarantee to the states was not even made the subject of a division. I received a pleasant intimation that, owing to the very strong objection I had to it, honorable members who were opposed to my view of the subject were not even going to divide the Convention on the question. Bearing that in mind, honorable members can understand my astonishment when I arrived here today and found that the course of proceeding which characterized this Convention here and in Sydney had been suddenly changed. Of course it is well for the Convention to get on with its work, and whilst I impute no blame to any one, because it was my duty to be here at half-past ten o'clock this morning, still I think it is a pity that, on Friday afternoon, when the subject of the debts of the states was discussed at such length, no intimation was given to honorable members that such an important proposal would be made.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Mr. Glynn's proposal on Friday was perfectly definite in favour of this proposal.

Mr. REID. -

But I am speaking of Sir George Turner's proposal. It is very wrong, no doubt, but somehow I have come to attach very little significance to notices of amendments by Mr. Glynn.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That does not test their merits.

Mr. REID. -

No; but still I went on the law of averages, and therefore I did not seriously regard my honorable friend's proposal but if I had known that the Premier of Victoria was going to make such a proposal as he submitted this morning, I would have attached great significance to it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I can assure the right honorable gentleman that when I got up to speak I had no intention of moving any amendment.

Mr. REID. -

That only shows how fortunate my right honorable friend was to be inspired while I was away. That is the charm about genuine inspirations; they always come at the proper time, and I am sure that the honorable gentleman is honestly delighted to find that those who have hitherto steadily resisted him on the matter have suddenly followed him to such an extent as to enable him to carry his proposal by 25 votes to 8. Of course, the right honorable gentleman's judgment has become more matured, and it is no possible sort of complaint that an honorable member at any time changes his mind.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I have always been of my present opinion on this question.
But the honorable member was in a different mood in Adelaide, because he then deferred to my strong opinions as representing New South Wales, by not inserting "shall."

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I have heard so many of these strong opinions lately that they have no weight with me now.

Mr. REID. -
Well, we will take it that my right honorable friend is now determined, if he can, to put this new complexion on the matter. Now, I have long ceased to feel any very keen interest in the various decisions arrived at here, because one never knows when they will represent finality, but I might be humbly allowed to follow Mr. Holder, and express-and I cannot express it more forcibly than he did-with very great earnestness how strongly I share the views he has set forth. In the first place, the insertion of the word "shall" in this clause will have the effect of presenting several millions sterling at once to the holders of Australian bonds. The debts of the five colonies, I find, amount to £140,000,000, and the insertion of the word "shall" in this clause, if this Federal Constitution ever comes to anything, is practically presenting to the holders of those £140,000,000 worth of Australian states bonds the security and guarantee of the Commonwealth. And what becomes of all those elaborate, eloquent, and laborious statements made to the public of the whole of the colonies of Australia by leading financial authorities as to the great gain which was to come to the people of Australia through the advantageous terms upon which the state debts could be consolidated under the auspices of the Commonwealth? Every honorable member can see that, if it becomes an absolute compulsion that every one of these bonds shall be taken over by the Commonwealth, the bond-holder gets an issue of the Commonwealth's security without paying anything for it, and that represents a loss of hundreds of thousands a year to the Commonwealth. It represents millions sterling to the bond-holders, and I say it is time to ask this Convention are any of the colonies reduced to such a pitch that these desperate measures have to be resorted to Statisticians have said so.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
Yes; the New South Wales Statistician.

Mr. REID. -
No; the Government Statist of Tasmania.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
No.

Mr. REID. -
I think that Mr. Johnston's writings as to the position of Tasmania are very strong, about as strong as anything can be. I have not once mentioned Mr. Coghlan's name in the Convention; I have never referred to his publications. No matter how people wrote, I have always been imbued with a strong feeling of confidence in the absolute stability of every one of these Australian communities. Indeed, this desperate aiming after something out of this not yet created body is significant not of a financial strength or confidence, but of a very different state of feeling, and I am very sorry to see it. Our people, whose policy differs so widely from the policy of most of the other colonies, feel, notwithstanding that fact, that, having embarked in this cause, they are prepared to leave the fortunes they pursue, to leave the settlement of vital matters affecting them as taxpayers, and as people engaged in the ranks of industry and commerce, to the Commonwealth; they are prepared, feeling full confidence in the stability of the other Australian colonies, to go in with them, even under circumstances which show that the colony of New South Wales must inevitably pay up to 48 per cent. of the taxation of this Commonwealth. Nearly 50 per cent. of the taxation under any conceivable Tariff will come out of New South Wales. If we are prepared, with these vast interests and responsibilities at stake, to come into this federal compact with every confidence, leaving our affairs in the hands of the Federal Parliament, surely other colonies can do the same thing, being equally sound and equally self-reliant. But no. There has been a constant desire in certain quarters to make certain things safe in advance. I say, on this question of finance, no one colony can be allowed to make anything safe in advance. How would honorable members listen to me, even if I represented so large a number of people, and even if the Federal Convention knew I did represent their views, if I asked for some sort of guarantee in connexion with the financial policy of the Commonwealth that the policy of duties should not be pushed too far, and so on, and so on; and that some share, however small, of the Commonwealth revenue should be raised from some other means than Customs, so as to give the policy of low Tariff a chance. How I would be ridiculed if I came forward with any such request! If I am prepared to leave everything open, confiding to the wisdom of the Federal Parliament, knowing that the Federal Parliament will, after all, represent the whole of the people of the states—if I am, and the people of New South Wales are, prepared to go into the Commonwealth with perfect trust in the fairness and wisdom of the financial policy of the Commonwealth, I think the other colonies should meet us in the same spirit. I have over and over again said that no Commonwealth Treasurer could possibly, having been intrusted with the duty of framing a Tariff, by any financial proposals of his leave any single colony in a state of embarrassment. Well, if that is not enough, if stipulations are to be made, honorable members must not wonder if stipulations are made on both sides. Now, I do not propose to make any. I will be true to the feeling and spirit in which this federal enterprise was entered upon. I still leave, and I am ready to leave, the Commonwealth and the Commonwealth Parliament absolutely unfettered in dealing with the finances of the Commonwealth. But if these proposals are to be put in for a Commonwealth Tariff, or if the Commonwealth itself is bound to raise a revenue of £7,500,000, because that is what this word "shall" means-If I have to go back to New South Wales and tell them, not as a thing which may happen in the fortunes of political strife, but as a thing which must happen when the Commonwealth must begin by raising £7,500,000 sterling.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

£6,500,000.

Mr. REID. -

Yes; I find the honorable member is right. The amount will be £6,500,000.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If the states have to pay that amount out of direct taxation, what will happen?

Mr. REID. -

My point is this. If you send any one back with the absolute statement that the Parliament has so framed a Bill that a certain course must be taken-

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

It is already so framed.

Mr. REID. -

How?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Because you must protect the solvency of the states.

Mr. REID. -

I again lament the use of the word "insolvency." This Convention is becoming a sort of bankruptcy court if one may judge from the frequency with which that word is used. It is positively revolting that we should hear an assembly representing these great Australian colonies using these ominous words. They are words entirely unworthy of this great body. I am very glad to think that no member from New South Wales defiles his lips with such expressions about the solvency of the country he represents. I quite agree with Mr. Holder, and that is why I am so strong on this subject, that we have been altogether wrong in all our financial labours if this is to he persisted in. It reduces most of the labours of the Finance Committee to an absolute absurdity. Would it not have been infinitely more straight forward and honorable if, on the motion for removing certain words from clause 92, which was agreed to without a division, this proposal had been made? These words were omitted on the strength of the remarks which I am now making, or remarks of an exactly similar purport, only a few days ago. These words were struck out without division:-

During the first five years after uniform duties of customs have been imposed the aggregate amount to be paid to the whole of the states for any year shall not be less than the aggregate amount returned to them during the year last before the imposition of such duties.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

These words were removed because they were unsuitable—I refer to the last ones.

Mr. REID. -

Still, they could have been amended. There has been a perfect genius for offering amendments in this Convention, and surely honorable members would have been equal to meet that little difficulty. But instead of that—we addressed ourselves to the main proposition involved in these words, and, as I say, following the lead of the Finance Committee—in which this present proposal did not find any strong favour—these words were struck out. Now, I say it would have been infinitely better to have left in that guarantee than in this round-about indirect way attempt to arrive at the same point. My reason is this: The fewer objections to the measure you put in this Bill the better. The fewer grounds you put in this Bill to create animosity and antipathy the better, and that remark applies—to this proposition to make it absolutely compulsory, whether a state likes it or not, that its finances shall be taken over by the Commonwealth, because that is what it means. The Customs are handed over to the Commonwealth, not because the states shall be reduced to be mere beggars standing at the door of the Commonwealth Treasury, not for any such ignoble reason, but because the whole enterprise of federation was impossible except with a uniform Tariff, and with the collection of the duties by one Central Government. We all gave way to that extent in this federal enterprise, but it did not at all follow that we were prepared in other matters, not essential, not vital, not unavoidable, to go so far that a colony would be compelled to give up its debts and intrust them to the Commonwealth, without having the slightest voice as to whether it would consent or not. Some colonies, no doubt, would be only too glad to consent, but I do not think our colony would consent. We do not wish to put our debt upon the shoulders of the other colonies, and I do not think we are at all keen to take upon our shoulders their debts. Not that I at all distrust the absolute strength and stability of the states themselves, but we all want-and that has been the key note of this federal enterprise until lately-to leave to the states those things which they can look after themselves, and can best look after, whilst we only hand over to the Federation those things which cannot be done by the states, separately. This one point is enough to destroy this proposal, except as a desperate unwise extravagant expedient on the part of persons who have not sufficient confidence in the soundness of their own states-that, as the honorable member (Mr. Holder) stated, and as every one must admit, all the advantages to be derived in time to come by the states from a conversion of their debts under the name of the Commonwealth, with the national security attached, will be lost. I think that I heard the honorable member (Sir Philip Fysh), in tones of the loftiest eloquence, describe the enormous advantage which it would be in time to come to have such a conversion.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
You have always denied it.

Mr. REID. -
I have never denied it. The difference between my honorable friend and myself in regard to this matter is that I do not believe that any holder of a state bond, while the states have the reputation which they have at the present time, will give up that bond unless he gets in return a new bond under which he will be paid the same amount of interest as he is now receiving.

Mr. FRASER. -
Or very nearly the same amount.

Mr. REID. -
Yes. But I have always admitted that when the deferred periods for payment come about, and the bonds are about to mature, you can convert, and convert to the greatest possible advantage. Unfortunately, however, the bulk of our debts are not due for many years to come.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
Half of them fall due within eleven years.

Mr. REID. -
What holder of Australian states bonds will consent to the conversion of his good security eleven years before it runs out, unless he gets as good term as he is now enjoying? I do not know whether my honorable friend has ever tried to convert a loan, but other people have. New South Wales has had the advice of the best financiers in London—not once, but a dozen times—during the last ten years, and they have all told us, what ordinary common sense should tell a man, that the colonies have not yet been reduced to such a pitch of discredit that any one believes that they will not pay their debts in full. So long as the bond-holders believe that they will be paid their interest they will not give up bonds which are now returning, say, £400 a year to them, for bonds which will only return them, say, £300 a year. But when these bonds are about to expire, and the bond holder is losing his £400 a year, if you come along with a proposal to extend the currency of the debt for another 30 years, he may be willing to take new bonds which will return him only £300 a year.

Mr. FRASER. -
He will have no choice.

Mr. REID. -
Yes; that will be his position. In this way you may be able to effect a great saving of interest, and the colonies are strong enough to be able to wait until they can reap this benefit. The Commonwealth will last long enough to be able to conduct all these operations, but they are operations which must be conducted with the mutual good-will of both parties. To talk of handing over to these people, who, hold £140,000,000 worth of state bonds to-day, the security and guarantee of the Commonwealth, by the insertion in the Constitution of the word "shall," means-what? It means this: If the liability to pay the interest upon this debt is taken over by the Commonwealth, the Commonwealth becomes responsible to pay every penny of interest so long as the bonds remain in force, and to pay the principal when the debt matures. Are we, an assemblage of business men, studying the interests of these states, when we propose to announce to the bond-holders in London that the day the Commonwealth Bill comes into force they will have the security of the Commonwealth behind their bonds? What will your conversion amount to if you do that? When you come along with your Commonwealth bonds in ten or twenty years' time, as each loan matures, and ask the bond-holders to accept the bond at a lower rate of interest, telling them—"Now you are getting the Commonwealth bonds instead of the state bonds," they will say—"The Commonwealth has been paying our interest for the last twelve years, and is responsible for this debt. You are not offering us better security than we already have. It is the same security, and what right have you to ask us to agree to these conditions under the plea that we are getting a better security?"

Mr. HENRY. -
If conversion is only possible as the bonds mature, how can such a state of things arise?
Mr. REID. -
I do not understand the honorable member.

Mr. HENRY. -
The right honorable member is arguing that there is no conversion possible, except as the bonds mature.

Mr. REID. -
I am speaking of the case when a state goes to the bond-holder. But the Commonwealth, going to the bond-holders, and having the power to say "No" if the terms do not suit, will be in a vastly different position. The Commonwealth will be able to go to the bond-holders and say:"You have only got big South Australia, or little New South Wales, or Tasmania, as security for your bonds. Now, here is a great Commonwealth, formed of all the colonies, ready to take these bonds off your hands and to give you a vastly better security, upon such terms as to length of time as may be agreed upon." If the Commonwealth did that it would be offering a distinct advantage to the bond-holder. The proposition is quite different from that in which the Commonwealth would stand if it gave the bond-holders this advantage in the first instance.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The right honorable member is dealing with a bargain in respect to a conversion before the time of maturity.

Mr. REID. -
Yes. Of course, when a bond has matured it will be easy for the state to go into the market and borrow money irrespective of the bond-holders, and out of this money repay the original debt. The rate of interest then to be paid by the state will be the current rate of interest at the date of the conversion. No doubt the interest upon the Commonwealth bonds will be lower than the interest upon a state bond. But if the Commonwealth, while all the state bonds are out, stamps them with the indorsement:"We will pay this debt," state bonds are made Commonwealth bonds, and the Commonwealth loses the opportunity of being able to substitute a better security for a worse. That sort of finance may suit South American republics, but we have not come to it in Australia, at all events not in our part of Australia, and we never shall.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I was rather surprised at the language of my right honorable friend in regard to this proposal. He has insinuated rather than stated that advantage was taken of his absence to-day to pass an amendment which we should not have attempted to pass if he had been present.
Mr. REID. -
I did not insinuate that at all.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
If you did not insinuate that, the whole of your introductory remarks had been better left unsaid. Then the right honorable member characterized this proposal as desperately extravagant, and referred to it as being significant of a want of financial strength in the states which supported it.

Mr. REID. -
I said a want of confidence in our financial strength, which is a very different thing. I have confidence, if others have not.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I think we all have confidence in the financial strength of all the colonies, and the British money lender has just as much confidence as we have. I have never been able to realize that any bond-holders will immediately put up the price of bonds from 96 to 104 because they have the Commonwealth security. Surely the Premier of New South Wales will not say that the security which his colony gives to the British bond-holder is not just as good as the security of the whole Commonwealth will be. I say, on behalf of Victoria, that I have no doubt that the security of Victoria is quite as good as that of the whole of the Commonwealth will be.

Mr. REID. -
Then the financiers are all wrong, because they have told us that the Commonwealth security would lead to better terms.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Especially as the customs and excise duties have been taken away from the states and have been given to the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
But they will be returned to the States.

My honorable friend tells us so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Then if they do, the security of the colony is just as good. If they do not, if there is a fear that they will not, then a colony is going to be placed in a very unfortunate position. There is just the difficulty.

Mr. REID. -
We are strong enough to stand it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I cannot see how we are making a present of £6,000,000 or £8,000,000 to the bond-holders because the honorable member tells us so, and I think a majority of the Convention agree with me, that no conversion will take place until the bonds are just about maturing.

Mr. REID. -

You can convert under the Commonwealth at any time.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not believe you can. Suppose my honorable friend is a tenant for life, and is entitled to the whole income of £10,000 worth of Victorian bonds at 4 per cent. If he is told that the Commonwealth is going to give certain bonds which, instead of bringing in £400 a year, will bring in only £300, he will say to the trustees-"I am perfectly satisfied with the income I am deriving; I am perfectly satisfied with the bonds of Victoria, and I do not want to convert Victorian bonds into federal consols."

Mr. HOLDER. -

What about the poorer colonies where the bonds stand much lower?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I cannot see how that will affect the question at all. Of course, if they are below par, and you say you are going to give them par, I can understand their taking them at once, but I do not think there would be much fear of a conversion taking place if a Federal Treasurer had to give £100 for £96. I do not think that is the sort of conversion which a Federal Treasurer is likely to carry out. I have tried to follow those who hold the view that the mere saying to the Commonwealth-"You shall take over the liability to pay this interest" is going to put this great increase on the price of the bonds till an intimation is made by the Federal Parliament that in addition to what the state is doing-paying the interest-they are going to convert them into something better, and the Federal Treasurer will not do that till the bonds are falling due. But even if you leave it optional for the Commonwealth to do it, the moment that the Parliament intimates that they are taking the necessary steps to obtain the consent of the state, which must be given by Act of Parliament, and therefore must be made public, the same thing will happen. The bond-holder will know that the Federal Parliament is anxious to take up these bonds, and he will put up the price just as he will do under this proposal, because he will know that there is no compulsion to convert. I could understand my honorable friend's objection if we were providing in the Bill, that within twelve months after the establishment of the Commonwealth it should be the duty of the Federal Parliament to convert and consolidate all our bonds into one loan. I could understand then the bond-holders would naturally think that they were going to get a vastly improved security, and would ask for a larger price for their bonds. But as we say here, you shall pay our interest, and we are doing that to prevent extravagance, that will not convey to the minds of any astute people in England who hold our bonds that there is any attempt to make this conversion or consolidation unless the Federal Parliament knows that it is going to get a fair and reasonable bargain on behalf of the states. The Premier of New South Wales tells us also that that colony has to pay one-half of this taxation-48 or 50 per cent. I fail to see how he arrives at those figures.

Sir EDWARD BRADDO. - Coghlan.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I do not think that even Mr. Coghlan goes to that length, but, of course, my right honorable friend is just mildly exaggerating the amount.

Mr. REID. -
No, I am going on a very good authority in saying it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
For the first two years, with the fact of our having no duties to pay, because our bonds will be stored with dutiable goods, you cannot pay very much.

Mr. REID. -
We are not accustomed to paying much now.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The other colonies will pay in the same ratio to their population as New South Wales pays. But even if they do pay 50 per cent. they get it back again. We are not going to rob New South Wales of all this extra revenue.

Mr. REID. -
Will you be good enough then to leave it optional to New South Wales whether, she is to bring in her debt? Will you give her that privilege?

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is another question.

Mr. REID. -
I make that application to you on behalf of New South Wales.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I think it would be to the interest of New South Wales and of all the colonies that we should have federal consols.

Mr. REID. -
I differ from you. Give us the option, that is all I ask.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Then my honorable friend says we are to raise this £6,500,000 because this proposal is put in, but in another breath he says that either the Federal Government must raise that sum or it must be left to the states to raise the money by direct taxation. I think that if we have to go to our people here and tell them that we are giving up this elastic source of revenue, and do not know what we are going to get back-

Mr. Reid. -

It is anything but elastic now.

Sir George Turner. -

It is pre-elastic in most of the colonies.

Mr. Reid. -

Not in yours.

Sir George Turner. -

It has certainly been increasing in our colony, and I think it has been increasing in nearly all the colonies, and as time goes on no doubt it will rapidly increase, and while the Customs will be increasing year by year, a considerable amount of interest on these debts that the Federal Parliament has to pay will be greatly reduced year by year, because as loans fall due either the state or the Federal Parliament will undoubtedly convert them, and as they are converted the rate of interest will be reduced from 41/2 per cent. or 4 per cent. to 3 per cent. Therefore I think the Commonwealth will run very little risk, indeed, in undertaking to pay all this interest for the colonies. In any case, we arrive at the same conclusion, because it is perfectly clear that if the states are to be left in the position they ought to be in then they must get back from the Federal Parliament about as much as they are receiving now; allowing for the smaller amount of the expense. If they do not get it back from the Federal Parliament, then they must be prepared in the respective colonies to impose some kind of taxation for the purpose of raising the difference, because we know very well that we cannot get on with less money than we have. We have, most of us, cut down our expenditure as low as we possibly can, and that expenditure, against the desire of the Treasurers, must gradually, year by year, increase, if we are to carry out the various improvements and the development of our respective colonies. It is evident that if we are to be got in a safe position, we must either ourselves raise it by direct taxation, or we must, if we possibly can, place something in the Bill which will throw on the Federal Parliament the onus of raising it by indirect taxation through the Customs; and, as we are told that must be done, I see very little harm in making it perfectly clear and certain that it will have to be done. My honorable friend appears to disown altogether various figures which have been circulated from time to time by the Statistician of New South Wales. I think it is a matter of the deepest regret that week after week we have new pamphlets circulated amongst us, and the contents published in the press, bearing the imprint of William Applegate Gullick, Government Printer, Sydney. What can our people think when this pamphlet comes into their hands—Notes on the Federal Aspect of Australian Federation by the Government Statistician of New South Wales, printed by the Government Printer? Ninety-nine persons out of every 100 will say—"This is an official document circulated with the cognisance of the Government of New South Wales."

Mr. Reid. -

Was not Mr. Johnston's paper published by the Government Printing-office?

Sir Philip Fysh. -

No.

Mr. Reid. -

I put no embargo on the Statist.

Sir George Turner. -

In the document we received to-day we read—

If, therefore, there was a return of surplus revenue, according to contributions, the Victorian Treasury would be £458,000 worse off than she is at present, supposing her Tariff were continued;--

That is what we have to go to our people with.

and his difficulties would be made still greater if a lower Tariff were adopted.

How can we go to our people with this staring us in the face—that even on our own Tariff Victoria will incur a loss of £458,000, but that—

Under a £6,000,000 Tariff the £458,000 deficiency would be swollen to £676,000.

There is a statement circulated apparently by the authority of the Government of New South Wales amongst our people, and published in our newspapers. Our people will naturally say—"What does this mean? If Victoria, with its population of only a million, is going to lose £600,000 or £700,000 a year through joining the Federation, we will be bound to submit to a very heavy increase in our direct taxation." Then he ends up with this significant statement:—

If the distribution is not per capita it will not be possible for Victoria to join the Federation without ruining its financial position.

We have been told by the Premier of New South Wales that we must not dare to mention the word "insolvency." We only mentioned it, not in fear that them colonies would ever be going insolvent but because if this revenue is to be taken from us, and we have not any guarantee that we shall get back a portion of it, then, unless we impose heavy and direct taxation, we shall be in an insolvent position,
Mr. REID. -
Then Coghlan is the basis of your move to-day?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Coghlan is not the basis of my move to-day. My right honorable friend knows very well that, from the very first, I have advocated that the debts should be transferred to the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID. -
You assented at Adelaide that the word should be left at "may" and so the records show. In deference to the objection of myself you assented to the word. "may" being put in.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
But I think I am a little wiser now than I was at Adelaide.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I think that you thought then that Mr. Coghlan was right.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I never believed that he was right because the absurdity of his statements was palpable on the face of them.

Mr. REID. -
The facts upon which they are based are right, but the application is wrong.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I am afraid the bombshell that was exploded in Adelaide, and which put two of my colleagues in fear of their existence, did more harm than it could possibly have done good. The only object that I had in this amendment was to throw the onus on the Federal Treasurer of making provision for this payment in order to prevent him from being extravagant, and giving way too easily, as Treasurer, to every demand for expenditure which will undoubtedly be made upon him. As the Bill stands, he will have ample power to spend money in the erection of arsenals and military colleges, and matters of that kind, which would eat up a large portion of the revenue. There can be no doubt that he would be extremely liable to have pressure brought to bear upon him to spend money in military and other directions, especially in times when there is anything like a war scare, and the result might be to leave him in a difficult position.

Mr. REID. -
War expenditure could not be met out of revenue, surely?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
In Victoria we have erected forts out of revenue, and have paid for them almost entirely.
Mr. REID. -
Well, if you get the money from the Commonwealth-and you will be entitled to get it back-it will be a nice nest-egg for you.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We paid for these military works out of revenue, and do I understand that we are to get it back from the Commonwealth?

Mr. REID. -
Yes, if you paid for it out of revenue.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Where are we to get it back from? And how? Are we to get it back from New South Wales?

Mr. REID. -
You will get Commonwealth bonds.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Then the Commonwealth will have to borrow for that purpose?

Mr. REID. -
Surely; do you think the Federal Government can take up £8,000,000 or £10,000,000 worth of public works without borrowing?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I know very well that they cannot. The clause, as I want it, would stand very much as it does in the Bill now. The clause says-
The Parliament may take over the whole or a rateable proportion of the public debts of the states as existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth, and may from time to time convert, renew, or consolidate such debts or any part thereof.

And so on. But there is no obligation on the Federal Parliament to convert or consolidate.

Mr. REID. -
Are you going to allow all the colonies, after all their debts are taken over, to enter into new borrowings?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We discussed that matter this morning, and I gave my own view of it. That view is that all borrowings should be through the Commonwealth, and then that the states are to indemnify the Commonwealth for the interest payable in respect of the debts. If there is any surplus revenue after paying the interest, the Commonwealth will return it to the states; if there is anything short, the states will have to return it to the Commonwealth. That would not interfere with the bookkeeping system we have adopted, and it is some sort of guarantee-not the guarantee I desire or wish to take to our people; but it would be something with which we could go to the people and by means of it could say to them-"There is an obligation thrown upon the Federal Parliament to provide as far as it can the interest on the loans before it expends money for ordinary purposes." This is to some extent a guarantee that the people of the colonies will not be left in the position that the Parliament will have to impose direct taxation. I should like to go a little way further.

Mr. BARTON. -

If it extended to all interest payable by the states it would amount to a huge expenditure by the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am not proposing that the Commonwealth should meet these debts, but simply take over the payment of the interest on them.

Mr. SYMON. -

Do you intend that the states shall continue liable for any deficiency?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Undoubtedly.

Mr. BARTON. -

I suppose the debts of the colonies amount to £170,000,000, and the average interest would be about 4 per cent.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes. The interest is over £6,000,000 a year.

Mr. BARTON. -

Then there would be the ordinary Commonwealth expenditure in addition. What sort of a Tariff would have to be put on to meet that huge expenditure?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I have not said that the Commonwealth Parliament is to be bound to raise a revenue sufficient to pay the whole of the interest. I thought, at first, that we might have adopted that very simple means; but it would work adversely to the states, because, in the first instance, the Commonwealth would be receiving less than they would have to pay in interest, but in ten or fifteen years' time the Commonwealth would be receiving in customs duties far more than it would be paying. I am not asking for any colony to have any advantage over another, but simply that we may have this check on extravagant expenditure by the Treasurer of the Commonwealth. That is the only object I have in view. I do not want to take money from New South Wales for the benefit of the other colonies, but simply that, instead of leaving the matter absolutely optional to the Federal Parliament, we should say to the Federal Treasurer-"From the first you must pay this interest."
Mr. REID. -
What machinery do you suggest if a colony is in distress owing to some calamity, and is slow in sending in the amount?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I can hardly anticipate a case in which a colony would be in that position. If there was any such danger, there would be no difficulty whatever in making our railway revenues a trust account, or in giving the Commonwealth a first charge on the railway receipts as a security.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
You might give them a special power of taxation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I should not like to see such a clause inserted in the Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -
It would be as bad as putting in a receiver or a bailiff.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
It would be easy to give the Commonwealth a security, but I would not consent to anything of the kind being put in the Bill. I do not think the Federal Parliament would ever be likely to ask for such a security. There is no doubt that New South Wales is in a different position to the other colonies, by virtue of the large land revenue it now receives.

Mr. REID. -
Will you give us the option of standing out of that arrangement?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
No, I would rather see it struck out of the Bill altogether. I would not put a placard of disgrace on the mother colony.

Mr. REID. -
Our debt is £60,000,000. It is a heavy burden to carry.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
You will not carry it yourselves.

Mr. REID. -
Yes, and a little more.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The honorable member is suspicious.

Mr. REID. -
Your nervousness is making me suspicious.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I am quite prepared to show my trust in the Federal Parliament by handing over all our debts to the Commonwealth, if you like. I never met an individual who objected to handing over his debts to any other person. The right honorable gentleman seems to be afraid that he is going to be ruined by handing over to another body the payment of the interest on the debt of his colony. New South Wales is in a different position from the other colonies, because it has a large land revenue. We in the other colonies have not that standby, and nine out of ten of our people will ask "How much is federation going to cost us?" That is our difficulty, and, with the various statements that have been published by the press with regard to the allegations made by Mr. Coghlan, we shall have a very hard task in inducing our people to vote for federation unless we have some standby. The standby we have asked for is a very little one, but it is something, and I hope the Convention will not, reverse the vote it gave this morning.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I do not think the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales should have been so much surprised at the action that was taken this morning having regard to the position of the other colonies and of New South Wales. In the other colonies the greatest revenue producer is the Customs, and the Customs are to be handed over absolutely to the Federal Parliament. It is natural that colonies so situated should be somewhat anxious about the future. Probably, however, we are over-anxious. We have often said that we should trust the Federal Parliament, and in connexion with this matter I think that we should trust the Federal Parliament. There is no reason to suppose that the Federal Executive will squander money that is handed over to them in trust, so to speak, in building arsenals and forts, and by those means place these colonies in a position in which it would be difficult for them to pay their way. That is an unreasonable hypothesis to set up. I think that, after discussing this matter the whole day, we shall probably have to come back to the clause in the Bill. That clause is, after all, as fair and reasonable as any that has been suggested. I myself should prefer that no limitation should be placed on the power of the Parliament to take over the debts of the states. It should be enabled not only to take over the debts existing at the time of the union, but the whole or any portion of any subsequent debts. We need not insist on the consent of the states being obtained. There might be difficulty in getting the consent of all the states, and we might fairly leave the matter in the hands of the Federal Parliament. It might be said that one state would be unwilling to give up its debts to the Federal Parliament, because it might be incurring an extra liability in regard the debts of the Commonwealth. But that would not be the case. The whole of the people of the Commonwealth will be responsible for the debts handed over. We might, therefore, dispense with the consent of the states. I quite agree with what the Hon. Mr. Holder and the Premier of New South Wales have said about the inadvisability of allowing the holders of our bonds to obtain a profit that we should receive ourselves. I foresee that there would be a profit on the conversion or consolidation of our debts, and it should all go into the Commonwealth Treasury. It has been said that the bonds of all the colonies are of the same value. That statement is not accurate, and I am sorry to have to say it. There is a considerable difference in the value of the bonds of one colony and those of another even at the present time. I know that from my own experience. A Western Australian loan was placed on the market the other day, and although our position was far better than it had ever been before, so far as we were able to judge, we did not get as good a price as on other occasions. During the same week New South Wales placed a loan on the market, and she obtained about £4 per cent. more than we did. In the face of that fact, and seeing that Western Australia is supposed to be one of the most progressive colonies of the group, and that it is certainly as well able to bear its burdens as any of its neighbours, how can it be said that the bonds of all the colonies are of the same value? With regard to the insertion of the word "shall" I must say that if I have an opportunity I shall reverse the vote I gave this morning. I gave it hurriedly and without due consideration. I think it would be unwise to make it compulsory on the Federal Parliament to take over the whole of the state debts. I think, if we give them full power to take it over in their own discretion and at their own time, we shall be doing wisely. If there is a plan adopted by which benefit will come to the various states, and the Commonwealth likes to take advantage of it, the Commonwealth ought to have power to do so; but to put in this Bill that it shall be absolutely obligatory on the Commonwealth to do so would, I think, be a great mistake, and would defeat the object we have in view. I do not know how loans are raised by most of these colonies, but the plan adopted by Western Australia, and, I think, by Tasmania, lends itself most favorably to the consolidation and conversion of the loans after a certain term. For instance, after twenty years, our loans can be paid off at any time during the following twenty years, on giving twelve months' notice to the bondholders. When the first twenty years expire, therefore, in our case, will be the time for the Commonwealth to step in, when a favorable opportunity occurs, and give the twelve months' notice, and the Commonwealth will get all the advantage of the conversion scheme.

Mr. FRASER. -
There is very little money borrowed by the colonies on those conditions.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
During the last seven years we have borrowed on those conditions, so that our earliest loans within that period have thirteen more years to run.

Mr. REID. -
Was the condition in your last loan, Sir John?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Yes, and it was in all our loans.

Mr. REID. -
You would have got a bigger price if you had not had that condition in.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Well, perhaps so. We have also a sinking fund of 11/2 per cent., which very few colonies have, and, at any rate, if we have suffered a little through putting in the condition in question, probably we will reap the advantage hereafter through having established a sinking fund, and also particularly through having the power to consolidate and convert our loans. Now, equally with every honorable member here, and especially with those who are Treasurers of the various colonies, I am most anxious to be able to see that we obtain, in this scheme of federation, all the advantages of federation, and also all the advantages of being secured in what we have at present. I would very much like a plan of that sort, but I do not think it is practicable. I believe that the Federal Parliament will be careful of the trust reposed in it, and that, after paying all necessary expenses, the federal authorities will return the balance to the states. Therefore, in this case, as in all others, I think we may fairly trust the Federal Parliament. Of course, as far as the present condition of the various colonies is concerned, I am quite content with the position we occupy in Western Australia. I have shown that, with fair economy and good management, we can pay our way and be independent of New South Wales and the whole world, and, therefore, it was not any idea that anybody else should pay anything for us that induced me to say, this morning, that the word "shall" should be inserted. My only idea was that if we were going to get the debts of the states transferred to the Commonwealth, leaving the obligation on the Federal Parliament to pay back so much, that would be more convenient to them, as it would be to us, but I am quite willing to leave it optional with the Federal Parliament to deal with this matter in its discretion as it thinks best. I am sure that we, in Western Australia, do not want anything from any one. I hope, and I believe, that I speak for every other representative in making that statement. Our present debt is only three times the amount of our revenue, which no other colony represented here can say. I make this statement with only one object, namely, to show that in giving my vote this morning I was not actuated by a desire to get the better of any one. I shall not say anything more on the subject. I wish to expedite business. I am afraid I have already spoken too long, but I really think that after we have discussed this matter we will find that the provisions in the Bill, with perhaps a little alteration, will meet all the circumstances, and be more acceptable generally than any other scheme.

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -

We have been arguing to-day as though the federal debt of Australia was the great wheel upon which the finances of the world turned, whereas my experience, during a great number of years, has shown me that, after all, the colonies are but a fly upon that wheel. And we appear to forget that we do not control the value of money in the great monetary circles of the world, but that they control us. I observe that Mr. Reid leaves the chamber just as I am about to address to him some figures which, I think, might be worthy of his attention. It would be well if the right honorable gentleman would read himself up on questions of finance, and not maunder and meander about the subject as he very frequently does. I am going to bring to his mind the important fact that during the last five years the rate of interest in the monetary circles has governed the value of our securities, and that the value of our securities has not governed the rate of interest. Whether it was South Australia, or the great and important colony of New South Wales, or even impecunious Tasmania -

Mr. SYMON. -

Thrifty Tasmania.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Yes, thrifty Tasmania; we found ourselves somewhere about 1892 or 1893 with our bonds all quoted at from less than £80 per £100. New South Wales, with her £2,000,000 of territorial revenue to back her up, Victoria with her protective Tariff, South Australia, and Tasmania, all stood in very much the same position, from £78 to £84 per £100. Now, what controlled this? Not that these colonies, some more or less wealthy, were separately indebted, but other circumstances in the monetary world, such as the failure of the Barings, and of the Argentine Republic, and so on, added their weight to our own difficulties of 1892-3. But since then our Australian securities have risen from less than £80 up to £110 for 3½ per cents. per £100, a difference of £30, or more than 30 per cent. upon the transaction. Now, why did not the Governments of these colonies, as Governments, go into the monetary market in 1892 or 1893 and purchase our bonds? Because they would have had to go to the same market and raise the money. Consequently, we are not controlling the money market, but the money market is controlling us; and if, therefore, we now get away from that position to the position of consolidating our debts, and we raise the rate or capital value of the investment in those securities, who gets the advantage? Is it proposed that we should go into the market and buy up those securities? No. Therefore, the bond-holder will realize the advantage of a face value on his security higher than the value of the security he bought. But, of what value is that to him? The face value of his interest remains at 3½ per cent., but he can sell his stock for so many more pounds per £100, but if he sells he must immediately invest in something else, the market price of which will only realize him £2 12s. per cent. Therefore, it is not a question of how much we will lose by the conversion, but a question of how much advantage the holders of our securities will gain in the increased market value of those securities. The bond-holders will get no advantage in the way of increased interest by reason of the rise of the apparent capital value of their securities in the market. Now, take the other point.

Mr. WALKER. -

If there is a rise in value there is a fall in interest, and why should we not take advantage of that?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Because the Commonwealth is not going to pay off its debts. We owe £160,000,000, and we are not likely to pay it off. We are likely during the next twenty years to add 50 per cent to it. If by endorsing the bonds with the signature of six or seven colonies, by means of a reasonable consolidation, you raise the value of those bonds, so much the cheaper will you borrow for the next twenty or thirty years. Who will get the advantage then? If we were never going to borrow again you could say that the holder would get the whole advantage, but if the colonies are going to borrow, the fact of our bonds having risen to £110 or £114 means that the Australian colonies or the Federation will be able to get money at 3 per cent. on £114.

Mr. HOLDER. -

And you will be paying the higher rate of interest in the mean-time.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

We will do so because we made a contract; but the colonies have been wise enough to make contracts for twenty years, and the loans are redeemable after that.

Mr. FRASER. -

Very few.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

£130,000,000 are owing, exclusive of £40,000,000 borrowed by Queensland, and of the former amount £50,000,000 are redeemable in 1910, and £20,000,000 in 1920. Any Treasurer will wait for such an opportunity. When he comes to convert what will be the quid pro quo? No man is so foolish as to suppose that the holder of stock is going to give away anything when he converts, and the Treasurer must give him a quid pro quo. If his stock has five years to run at 3½ per cent., and some of it has to run ten years or twenty years, you will give to him in proportion. If you are going to offer him a 50 years' tenure, then the holder with twenty years' tenure will take less than the holder of a five years' tenure. That will be the whole position. It has been pointed out by the exchanges and financiers of the world that so far as holdings are concerned we ought to do all we possibly can to secure our quotation in trustees' stocks. Trustees do not buy except upon a tenure of twenty years. If you have five years, ten years, and fifteen years to run, and then we were disposed to give 30 years' tenure to the whole of those stocks, it would not be the capital amount which would be increased; it would only be the number of years during which the security would be held which would be increased. So that, after all, we are dealing with a bogey when we presume that we are going to increase the value of these stocks so enormously against ourselves. There is no good to be gained by conversion, except by delaying the payment of your interest, and except upon a quid pro quo basis. I made a statement, three years ago, that Australia might save over £1,000,000 by conversion. Will any honorable member tell me that any financier having taken up those figures has proved them to be incorrect or unlikely of accomplishment? I can assure honorable members that the Government of Tasmania holds letters from very high authorities in the financial world in England, some of which have been already quoted, urging us to take the course indicated, and not only £1,000,000, but £2,000,000, might be saved by the arrangement. £1,000,000 will be saved actually in pounds, shillings, and pence, and the other £1,000,000 might be postponed in payment. I do not call such a postponement a saving; but if it were convenient, if the Treasurer had a great difficulty to meet, and was not able to raise a revenue except such as a Tariff of 40s. per head represents, and with the difficulty of a state standing between him, he could convert and save £1,000,000 simply by postponing the payment of a certain portion of the interest for 30 years, and he could save another £1,000,000 by giving trustees and others an opportunity of coming in upon a longer currency than they have at present. These are the only two points I wish to add to the discussion. There has been so much said that is utterly irrelevant that I do not wish to refer to it; but I consider that these two points are relevant to the issue, and I desire to place them before the committee.
Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I wish to say a few words before the debate concludes, in order to make clear my own attitude in this matter. When I heard the speech of Sir George Turner, it certainly had a very reassuring effect upon me, but until I heard that speech, having listened to other speeches previously delivered, I confess I had very serious misgivings with respect to the vote I gave for the insertion of the word "shall" in place of the word "may." However, I think Sir George Turner's explanation of what he hopes to gain has to some extent removed my misgivings, and it has taken away a great deal of the fear which I entertained as to the possible effect of substituting "shall" for "may." Both before and since I had the honour of entering this Convention, I have always been in favour of federalizing the debts and the railways. In Adelaide, when the subject was first discussed, I was amongst those who took the position that some scheme might be devised under which the railways and the debts might be brought under the federal power. I voted for the insertion of the word "shall" in order to give effect to the opinion which I have always entertained, that, to be consistent, some scheme should, if possible, be devised to carry out the federalization of the railways and the debts. I have not lately felt that there is very much possibility of that being accomplished now. If we had resolutely set our minds to the subject at the Adelaide sittings, and if we had determined in principle upon the federalization of the railways and the debts, I think we should have been able now to deal with some scheme which might have been formulated and worked out to the fair satisfaction of everybody. I think that that is now too late. Although I still adhere to the opinion I have always entertained, I believe it is now too late for us to take up this vast question of the federalization of the debts and the railways.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

That is not now proposed.

Mr. SYMON. -

If the honorable member listens to me he will understand that I do not believe in the federalization of the debts without federalizing the railways. It may be right or wrong financially if you please, but I do not believe that any fair scheme is possible under which you can federalize the debts without introducing into it as an element the federalization of the railways. Now that we are in the fifth or sixth week of our Melbourne session, it is hopeless to debate any such question as the federalization of the debts or of the railways, and therefore I am content to leave things as they are. It was from that point of view that I gave my vote for the substitution of the word "shall" for the word "may," in the hope that possibly some scheme or other might be submitted which might bring about some fair basis for the consideration of this subject. But when I found that the discussion practically amounted to the re-opening of the financial adjustment to which we had devoted days, my mind was filled with the gravest apprehension as to whether I had not assisted in doing something I should regret, by-voting for the insertion of the word "shall." I am not prepared to re-open this question. I think that, so far as we can, we have dealt finally with the financial clauses. We decided that exceptional treatment should be meted out to the colony of Western Australia. We fought that question out upon the lines of the proposal submitted by the Finance Committee, and upon the lines of the proposal submitted by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin).

Mr. HENRY. -

But how does the present proposal disturb the financial arrangements of the Bill?

Mr. SYMON. -

The view I take is that it was intended to disturb them. I heard speaker after speaker declare that this was, to be in effect a guarantee from the Commonwealth that the interest upon the state debts would be paid by it, and that it was to be another way of accomplishing what was sought to be accomplished quite fairly and properly by my honorable friends from Victoria—the giving of a substantial assurance to the states that they should receive, without further taxation or difficulty, any deficiency which might occur in connexion with the distribution of the surplus.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is absolutely essential.

Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable and learned friend has put it exactly as I intended it, and as the Hon. Mr. Henry understood it and put it to the Convention. It was to re-adjust the financial balance, which was supposed to be disturbed by the arrangements which we have made. I felt that, at any rate, I could not be a party to this being done by this method. If, later on, some honorable member can submit something tangible and direct, I am perfectly willing to have the matter reconsidered, but I am not willing to have it reconsidered in connexion with the introduction of provisions which have nothing upon earth to do with this particular question. That is the view I took, and, therefore, like the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) I felt that I had made a mistake. But when the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) said yes, in answer to the question I ventured to put to him as to whether he intended that the states should continue liable for any deficiency of interest upon their debts which their contribution to the Customs revenue was unable to make up, I felt that that took all the vice out of his amendment.

Mr. HENRY. -
All the virtue.

Mr. SYMON. -
From my honorable friend's point of view, all the virtue. From one point of view that answer emasculates the amendment, but from the other point of view it commends it to those who do not want to disturb the financial arrangements which have been brought about. Therefore, I do not feel as many qualms of conscience as I did a little while ago in regard to the vote I have given. At the same time, I do not see how the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) is going to carry this out. I shall wait to see what further proposal he has to make.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I have already said that I propose to go back upon the clause in the Bill, and to alter the word "may" to the word "shall."

Mr. SYMON. -
Yes, but the difficulties which oppress me do not end there. They are in relation to the relative position of the Commonwealth and the states. If these deficiencies occur, will you not create possibilities of irritation and conflict between the Commonwealth and the states which might better be avoided?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
They would occur in any case.

Mr. SYMON. -
There will be difficulties, but let us minimize them as much as possible.
My honorable friend said that this might have some effect in keeping down the cost of the Commonwealth, but I confess that I am unable to see how that can be. The Commonwealth Treasurer will have as much inducement to spend money, and there will be no more control over his expenditure, than if you had left the Bill as it formerly stood. If you wish to limit the expenditure of the Commonwealth you should introduce some direct provision such as that which we have already struck out. I thought that that provision should be struck out because it was derogatory to the federal authority to put such a limitation in the Constitution. If we are going to trust to the integrity, the honesty, and the good sense of the Federal Parliament which we are about to create, and which will be as good a body as this Convention, we may fairly leave to it the duty of dealing economically with the Commonwealth revenue, and maintaining the solvency-I have no, objection to the use of that word-of every state. I see nothing to be gained by the honorable member (Mr. Henry) from the amendment, after the explanation which has been given by the Premier of Victoria; and although we might have avoided the debate which has taken place if we had not inserted the word "shall" for the word "may," the amendment has been robbed of its possible evil effect by that sagacious political medical practitioner. I think, however, that it would be better to get back to the word "may," so as to leave it open to the Federal Parliament to exercise its discretion in regard to these matters, in order that it may arrange such terms and conditions as will insure both to the Commonwealth and to ever state the full advantages to be derived by any consolidation of the debts.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am one of those who think that the proposal to compulsorily take over the debts of the states is one which has a good deal of danger in it. I do not propose to add much to the exhaustive speeches which have been made upon this subject, but I should like to meet one argument that has been often advanced, and that is, that if you take over the debts you should take over the railways, because the railways are the assets for the debts. But the assets for the debts are the consolidated funds of the different colonies. I pointed out in Sydney that the public debts of the colonies are secured upon their, Consolidated Revenue Funds. There may be some argument for taking over the debts, though not taking them over absolutely, when we consider that the most elastic source of revenue in the colonies is transferred to the Commonwealth. But I do not see how that affords an argument for taking over the railways also, as I think more than one speaker has suggested, for the plain reason that, although the railways have been constructed out of borrowed money, the railways are not the security for the debts, but the consolidated revenue is. I believe it would be a very unpopular thing in the colony from which I come if Sir George Turner's proposal were carried.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It would be a popular thing here.

Mr. BARTON. -

It might be popular here; but, of course, we are bound to tell each other our difficulties, and I think it would be an extremely unpopular proposal in New South Wales.

Mr. WALKER. -

It would make it very difficult to get 80,000 votes.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I cannot see why it should be unpopular.
Mr. BARTON. -

I do not know why it should. But all along there has been a rooted objection—I cannot explain everything I hear—to any proposal which might involve a compulsory taking over of the debts. I must say that, not being an expert in subjects of this kind, I look most particularly to the question which is before us of making a Bill which our respective constituents will take. I am bound, therefore, to give expression by my vote to the feeling I have as to the opinion held in the colony from which I come, always, of course, bearing in mind that there may be a different opinion in other colonies, but knowing that all of up, are bound to avoid, as far as we can, those matters which are so entirely unpopular in the colonies from which others come as to imperil the safety of the Bill. That is really the position, I think, in New South Wales on this subject. I am of the opinion that the sooner the Commonwealth takes over a very large proportion of the debts the better it will be, but I think that is a question really for the Commonwealth to decide. We are here in a position in which we cannot predict what will be the right degree to which the debts should be taken over by the Commonwealth, standing as we are, possibly, on the threshold of a Federation, but certainly not being able to predict the varying conditions which will arise when it is accomplished. We have recognised that consideration in providing for the bookkeeping system. By that we have admitted that we are standing outside of all the conditions under which the federated country will be living, and not able to predict in what way the financial question will work itself out. No doubt, intimately connected with this question is the question of the debts. I think the objection to our taking upon ourselves the risk of the proviso—the large objection which we avoid when we agreed to the bookkeeping system as providing a basis of experience—equally applies to the case of the debts. If it becomes at any time a desirable thing to take up the debts, at any rate, as they fall due, that will be a matter which will appeal equally to the Commonwealth and to the states as we proceed in the life of the Commonwealth. That will be a matter which we may certainly trust our own people to decide for themselves when the time comes, and I will be perfectly content with whichever way they may decide, because I believe they will be actuated by quite as much common sense as we are, and they will have the advantage of a vast deal more experience than we have. Under these circumstances, I think it will be wiser to leave this matter to be moulded by events—to be decided by the result of federation as it comes. I agree with the objection which my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) took to the position that would be created by taking over these debts—a position involving the payment of such a very great amount of interest, in addition to the ordinary expenses of the Commonwealth, as would necessitate, unless Sir George Turner's expedient is carried out, the adoption of a Tariff that would force a particular policy on the Federation. Although I shall be found, if I take any part in public life after federation is established, supporting a fiscal policy which I believe to be the best for a country in this stage of development, I, for one, will never consent to anything being implanted in the Constitution which would enforce a particular line of policy on the Federation. It is our duty to leave their hands wholly unfettered in all their methods of self-government. We are here to frame a constitutional machine, and to make those necessary conditions with respect to certain material interests which will give us safety in entering into a Federation. When we have done that-and I do not think this is necessarily one of them—I think that there we should stop, that we should certainly not do anything which forces a particular line of policy on the people who are going to be called, not into existence, but into another form of constitutional capacity. We should leave such matters as these to be decided by them, knowing very well that they are our own people, and that they will decide better by the light of experience than we can do without it. That is the feeling I have on the subject. Much as I should like to see the Commonwealth take over a large portion of the debts within a reasonable period after its establishment, I do not think we are here to force it to do so by means of any particular line of fiscal policy, which I think free-trader and protectionist alike should refrain from endeavouring to enforce beyond what we would not be able to call free-trade if you put them in that kind of bondage. Well, then, there comes Sir George Turner's expedient, by which he hopes to minimize this difficulty—the expedient of returning or refunding to the states according to the proportion of the debt taken over to the revenue of the Commonwealth. I am rather inclined to distrust that portion of the existing clause. I think if the Commonwealth either takes over these debts, or a large proportion of them, it should pause well within the limits of the revenue of the Commonwealth, and not hand itself over to a bargain between the Commonwealth and the states, on lines of payment and refund between the Commonwealth and the states, which will create an objectionable state of things, which will be a standing subject, not only

Mr. KINGSTON.

[P.1630] starts here

of friction, but of endeavours to obtain better treatment. That would form a difficulty which, I think, would tend to worry the revenue out of the Commonwealth.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Won't you have it under the existing state of things?

Mr. BARTON. -

You have too much of it in the Bill as it stands. The difficulty which will arise, it seems to me, will be this. Where a state is bound to make a refund to the Commonwealth, if this is intended to be a guarantee of its solvency, it is that particular state which may have to make a refund. We do not know what the possibilities are, and in that event, if the state is in that financial condition which makes it unable to pay that refund, what is the good of the provision there? Because it is very well to say you can hypothecate a portion of the revenue, but you will do that with results which will injure the credit of the state, and, in injuring the credit of any one state, you will be injuring the credit of the Commonwealth. It seems to me to present a difficulty which we would do better to avoid.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If the state was in such a position that it could not repay the Federal Parliament, would it be in such a position that it could not pay its English creditors?

Mr. BARTON. -

That may be. I do not think it is a good position to create. It is not a good position to raise as a possibility on the face of your Constitution things of that kind which are intimations of a condition which we do not expect to have, and which we think the prosperity that federation will bring is considerably likely to prevent. I do not think that conditions and possibilities of that kind ought to be raised by anything we do in the Bill. I think we would arouse suspicion very largely which we ourselves do not entertain.

Mr. SYMON. -

The Convention has already negatived Mr. Henry's amendment contemplating that very condition.

Mr. BARTON. -

That may be, but the difficulty I see looming in Sir George Turner's proposal is this one which he has explained, and which he says he will get rid of in this way, but which I am afraid will not be got rid of, because if the condition arose there would be a state of uncertainty established in regard to state revenue as well as federal revenue, which would not place the Federation or the colonies, in a good position, but which, on the contrary, would damage the credit of both.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They have got that practically in Canada.

That may be, but because Canada has managed to avoid the danger there is no reason why we should open a door to that danger for ourselves. I do not think it is a good thing to do. We are not bound by the precedent of Canada. Where we see the matter has been tested in another country by a provision of its Constitution, where we find being so tested it has proved a success, and where there is nothing in the difference of condition or temperament between the peoples to prevent the success in the one from being a precedent for success in the other, we may rely on a precedent of that kind. But I think we have to satisfy all those conditions first. The Canadian debts, compared with ours, are not a very serious matter. The position in which the provinces have been put by the Canadian Constitution has rendered it very unlikely that provincial debts will ever occupy a serious place. And that is exactly the condition we do not create by this Constitution, nor does any one pretend that he wants to create that condition. It is a condition that will arise under something nearer to unification than anything which we intend to propose. The difficulty being avoided in that way in Canada, we need not trouble ourselves with that precedent. On the whole, as it would be more injurious to the prospects of the Bill if Sir George Turner's proposal were carried, I think it would be wiser not to insist upon it. Any one who believes that this question is solvable, and reasonably solvable, by the Commonwealth and the states as a matter of arrangement, may trust to their having the same common sense which Sir George Turner imputes to all his fellow members in the Convention. Having that belief, I do not know any reason why we should take what is practically a leap in the dark. We do not know how the proposal would work, and not knowing that, we are doing far better by placing ourselves in the position of enabling the Commonwealth to decide, as circumstances arise, what will be the best policy for them at a particular time.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

In taking away from the states their principal and most flexible means of revenue, do not you think it would be expedient to have some guarantee for the state creditors?

Mr. BARTON. -

I quite agree that there is a difficulty, raised there. You transfer the larger source of the consolidated revenue, which is the security, and it may be that the Commonwealth will take that into very serious consideration. You may be quite sure that, as the Commonwealth will be merely a representation of the various states, the interests of the various states in having their debts taken over, if it is at a particular time necessary or advisable to take them over, will be so well represented in the Commonwealth that the question of policy will be solved in the direction of the desire of the representatives of the states. That being so, I think we need not fear to leave them to act for themselves.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say-

Mr. BARTON. -

I was going to ask that progress be reported.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

Before progress is reported, I desire to point out that, as I previously said, I worded my amendment in very wide terms in order to open up a discussion on the question. At the same time, I was not prepared to go the length of taking over the liability of the debts themselves. What I want really to get at would be this—that the clause in the Bill as it stands would simply read in this form:—

The Parliament shall take over the whole of the public debts of the states, &c.,

and then strike out a portion of the clause at the end. The only further alteration I would now desire to make is simply to leave out the reference to taking over the "rateable proportion," as it is inconsistent with taking over the whole of the debts. If I cannot get at that position by some means, I would simply propose to throw on the Commonwealth the liability to pay the interest on the public debts of the states.

The CHAIRMAN. -

We are now only considering an amendment on a proposed amendment. If we negative the amendment on the proposed amendment, and then negative the original amendment, we can go back to the consideration of the clause.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

Divide!

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I may state that there is a difficulty about taking a division to-night, because I know that there are several gentlemen absent who never expected a proposal of this kind to be made. It was not expected that any proposal for the compulsory taking over of the debts of the states would be brought forward, and consequently several honorable members are absent who will be here tomorrow. I do not know whether the committee will consider it to be fair to postpone the taking of a division on the question until tomorrow. I think myself it would be eminently fair. If a division were taken in the absence of several members who have a considerable interest in the question, it would only be treated as a snap division, and the whole matter would be re-opened.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Then the division must not be taken early tomorrow, because some members, I understand, will not be here until twelve or one o'clock.

---

Mr. BARTON. -

I think there will be more said upon this question to-morrow morning if a division is not taken to-night. I believe there are two or three members who are likely to speak. Apart from that, I would suggest that it would be well to give an opportunity to the Right Hon. Sir George Turner to put his proposition into any shape be likes. In order to test the matter, I beg to move that progress be reported.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

The Convention adjourned at seven minutes past five o'clock p.m.
Tuesday, 1st March, 1898.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at twenty-six minutes to eleven o'clock a.m.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on clause 98 (see page 1540), and on Sir George Turner's amendment on the amendment proposed by Mr. Holder, for Mr. McMillan (see page 1577), as amended by the substitution of "shall" for "may," to insert after the word "shall" the words "be liable for the public debts of the states existing at the time of the Commonwealth."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
The difficulty in connexion with this amendment is that it does not appear clear in what way the matter is really to be adjusted. Is the Commonwealth to be liable to the states as a guarantor, or is it to become the transferee of the debts? Some words should be added to the amendment to make the intention clear.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It follows the Canadian Act.

Mr. BARTON. -
I am not quite sure how that Act has been read, but this seems to be a rather doubtful way in which to express the matter. There might be in case of any question coming before the courts a serious difficulty with regard to it.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I understood that Sir George Turner did not intend to press the amendment in this form, but that he would adopt clause 98 with a slight alteration.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
In the absence of Sir George Turner, I may state that I have in my hand a copy of the Bill which he used yesterday when discussing this clause with me. The word "shall" is there substituted for "may" in the existing clause 98, and there are other notes which show that he did intend to adopt clause 98, with certain modifications.

Mr. BARTON. -
He wished to make his proposal like clause 98, excepting that it should be compulsory, and that the words relating to rateable proportion should be omitted.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I understood that the amendment was moved by the Hon. Mr. Holder for the Hon. Mr. McMillan, and that Sir George Turner's proposal was an amendment upon it. I voted for that amendment, intending to vote against the proposal as amended. I desire to adhere to the clause in the Bill as it stands now.

The CHAIRMAN. -

If the committee desire it they can either negative or pass Sir George Turner's amendment, and then they can either negative or pass Mr. McMillan's amendment as amended.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

It will be understood that if the word "shall," or any words containing the word "shall," is struck out, that is not a mere formal striking out with a view to the same thing being proposed again. If we negative the amendment with the word "shall," it will not be competent for the Right Hon. Sir George Turner or any other honorable member to propose a similar amendment until the recommittal stage.

Nothing has been inserted in the clause yet, still less has the clause been inserted in the Bill. The committee have not, therefore, come to any final conclusion whatever. The Legislature of Western Australia has suggested that we should strike out the word "may," and that is the next amendment I shall put.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I mentioned yesterday that my desire really was to adopt clause 98 of the Bill with modifications. There is only one alteration that I wish to make in the clause. It would then read-

Parliament shall take over the whole-
I would leave out the words "or rateable proportion." of the public debts of the states.

Then the clause would go on down to the last four lines, which have reference to the rateable proportion of the debts of the several states. Those words I would propose to omit as a consequential amendment. To simplify matters, I think it would be wise now to withdraw the amendment I moved yesterday. I only submitted it tentatively, in order that the subject might be discussed. With the permission of the committee, I will withdraw it, and I will move the omission of all the words in the Hon. Mr. McMillan's amendment after the word "all," with a view to the insertion of other words.

The amendment of Sir George Turner was, by leave, withdrawn.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I beg to move-

That Mr. McMillan's proposed amendment be amended by the omission of all the words after the word "over."

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I would ask is this a convenient way of dealing with the question? In my opinion, the simplest plan would be to at once dispose of the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan). We may either carry it or reject it, or accept a part of it.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment of the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) is perfectly in order, but it would perhaps be more convenient to withdraw the amendment upon and the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) and go on with the clause.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I would ask if I can withdraw the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan)?

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment has not yet been inserted in the clause. It is no part of the clause, and therefore can be withdrawn.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Do I understand you to say that the amendment can be withdrawn?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Yes.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Then I would like to withdraw it.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Will that necessitate another division upon the substitution of the word "shall" for the word "may"? If so, certain honorable members will gain a point.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I think the simplest way would be to withdraw all these amendments and to go on with the clause as it stands, taking a division as to whether the word "shall" should be substituted for the word "may" in the clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I am not afraid to take any vote upon that question, and so that there may be no imputation of any false work being done, I am willing to withdraw my amendment.
Mr. VENN (Western Australia). -

The procedure seems to me most confusing. Are we being asked to swallow our previous votes? I have watched our proceedings most carefully, but I cannot understand our present position. Yesterday we divided upon the question of the substitution of the word "shall" for the word "may." Are we now to understand that that division is to go for nothing, and that we are to start from where we were yesterday morning?

Mr. GLYNN. -

It is very good tactics.

Mr. REID. -

Nonsense! A division would have to be taken in any case upon the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan).

Mr. VENN (Western Australia). -

It seems to me most extraordinary that we should be asked to go back to the position in which we were yesterday morning, and without rhyme or reason.

The CHAIRMAN. -

If the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) insists upon moving his amendment, I shall have to put it.

Mr. BRUNKER (New South Wales). -

I think it is necessary that the members of the Convention should really understand our true position, after the vote which was taken yesterday. Before giving any vote or expressing any opinion myself, I should like to know in what position we should stand, whatever the treatment of the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) may be?

The CHAIRMAN. -

I may explain that the word "shall" has not been inserted in the clause. Nothing has been inserted in the clause. The honorable member (Mr. Holder) moved, for the honorable member (Mr. McMillan), that certain words be inserted in the clause. Then an amendment was moved upon that amendment, and the word "shall" was substituted for the word "may." Now the position is that the word "shall" stands in an amendment which may or may not be inserted in the clause. We have come to no conclusion whatever in regard to the clause itself. We cannot take the word "shall" out of the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan), but we need not put his amendment in the clause.

Mr. BARTON. -

The amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) can be negatived.
The CHAIRMAN. -

Yes.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I will ask the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) if he is prepared to withdraw his amendment?

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

My only object is to prevent confusion. I am willing to withdraw the amendment, but some honorable members seem to be opposed to that course. If I withdraw my amendment, and the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) is withdrawn, I shall have to move the substitution of the word "shall" for the word "may" in the clause. The question as to which word should stand should be tested now or later on. However, as many honorable members who yesterday voted for the substitution of the word "shall" for the word "may" in the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) appear to object to the withdrawal of my amendment, I do not care now to ask leave to withdraw it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I will explain that the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) is a proposition which has not yet been inserted in the Bill. A word in it, the word "may," has been omitted, and another word, the word "shall," inserted. In no other way has the amendment been altered. If the amendment of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, providing for the insertion after the word "shall" of the words "be liable for the public debts of the

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That amendment has been withdrawn.

Mr. BARTON. -

Then the substance of the amendment can be proposed as an amendment of the clause itself. As to the doubt of the honorable member (Mr. Venn) as to our position, I would point out that we have yet to vote upon the question whether the word "may" in the clause shall be substituted for the word "shall." The propriety of that alteration must be debated again in any case.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

If we go on with the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) keeps the advantage which he gained yesterday, but if that amendment is withdrawn, and we go back to the clause, he loses his advantage. The rule of the Convention seems to be that when the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) finds himself in a minority, we must go back upon our decision.
Mr. REID. -
What is the good of saying that? Surely when I am present I have the right to discuss any proposal before the Convention.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
You have all the right, and a great deal of power.

Mr. REID. -
I have only the same right as any other man.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
As a matter of fact, when a division is taken in which the right honorable member is in a minority, it is afterwards found necessary to reconsider the matter. I generally protest against this procedure, but as yesterday I happened to be in a minority with him, I will not protest against it now, because it may allow yesterday's minority to be converted into a majority. Therefore, I think that we had better stand by the ordinary rule, and give the right honorable member credit for the excellency of this tactical proposal.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It will save time in the end.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Perhaps so. At any rate, I am not averse to an arrangement which may turn a minority, of whom I am one, into a majority.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -
What it is proposed to do is, not to depart from the rule, but to strictly observe it. The proposed clause of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) -

The CHAIRMAN. -
The honorable member (Mr. McMillan) did not move his proposal as a clause. He wished to insert certain words in a clause of the Bill.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Mr. McMillan's amendment was given notice of as a clause, but it was moved as an amendment.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -
If the amendment and the amendments upon it are withdrawn, the clause will be open for discussion, and the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) will be at liberty to move that the word "shall" be substituted for the word "may."

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I think that the remarks of the honorable member (Dr. Cockburn) were quite uncalled for. I have made no proposition or suggestion. When I arrived here yesterday afternoon there was a certain proposition before the Convention to which I addressed myself, and I do not think I should be singled out as though I had taken a course which no other honorable member takes. Every honorable member has a right to address himself to every proposition before the Chair. I do not claim any rights other than those possessed by every other honorable member, and I do not think that remarks such as those of the honorable member (Dr. Cockburn) should be made. The object of them is apparent.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I suggest that we now go on with the business. The question before the Chair is-

That the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) be amended by the omission of all the words after the word "over."

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I am glad that at last we understand the proposal of the right honorable member (Sir George Turner). He practically desires to retain the provisions of clause 98, except that he wishes it to be obligatory upon the Commonwealth to take over all the debts of the states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes, upon the terms laid down in clause 98.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Clause 98 provides for the taking over of the debts of the states, subject to a right upon the part of the Commonwealth to be afterwards indemnified by the states. Yesterday I voted against the amendment of Sir George Turner with great misgiving, because I knew that his intention was right; but the more I have thought over the matter, the more I am convinced that the minority were right in opposing him. Still one important advance was made by the large vote which was taken yesterday. It made it apparent that the members of the Convention are determined that some guarantee shall be given to the state Treasurers.
But what is equally apparent is that the proposal of the right honorable member will not give such a guarantee. The desire is to give a guarantee, and there must be some process evolved which will not leave the state Treasurers absolutely helpless after the establishment of the Federation.
But, at the same time, this proposal will not do it. If the idea were that the debts were to be taken over by the Commonwealth, and the Commonwealth were to have no recourse against the states, it would be a guarantee.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

But an unfair one.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That might be, but it would be a guarantee.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Mr. HIGGINS. -

More than a guarantee.

If that were the idea—that the Commonwealth were to be responsible for these debts, and were to have no recourse as against the states—that would be something like a guarantee, and, perhaps, it might be a wrong thing; but what are we to say about a guarantee of this class when we find the Commonwealth can come back on the states for any difference? Where is the guarantee there? It is an instance of what I referred to the other day, as keeping the promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope in a remarkable degree. If the Commonwealth feels that it can come upon the states for any deficiency, where is the motive to the Commonwealth to impose the requisite taxation to obtain a sufficient amount to meet the necessities of the state Treasurer? Although I voted in the minority, I am very glad that the committee has so strong a sense of the importance of giving some guarantee to the states Treasurers, but this is not the way to do it. It has been said that we must trust the Federal Parliament, and the influences upon the Federal Parliament, to secure that there shall be a sufficient guarantee to the states—a sufficient surplus to the states. I would go as far as any one in trusting the Federal Parliament, but I want to see that there is a sufficient motive in the Federal Parliament to provide the necessary surplus to, the state Treasurers, and I cannot find it. The Federal Parliament may be trusted to do its best for its taxpayers—its constituents—but then the Federal Parliament has no sufficient motive to see that a state Treasurer is not embarrassed. The Federal Parliament will know that if it does not provide a sufficient surplus to the state Treasurers, the latter will have to tax the people but it is a very different thing for the Federal Treasurer to feel that he must tax the people, and to feel that he must leave the taxation to the state Treasurers. When you have to deal with a cantankerous dog, I would far rather not tread on his tail myself—I would let the next fellow do it; and it is the taxpayers' tail that has to be trodden upon. There are occasions which I can conceive when the Federal Treasurer might say: I should like to put state Treasurers, or some state Treasurer, under the obligation of treading upon the taxpayers' tail.

Mr. REID. -

Some taxpayers think that taxes are the readiest method of getting rich.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The point I am addressing myself to is that this does not give security to the state Treasurers, and I think it is only justice that security should be given to the state Treasurers when we are taking away from them the chief means and the most flexible device for meeting the interest on the debts. If I have £10,000 worth of property, and I have £8,000 worth of debts, I ought not to give away £5,000 worth of that property without making some provision to meet my debts. What I fear is this: That if there be no guarantee given, our state stocks will in a sensible degree be depreciated. If the outside creditor finds that the Customs and Excise are going over to the Federal Parliament, and if there is no guarantee given of any amount coming back, it is only reasonable to suppose that there will be a great dislocation in the money market as regards the state bonds. It is only fair that when we have entered into obligations for the various states with the English creditor we should see that no reason is given for supposing that we may make any default or deficiency. There is another point I wish to refer to. To my mind, no one has yet answered Mr. Holder's argument in the slightest degree, and he urged a great objection to making this clause obligatory. No one has answered Mr. Holder's argument that you are giving a premium to the bond-holders by the system proposed of making this obligatory.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Sir George Turner admits that by saying you could not convert until the expiration of the loan.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Exactly; may I indicate the position in this way? It is quite true that under ordinary circumstances you cannot convert until the end of a loan, but let us consider this. Suppose you have got a state bond carrying 3 percent. at 96 in the market, and suppose the holder of the state bond finds the Federal Parliament has backed that bill, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he will regard it as more valuable than the state bond, and I think Mr. Holder's suggestion of a 96 bond going up to 104 is not unreasonable.

Mr. HENRY. -

But the holder of the bond would take a lower rate of interest.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No; I am assuming that there is a 3 per cent. bond in existence which has only the backing of Tasmania, and the price of that bond is at 96; if, however, you get in addition the backing of the whole Federal Commonwealth, do you mean. to say that bond will not rise in value?

Mr. REID. -

Of course it will.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is so, and a present will be made to the bond-holder, but I admit that present will not be at the expense of the Federal Commonwealth or of the state.

Mr. HOLDER. -
But it will be the gift of a valuable security.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes, that is the case.

Mr. SYMON. -

The same present will be made, but not to the same extent, by the mere fact of federation taking place.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I must follow out my point. I quite agree that it is not a present made at the expense of the state or the Commonwealth, but it is a present if the bond should rise suddenly, by reason of the backing of the Federation, from 96 to 104. I am assuming that there is to be no conversion at all, but that the Federal Parliament has come under the obligation of paying the debt. If we can devise means by which the bond-holder is not to get that present without some equivalent being given for it, surely we ought to accept that expedient. It is quite possible that even those who hold long-dated bonds, say twenty or thirty years, from the states mi

Mr. HOLDER. -

Hear, hear; you give it away.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

At the same time, I quite well see that more can be made of this point than is needful. I have considered it very carefully, and I am quite assured of Mr. Holder's argument being unanswered. Therefore, we ought to try to keep the credit of the Federal Commonwealth, and not give it away without some equivalent.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Are you not assuming that by dividing your assets you are doubling your security?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is a conundrum which I will not attempt to answer. The position is that, strongly as I am in favour of giving some strong guarantee to the states Treasurers, I do not think we can do it by making it obligatory on the Federal Treasurer to take over the debts, but, above all, it will be no guarantee to the states if the obligation is coincident with a provision that the state Treasurer is to indemnify the Federal Treasurer against any deficiency. I am not at all impressed with the other argument used with such effect by the Premier of New South Wales, namely, that by that means you absolutely compel the Federal Parliament to impose high import duties. I think it is hardly worthy to press that argument in the way it has been. The Premier of New South Wales says to us practically-"You know I believe that there must be high import duties, but I do not want my people in New South Wales to know that is the case." I do not think that is worthy of the people of New South Wales. The people of New South Wales will understand the thing as perfectly as we do, and they know thoroughly well that there must be high import duties in order that we may be able to prevent the insolvency of certain states. It may be all very well for New South Wales, where only a comparatively small proportion of the revenue is derived from Customs and Excise, and where they sell their capital assets and treat them as revenue.

Mr. REID. -

Will not those assets be come all the more valuable when enterprise and settlement are attached to them?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I quite admit that, but I wish to go on with my argument. I would not even so far reflect upon the security of New South Wales by even saying that I believe it to be good. The evil which we have in this matter is that we have not imagination enough to look at the position from the other point of view. Because the Premier of New South Wales does not want to go to, the people of New South Wales and say frankly that after federation there must be considerable import duties, because there are considerable debts and large interest payments to be made—because he does not want to go to the people with that in his election speeches, we are to be put to all this terrible embarrassment. So far as we are concerned, that is not our business. The people of New South Wales know perfectly well that to meet the large interest on our debts there must be large customs and excise duties, and we may as well face the position frankly at once. I am sure the people of New South Wales will be willing to reciprocate any frankness which may be displayed.

Mr. WALKER. -

Would not the hypothecation of the railway income make up the deficiency?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think so, but that is not proposed yet. I must deal with the proposal as it stands. I do not think it is a question of protection and free-trade, because you can get far more money out of revenue duties than you can out of protective duties, but the point is undeniable that you must have a large income by way of Customs and Excise. Why cannot we admit that frankly in our Bill? There was a suggestion which was made yesterday by Sir George Turner, to which I find I made allusion in Adelaide, and I am surprised it has not been followed up this morning. I watched closely this morning to see if Sir George Turner would follow up that idea, which is very fruitful. It is this: Why not amalgamate the Tasmanian amendment with the provision that the Federal Commonwealth is to, be the hand to pay the interest upon the, lowest scale of borrowing? There is a very suggestive and thoughtful amendment put by Tasmania, but which I think goes too far. It is in effect that each state is to have paid for it so much principal and interest as will correspond with the debt which is, having regard to the number of people in each state, the lowest debt of each of the colonies. I would suggest that all that should be done by the Federal Parliament is to leave the principal of the debt still an obligation on the state, but to insert a provision to the effect that the Federal Parliament shall pay the interest upon each state's debt up to a certain limit, and that that limit shall be the lowest scale of borrowing. For instance, if Western Australia has only borrowed £40 a head, there shall be interest on £40 a head paid by the Federal Parliament for each of the states.

Mr. HENRY. -
That is the Tasmanian proposal.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Very much the same. I think the Tasmanian proposal has not had sufficient attention paid to it yet-I am very glad Mr. Henry referred to it-and I think the reason of that is because my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) was the first to propose in this committee to take over the whole of the debts. That, I believe, is the reason why the Tasmanian amendment has not got due attention.

Mr. HENRY. -
It deserves more consideration.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I was surprised that Sir George Turner allowed Mr. Glynn's amendment to go without any division or debate, and then proposed it himself. I did not understand it, because Mr. Glynn's amendment raised the very question at issue.

Mr. GLYNN. -
My amendment provided for some amalgamation, for some wiping out of debts, but Sir George Turner's does not.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Quite so. I think that Mr. Glynn's amendment, if I may say so with all respect, was better considered than Sir George Turner's amendment, and, therefore, it ought not to have been negatived, and then the same proposal, but in a cruder form, put before the committee. I think it was rather hard on Mr. Glynn, who deserves every credit there is for having raised this point. In my opinion, we might achieve the two objects in view. We might avoid the backing of the principal by the Federal Parliament, and, at the same time, secure to the states Treasurers a certainty that, without recourse to them for indemnity, there shall be a certain proportion of the interest paid. I know that any suggestion made by a private member will not have, and ought not to have, that attention which it would receive if it came from a responsible Minister of the Crown.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We are all equal here.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

We are all equal here; but I am speaking practically. I say it is quite right that a proposal coming from my right honorable friend very justly gets more attention than a proposal coming from a private member, and I do not at all complain of it. But I throw out this suggestion that the guarantee shall be limited to the interest-the interest on the lowest scale of borrowing-and that there shall not be an obligation on the Federal Parliament to back the bill for the principal. You may have in that direction a reasonable compromise which will give the state Treasurers the certainty that at least they will have so much of the interest paid, and enable them to tell their people that there will not be any obligation on the Federal Parliament to back the principal of the debt.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

How are they going to get that money? Must not they borrow it?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think we must admit and confess the fact that we must get, through the Customs, a large amount, by means of taxation, to meet our interest. We at present get through our Customs the means of paying our interest, and we shall have to do it here-after. The only objection to this course is that taken by the Premier of New South Wales, who practically says:"I do not want to tell my people (what every person knows) that there must be a large amount of revenue raised through the Customs." I say that this Convention ought not to accept that position. We are going to be frank with the people of Australia; we know that they are now paying large amounts through the Customs to meet the interest on their debts, and we know that they will have to do it for many years to come. In that spirit, therefore, I would suggest that there should be another alteration of the amendment. I think the Premier of Victoria has already altered his amendment three times.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

And I will alter it three times more if that will facilitate the decision of the question.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
I am quite sure that the Premier of Victoria will-

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
You seem to have a great down on the Premier of Victoria.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The honorable member, as usual, has made a statement which is absolutely unjustifiable. I am not going to withhold any criticism from Sir George Turner, or anybody else, if I believe it to be true. Sir George Turner knows I will say to his face what I would not say behind his back, where I would say far better things. I have no hesitation in pointing out that the same gentleman who spoke about all the portfolios or offices in the Judiciary being already filled by allocation among the members here, is the very same gentleman who has stated that I have unjustly attacked the Premier of Victoria.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
What is the difference between taking the lowest rate of interest, as you suggest, and what we are now paying?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I do not quite follow the right honorable gentleman.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
As I understand it, you say that the guarantee is to be at the lowest rate of interest paid by any of the states.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
No; you find what has been the lowest borrowing per capita, and guarantee the interest on that. For instance, Victoria or Western Australia has had the lowest scale of borrowing per capita hitherto.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Yes, about £40 per head.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Well, the suggestion is that you should guarantee the interest on that lowest rate of borrowing per head.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
If you fix £40 per head all round, and use the surplus for paying the interest on that portion of the state debts, that will be a distribution of the surplus on that basis, and the Convention has refused to sanction that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
For the first five years the amount of the surplus is to be ascertained by the amount received in each state from Customs revenue. After that time, I hope it will be a per capita distribution. All I say here is that, having regard to the figures, there can be no serious injustice done to any state under the arrangement suggested if the interest be apportioned per capita, according to the number of people in each state. The right honorable gentleman's idea evidently is that as the rates of interest vary, and as the terms of the loans vary, there will be difficulty in carrying out such a scheme, but I say that all the different debts can be reduced to a common denominator in very much the way that Mr. Glynn proposes. There is a grave difficulty owing to the terms of the loans and the rates of interest being different, but the first sug

That is so.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is possible to reduce all the debts of the states to one common denominator, and have them expressed in one average debt, bearing one average interest, and having arrived at that, you can then say-"We will make the Federal Parliament take over the liability to pay the interest on a certain proportion of the states' debts"-that is the lowest proportion-and the surplus will eventually be distributed per capita. I have to submit this, therefore, and I only hope it will be taken up by our leaders, because I think it will to a large extent meet the difficulty that confronts us.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I will ask the Convention, Mr. Chairman, to adopt the suggestion you made a little while ago as to the manner of putting the various proposals to the committee. It is perfectly competent for us now to negative Mr. McMillan's amendment, and then it will be competent for Sir George Turner to propose the omission of the word "may," from the original clause of the Bill, and, that being carried, to move the insertion ,of the word "shall," and afterwards the remainder of his amendment. By this means we shall take a step forward in the way of getting on with our work. And I think it is time to do that. We have had a long discussion on the matter, and I believe that each of us. knows pretty well what the opinions of the others are on the question.

The amendment of Sir George Turner was agreed to.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I now beg to move-

That the word "may" be omitted from the words "Parliament may" in clause 98.

Sir George Turner's amendment was negatived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The question now is, that the words "shall take over," proposed to be inserted in clause 98, in lieu of the word "may," which we have just struck
Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I do not make any apology for spending a little more time on the very important question we discussed all day yesterday. I spent several hours last evening in making a few calculations which I thought would be useful to the Convention, and I am going to give them to the Convention in a few minutes. I want to speak chiefly because of certain remarks that were made by Sir George Turner last evening, and to dispose, if I can, of certain criticisms that he levelled at statements which, early in the day, I had made in respect of the conversion of public debts. I repeat that I do not make any apology for dealing with this question, because whatever sentimental advantages there may be about federation, whatever advantages-and there are many-to trade and commerce there will be connected with federation, all through the sittings of our Convention, in the three places where we have sat, there has been running frequently this note-"What can we tell the electors whom we represent they will receive as actual profit from the proposed federation? "Now, to my mind, the only cash dividend which federation can pay is the cash dividend to which I am going to direct attention. There will be commercial dividends, dividends of finance, dividends of sentiment—all these things will accrue—but the only one cash dividend which federation can pay, the only one cash argument we can use to our constituents in recommending them to adopt federation will be the profit arising from any possible conversion of our loans. That is taken for granted by practically all those who, in the press, have written on federation with any financial knowledge and experience; that is the only argument I have heard used, even in this Convention, in favour, from that point of view, of the federation we are striving to frame. In order that I may clear away some misunderstandings which surround this question, I want to say that if I were dealing, as a state Treasurer, with state loans, I should say that a state Treasurer could not profitably convert any state loan except as it was becoming due. And the reason I say that is because no state Treasurer has anything he can give to the bond-holders in the way of better security or advantage, unless he gives an extravagant extension of the term of the loan, to induce them to accept any conversion scheme. If I were a state Treasurer, dealing with state bonds, I should be hopeless about effecting any profitable conversion of loans excepting as the bonds approached the due dates. But in this case the position is entirely different. Here we contemplate a Federal Treasurer, who will have at his back a federal security, which, I think, without argument, would be taken by everybody to be a better security than the security of any individual state. However, as I have heard even that questioned, I must spend a moment or two on the point, but only a moment or two, and discuss whether the security which the Federal Treasurer will have at his disposal is likely to be a better security than that which any state Treasurer has to offer. I will put it this way: The security which the different states offer to-day is evidently a varying quantity. That is proved by the fact that on the London market the stocks of the various colonies of even date and even interest-bearing capacity are at different prices, and the differences in those prices measure the different estimates which the London bond-holders, speculators, and stock-brokers put upon the difference in the security of the various colonies.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

That is not the only difference.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not want to go into details; those are the main reasons. Now, it must, I think, be apparent to everyone who looks into the facts that if these colonies federate, and the debts are taken over by the Commonwealth, the least that can happen will be that the cheapest stock among the five colonies there represented must be raised to the level of the dearest stock of the five colonies; because the security behind the federal stocks—whether they be issued to take up the present South Australian, or Tasmanian, or Victorian, or Western Australian, or New South Wales stocks—will be one and the same throughout. Therefore, as it is inconceivable that the value of the lowest stocks at the present time can be less under federalization than the value of the highest of our stocks at the present time, we must come to the conclusion that the value of federal stock must be at least as high as the best stock of the five colonies. Take, for instance, to illustrate that point, the case of five commercial men, all of excellent standing, but one of whom is of rather better standing than the other four. Good as his paper may be in itself, the paper of the five, of whom he is one, must be better than that of the best of the five singly, because you have the security of the best of the five and of the other four as additional security.

Mr. DOBSON. -

You are forgetting altogether the liabilities of the other four colonies.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I am not contemplating an increase of the total indebtedness of the colonies here represented. If the indebtedness were increased my assumption would be affected accordingly. I am contemplating simply the transfer of the existing amount of debts of each colony throughout the group. Now, I think I may go further, and say that while New South Wales 3 per cent. stocks are worth to-day £101 per cent., the federal security will make them worth at least £104 per cent. I am within the mark exceedingly well within the mark-in supposing that after the inauguration of the federation of these colonies the value of our stocks will rise by more than 3 per cent. above the present value of the stocks of New South Wales and of Victoria. Anything less than that cannot be considered likely for a moment. I assume, then, the very low price of £104 per cent. for federal stock. What is the next point? New South Wales stock to-day being £101, if the federal stock be at £104, there is a profit of 3 per cent. to be made on the stock of New South Wales. Victorian 3 per cents. to-day are at £101, and there will, therefore, be a profit of 3 per cent. to be made for the Commonwealth on Victorian stock. South Australian 3 per cents. stand at £100. There is, therefore, £4 per cent. to be made with regard to those stocks. Tasmania has no 3 per cent. stock, and I have, consequently, had to take her 31/2 per cents., and make a calculation as to what the corresponding price of Tasmanian stocks would be if they were 3 per cents., and I find that the price would be £99. So that there is 5 per cent. to be made upon Tasmanian stocks. The price of Western Australian 3 per cents. is quoted at under £97, so that there is actually 7 per cent. to be made on Western Australian stocks by making them not local, but federal, stocks.

Mr. GLYNN. -

What do you calculate would be the price of Tasmanian 3 per cents.?

Mr. HOLDER. -

£99. Honorable members will see that I have not been able to spend sufficient time to make these calculations actuarially correct down to the odd shillings and pence. To have done that would have occupied many days, whilst I only had last night in which to make my calculations. But, for all practical purposes, as being sufficient for what we are doing, these figures which I am giving are a very close approximation to the truth, without going into a most extensive actuarial calculation; and I may add that I have been guided to a large extent in making these calculations by the suggestions contained in the amendment of my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Glynn), and also by the suggestions embodied in the Tasmanian amendment.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

How is the Federation going to lose these sums you have mentioned?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I thought that that was by this time so clear that I need not go over the point again. But I will do it again in order to make the matter clear to the mind of the honorable member. The question I am asked is: How the Federation can possibly lose the amounts I have mentioned by a compulsory and immediate conversion of local into federal stocks? Really, I should have thought that that was such a very elementary point that it was the mere ABC of the question, and that it was not necessary to say any more about it to honorable members of this Convention, who are assumed to have gone into the question. However, I must answer the interjection. If we do anything under this Constitution which will have the effect of raising the price of some of these stocks from £97 up to £104, it must be apparent to the most superficial thinker that we shall make a present of £4,500,000 to the bond-holders. How is it a present to them? Because we are giving to them what would have enabled us to make a bargain with the bond-holders—would have enabled us to make better terms than we could possibly make, by handing over to them for nothing this enormous advantage of federal security, which would actually increase the value of Western Australian stock by the amount of £7 per cent. The Federal Treasurer would thus be giving to the bond-holders an advantage to the value of £4,500,000, which advantage otherwise employed would have enabled him to make immensely better terms for the Commonwealth. If the Federal Treasurer were worth his salt he would go to the bond-holders and say—"If you like to stay where you are I have no power, if I had the will, to compel you to change your position. But, if you like, I am willing to share with you the sum of £4,500,000 which we can make by turning the stocks of the colonies of Australia into Commonwealth stocks. I am willing to give you a Commonwealth stock in exchange for the stock you now hold if you will make it worth my while to do so." And the probabilities are that the bond-holders would be glad to come to terms with the Federal Treasurer in return for the bonus of 1 per cent. and the Commonwealth stock which he would give to them.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Do you contemplate giving Commonwealth stock at existing rates of interest?

Mr. HOLDER. -

That does not matter for the purpose of my argument. I am now giving to the Convention in a few minutes the result of many hours of work. If I were to follow up the pathways by which I have come to these conclusions, I should be occupied in addressing the Convention for a much longer time than I wish to speak. I ask honorable members to give me credit for having arrived at these results by direct methods, without going over the steps of the pathways by which I have come to my conclusions. Taking round figures, the debt of New South Wales at the present time is £57,000,000. Now, I contemplate that the Federal Treasurer would give the holders of New South Wales bonds a bonus of 1 per cent. to induce them to convert their stock to a Commonwealth stock. That leaves 2 per cent. profit on the conversion. If New South Wales chose to take it in cash, she would receive £1,140,000 in money, or if she chose-following the suggestion of Sir George Turner, which I have no doubt expresses what is more likely to be done-to take it

You are forgetting that the loans mature at different periods.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I have taken the period of maturity at an average of 30 years.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
A lot of our loans have more than that time to run.

Mr. HOLDER. -
As I have explained before, for the purpose of calculations of this kind you have to adopt a common denominator, and I have taken the suggestion of Mr. Glynn as a means of arriving at my conclusions. Taking all the factors of the case into consideration, I adopt 30 years as the common denominator. Now, in the case of South Australian stocks there would be a profit which would result in £705,000 capital gain, or an annual saving in interest of £35,000 a year. The debt of Tasmania amounts to £8,000,000. The market price being assumed to be on an average £99, the capital gain on these stocks would be £323,000, or a saving of interest of £16,000 a year. Western Australian stocks are only at £97, so that there would be a much larger gain.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
They are higher than that ordinarily.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Then the right honorable gentleman has unintentionally misled me. I asked him this morning for the current price of 3 per cents. He told me £96 5s., and I said that I would give Western Australia credit for £97.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
They are at nearly £100.

Sir PHILLIP FYSHE. -
You take currency into account?

Mr. HOLDER. -
I have said so before. The lowest quotation have seen for Western Australian 3 per cent. stock was £98, and if I had not asked Sir John Forrest, I should have based my calculations on £98 but when the right honorable gentleman told me that the lowest quotation was £96 5s., I gave his colony credit for £97, so as to leave a sufficient margin. However, the difference is very small, because the whole debt of Western Australia is only £8,000,000. That gives on the basis I have mentioned a profit of £480,000 capitalized, or an annual saving of interest of £24,000. The total, worked out for the whole Commonwealth, with a slight alteration for Western Australia—which alteration would not be a material one—would give us this result: That there would be a capital advantage gained amounting to £3,588,000; or if that capital advantage be utilized in the way of reduction of interest, then we have a total annual saving of £179,000 a year. If that be so—and I defy successful criticism—

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The assumption is that in order to get Commonwealth security the bond-holders are willing to give up nearly £180,000 a year?

Mr. REID. -

On £140,000,000 of debt.

Mr. HOLDER. -

In return for receiving at the hands of the Commonwealth a bonus of £1,400,000. That is a very large bonus, a very considerable temptation. Without it they would not come in, but with it I feel certain that they would. There is not only an advantage to the bond-holders under this scheme, but there is an advantage to be held out to those whom we represent of a large saving to their states, which would go a long way towards paying the original cost of entering into federation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Has the honorable member calculated the probable amount of depreciation of state stock in consequence of the Commonwealth taking over the revenue which is the fund for its payment, and yet not being bound to pay the obligations?

Mr. REID. -

That will increase the profit of the transaction.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I am much obliged to the Attorney-General of Victoria for his interjection, because I should probably have forgotten to answer the point, and as it is so immensely in my favour, I should have regretted passing it over. My honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) holds to the view, I believe, that federation may possibly result in decreasing the value of state stock. He takes it that federation may decrease that value, because it takes from the states some of the income out of which they have been accustomed to pay their interest. Now, I do not think federation will do so. That result has not followed in other parts of the world under federation. I should be sorry if I thought it might be so, because I hold the view that the state should have the power to borrow for the purpose of developing their territory and resources, and if we diminish the value of the state stocks we might very seriously limit the power of the states to properly develop their territory. I do not think so; but if it did come about, if even temporarily on the formation of the Commonwealth state stocks fell 2 per cent. less than these rates here, it would add to the profit I have just mentioned a, a little over £2,000,000.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Do you call a loss to our creditors a part of the profits?

Mr. REID. -
Creditors! It is their own doing to disparage their securities.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I am going to say the next thing I wish to say, not in the heat of debate, not on the spur of the moment, but with the utmost deliberation and knowledge of what I am saying. I do, not care one bit what happens to the stock-holders through this federation scheme. No one would be more bitterly opposed to repudiation than I. But stock-holders when they buy their stock take all the chances of the market, and this federation is among the chances of the market. Just as I would not grudge to the stockholders any advantage which comes to them from a rise in prices, so I do not feel responsible to them for any disadvantage which comes to them from any fall in prices.

Mr. REID. -
Owing to their want of confidence in their own securities.

Mr. HOLDER. -
It would simply be through some loss of confidence on their part. It is something worth learning to learn that one of the great things to be thought of by the Convention is that we must protect the interest of the bond-holders. I did not know before that one of our duties is to protect most carefully the interests of the British bond-holders.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It is the duty of every debtor not to deprive himself of the means to pay his creditor.

Mr. REID. -
Rothschilds must be about somewhere.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Is that what you think federation means?

Mr. ISAACS. -
Common honesty.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Common honesty means that we should not ruin these states, and thus render them unable to pay their debts. Nothing we do looks in that direction. All we do looks in quite the other direction. I believe it will come to this in the very early days of the Federation if the Federal Treasurer is worth having: We will give to the bond-holders for any security they have to-day a very much better and more valuable security, and we will give it to them on terms advantageous to them, but still more advantageous to ourselves. If honorable members, when they go back to their respective colonies, want a good argument with which to recommend federation, here is one, and take away this one and we have no financial argument left.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No one proposes to take it away.

Mr. HOLDER. -

No one proposes to take it away.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No; it is just as possible under the one provision as under the other.

Mr. REID. -

Then you can leave the "may" in.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I have to go back to elementary finance again.

Mr. FRASER. -

Hammer it in.

Mr. HOLDER. -

It does seem necessary in some cases to repeat over and over again before you can get the truth in, but I am going to repeat it once more, in the hope that it will be understood. It is suggested that all these advantages of which I spoke may be gained if we give a guarantee in the Constitution, by waiting till the bonds fall due. Let us look at this position. It is suggested by my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin)-

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I did not suggest that.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I cannot see what else was in the interjection. However, I will answer what I thought was in the interjection, and what I know is the idea prevailing in some cases. The idea prevailing in some minds is that we can secure all we ought to secure, whether we give the Commonwealth guarantee now or not, by simply waiting till the stocks fall in. What does that mean? Some of the stocks will be falling in shortly.

Mr. FRASER. -
£18,000,000 of Victoria stocks will fall in in ten years.

Mr. HOLDER. -

£18,000,000 of Victorian stocks out of £140,000,000 will fall in in ten years. All these stocks will not fall in for many years, and if we are to wait calmly on our oars till those stocks fall in, it means that this sum of £179,000 a year, which we may save in the way of interest, is not to be saved till years have passed, and as they have passed have gradually enabled us to retrieve the initial error we made in giving bond-holders for nothing a very valuable security. If it is proposed by any one inside or outside of this Convention to give this guarantee now, even to give it by implication in such a way as to raise the market value of the stocks, and then because we had made a blunder, wait twenty, thirty, or perhaps more years till we can retrieve that error, surely that is not a position which will be taken up by men with their eyes open. It might be taken up by us if we were not awake to the facts of the case. Here is an opportunity, without injuring our right to reconvert these stocks, as, I said, may fall in 30 or 40 years hence; here is an opportunity right away, if we give the Federal Parliament large enough powers, to secure an annual gain of £179,000, or, if it pleases to take it in cash, a gain of over £3,585,000. I do hope that the committee will not insist on the word "shall" remaining in any part of the clause, but, while it gives full and ample power to the Federal Government to convert, in the interests of the colonies, the stock as it may become payable, it will not compel them to do so at the outset.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The word "shall" does not compel them to do it at the outset

Mr. HOLDER. -

It looks like it I it is meant to make people believe it does.

Mr. REID. -

It is equivalent to an endorsement on the bond.

Mr. HOLDER. -

If anybody ought to insist on avoiding any shadow of doubt on the possibility of this scheme, it is the small states. It does not matter much to New South Wales that she would save £57,000 a year she can do without it. It does not matter supremely to Victoria that

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We do not care for £24,000.

Mr. HOLDER. -

If £24,000 is nothing to Western Australia, I regret the time we spent a few days ago in trying to make special terms for that colony; but if it is nothing to her I am quite sure that there are some sources of expenditure to which £24,000 can be fairly applied greatly to the advantage of the Commonwealth. However, I will conclude by repeating the hope that we will take care to guard against all possible breath of doubt on the possibility of such a scheme as this, and to leave the Federal Treasurer's hands entirely untrammelled, so that he may do whatever at the time may seem best. It may seem best to him to follow the suggestion of Mr. Glynn; it may seem best to him to follow the suggestion of Tasmania; but do not let us tie him down to either or both of the suggestions or to any scheme. Let us give him a free hand, and, doubtless, he will use it well.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I wish to say a few words in reply to the very impressive address of my honorable friend (Mr. Holder). The word "shall" does not require that any particular scheme of taking over these debts shall be adopted. The word "shall" does not imply that they shall be taken over at once, or at any price, or at any cost. The word "shall" simply imposes an obligation upon the Federal Treasurer to give effect to this provision at the earliest date at which it will be profitable to the Commonwealth, and a desirable thing to do. The only difference between "shall" and "may" is that while the word "may" carries with it the possible implication that the Commonwealth may take an entirely independent stand, and disregard state loans altogether, the word "shall" is intended to carry with it the implication that under proper business conditions, and in a proper business way, the best means of federalizing the debts shall be adopted, in order to gain the advantages which Mr. Holder has dwelt upon to-day, and which, however speculative, those of us who vote for the word are no more blind to than he is himself.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

It is astonishing how these legal disquisitions on the meaning of "shall" and "may" become inapplicable when applied to financial transactions. If an Act of the Imperial Parliament were passed prescribing that the Rothschilds shall take over the debts of a South American republic, and shall pay the interest every year, I think the legal "shall" and "may" argument would disappear, and the bond-holder would be delighted to find himself in possession of a South American bond for which he would get interest at Rothschilds every half-year; and with a provision that the debt shall be taken over by Rothschilds for all time, and the interest paid for all time by the Rothschilds.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The honorable member mistakes-

Mr. REID. -

Will the honorable member allow me to finish what I am about to say, and then perhaps an interruption will be unnecessary?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I hope so.

Mr. REID. -

The mere appearance in this Constitution of the word "shalt" according to the honorable member's meaning of the word "may," shows the absolute want of a necessity to put it in. If you may do a thing it gives you the absolute power of converting it into shall whenever you like, according to the wisdom of the existing situation, and the Federal Treasurer, who can read the shall into may, can deal with the bond-holders; but the Commonwealth

Treasurer who has branded on him the word "shall" cannot, because there is an absolute necessity to do it, and if there is not an absolute necessity to do it why put in the word? Is it not an attempt to make it an absolute necessity, and where is the guarantee to the states if it only means "may"?

What was the object of my right honorable friend's proposal? It was to guarantee on the establishment of the Commonwealth that the interest on the debts shall be paid at once. The right honorable gentleman does not deceive himself with the legal disquisitions of my learned friend. He does not mean what my learned friend has said. He means it as a genuine business transaction to relieve the states of a certain given sum for interest on a certain given event happening. Therefore, since "may" has all the force of "shall," in the wisdom of the Commonwealth, the Commonwealth, retaining the discretion, can negotiate with the bond-holders, but if it has no discretion it cannot, I cannot understand what all this discussion is about. May I mention another strong point? We know that in the money market of the world all sorts of vicissitudes take place. Clouds come over the financial sky, and sometimes state bonds go down with a run, as our bonds went down in 1893. I suppose our bonds now are worth £20 or £15 in every £100 more this year than they were worth in 1893. Under the word "shall," if any such disturbance in the London market came about, we could get no benefit from it, because the bond-holders of the states would be protected by the "shall" in the Constitution Bill, and the duty of paying the interest which the Commonwealth had taken over-because if he gets his interest every half-year, and there is a liability behind it to pay the principal when it is due, what more does a bond-holder want? The Commonwealth under some cataclysm in the money market may step in and save an enormous sum on the colonial debts by substituting the Commonwealth security.

Mr. FRASER. -
Our 3½ per cents. went down to £82 at a very critical time, and our 4 per cents. went down to below par.

Mr. REID. -

That is so, and now 4 per cents. are about £118, I think. These vicissitudes in finance show what a magnificent opportunity the Federal Treasurer may have.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

If he had the cash to do it with.

Mr. REID. -

Does my honorable friend mean that the Commonwealth will not be a stronger body financially in credit than a state?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Perhaps comparatively.

Mr. REID. -

If the states are as strong as the Commonwealth will be, what is all this fuss about these strong solvent states? What does all this fuss and fear about insolvency and embarrassment mean?

Mr. ISAACS. -

If you leave us our revenue we are perfectly satisfied with our position.

Mr. REID. -

Does not the honorable gentleman see that under the word "may" the Federal Treasurer can do all he wants to do? I frankly say that I am absolutely opposed to the word "may," and that I consider the consent of the states should be necessary; but as I can see there is a large majority against me on that point, I wish to go for the next best thing, from my point of view. The next best thing from my point of view is that if it is to be handed over to the Commonwealth it should be handed over so that the Commonwealth can do its best for the states and the Commonwealth, whereas if you hand it over under the "shall" it amounts to a financial indorsement of the securities of the states, and all the possible gains of the conversion disappear. I do not wish to be understood by Sir Philip Fysh as saying that there can be no operation of that sort possible. I think if you are simply exchanging one state bond for practically another, the advantages would be so small that, probably, you had better wait till the bonds run out. But if you can exchange, as we believe we would, a stronger security, then the chances of a conversion become infinitely greater. For instance, if we could get a British guarantee behind our state loans, we could go into the market to-morrow and save millions. So, in a much smaller degree, we could gain a great advantage by getting the Commonwealth endorsement and letting the endorsement be in the hands of the Treasurer, so that he could put it on when it was an advantage to the states and the Commonwealth to put it on. The use of the word "may" will leave that position, while the use of the word "shall" will take all the advantage of that position away. Let me point out to those who say that the security of the Commonwealth would not be much better than the security of the states that they destroy their own argument, on the faith of which they asked this to be done. Because they say the Commonwealth is taking over the Customs revenue, and the Customs revenue being taken over, the financial position of the states becomes much weaker.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Because the states do not know what their revenue will be.

Mr. REID. -
But does not the right honorable member see that, while he is aiming at a thing which he has consistently aimed at all through the Convention, he is in this case aiming at it by means of a circuitous process, which is disastrous to the Commonwealth in the case of conversion or possible conversion of the public debts? The right honorable member's object is one which we cannot quarrel with, because he has put it fairly and clearly from the first; but the right honorable member is not on the same ground when he wishes to secure his object in this way. It is the wrong place in which to secure his object.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Will you help me to secure it in another place?

Mr. REID. -
The right honorable member must not expect me to give up my convictions in order to help him against my judgment. I would like here to draw attention to a remark made by Mr. Higgins, which I emphatically repudiate. I do not mind what some of the Melbourne papers may say of me—it does not matter a straw to me; but I do object to a member of the Convention stating that any course of mine in this matter is influenced by a coming election.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I did not mean to say that.

Mr. REID. -
I am very glad to hear the honorable member's statement, because I wish to point out that my attitude on this question is exactly the same as it was in Adelaide. My honorable friends know that my ground on this matter, as on nearly every matter, is precisely the ground that I fought for in Adelaide when we were not thinking of elections.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Did not you say the other day that no profit was to be made by conversion?

Mr. REID. -

By conversion of a state's loan, unless you offer better security—certainly.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

The better security was an admitted fact.

Mr. REID. -

I think my honorable friend will see that it is not necessary to argue that if you offer a better security to a man you have, at any rate, a chance of making a better deal.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Yet you said there was no such chance.

Mr. REID. -

Only with reference to the ordinary conversions which states have attempted. I have mentioned the case of New South Wales. We had an inquiry made in London from the best financial authorities, and we found that in the case of our securities we could not convert them to any decided advantage. But the case is essentially different if the whole strength of the colonies is united in a Federation. The situation becomes different; the security becomes stronger, and that makes all the difference. I only add these words to what has been said by Mr. Holder, because I wish to assure the Convention that what I am saying now is simply the result of all my inquiries before the Convention met at Adelaide, and I am now taking up exactly the same position as I did then.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I understand from Mr. Deakin, who is not here just now, that he looks upon the word "shall" as directory, and not mandatory, and that the effect will be - "You way do it, and you ought to do it; we give you our advice, we think you ought to do it, but you may please yourself." Now, I don't think it is well to put words in the Constitution which will be differently interpreted by different people. Lawyers may say that under certain circumstances "shall" and "may" have identically, or almost identically, the same meaning; but this Constitution is not to be adopted merely by the legal profession. It is to be adopted by the great public of Australia - and will every member of this Convention pledge himself to tell his colony that it makes no difference whether you say "shall" or "may"? Will not the effect be, if you substitute "shall" for "may," that there will be a certainty of difference, or, at any rate, a doubt on the subject sufficiently strong to make ever elector whose views are against the compulsory taking over of debts the opponent of federation?
Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
How many of them are there?

Mr. REID. -
A great many in some parts of Australia.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
That is a matter as to which Mr. Reid will say one thing and Sir Edward Braddon will say another.

Mr. REID. -
I can speak better for my own colony than he can, at all events.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
And, as I was about to say, each will, probably be absolutely accurate within the limits of his own experience. This discussion has taken a long while. We have not had any new argument that was not used at an earlier stage of the Convention. It appears to me that many think that a constant repetition of identically the same arguments will in time alter the opinions of those whose opinions are already formed. I can only say, for my own part, that I came to the Convention at its first meeting with a strong disposition to support the compulsory taking over of all the debts. As the matter developed and was discussed—not here, because I cannot say that any fresh light has dawned upon me here—I saw all the difficulties which have been pointed out with infinite repetition here, and I saw clearly that the result would be no benefit at all to the Commonwealth or to any state, but a benefit to persons whom we had no disposition to unnecessarily assist. Having come to that conclusion, I thought that if any conversion were to be done in respect to these loans, it should be done by the state, and could not be done very well by the Commonwealth. If the Commonwealth—no, I won't repeat the argument; it has been repeated so often that I think it is almost time we realized that we have exhausted the subject, and that the time has come for taking a vote on it, yes or no, and getting on to some other business. For my own part, the conclusion to which I was forced, and which no argument has shaken me in, is that it will be no benefit, either to the Commonwealth or a state, but a great advantage to other people, if this taking over of debts were made compulsory, and that conviction remains unshaken. I think the clause is well considered—certainly it was carefully considered. The conclusion embodied in that clause was arrived at after an immensity of argument, though no light has been thrown upon it in this discussion. So, without going over that ground of argument again, I shall simply content myself by saying, with reference to the argument of Mr. Deakin, that it would be a pity to insert a word which lawyers may construe one way and the general public another, and that generally the clause, as it stands at present, is substantially that which should be adopted.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

I think the honorable gentleman (Sir John Downer) voted for the word "shall" being inserted.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

But now he appears to have come to a different conclusion.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Not at all.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Then I would like to know what he meant by voting recently for the word "shall"? It appears to me that "shall" is better than "may," and I quite agree with the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) that the use of this word does not insist on the Federal Government proceeding at once or at any particular period to take over the whole of the debts. I would like to draw the attention of honorable members to the position of the finances of the several colonies.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

"Shall" and "may" in the amendment meant the same thing.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

"Shall," it appears to me, has a different meaning from "may." "May" is always understood by lawyers as being indefinite, and in regard to state finance it is surely better to have words that are explicit, clear, and cannot be misconstrued. Now, sir, according to the return which has been submitted to us, the total debts of the several colonies amount to something like £170,000,000 altogether. But we find this, that between the present date and 1900, Victoria has to borrow a considerable sum of money. This return, I may mention, was made up in 1895, and therefore I presume the figures are not exactly what they are at the present time. Between 1895 and 1900, Victoria would have to raise £3,517,722; New South Wales, £5,036,350; South Australia, £1,930,000; Western Australia, £14,435; and Tasmania. £92,770; making a total of £10,591,277. Between 1901 and 1905—that is, during the next seven years—the sum of £11,970,050 has to be raised, making over £22,000,000 between the present time and 1905. Now, how is that money to be dealt with? Will it not be for the benefit of the states as well as the Federation that the debentures to replace those moneys should be guaranteed by the Federal Government instead of by the local Governments? In the first clause of this Bill it is stated that we are to be a community bound together for ever and ever-amem. That appears in the first clause. Now, if we are to be so bound what does it mean? Does it not mean that one and the other shall help and assist each other, supposition there may be a deficiency at any particular moment? But where is the probability of a deficiency arising? New South Wales takes upon itself to say this: Unless you do exactly as we wish you to do we shall pack up and be off; we won't join the Federation. New South Wales took the same course with respect to the Federal Council, and has continued to take it up to the present day, although the Federal Council Bill, when before the British Parliament, was actually altered in order to suit the views of Sir Henry Parkes, and to induce New South Wales to come into that Union. If she had done so, and we had gone on with the Federal Council, we should have gradually worked into the position which we are now trying to achieve, but which, as things are, we are not very likely to reach. In fact, I think we are further off from federation at this moment than we were in 1891. It is to be hoped that this system of threatening one another is not to be continued. Sir, I cannot understand the arguments which Mr. Holder used with respect to the position the colonies would be placed in by federalizing the debts. He puts it in this light, that the value of the debentures would be so much raised; but would not the same argument apply to paying off the debts? I am not alluding to conversion at all. I am alluding now simply to the consolidation of the debts. As we required to borrow to pay off the debentures that from time to time became due, instead of getting the loans at a discount, we should get them at a premium, and as the value of the federal bonds rose in the market, so would the value of the particular borrowings rise in the same proportion. There are two classes of investors in the market. One is the jobber, and the other is the person who simply desires to make a profitable investment. The longer the term the better they like it. All such persons as trustees go in for investment, and do not care about buying and selling. The jobber, however, wishes to buy and sell. What does it matter to the colony if the value of the bonds go up 50 per cent.? The colony only pays £100 per £100, and if it gets a premium so much the better for the community at large. I cannot understand the position that is taken up by the Hon. Mr. Holder. He has certainly gone much more elaborately into figures than I have done. I am simply stating my view of the matter. Even supposing that the debentures fell in value, what effect would that have? The Federal Parliament would simply make a saving. Some honorable members appear to imagine that the colony they represent is to be called upon to pay for the other colonies, but I think that those other colonies would repudiate any such idea. New South Wales happens at this moment to be in a flourishing condition, but are not the other colonies also in the same position? It is said that the population of Victoria is not increasing, but the men who have left Victoria have gone to Western Australia, and Western Australia is making good use of them. The community at large gets the benefit of their labour. Why should we not take the position put by Mr. Higgins, and, assuming the lowest amount of debt of any of the colonies, consolidate on that principle? The state Treasurers would then know exactly what they would have to do. Under the Bill as it stands they would not know what their position would be until the Federal Parliament had agreed to a Tariff, determined upon its expenditure, and made up an account. We could get rid of these difficulties in the manner that has been proposed, and the state Treasurers could then impose whatever taxation was necessary to meet their requirements. It is absurd to talk about insolvency. The word "insolvency" has come into our discussions from New South Wales, but I do not think any honorable member would use the expression with regard to his own colony. Mr. Coghlan's statistics were issued by the Government of New South Wales, and I think we have a right to assume that the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales is more or less responsible for them. Those statistics convey some very wrong impressions as regards the condition of affairs. We find that Tasmania has, during the years 1895 and 1896, increased the return from her revenue by some £70,000, and it appears that for 1897 the improvement will be even greater. There is, therefore, no doubt about that colony, particularly when we consider the present position of her mines. It appears to me that we cannot do better than adhere to the former amendment substituting the word "shall" for "may." It is an extraordinary thing that, after we have had a division and agreed to an amendment by a majority of nearly twenty, we should be asked to retract simply because of some statements that are made by the representatives of New South Wales. I hope that honorable members will give an independent vote on this subject, and re-affirm their former decision.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

As a layman, I must admit that I have been surprised to find that some lawyers seem to think that the words "shall" and "may" have a somewhat similar significance. It seems to me that "may" is a better word for our purposes, because it leaves a discretion to the Federal Treasurer, whereas "shall" would be mandatory.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is not the Federal Treasurer, but the Federal Parliament.

Mr. WALKER. -
It is within my own recollection that British 3 per cent. consols have been as low as £89. To day the 23/4 per cent. consol-a stand at £112 10s. That shows how important it is that the Treasurer of the Commonwealth should be at liberty to choose his own time for a large financial operation of this kind. I cannot follow the remarks of those who oppose the Hon. Mr. Holder's views. He has put his views in a very succinct and clear manner, and I indorse everything he has said. It would be a great mistake to insert the word "shall," as it would at once raise the market value of all the state stocks. Some people think that that would be so much the better. So it would for the bond-holders, but I fail to see that it would be better for the Federal Parliament, whose duty it would be to convert with the greatest advantage to the community. I do not wish to take up more time, but I could not refrain from offering these few remarks.

Question-That after the word "Parliament" in clause 98 the words "shall take over" be inserted-put.

Question so resolved in the negative.
The CHAIRMAN. -
Inasmuch as the last vote decided the questions raised by the amendments suggested by the Western Australian Legislature, I shall not put those amendments.
Clause 98 was then agreed to.
The CHAIRMAN. -
There are some new clauses proposed by Tasmania, but they seem to me to have been already decided. I shall therefore not put them, with the exception of one which has not been the subject of discussion.
Amendment suggested by the Parliament of Tasmania-
That the following new clause be inserted after clause 93:-
93A. The Commonwealth may from time to time lend to any state, on such terms and conditions as the Parliament may prescribe, any sum or sums of money borrowed on the public credit of the Commonwealth.
The amendment was negatived.
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
Honorable members will see, by referring to page 5 of the list of amendments, that I originally proposed to insert the following provision in the Bill:-
A petition of right may, in such manner as Parliament may prescribe, be presented and maintained by a subject against the Crown in all cases in which were the claim against a subject damages might be recovered or relief granted. The leader of the Convention is willing to accept the spirit of that proposition, but he has asked me to change the wording of the amendment. He has given notice of a new clause, which is marked 73A, and I now beg to move-
That the following new clause stand part of the Bill:-
73A. Proceedings may be taken against the Commonwealth or a state in all cases, within the limits of the judicial power, in which a claim against a subject might be maintained.
I might mention, for the information of the non-legal members of the Convention, what the general law is as regards remedies against the Crown. There is a right of action against the Crown upon a petition of right presented by a subject, in all cases where there has been a breach of contract by the Crown, or where moneys, and, I believe, latterly, lands which belong to a subject have got into the possession of the Crown. But there is no claim by way of petition of right for damages for a tort or injury not arising out of contract.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
"The Queen can do no wrong."

Mr. GLYNN. -
Yes, upon the principle that the Queen can do no wrong; and, inasmuch as she can do no wrong herself, she cannot appoint an agent to do wrong.
The position is very clearly laid down in the case of Feather v. The Queen.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
There is an action against an agent of the Queen, who professes to act with her authority.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Yes. You cannot sue the Queen, but you can sue her agent, because it is assumed that if he has done wrong he has acted outside the scope of his authority. But there is no right of action against the Crown for what is technically known as a tort.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
There is no right of action in England.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I am now speaking of the English law. It has been somewhat modified in the Straits Settlements, and in one or two other parts of the empire, I believe, by giving a right of action for tort in certain cases, but I do not think that this extended right of action has ever been given in any of the colonies. Conditions justifying actions for damages against the Crown, however, are almost as frequent as actions for breach of contract. In Canada a man sued the Crown for damages received in connexion with a railway accident, but he was debarred of remedy there, although he suffered serious injury, because of some defect in the railway laws not conceding this right. The position has been laid down in regard to the Queen in the case I have already mentioned, that-

Where the land, or goods, or money, of a subject have found their way into the possession of the Crown, and the purpose of the petition is to obtain restitution, or if restitution cannot be obtained, compensation in money; or when a claim arises out of a contract, as for goods supplied to the Crown or to the public service-

the Crown is bound to refer a petition of right to the courts for decision, because it is provided by Magna Charta that justice cannot be denied, sold, or delayed. By this action, similar rights of action are given to the subject against the Crown in cases in which the subject can maintain a claim against another subject. The proposed new clause extends this right of the subject against the Crown by enabling a state or citizen to sue the Commonwealth or a state, not only for breaches of contract, but also for torts. I fail to see why, under our modern system, this right of action against the Crown should not be given in cases of tort. The matter is referred to in Burgess's Political Science and Constitutional Law. In that work the writer, in speaking about the American Constitution, states that the eleventh amendment, which in its terms is restrictive, is merely a declaration of the sovereignty of the states as against citizens of other states; and he says that whenever the courts have an opportunity of putting in as defendant the agent they do so, because it is considered that this abnegation of a remedy is impolitic. Not only does my proposal give a slight extension in the region of torts to the remedy of the subject against the Crown, but I believe that it is absolutely necessary to preserve the, existing remedy. It is exceedingly questionable whether, under clause 73 of the Bill, we have not taken away the remedy now given by petition of right against the Crown. It may be said that this matter might be left to the Federal Parliament, but the powers of Parliament to, give a remedy subject to the consent of the Crown for tort against the Crown are limited by the delegation. The Federal Parliament, as the Bill stands at present, could not give a right of action against the Crown, assuming, of course, that the Crown in its prerogative capacity consented. Clause 73 deals merely with procedure; it does not extend the existing law. I mention this matter because it has been said by some honorable members that this provision should not be put into the Constitution, and that an Act of Parliament could deal with the extension; but I do not think that it could. If honorable members look at sub-sections (6) and (7) of clause 73 they will see that they contain provisions for the extension of the judicial power to all cases in which a writ of mandamus or prohibition is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth, or where a matter arises between the states, but it is plain that the limitation upon procedure by prerogative or injunction against the Crown is continued. Therefore, unless this provision is inserted, the Federal Parliament will have no power to extend the right of action against the Crown by any Act. I would further add that the German Constitution, in three or four of its final clauses, practically gives the rights that I seek to give against the Crown.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Does the honorable member intend to provide that an action for assault and battery may be brought against Her Majesty?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes. Of course an action is never taken against the Queen in persona, it is always taken against an agent. Under the Railway Acts, we sue the Commissioners of Railways, because the Crown has, to some extent, given up a portion of its prerogative.

Mr. SYMON. -

The Federal Parliament could provide for this extension.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I doubt it. By clause 73 you are not extending the existing law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Why is this provision more necessary in this Constitution than in any other?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

You cannot take away the prerogative by implication, you must take it away expressly.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Of course. That is one of the objects of the amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -

If you had not some clause of this kind in the Constitution, believe that the best part of clause 73 would be nugatory.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes. That is why I moved the amendment in its original form. The honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) says it is not in any other Constitution, but he will find it in the German Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am speaking of British Constitutions, where the Royal prerogative is behind.

Mr. GLYNN. -

There is no British Constitution that we can make a comparison with. The American Constitution is a close analogue, and that Constitution continues the old English law. Although there is no Royal prerogative there is a sovereign Commonwealth and a sovereign State. The distinction is not between a monarch and a republic, but the sovereignty of the state itself. For the same reason it has been decided in America that you cannot bring an action against the Commonwealth for tort, though you may in contract. According to an Act passed in 1855, if the Court of Claims decides that a right lies, and what the remedy ought to be, an Act of Parliament is introduced to give effect to it. The German Constitution practically embodies the same procedure, and gives a right against the State.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
But the German Emperor has a "mailed fist."

Mr. GLYNN. -
I do not think that affects the judicial power of the courts within the Federation itself. I would ask honorable members to consider that if you do not put this in you have not in the Constitution such a surrender of prerogative by the Crown as would justify the Federal Parliament in passing an Act. I believe the Act would be ultra vires unless that was put in. That is why I suggested my amendment. I think Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor will support the position I am endeavouring to lay down.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I sincerely hope this new clause will not be introduced into the Constitution. Honorable members have only to read it to see what an extensive ground it covers, and what a very dangerous clause it may be to put into the Constitution. At present, as the honorable member ver points out, of course there are certain limitations in regard to proceedings against the Crown, that is, against the Government of the state, and these limitations are always dealt with when they require to be amplified or further restricted by means of legislation in the ordinary way. But this provision would insert in the Constitution a power enabling anybody to bring an action for any purpose or subject whatever against the Commonwealth or the state, unrestricted in any way or fashion.

Mr. BARTON. -
Then what is the meaning of the words "within the limits of the judicial power"?

Mr. SYMON. -
It means, as far as the Commonwealth is concerned, these subject-matters referred to in clause 73. The judicial powers of a state are absolutely unlimited.

Mr. BARTON. -
I beg pardon. The clause expressly limits that.

Mr. SYMON. -
No. This is wide enough to enable actions of all sorts and descriptions to be brought against the state without any restriction or limitation.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Does this go further than the Crown Redress Act of Tasmania?

Mr. BARTON. -
There will be practically the same results as regards the Commonwealth. Mr SYMON. - I cannot answer that question in detail, but this is putting in the Constitution what you may find to be a very serious embarrassment in relation to the conduct of business, which may involve the Commonwealth or state in litigation. After all, it is a very large order to put in the Constitution. We may be all agreed that there ought to be great facilities for proceeding against the Crown; that the prerogative ought not to be invoked in many cases as a defence in which it could be invoked. But that is a matter for legislation and procedure. I call attention to the fact that if this is procedure, as I think it is, very clearly it ought not to be in this Constitution at all. At present we know what the prerogative is. I recollect very well that in the Bill as it came from the Convention of 1891 there was a clause introduced that no proceedings could be brought against the Commonwealth or the state unless with the consent of the Commonwealth or the state. That was eliminated in the Judiciary Committee. That was confirmed at the session in Adelaide, because it was thought inadvisable to introduce what was really procedure, and that the state should declare whether the particular suit should be brought with its consent or not, or under what limitations. Therefore, this clause is just as much a matter of procedure as the clause proposed by Mr. Glynn originally, and in substitution for which he has moved this clause.

Mr. KINGSTON. - Is it any more necessary here than in a provincial Constitution?

Mr. SYMON. - Not a bit.

Mr. BARTON. - The provincial Constitutions are plenary in their powers. This is a strictly limited Constitution.

Mr. SYMON. - It is only limited in a certain way. Of course, I attach much weight to Mr. Barton's view. He says that clause 73 will be entirely nugatory. I dissent from that. Clause 73 defines the limitation of the judicial power, but it is inoperative until the Commonwealth Parliament passes its Judiciary Act. If the Federal Parliament chooses to say that petitions of right shall be abolished, or that petitions of right shall extend to cases of wrong as well as to cases of ordinary contract, the Federal Parliament can do so; but if you put this in the Constitution it changes its character—if it is intended to have any effect—from a matter of procedure to a matter of absolute substance and right, and it enables, no matter what embarrassment it may cause to the Government, any person whomsoever to bring an action in respect of any matter free from all restrictions.

Mr. FRASER. - Might the safety of the Commonwealth be put in danger?
Mr. SYMON. -

It might be subjected to the very greatest embarrassment. I am strongly in favour of removing some of the restrictions that now exist. I think the Act of New South Wales with regard to proceedings against the Commonwealth is much wider than in our colony. We have enlarged the proceedings in railway matters by enabling actions to be brought against the commissioner for damages. I should like to see the other existing restrictions removed, and to see facilities given, but these can all be dealt with as they arise; but that is a very different matter from inserting in the Constitution a provision, the far-reaching consequences of which we cannot foresee.

Mr. DOBSON. -

But if the Federal Parliament takes a narrow view of the matter there will be no redress.

Mr. SYMON. -

The Federal Parliament will be just as able to take a wide view as we are. My honorable friend, who is a great advocate of strengthening the Royal prerogative, should remember that this is interfering with it, when we are unable to deal with it in detail, and unable to specify the particular consequences that will flow from the insertion of this clause. This is a very wide and large question indeed. It is one that, I venture to say, it is impossible to deal with satisfactorily now, because each question in respect to the removal of restrictions must, I venture to think be dealt with on its own merits, and in relation to the concession that ought to be made in that particular case. Mr Reid asks if the clause were omitted, would the Federal Parliament not have power to deal with the whole subject? Mr. Barton thinks not, but I venture to think, with great diffidence, that it will.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is not this more than mere procedure? I am with you to a large extent, but if you give the subject the right to sue in an action at law, which he had not power to do before, is not that a matter of substantial right?

Mr. REID. -

Might it not be a power incidental to the other powers to make this provision.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes. I want to point out this to Mr. Higgins. In a certain sense of course this is a matter of substance. It is a matter of substance if you insert in the Constitution the absolute right of anybody to bring an action against the Crown, free from all possible restrictions, but it is procedure, and can be affected by procedure through the instrumentality of an Act of the Federal Parliament.
Mr. REID. -
It must be a matter affecting the prerogative.

Mr. SYMON. -
Specially mentioned in the Act. I do not say we might not do it in this Act. What I say is this: It is a matter affecting the prerogative. We are still under the Crown. When this union is consummated every suit brought, though nominally against the Commonwealth or state, is against the Crown. It is competent for the Federal Parliament, with the assent of Her Majesty, to declare that a petition of right shall lie for wrong as well as contract.

Mr. FRASER. -
Then we need not put it in this Act.

Mr. SYMON. -
Yes; but if we do put it in this Act, I warn honorable members of the impossibility of determining the consequences. It may be infinitely better for us to leave it to the Federal Parliament. Is it competent for the Federal Parliament to deal with it? Mr. Barton thinks not; I think it is. It is just as competent for the Federal Legislature, of which the Queen is a part, to deal with it, as it is for us to deal with it in this Constitution, which is to be enacted by the Imperial Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN. -
The Federal Parliament can affect the prerogative, but only within the limits prescribed by this Act.

Mr. SYMON. -
This is entirely a matter of prerogative.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Yes.

Mr. SYMON. -
Very well. I ask where is there anything in this Constitution which enlarges or restricts the prerogative of the Crown?

Mr. GLYNN. -
Clause 2 of the Act. You have a limitation there.

Mr. SYMON. -
The honorable member is playing a kind of practical joke upon me when he says that limits the prerogative of the Crown.

Mr. GLYNN. -
It takes away the right of appeal.

Mr. SYMON. -
That is not the point we are discussing. Clause 2 says that the Act shall bind the Crown. Of course it does; but where is there a word in the Act that says that a British subject, a citizen, shall be unable to bring any action against the Crown that he is entitled to bring now?

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is not the point.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is the point. Unless there is some limitation upon that right of a citizen of Australia, it is entirely at large; it is as extensive as it was before. Therefore, it is a matter which can be regulated by the Federal Parliament just as effectually as by any local Parliament. At any rate, that is my point. I warn honorable members that it is a very serious thing to put in a provision of this kind, sweeping away this prerogative entirely in matters in which it may be most important to preserve it, subject to some limitations.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. SYMON. -

I do not intend to add much to what I have already said. Before adding anything, I should like to say that I rather misunderstood Mr. Glynn's interjection referring to clause 2. I understood him to mean that clause 2 practically took away the right of a citizen to sue the Crown, whereas what he meant, as I understand it, was that the existence of clause 2, of course, places under the control of this Constitution, when finally passed into law, and having Her Majesty's assent, the prerogative in respect of such matters as are effectively dealt with there. But I would like to point out to my honorable friend that whilst clause 2 undoubtedly places these restrictions on the prerogative, a much wider scope has been given to proceedings against the Crown in all these colonies and in England than at one time existed. At one time it was supposed that no proceeding could be taken against the Crown unless for money claimed. Then it was enlarged to meeting claims against the Crown, which was proceeded against under petition of right, in respect of damages for breach of contract. And then that has been still further extended, permitting proceedings to lie against the Crown in respect of inequity-claims in respect of injunction, or for specific performance. And in Australia it is necessary there should be a further extension, as has been the case in our own colony, because of the circumstance that the state is practically a common carrier in running the railways. Therefore, provision ought to be made to facilitate actions against the Crown in respect of breaches of contract or of damages resulting from the state carrying on that particular business. To that extent, of course, there has been a very great widening of the scope for proceedings against the Crown, but this new amendment, if it is to give effect to the intentions which Mr. Glynn has indicated, would practically have the effect, as a matter of principle, of repealing the maxim that "The Queen can do no wrong," because it would enable all actions which might be maintained against a private citizen—that is, according to my honorable friend's view—to be maintained free of all restrictions against the Crown. Now, I do not think that that is the scope that the leader of the Convention intended to give it. My honorable friend (Mr. Barton) confines it undoubtedly to the strict limits

Quite so.

Mr. SYMON. -

And if that is the limitation, which I can appreciate, I ask my honorable friend to consider whether it is not merely procedure. If the amendment were intended to have the effect which I think Mr. Glynn was under the impression it would have, then undoubtedly it deals with the matter of principle. It extends to the principle that "The Queen can do no wrong." If, on the other hand, it is limited to the provisions of clause 73, which prescribes the scope of the judicial power, then it is procedure, and procedure pure and simple. We must have a Judiciary Act passed immediately after this Constitution comes into operation, and the Federal Parliament meets, or the whole of the Federal Government, so far as the administration of justice is concerned, would be at a perfect stand-still. Still, this mode of proceeding against the Crown, which is the Commonwealth in this case, would have to be prescribed under that Act; and so far as it affected the prerogative it would require to be specifically mentioned, and the Royal assent would be necessary to render the prerogative effective. Therefore it would be infinitely better to leave this matter to the Federal Parliament to deal with in the Judiciary Act, which will embrace everything that is essential to give effect to the judicial clauses of this Act, and to bring them into operation. Then, I think myself, some confusion may arise in consequence of the reference to the state in the words "Proceedings to be taken against the Commonwealth or a state in all cases within the limits of the judicial power." Now, it does not appear to me that we ought to interfere in any way with the functions of a state to regulate the proceedings which it, as a quasi-independent political entity, may prescribe for the regulation of its own legal proceedings. I think that, in any case, reference to the state ought to be removed from this provision; but my objection goes further and deeper, and seeks to prevent the insertion, first of all, of what seems to me to be an unnecessary provision, one which may have consequences that we can hardly foresee, and one which could be effectually dealt with in the procedure enactment of the Federal Parliament, giving all the necessary elements, and providing all the necessary conditions, under which the judicial power is to be exercised. But if Mr. Barton's view is correct, at any rate, it is doubtful whether the Federal Parliament will have the power to go to the length, if it desired, of such an amendment as this. Then the proper way would be to give it the power to say that the Federal Parliament shall have the power of legislating with regard to the proceedings to be taken against the Commonwealth or the state in all cases there.

We come a good deal closer together there.

Mr. SYMON. -
My honorable friend will quite understand that, although I do not entertain the doubt he has on the subject—in fact, I have no doubt whatever that the Federal Parliament have ample power to do this, and I rather deprecate inserting a matter of this kind in the Constitution, which, as I think, is unnecessary, and which must produce embarrassment—but if my honorable friend feels, at any rate, it is doubtful whether the power would exist in the Federal Parliament, then, I think, the proper way to accomplish it would be, not by direct act of legislation in the Constitution, which could not be altered except under the clause for the amendment of the Constitution, and which would enable any disagreeable or troublesome person to harass not only the Commonwealth but a state in any way he pretty well pleased. I have nothing to do with the government of the country, and I am not in Parliament, but if I were either in the one or the other, I should strongly resist any provision of this kind, much as I should wish to see some further enlargement of the powers of the citizen to sue the Crown. And, although we use this expression—suing the Commonwealth and suing the state—we have made no alteration in the existing constitutional system, which is that it is the Crown we are dealing with, and, therefore, either you are seeking to introduce a mere matter of procedure in relation to actions against the Crown or else you are repealing a principle which ought not to be repealed, except in relation to particular instances and specific cases, which should be dealt with prudently and with care.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
This interferes with the state legislation.

Mr. SYMON. -
I have already pointed out why this does not interfere with the independent powers of the states relating to these proceedings.

Mr. GLYNN. -
There would have to be an Act of Parliament to carry out clause 73.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
You must give a right for the Commonwealth to proceed against a state as well as for the state to proceed against the Commonwealth.

Mr. SYMON. -
Is not that power procedure as clearly as anything can possibly be?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
No, there is no cause of action now.

Mr. SYMON. -
There is a judicial power.

Mr. BARTON. -
That gives power to the court.

Mr. SYMON. -
The right of action arises under that judicial power. How you are to maintain that right of action is, however, procedure. There might be a right of action by the state against the Commonwealth, but that is an action by the Crown against the Crown. It is not here as in America, where the state of Georgia can proceed against the state of Massachusetts, and each state sues in its own name. That state of things cannot exist here, because these colonies are to form a union "under the Crown." Therefore, if one state sues another state, it will be a case of the Queen suing the Queen.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Is there not all the more need for a provision that the Crown may sue the Crown?

Mr. SYMON. -
That is not what you are doing under this amendment.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That the Crown represented in the Commonwealth may sue the Crown represented in the state?

Mr. SYMON. -
If a state sues a state now, it is the Crown suing the Crown. Necessarily there would have to be some provision to regulate that, but it is all a matter of procedure, and would be dealt with by the Judicature Act. If you want to provide for every possible circumstance in which difficulties of procedure may arise you would fill this Constitution with them. The danger of this clause, I again point out, is that it comes uncommonly near conferring an absolute right under colour of regulating procedure.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Why shouldn't it?

Mr. SYMON. -

I say that it should not. It would be flying in the face of all constitutional principle and of the right of the states to regulate their own procedure to put anything of the kind in this Constitution. If the Convention is prepared to say that a man may sue the state, it may be for assault and battery, arising perhaps out of some question mentioned in clause 73, all I can say is-let the Convention do it.

Mr. DOBSON. -

How could a Commonwealth official commit an assault within the scope of his authority!

Mr. SYMON. -

That is a matter which the High Court would decide, and decide most effectually, and my honorable friend would be perfectly satisfied with the decision of the High Court.

Mr. GLYNN. -

There would be no remedy if this were not put in.

Mr. SYMON. -

There would be no remedy if it were put in, because no one is liable for the unlawful acts of his own servant.

Mr. DOBSON. -

No one could hold the Crown liable because a Crown officer did some act quite outside his functions.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

If the Crown were so liable there might be an action against the Western Australian Government in regard to the case in which the Attorney-General of that colony was assaulted.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, we might have a case of the Western Australian Attorney-General suing Sir John Forrest's Government in connexion with the assault mentioned by Mr. Douglas.

Mr. BARTON. -

He would not get that right under clause 73.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am aware of that. I am afraid that we are going beyond the matter of procedure, which Mr. Glynn desires and Mr. Barton does not. Mr. Glynn argues the question as though, in reference to the case of the Queen against Feather, this would enable actions of tort to be brought against the Crown. Mr. Barton does not wish that. He wishes the matter to be kept strictly within the limits of the judicial power.

Mr. BARTON. -

I wish either to confer through the Constitution or through power under legislation, the right upon the subject to bring actions in all cases which are set forth in clause 73, because I think those rights should be conferred.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is what I understand my honorable friend directed his attention to; and if the effect of this amendment were simply to empower the Parliament to deal with this subject, there would be comparatively little objection to it. But if it is introduced into this Constitution in this shape, it is necessarily dangerous, much too wide for the purpose intended, and of course-if it is wrong-and I venture to think it will be found to be wrong-it will be irremediable without an amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. BARTON. -

Would this satisfy my honorable and learned friend?-

The Parliament may make laws conferring the right to proceed against the Commonwealth or a state within the limits of the judicial power.

That confers rights.

Mr. SYMON. -

I think I may say from hearing that read that it obviates the objection I have to a large extent, although it does not seem to me to be necessary that we should introduce it into the Constitution. However, that is not a matter of very great consequence.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I have always on this subject held that there is no earthly reason why the Crown should not be sued, wherever the subject may be. I have not taken this view because I hold what are considered generally to be too pronouncedly liberal views, but simply for the reason that there is no earthly reason that I can see why Government officials should be able to do wrong and a private person have no rights against him.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Do you think that "The Queen can do wrong"?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not want to have a mere verbal discussion. I think the Queen's officers can do wrong.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

And that you should be able to sue the Queen's officers?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

We have decided, with the consent of Her Majesty herself, that the Queen can do wrong. Let me take, first of all, the amendment which Mr. Barton has suggested to Mr. Symon. Suppose there is a power given to legislate. There has to be an interval between the confering of the power and the exercising of it. Under the existing laws of all the colonies the Crown is liable in respect to certain wrongs. The s not hold in England, and as the result-in consequence of there being no remedy for accidents caused through negligence and other reasons-all the Legislatures of all the colonies have passed legislation by which they provide, not in words but in substance, that the Crown can be sued. Therefore, to raise the question now about wishing to interfere with the legal and constitutional maxim that "The Queen can do no wrong" would, I say, mean interfering with the rights of citizens in a number of cases already.

That maxim is practically done away with in respect to actions against the Crown in New South Wales.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I understand that the maxim that "The Queen can do no wrong" is practically abolished in New South Wales, where actions can be brought in tort or contract. Therefore, so far as the mother colony is concerned, the maxim that "the Crown can do no wrong" has ceased to exist as regards actions against departments of that colony. Supposing we did not put this provision in. We should give the Commonwealth power to take over the railways on terms which might be agreed upon, but they would not take over the Acts of Parliament under which the citizen has a right to proceed against the Crown in regard to any wrong done to him by the state as owner of those railways. The Commonwealth would thus take physical possession of the railways and incur no liability.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Under an Act of Parliament, of course.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Under an Act of Parliament, but it would incur no liability until it chose to create a liability by its own legislation. We are thus handing over a number of state powers which the citizens have, and have exercised more or less to their own satisfaction, to this new body. Is it unreasonable for the subject to say-"I wish my present rights to be conserved in this handing over. I know what my state has done in the past, and what it has done satisfies me, but I do not know what the Commonwealth may do. I am handing myself over body and soul to the Commonwealth, but I do not want you to take from me those rights of action which for many years I have had and have exercised under the existing Constitution; and you are leaving me to be dependent upon the legislation of another body over which I shall have much less control than I have over my state legislation at the present time"? It appears to me to be manifestly inexpedient to leave it to the legislation of the Commonwealth. I do not care about the wording of the clause so much, but I am dealing with the substance of it. I contend that it is a right and proper provision to be embodied in this Constitution at its inception.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do not agree with you.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I can quite understand the objection of my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) who would like the maxim-"The Queen can do no wrong " to read "The King can do no wrong." He has said to me, in discussing this matter-"We might have all sorts of actions brought against us." Well, why not? Why, because you have the longer purse, and a greater power of fighting your opponent, should you be exempt from action if you do wrong as a state, when the humblest citizen is not exempt from any responsibility for any injury done by him to his fellows?

Mr. ISAACS. -
Would the honorable member mind saying how this provision would cure any injustice?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
This clause is intended-I am not sure about the wording of it myself-

Mr. ISAACS. -
I do not speak of the wording of it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
What I understand it to mean is that one of the fundamental principles of the Commonwealth will be that within the limits of the judicial power the subject shall have a right of action against the Crown. That is really what it comes to.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Not creating any right but giving a remedy.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
It is both creating a right and giving a remedy. How can you say that it is merely giving a remedy when a man who wishes to bring an action is confronted by the legal maxim-"The Queen can do no wrong."

Mr. HIGGINS. -
He has a right against an officer, but you want to say that he shall have a right against the Crown.

Mr. BARTON. -
He would have no right against an officer except in so far as the Constitution creates that right.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Let me deal with the principle and not with the wording of the clause. I say that the object of Mr Glynn in moving this amendment was to say that whenever a subject had a right of action against another citizen within the limits of the judicial power under this Constitution, he should, under the same conditions, have a right of action against the Commonwealth. That is the way I understand him, and so understanding him I entirely approve of the action he has taken. Surely the time ought to be nearly passed when the Government, on account of its long purse and great power, can set a subject at defiance when one subject cannot do the same with another?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

In the interests of the people.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

It is in the interests of the Minister who wants to get out of a liability for his action.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

What have these statutes been passed for in the different colonies? What was the statute of New South Wales passed for under which actions of wrong can be maintained? I understand my right honorable friend to say that a similar Act has been passed in his colony.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Twenty years ago.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

What was it passed for? It was passed because there were wrongs done by Governments for which the unhappy subject had no redress.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Simply to facilitate things.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Could not that be done by Parliament even if this were not in the Constitution?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I will come to that in a moment, if my learned friend will excuse me; I cannot deal with two things at one time. I am dealing now with a broad general principle in the way in which I wish to see it carried out, treating it as a fundamental principle which might well be inserted in the Constitution, that when we are handing over the right to take our railways, and the sole power to impose and collect customs duties, we at least might say to this new body we are creating: The humblest subject shall have as much remedy against you as if you were a subject instead of a representative of the Queen. That is a right and just thing, and it is being affirmed more strongly, year by year, in every British-speaking community. We have not advanced so far in South Australia as they have in New South Wales, but the march is strong and sure, and the time is not far distant when the petition of right and all these special provisions will be done away with, and the same remedy will be given to the subject against the Crown as the subject is liable to himself. I think we might, on the attempt to found this great Commonwealth, just advance one step, not beyond the substance of the legislation, but beyond the form of the legislation, of the different colonies, and say that there shall be embedded in the Constitution the righteous principle that the Ministers of the Crown and their officials shall be liable for any arbitrary act or wrong they may do, in the same way as any private person would be. We are not, in doing that, very much extending what has been done in New South Wales. We are extending what has been done in South Australia, although there we have passed an Act by which we make the Railways Commissioner liable for torts, and that Act was passed on account of a gross wrong which was done for which there was no remedy, and in which the Crown was about to set up the defence that the Queen can do no wrong. What is the use of our saying, can we interfere with this great constitutional principle? We have all interfered with it; some have almost, if not quite, destroyed it, and with Her Majesty's assent, or will interfere with it, and ultimately quite destroy it. Why not do it now? Has my right honorable friend any fear that he will be worried with vexatious actions?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

In your Act you limit the liability in railway actions.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I know that our Act does not go far enough. I agree with my right honorable friend there, but he does not seem to appreciate it.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I do appreciate it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

In South Australia we have remedied the disease a little, but not sufficiently. In New South Wales they have almost cured the disease, although, perhaps, even now there are some of the old clumsinesses remaining which make the procedure less convenient than it ought to be.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Make it easy to fleece people.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. - My right honorable friend thinks that Governments are so much more liable to have verdicts given against them than are private individuals.

Sir JOHN FORREST. - I do.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - I do not think anything of the kind.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. - Banks also.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - I expect the banks deserve what they get, but so far as Governments are concerned, that is by no means my experience.

Sir JOHN FORREST. - It is mine, any way.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - But if it be so, and if Governments are peculiarly victimized in legal proceedings it will be on account of that very difficulty of getting at them. Make the mode of procedure against the Government as easy as it is against anybody else, and a sense of fairness will come in which will prevent any injustice being done to the Government. But make it difficult to get at them, strew the path with thorns, and you will create a prejudice in the public mind which will probably cause the Government to be victimized in the exceptional cases.

Sir JOHN FORREST. - There is not the slightest difficulty in getting at the Government now. If you have a contract it is as easy as possible.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - Of course it is. If you commit a wrong should it not be as easy as possible?

Sir JOHN FORREST. - You cannot do it in England, any way.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - Of course they do not. We have many statutes here giving remedies to the subject which, although assented to by the Queen, are by no means in force in England. We are here establishing a Constitution truly under the Crown, but in many respects vastly different from the English Constitution. I think this principle is a very proper one. It ought to be affirmed, and put in the Constitution. It is not a matter of procedure. It is the establishment of a right which will not exist unless the words are put in. If you want to give the right, you have to put it in. If you leave it out, you negative the right. If you only give the Parliament the power to establish the right, then you are, to some extent, negativing the right. I do not know that it is worth while to have much discussion about the question—Can the Parliament do this without express words? I quite agree with Mr. Barton that it could not.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You think Parliament could not?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think it has not the power.

Mr. ISAACS. -

How is it done in Canada? How is it done elsewhere?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Put it in the powers of the Parliament.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

We spend time enough in discussing things here, and when every one is agreed that this clause is not to be adopted in the form in which it is printed, but is only to be a power of the Parliament, it is not worth while to discuss the question of whether it is absolutely necessary to put in the words. Where there is a wide difference of opinion, it would be safer to do it. I agree with Mr. Barton that there is no power, because sub-section (37) of clause 52 reads—

Any matters necessary for or incidental to the carrying into execution of the foregoing powers, or of any other powers vested by this Constitution in the Parliament or Executive Government of the Commonwealth, or in any department or officer thereof.

I venture to say that these are not necessary or incidental to the execution of any powers. The Commonwealth will come into existence under this Constitution plus English law, one of whose principles is that the Queen can do no wrong. That is the foundation on which the Constitution is established. Then, how can you so interpret sub-section (37) as to say that, incidental to the carrying out of the Constitution, the Parliament which is established on the basis that the Queen can do no wrong, may provide that the Queen can do wrong?

Mr. ISAACS. -

How did you do it in South Australia under your Constitution?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not think there is the least analogy with state Governments. When we come to the Federal Judicature, we have a special code for them. They have immense powers, much greater than any Supreme Court has, but they have much more limited powers than any Supreme Court has as well. Within their ambit they are immense; in numbers, they are comparatively few. This is a code of their powers, and, in my opinion, construing subsection (37) of clause 52 with clause 73, I do not think there would be power in the Parliament to create a right of action against itself which it was the very essence of its establishment should not be created without express words authorizing that to be done. I do hope that the committee will carefully consider whether they will not go further, whether there is any reason for a this timidity. Why should not the Government be liable at the suit of any one? I can see no principle in right and justice. We are gradually destroying it year by year, but in a properly careful way we only do it by degrees, but seeing that in the senior colony they have substantially done it altogether, and that none of that terrible mischief has been worked which is anticipated by Sir John Forrest, that there is no more multiplicity of actions against the Government in New South Wales than in other colonies, I want to know why we should not, in establishing this Constitution, interfere if you please with this prerogative, at all events, to the extent to which the senior colony has done, and establish in the subject at once and for ever in the Commonwealth of Australia the right to obtain a remedy when a wrong is done by the Government, in the same way as he would have if the wrong were done by a private citizen.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I am in sympathy with the clause, because I think, if we are to keep pace with the march of the times, the Constitution Bill ought to contain a direct declaration that the Commonwealth may be sued by a subject for a breach of contract, or for a wrong done by any of its officials.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Is not that so without any such clause?

Mr. DOBSON. -

I do not think it is so.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then we want a great deal more than this in.

Mr. DOBSON. -

It was argued in the Judiciary Committee, and it was argued in other places, that the moment the Commonwealth is established the Parliament will, as a matter of course, pass a Crown Redress Act, giving the subject the right to sue the Queen. But why should we not, in drafting the Constitution, insert these words if there is any doubt about the subject? My learned friend (Mr. Symon) says it is a question of procedure. My learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) says it is a question of so much importance that there is power to do it without stating it in the Bill.
I say it is a question of remedy.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Mr. Symon says let Parliament go on to declare so-and-so as the mode in which it shall be done. Why not let the Constitution declare that there shall be the right, and let Parliament go on, if you like, to pass an Act saying within what limits and under what restrictions it shall be carried out?

Mr. SYMON. -

Constitutionally that right exists now.

Mr. DOBSON. -

If our leader, who has suggested this clause, will tell us that it is unnecessary there is an end of it, and as every moment of our time is precious we had better end the debate at once. I think it was put in by Mr. Barton on the ground that he and the Drafting Committee think most decidedly that it is necessary. If there is any doubt about the point, is it not a matter of such great importance that it ought to appear in the Constitution? I think I shall give my honorable colleagues an unanswerable argument why it should be there. We all have to preserve state rights, and we are here to enlarge the powers, privileges, and advantages of our citizens when we have created our Commonwealth, and not to take them away. You have given over your post and telegraph offices. Now, suppose by some gross neglect or delay on the part of an officer a letter or telegram is delayed, affecting a large commercial transaction, costing some unfortunate citizen £5,000, £500, or £100; if that officer had remained a state officer, the citizen would have had his remedy against the Crown in the state.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Would he?

Mr. DOBSON. -

Certainly. At all events, under the Crown Redress Act of Tasmania, he would have. As you are transferring certain services of the states to the Commonwealth, you should also guard the rights which every citizen should have against the Commonwealth officers, and which, under similar circumstances, he would have against the state officers. Can it be imagined that, if there be a remedy against the state officers, there should be no remedy against the Commonwealth officers until the Commonwealth Parliament have passed an Act providing that the Commonwealth officers can be sued? I think the example given by Mr. Symon-

Mr. SYMON. -

I did not intend that as an example in support of any contention.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I think the example given by Mr. Symon is hardly so appropriate as those we usually hear from him. I take it that if a post-office or telegraphic official punched my head-

Mr. SYMON. -
That is impossible.

Mr. DOBSON. -
You do not know what may happen in a democracy.

Mr. SYMON. -
In Tasmania.

Mr. DOBSON. -
I should sue the man in his personal capacity.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
You would knock him down if you were a Britisher.

Mr. DOBSON. -
It would all depend on the size of the official. In reference to the other important question raised by Mr. Symon as to whether the word "state" is properly used in the provision-"Proceeedings may be taken against the Commonwealth or state," I spoke of that to Mr. Barton before lunch, and, although I was not then in favour of it, I believe Mr. Barton will be able to give very good reasons why "state" should be maintained. Does it at all follow under the Crown Redress Act that if a state officer does a wrong against the Commonwealth-deprives, it of revenue, for instance-does it follow that the Commonwealth Attorney-General shall sue the state Attorney-General? I therefore think that Mr. Barton has done wisely in putting in the word "state" as well as "Commonwealth," because the provision goes on to state "in all cases within the limits of the judicial power." I do not like the proposal that the Commonwealth "may" make the laws. That does not carry us any further than at present, because the Commonwealth may make laws if there is nothing expressly to prevent it making them. But what is to happen if a wrong is done, or a contract is broken, before such an Act be passed? I should prefer to leave the words as they stand, winding up, to suit Mr. Symon, with "in such a manner and subject to such restriction as Parliament may determine." That would leave it to the Federal Parliament to put on their own limitations and restrictions, and to declare the mode of procedure. But as the proposal at present stands, there would be engrafted in the Constitution the fact that every man has a right to sue if the Queen has broken any contract or committed any wrong.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
There would not be any right, even then, until the Parliament has legislated. Your proposal is the same as Mr. Barton's.
Mr. DOBSON. -

If we engraft in the Constitution that every man has a right to sue, we can surely trust to Parliament to make proper and wise arrangements under which the Queen could be sued. I do not see that the objection raised by Mr. O'Connor has much weight. Although I mistrust the Parliament in matters where self-interest is concerned, I trust them in the matter of a Crown Redress Act. I am in sympathy with the clause as it stands.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I have a proposal to make which I think ought to unite a good deal of the opinion that has been expressed. My proposal is that this power to deal with claims against the Crown should not be inserted in the Constitution, but should be given to the Federal Legislature. There can be no doubt, we all agree, that the prerogative right to prevent justice being done is simply a barbarism, and ought to be swept away in every country with responsible government. In New South Wales we have swept it away. It is true that in that colony it has been swept away under the guise of procedure, but the procedure there takes away the right of the Crown to refuse redress. Under our procedure any subject can bring an action, not only on contract, but in tort.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

What year was your Act passed?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I cannot say. The procedure now in our colony applies, not only to contracts, but also, by judicial decisions, to wrongs. In all the colonies there are provisions, wider or narrower, cutting down the prerogative right not to be sued. We must all agree that the Commonwealth should so proceed that in any case in which a man has a cause of action, whether on a wrong or a contract, his right should not be trampled upon by the state any more than by an individual. I quite admit that in dealing with this matter we are opening up a very large question indeed.

Mr. FRASER. -

The state would very likely be fleeced by unscrupulous men.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Does not the same remark apply to anybody who has the bigger purse-to corporations and banking institutions?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The state is the biggest body.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

there can be no ground on which a state could have the right to do wrong or break a contract any more than an individual. I admit that the Crown has to employ an enormous number of persons in various transactions which bring them into contact with subjects. The Crown employs policemen and officers of various kinds. That is the case particularly in this country, where the Crown enters into business of many kinds. I can quite understand that in many of these cases it might be desirable not to give an unlimited right of action. Let us take, for instance, the case of the survey of a gold-field. A mistake made there as to places or boundaries might result in a wrong, which, if followed to the fullest extent, would require thousands of pounds of compensation. The Crown has always the risk of liability through the small neglect of duty on the part of any of the thousands of officials it employs.

In a technical sense it is right that the Crown should be sued, but, on the other hand, in the public interest it is right to restrict the power of action and the power of recovering damages, exactly on the same principle that the right of action and damages are restricted in the case of the railways, or in the case of ship-owners. The liability of the latter is on a certain percentage to the tonnage of the ship. There is a principle of public policy underlying all this. In such matters you have to deal with large numbers of persons. The state might be involved in claims for immense sums by reason of the failure to perform some duty on the part of any of the thousands of people engaged in the public service, and there should, therefore, be some restriction and limitation on actions of the kind. That is only one illustration. But another illustration may be given. Take the case of the large force of police in the city. Some constable might be guilty of small negligence in not keeping the crowd from behind a particular barrier, or in putting a barrier in such a way that a crush follows with destruction to property. It may be that would be negligence on the part of an agent of the Crown, but it is another matter to say that the Crown should be liable for all the damage. I give these illustrations in order to show that, although it may be a proper thing to give the right of action against the Crown, still there underlies all a principle of public policy which makes it necessary to safeguard the right in every instance. We cannot safeguard that in this Constitution. In giving this right, some regard must be had to all the circumstances.

Mr. SYMON. -

And specific cases or classes of cases.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

And specific cases or classes of cases must be considered. That may be done by the Federal Parliament. My proposal gives power to the Federal Parliament to legislate on matters of this kind. The next question is as to whether it is necessary to give this power to the Federal Parliament. It has been interjected by Mr. Isaacs that in his opinion it is not necessary. This matter has been the subject of a great deal of consideration by the members of the Drafting Committee, including Mr. Barton, and the conclusion I have come to entirely corroborates what Mr. Barton has stated on the matter.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

May I ask you one question? Is it your idea the remedy should remain against the officer if you get a remedy against the Crown?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I was not dealing with detail of that kind. I only proposed to furnish another illustration of how the question ought to be dealt with in Parliament, where all the qualifications and conditions might be considered.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I understood you were a party to the amendment, as at first considered. Was it your idea if there was a wrong done by an officer, acting under the impression there was an Act of the Commonwealth giving him power, that the remedy should be taken away as against the officer, and only remain as against the Crown?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No. In that case I apply the principle to its fullest extent. If two persons are concerned in a wrong they are both equally liable. In the case the honorable member mentions, the officer would be liable just as much as the Crown. I need not, however, enter into that matter now. Although my opinion at first was that the right should be given in this bare way, I have been impressed by the arguments used by Mr. Symon and others in regard to the immense importance of the questions that are involved in taking away the prerogative right. Coming back to the question as to whether it is necessary to give this power to the Parliament, I have no doubt whatever in my own mind it is necessary. The powers of the Parliament are limited entirely within the four corners of the Constitution. There might be powers incidental to the carrying out of the powers given in the Constitution, but there is no power except such as are necessarily implied from the powers already given in so many words. There is no power here to take away that portion of the prerogative which enables the Government to resist any claim. The claim against the Government is not a matter of procedure: it is a matter of right. The reason a subject cannot sue the Crown is not because there is no procedure, but because no action by the subject will lie. Unless you give a right by the subject against the Crown, the prerogative right of the Crown to say that the Crown can do no wrong is still continued. Therefore, I say that the right of the Crown not to be sued is not a matter of procedure, but one of prerogative right. You cannot take away the prerogative right except by express language, and that must be admitted by any one who has considered the subject. No right of the Crown can be taken away except by express language. I say there is no language here which will bear, even with the most strained construction, the interpretation of taking away this prerogative right of the Crown. I have heard some reference made to the last sub-section of clause 52, but that does not touch the matter. It only gives the right to exercise all powers which may be necessary for carrying into effect the powers which have already been given. That might give a right regarding procedure if there was power to take away the prerogative right of the Crown, but it does not go beyond that. Is there any such power given under the Judiciary? The power under the Judiciary is simply a power to entertain a question when brought before it, but the right to entertain a claim against the Crown when brought before it does not give a right of action against the Crown. Inasmuch as it does not appear anywhere, either expressly or impliedly, that this right of the Crown to defeat the claim of a subject is taken away, and as we all want to give power to the Federal Parliament to take away that right under such limitations as may be thought necessary, I think that power ought to be inserted in the Constitution. What objection can there be to inserting it in the Constitution? I think I gathered from what my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Symon) said, that he saw no objection to doing so, and I myself cannot understand what objection there can be.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Are you speaking of the clause as printed-73A?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No; I do not think the honorable member was here when I began my remarks. What I said was, that I can quite see there may be a good many objections to give the right in the Constitution in that bare way, and therefore I propose to ask Mr. Glynn to substitute for his clause the following:-

The Parliament may make laws conferring rights to proceed against the Commonwealth or a state in respect of matters within the limits of the judicial power.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Ought, not that to be put in clause 52 instead of clause 54?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is a matter of drafting. I have no particular objection to its being put in clause 52; but we may as well settle the principle now. This puts it beyond all question that the Parliament has a right to legislate in regard to these matters. I do not think any one denies that the Parliament should have that right, and the sole question is whether the right is given here in the Constitution already. I say it is not given. I am not aware of any portion of the Bill from which it can be inferred that it is given, and giving the right in this way enables the Parliament to take all care that the prerogative right is protected, so far as it is necessary to protect it consistently with justice to the subject.

Mr. FRASER. -

Why bring in a state as well as the Commonwealth?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I am glad the honorable member reminded me of that point.

It is done for this reason: You will observe that the power here to make laws giving a right to proceed against the Crown or a state is confined only to those subjects which are within the limits of the judicial power. Now, under clause 73, the judicial power extends to certain matters:-

(1) Arising under this Constitution or involving its interpretation.

Of course those are matters of law.

(2) Arising under any laws made by the Parliament: (3) Arising under any treaty: (4) Of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction: (5) Affecting public Ministers, consuls, or other representatives of other countries: (6) In which the Commonwealth, or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth, is a party.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is utterly unlimited.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes, that is unlimited.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And you give this power conferring rights?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I beg the honorable member's pardon. That sub-section cannot touch the question or limit the rights in any way; it is a mere matter of procedure.

(7) In which a writ of mandamus or prohibition is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth: (8) Between states.

In answer to Mr. Fraser's question, I would point out that power is given here for proceeding by one state against another. Now, at, the present time, an individual could not proceed against a state for it wrong; an individual could not sue a state.

Mr. FRASER. -

But could not a state Parliament grant that permission to sue which you now seek to put in the Commonwealth Bill?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The state might grant the permission.

Mr. FRASER. -

Then why interfere?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

For this reason: These subjects of jurisdiction are subjects which arise under this Constitution, and in giving this jurisdiction regarding subjects arising under the Constitution you must also provide for your remedies. It is an idle thing to say that there shall be certain jurisdiction to deal with disputes arising under the Constitution if a state cannot site another state. If you say here that one state may site another state, or that an individual may sue a state, in the courts of the Commonwealth, you must make some provision by which the right to sue is given to the state and against the state. Inasmuch as you deal with questions here which involve the settling of questions between state and state, or between the individual and the state, before the Commonwealth courts, you must give the right of action also, without which this right to sue is of no value whatever.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You want to grant a substantive right which would not otherwise exist.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No. I will give the honorable member an illustration. Suppose, for instance, some work, say of irrigation, is erected by a state in one of our rivers that injures some citizen of the Commonwealth, and he wants to bring an action against the state; we will say he is a citizen of another state, and, therefore, he must bring the action in the Federal Court, the state which is sued, if its procedure do not allow it to be sued, may say-"That is all very well; as a matter of procedure, this right is given to you; but, inasmuch as the Crown call do no wrong in this particular state, there is no power to bring the Crown into court in this state, and therefore there is no cause of action." Therefore it is that, in order to give completeness to the rights which the procedure evidently intended to confer, you must give the right to sue a state in the same way as you give the right to an individual to sue the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I thought you were speaking of actions by an individual against a state—not between states.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

So I was, but the honorable member will see that this clause is incomplete at present. It will be necessary to complete the clause by putting in the power which is given in America, and which necessarily exists here, that not only may actions between states be brought, but actions between a citizen of one state and a citizen of another state, or between a citizen of one state sued another state. That is an omission which must be remedied.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It was left out advisedly by our committee.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That can be considered later, but in order to complete the circle of remedies with which we are dealing, and give vitality to some very important rights which have no doubt been given under our decisions here regarding subjects of legislation, something of this kind must be done. I would suggest to the committee that it is necessary we should give a right to proceed against a state as well as against the Commonwealth. After all, it is merely a permissive power. All these questions will be discussed by the Federal Parliament, with the opportunities and knowledge necessary to do justice to the Crown and to the public.

Mr. SYMON. -

Would you preface your amendment by saying "Without limiting the power of the Parliament under the Constitution"? The object of that would be to prevent it operating as a limitation.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not see how it could operate as a limitation. It deals with a specific question, and it seems to me to cover the whole ground.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

This is a matter of extreme importance. I am not at all satisfied that we should be right in inserting this clause or anything like it. No doubt the views presented by Mr. O'Connor are worthy of our most careful consideration, but in the limited time afforded to us, I am not able to say that we should not be doing wrong by agreeing to such a clause. If we assume that it is necessary, we must also assume that it is necessary in relation to many other subjects in the Bill. What are we doing? We are proposing to put in a clause which will supplement sub-section (37) of clause 52. That sub-section is in the widest possible terms.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It is not proposed as a supplement to that.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What I say is, that it is intended in effect as a supplement to that and to all other powers given to Parliament in the Bill.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It is an express power.
Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, and that means that it is considered that the expressed and implied powers already given are not sufficient.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The Parliament has by clause 52 full power and authority to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to a large number of matters that are set out. This is a power that is without limitation. The Parliament may legislate, for example, with respect to the Federal Judicature and actions that may be brought, as well as on all the substantive matters mentioned in clause 52, and any Act passed is to bind the Crown. And yet we are told that the Parliament cannot legislate upon these matters in one particular direction. It is said that it cannot, when passing an Act upon any of these subjects, say that if any wrong is done, the state or the Commonwealth shall be liable, out of the public purse. Why cannot it make such a law? Why cannot it say that an individual should have redress out of the Commonwealth or the state purse if the subject on which it is legislating is one of the various subjects committed to its care? We are told that it is a matter of prerogative. Perhaps it is, but that does not except it from the powers of the Parliament. It is the Queen and the two Houses that are legislating, and when the Imperial Parliament passes this Constitution it will say-"You may affect the prerogative so long as when doing so you are within the limits of the powers conferred." In the Canadian Act there are no such words. As to a number of subjects, we are in exactly the same position as the Congress of the United States. The Federal Parliament is supreme within these limits.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

There is no prerogative to reckon with in the United States.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No; but the principle is the same, and if there were a prerogative it would be within the powers. In Canada they have taken away the right of appeal to the Privy Council in certain instances, and that affects the prerogative. There can be no distinction drawn between the two cases, so far as this particular point is concerned. Now, let us consider how far it is necessary. Does the honorable member mean to tell me that it is a matter of substantive right to say that you shall have an action for a wrong—a tort, as it is called? You have to assume first of all that there has been a substantive right that has been violated before you get the tort, and you are now urging that power should be given to the Parliament to allow the remedy for a wrong to extend where it has not extended before. It is not creating rights except in the sense that every remedy is a right—a right of action, a right of going to one court, a right of appeal. You may talk of them all as rights, but they are only rights in a limited sense, and they are quite different from the substantive right which has been violated and which is the cause of complaint.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is a right to proceed.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes; and that, after all, is a question of remedy. I have misunderstood the Constitution altogether, and we shall have to recast it, if we are to be told that there is any direction in which the Federal Parliament cannot legislate within the limits of the powers committed to them. This proposal would possibly operate as an absolute limitations. Take a matter like that of immigration and emigration. Is it to be said that the Federal Parliament must not affect the prerogative of the Crown by saying whether foreigners shall be admitted or not? There are a number of prerogatives that are put within the reach of the Federal Parliament, and if it is necessary to insert this clause in one case it must be equally necessary in others. I am sure that it would be a cause of very great trouble. My objection to new clause 73A as printed is as I have stated, but my objection to the words used by Mr. O'Connor goes much further. I will point out why. My honorable and learned friend (Mr. O'Connor) proposes that the Parliament shall make laws conferring upon the individual the right to proceed against the Commonwealth or against a state. But I am afraid that that will take us very much further than any of us anticipate. Suppose that the state of New South Wales were using the water of the Darling in a way to which the state of South Australia objected. Would not this provision allow the Federal Court to say that New South Wales must be stopped? We come back to the old question as to the meaning of the word "matters." At first it was sought to pass over that word lightly, but the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) afterwards found that there was a good deal in the point raised by me in connexion with it. If the judicial power is to extend to all matters between states, the clause now submitted would enable the Federal Parliament to say that just as an individual riparian owner below stream may sue an individual riparian owner above stream for depriving him of a certain amount of water, so a riparian state below stream might sue a riparian state above stream.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Does not this provision simply confer the right to proceed?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I think it goes much further.

Mr. GLYNN. -
We want to obtain for the states the right of action which the honorable and learned member seems to fear.

Mr. DOBSON. -
The proposal gives no right further than the right to proceed.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The right to proceed includes everything.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
What does the honorable and learned member object to?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I think that the proposal goes very much further than any of us wish.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Does it give any more power to an individual in respect to this right to proceed against a state than he has now?

Mr. ISAACS. -
It gives rights which do not exist now. All I think we should do in regard to this matter is to see that sufficient machinery is put into the Bill to carry out the substantive portions to which we have agreed. We have agreed by passing clause 52 that certain matters, and certain matters only, shall be referred to the Federal Parliament. With regard to these matters there is no limitation of the power of the Federal Parliament, and to make this perfectly certain we have put in a provision which gives the Federal Parliament the power to do anything necessary for the due exercise of this power. In the United States Constitution they use the word "proper" where we use the word "necessary," and it has been held there that this provision is unlimited in its operation. It is not treated as an ordinary deed conferring power on an agent, but is regarded as an intimation to the Federal Parliament to exercise its own discretion as to what is necessary or incidental to the attainment of the objects it has in view. I do not want to allow the Federal Parliament to be able to legislate upon other matters, but so far as these matters are concerned, its control should be practically unfettered. To put in a clause such as is now suggested would, in my opinion, very seriously limit this power. Why should we do this, simply when it may lead us in a direction that we are not sure of? I think we should be doing wrong to put in this provision. But after the strong expression of opinion we have had from the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor), I do not hesitate to say that I may be in error in the view I take. I have not had sufficient time to thoroughly consider this matter. My honorable and learned friend has no doubt had more time to consider it than I have. I am merely expressing the thoughts that occur to me at the moment, but no doubt he feels more confident of his position, because he has given the matter the conscientious thought and attention which he gives to every subject with which he deals. Nevertheless, the provision seems to me to bear the construction which I have put upon it, and I think that it will not act so beneficially as the honorable member (Sir John Downer) wished us to believe it would act. He said that power was given in the Constitution to take over the railways. If any wrong was done by a state in regard to the railways, why should we not give the right to proceed against that state? If we look at the clause of the Bill relating to railways, we will see that the Commonwealth has no power to take over the railways without the consent of the stat intended to give the Federal Court the right to adjudicate in certain classes of matters. These classes of matters are distinctly set out in clause 73, which tells us what matters the judicial power of the Federal Court shall extend to. These classes of matters being set out, there is a presupposition of rights, whether of tort or of contract. The Federal Legislature under the Constitution has the fullest power to legislate in regard to these matters, the fullest power to legislate substantively, and, therefore, also the power to legislate with regard to procedure. It seems to me that the measure is complete as it stands, and that we should be introducing an element of great doubt and danger by putting in this provision. I offer these remarks for consideration, because I think that the matter is one which concerns us all, more especially when we recollect that the judicial power extending between the states is not confined to matters confided to the Federal Parliament, but that there may be rights outside those matters. The states may have controversies outside the legislation of the Federal Parliament. When we say that the Federal Legislature should have power to legislate so as to confer rights to proceed, we may be getting outside the limits of the Constitution.

Mr. DOBSON. -

If all these amendments are shut out, and the Federal Parliament passed a Crown Redress Act, would the Queen have to consent to it?

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, not in person, because the Constitution says that the Queen shall have her representative here-the Governor-General.

Mr. DOBSON. -

But a measure derogating from the Queen's prerogative would, to some extent, be an alteration of the Constitution.
Mr. ISAACS. -

I cannot see that it would be an alteration of the Constitution any more than a similar measure passed by one of the colonies now would be an alteration of its Constitution. Constitutions have been given to each of the colonies. They give the local Parliaments no express power to derogate from that prerogative, but there is a power to legislate—a limited power—and within that limited power they can, if they choose, pass legislation derogating from the Queen's prerogative. For these reasons, I think that we should not adopt the proposal.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I think that the best answer to the speech of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) is the fact that in Canada, in 1875, they attempted a limitation of the prerogative, in general words, to take away the right of appeal to the Privy Council; but that enactment was held to be bad, and an Act, 51 and 52 Vict., had to be passed.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It was not held to be bad because there was no power in the Parliament, but because Parliament had not expressed its wishes.

Mr. GLYNN. -

In a case in Canada, which occurred not very long ago, an action was brought against the Railways Commissioners there to obtain compensation for serious injury which was the result of a railway accident. But this absurd principle which fences in the prerogative, and which might have been all very well 150 years ago, stood in bar to prevent the plaintiff from getting damages.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That does not affect the question.

Mr. GLYNN. -

It affects the policy of my proposal. My honorable and learned friend has pointed out that if we pass the clause as suggested by me, or the provision suggested by the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor), we shall be giving certain rights of states against states under clause 73. That is what I want to do. I do not want federation to be merely a barren name so far as the colony of South Australia is concerned. As has been pointed out by the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor), we are at the present time, as the Bill stands, only regulating procedure. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) says that a question might arise in regard to the interference by New South Wales with South Australian interests in the Darling. Under the Bill as it stands South Australia can go to 50 courts, and get no redress; but if my proposal is carried, it will be able to go into a federal court of justice and proceed against the offending state, just as one individual riparian owner can proceed against another.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not think the New South Wales representatives wish that.

Mr. GLYNN. -

They have plenty of wisdom in their heads, and they ought to see the effect of a particular amendment, but we are shifting about so much that it is almost impossible to understand when an honorable member know's what he is doing. I know perfectly well what I want to accomplish. I want to give all the provisions of clause 73 complete efficacy. I want to say whether you wish the Federal Judiciary to interfere between states. The Crown immunity applicable 100 years ago should not interfere with those rights. An honorable member says it can be done without amendment, but I very much question that. The eleventh amendment of the American Constitution was another side of this business. It was to take away a right granted by the Constitution, or impliedly granted by the Constitution, for a subject outside the state to sue the state. It was held that the state as well as the Commonwealth was sovereign, and there was an interference with the theory of the petition of right not by an Act of Congress, but by an amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Does the honorable member refer to the case of Chisholm v. Georgia, when the Supreme Court decided that a state could be sued under the Constitution? It required the eleventh amendment to reverse that.

Mr. GLYNN. -

A man would have to live to the age of Methuselah to cultivate a memory equal to remembering all the cases which the honorable member is always referring to. Burgess, in referring to this anachronism of policy, says-

The Supreme Court has itself evidently felt the error of the limitation, and has rendered it nugatory wherever it has been possible to place the individual in the position of defendant instead of plaintiff in a suit in which the other party is a Commonwealth, and whenever it has been possible to make an officer of the Commonwealth in his personal character defendant in place of the Commonwealth itself.

There is a declaration by one of the first constitutional writers in America as to the advisability of removing these provisions from the Constitution. It was stated by Mr. Symon that this is a matter of procedure and ought not to be included in the Constitution. That does away with his pet idea of denying the right of appeal to the Privy Council in this Constitution. Why not leave that also to the Federal Parliament? One objection to relegating questions of this kind to the Parliament instead of settling them in the Constitution is the fact that in the Federal Parliament many of these vexed questions which have been discussed in this committee will turn up again. We shall hear objections in the Parliament that if you confer this right of a state to sue another state you will be giving a right of action with regard to the riparian rights of, say, Victoria as against New South Wales. Even the very matter which we have fought out for weeks will be brought into the Federal Parliament and rediscussed with, perhaps, for some of the states, an absolute denial of rights. So far as the policy of the immunity of the Crown is concerned, it is monstrous that although £10,000 worth of damage was done to a subject in England by the Commissioner of Woods and Forests, the subject was absolutely debarred from exercising his right on this plea of the immunity of the Crown. Are we going to perpetuate such a stupid provision? The Crown is supposed to be the conservator of justice to the people, and is it to be allowed to stand in the way of justice? It is better to settle this question by the Convention itself now than to pass it onto the Federal Parliament. As a matter of policy, the sweeping away of these immunities of the Crown which place it in an anomalous position in regard to the subject is quite justifiable.

Mr. FRASER. -

Why should we settle what the Federal Parliament can equally, well settle?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Supposing a Bill were introduced into Parliament the objection of Mr. Isaacs that you would be giving a recognition of the right of one state to sue another state on the rivers question would be urged, and you would then have the whole rivers question introduced into the Parliament. We ought not to be talking here for weeks on a subject, and then by rejection of a motion of this sort in the Convention prevent the carrying out of a policy which, in other respects, we are supposed to have formulated. It is generally conceded that some amendment such as this is necessary, whether it be done in the Convention or by the Federal Parliament. If Mr. O'Connor thinks that it should be relegated to the Federal Parliament, and if my motion is carried, that can be done afterwards, but I will risk a division on this point. Consequently I ask the committee to support me in voting for this clause, which has been drafted by Mr. Barton.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I wish to say a few words on this subject. At the outset I would say that I am not very particular whether this matter is dealt with by such a clause as drafted by the Drafting Committee or whether it is dealt with by a clause giving the Parliament power to deal with the subject. I can without much difficulty meet my honorable friend (Mr. Symon), but I do hold a strong opinion that it would be necessary to provide for this matter in the Constitution in the manner we have provided for it in this draft or else to take the power for Parliament to make laws upon the subject. The question has been asked whether the Parliament cannot make laws affecting the prerogative. The answer is-"Yes" and "No." The Parliament can make laws affecting the prerogative in respect of any matter in which it has express power of legislation or a power necessarily implied. It cannot make laws affecting the prerogative in matters with respect to which it has no power to make laws.

Mr. FRASER. -
Can it not get authority?

Mr. BARTON. -
Not unless it gets the power in this Act.

Mr. FRASER. -
Cannot the local Parliaments get the power from home?

Mr. BARTON. -
They do not require to get authority from home, for this reason: That the local Constitutions empower the colonies separately to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the community, and that is without restriction, except such small restrictions as are imposed by the Constitutions themselves, and, of course, the necessary restriction that they can only legislate for their own territory. The position with regard to this Constitution is that it has no legislative power, except that which is actually given to it in express terms or which is necessary or incidental to a power given. The result is that you might pass a clause giving judicial power to a court, but you cannot by the passage of that provision make the conferring of a right of action upon a subject something necessary or incidental to the exercise of that power, because jurisdiction simply means power to determine cases where a right of action exists. It certainly does not mean giving the right of action simply where jurisdiction is given. That is the starting point of difference in the argument between honorable members who have spoken and myself. Where there is a jurisdiction given, that is simply the right to try cases where there is shown a right of action. That jurisdiction does not confer a right of action upon anybody. Whether it is by the operation of the maxim that the king can do no wrong, or by any other cause, that a person has no right of action, he cannot have that right given to him under this Constitution unless there is a provision in the Constitution giving him that right, or a provision enabling Parliament to confer that right upon him. That is really the difficulty of the position. That is where I seem to differ from Mr. Symon and Mr. Isaacs. This proposition is really made as a matter of safety. It will be a very awkward thing if it is discovered years after the Constitution is framed, instead of being discovered now, that where a subject has a valid right of action, except for the maxim that a king can do no wrong, he is precluded by the operation of that maxim under this Constitution. I grant that in respect of any matter in which the power of legislation is given, such as legislating about military defence and other matters, the plenary power of legislation gives legislative authority which includes more than the right of a

Do you, mean in respect of matters outside?

Mr. BARTON. -
Outside the powers granted.

Mr. ISAACS. -
What right have we to interfere in those matters?

We have no right, so that the point is narrowed down to this: The question is whether any words in this Bill can be read to confer by themselves the right upon a subject to bring an action in the face of the maxim I have referred to, or whether apart from that there is any power conferred by the words of this Constitution-and by the words I mean the expression or necessary meaning of them-upon the legislative authority of the Commonwealth to confer these rights. Now, I have studied this matter considerably. The Drafting Committee have bestowed considerable attention upon it, and we are unable to see in any way that there is either a power given in the Constitution as it stands, or to the Commonwealth Parliament, to legislate so that these rights may be conferred, either by the Constitution in the former case, or by the statute to be passed by the Federal Parliament in the latter case, and that is our difficulty. I think it is better not to rely upon assurances that such a power is impliedly conveyed. I must say that, after all the attention we have bestowed upon the matter, we three members of the Convention who constitute the Drafting Committee, and who have considered it so carefully, have not been able to find a vestige of that power. It is natural-and I think this is how the question has arisen so late-in comparing a Constitution of this kind with the American Constitution one should first imagine, as most of us have imagined, that the granting of the judiciary power confers also either the right of action or the power to legislate with regard to the right of action. But the difficulty is this: The American Constitution has been framed in that way because it was an independent Constitution. It has been read always to express the grant of power by the people, independent of all statutory authority. It has been treated simply as a declaration of the people, and one can understand why rights of action should be taken to be inferred by words importing merely a judicial power, because those who framed the Constitution probably came to the conclusion that it would be only for them to do so that those words defining the judicial power would be, for many purposes, practically useless, unless the people meant to grant the right of action in the cases mentioned. But that implication does not arise in a Constitution of this kind, or in the canons of the construction of the English statutes, and there is no way in which we, as members of the Drafting Committee, can see that it does arise. Consequently, if this power is not put in the Constitution as the right of a citizen, or so that the Parliament can confer the right, we are of the distinct opinion that in respect of many matters specified in clause 73-matters which arise between citizens and the Commonwealth or between citizens and the state-there would be not only no right of action conferred, but no power in the Parliament to confer that right.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You want to leave the Parliament free to make laws if it sees fit.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am content with that. Where a claim is maintainable against a subject it should be maintainable also against the Commonwealth or a state. I can see that there may be some practical inconvenience arising out of that, but I am content to leave the matter in the hands of the Federal Parliament. Still I ask the Convention to go with me to that extent, lest we should arrive at a decision on matters which, after this Bill is passed, would prevent a subject from gaining any redress where his rights would have been in fringed if the other party had been a subject instead of a state or the Commonwealth, because, if that did happen, there would be no power to remedy that evil by statute. Now I come back to the beginning of my argument, to make the matter clear. You cannot, by arguing that there is power to limit the prerogative by a statute, argue in the Federal Constitution that you can limit the prerogative by a statute in cases where no power of legislation on extra-federal subjects is conferred.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We can deal with those subjects now.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think we should, but the difficulty that my honorable and learned friend is in is this: Where there is no express power in the Constitution, and where there is no legislative power conferred in respect of the subject, his argument is: That because you can limit the prerogative right by legislation, therefore you can limit it to the extent of that extra-federal subject. I think that is really the position. I must urge that, if not the clause of which the Drafting Committee gave notice, the clause I read in answer to Mr. Symon, should be adopted, because there is danger of a serious difficulty arising, which two or three words might remedy by taking the whole course into the hands of the Federal Parliament, who may apply it according to the rights of the people which they have in charge.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

As Mr. Glynn has not been able to accept the amendment I suggested in place of his, I beg to move the insertion, before the word "Proceedings" in his proposal, of the following words:-

The Parliament may make laws conferring rights to proceed against the Commonwealth or a state in respect of matters within the limits of the judicial power.

An amendment was suggested by Mr. Symon, but I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will not that involve in implication that there is no power to make laws to proceed against any individual?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Oh, no.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not know.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Mr. O'Connor's amendment would apply to a person.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Either to a person or to a state.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

What Sir John Forrest said has some bearing on a suggestion I was going to make. I was going to ask Mr. O'Connor if he would not substitute for the very equivocal and doubtful expression "rights to proceed" the word "remedy."

Mr. BARTON. -

Would "remedy" do?

Mr. SYMON. -

I think so.

Mr. BARTON. -

You want to include the right.

Mr. SYMON. -
Well, that is a remedy. What I want to point out is that nobody intends, by this Constitution, to give a right of action. You cannot give a right of action. It depends on something quite different-on what has happened between the Commonwealth and a citizen, the state and a citizen, or between citizen and citizen? The right to proceed is merely a remedy. Therefore, I agree with Mr. Isaacs, who points out the confusion that may arise, and also what "rights to proceed" means. The Federal Parliament may have some difficulty in determining what their legislation can be within the scope of this expression-"Rights to proceed." I was greatly impressed by what Mr. Barton said. It comes to what is a remedy. You want to give an individual a right of remedy against the Crown exactly as he has a right against an individual. It is all a pure question of remedy. If Her Majesty chose to answer a petition of right in a question of tort with the usual form of words-"Let right be done," right would be done.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

No.

Mr. SYMON. -

I say it would.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

No.

Mr. SYMON. -

I note the emphasis of my honorable friend, but his interjection is not an answer to my statement. We want to allow Parliament to do what it pleases with regard to the rights it has.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I am sorry to say that I cannot accept the suggestion. What we want to deal with are rights. The reason why you cannot bring an action against the Crown is that the Crown can do no wrong in the eyes of the law. Therefore, we want to give Parliament the power to confer rights.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I should like to say that I will accept Mr. O'Connor's amendment, and to explain that as my clause was drafted it stated "in such manner as Parliament may prescribe"-really a reference to what was originally suggested.

Mr. O'Connor's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Glynn's proposed new clause, as amended, was further amended by omitting the remainder of the clause.

The clause, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -
I beg to move the insertion, after clause 74, of the following new clause:-

74A. The plea that any law either of the Parliament of the Commonwealth or of any state Parliament is ultra vires of the Constitution shall not be raised in any court except as follows:-

1. As to a law of the Parliament of the Commonwealth by or on behalf of a state.

2. As to a law of any state by or on behalf of the Commonwealth.

But nothing contained in this section shall prevent the plea being raised that there is a conflict between any law enacted by the Commonwealth and any law enacted by a state.

I shall move this new clause in as few words as possible. The first proposal contained in the clause is that, as to a law of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, the question of ultra vires shall not be raised by any private citizen, but, only by the Parliament of a state. Let us look at how this will work. A federal law, in the first place, has to be discussed by the House of Representatives, in which all the states are represented in proportion to their varying populations. Then it goes to the Senate, where the states are represented in equal numbers. It runs the gauntlet of criticism by the press and by the constituents both of the Federal Parliament and the states Parliament, and ultimately it reaches the solemnity of law. My contention is that no private individual should be allowed to contest that law in the courts. It may be said that the law will possibly abridge the liberty of some individual citizen or make some deduction from his rights. But it is so with nearly every law. There is scarcely any law which does not affect a citizen's material interests in some point or another, but the test of whether the law is legitimate is the interest of the majority of the people. If the law is passed after having run the gauntlet of criticism in the House of Representatives, by the Senate, and by the public, my contention is that it should only be impugned by a Parliament of a state. It is a question, after all, of the rights of a majority. The states Parliament would be the sentry along the line of the dividing power between the states Parliament and the Commonwealth. As

---

Mr. SYMON. -

Because the law of the state cannot be ultra vires, but the law of the Commonwealth may be.

Mr. GORDON. -
It may be that the law of the state may infringe on the law of the Commonwealt

Mr. SYMON. -

But the law of a state now cannot be ultra vires.

Mr. GORDON. -

But the proposition is this: At present the law of a state is passed by the majority of the representatives of the people of that state. The same proposition holds good in a Federation. A federal law is passed by a majority of the representatives of the people in Parliament assembled, and ought to have the same binding effect on the individual as it would without the Federation. As regards a federal law, I contend, with much respect, that the state Parliament Should be the sentry along the line of the dividing power, between the powers of the two bodies, to say whether or not there is any infringement of the power. As regards a state law, the Federal Parliament is the sentry along the line.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Suppose the sentry is asleep, or is in the swim with the other power?

Mr. GORDON. -

There will be more than one sentry. In the case of a federal law, every member of a state Parliament will be a sentry, and, every constituent of a state Parliament will be a sentry. As regards a law passed by a state, every man in the Federal Parliament will be a sentry, and the whole constituency behind the Federal Parliament will be a sentry.

Mr. REID. -

They would not all be in the swim, to use Mr. Higgins' elegant phrase.

Mr. GORDON. -

They could not.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You would have to get the state Parliament to move.

Mr. GORDON. -

Yes. If this proposition is not carried, some individual will have to move, but the same reasons which would cause an individual to move would cause the Parliament to move if individual interests were to any serious extent affected. In the case of a federal law the state Parliament would be on the alert always to see that its sphere of action was not improperly infringed.

Mr. WISE. -

How is the state Parliament going to raise the question?

Mr. GORDON. -

By a process which can very easily be devised, by the intervention of the state Attorney-General-
Mr. WISE. -

On fictitious suits.

Mr. GORDON. -

Not necessarily. It may be raised on an abstract proposition.

Mr. WISE. -

The essential virtue of our system is that the courts deal with concrete propositions.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is the present system, but we are creating a new system. There is no scientific reason in law why an abstract proposition of law should not be submitted to the courts, or why the Attorney-General of a state on the one hand, or the Attorney-General of the Commonwealth on the other, should not intervene in the same fashion, probably on the same lines, as an Attorney-General now intervenes in a divorce suit. How this principle would have worked in the American Constitution is illustrated by the Treasury Notes Case. When the Congress of the United States issued Treasury-bills in 1862—a measure absolutely required to save the nation—none of the states having the honour of the nation at stake would have disputed the legality of that issue. It was left to a single individual to paralyze for a time the whole nation, by raising the question of the legality of the notes.

Mr. SYMON. -

His individual rights were at stake.

Mr. GORDON. -

Clearly; but surely my honorable friend sees that where we have government by majority individual rights must give place to the interests of the majority? That is true as to the laws of God himself. The law of gravitation, which governs the spheres, makes the boy fall out of the apple tree. Nature, which is so seemingly careless of the individual life, is careful of the type. What are we doing here? We are binding by majorities minorities everywhere. The whole scheme of federation is the binding of a minority by a majority. In fact, every modern system of government is simply a scheme for effecting the will of the majority. This proposal will make the law valid until upset in the way proposed: It can only be impugned afterwards by the Federal Parliament, or, on the other hand, by the state. I think it is monstrous that after the Federal Parliament has passed a law expressing the will of the majority of the people, or after a state Parliament has passed a law expressing the will of the majority of the people, any individual should be allowed to impugn it. It is quite possible, it is highly probable, that many individuals will be affected by it, but why should one individual be allowed to upset a law which is carried in the interests of the majority? The test of whether or not a law is righteous is this—is it required in the interests of the whole?

Mr. WISE. -

Suppose the majority decide that there shall be no equal representation in the Senate?

Mr. GORDON. -

Those who are outvoted will be bound by it. Are we not binding, or attempting to bind, by this federal scheme a powerful minority in New South Wales and in other colonies who declare that they are being robbed of their rights?

Mr. WISE. -

We are.

Mr. GORDON. -

If the majority desire it the minority will be bound, and no matter how much they howl—no matter how much they cry out that they are being robbed of their rights—they will be bound by this scheme of federation if the majority say they are to be bound by it. Where is the argument of a right of the individual when in this very scheme of federation we are taking away what so many hundreds of thousands of persons conceive to be their precious rights?

Mr. SYMON. -

It is not a law which is ultra vires.

Mr. GORDON. -

The honorable member will see that I am not declaring that any law which is ultra vires is not ultra vires. I am simply limiting the area of attack.

Mr. SYMON. -

The man who is ruined by it is not to take that point.

Mr. GORDON. -

We must postulate of all our Parliaments that they will not pass laws which are ethically indefensible. We must also postulate that they will pass laws which may do injuries to individuals; but I contend if any serious individual injury is done, or any injury is done to a number of persons whose interests really require to be protected, the state will intervene and assist them, on the one hand, if it is an infringement by the Federal Parliament. On the other hand, the Federal Parliament will intervene and assist them if it is an infringement by the state Parliament. But once an Act of Parliament has reached the solemnity of the law expressing the will of the majority of the people, I contend that no individual should be allowed to bring it into court, but that it should be left in the case of a federal law to the state, and in the case of a state law to the Federal Parliament. If any one looks through the list of American decisions under the head of "Legislature," he will see that no injustice would have been done, but that a great deal of justice would have been done, and a great deal of litigation saved, if this principle had been the law there. In the Treasury-notes cases which I have mentioned, a single individual, in his own selfish interests, almost paralyzed the whole nation. They had to get over the difficulty by the subterfuge of appointing to the Supreme Court Bench a Judge who was known to be favorable to the Government's view. But for that there would have been an absolute paralysis in America for the time being. If this provision had been in force that only the state could impugn a federal law it would never have been done, because the states, having the honour of the country at heart, would not have dared to interfere with the law. I know that I have against me a large number of the lawyers of the Convention, a timid and conservative class, as Herbert Spencer points out, who are fearful of change.

Mr. BARTON. -

Then the real boldness is to be bold enough to muzzle the citizen.

Mr. GORDON. -

I admit that there is this objection to the principle: That it does prevent an individual from bringing a law into dispute. But it is a question of the balance of convenience. I do not shut my eyes to the desirability of everything being perfect if we can make it perfect. But there is always a screw loose in mundane affairs, and we cannot have everything. The balance of convenience is in favour of allowing the state on the one hand, or the Commonwealth on the other, the sole right of impugning each other's laws. That would leave an interspace between the two for acquiescence, which would become a force in the Constitution. The acquiescence of the state in the law of the Federal Parliament, or the acquiescence of the Federal Parliament in the law of the state, even if the laws did cross a little the strict and rigid line of either of the powers, would become a force in the Constitution. There would be an interspace for the genius of legislation to play in. No workable Constitution should be without room for play. The genius of the British Constitution is based on acquiescence in improvements. The inherent difficulty in all written Constitutions is the absolute rigidity or legality of the Constitution.

Mr. SYMON. -

Do you think acquiescence would make a law if the law passed by the Commonwealth Parliament was ultra vires?

Mr. GORDON. -
It would until the law was impugned. If the state did not impugn that law it would remain in force. It is a law, and it could be allowed to be valid by the force of acquiescence. And here is another point. The proposal which I am supporting, to some extent keeps a remnant of parliamentary sovereignty over the strict interpretation of the courts.

Mr. FRASER. -
That is too abstruse for laymen altogether.

Mr. GORDON. -
Well, I think not. I am sure that if the honorable member applies his mind to the subject he will see it is not abstruse. If a statute of either the Federal or the states Parliament be taken into court the court is bound to give an interpretation according to the strict hyper-refinements of the law. It may be a good law passed by "the sovereign will of the people," although that latter phrase is a common one which I do not care much about. The court may say-"It is a good law, but as it technically infringes on the Constitution we will have to wipe it out." As I have said, the proposal I support retains some remnant of parliamentary sovereignty, leaving it to the will of Parliament on either side to attack each other's laws.

Mr. BARTON. -
How would they raise the question?

Mr. GORDON. -
Suppose it were a federal law, the Attorney-General of any of the states could intervene in an actual suit, or place an abstract question before the High Court.

Mr. SYMON. -
The state would not bother its head if the law only affected a few individuals.

Mr. GORDON. -
If the law only affected a few individuals, the state might not intervene, but it is possible that a law referring to only a few individuals may involve the benefit of the whole of the community.

Mr. SYMON. -
It is not a law if it is ultra vires.

Mr. GORDON. -
It would be law by acquiescence. It would remain a law until it was attacked.

Mr. BARTON. -
Sir Julian Salomons, in making that speech, was trying to say everything possible against the Constitution, and was regardless of everything but attacking it.

Mr. GORDON. -

On a point of this kind, Sir Julian Salomons is an authority worth quoting.

Mr. SYMON. -

He is only an authority for the education of his own children.

Mr. GORDON. -

Sir Julian Salomons, is an authority who says that this Constitution will lead to a great deal of litigation. If we can minimize that litigation it will be a good thing.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That is a bad argument, I think.

Mr. GORDON. -

At any rate, it is an unselfish argument.

Mr. FRASER. -

The proposal would open many doors to litigation.

Mr. GORDON. -

No; the proposition would shut doors, and not open them. If it were left to the states to attack a federal law, or to the Commonwealth to attack a state law, these would be the only possible litigants on this point of _ultra vires_. That would shut out millions of people amongst whom it would be possible to find litigants. It would not, however, shut out an individual from attacking the administration of the law once the law was passed. The idea is, that no citizen should be allowed to attack what is the express will of the people.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is not the expressed will of the people if it be left to a Ministry or two Ministries without the assent of Parliament.

Mr. GORDON. -

But if it be passed by Parliament it is the will of the Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But suppose they go beyond their power?

Mr. GORDON. -

It is still the expression of Parliament. Directly a Ministry seeks to enforce improperly any law the citizen has his right.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

What I mean is: There may be an act done by the federal power which is illegal. Suppose it happens that the Ministry of the state concerned does not wish to enforce that right against the federal power, there is no remedy at all.

Mr. GORDON. -
Then I say, if the Ministry of a state, controlled by the Parliament of that state, and controlled by public opinion, does not think it necessary to impugn the law, you may depend upon it that law is just and righteous.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
What about other states?

Mr. GORDON. -
It is open to all the other states to impugn the law.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That cannot be done.

Mr. GORDON. -
I should say it is left open to the whole of the states to impugn any federal law. That, I think, is expressed in the clause. If the state does not impugn the law you may depend upon it, the law passed by the Federal Parliament is a righteous and proper law. If the Federal Parliament does not impugn a state law, it may be taken for granted that that law is a proper and legitimate one. It will be seen that it is impossible to draw a rigid line between the two authorities which are concurrently legislating.

There must be some overlapping, and some little technical friction between the laws. But it would be monstrous for citizens to take advantage of that and to drag the state Parliament or the Federal Parliament into court simply because what might be to the benefit of the whole nation interferes with private and individual rights. I am not shutting my eyes to the objection that the proposal might possibly do injury to some individuals, but I say there is the advantage that no one individual could do serious injury to the state—that no one individual could possibly paralyze the whole action of the state.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
And possibly he a "crank."

Mr. GORDON. - Possibly.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
He could not paralyze the law unless it ought to be paralyzed.

Mr. GORDON. -
That is a relative question, and I contend the law of the majority should rule, as expressed by the law of Parliament for the time being.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
But you are expanding the Constitution without the formalities required for the amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. GORDON. -
This is designed to make possible the expansion of the Constitution by allowing some relief to the extreme rigidity of a written Constitution. It has that object, and it also has the object of preserving, as far as possible, parliamentary sovereignty over the extreme and technical interpretations of the courts. It has further the object of reducing the expense of litigation, and it has the advantage also, as I think, of maintaining, to as large an extent as is practicable in a written Constitution, the will of the people, which in some measure must be subordinated, of course, to the contract, and has to be interpreted by the courts on the strict lines of legal refinement. The courts have only functions to perform, they have no discretion. It is possible, according to the strict reading of the Constitution, that one individual might paralyze the whole political desire of a state on the one hand, or of the Federal Parliament on the other hand. This subject has been dealt with by some exceedingly able writers. One series of articles appeared in the Weekly Herald, of Adelaide, by Mr. Heggaton, advocating a proposition of which Mr. Holder has given notice. The effect of it is that under certain conditions a law of a state Parliament or of the Federal Parliament should not be open to be attacked. I am prepared to support the honorable member, but this is a proposition which goes half-way, and which leaves either law to be attacked if it injures the Commonwealth or the state, or inflicts injury on any individual of the Commonwealth or of a state which calls for intervention. The machinery required is simple. It could be done by a reference to the court, or by the intervention of the Attorney-General of the state or of the Commonwealth. All our rights depend to some extent on the probity of the Attorney-General for the time being. In criminal matters, he has the right of presenting or of not presenting a bill, and in divorce cases he also has the right of intervening. The guardianship of our individual rights, I may say of all our rights and liberties, rests for the time being on the Government in power. That is no new proposition. I know that the objection may be raised that this would place the private citizen in the power, to some extent, of the Attorney-General of the day-an officer of a faction-but that is the system of government under which we live.

Mr. SYMON. -

I do not think so.

Mr. GORDON. -

If the Parliament of South Australia passed a law demanding a contribution of £10,000 from the honorable member, he would have to pay it.

Mr. BARTON. -

Our civil rights are not in the hands of any Government, but the rights of
Mr. GORDON. -

Even that embraces a very large body of rights, and the principle is the same. We have to rely in many of our relations on the probity of the Attorney-General, on the probity of the Parliament, or, to go further down, on the probity of the community. Upon all these grounds I contend that the amendment is one that ought to be passed. It leaves the whole executive power open to attack. Once a law is passed anybody can say that it is being improperly administered, and it leaves open the whole judicial power once the question of \textit{ultra vires} is raised. Under the clause, as I have amended it, it will not prevent the plea of \textit{ultra vires} being raised where it is accompanied with the plea of a conflict of law. If there is a state law and a Commonwealth law on the same subject, every citizen is entitled to know which he should obey. If he joins a plea of \textit{ultra vires} with a plea of conflict of law, that ought to be heard. The clause expresses only one limitation, and it is on the question of who shall raise this plea upon a subject which has been legislated on only by one of these great powers—the Commonwealth on the one hand, or the state on the other. Once either of these powers has passed a law, my contention is that they are the guardians on the dividing line who are to watch each other and to see that that line is not improperly crossed.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

In the event of injury being done by a law that they had not the right to challenge, although it was unconstitutional, how would they be compensated, supposing it had been in operation for some time before complaint was made?

Mr. GORDON. -

My contention is that if the Commonwealth passed a law that caused injury to a number of citizens of a state, the Parliament of that state would be up in arms, and they would have their constituents and the press behind them.

Mr. SYMON. -

What proportion of citizens would you suggest?

Mr. GORDON. -

Such a proportion as would negative the proposition that the law was for the good of the majority. That is the test now. Every Tariff involves somebody in loss. It is not a question of loss to the individual, but of the legitimacy of the law, and the interests of the larger body of the people. We must make it a postulate that our Parliaments will not pass ethically bad laws. We are bound to suppose that these laws will be legitimately passed in the interests of the majority, and for the reasons I have given I hope that this clause will be agreed to.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

One of my honorable friend's most agreeable characteristics is the versatility with which he from time to time takes up positions that, to the ordinary mind, appear to be not only different, but mutually destructive. At one time we have him posing as the vehement champion of state rights, and insisting on the strictest line of demarcation between the powers of the Commonwealth and of the states. At another time we find him moving an amendment which, in its effect, would obliterate all distinction between the Federal Commonwealth and the states.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

How does that appear?

Mr. WISE. -

If the honorable member had only moved this amendment when we first met in Adelaide, and had carried it we should have been saved many months of discussion. All that would have been necessary then would have been to frame a Constitution in about six clauses, declaring that there should be a Commonwealth Parliament, that the states Parliaments should remain, that the powers of the Commonwealth Parliament should be whatever the states Parliaments allowed them to be, and that the powers of the states Parliaments should be whatever the Federal Parliament allowed them to be. That would have been our Constitution. The amendment, as it stands, provides that whatever law may be passed, taking the first branch of it, by the Commonwealth, it is not to be declared ultra vires if the five Attorneys-General of the several states agree that for any reasons of state they will wink at any violation of the law, and allow any person affected injuriously by it to suffer.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

That is not fair—the five Attorneys-General.

Mr. WISE. -

Yes. We have been striving all through to erect an independent Commonwealth with certain clearly-defined subjects of legislation, and to provide very strictly that the rights of a state should not be impinged upon by the undue exercise of the powers of the Federal Parliament. In order to prevent that, we have constituted a Supreme Court to interpret the laws of the Parliament. But the honorable member now comes forward and says that the Parliament is to make the laws, and that the Ministers of the day are to interpret them. The Parliament may make what laws it pleases. It may make laws altogether outside the subject of the matters referred to it by clause 52, but unless in each state there is a majority sufficiently strong to sway the Ministers in power for the time being, those laws will not be declared to be ultra vires.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

If there is a majority strong enough in any one state that will be sufficient.

Mr. WISE. -

If the Federal Parliament chose to legislate upon, say, the education question—and the Constitution gives it no power to legislate in regard to that question—the Ministers for the time being in each state might say—"We are favorable to this law, because we shall get £100,000 a year, or so much a year, from the Federal Government as a subsidy for our schools," and thus they might wink at a violation of the Constitution, while no one could complain. If this is to be allowed, why should we have these elaborate provisions for the amendment of the Constitution? Why should we not say that the Constitution may be amended in any way that the Ministries of the several colonies may unanimously agree? Why have this provision for a referendum? Why consult the people at all? Why not leave this matter to the Ministers of the day? But the proposal has a more serious aspect, and for that reason only I will ask permission to occupy a few minutes in discussing it. Not that I believe that it will be carried, but I think it is an echo of a widespread misapprehension which prevails outside as to the duties and functions of the Supreme Court. It very often seems hard to a layman that that which has been enacted by Parliament should be declared to be illegal by a Supreme Court when the statute is called into question during litigation between two citizens. It is hard, but like everything else in politics, it is a choice of evils. The question is: Whether it would not be of much greater disadvantage to the whole community to bring in the Supreme Court as an interpreter of the Constitution before any precise case was taken before it, than it is to leave the individual to suffer the hardship of finding that the Act upon which he relied was really invalid? I will not use my own language in explaining the position, but, to have it put upon record, I should like to quote a passage which occurs on pages 154 and 155 of Dicey's Law of the Constitution. After pointing out that the American Supreme Court exists to interpret the Constitution, and to see that effect is given to its provisions, the writer goes on to say that—

The power, moreover, of the courts, which maintains the Articles of the Constitution as the law of the land, and thereby keeps each authority within its proper sphere, is exerted with an ease and a regularity which has astonished and perplexed continental critics. The explanation is that the Judges of the United States control the action of the Constitution, but they perform merely judicial functions, since they never decide anything but the cases before them. It is natural to say that the Supreme Court pronounces Acts of Congress invalid, but in fact this is not so. The court never directly pronounces any opinion whatever upon an Act of Congress.

What the court does do is simply to determine A. is or is not entitled to recover judgment against X.; but in determining that case the court may decide that any Act of Congress is not to be taken into account, since it is an Act beyond the constitutional powers of Congress.

If any one thinks this is a distinction without a difference he shows some ignorance of politics, and does not understand how much the authority of a court is increased by confining its action to purely judicial business.

In a book prepared by you, sir, entitled A Manual of Reference for the use of Members of the National Australasian Convention, to which frequent reference has been made, the matter is further dealt with. You say, at page 126, in words that I would like to adopt as part of my argument:-

No doubt the power given is very great, but it is exercised in a manner and by a body which affords the least possible chance of friction and quarrels between the central and the provincial governments. A veto by the central authority has to be exercised at a time when the public attention of the provincial electors is directed to the matter; at a time when, perhaps, party spirit runs high, when angry passions pervade both factions, and when the subject-matter is invested with an importance which is not intrinsic, whereas a declaration by a court that the statute is invalid is withdrawn from the sphere of politics. Each individual and each state looks upon it that such declaration is given only in pursuance of the Constitution. Public attention is probably directed to other matters, and the question has, in many cases, shrunk into its native insignificance; and "it is to the interest of every man who wishes the Federal Constitution to be observed that the judgments of the federal tribunals should be respected, and they take it that the courts are the protectors of the federal compact, and that the federal compact is, in the long run, the guarantee of the rights of the separate state."

If the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) was carried into effect—though of that, I think, there is not the slightest chance—it would follow that any person who was aggrieved by an unconstitutional enactment would have to persuade the Attorney-General of the state or of the Commonwealth, as the case might be, to in some way set the law in motion to ascertain the legality of the enactment, If the enactment was one which affected a matter exciting strong party feeling, the result would be that the abstract question of its validity would have to be argued before the court at a time when public feeling was excited, although it would be of the utmost importance that the decision of the court should be entirely free from all suspicion of political bias. Then, too, the enactment might be valid in parts and invalid in other parts, or it might be impossible to interpret it in the abstract. It is impossible to foresee the bearing of a statute upon all possible cases, and it is only when a case comes for determination before a court that the court is able to say that in that particular case the statute does or does not afford protection to the citizen who has relied upon it. The honorable member's proposal would remove at once the greatest of all safeguards to the impartiality and usefulness of the Federal Court, by taking away from it its right to deal with matters which are brought, as lawyers term it, to a distinct issue, and with precise and definite points, in regard to which the full bearing of every word of the judgment could be appreciated? Instead of the court being able to determine the legality of an enactment in its bearing upon any particular case, there would be considerations introduced which were utterly foreign to the atmosphere of the tribunal, and that would seriously impair the public confidence in a court which, with us, as in America, will, I believe, prove to be the ultimate protector of the liberties of the people. Then, too, the amendment is in its form so complicated that its practical working will be impossible. The honorable member said truly that the Attorney-General constantly intervenes now. But he intervenes at the expense of the individual. The individual presents his case, and gives a guarantee for costs. Under this proposal all that would happen would be that the individual who wanted to assert his right would have a barrier placed between him and the obtaining of justice. He would have to satisfy the Attorney-General for the time being that he would be able to pay the costs of any action, and he would have to bring sufficient political pressure to bear upon that officer to get him to move in the case, and finally he would be left to contest the matter in his own interests and in his own name. The result would be that the rights and liberties of every citizen in the community would be placed at the mercy of a chance parliamentary majority.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is the position now—the rights and liberties of every individual are at the mercy of a parliamentary majority.

Mr. WISE. -

The honorable member is now speaking of rights in respect to legislation.
If the Parliament of South Australia were to pass a law contravening the Merchant Shipping Act

Mr. GORDON. -

I am not speaking of Imperial legislation.

Mr. WISE. -

Suppose the Parliament of South Australia wanted to get rid of the Plimsoll Mark Act—even though there were a majority it would be invalid, but according to the honorable member, when, we have here a case exactly analogous, if the Constitution limits the power of the state, and enacts that certain powers shall belong exclusively to the Commonwealth Parliament, and that if the state deals with them it invades the authority of the Commonwealth Parliament, the individual is to have no rights unless he can persuade the Government of the day to take up his case. It is in the interests of the poorer and uninfluential classes of the community, it is, in the interests of the minority, that this amendment should be rejected, because it places an obstacle in the way of obtaining that justice which ought to be free to every individual in the community.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I should like to add my protest against this new clause. I am bound to say something, because the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) says it is only the conservative and timid lawyers who would venture to oppose this proposal.

Mr. GORDON. -

I did not say that. I said as a rule the legal profession is, according to Herbert Spencer, a timid and conservative class.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That may be so, and if the honorable member says he did not make that statement it is all right. Anyhow, I thought he said that only conservative and timid lawyers would oppose this clause. There is no doubt the intention of the honorable member is excellent. He wants to diminish litigation. If he can show that this will diminish litigation to any material extent, and, at the same time, will not involve us in a great many dangers to our liberties, I will go with him, but he has not shown anything of the sort. As Mr. Wise has shown, it will throw an unpopular minority into the power of a chance Ministry of the day. We must see to-day that the rights of individuals, even unpopular individuals, are preserved in the Constitution. I think Sir John Forrest said that I personally had not got sufficient respect for the rights of individuals.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Do I understand him to refer merely to private property?
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Not the same respect as I have.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I understood the honorable member to put himself on the very highest pedestal, and by contrast to put me on the very lowest. At all events, I feel that if this were carried, an unpopular individual, to obtain his rights and liberties, would have to go cap in hand to and be at the mercy of the Government of the day. I was thinking of the pig-tail case which occurred in California, and which I alluded to some time ago, where an abominably unjust law was passed against Chinamen. It was passed to persecute them in regard to their pig-tails, which they regard with exceptional reverence. That law was declared to be unconstitutional as a law passed by a state. I ask honorable members to consider the great difficulty there would be in getting the Federal Congress or Federal Executive to interfere in the case of Chinamen, so as to enforce their rights in such a case. There was an exceptional law which should never have been passed. It was distinctly a persecuting law. Any practical politician would see the great difficulty there would be in appealing to a Federal Executive, especially if there was an election approaching, to enforce the just rights of Chinamen in such a case. The same thing might happen supposing a federal law were passed which was outside the Constitution. Supposing that a majority of the state concerned happened to regard the man as unpopular supposing a law were passed that no one bearing the name of Jones should be admitted into the state of Virginia, the law might be directed against a certain person named Jones, and it would be unconstitutional, and Jones could not enforce his rights to go into that state. I ask, is he to be compelled to go cap in hand to the Attorney-General of the state of Virginia to enforce his rights? I feel that, with the very best intentions, my honorable friend is making the gravest of mistakes. So far as regards the main purport of the amendment, it would mean this: That you could only get a point of this sort decided by having a state or Commonwealth intervening as a party. You would turn judicial questions into political questions. You would proclaim - "Here is a question between the state and the Commonwealth; here is a political question"; and you would make the Judges partisans. It is one of the great advantages of private persons being able to raise these points, and not the states or the Commonwealth, that you keep the judicial bench free from the taint of political partisanship. I feel that the more you look at this thing all round, the more inconsistent it is with the very first principles of justice. It may be said - "Even supposing the law does go beyond the Constitution in some degree, surely it ought not to be left to a private person to upset it." I say it ought to be upset at once and at the very earliest point. As soon as ever you find it has gone beyond the bounds you ought to say - "This thing is illegal." Otherwise you will leave to the Ministry of the day these powers of which you are so careful, giving them to a majority of the states and to a majority of the people. You would allow the Ministry of the day to exercise a suspending power as to whether it would enforce a law or not, which is most dangerous. It is one thing to induce a Government or Parliament to pass an unjust law, and it is quite another thing to induce a Government for one excuse or another to hold its hand from acting. What I fear is that you would often induce the Government to withhold its hand from acting, for fear it would incur opprobrium or unpopularity. I sincerely hope the amendment will not be carried.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

Of course the objections raised are those I expected, only I think they might have been put with even greater force. And there is a great deal more to be said in favour of my motion than I have been able to say. I agree at once with the interpretation of Mr. Wise that this measure is a simple method of amending the Constitution by acquiescence. I intended it to be so, and that is not a demerit—it is a merit—of the proposal. As for the argument that you might as well have no Constitution at all if you allow amendment by acquiescence, that seems rather wide of the mark. People going into a partnership lay down the general terms of that partnership, but they may be qualified by consent. But you must have in your partnership general rules laid down. There are the general lines laid down in the Constitution, which within certain limits may be modified as agreed, so that the honorable and learned gentleman's argument in that view, I think, fell to the ground. Mr. Higgins enforced the argument as to the rights of the individual. Now, I have already said that I think those individual rights should be subordinated to the general rights of the community, and to their interests as expressed in the law for the time being. I object altogether to the objection that party faction would govern. What would govern it would be the sense of the community for the time being. However, as there appears to be no hope of carrying the proposal, I must content myself by submitting it to the committee.

Mr. Gordon's proposed new clause was negatived.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

It is with a feeling of considerable responsibility that I now propose new clause 117A (to follow clause 117), which is as follows:-

If the colony of Queensland adopts this Constitution, or is admitted as a state of the Commonwealth, nothing in this Constitution shall be taken to impair any right which the Queen may be graciously pleased to exercise by virtue of Her Majesty's Royal prerogative or under any statute in respect of the division of Queensland into two or more colonies; but so that the Commonwealth shall retain the powers conferred on it by this Constitution to impose terms and conditions in respect of the establishment of any such colony as a state.

Clause 117 reads as follows:-

A new state shall not be formed by separation of territory from a state without the consent of the Parliament thereof, nor shall a state be formed by the union of two or more states or parts of states, or the limits of a state be altered, without the consent of the Parliament or Parliaments of the state or states affected.

We are all aware that one of the reasons why Queensland is not with us to-day is that in the Parliament of that colony the members for the Central and Northern Divisions voted against the Federal Enabling Bill because they were afraid, from the way in which the measure was introduced, that Queensland would be made one electorate, and that the members of the Federal Convention would therefore be largely elected by people resident in the Southern Division of the colony. In that case, they feared, if clause 117 became a part of the Constitution, they would be deprived of the right of petitioning Her Majesty which they now have. It may be, perhaps, in the recollection of honorable members that on the 9th April I presented at Adelaide a petition to the Convention from the Central Queensland Territorial Separation League. That petition has had the attention of the Queensland electors, and has not been dissented from. I think it would be well if I read a few extracts from it, showing the grounds on which the petitioners desire that a new clause shall be inserted in this Constitution so as to facilitate the entrance of Queensland into the Commonwealth. Before doing that I may mention that the colonies of Victoria and Queensland were separated from New South Wales on petition, and without the approval of the Parliament of New South Wales. In fact, Victoria would never have been able to secure separation from New South Wales if the consent of the New South Wales Parliament had been required. At the time Queensland was made into a separate colony, Her Majesty, as will be seen from the extracts I will presently read, reserved the right to separate Queensland into two or more colonies. The memorialists, amongst other things, made the following statements:-

That, by Acts passed by the Parliament of Queensland, that colony has for certain administrative purposes been divided into three parts, described as the Southern Division, the Central Division, and the Northern Division respectively, with the several boundaries described in the 1st schedule to this memorial.

That in every one of the Government Financial Separation Bills introduced unsuccessfully into the Queensland Parliament from time to time since 1871-

They have had Financial Separation Bills introduced more than once.

the colony was proposed to be divided into three parts-South, Centre, and North.

That the Queensland Federal Enabling Bill, introduced last year, provided for the three divisions being constituted as separate electorates.

The Premier, Sir Hugh Nelson, when moving the second reading of this Bill, said-"Take the Northern and Central districts. We all know that they have a perfectly legitimate aspiration, that they are looking forward to the day when they will be formed into separate states. Why should they not? I propose that they shall of necessity be represented at this Convention by dividing the colony into three electorates-Northern, Central, and Southern, each sending its own representatives. This is a burning question with the electors of the Northern and Central districts."

That is the first time they brought in a Bill in which it was proposed that the members of the Convention should be chosen merely by the members of the House of Assembly. Further on, and this is a matter to which I wish to draw the particular attention of honorable members, the memorialists say-

That the inhabitants of the Central Division have for many years desired the privilege of self-government, and to that end have repeatedly and almost unanimously claimed the boon from the Parliament of Queensland, as well as by petition from the Imperial Government. They rely, not only upon the provision made in past Imperial legislation for the protection and benefit of communities placed in the position of the petitioners, but also upon the implied promise of the Duke of Newcastle, in his despatch of the 18th August, 1858, addressed to Sir William Denison, the Governor of New South Wales, in which he stated that "It will be desirable that the Crown should possess the power of dividing further the territory now created into the colony of Queensland by detaching from it such northern portions as may hereafter be found fit to be erected into separate colonies"; and also upon his despatch to the Governor of Queensland, Sir George Bowen, dated 14th September, 1861, in which he said-"I am not prepared to abandon on behalf of Her Majesty's Government the power to deal with districts not yet settled as the wishes and conveniences of the future settlers may require."
The petition ends as follows:

That a clause of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 contains the provision that subsequent to the passing of the Act of Union no state shall be subdivided, except with the sanction of the Parliament of that state; and your memorialists have reason to apprehend that the same provision will be contained in the Bill of the Convention.

That is so at the present time.

That the enacting of such a provision would be calamitous to the Central and Northern Divisions of Queensland, and leave them perpetually at the mercy of the more numerous but less productive populations of the Southern Division.

That, as an act of simple justice, your memorialists therefore pray that provision may be made in the Constitution Bill of the Convention for the admission of the present colony of Queensland into the Federation as three separate autonomous provinces or states.

Well, of course, we could not think of admitting the present colony of Queensland into the Commonwealth as three different states, because that would give them an undue representation, but my amendment overcomes that difficulty. And I must here express my thanks to the leader of the Convention for putting my proposal into proper form. I therefore hope that the Convention will see their way to adopt this new clause, because it may be the means of facilitating the entrance of Queensland into the Federation.

I have shown this clause to several members of the Queensland Legislature whom I have met in Melbourne, some of them representatives of Southern Queensland.

Mr. BARTON. -

Whom do you say you have discussed the matter with?

Mr. WALKER. -

With several members of the Queensland Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -

With any representing Southern constituencies?

Mr. WALKER. -

Yes, among others, with the representative of Maryborough, and they did not see that Queensland will be in a worse position if this clause is passed than she is at present. Southern Queensland will be in no worse position if the power to petition Her Majesty remains as it now stands. I have myself resided in the three districts of Queensland, so I can speak from personal knowledge. Since the early "sixties" there has been a continual movement for separation, and so much is this state of public opinion in Queensland recognised that the headquarters of one Supreme Court Judge are at Townsville, of another at Rockhampton, and the remainder of the Supreme Court Judges have their head-quarters in Brisbane. The clause I now propose practically says to the people of Queensland-"If you join the Federation you shall have the same privilege as regards dividing your territory as you have now."

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
They have been told that by the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

Mr. WALKER. -
Yes. I shall not detain the Convention further, but if there is anymore information which I can give to honorable members, I shall be most happy to give it. I have shown my proposed clause to a good many members of the Convention, and, so far as I can gather, the feeling is that it seems to be only reasonable that Queensland should not be put at a disadvantage by coming in. At present a large portion of Queensland would be put at a great disadvantage if they came in and this Constitution was not altered, because they would, for all time, lose the opportunity of being separated, except with the consent of the Queensland Parliament, and many years might elapse before they could get the relief for which they have petitioned Her Majesty the Queen.

[The Chairman left the chair at five o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at thirty-five minutes past seven o'clock p.m.]

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
I understood, before the adjournment, that the leader of the Convention was about to offer some remarks on this clause, and awaited with interest what he had to say upon it. For my own part, there seems to be one amendment and one addition necessary. I have, since the adjournment, learned that a similar provision obtains in the Constitution of Western Australia, and it seems to me that the clause should be made to apply also to the

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Why not make it general?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Perhaps that would be better still. But it is interesting to know that the conditions which this clause is intended to meet pertain to more than one colony.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We do not want it to apply to us.

Mr. WALKER. -
Is it not the case that Queensland has not made a special effort to come into this Federation owing to the necessity for this provision?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
But that is not a reason why Queensland should be the only colony referred to in the clause, nor is it a reason why the proposal should not apply to all the colonies. It seems to me that the amendment suggested by Mr. Kingston would be an improvement; but I would suggest that the proper provision is that which is already found in the measure before us, and that is the reservation to the Federal Parliament of the power of subdivision. The exercise of such a power during the separate existence of the colonies would naturally be vested in Her Majesty, but after the establishment of union the proper authority in which to vest such a power would be the Federal Parliament.

Mr. WALKER. -

Look at clause 117.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That clause provides that a new state shall not be formed by separation from another state without the consent of the Parliament thereof. If any power of subdivision is to be given it should be to the Federal Parliament, as such a provision would be more in accordance with a Federal Constitution. In fact, it would be embarrassing to give to Her Majesty such a power, when the state to be subdivided was a member of a federal body, in whose Constitution and whose representative strength such a subdivision would make serious alterations.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

But Queensland apparently does not intend to become a member of the Federation.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The matter can only be considered from the point of view of the possibility of her becoming a member. I am in favour of Mr. Walker's proposal, with the amendment indicated, and with the suggestion made by the Premier of South Australia that instead of confining it to an individual colony the clause should be made to apply generally, and that the power of subdividing should be transferred to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. SYMON. -

You would not make it apply to any other colony as to which the same power does exist?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is not necessary, because clause 117 provides for every other instance in which such power of subdivision may be required.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Is there any such provision in regard to Queensland?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
So I understand. The provision in clause 117 can only be exercised with the consent of the colony to be subdivided. But in two states at least—Queensland and Western Australia—there exists a special power in their present Constitution for subdivision without the consent of the states.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

Although I am quite aware that there is a provision in the Constitution of Western Australia that Her Majesty in Council may subdivide the colony, I think it very unlikely, at any rate under any circumstances we can foresee at the present time, that that event will ever take place unless it is desired by the Legislature of the colony. I am not aware that in the Constitution of Queensland there is any provision for the separation of the colony, although I know that there has been a good deal of controversy in regard to the matter.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Is there any special provision in your Constitution Act?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Yes. I think the Imperial Government has pretty well laid it down that it will not subdivide Queensland without the consent of its Legislature. That has been the position, I think, which has been taken up, if not actually in words, certainly in effect. Although the fact is stated in the Constitution of Western Australia that Her Majesty in Council may subdivide the colony, I suppose that power is inherent in the Imperial Parliament in regard to any British colony. Although it would probably be easier to subdivide Western Australia than it was to subdivide New South Wales, still I take it that the power is inherent in the Imperial Parliament to subdivide New South Wales, Queensland, or any other British colony, if it chooses to do so. But we know very well that that is not likely to take place, at any rate, under circumstances that we can foresee. I cannot think that the proposal of Mr. Walker is one which I should support, because I take it that the subdivision of Queensland is not likely to come about unless with the consent of her people, and that would come about just as easily under a federal form of government, subject to conditions, as it would come about under existing conditions. I do not think it belongs to us particularly to pave the way specially for Queensland in this matter. Queensland, no doubt, will be able to look after herself, to manage her own business in her own way, and, as she is not represented here, I think we should treat her as we treat every other colony in the group, that is, pave the way for her to come in, leaving it to her people to determine hereafter whether it shall or shall not be subdivided.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I shall be very glad if some honorable member who is more familiar with the Constitution of Queensland than I am can tell us precisely where this alleged power of subdivision exists.

Mr. WISE. -

It is in their Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I shall be very glad if some honorable member will point it out to me. So far as I have been able to gather, the Imperial Act of 1855, 18 and 19 Vict., chapter 54, provides that the northern boundary of New South Wales may be altered by letters patent. Section 7 of that Act provides that whenever the Crown does alter the northern boundary of New South Wales, it may constitute the portion north of the newly-constituted boundary into a separate colony or separate colonies. Now, Her Majesty did in 1859, by letters patent, alter the northern boundary, and constituted a colony. It converted the Moreton Bay district into Queensland.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Then is not the power exhausted?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am not aware whether any power of subdivision exists apart from Imperial legislation.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is only Imperial legislation, I think, and then there is the Boundary Act of 1895.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That Boundary Act of 1895 does not, I think, touch this particular point. That is the Act requiring the consent of the colonies to a decision on this point.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That is merely an Act of agreement.

Mr. BARTON. -

It says that where any colony has been or is altered afterwards by letters patent, those boundaries shall be considered the boundaries of the colony.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is a short Act of two or three clauses dealing with the point of the consent of a state, but I don't think it touches the point now before the Convention.

Mr. WALKER. -

That Act only refers to the boundaries of existing colonies and does not deal with severance.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That Act is the 58th or 59th Victoria of 1895. It provides that where the boundaries of a colony have, either before or after the passing of the Act, been altered by Her Majesty the Queen by Order in Council—by letters patent—the boundaries so altered shall be deemed to be from the date of the alteration the boundaries of the colony fixed, and the consent of the colony shall be required to the alteration of the boundary. As I have said, I do not think that affects the present position. So far as I am personally acquainted with the law—I do not pretend to a close acquaintance with it—that is the position. The 7th section of the Act gives power to alter the northern boundary of New South Wales by letters patent. That has been done, and territory severed from New South Wales has been erected into a new colony called Queensland. It looks very much as if the power given by letters patent has been exhausted. I am aware the separatists, as they are called, in certain parts of Queensland have urged on the Imperial Government that there still exists an unexercised power to further subdivide Queensland. Whether that be correct or not I do not know. The Home Government have said they do not abandon the claim to do it, but on what ground that is urged I am not aware. We are not in a position to say there is such a power, and until we are clear on that point we might be taking an extraordinary step if we put in a clause dealing with the matter.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I think it would be prudent, in the interests of the Commonwealth, to retain this power in the hands of the Queen, even if no immediate necessity arises for such retention out of the existing Constitution of Queensland. We know that it is at present admitted by Queenslanders themselves that they have no power of dividing their territory. At the present time the people of Queensland seem to be in a very puzzled condition on this question. The northern and central portions of that colony desire to be separated. They desire Queensland to be divided into three colonies, and not very long ago—I think some two or three years ago—the Secretary of State for the Colonies forwarded the information that no such division might be made until the colonies are federated. Federation, therefore, had to precede the division of Queensland. Now, apparently there is a movement in the northern part of Queensland, which has for its object the reversal of the order of things, and making the division of Queensland precede federation. As the matter stands at present, there is a direct flying in the face of the advice received from home, and no hope whatever is offered to the people of Northern Queensland of obtaining the division for which they ask. They have first to federate, and it would certainly not impede that federation if we retain this provision in the Constitution Bill, which gives Her Majesty the prerogative to say whether that division shall take place or not.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Among the parliamentary papers published in Queensland will be found in the Votes and Proceedings for 1893 a synopsis of Imperial legislation relating to the separation of Australian territories, and the creation of new colonies therein, and the establishment of government therein. In that synopsis (page 1036) reference is made by quotation to the Acts which seem to deal with this matter. The first is 3 and 4 Vict., chapter 62, section 2, which recites-

Whereas the said colony of New South Wales is of great extent, and it may be fit that certain dependencies of the said colony should be formed into separate colonies, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by letters patent to be from time to time issued under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to erect into a separate colony or colonies any islands which are now, or may hereafter be, comprised within or be dependencies of the said colony of New South Wales.

Then, 5 and 6 Vict., chapter 76, section 51, provides that-

It shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by letters patent to be from time to time issued under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to define as to Her Majesty shall seem fit, the limits of the colony of New South Wales, and to erect into a separate colony or colonies any territories which now are, or are reputed to be, or may hereafter be, comprised within the said colony of New South Wales: Provided always that no part of the territories lying southwards of 26 degrees s

13 and 14 Vict., chapter 59, section 32, provides-

And whereas by the said firstly-recited Act of the sixth year of Her Majesty power is reserved to Her Majesty, by letters patent to be from time to time issued under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to define the limits of the said colony of New South Wales, and to erect into a separate colony or colonies any territories which then were, or were reputed to be, or thereafter might be, comprised within the colony of New South Wales: Provided that no part of the territory lying southwards of the 26th degree of south latitude in the said colony of New South Wales should by any letters patent as aforesaid be detached from the said colony of New South Wales: And whereas it is expedient that the power reserved to Her Majesty as aforesaid should be extended over certain parts of the said territories lying southwards of 26 degree of south latitude upon the application of the inhabitants thereof: Be it enacted that it shall be lawful for Her Majesty from time to time upon the petition of the inhabitant householders of any such of the territories in the said proviso mentioned as lie northward of 30 degrees of south latitude to detach such territories from the colony of New South Wales, and to erect such territories into a separate colony or colonies, or to include the same in any colony or colonies to be established under the powers of the last mentioned Act; and all powers and provisions of the last mentioned Act in respect of any new colony or colonies to be established under such Act shall extend to any new colony or colonies to be established under this enactment.

Then there is a provision in the New South Wales Constitution Act, section 7, that-

It shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by letters patent to be from time to time issued under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to erect into a separate colony or colonies any territories which may be separated from New South Wales by such alterations as aforesaid of the northern boundary thereof.

Further, the 24th and 25th Vict., chapter 44, section 2, provides-

It shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by such letters patent as aforesaid, to annex to any colony which is now or may hereafter be established on the Continent of Australia any territories which, in the exercise of the powers hereinbefore mentioned, might have been erected into a separate colony: Provided always that it shall be lawful for Her Majesty in such letters patent to reserve such powers of revoking or altering the same as to Her Majesty shall seem fit; or to declare the period during which such letters patent shall remain in force; and also in the revocation or other determination of such letters patent to exercise in respect of the territories referred to therein or any part thereof all such power and authority as might have been exercised if the said letters patent had never been issued.

And then the petition says-

It is assumed that the foregoing citations establish these facts-

(1) In the beginning the Crown carried out the details of administrative government and restricted legislation.

(2) By the Act of 1842 (5 and 6 Vict., chapter 76), the separation of the two functions-division of territories and establishment of colonies-was first indicated, the reservation of the divided power to the Crown being distinctly stated. By this Act the elective principle was first introduced.

I mention this to show the position taken up by those who advocate separation.

(3) By the Act of 1850 (13 and 14 Vict., chapter 59), the reservation to the Crown of the power to separate territories was re-affirmed; but with the right vested in the inhabitants of Australian territories to call for its exercise. As regards government, the elective principle was continued, and the power to the Legislative Council, established under the preceding Act, and the Act presently cited, to establish an enlarged form of Legislature, either of one or two Houses, with either partly nominative or wholly representative. By the 37th section of this Act these powers were extended to all new colonies from time to time created on separated territory, and it thus became the constitutional, charter of Australia, and on which or from which all the Australian Constitutions have been framed or devised.

The New South Wales Constitution Act of 1853 and the recent Western Australia Constitution Act were both submitted to the Imperial Government on this authority, of which no diminution has hitherto been attempted, except by the 18 and 19 Vict., chap. 54, by a provision in which the form of Legislature and Government in new colonies was directed to be in accordance with those in force at the time in New South Wales. This proviso was repealed by the 24 and 25 Vict., chap. 44 (1861), and the provisions of the 13 and 14 Vict., chap. 59, are the only ones in force at the present time.

That seems to be the position which the petitioners took up, that the division is possible, and ought to be carried out, under Act 13 and 14 Vict., chapter 59.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is not the power of creating new colonies exhausted?

Mr. BARTON. -

In all these cases the power may be given by letters patent from time to time. The power is not exhausted as long as there is territory to operate upon.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Her Majesty might have constituted a portion of that territory into a colony.

Mr. BARTON. -

She might. She might have made Southern Queensland into a colony, and not dealt with the remainder. Then the question arises, whether the power might not be exhausted by the territory to be operated upon being also exhausted—whether these powers are such as entitle Her 'Majesty, after making a subdivision, to make a further subdivision of the same territory. There is a doubt as to whether the alteration of boundaries can be read so widely as to mean the separation of territory. Having explained the position of the petitioners, who seem very urgent in their claims, I feel considerable doubt and difficulty about this clause myself. I should be very loath indeed to omit any reasonable provisions from this Constitution which might satisfy the inhabitants of Queensland as to the terms on which they might hereafter come in-not terms affecting the Commonwealth, but terms affecting the relations of one part of that territory with another part. It might be wise to provide that nothing should be done by this Constitution which should determine any existing right of the Crown to be exercised as this Act specifies upon the call of the inhabitants, and there, probably, the Convention will be agreed. I do not complain of the form of the clause, because I have had a hand in drafting it myself. It simply refuses to impair any right that may exist. The real question is whether, taking all these Acts into consideration, there is really anything to be conserved.

Mr. WISE. -

It can do no harm.

Mr. BARTON. -

No, I am inclined to think it can do no harm; but I recognise that the electors of Southern Queensland are in a majority, and that Southern Queensland has all along resisted this separation, and claimed from the Imperial Government the right of determining when the separation should be made. That is to say, the people of Southern Queensland, being in a majority in the Queensland Parliament, have all along urged that they are the people who should determine the question of separation; and, that being so, I am in doubt whether, by the passing of this clause, we may not generate some friction which will be rather adverse to the interests of federation. It is quite true that the passing of the clause will not derogate from their claim, because, if Her Majesty has no right to subdivide the colony further, this provision will have no effect. On the other hand, we should be careful not to put into the Bill anything which is merely blank cartridge, as in that case this provision would be. I do not want to give any strenuous opposition to the proposal. We should, however, consider it well, and if we agree to it, it might be well for the President to telegraph to the Queensland Government-who, so far as the Convention is concerned, represent the colony-the text of the clause, and to ask for their opinion upon it. Our action in passing the clause would not have finality at this stage, and this might be a good opportunity to get the opinion of the Queensland Government.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Which Government may or may not represent the people of the colony.

Yes; but in, regard to any colony which is not represented here, we must assume that the Government is the only authority which can present the opinions of the people. The clause raises a difficulty, and the question arises whether we should embody it in the Constitution, or whether it would not be better that a telegram should be sent to the Government of Queensland, intimating that the clause had been proposed, and inviting their opinion upon it. That could be done at the present stage, and would prevent any trouble if, as might happen, the clause were negatived. Perhaps it might suit the views of the honorable member (Mr. Walker) to withdraw the clause until a reply could be obtained. That would preserve our right to deal with the matter, because we could at a later date insert the clause upon the recommittal of the Bill if we found that the views of the Government of Queensland sustained the opinion that the clause was one which should be passed. I would suggest to the honorable member that, as a middle course, and one which would not involve friction-because, although we may put the clause into the Constitution, and take it out again, we may arouse jealousy and friction, which would do no good, in the face of our desire to see Queensland a member of the Federation-he should withdraw the clause until we can hear from the Government of Queensland. That course would not leave the memory of any past wrong. At the Present time we are not quite sure of the effect of the proposal, although members of the Queensland Legislature-one of them representing a southern constituency-

Mr. WALKER. -

The Chairman of Committees.

Mr. BARTON. -

Although these gentlemen have told the honorable member that the provision is a good one, we might get a more authoritative pronouncement by taking the course I suggest.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

I have much pleasure in complying with the suggestion of the leader of the Convention, more especially as it will give our Queensland friends another opportunity of knowing that it is our wish to act in a thoroughly federal spirit, so far as that colony is concerned. I may mention for the information of honorable members that when Queensland was established as a separate colony, on the 10th December, 1859, its total population was under 30,000; it is now about 470,000-a very considerable increase in 38 years. The portion of Queensland which does not want federation at present, but which wishes to make provision for it, contains 170,000 people-a population as large as that of the great colony of Western Australia. I have no doubt but that if we follow the suggestion of our leader good will eventuate. I have no other object than to do what I can to bring the great colony of Queensland into the Federation, being one of those who think that the Federation of Australia will never be complete until we are surrounded by water as our natural boundary. With the permission of the committee, I beg leave to withdraw the proposal in the meantime.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

I object. I would like to point out to the Convention that this is a much more important clause than it seems to have been considered by the leader of the Convention, who has pointed out the various enactments under which the different colonies have been established. He has pointed out that by some means, which he did not well define, we might, by putting in a clause of this kind, arouse a spirit of jealousy in the people of Queensland. He suggested that the way to get over this difficulty is for this Convention to appeal to the Government of Queensland to learn their opinion upon it. The Government of Queensland have had ample opportunity, had they chosen to be as earnest in the cause of federation as the other colonies, to be represented in this Convention. It is not to the Government of Queensland that this Convention should desire to appeal. I believe this clause has been drafted by the Drafting Committee.

Mr. REID. -

No; mainly by Mr. Walker.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

It was submitted, I believe, by Mr. Walker, and drafted by the leader of the Convention, and it was meant to provide an easy means by which the people of Queensland could approve of this Constitution. We must all recognise that every delegate here is most anxious that federation should be completed by the admission of Queensland upon the same terms that we are being admitted ourselves. In another portion of this Constitution we find that with regard to other states coming in it will be necessary, perhaps, later on, for a bargain to be made between the Commonwealth as then established and the new states seeking admission. We all recognise that the difficulties in Queensland have been, first of all, a generally greater desire for the separation of the colony into three portions than for federation. We must all admit, that, had it not been for the peculiar action of the Government of Queensland, that colony would have been represented in this Convention. I have no need to call attention to the telegrams that we received at different times from the representatives of that Government as to their desire to join in the deliberations of this Convention. We know perfectly well that those desires, as expressed in their telegrams, could not have been in earnest, or they would have been represented here. And what does Mr. Walker seek to do now? He seeks to place the colony of Queensland in a position that they would be able to come into this Federation, when it is formed on precisely the same advantageous terms as the other colonies who are now taking part in it.
Mr. BARTON. -
That is not the object of Mr. Walker's clause.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Of course it is not all the object of that clause.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Queensland in have to come in on better or worse term than the other colonies. The new term might be better.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
We will admit that; but I am sure that neither Queensland nor any other colony would seek to be admitted on better terms than the smaller colonies are admitted. But one thing those who have sought Mr. Walker's aid desire is that they shall not be prejudiced, and that they shall still have a right, if necessary, to subdivide their colony.

Mr. WALKER. -
Subject to Her Majesty's will.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Subject, of course, to Her Majesty's will. And the clause is so drawn that I cannot see for a moment, nor has the leader of the Convention pointed out, one reason that could possibly lead to any friction or any possible jealousy. The honorable gentleman talks about the possibility of friction, and about the possibility of arousing jealousy in Queensland in this matter, but he has not shown us any reason for it. What point is there in the whole clause, from first to last, that can possibly give occasion for any jealousy on the part of the people of Queensland?

On the contrary, it might arouse the most intense jealousy on the part of South Queensland, which, at present, has the majority.

Mr SOLOMON. - Well, we all know pretty well that, as far as the south of Queensland is concerned, we have very little hope from that portion of the colony in regard to federation-very little indeed. It is more the central and the northern portions of Queensland that we have to look to for the majority of the people being favorable to federation. This clause seeks to do two things-first of all, to permit the colony of Queensland to come into the Federation, and next to preserve their right in reference to the subdivision of the colony at a later date; and, more than that, it provides against any objection that might be raised by the members of this Convention as to the representation of the separate portions of Queensland, by stating that if that colony is subdivided in the future, by permission of Her Majesty, in accordance with her prerogative, those states shall then only come into the Federation on such terms as may be made with the Commonwealth. Will the leader of the Convention, or any other honorable member, show me a single legitimate reason for refusing to mollify the people of Northern and Central Queensland by a clause of this sort, or a reason why we should not place such a clause in our Bill? I would like to hear some other members of this Convention, who are, no doubt, as anxious as I am myself—as anxious as most of us are, I believe—to see Queensland represented in this Convention, and joining the Federation, because without that colony it will be a very incomplete Federation of Australia.

Mr. WALKER. -
It will be lop-sided without Queensland.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
A very lop-sided Federation indeed. I would like those honorable members to show some real cause for withdrawing this new clause.

Mr. WISE. -
It is only temporarily withdrawn for a day; it will be brought on again.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
For what reason is it withdrawn?

Mr. WISE. -
To get the views of the Government of Queensland; we shall not be bound by them.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
That is a reason we have no justification for descending to. The views of the Government of Queensland on this point are not such as should influence this Convention to any extent.

Mr. WISE. -
Probably they would not.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Our experience of the Government of Queensland has not been, so far, of the most satisfactory description.

Mr. WISE. -
We can discuss their views when we get them. Why occupy time in the discussion of the matter now?

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I hope the honorable member (Mr. Walker) will reconsider the subject before he withdraws the clause on the off chance of it being considered, probably next week, when a great many honorable members of this Convention will be in a hurry to get away to their own colonies, and when it will not have a fair chance of being fully and fairly discussed. This clause appears to me to have been carefully drafted, and it is calculated to obtain the approval of the majority of the people of Queensland. Of course, there may be an anti-federal feeling on the part of some people in the southern part of Queensland, where the mercantile community are in strong force, and where they recognise that under federation they will have a powerful opposition—or rather, I would say a powerful competition—from the merchants of Sydney operating against the merchants of Brisbane; but the central portion and the northern portion of Queensland look upon it from a far wider stand-point. If the question of being represented in this Federation had been put to the citizens of Queensland in the same way as it was put to the citizens of New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, we should have seen ten Queensland representatives sitting here with us to frame this Bill. I ask the honorable member not to withdraw his proposal, but to insist on having it discussed, at any rate, at greater length than it has been discussed.

Mr. WISE. -
And of losing it.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I do not think so. There would have to be more cogent reasons given why it should be rejected than have been given before it would be lost. I hope it will be fully considered before the honorable member withdraws it, on the off chance of having it discussed on another occasion with the fullness that its importance demands.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -
I suppose it will be readily recognised that no one has more sympathy than I have with any proper attempt to secure the inclusion of Queensland in the Federation of the Australian colonies; but it appears to me that if we adopt the clause proposed by Mr. Walker we shall be making a mistake, and if we postpone that clause for the purpose of consulting the Government of Queensland as to their views about the inclusion of it in the Bill, we shall be making a still greater mistake. With all deference to the leader of the Convention, it appears to me that, while his suggestion is admirable as a matter of courtesy, it will be an entire mistake as a matter of business to adopt any such course. We have already objected on two or three occasions to the inclusion of the name, of a particular colony for special treatment. We know that there was strong objection to the special mention of Western Australia—and both on the ground that it would be a mistake to adopt the suggestion of the leader of the Convention, and also because it is unnecessary, I hope that this proposal will be withdrawn. I would ask the attention of the Convention to clause 114 of the Bill, which relates to the admission of existing colonies to the Commonwealth from time to time, and I would put it to honorable members whether it would not be quite as well-I think it would be rather better-to accomplish the object of the mover of this new clause by simply recommencing clause 114, and inserting some such words as "or any subdivision of such colonies." I will just read the first few words of the clause to which I refer:-

The Parliament may from time to time admit to the Commonwealth any of the existing colonies of-

And then follows a direction for the insertion of the existing colonies which have not adopted the Constitution. If, after these words, we were to insert the words "or any state formed by the subdivision thereof," it seems to me that we should accomplish all that we ought to be asked to accomplish. It would, in my opinion, be a great mistake to encumber this document which we are preparing, and which we hope will last if not for all time at any rate for, many years, perhaps for centuries, with the mention of any particular colonies, if we can by any general terms accomplish otherwise what we desire. I take it that all we desire is to leave the power open, not only for Queensland, but for any subdivision of Queensland, to come in on terms agreed upon; and by the adoption of such words as I have mentioned rather than by the insertion of a special name, as proposed by Mr. Walker, we can best accomplish our object. For this reason, I hope that the clause will be either withdrawn or rejected, and that such an amendment as I have suggested will be made in clause 114, which will give all that Queensland can desire to meet the case of her possible subdivision.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I do not think that the honorable member who has just spoken (and with his views as he expressed them I entirely agree) has quite touched the difficulty here. Queensland will be as free up to the time when she joins the Commonwealth (should she join it) as she is now to take advantage of any Imperial statute regarding the subdivision of her present territory. The difficulty about her subdivision is this: At any time, if the Parliament of Queensland agreed, she could be subdivided. But the Parliament will not agree, and the party in the minority are seeking to invoke the power of the Imperial Parliament against the majority in opposition to subdivision. If Queensland came into the Federation under clause 117, she could only be admitted on such terms as the Federal Parliament thought fit to impose.

Mr. HOLDER. -
That is to say, by becoming a state under the Federal Parliament she loses her power to subdivide?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is so. So that the difficulty really cannot arise until Queensland desires to join the Federation. If this clause of Mr. Walker's were carried it would be at once an incursion by this Convention into the most dangerous area of Queensland party politics. We cannot conceal from ourselves that if this clause were put in the Constitution it would be, on the face of it, taking part with the separatist party, which might do incalculable injury in regard to the rest of Queensland. A proposal has been made, and I think a very good one, that my honorable friend (Mr. Walker) should withdraw this clause for the present; but I do not altogether fall in with the suggestion that the President of the Convention should make a communication to the Government of Queensland.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I hope not.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I quite agree with what has been said by Mr. Solomon and Mr. Brown. We ought not even to go to the length of making any appeal to the Government of Queensland officially on this matter, because I think it would be just as near the mark to ask the Premier of New South Wales some question regarding the policy of protection or freetrade in that colony, or any other question of local party politics, as to ask the views of the Government of Queensland at the present time on the question of federation. I think it may be very desirable, in order that we should not dismiss a proposal of this kind without the fullest consideration, that the views of the Government should be ascertained, but I think they might be ascertained by our leader in an unofficial way; and before we finally decide this question we will have the advantage of having those views, and will be able to decide for ourselves how far they represent the views of the whole of Queensland, how far they represent the views of the separatist party, and in what way they will throw light on what we are to do in the decision of this question. Anxious as I am to see Queensland join the Federation, my own view at present is that we might be doing more harm than good by putting in the Constitution any provision which would seem to lean towards one party rather than another in the local politics of Queensland.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I rose simultaneously with Mr. Solomon to point out the same arguments as he and two others have submitted, probably better than I could have done. I desire to remind the Convention of one thing which I think adds weight to the words which have fallen from Mr. O'Connor. It appears to me the Government do not represent the colony of Queensland on the question of federation. I say that with some hesitation. I do not for a moment say that the Government of Queensland are not the right authority for any one to communicate with privately. But I would just call the attention of the Convention to what happened when the Enabling Bill was before their Parliament, which ended in our friends not being with us here. The Bill was introduced by the Government. A member of the Opposition asked Ministers to pledge themselves, I think, to the effect that the three divisions of the colony which they desired to obtain should to some extent have their proportional number of delegates, instead of having ten men elected by the whole of the colony, ignoring the division in which the separatist party want the colony to be divided. The Ministry declined to give that pledge, a debate ensued, and the Bill was rejected, I think by a majority of one. We have before us the distinct fact that the Ministers were in a minority, and that the Enabling Bill was negatived by a division, which showed that the Opposition, or the separatist party, practically, on that occasion at all events, had a majority in the Parliament. Under these circumstances it appears to me that it would be suicidal for us to interfere in any way in this matter. I do not think the suggestion that the President of the Convention should communicate with the Ministers is a wise one. I think the only thing which can be done is that Mr. Walker, or possibly our leader (Mr. Barton), should, in a distinctly private way, take any step he likes to take.

Mr. BARTON. -
I have drafted a telegram to Sir Hugh Nelson now, as from myself, setting out the clause, telling him what has happened, and asking him if he can favour me with the views of his Government.

Mr. DOBSON. -
That is the only thing which can be done, and I even fear that doing that much, and having this little debate, will get us into hot water. We know from what happened that Southern Queensland and the Government will not be in accord with this clause. We know perfectly well that the fact that some of us wish to pass the clause will make some of our northern friends in Queensland look with some suspicion and hostility on the Convention. The matter appears to me to be one which we should leave severely alone.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -
I still intend to withdraw the clause, with the permission of the committee. I am very glad that Mr. Barton is going to take the action he has indicated. I will follow that up by a private telegram to Sir Hugh Nelson, and, with the permission of the committee, I will bring forward the clause at a later stage.

The clause was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I may point out that Mr. Holder's new clause is proposed to be put as the last clause of the Bill, and that if Sir John Forrest wishes to propose his new clauses he should do so now, to follow after clause 102.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

Honorable members are aware that no mention is made in the Bill as to the mode of appointment of the Governor of a state. I believe the result of that omission will be that the Governors of the several states will be appointed by Her Majesty in the way in which they are now appointed. Honorable members will also [P.1703] starts here recollect, that, in 1891, a provision was placed in the Bill by which the states had power to legislate in regard to the office of Governor of a state. That provision was excised in Adelaide, I think very wisely, and there is now no provision in the Bill for the appointment of a Governor of a state. We have provided that the Governor-General shall be appointed by Her Majesty, but we have said nothing whatever, as far as I can recollect, in regard to how the office of Governor of a state is to be filled. I hope that no one will think that I have any desire, to weaken the bonds which unite us to the great mother country. Every one of us, I think, is agreed that the Federation we are trying to create—in fact, it is mentioned in plain words in the preamble—shall be a Federation under the Crown of Great Britain. But it seems to me that if we are to have a real federation of these colonies that federation will be very much weakened if we have each state with a Governor, appointed by Her Majesty, from home.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

How can that weaken it?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I will show the honorable member directly. In 1891 the idea was—and, of course, it is more so now, because there is nothing to the contrary in the Bill—that each state should have a Governor appointed by Her Majesty as at present, that that Governor should have the right to correspond directly with the Secretary of State, and that there should be no bond of unity between the Governor-General, as head of the Commonwealth, and the Governor of a state. I think that will be altogether foreign to the Federation I desire to see established. The Federation we may have most experience of is that of Canada, which, like that of Australia, is based on responsible government. In Canada the Lieutenant-Governor of a state holds office during the pleasure of the Governor-General.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
  Canada is not federated.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
  The honorable member may, perhaps, be able to explain that. At present I believe Canada is federated, and the Federation there is most like the Federation we are trying to constitute here, namely, a Federation based on responsible government. I recognise very fully the chief objection to having Governors appointed by the Federal Government. It is generally thought that the colonies would suffer in prestige thereby. There is no fear of that. We know very well—and if we don't know now it is time we did—that these colonies when we become a Commonwealth will cease to have that prominence in the world which they enjoy at the present time. On the 30th of August, 1888, in an address delivered at Sydney—I quote this to show that I have not only thought of the matter now—I used words which are as applicable to-day as then, and which embodied my opinion. Speaking on the subject of federation, I said—

  No doubt there are great difficulties and great prejudices to be overcome before federation takes place, for the different colonies and their different Governments will lose their prominence, and the Dominion Government will alone be known in the world. This is a very serious obstacle to the ambitions of each colony, and will play an important part in preventing the federation of Australia. For instance, we may all know who is the President and Ministers of the United States, or the Governor-General and Ministers of Canada; but how few of us know anything, for instance, of the local Governments of the state of California, or of the province of British Columbia? The states and provinces are merged in the Central Government and Legislature, and it will be difficult to convince the colonies of Australia that it is desirable to sink their individual prominence and become merely a factor in the Central Government

Mr. REID. -
  Is that in Bryce?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
  No, these are words which I used myself.

Mr. REID. -
  They sound exactly like Bryce.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
  The words are my own.

[P.1704] starts here

Mr. REID. -
  Bryce's book was not published then, but the style is the same.
Mr. HOLDER. -
Perhaps Mr. Bryce copied Sir John Forrest.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do not say that, but the words I have quoted are the words I spoke at a gathering in Sydney in 1888. If we are not prepared to face this question of lost prestige-for that is what it comes to-we are not prepared for federation. Another reason why I think the Governors of the various states ought to be appointed by the Federal Government is that we should desire this Constitution to be self-contained.

Mr. SYMON. -
Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
My friend (Mr. Symon), in the early part of this session, while addressing himself to the constitution of the High Court, used these words-
I understand we are creating a nation which is to be self-contained, self-sufficing in every possible respect.
If that applies to the constitution of the High Court, surely it should also apply to the appointment of the heads of the states in the persons of the Governors.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Are we creating a Federation under the Crown?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Yes, and it will not be less under the Crown because the Lieutenant-Governors, or whatever we call them, are appointed by the Governor-General.

Mr. SYMON. -
A federal monarchy.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I desire with my friend (Mr. Symon) that this Federation should be self-contained. Speaking for myself, I desire that the very highest post on this great continent should be open to our own public men. That would give dignity to our public life. At the present time in our own small Governments we do not go out of our own colonies for officers to fill the highest posts in the land, leaving out the position of Governor. We have our own Chief Justices and Puisne Judges appointed by the local Government. If there be a High Court established, as there will be under the Federal Constitution, the Judges of that court will be selected from the public men of Australia.

Mr. SYMON. -
And they will dispense final justice.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I don't know about that.

Mr. SYMON. -

Oh, I think so.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

If we are prepared to trust the Federal Government to appoint the Judges of the High Court, and also other officers to carry on the business of the Government, why should we refuse the right to appoint our state Governors? At present we must remember our field of selection is very much restricted in appointing Chief Justices, Puisne Judges, and other high officers. But when we have the whole of Australia to select from, our area will be very much enlarged, with the result that better men may be appointed. In selecting a Lieutenant-Governor for a state the Government would not be restricted to the state in which that officer would have to perform his functions, but would have the whole of Australia to select from.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

You have disqualified the Judges for that office, have you not?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

There would be a wider selection, with the exception of the Judges.

Mr. WISE. -

In the states the Judges are not disqualified for the office of Lieutenant-Governor.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

There is difficulty enough at the present time in obtaining prominent English statesmen and noblemen to take the position of Governor in these autonomous colonies. When we have federation the prestige of these smaller Governorships will be very much lessened. The states then, although they will be autonomous, will not be autonomous to the same degree as at present. Under such circumstances, will the difficulty of obtaining Governors not be very much greater? Does any one think we shall be able to attract prominent English statesmen and noblemen to come here as state Governors? If we are not able to do that—and we certainly will not be, because we are scarcely able to do it now—we will find that the men selected for the position by the Imperial Government will not be so experienced, or in any way better qualified to uphold the dignity of the office than persons who could be obtained in Australia. I admit freely that there may be some difficulty in the colonies in obtaining suitable persons. There always is a difficulty in obtaining highly-educated cultured persons in new communities. There may be a difficulty probably in the early days in obtaining the most suitable persons to fill these offices.
The same argument would apply with some force to the appointment of the Judges in the various states, and it will apply also to the appointment of Judges of the High Court of the Commonwealth. If we continue the practice of giving these high offices to gentlemen from the other side of the world there will be less inducement to persons of culture and education to remain here, and we shall be less likely to secure a leisured class. This Constitution is not for to-day or for to-morrow, but for all time. We believe that Australia, will, under this Constitution, grow into a great and prosperous nation. All these offices should by right belong to the people who have made the colonies what they are, and who are doing their best to build up on this side of the world a Greater Britain. Some honorable members would leave this matter to the states, as was done in the Bill of 1891. I am altogether opposed to that proposal, because you would not be likely to obtain a constitutional government by such means. You would have a Governor elected by the people, who would probably feel himself to be stronger than the Government itself. An elective Governor is not, in my opinion, quite consistent with responsible government.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Suppose you gave the Federal Parliament power to legislate on the subject of the mode of appointment.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I should not object to that, but my own feeling is that we shall be acting wisely, and certainly consistently, if we leave to the Federal Government, which, of course, represents the Federal Parliament, the disposition of all the offices of the state. If they are worthy to appoint to the great offices of Judges of the High Court, I can see no reason whatever why they should not also be intrusted with the appointment of the Governors of the states. I do not believe that the present plan, if continued, will work well. It is no use trying to deceive ourselves by thinking that the states will be absolutely independent of the Federal Government. That would not be a real Federation.

Mr. BARTON. -

You differ altogether from Mr. Freeman. He says that that is a Federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

My idea is that we want some connecting link between the states and the Federal Government. If you have a Governor who is independent of the Federal Government, and who can correspond with the Secretary of State quite independently of the Federal Government, you will find that the Federation we are building up will not be perfect. The only reason that can be given against the Governors of these states being selected from the Australian people, is the absence of suitable persons of education and culture amongst the politicians of this country. If that is the case now—and I do not think it is—it surely is not a reproach that will last for ever. As time goes on it will disappear, and the best means of insuring its disappearance is to hold out every inducement to persons of education and culture to remain here. - We should not tell the citizens of Australia that it is not to be open to them to aspire to the highest offices in the state, and that those offices are to be reserved for persons brought from the other side of the globe, who may have no sympathy with them in the work in, which they are engaged. I beg now to propose the insertion, after clause 102, of a new clause 102A, which is as follows:-

In each state of the Commonwealth there shall be a Governor, who shall be appointed by the Governor-General in Council, and shall hold office during the pleasure of the Governor-General, but for no longer than six years in any one state at any one time.

If that is agreed to I will then propose the following new clause:-

All references or communications required by the Constitution of any state, or otherwise, to be made by the Governor of the state to the Queen shall be made through the Governor-General, as Her Majesty's representative in the Commonwealth, and the Queen's pleasure shall be made known through him.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not think this is a clause which need take up much of the time of the Convention, although my right honorable friend has, in moving it, departed, to some extent, from his golden rule of brevity.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

How long was I?

Mr. BARTON. -

Not very long. I do not recognise the force of the argument that, because the colonies have to face a possible loss of prestige under the Federation, that is a good reason for taking away a little more of that prestige. If it is true that there will be a diminution of prestige, I suppose it would be important to those who do not wish to have that prestige further diminished not to take another step in the same direction, which certainly is the sum and substance of this proposal. We have, from the beginning, had before us, with certainly some exceptions, but to a large extent, the idea of a Federation as defined by Mr. Freeman. Now, Mr. Freeman, in his History of Federal Governments, lays it down that as between the Federal Commonwealth and the states the one should be sovereign in its sphere just as the others are sovereign in their sphere.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Then you would let them appoint their own Governors.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not say that. I say that as between the Commonwealth and the states the one should be sovereign in its sphere just as the others are sovereign in their sphere, and that is a question of the relations between them. It would certainly destroy any approach they might make to coming within that definition to leave the highest office in any of the states to be made the subject of appointment by the Governor-General of the Commonwealth. There would no longer be that independence of relation to which the right honorable member objects, and which is one of the essences of a Federation. So far as you depart from the independence of the state, as between it and the Commonwealth, in all matters relating to purely internal government, you depart from the definition of federation which every philosophical writer on the subject has given. Nor do I think the precedent of Canada furnishes any reason why we should adopt the course taken in that case. It is well known that, although Canada is called a Federation, it differs in many serious respects from a Federation, and that the individuality of the states, which every one of the states concerned in this endeavour to federate maintains as a prime object, would suffer, not in prestige merely, but in actuality, by the adoption of such a clause. I do not think we shall be doing wisely or well if we adopt a clause of the kind. We should be departing from what is the fair and authentic idea of a Federation for the mere purpose of taking away a prestige, the loss of which, if it did take place, would be lamented by a great many of those who will have to vote for this Constitution. That is not the way to commend the Constitution to the people. It will rather have the effect of inducing many of them to reject it, and for that reason alone I should be strongly disinclined to agree to any such proposal.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It will come someday.

Mr. BARTON. -

My right honorable friend has asked what reason is there against this proposal. He might as well ask what reason is there against the Governor-General appointing the Judges of the states. To what extent would this remain a true Federation if such a provision were inserted in the Constitution?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You would object more to the state doing it.

Mr. BARTON. -
My right honorable friend's argument might be extended to the appointment of any class of officers. It is only a question of degree. What would be the result of such an argument in a system of federation?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Would you let the state Governments make these appointments?

Mr. BARTON. -
No.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We are in accord in this.

Mr. BARTON. -
I believe that, as these colonies propose to federate under the Crown, the appointment of the Governor-General should come from the Crown; and, for a very similar reason, the appointments of the Governors of the states should come from the Crown. My right honorable friend, by his interjection, has given us a remarkably good reason why we should not adopt the new clause. He has stated that the only reason that can be urged against its adoption is that there are not enough good men in the colonies to fill the position of Governors. There may be enough competent men for these positions, but that is not the reason why I think that the power of appointment should be in the Crown. If my right honorable friend wants to declare that the citizens of the Commonwealth shall be eligible for the position of Governor—though I should not follow him there—he might have some reason for putting a declaration of that kind in the Constitution. I take it, however, that the appointment of persons in the Commonwealth to the position of Governors would probably result in the appointment of men who had led the life of political partisans, and who were, therefore, less fitted for the office than men outside the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
The same argument would apply to the appointment of the Judges.

Mr. BARTON. -
No. A man who belongs to apolitical party is advocating the views of that party day by day, but a man employed in the business of an advocate has to deal with various sets of men and various sets of cases. If the right honorable gentleman only knew the effect of his profession upon the mind of an advocate, he would know that the training of an advocate does not unfit him to take a calm judicial view of things. But a man who had lived a life of political partisanship would be unfitted for the position of Governor.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We have had cases of Premiers being appointed Judges.
Mr. BARTON. -
That may be so. If my right honorable friend wants to increase the range of choice, his more rational course would be to declare that citizens of the various states shall be eligible for the position of Governor.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
They are eligible now.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes; and there is an instance upon record in which a citizen of New Zealand was appointed Governor of a Crown colony. I am not, however, seriously concerned in arguing this point. I take it for granted that the citizen of a state is eligible for the office of Governor, and I have read and heard it urged with some warmth that if the Crown were to take more account of distinguished colonial citizens in making some of its appointments, that would tend to bind the empire more closely together. But, by limiting the range of appointment, as the right honorable gentleman proposes, the inevitable result will be that the Governors of the various states will be Australian citizens, and I do not think that any good can result from this restriction. In my opinion, it is better to leave the po

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -
In the Convention of 1891 there was a member named Mr. John Forrest. Amongst us at the present time is a gentleman called Sir John Forrest.

Mr. HOWE. -
The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Oh, well, have it as you like. It appears that the two names signify the same individual; but I should like to know what has caused the alteration of his opinions?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I cannot remember what was done seven years ago at this moment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
What is the object of allowing the Governors of the states to be appointed by the Governor-General?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do not think this question was ever discussed in the Convention of 1891.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
What good would be obtained by carrying into effect the right honorable member's proposal? Is it not desirable that the Governor of each colony should be a gentleman who has not been so associated with the politics of that colony as to have become a partisan?
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
He might come from Queensland and go to Tasmania.
Mr. BARTON. -
Would the people of Tasmania like that?
Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Such an appointment might be made, but it has always been found desirable to leave the power of appointment with the Home Government. Why not appoint We Governor-General from amongst the people of the colonies, and then go to the fountain-head, and provide that he be elected as the President of the United States is elected? What has been our object in this federation? Has it not been to separate the states Governments as far as possible from the Federal Government? This is attained to some extent by having the Governors of the states appointed by the Home Government.
It is to be hoped that the Commonwealth will not be so far separated from the British Government as was proposed in 1891. It is well known that at the Convention of 1891 some strongly republican opinions were held, and many of the views which were then expounded by Sir George Grey were more or less of a republican nature. The right honorable member was upon that occasion strongly opposed to the appointment of the state Governors by the Governor-General.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do not think so—I was opposed to the election of Governors.
Mr. DOUGLAS. -
It would be as well for the right honorable gentleman to explain to us the reason of his change of opinion.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do not think I have changed my opinion.
Mr. DOUGLAS. -
What advantage would it be to the community if the Governor-General were allowed to appoint the Governors of the colonies? Why not leave the appointment of the Governor-General to the people of the colonies, and provide for a plebiscite for the purpose? The proposal before us is not necessary, and if it were carried we should have to alter several other clauses in the Bill to give effect to it. It is to be hoped that the Convention will stick to the old institutions, and that the Governors of the several colonies will be independent of the Governor-General. If every enactment of the local Parliaments must go through the Governor-General—which is what the provision of the right honorable gentleman means—the effect would be that the states would come more under the influence of the Governor-General and of the Parliament of the Commonwealth. That has not been our object from beginning to end. Our object has been to retain for the slates certain rights, powers, and privileges independent of the federal power. It is to be hoped that we are not going to make an unification in that respect. We have agreed that we will not adopt the Canadian system, but, as far as possible, according to circumstances, we will adopt the principle that each state should be independent of the Federal Parliament.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Would you have the Presidents and Speakers appointed from home?

Mr. BARTON. -
Would you have them appointed by the Commonwealth?

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Sir John Forrest is altogether abroad on this question. The better plan would be to deal with this as we did with another matter recently. Let us give Western Australia the privilege of having a Governor appointed by the Governor-General. No doubt that will suit the honorable gentleman; but, so far as we are concerned, we do not want this, and as far as possible, we will not have it. As far as Tasmania is concerned, there is no doubt we shall send a petition to the Queen asking her not to recognise such a position. I feel confident that the mother colony—although she is a sort of mother-in-law on the present occasion—will also go in for the same thing, and have a proper Governor appointed, instead of the nominee of a nominee, as the honorable member proposes. I hope we shall stick to our institutions in a proper manner. When the proper time comes, no doubt these colonies will form a nation, but that time has not yet arrived.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -
As one of the representatives of the mother or mother-in-law colony, I am afraid I shall not please Mr. Douglas in the view I am going to take. I feel great hesitation in taking an adverse view to that of the leader of the Convention in a matter of this kind. I recognise that there is a certain logical inconsistency between the amendment and the strict theory of a Federation. At the same time, we are not to be governed by theories in dealing with practical affairs. The amendment appears to me to be a fair practical solution of an exceedingly difficult question. One of the chief objections urged against union is the increase of expenditure in government. One of the difficulties is how to reduce the expenditure upon state Governments without diminishing their efficiency. Nothing could be more absurd than the maintenance of six vice-regal courts in the several provinces after a Governor-General has been appointed representing Her Majesty in her dealings with Federated Australia. If this clause is not put in there will be a necessity imposed on each state of getting an alteration of the Constitution by an Imperial Act, a difficulty which will vary more or less in the different states, but which will certainly exist, and cannot be overcome for a long period. If, however, this amendment is passed, we at once secure to the people of every colony that for which they have been asking for a long time, namely, that the Governor appointed by Her Majesty shall be one acceptable to the people of the colony. I do not regard this proposal as being in any way a derogation from Her Majesty's prerogative. Her prerogative will be exercised by the Governor-General and the Ministers of the Commonwealth, just as truly as it is exercised by the Secretary of State in Downing-street. The appointments to the Governorships of the various colonies will be appointments by Her Majesty, whether they are made through the agency of the Ministry of the Commonwealth or through the agency of the Ministers in London; so that, from any point of view, the prestige will remain the same. Such prestige as attaches to the nominee of the Queen will attach to the nominee of the Governor-General of the Commonwealth, in whom it is proposed to vest the appointment of Lieutenant-Governor, but there will be this difference—that the people of each state will inevitably, through their Ministers, be consulted before the Governor-General nominates anyone to that high position. There is another consideration. I look forward to a great alteration in the duties and powers of the Lieutenant-Governors after the Commonwealth has been established. I look forward to seeing the Lieutenant-Governors occupying a much more important political position than they do to-day, and a much less important social position. If we are to have anything like economical administration of the various colonies, there must be a diminution of the parliamentary apparatus in all of them. Probably we may see one Chamber only in each colony, and in that case it may be that we should desire to have a Governor performing purely political functions, as the Governor of an American state does, for the purpose of expressing the executive will of the community, and acting as a restraint upon Parliament when it comes into conflict with what he believes to be the popular opinion of the state. In many ways the position of Governor must be modified.

Mr. GLYNN. -

You cannot modify it unless you change clause 102 of this Constitution.

Mr. WISE. -

I am not sure that the honorable member is right. I do not see that that really touches it. The consideration I wish to bring before the Convention is: That in view of the probable change in the position of the Governors of states, this proposal, which virtually leaves to the people of each state the selection of their own Governor—because no one can imagine the Governor-General, which means the Ministry, appointing any Lieutenant Governor without consulting the Ministry of the state as to the fitness of the person to be appointed—raises the question whether we should not embrace the opportunity in this Constitution of pointing out to the people concerned the opportunity for a diminution of expenditure which may be of a very useless kind. No one feels a higher admiration than I do for the gentlemen who fill the positions of Governors in the various colonies, but, at the same time, I dare say that they would be the first to admit, if at liberty to speak frankly, that the Government Houses, to-day, in the various colonies have to a considerable extent outlived their original purpose—I will not say their usefulness. That Government House which, in the old days, was the centre of a society composed of military and civil officials, fulfilled a purpose of a very distinct and useful kind, but a purpose which it may be doubted can be occupied now that society has widened, and when the social duties of a Governor so much encroach upon his time as to leave him little opportunity of performing the other duties appertaining to his position.
Now, Government House necessarily, not through any fault of those who fill the position, but from the circumstances of the colonies, sets what is altogether a wrong standard of manners and culture. It holds up to the people of the colonies an ideal which is not a true ideal, either of manners or of culture, and that is a necessity of the situations necessity which cannot be removed, but which, as the colonies grow, and as the social circle widens, must every day increase. Consequently, I welcome a proposal of this kind, which gives the colonies an opportunity of expressing an effective voice in the selection of their Governor. I welcome it also for the reason put forward by my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) that it does offer a reward to merit in men born and bred in Australia, because it opens up new opportunities of usefulness to the chief executive officer of the community—the Lieutenant-Governor—and because it binds more closely together the various states in a union in which they will all find their best expression. The fact that this proposal is moved by the right honorable member is sufficient evidence to us here and to everybody outside that it is in no way aimed at weakening the strength of the tie between Australia and Great Britain. If it were, I should not be found supporting it. I believe the amendment is a very valuable one—I am certain that it is a very important one and, if it is carried, I am confident it will 2757

go a very long way to commend this Constitution to the popular approval of Australia.
Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I thoroughly indorse a great many of the remarks which fell from Sir John Forrest in moving this proposal. It seemed to me at the time as if the mantle of the great tribune of the people, Sir George Grey, had descended on his shoulders, because the eloquence with which he appealed to us to keep the highest offices of state in this country within the reach of the citizens of Australia, appeared to be quite familiar to my ears. But there are practical difficulties in the way. As has been pointed out, it is necessary to guarantee the independence of the states in relation to the Commonwealth. Now, let us consider who would be the gentlemen appointed to the positions of Governors of the states by the Federal Executive. They would be creatures of the Federal Executive, of course, and would be essentially party men.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Why should they be creatures of the Federal Executive?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Because they would be appointed by the Federal Executive, and the appointments would

Mr. HIGGINS. -

There is only one party in Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The Judges are appointed by the Executive, and surely they are not creatures of the Government.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

That is a different thing altogether. Judges are not politicians, and this patronage will be given to men who will continue to be politicians.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The appointments to the judicial bench are often political appointments.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

If this system of appointing state Governors is carried out, the highest office in the state will be much more of a political office than it is to-day, and that would lead to a most disastrous condition of things. If the Lieutenant-Governor is to be, in the first place, something of a politician, and his appointment is to be conferred by a party Government, it will be given to a partisan, and I cannot think of anything more likely to be obnoxious to a state, which may not be high in favour with the Federal Government, because, in some states the Federal Government might not desire to conciliate the feelings of the state, and might appoint a member of a party opposed to the party in power in the state-I say I cannot imagine anything more obnoxious to states than the appointment of old politicians as Lieutenant-Governors.
Mr. HOWE. -
Old politicians have made the best Judges on the bench up to the present time.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
The Judges are removed altogether from politics, but the Lieutenant-Governor cannot be so much removed from politics.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Why not? How much influence has a Governor of a colony in its politics?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
I ask the Convention to bear in mind that the nominee-the creature-of the Federal Executive, backed up by the power of the federal authority, would be in no mean position, but in a position of considerable power. While I am entirely with the desire of Sir John Forrest in this matter, I do not see how his proposal can be carried out without exceedingly grave danger. I think it is absolutely necessary that the proposition laid down by the leader of the Convention should be given effect to, namely, that the independence of the states in relation to the Commonwealth with respect to these appointments must be secured. Now, there is one way of reconciling these two positions, and I beg to move, as an amendment to the clause-

That all the clause after "Governor" (line 1) be struck out with a view to the insertion of the following words:-"And the Parliament of the state may make such provisions as it thinks fit as to the manner of the appointment of the Governor of the state, and for the tenure of his office, and for his removal from office."

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That was struck out at Adelaide.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
The right honorable member is now alive to considerations which he did not then recognise, or, at any rate, which he did not then express with the same eloquence. He is alive to the fact that we ought to make the highest offices of Australia open to the sons of Australia, but, at the same time, I am sure he is not desirous of carrying that out in any way obnoxious to the state. By the adoption of my amendment each state can carry out the honorable member's views in the way that seems best to the people of that state. I think it would be a mistake to make the position of Governor elective. No state in a condition of sanity would make such a provision.

Mr. SYMON. -
That is the provision in force in America.
Dr. COCKBURN. -

But the Governor in America is essentially the head of a political party, and therefore occupies an entirely different position from that of the Governor of one of these colonies. Indeed, the very reasons which make his election proper in America make it improper here, because we do not want to see the Governor of a state a partisan. Very considerable powers lie in the hands of the Governor of a state. He has the issue of the writs for the federal elections. That is not placed in the hands of the Governor in Council.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Oh, surely, it is.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I think not. I think it is in the hands of the Governor of the state. Undoubtedly that is a prerogative. The issue of writs for the election of Members of Parliament, and also the dissolution of Parliament itself, are still prerogatives which are exercised by the Governor without the consent of the Executive Council, that is to say, without the formal consent of the Executive, although Governors who understand the matter do not do these things without the knowledge of, and without consultation with, their Ministers. But, unquestionably, it is part of their office to be able to do so, and, therefore, under this system the office of Governor might become more political than it is at present.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

How is it that this system has worked well in Canada?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It has not worked well in Canada, I believe. I am not so well up in Canadian precedents now as I was six or seven years ago, when the matter was fresh in my memory, but I have seen, over and over again, in the writings of those who are most conversant with the methods of Canada, the very objections which I have mentioned raised, namely, that worn-out politicians, old party men, who have done excellent service, who have served their party in their day, and who are entitled to something, and whom, at the same time, the federal authority wants to get rid of, to shelve, are raised to these appointments. Now, that has given rise to a good deal of offence, and we desire to avoid all that here. I certainly want to see everything that Sir John Forrest has proposed carried into effect in such a manner as will in no way imperil the future of the Commonwealth, and, therefore, with a view of carrying out all that the honorable member desires, and at the same time without doing anything which all authorities have recognised is a wrong to the state, I beg to move the amendment I have already indicated.
Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I think this is a very interesting discussion, but entirely out of place here. These are matters to be settled by the states themselves. I cordially agree with my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Wise) that one result of this Commonwealth, if it ever comes about, will be that the system of local Governors and the parliamentary systems of the several states will be entirely remodelled on economical lines, but the way that is to be done will be left for the states themselves. We are framing a Constitution for the whole Commonwealth. There is an entire difference between the Constitution of Canada and the Constitution being framed by this Bill. In the case of Canada everything not expressly left to the states comes under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Dominion. The exact opposite of the case is here. Everything not expressly mentioned in the Commonwealth Bill is left within the jurisdiction of the states. The United States principle has been adopted here as opposed to the Canadian principle. That being so, it would be entirely foreign to the scope of this Bill to depart from its principle by providing for these matters being taken out of the hands of the states. I believe the improvements contemplated will take place, but they can take place by means of state legislation. I fear that if we place this proposal in the Constitution, we shall simply create another prejudice against the Bill.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

My honorable friend (Mr. Douglas) has expressed his surprise at the change of attitude of Sir John Forrest between 1891 and the present time. Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What did I do in 1891?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Still greater is his change of attitude since the beginning of this Convention at Adelaide and the present time.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Why?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Because the right honorable gentleman was then an advocate of keeping up the sovereign rights of the states.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I am now.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Not at all. The right honorable gentleman has made a comparison between the states the Commonwealth as they will be and the provinces of Canada. But the provincial Governments of Canada are simply so many municipal councils—glorified municipal councils, I believe, they have been called and the right honorable gentleman is apparently prepared to bring our sovereign states down to the level of the provinces of Canada. If he will only think of the arguments already advanced against his proposal he should be satisfied. It has been clearly shown that to make the Governor-General in Council the appointer of the several local Governors would be to make them the nominees of the Federal Executive Council—the Federal Ministers—and therefore, necessarily, it would be almost a partisan arrangement, which must have disastrous results to the various states.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It has not been so in Canada.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
The right honorable gentleman goes back to the case of Canada, where the form of government is not a federation, but a confederation.

Mr. SYMON. -
A unification.

Mr. GLYNN. -
And where the federal body can repeal local Acts.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Yes. Yet the defender of the rights of the states of Australia is trying to reduce them to the level of the provinces of Canada. I do not believe that the right honorable gentleman himself hopes to see that done.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
A small colony like Tasmania need not trouble about that.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Size is not everything. A bladder may be large, but there is little in it. He has admitted that there is not the material here for the production of a body of men from whom provincial Governors can be selected.

Mr. SYMON. -
If the material is here the Queen could select from that material.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
But I am showing how the right honorable gentleman has failed to make out his case so as to put any strength into it. According to his own showing, there are no people of culture, or education, or so forth here.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You quite misunderstood me. I did not say that.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
My right honorable friend said something like that. When I heard the right honorable member speaking I was wondering if he was going on to say that there would have to be started a university for the education of Governors, with a master of deportment, and all that sort of thing, and that not do so was a disappointment to me. I hope we shall leave the Bill as it stands in this matter, that we shall not interfere with the prerogative of the Crown in regard to the appointment of state Governors, and that we shall maintain our state Governors in the high position they occupy, and, what is more, in the perfectly independent position they occupy as between parties and parties.

Mr. Howe (South Australia). -

I was very much pleased indeed to hear such a genuine ring of Australian patriotism emanating from my old friend (Sir John Forrest).

Mr. Symon. -

Did not you expect it?

Mr. Howe. -

I expect everything that is good from Sir John Forrest, and this is one of the best proposals I have ever heard emanating from him. So far as I am individually concerned, and so far as I recollect the discussion in the Sydney Convention of 1891, Sir George Grey raised a different question altogether—in fact, his motion was tantamount to severance from the old country.

Mr. Kingston. -

No.

Mr. Howe. -

With that I had no sympathy whatever, and the mantle of Sir George Grey, I would remind my honorable colleague, not yet fallen on the shoulders of Sir John Forrest.

Dr. Cockburn. -

He is nearly as eloquent, and is going very much in the same direction.

Mr. Howe. -

The contention of Sir George Grey was, why should Australia permit the Governor-General to be even nominated by the Home Government? I have no sympathy with that contention at all. I do not believe in "cutting the painter" in any shape or form; but after Australia is federated under a Governor-General, appointed by the Crown, I see no reason why a state should not have a Governor appointed by the Governor-General, or otherwise by the Federal Parliament. It has been said that prominent politicians would be appointed to the position. What is the history of the state from which I come? Prominent politicians who are lawyers, every one of them, are now administering justice on the bench of South Australia, and one of them has discharged the duties of Governor on many occasions, and throughout the length and breadth of the colony his justice has never been impugned by a single soul. I do not see why the Federal Parliament should not appoint one of the prominent politicians to the position of Governor of a province. I would not allow a state to interfere in this matter. Politicians lead their party to victory, and suffer with them in defeat, and there may be an unconscious bias existing. Moreover, if we allow a state to choose its own Governor, and we have a powerful Government, perhaps presided over by a genius like our right honorable friend (Mr. Reid), what is to prevent him from appointing himself to the position? Nothing at all. If it is going to be left to the state to appoint its own Governor, and there is a strong Government in power in that state, it would be quite open for the Premier to be appointed if he desired to take the position. I desire to take out of the hands of the local Government the power to appoint any member of the Executive Council as Governor. I have no objection to the Federal Parliament assuming that function, as a very proper function for it to perform. I was pleased to hear the arguments brought forward in favour of this new departure. Are we in Australia—a nation of nearly four million people—going for ever to send home for Governors to rule over the destinies of each separate province? Have we not men amongst us equal to any who could be brought from home? Are we not likely to have here men superior to those whom the British Government might choose to send out to administer our affairs? Have, we not men who have done great service to the country, and men who are born Australians, who could fill the position satisfactorily? Why should we not give the highest positions in this country to those who belong to the country, and who are pure Australians, instead of sending 12,000 or 13,000 miles for a stranger? In every particular I say Australia for the Australians," and every position which Australians are equal to fulfilling with credit to themselves and honour to the country should be reserved to them.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I doubt very much if the amendment will go the length which my honorable friend (Mr. Howe) wishes. It hardly, in language at any rate, declares that these posts are to be reserved for Australians. What the amendment really amounts to is this: That it would be just as possible for the Governor-General in Council to choose the Governor of a state in England as it would be for the Queen under the present system. My objection to the amendment is not founded on any of the reasons dealt with at so much length. It does not appear to me that the question is that of the material available in Australia for the appointment of states Governors. Nor is the question whether it is desirable or not that political partisans should be appointed. Further, I do not think that the amendment proposed by Sir John Forrest involves any question whatever, even if the amendment were carried, of "cutting the painter."

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I would not move it if it did.

Mr. SYMON. -

I hope both Sir John Forrest and myself would be found resisting any proposal which involved a step in the direction of separation. It appears to me that the real objection to the amendment is that stated by Mr. Reid, that it really seeks to interfere with the state Constitutions. This amendment in its first line is to the effect-"In each state of the Commonwealth there shall be a Governor." What right have we, in the Federal Constitution, to declare that? What right have we to interfere with the Constitutions of the states, which will remain, practically, independent states within the Commonwealth? We are not seeking to interfere in any way with the existing state of things in relation to the head of the Executive. But the proposal would involve us in a difficulty. Having declared there shall be a Governor for the state, the proposal goes on to prescribe, not that the existing state of things shall continue-subject, of course, to the Imperial authority, and to the control of the state itself-but that the Governor shall be appointed for all time under the Constitution, until that is altered, by the Governor-General in Council. And that we are asked to do without the consent of the state. It is not for this Convention to take a step of that kind.
It would be interfering in the highest-and I venture to think the most improper-degree with the functions of the state, which we seek to preserve.
It is a state interest and a state matter entirely; and, therefore, without going into the large question raised by Mr. Wise as to the social and other functions of the Governor, or Lieutenant-Governor, we ought to abstain from taking one step beyond what we are obliged to do in interfering with the existing government of the autonomous states.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I wish to make a few observations with regard to some of the arguments that have been used. The only good argument, I think, which has been put forward was that of Mr. Symon. That may be an argument-I think it is one-which requires careful consideration; but, at the same time, in 1891 we dealt with this matter in a way in which we specially gave power to the states to legislate in the direction of appointing Governors. I think, myself, that those who oppose the proposition now must really be, in favour of elective Governors.

Mr. REID. -

No, no.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That most likely would be the result. Mr. Barton asked why should we restrict the area of selection of state Governors to the Australian Continent. I might ask him a similar question-why restrict the area of the Judges of the High Court to the people of Australia? What would he or any one else think if it was proposed, or thought of for a moment, that in appointing the Judges of the High Court under this Constitution the selection should be made from the Bar of England? I do not think that would meet with the approval of the people here, but it seems that what is sauce for the goose is not sauce for the gander. They are willing to limit the area of selection of the High Court, but they are not willing to limit the area of selection with regard to the Governors of the various states. We have some foundation, at any rate, for the argument which we use. We have the United States of America, in which Governors are elected. That, of course, I do not approve of. I think it is not consonant with our ideas of responsible government to have the chief executive officer appointed by the people. I think friction is more likely to arise under such a system than if you place the Governor in a constitutional position, as we do, by appointing him as the representative of the Queen. Then we have the case of Canada. I have been through Canada. I have had the pleasure of visiting Government House in the state of Ontario, and I found a refined and cultured gentleman dispensing the hospitality of Government House there—not to such a large extent as in the city of Melbourne, but certainly in a way which I think would meet with the approval of every one. We have facts there to guide us. We find that the system adopted in Canada—at any rate as far as my experience goes, which is certainly not a great one—has worked well. Now, it has been said some that this would weaken the tie between the mother country and ourselves I repudiate that idea altogether. I should withdraw this motion, and not say a word in support of it, if there was any chance whatever that there could be any weakening of the tie between the mother country and ourselves. My object through life has been to strengthen that tie, not to weaken it. I believe we owe a deep debt of gratitude to the great mother country, and that we cannot do too much to repay all the good we have received from her. In regard to the statements that we would have politicians as Governors, I can see no objection to that. Retired politicians occupy high offices all over the world. We know that in England the highest offices in the state are occupied by Judges who were prominent politicians in their day. There is scarcely one of these colonies in which you will not find gentlemen who have been prominent politicians, and even party politicians, occupying the chief judicial offices.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

To whom would they owe their allegiance?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I do not think our Judges owe allegiance to anybody except the Crown. We know that the Chief Justices of some of the colonies have been Premiers and party politicians, but I have never heard a word said against them on that ground. Then it is stated that the Governor would exercise an influence in local politics, but that is carrying the matter too far. We know that, under our form of responsible government, the Governor does not interfere. There has been no instance, certainly for many years past, in which a Governor has tried to interfere, or has had the opportunity even of interfering, with local politics. You may depend upon it that if a prominent Australian were appointed to the position he would know enough of constitutional government to prevent him from doing anything so foolish. I believe that, if we leave this matter to the states, we shall very soon have elective Governors. I need not give the reasons, but the trend will be in that direction. Sir Edward Braddon said I stated that persons of education and culture could not be found here. I stated that there might be some difficulty on that account, and that it might be used as an argument, but, I do not think there is much in it. We know that until a few years ago all the Governors of these colonies were civil servants, who had in many cases worked themselves up from humble positions. We had a squatter from New Zealand (Mr. Frederick Aloysius Weld) as a Governor in Western Australia, and he performed his functions admirably, although I admit that his was an exceptional case, as he had special social advantages and great family influence in England. Then we had Sir Frederick Broome, who filled the office with credit. He was a squatter in New Zealand, and afterwards a writer on the Times, and in all these colonies we have had professional Governors filling the office with credit and advantage to all. I see no reason, therefore, why we should not find persons in Australia fitted for these positions. I say that there are such persons now, but we are not making a Constitution for today or to-morrow, but for all time. The only argument of any force against this proposal is that advanced by Mr. Symon, but, at the same time, I think we shall be acting more in the interests of the states if we adopt this plan than if we leave the matter to the states themselves, when the result will be that we shall eventually have elective Governors.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) desire to move his second clause?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No, Sir.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I beg to move-

That the following new clause stand, part of the Bill:-In the event of any law passed by the Federal Parliament being declared by any decision of the High Court to be ultra vires of this Constitution the Executive may, upon the adoption by absolute majorities in both Houses of the Legislature, within six months after the decision of the High Court, of resolution thereto directing, refer the law to the electors under section 121, and if approved as therein provided the Constitution shall be deemed to have been enlarged, and the law shall be conclusively deemed to have been intra vires of this Constitution from the passing thereof.

In the opinion of our constituents, or of a great many of them, one grave objection to this Constitution is that over everything is the High Court. In the opinion of many, the legal formulae and legal proceedings usurp in this Constitution the place which the people have occupied in the state Constitutions. If we accept the Constitution, the final appeal will be, not to the people as represented by the Parliaments, but to the High Court. I admit freely that as the Constitution is a deed of partnership, it is absolutely necessary to have the High Court to interpret it, and to see that the various co-partners keep in all that they do within the four corners of the deed to which they have agreed. At the same time, so rooted is the objection to the position which law occupies in this Constitution that it will be well if we can meet that objection in any way by placing in the hands of the people the final appeal, at least in some cases where the final appeal would otherwise be to the High Court. I do not need to quote from many opinions of others to support what I have said as to the general view that federation means a great deal of law. I noticed in the daily papers in this city a few days ago a report of an address by Professor Harrison Moore, the professor of law at the Melbourne University, in which he said that the legal profession had not had very much to do of late, but that under the Federal Constitution now under consideration the lawyers would have plenty of work. I do not take that comment as coming from one who is hostile to federation, but simply regard it as the expression of Professor Harrison Moore's deliberate opinion that federation under this scheme would mean any amount of work for the lawyers. That is just what the people do not want, and if we can by any means lessen the law work and place the final decision of some matters in the hands of the people, from that point of view we shall do well. I can quite conceive that again and again the Federal Parliament might pass laws involving comparatively small extensions of the Constitution as we have it before us, but yet involving such amendments as, if the people were appealed to, they would certainly indorse-amendments not of sufficient weight and importance to be submitted to the people for their endorsement unless the laws in question were challenged. Therefore, in this amendment I propose that in the event of any law passed by the Federal Parliament being declared by the court to be ultra vires, then the Federal Parliament may, by an absolute majority of both Houses of the Legislature, within six months of the adverse decision of the court, submit the matter to the electors for a referendum in the same way as provided in the clause dealing with ordinary amendments of the Constitution. We have deliberately decided previously that the Constitution should only be amended by direct appeal to the electors, in which the vote shall be counted in two ways. I do not propose to alter that provision in the slightest degree. We have provided that measures altering the Constitution shall only come into force after they have been carried by absolute majorities of both Houses. I include the same provision in this clause. Before a matter can be sent to the referendum, both Houses must by absolute majorities agree thereto.

Mr. Higgins. -

If so, how do you improve the position by this clause?

Mr. Holder. -

The honorable member asks me what effect my clause would have. I will suggest a case. Suppose that it is desired to effect an alteration in the Constitution. The steps necessary for that now would be to introduce into the Federal Parliament a Bill to amend the Constitution. That Bill must go through its various stages, be passed by absolute majorities in both Houses, and must then go to a referendum of the people. But suppose that without any knowledge on the part of the Parliament that that would be the case the major portion of the Bill was found to be outside the limits of the Constitution, and that it was held to be ultra vires. Honorable members will begin to see what this clause would achieve in that event. Supposing in this case the Bill had been passed without any belief by the Federal Parliament that the provisions were ultra vires of the Constitution, and some months afterwards the courts were petitioned to exercise jurisdiction, and pronounced the measure ultra vires; if, then, the Constitution had to be amended in the ordinary way, it would follow that, after the Bill had been passed, after some steps might have been taken under it, after it had been pronounced ultra vires, the whole matter would have to be begun again at the very beginning. You would have once more to introduce a measure to Parliament, to pass it through all its stages, to take a vote of the people, so that all your work has to be done again, whereas under my clause the procedure would be this: The court pronounces the Bill ultra vires; at once, or at anytime within six months thereafter, the two Houses of the Legislature are asked to pass addresses, if they consider it important enough, and think it right to do so, and all the time that would otherwise be spent in passing a new measure through Parliament is saved, because the carrying of the two resolutions would not take nearly so long as the passing of an Act of Parliament. And then this provision comes in. If on the referendum the majority of the states and of the people approve-

The Constitution shall be deemed to have been enlarged, and the law shall be conclusively deemed to have been intra vires of this Constitution from the passing thereof.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Is not that putting matter of legislation in the Constitution?

Mr. HOLDER. -

No, I do not contemplate for a moment putting any legislative matter in the Constitution.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is what its effect will be.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not see how that result could come about.

Mr. ISAACS. -

This makes it retrospective altogether.
Mr. HOLDER. -

I will answer that interjection, which certainly has great weight.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Will the honorable member answer this question: Supposing a law is affirmed by this process, and afterwards another law involving the same question is proposed, is that also made good, or must there be a referendum for that?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I have two interjections to answer. I will deal first with that of the Attorney-General of Victoria. In reply to his statement that this makes the law altogether retrospective, I simply say that the proposal is to make the law retrospective in this sense: That during the interval throughout which it was, according to the judgment of the court, ultra vires, the decision of the people afterwards could make it intra vires.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That might make persons criminals who were not otherwise criminals. It might not have been an offence to do a certain thing if the High Court declared the law to be ultra vires, but if that law was made intra vires from an antecedent date, all the persons who did that thing might be subject to punishment.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I have great respect for the eminent legal authority of the Attorney-General of Victoria, and he may help me to overcome that difficulty, and attain the advantage I seek to attain. Mr. O'Connor asks me, if this were adopted, and under a certain referendum a certain Bill was declared to be intra vires, whether that position would cover any similar Bill adopted afterwards? My answer to that is this. I wish it should do so, that the enlargement of the Constitution should be not merely for the inclusion of the particular measure which had been passed, but for the inclusion of the particular matter concerning which otherwise that Bill had been, but for the referendum, ultra vires. I do not profess to be a draftsman, and I gather that the Drafting Committee have been kind enough to undertake - especially for lay members - to put into proper phraseology any resolutions which the Convention has by a majority declared to embody principles which they wish to have included in the Bill. So I am content, if the Convention adopts my proposition as being an indication of its will, to leave the wording of the clause as it shall appear finally entirely in the hands of the Drafting Committee, and shall be very glad of any help they can give to suggest a method of covering what the honorable member has suggested, so that my intentions may be fully met. I do feel that in any question where the point of the law ultra vires is raised, not the High Court but the people ought to be the final appeal - that if I or any one else is on the other side of this controversy concerning a measure, and I take the ground that it is ultra vires or that it is not, the final appeal concerning what the Federal Parliament may do ought not to rest with the High Court, which can simply determine it on the dry question of law, but ought to rest with those people who, themselves, have the right to say whether or not the Constitution shall be enlarged to take in the particular question at issue. I do not hesitate to affirm that, if we can place this final appeal in the hands of the people instead of keeping it in the hands of the High Court, we will have done very much indeed to popularize this measure, not only in South Australia, but in other colonies. For I do assure honorable members that the presence of so large a number of lawyers as there are in this Convention has helped to give colour to the suggestion, which is very widely prevalent, that this Constitution is being made for the lawyers and for the courts.

[P. 1720] starts here

Mr. SYMON. -

Nonsense!

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is pandering to the popular cry.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think my honorable friend ought to do his best to dispel any such base slander as that.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I can assure my honorable friend that I will do my best to dispel any such base slander as that. I am not stating a matter in which I express my own thought or my own feeling, but I repeat that in what I said just now I am expressing the thought and the feeling of a great many persons outside the Convention who are not so well informed as we are. If we can remove a misapprehension, if we can cure a ground of distrust, by making the people themselves the final arbiters in their own cause, we shall surely be doing well, and by doing that we will not be endorsing, but will be going the very best way possible to refuse an indorsement to that opinion which was dissented from just now.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Why not make them the first arbiters, too?

Mr. SYMON. -

Why not make them the High Court at once?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I have already shown that the adoption of my clause would save a large amount of time. It is quite impossible that the people can sit as Judges, because the function of Judges is one thing, and the function of electors of the Commonwealth is quite another thing. I am not confounding these two. The people are absolutely incompetent to judge whether a certain law is or is not ultra vires, and I would not dream of committing that charge to the people, for there are no persons less fit than the general electors—taken all together on a referendum—of any country to decide whether this or that is true law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You say the people accept the position in law; but they are asked whether they will change the Constitution.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That is exactly it. I would never dream of asking the people to reverse a legal decision arrived at by the High Court. I have been specially careful in the form of the amendment to avoid any such thing. I do not dream that the High Court will on one day say that a certain Bill is ultra vires, and that the people shall the day after, or some months after, say the court was wrong. That is not what I suggest. I suggest that the people should accept the decision of the High Court that the law was ultra vires, but should say it ought not to be ultra vires—that the Constitution should be enlarged so that such a decision could not be given again. I do not wish to leave it to the people to say that the decision was wrong, but to leave them to say that the Constitution should be so enlarged so as to make such a decision impossible in the future. That is a different thing from making the people Judges or giving them a judicial position. I really feel very hopeless as a layman addressing the Convention on a very technical legal point like this. I quite anticipate—and though this is not a wise thing to say, I do not mind saying it—I quite anticipate defeat before I sit down. At the same time, I shall not cease to regret defeat if it comes, nor shall I cease to believe that this way out, or some other which the Drafting Committee could easily suggest, ought to be adopted, so as to avoid the possibility of anybody outside saying, with any appearance of truth, that this is a lawyer-written Constitution. I want to move the motion in a slightly different form. I want to leave out the word "High" before "Court" in each case, so that the word "court" only shall stand. I mean that word to cover not merely the decision of the High Court, but the decision of the last court of appeal from the High Court, if that appeal be made. With that alteration, I move the amendment standing in my name.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I move that progress be reported. I wish to make a statement without discussing the question. I should like honorable members not to go away when progress is reported, because I wish to get an order for the printing of the Bill with the amendments so far, and for the Drafting Committee's amendments to be embodied pro forma in the Bill. In order to do that the standing orders will have to be suspended, and that requires the attendance of a majority of the House.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

Would it not be better for the leader of the Convention (Mr. Barton) to answer the arguments of Mr. Holder, and let a division be taken? If we do not take a division tonight we shall occupy the whole of tomorrow in discussing this question, which includes that of the High Court, the referendum, and deadlocks.

Mr. BARTON. -

After the opinion some persons outside seem to hold about lawyers, I shall leave the discussion of this matter to the laymen.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

The standing orders having been suspended,

Mr. BARTON. -

(New South Wales) moved-

That it be an order of this Convention that the amendments prepared by the Drafting Committee be embodied in the Bill pro forma, and that the Bill, as amended to this day, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON. -

The ordinary course will be the reconsideration of the clauses, and after that, if necessary, the recommittal when the last, of the new clauses and the preamble have been dealt with. It might appear well to make it one stage of recommittal, instead of having a reconsideration stage also. I will leave that to the consideration of honorable members between this and to-morrow.

The Convention adjourned at twenty minutes past ten o'clock.

Petitions-Order of Business-Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at thirty-five minutes past ten o'clock a.m.

PETITIONS.
Mr. REID presented petitions from certain bank's trading in New South Wales, and from the Sydney Chamber of Commerce, praying the Convention to preserve the existing right of the Queen's Australian subjects to appeal to Her Majesty from decisions of the local courts.

The petitions were received.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.
Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
I desire to suggest to our honorable leader (Mr. Barton), if he can conveniently arrange it, that the more important questions should be submitted before those questions which are not so important. I regret to say, as I have already said, that I will have to leave on Wednesday next, and I should like to have an opportunity of voting on some of the remaining important clauses. I desire also to suggest to honorable members that if they have proposed amendments of clauses they should give notice of them. I should be sorry if, after clauses had been decided in a certain direction, the decisions of the Convention were reversed after we leave, if that would not have occurred had the representatives of Western Australia, who have to take their departure next Wednesday, been able to remain here. Although I know I am asking what I have no right to ask for, still I may point out that we have been here a long while, and that we who represent Western Australia occupy a different position from other members of the Convention who are members of Governments, Western Australia being so far away. I hope that the leader will be able to arrange the business so as to meet the wishes of the representatives of Western Australia, to some extent at any rate.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I take it that such a course as my right honorable friend has suggested is more one for the Convention to consider than for me. The Convention is the best judge of the relative importance of the various clauses of the Bill. One can quite understand, as an illustration, that Sir John Forrest would not like to leave Melbourne without having an opportunity of taking part in the discussion with reference to dead-locks. Perhaps that is one of the most important matters that will be reconsidered. I can quite understand his position, and sympathize with him in it; but it is really a question for the Convention itself to determine.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The Convention will follow you in the matter.

Mr. BARTON. -

When the clauses dealing with Money Bills were taken early at Adelaide, in order to accommodate my right honorable friend, there was a specific motion on the subject, which was put to the Convention and carried. I would suggest to him that if he desires to take any such course as that, he might now give notice for to-morrow in reference to any clauses which he wishes to be considered before others. I think it would be rather too much to ask me to take upon myself to judge what, in the view of the Convention, would be the relative importance of the clauses. That is so much a matter for the Convention to determine that it would be rather impertinent for me to make any assumption on the point.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Could not we sit late to-night and push on?

Mr. BARTON. -

We might sit to-night, but I do not think that that would give Sir John Forrest the assistance he wants.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Perhaps the ordinary orders will do.

Mr. BARTON. -

If the honorable member will say what clauses his mind is most exercised about, perhaps the Convention will meet his wishes in the matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The dead-lock clause, for one.

Mr. BARTON. -

Well, any amendments I have to propose on the reconsideration of clauses before that are not, speaking for the Drafting Committee and myself, perhaps very serious—such as would take a long time to settle. Some of them are almost drafting amendments, but still such as involve consulting the Convention as to the policy of those amendments. I am not aware of any intention to re-open any clause which will take a long time, except that Sir George Turner wishes to re-open clause 9, to again consider the question of each state being made one electorate in elections to the Senate; and also clause 24, in reference to the question of the quota; and, of course, both those provisions come before clause 56A—the dead-lock clause. It may be that the Convention would look favorably on a motion of the kind I have suggested if Sir John Forrest gave notice of it now.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We will see how we get on.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
Sir George Turner desires to re-open other clauses in addition to those mentioned by the leader of the Convention, for instance, the clause relating to bounties and other questions.

Mr. BARTON. -
But the clause relating to bounties will come on later than the dead-lock clause.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes, but I do not want any misapprehension to get abroad that Sir George Turner wishes to confine reconsideration to the matters mentioned by the leader of the Convention.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I understand that Mr. Reid desires to reopen the rivers question.

Mr. REID. -
I am getting my amendments printed.

Mr. BARTON. -
The question of rivers comes before the question of deadlocks, and if Sir John Forrest is anxious to get the dead-lock question considered before the rivers question and other questions which also precede it in order, and some of which may take a little time, I think his best course is to give notice of motion on the subject. There are circumstances which we all understand that might cause many honorable members of the Convention to look with favour upon a proposal of that kind.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
The rivers question is perhaps just as important as the question of deadlocks.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on Mr. Holder's proposed new clause (see pages 1717-18).

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
My honorable friend (Mr. Holder) began his speech by indicating that he was moved to submit his new clause by three considerations. One was that there was the grave objection entertained by many people to the Constitution we are framing that over all was the influence of the High Court. Now, I am not sure that that represents accurately anything in the nature of an objection that is entertained by people in any of the colonies.
On the contrary, it seems to me that, instead of there being—at least amongst a section—a feeling that the Constitution is overspread by the High Court, or any of the courts, there is a desire that we should still further multiply the courts which are to concern themselves with this Constitution, and the institutions to be established by it, for, instead of having enough courts, we are to have one more—the Privy Council—by way of appeal from the Federal High Court, which, my honorable friend thinks, overspreads this Constitution. My honorable friend said that there would be necessarily a great many questions of law in connexion with the working of this Constitution, and he referred, in support of that statement, to some expressions made use of by Professor Harrison Moore, with regard to the employment which would thereby be found for the lawyers. My honorable friend having stated that, proceeded to move his amendment, which will not in any possible particular lessen the evils (if they are evils) to which he called attention. He proposes, under this amendment, that every question in relation to the validity of laws, either of the state or of the Commonwealth—those laws having first passed through the crucible of investigation by the High Court—shall, by the cumbrous and expensive method of seeking to get rid of the decision which may have been pronounced by the tribunal appointed under the Constitution, be submitted to a referendum of the people.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Laws altering the Constitution.

Mr. SYMON. -

First of all, I take leave to deny that any body of people in Australia, whose voice is entitled to any weight, will so misunderstand the position of the High Court in this Constitution, in relation to questions of ultra vires, as to think that, instead of being an advantage, it will be a positive disadvantage to them when the union is consummated. The High Court is really and most properly appreciated and understood as being the guardian of the interests of the states as well as of the interests of the Commonwealth; as the protector of the freedom of citizens as well as of the rights of the states. They understand that it might be possible, but for the intervention of the High Court, for the Commonwealth to pass laws that interfered with the rights and with the integrity of the states constituting the Commonwealth, and that it might also be possible, on the other hand, for the states to pass laws which would to a certain extent infringe upon the rights of the Commonwealth. The High Court is to occupy the position of arbiter between the two—it is to be the daysman that is to go between the states on the one hand, and the Commonwealth on the other. It is for that purpose that the High Court has been established. If there is too wide a power in regard to disputes upon questions of encroachment under legislation, if it is considered that the High Court might frustrate the object of the Constitution, then the remedy is not to increase the expense in remedying the difficulty, but to sweep away the High Court altogether, and to say that we will rest content with some other method of adjusting the differences between the constituent parts of the body politic of the Commonwealth. Now, sir, my honorable friend's amendment only needs to be examined by the light of what we have already provided in the Bill in order to secure its prompt rejection. My honorable friend put it that he did not wish this amendment to establish a court of appeal in the ordinary sense in regard to decisions of the High Court. But it must amount to one of two things. This reference to the mass of the people must be either in the nature of a court of appeal from the decisions of the High Court, or simply an alternative method of amending the Constitution by authorizing what has been called in question.

Mr. HOLDER. -
That is what it is.

Mr. SYMON. -
My honorable friend accepts the latter description. Now, sir, of course in either case it means an expenditure. This referendum—which as proposed here is a kind of lop-sided referendum, as I shall show in a minute—means an expenditure, superadded to all the cost and delay of litigation, of £30,000 or £40,000 or £50,000, which a referendum to the people of the Commonwealth is estimated to cost.

Mr. HOLDER. -
And which any alteration of the Constitution must c

Mr. SYMON. -
I will come to that in a minute. I shall not overlook that consideration. If this referendum is to be in the nature of a court of appeal, the proposal will be constituting the people-the mass of the people—a court of appeal against the decision of the tribunal which they themselves had constituted.

Mr. HOLDER. -
That is absurd; you are setting up a man of straw in order to knock it down.

Mr. SYMON. -
My honorable friend's whole proposal is a man of straw, and I am endeavouring to treat it as such, in order that the slightest wind may knock it over. We know that the same difficulty arose in Switzerland, where it was sought to constitute the Federal Assembly a court of appeal from the decision of the High Court. For some years-between 1848 and 1875-the experiment was tried, but it was found to work so detrimentally to the best interests of the people of Switzerland that they repealed it, and placed the High Court of Switzerland above political influence, and above the control of what was a political tribunal.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON. -

Of course, I know that my honorable friend assents to that. I know that he would not be so lost to every sense of propriety as to suggest that there should be an appeal from the High Court to the Federal Parliament, or to any state Parliament in regard to a state law; but I am pointing out that some honorable members may not take the view my honorable friend takes as to the amendment of the Constitution, and they may be prepared to take the view that it will be well to have some other tribunals body introduced with a view of controlling the decisions of the High Court in matters considered to be matters of public policy. Therefore, I do not point out the case of Switzerland because my honorable friend thinks we could do the same here, because such a step would be abhorrent under our Constitution. The next point is that this is an amendment to secure an amendment of the Constitution in case the Federal High Court, which is the body in whom we repose the custody and care of our liberty from all kinds of legislative and executive encroachments, decides, in regard to a particular law of the Commonwealth, that it is ultra vires. If the question is of sufficient importance to warrant an amendment of the Constitution, let the Constitution be amended under the provision of clause 121 in the ordinary constitutional way. Why not? But if the matter be not of sufficient importance, why are we to be put to the enormous expense of from £30,000 to £50,000 for a referendum on some matter which is of not sufficient importance for it to be proceeded with in the ordinary way? Then my honorable friend-of course being driven to find some reason why we should adopt this method rather than the method we have all agreed to up till now under clause 121-says there would be a saving of time. Now, what would be that saving of time? Under this provision, should the High Court decide that a particular law is ultra vires, my honorable friend proposes that the Executive Government should be able to come down to the Federal Parliament with a resolution, which has to be carried by absolute majorities in both Houses, in exactly the same way as a Bill which might be introduced under the clause providing for amendments in the Constitution. The only time that would be saved would be any possible diminution of time involved in the difference between carrying these resolutions and carrying a Bill directed as far as possible to the same object. The saving of time would be a mere bagatelle. Is it worth while purchasing that saving by disorganizing the whole of our method-cumbrous as some think it is-of amending the Constitution? The game is not worth the candle. It is not worth considering for a moment, seeing that the method prescribed in this amendment is absolutely identical with the method provided in regard to ordinary amendments of the Constitution.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Purposely identical.

Mr. SYMON. -

Then what is the use of debating it? This amendment may be described as another means of spending £30,000 or £50,000 on a referendum, without the safeguards which should be essential in every possible proposal for amendment of the Constitution, in a debate upon the different stages of the Bill. The machinery we have got with regard to amendments of the Constitution would be as effectual and more satisfactory than what is proposed in this amendment. I agree that if this means anything it means neither more nor less than an amendment of the Constitution. Mr. O'Connor, in a very pregnant interjection made in the course of Mr. Holder's speech yesterday, said:"How would you deal with the case of a Bill going in substantially the same direction and dealing with the same subject-matter?" Mr. Holder replied that he would leave it with the Drafting Committee to frame a provision to deal with cases of that kind. But the objection entirely dissolves the whole ground on which the honorable member bases his amendment, because it would have the effect, as I think Mr. Glynn interjected, of introducing into the Constitution the legislation which was called in question by the Federal High Court.

Mr. LEAKE. -

It is also retrospective in its effect.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is the point I was coming to, and I am much obliged to the honorable member for calling my attention to it. But I do not wish to elaborate the point, because it must be seen that the proposal has that vice. In addition to that, what does my honorable friend (Mr. Holder) do? We all of us have the interests of the states at heart; but my honorable friend leaves the state law to be declared ultra vires. Under this proposal you are to protect the laws of the Commonwealth in an extraordinary and burdensome way, but not the state laws, which the High Court may declare to be ultra vires. Why should not the people of the states have a similar power of saying that their law is perfectly good, and that they want it? That is what I meant by saying that this is a lop-sided arrangement. If you want to amend the Constitution, amend it; but if you are dealing simply with a law declared to be ultra vires, then I say that the states should be treated equally with the Commonwealth, and it should be open to their particular citizens to say whether or not they approve of the proposed alteration of the law. But you would introduce the greatest complication into the Constitution by doing anything of the kind. An amendment of the Constitution is a matter of grave importance, and to say that a Commonwealth law declared to be ultra vires by the High Court is to be placed in a different position, and is to be treated in a special way, in which a law of a state declared to be ultra vires is not treated, is grossly unfair. You must, to be just, deal with both the states and the Commonwealth upon the same method in regard to alterations of the Constitution.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Will you support me if I put that in?

Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable friend should not ask me to support such a proposition as that, because he knows that I would do nothing of the kind; but I say that if his proposal is to be adopted with regard to the laws of the Commonwealth, it is unjust that the states should not be treated in the same way. I say that the states and the Commonwealth should have the same advantage in this respect.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

And why confine it only to questions of ultra vires?

Mr. SYMON. -

Exactly. Why not say, that all laws of the Commonwealth shall be valid in all respects, and that all laws of the states should also be valid? Then we should get into a nice pickle. If a law is of vital and serious consequence to the Commonwealth, and is declared to be ultra vires by the High Court, there is under the Bill an appeal to the people, by means of the provision for amending the Constitution. Let that appeal be made, and let the Constitution be amended; but do not let us introduce, a further opening for expense, and also for injustice, by an inefficient means of really amending the Constitution, but which at the same time will leave unredressed the grievances which may exist on the part of the state. I therefore hope that this amendment will be rejected as altogether unnecessary, and as cumbrous and expensive; and as not even having the colour of bringing about the redress of difficulties, which my honorable friend stated at the outset, because the provision is not one which will have the effect of diminishing the possibilities of litigation under this Constitution. No one more deeply sympathizes with the object of the clause than I do, but some more effectual way must be devised to deal with this question. This, instead of being an improvement, will be a distinct blemish on the Constitution we have to frame.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I agree with Mr. Symon that there are difficulties raised which are almost insuperable against the clause as it stands. There is not a single point in which more facility is given for amendment of the Constitution than already exists in the Bill. You want under this clause, as you want under the 121st clause, an absolute majority of both Houses. You also want a majority of the states voting, and a majority of the people voting.

Mr. BARTON. -

An absolute majority of both Houses directing a referendum, not for passing a law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But they have already passed a law, and I take it that if you can get an absolute majority of both Houses directing the referendum, there is no practical difference between that and an absolute majority again passing the law. Because they virtually passed the law as far as they could. Therefore, it seems to me there is no advantage gained from the stand-point of desiring a better means of getting an amendment of the Constitution. Then, I feel that it is open to the destructive criticism that it makes the law retrospective, and after the court, possibly the Privy Council, has decided that the law is ultra vires, and people have acted on that decision, being compelled to, act on that decision, or being compelled to refrain from acting on the decision of the court, as the law is positive or negative; then we should have under this referendum a law made operative as from the time of its original passing, and penalties, both personal and pecuniary, might be incurred through no fault of the individuals who had incurred them. That seems to me to be a defect to which we cannot close our eyes.

Mr. WISE. -

Besides, it would punish everybody who took the advice of a man who interpreted the law properly.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It compels everybody who has obeyed the decision of the higher courts to act, or refrain from acting. That is a position which none of us would willingly get into, and the retrospective action is wrong. I quite sympathize with the moving spirit that actuated Mr. Holder, because I feel, as I said before, that our means of amending the Constitution are lamentably defective. It is an attempt by Mr. Holder to prevent the strict interpretation of the law from running counter to public opinion, even public opinion which may be definitely expressed by means of a referendum. Complaints have been made, as we know, in America that the Supreme Court is master of the Constitution; that there is no appeal from it, and that the means of amending the Constitution to get rid of any particular decision, which time and circumstances have made utterly contrary to the feelings of the nation, are practically irremediable. I should say, in reference to the so-called safety-valve that has been provided in America, even that one stigmatized as being only tolerable because it avoids a worse state of affairs, namely, swamping the Supreme Court, is a mode which I find Mr. Dicey refers to and does not reprove. In the last edition of his work on the Constitution, 1897, pages 166 and 167, he actually points out without disapproval, and, in fact, with a certain amount of approbation, the possibility of appointing more Judges to the Supreme Court; the new Judges being, as he says, lawyers who share the convictions of the ruling party. When we see that state of things referred to in such terms by so eminent and impartial a writer as Mr. Dicey, we must not lightly treat the considerations brought forward by Mr. Holder and dismiss them from our minds. I agree that the mode he suggests is one which we can hardly follow. If it were proposed that a law passed by both Houses, and thus expressing what is desired by public opinion—and by some strict construction of the Constitution that desired end has been found impracticable—and that, both Houses having agreed to that law, it should be competent for the Executive, upon an absolute majority of either House, to send it to a referendum of the states and the people, I could understand that a better remedy was provided, because you would have the states protected on the original vote passing the Bill, and again in the referendum. If that course were adopted, I think this clause could be framed so as to give us a better position than we, have under the Bill. But if we agree in the first instance that both Houses sho

What is the honorable member's suggestion?

Mr. ISAACS. -

The adoption by an absolute majority in either House of Legislature, instead of by both Houses. It presupposes both Houses have passed the Act; that the Act is declared to be invalid; that subsequently public opinion has been found to be of such a nature as to press for an adoption of such a law, and it is impracticable, because the Constitution does not admit of it. Then either House must pass by an absolute majority a resolution, and the Executive must refer the law to a dual referendum of the states and the people. A double protection would be given, and that would ease the minds of a great many people, not only in this colony, but, I dare say, in New South Wales, as to the question of an amendment of the Constitution. It does not touch the question of deadlocks in ordinary legislation, but only the amendment of the Constitution, and would go far to pave the way for a better understanding on the subject than we now possess.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I may shorten the debate if I point out that the amendment suggested by Mr. Isaacs would be tantamount to an alteration of the decision already arrived at in clause 121. In that clause it is decided that majorities of both Houses are necessary to alter the Constitution. If Mr. Isaacs' amendment were carried it would negative that proposition, and I do not think we can do that at this stage.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I should like to mention one consideration which has not perhaps occurred to your mind. I understood the decision was that, if the two Houses came into conflict, the question should be referred on a motion passed by absolute majorities of both Houses. But this is not a question of conflict between the two Houses, but where the two Houses have agreed, and the Supreme Court has said that it is outside the Constitution. That seems to me a totally different question, when the two Houses may not be in conflict, but either House may pass this resolution, and then the Executive can refer it. I think that is a great distinction.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would point out that clause 121 says that the provisions of the Constitution shall not be altered except in the manner following—that is, by an absolute majority of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. That seems to me to be conclusive.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I share in the objections which so many honorable members have offered to this clause. I certainly hope that I shall not be taken to be speaking simply as a lawyer, and with a desire that this Constitution should be under the law and lawyers, when I express my objections to it. I agree with what has been said to the effect—although there is a great weight to be attached to Mr. Holder's argument—that the clause will operate as an appeal from the High Court to a popular authority—an appeal to an authority which, at any rate, is not a competent authority on a question of law. As to the question of making a law, the people ultimately are no doubt the best authority, but on the question as to the reading of a law they can scarcely be the best authority. There is a difficulty in this clause which also presents itself to me—that is, it works only one way. Where a law has been decided by the High Court to be ultra vires, by this appeal to the people it may be decided to be intra vires of the Constitution from the beginning. Take the case of a law which the High Court decides to be within the Constitution, and which the people have a very strong opinion is outside the bounds of the Constitution, and that the court has been wrong there. Now, if it is right to make a clause of this kind operate for the purposes of appeal in the one case, it is equally right to make it operate for the purposes of appeal in the other.
Mr. ISAACS. -
That is not necessary. The people have it in their power to repeal an Act if they do not like it.
Mr. BARTON. -
In this case the object is to enable the people to make valid that which under the Constitution is invalid. If you make the clause work one way, what reason is there for not making it work the other? With reference to the general effects of the clause, it seems to be clear that where the High Court has wrongly decided a matter to be intra vires of the Constitution, you provide no sort of way of dealing with it excepting by repeal. It may be that repeal is the easiest method. This amendment is intended to get rid of the decision of the High Court, which may be perfectly correct in law. I do not think that is a course which will commend itself to our general sense and experience as being desirable. I know that we are providing for new conditions, and there is weight to attach to every argument which relies upon the novelty of these conditions. But still I do not think that this is a course which should commend itself. If you take the case of any decision of the High Court that a law is ultra vires—and the position would be worse if Mr. Isaacs' amendment were adopted—having got that decision from the authority you yourselves have set up as the ultimate arbiter, within your own bounds at any rate, on questions of constitutional law, you then say that the finding of that tribunal may be rendered nugatory just as the Executive, having a majority in Parliament, may choose by submitting it to the people. It may be assumed that the Executive will feel the popular pulse before they do it. The conclusion then is, that you deliberately weaken that will be the effect, although it may, not be the intention—the authority of that tribunal. Would not such a provision operate very badly? I quite see that the Hon. Mr. Holder has not submitted his clause with the view of taking the appeal from the High Court to the people on a matter of law. All I am arguing is, that the effect of the clause would be the same as if he had done so. There is not much difference between saying, as is said in this clause, that when the High Court has decided a matter to be ultra vires you may remit it to the people, who may determine that it is within the powers of the Constitution, which would be a reversal in one sense of the decision of the High Court, and saying boldly, and at once, that if the High Court declares the law to be ultra vires the people may decide that it is intra vires.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is a matter of form.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, the difference between these two procedures is simply a matter of form. In the clause the words are used "and the law shall be conclusively deemed to have been intra vires of this Constitution from the passing thereof." The peculiarity of this part of the clause is very striking, because the words I have read follow these words:"and if approved as therein provided the Constitution shall be deemed to have been enlarged." If the Constitution is to have been deemed to have been enlarged for that contingency it is only because the law was ultra vires. If you carry that further and say that it is intra vires, what do you want with any enlargement? It is quite inconsistent. It amounts to saying that the Constitution has been enlarged, and that is only necessary if the law was ultra vires. And yet it is followed by the words:"and the law shall be conclusively deemed to have been intra vires," which is to decide that the High Court was not right but wrong.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That is like the passing of a Validating Act.

Mr. BARTON. -

No; a Validating Act does not put things in that way, and I say that that is an objection of more than form. When you say that the Constitution shall have been deemed to have been enlarged, you decide that the Constitution requires amendment in that particular, but when you say that the law shall be conclusively deemed, to have been intra vires from the passing thereof, then you decide that the Constitution does not require amendment. There is very considerable not only ambiguity, but contradiction in the proposal.
What are we asked to authorize the people to do-to decide that the High Court was right? In which case their decision could only have effect if it operate as an enlargement, or to decide that the High Court is wrong, in which case the Constitution is sufficient from the beginning. We ought to know which road we are to take before we vote on the clause. It seems tome that the objection there is a strong one, and that it requires some answer. I shall not now repeat the arguments adduced by other honorable members against the clause. That is unnecessary. But I do say that I have not been at all convinced that it is our duty to adopt the clause.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There is one additional difficulty, which my honorable friend (Dr. Quick) has suggested. The Constitution would be deemed to be enlarged by the passing of a law, but if you wanted to alter or amend it you could not do so.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That is the point Mr. O'Connor mentioned last night.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is to say that, the law having been passed, and the Constitution having been enlarged, the Constitution has been amended.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is all. You could not alter a word of it.

Mr. BARTON. -

No, you would have to take the question of whether the Constitution was really amended or enlarged; but the decision might mean that the Constitution did not require enlargement at all.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I will deal with the speeches in the order in which they were given. I note that, although the Hon. Mr. Symon said that the matter was not worthy of a moment's consideration, he proceeded to talk for about half-an-hour about it, and his speech consisted mainly in setting up bogies that were not in the amendment, and knocking them down again after they had sufficiently frightened the Convention. I need say no more about these bogies, because they were not present in my mind, and they do not appear in the amendment. I am obliged to the Hon. Mr. Isaacs for the speech he delivered, which shows that the feeling of which I have a knowledge is also within his knowledge the feeling that the Constitution we are framing is somewhat too rigid, that the modes of amendment are few and difficult, and that greater ease of expression of the popular will would be an advantage. I am pleased to have the recognition which the honorable and learned member gives of the fact that these views are not confined to South Australia. As to the particular points raised both by Mr. Isaacs and the Hon. Mr. Barton, I want to say this: That what is contemplated is actually an amendment of the Constitution. It is not intended to be an amendment by a side-wind, but an amendment with all the necessary delay and all the necessary expense which it is contemplated any such amendment should involve. I did not imagine for a moment that I was going to make a short cut to any amendment of the Constitution by which damage might be done to either state or national interests. I think that I have duly safeguarded both state and national interests, while providing a speedier method of altering the Constitution. So far as the objection raised by the Hon. Mr. Barton on the matter of a law being declared ultra vires is concerned, there is no idea of submitting to the popular verdict any legal decision of the High Court or of any court. When the Parliament determines under this clause to refer any matter to the people they accept the verdict of the court as being true and right. If they do not accept it their course will not be to refer it to the people, but to send it to a court of appeal. The fact that they do refer it to the people shows that they recognise that the matter was outside the powers of the Federal Parliament, and that they seek to have those powers enlarged. The form of words adopted means this—that the enlargement of the Constitution is to be somewhat dated back. It is to be retrospective, not in the sense of a challenge, but rather the reverse, of the decision of the court. The enlargement of the powers is made retrospective cover the particular question at issue. With regard to the last point mentioned by Mr. Isaacs, on the suggestion of Dr. Quick, I referred to it yesterday evening when replying to an interjection from the Hon. Mr. O'Connor. I can conceive of almost no case where the enlargement of the Constitution would not be sufficiently clear and definite in its outline to enable anything to be done which might be required in the future. I will take a case as illustrating the general trend of the amendment. Supposing such a case occurs as occurred recently in the United States, and that an Income Tax Bill is passed by the Federal Parliament. It is discovered—though I do not think it could be under our Constitution, I am merely discussing it as an illustration—that the Federal Parliament has exceeded its powers. The High Court or some other competent court rules to that effect. The conviction of the Federal Parliament is that the people intended that they should have this power, and that it is owing to an oversight or to a technical defect in the law that they have not the power. Now, two courses may be taken. They may rely on clause 121. In that case the Bill which has been passed by the Federal Parliament, and declared ultra vires by the High Court, would be laid aside, and a measure would be introduced for the amendment of the Constitution. That measure would have to be passed by both Houses, and a vote of the people taken upon it. If the vote was given in the affirmative, a new Bill would have to be brought in providing for the income tax. The first law would be absolutely set aside, and a very considerable delay would take place, although the popular will had all along been in its favour, and the popular belief was that the making of such a law was within the powers of the Federal Parliament. My clause would shorten matters very much. As soon as the court declared the Bill to be ultra vires the Federal Parliament could refer the matter to the popular vote. If the vote was given in the affirmative, then that law would have been from its first passage intra vires. The enlargement of the Constitution enabling the Federal Parliament to pass an Income Tax Bill would be dated back to the time when the Bill was first passed, and it would have been all along the law of the land. The financial arrangements of the whole Commonwealth, which might have been made on the faith of that Income Tax Bill being intra vires, would not be upset, as they would be if a new Bill had to be introduced. I am afraid that there is only too much force, however, in the suggestion of the honorable and learned member that my proposed new clause-I did not see it before-is in conflict with clause 121. I will therefore forestall any declaration to that effect upon the part of the Chair by asking leave to withdraw my amendment. I hope, a little later on, after consultation perhaps with the honorable and learned member, to bring forward a proposal which will not be antagonistic in its terms to clause 121, and which will tend to make the amendment of the Constitution in accordance with the popular will as speedy a process as possible.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Does the honorable member think that if an appeal were made to the people to upset the judgment of the Supreme Court, the case could be so clearly put before the electors that they would be able to give an intelligent verdict upon it?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I should not dream for an instant of asking the people to consider, much less to either confirm or reverse, any decision of any competent court, because I do not think that they would be competent to pronounce an opinion in regard to such a matter. But I would allow the people to say-"The Supreme Court is right, and to cure the defect in the Constitution which has been sprung upon us we want to see it enlarged, so that another similar decision will be impossible." I do not propose to ask the people to adjudicate upon the decisions of the Supreme Court, but I wish to give them power to enlarge the Constitution in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Holder's proposed new clause 121A, was, by leave, withdrawn.

Preamble:-Whereas the people of [here name the colonies which have, adopted the Constitution] have agreed to unite in one indissoluble Federal Commonwealth under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and under the Constitution hereby established: And whereas it is expedient to make provision for the admission into the Commonwealth of other Australasian Colonies and possessions of Her Majesty: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in the present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:-

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I beg to move-

That the following words be inserted after the word "Constitution" (line 2):-"humbly relying upon the blessing of Almighty God."

I wish to move the insertion of this form of words in the preamble, because I think that it embodies the spirit of the nine suggestions in regard to this matter made by the various Houses of Parliament which have considered the Draft Constitution. The words I wish to insert are simple and unsectarian. They are expressive of our ultimate hope of the final end of all our aspirations, of the great elemental truth upon which all our creeds are based, and towards which the lines of our faiths converge. They will, I think, recommend the Constitution to thousands to whom the rest of its provisions may for ever be a sealed book. If our whole ceremonial life is not touched with insincerity and its symbols are not empty and vain, if there be a reality greater than we can grasp at the back of all our aspirations; a mind as eternal as time, and infinite as space, to which the phenomena of the world and our lives are but a passing phase; if the invocation of the Divine blessing and sanction upon the many occasions of our daily life is not a mere empty formality we cannot, at the moment of entering into a union so full as this of the possibilities of good and evil, of contentment or regret - of, in the words of Jeremy Taylor, felicity or lasting sorrow - refuse to give expression to the central fact of all our faiths. In an affirmation of pure reverence and submission such as this, the adherents of all creeds, sinking their differences of form and method, can join, and will find the spirit of toleration in them growing strong under a sense of their common aim. It will thus become the pledge of religious toleration. We may be met again by mere considerations of propriety. We may be told that everything has its appropriate time and place, and that words of faith should not be embedded in the preamble of an Act of Parliament. But I would point out that this objection proves too much, and, if pushed to the full limit of its application, would deprive half the offices and courtesies of life of their highest significance. The stamp of religion is fixed upon the front of our institutions, its letter is impressed upon the book of our lives, and that its spirit, weakened though it may be by the opposing forces of the world, still lifts the pulse of the social organism. It is this, not the iron hand of the law, that is the bond of society; it is this that gives unity and tone to the texture of the whole; it is this, that by subduing the domineering impulses and the reckless passions of the heart, turns discord to harmony, and evokes the law of moral progress out of the clashing purposes of life. In these days of too-often dying ideals, when thoughts that once would burn are chilled by the besetting touch of commonplace; when utility seems the measure of virtue, and the greater passions pale under the searching rays of reason; when affection, love, duty, the divine but reckless instincts of patriotism, have been expressed in the language of metaphysics, or become the subjects of mental pathology; when the ardour that fires our noblest aims is damped by a calculating cynicism, and the glow of poetry goes out before the glare of materialism; it is well that we should set in our Constitution something that may at times remind us of ideals beyond the counter, and of hopes that lift us higher than the vulgar realities of the day. I speak not as one whose mind is braced beyond the measure of his neighbours by an adamantine faith, or any of those consolations that come from the larger hope. Say what we will, there are moments, short though they may be, when the puzzle of life and destiny staggers the sense, when the shadow is cast and obscures the vision, and the best of us feel our weakness and loosening grip of the unseen. Then it is that the symbols of faith and reverence attest their power and efficacy, and brace the reeling spirit with a recovered sense of the breadth and continuity of man's consciousness of an inscrutable Power ruling our lives. This is the basic principle, the central theme, of all our creeds and dogmas—the great elemental truth, in which all their differences disappear. Let us, then, in no spirit of Pharisaism—for we speak as much for others as for ourselves—fix in the Constitution, this mark of the Omnipotent, this stamp of the Eternal, this testimony of feeling, or it may be but of desire, in which faith may find a recommendation, and doubt discover no offence.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would call the attention of the members of the committee to the fact that a number of amendments have been suggested by various Houses of Legislature which are in effect of a similar nature to the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Glynn). I would, therefore, suggest that any honorable member wishing to bring the amendment into conformity with the language of any of these parliamentary suggestions should move an amendment upon it inserting the words suggested by the Houses of any of the colonies. All these suggestions are

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
In Adelaide I voted against the insertion in the preamble of a form of words proposed by the honorable member (Mr. Glynn), and it is with regret that I shall have to repeat that vote—at the present time, because the Constitution contains no provision to obviate the had effect which the insertion of these words will have. I am glad that I am so far justified in my opposition to the proposal made by the honorable member in Adelaide by the fact that no Assembly and no person has suggested the insertion of the words which were then proposed to be inserted by the honorable member. Those words were utterly inappropriate. I freely admit that the words which he now proposes to insert are not quite so objectionable, though I still think that the amendment could be improved upon. I say frankly that I should have no objection to the insertion of words of this kind in the preamble, if I felt that in the Constitution we had a sufficient safeguard against the passing of religious laws by the Commonwealth. I shall, I hope, afterwards have an opportunity, upon the reconsideration of the measure, to bring before the Convention a clause modified to meet some criticisms which have been made on the point, and if I succeed in getting that clause passed it will provide this safeguard. I shall have an opportunity then of explaining how exceedingly important it is to have some such safeguard. There is no time for me now to go into an elaborate history of this question so far as the United States of America are concerned. I have investigated it with a great deal of care, and I can give the result of my investigations to honorable members, who, I hope, will not believe that I would misled them if I could help doing so with regard to the effect of what has taken place there. Because they had no words in the preamble of the Constitution of the United States to the effect of those which the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) wishes to insert, Congress was unable to pass certain legislation in the direction of enforcing religion. There was a struggle for about thirty years to have some words of religious import inserted in the preamble. That struggle failed; but in 1892 it was decided by, the Supreme Court that the people of the United States were a Christian people.

Mr. BARTON. -

That decision was followed practically by the decision that they were a Christian people.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes. That decision was given in March or February, and four months afterwards it was enacted by Congress that the Chicago Exhibition should be closed upon Sundays, simply upon the ground that Sunday was a Christian day. The argument was that among a Christian nation you should enforce Christian observances.

Mr. BARTON. -
Could they not have closed the exhibition on Sundays without that enactment?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think the honorable and learned member will hear me out in this, that there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States of America, even indirectly, suggesting a law of this sort. No doubt, the state of Illinois could have passed such a law, because it has all its rights reserved. But there was nothing in the Constitution enabling the Congress to pass a law for the closing of the exhibition Sunday. As soon as ever those parties who had been working for the purpose of getting Sunday legalized throughout the United States found that decision given in February, 1892, that "this is a Christian nation," they followed it up quickly, and within four months there was a law passed for the closing of the exhibition on Sunday.

Mr. WISE. -

Was that held to be constitutional?

Mr. BARTON. -

It has not been challenged yet.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It has been in force for five and a half or six years, and it was struggled against, as my honorable friend will know. There was a strong monetary interest against it, and they, no doubt, took advice, but I will say frankly that I am not aware that it has been held to be constitutional. I understand though that there has been no dispute among the legal men in that country as to its being constitutional. Honorable members will hardly realize how far the inferential powers have been extended in America. I should have thought it obvious, and I think Mr. Wise will agree with me, that the Congress had no power to pass a law of that sort.

Mr. WISE. -

I admit that your statement puts a very different complexion on the matter.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I hope it does, because it will become a very important matter. I should have thought that it was not within the scope of Congress to pass a law, no matter how righteous, to close the exhibition on Sunday, but I find, on looking to a number of decisions in the United States, that it has been held again and again that, because of certain expressions, words, and phrases used in the Constitution, inferential powers are conferred upon the Congress that go beyond any dreams we have at present. I know that a great many people have been got to sign petitions in favour of inserting such religious words in the preamble of this Bill by men who know the course of the struggle in the United States, but who have not told the people what the course of that struggle is, and what the motive for these words is. I think the people of Australia ought to have been told frankly when they were asked to sign these petitions what the history in the United States has been on the subject, and the motive with which these words have been proposed. I think the people in Australia are as reverential as any people on the face of this earth, so I will make no opposition to the insertion of seemly and suitable words, provided that it is made perfectly clear in the substantive part of the Constitution that we are not conferring on the Commonwealth a power to pass religious laws. I want to leave that as a reserved power to the state, as it is now. Let the states have the power.
I will not interfere with the individual states in the power they have, but I want to make it clear that in inserting these religious words in the preamble of the Bill we are not by inference giving a power to impose on the Federation of Australia any religious laws. I hope that I shall be excused for having spoken on this matter. I felt that it was only fair that honorable members should know that there is a damner in these words, if we are to look to the precedent of the United States. I will help honorable members in putting in any suitable words provided that we have sufficient safeguards.

Mr. LYNE. -

Will you explain, before you sit down, where the particular danger is?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The particular danger is this: That we do not want to give to the Commonwealth powers which ought to be left to the states. The point is that we are not going to make the Commonwealth a kind of social and religious power over us. We are going into a Federation for certain specific subjects. Each state at present has the power to impose religious laws. I want to leave that power with the state; I will not disturb that power; but I object to give to the Federation of Australia a tyrannous and over-riding power over the whole of the people of Australia as to what day they shall observe for religious reasons, and what day they shall not observe for that purpose. The state of Victoria will be able to pass any Sunday law it likes under my scheme. It can pass any law of that sort now; but surely it is a proper thing for a state, and it is not a proper thing for the Commonwealth, to exercise this power. I feel that honorable members who value state rights reserved to the states, who value the preservation of the individuality of the states for state purposes, will agree with me that it is with the state we ought to leave this power, and that we ought not to intrust it to the Commonwealth. For instance, our factory laws are left to the state. Those laws provide for a certain number of hours of rest, and that employés shall not work on Sundays, and so forth. If we leave the factor laws to the state we should also leave this question of the observance of Sunday to the state. I will not take it from them. At the same time, I am not going, no matter what the consequences are, to help to intrust this power to the Commonwealth. I want the people of the different states to manage their own affairs as well as they can. I may say frankly that I, rightly or wrongly, am one of those who think that the Christian or religious observance is no good if it is enforced by law. I am one of those who think the religious observance is of no value unless it is the outcome of a man's own character, and the outcome of a man's own belief.

[P.1736] starts here

Mr. SYMON. - You do not want to keep it always stuck up in the form of a sentence in your bathroom.

Mr. HIGGINS. - My learned friend, I believe, is staying at the Melbourne Club, and I am glad that they have taken the opportunity to inculcate sound doctrine upon him.

Mr. WALKER. - Is not there an acknowledgment of the Almighty in the schedule of the Bill? Is not this perfectly consistent with the schedule?

Mr. HIGGINS. - No; I think the honorable member will see that a recital in the preamble to the Constitution is a very different thing from an oath which may be taken in a court of justice or anywhere else.

Mr. DOUGLAS. - You will find that you can make an affirmation without referring to Almighty God. Any person can make an affirmation who has no belief in Almighty God.

The CHAIRMAN. - I do not think the honorable member is in order in making a speech.

Mr. HIGGINS. - I thank the honorable member for being disorderly under the circumstances. I think there is a good deal of force in what he says, but I also see this, that the taking of an oath in a court of justice or on taking office is quite a different thing from having in a well thought-out preamble to a Constitution any reference to religious belief.

Mr. WALKER. - It is prescribed in the schedule.
Mr. HIGGINS. -

That may be, but a schedule is quite a different thing from a preamble.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I have no doubt that the Convention ought to thank the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) for the warning he has thought fit to give; at the same time, I, for one, see no cause for fearing that any of the dangers he has suggested will arise from inserting these words in the Bill. He has said that under the American Constitution, in which no such words as these appear, certain legislation has been carried by Congress forbidding the opening of the Chicago Exhibition on a Sunday. If under a Constitution in which no such words as these appear such legislation has been carried, what further danger will arise from inserting the words in our Constitution? I do not see, speaking in ordinary language, how the insertion of such words could possibly lead to the interpretation that this is necessarily a Christian country and not otherwise, because the words "relying upon the blessing of Almighty God" could be subscribed to not only by Roman Catholics and Protestants, but also by Jews, Gentiles, and even by Mahomedans. The words are most universal, and are not necessarily applicable only to Christians. I see no reason whatever for fearing that any danger will arise from placing the words in the preamble. This is a Constitution in which certain powers are conferred on the Parliament of the Commonwealth. I do not know that the placing of these words in the preamble will necessarily confer on that Parliament any power to legislate in religious matters. It will only have power to legislate within the limits of the delegated authority, and the mere recital in respect to the Deity in the preamble will not necessarily confer on the Federal Parliament power to legislate on any religious matter. Whatever may have been the legislation of Congress as to the Chicago Exhibition, there may be reasonable grounds for doubting as to whether it may not be ultra vires. Mr. Higgins has vaguely alluded to certain words and expressions in the Constitution of the United States. I do not know what those words are which could have justified such legislation, but in reference to this Bill I challenge any one to point out any clause which would justify the Federal Parliament in legislating on any religious matter. If there is such a clause in the Bill, then by all means strike it out or modify it, but, until Mr. Higgins can point to a clause in the Bill which will authorize the Federal Parliament to legislate on religious matters one way or the other, his apprehension as to dangers is altogether without foundation, and it should not in any way influence this committee in deciding on the question whether we should put in the preamble words simply recognising the existence of Almighty God and that reverential feeling to which the Deity is entitled. I hope that after due consideration, and in face of the strong recommendations of all the Parliaments of Australia, and the numerous and influential petitions which have been presented to the Convention by the inhabitants of Australia, honorable members will give more respect to the Parliaments and the people of Australia than to the warning held out by Mr. Higgins.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Before the amendment is put, I should like to say a few words in explanation of the position I hold. I am quite aware that since it was debated in Adelaide there has been considerable argument and a certain degree of warmth about this matter. Just as I thought that the mover of the amendment in Adelaide, which amendment was defeated, might well not press it to a division, so I had hoped that we should have had no amendment of this kind moved here. If such an amendment is to be made, I will say, at the outset, that the form of this one is the least objectionable which could be devised, for my friend (Mr. Glynn) consulted the Drafting Committee about the form of the amendment, and, so far as they in that capacity could offer any opinion, they thought it was as good a form as could be put in. But, with regard to the substance of the matter, I have all along thought that it is, to a certain extent, a danger to insert words of this kind in the preamble. Mr. Higgins has clearly put before us the difficulty which arose in the United States—a difficulty which arose out of a decision without any such words in the Constitution, which led to a decision and an enactment, and which it is probable we do not want to see arising under our Constitution. My honorable friend (Dr. Quick) has argued that if, in the absence of any such words in the Constitution of the United States such things could happen as have happened under that Constitution, our case will be no worse if we put words of this kind into the preamble of the Constitution of the Commonwealth. I am rather of the contrary opinion to that of my honorable and learned friend. I think that if there is a danger of a body of religious laws being passed or of decisions being given by a court, without words of religion in the forefront of the Constitution, in its very preamble, that danger, by every consideration of experience and common sense, would be increased by putting in an express amendment which might be construed as a peg on which to hang such further decision or such further enactment. The court, I know, in the case that was in question, went outside the Constitution for its material. It referred to the Declaration of Independence, which was the precursor of the Constitution that had been entirely swept away by the Constitution of the United States. It referred to the grants to the planters and to those who had taken up the plantations in America, as well as to the charters and enactments under which they were governed. The court referred to all those things, and to every piece of paper on which it could lay its hands, for the purpose of deciding that the United States was a religious nation, and inasmuch as these expressions, which were dug up by the court in grants, were used as much under a Catholic as under a Protestant regime, but under no other regime, they then decided that the United States were not only a religious nation, but also a Christian nation. Now, I think that those matters are better left in the hands of the states. The states have certain plenary powers, which we do not wish to cut down, except so far as may be necessary for the purpose of federal government. The states have power to impose Sunday observance laws. Each state-and it is only of states that the Commonwealth will be composed-has power to regulate these things within its own territory, and the territories of the states together make up the sum of the territory of the Commonwealth. So that there is power in existence to deal with these matters without duplicating that power. The danger is, if we are to pay any attention to the decisions in the United States, that the thing that was done in the United States is more likely to be done here if we duplicate that power, because the result will be a conflicting body of laws dealing with religious matters and the observance of the Sabbath. Now, I do not look on that prospect with any degree of pleasure; I do not think that that will be a state of things which will be desirable under our Constitution. I have no desire to add anything further, except that I do not wish to be understood as withdrawing from the opinion
I expressed at Adelaide, but the views I expressed there, in opposition to a similar amendment, may have perhaps received some confirmation from the facts as to the United States enactments and decisions which Mr.
Higgins has brought forward in the course of this debate, and which were mentioned partly by me some days ago, when speaking on another clause. I do not think there ought to be the slightest acrimony of any kind in a debate on this subject. It is really a pity that we have to vote on such a subject, but I feel quite sure that it will be debated in a spirit entirely reverential on both sides. For myself, I hope I have not introduced a word which would enable any one to say that I have dealt with this matter in any factious or party spirit, and any idea of faction or party must be eliminated from these proceedings. If a division is called for-and I must say that I do not like divisions on these questions-I shall, as a matter
Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

Having moved, in the New South Wales Parliament, a motion somewhat similar to the one now moved by Mr. Glynn, I took considerable interest in, and paid great attention to, the remarks which were made by Mr.
Higgins, and I may say that I would not hesitate for a moment, if I thought there was any menace to the powers of the states in adopting this proposal, to vote in opposition to the way I voted previously on the subject. But I cannot see that there is any menace to the states at all, or that any power will be taken from the states by inserting this amendment in the preamble of the Constitution. As one honorable member—I think it was Dr. Quick—said, certain actions have been taken by the states in Congress where there is no mention of the Supreme Being in the preamble or in the Constitution at all; and, if we leave this amendment out of the preamble, that power will be much the same as it is in the states. Now, all we do by this amendment is to define something more definite than has evidently been defined in the Constitution of the states. Remembering that the Federal Parliament will represent the various states to a very great extent, I think that anything that might be feared in the way Mr. Higgins suggested could be put on one side at once. Moreover, I recognise this fact—that the insertion of this amendment will assist very materially in the acceptance of the Constitution. It may be, and probably is, a matter of sentiment—I suppose none of us pretend to be actuated on a question of this kind other than by sentiment—but I feel convinced that the insertion of this amendment in the preamble will influence a large number of votes in favour of this Federation Bill. Not having heard anything to shake my belief that that will be so, I shall adhere to the vote that I gave on a previous occasion.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania).—

When this subject was broached in Adelaide, I took the opportunity of stating that I could not see the utility of inserting these words in the preamble of the Commonwealth Bill, and my opinion has not in anyway altered up to the present time. I should like to know what is the object honorable members have in view in desiring the insertion of these words? Do these words convey to the public mind any particular idea that their insertion in the preamble of this Bill would make us a religious people? The words in question are "humbly relying on the blessing of Almighty God." Now, do not we all rely upon the blessing of Almighty God in our daily transactions? Certainly. But do we set forth that fact in all our letters and documents by which we communicate with one another? Certainly not. No doubt the supporters of this amendment desire to make the public believe or fancy that they will become a religious people if such words as these are put into the preamble of this Bill. Do we do this at the present time in our ordinary legislation? Do not we all know that it is a mockery that the House of Commons at the present time commences its sittings, day by day, by having prayers read in that assembly? The Speaker of the House of Commons reads the Lord's Prayer before proceedings are commenced, but it has crowned into such a farce that nobody attends the House until the prayer is over. Do we want to introduce that system here?

Mr. PEACOCK. -

It is done here.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

I believe that there are still some legislative assemblies in Australia where they commence the day's proceedings by reading the Lord's Prayer. It was originally done in Tasmania, but it was soon found out to be a perfect piece of mockery, and abandoned.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Do not you have any reference to the Supreme Being in the Governor's speech in Tasmania?

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

We used to have the Lord's Prayer read in the Legislative Council, but it became a matter of such indifference that the custom was given up. I do not know whether you have it in your Parliament in Victoria.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Yes; in our Legislative Council the President reads the Lord's Prayer.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

And nearly all the members know it now.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

When any honorable member became a candidate for the position of a representative of his colony in this Convention, did he go down on his knees and pray Almighty God to confer a blessing on him in order that he might secure a position here? Of course, we all have these good feelings in our minds when legislating here, as is shown when we come to anything which suggests brotherly feeling or action, and, therefore, why insert these words in the preamble to the Bill?

What is the object of inserting these words? Is it to make the people believe that they will be more religious if the words are inserted? Shall we be more religious if we put them in? Will it have any effect whatever upon us? Why, it is all nonsense—a sham and a delusion—like many other things that have taken place here! I presume that I am ordinarily as religious as any member of this Convention, but I do not make a parade of it. I take my Sunday walks, but I do not do as the Quaker did, who said to his assistant—"John, if you have sanded the sugar and wetted the currants, you can now come in to prayers."
Mr. WALKER. -
It was not a Quaker who said that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Well, it was somebody like the honorable member, then.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
The honorable member presents a large petition, praying for the insertion of this amendment, and thinks he has done a great deal of good to the community by so doing. Now, does that do any good at all? Do we pay any attention to it? Dr. Quick says we all have some religious views, and even Hindoos and Mahomedans-although I presume there are very few Mahomedans here-even religious Hindoos and religious Mahomedans would not apply the words of this amendment in the same sense as we apply them, nor are they applied in the same sense by Christians of one character and Christians of another. And we know that there are at least about 120 different descriptions of Christians, and, it may be, many more. The insertion of these words would be a mockery, and that is the reason I voted against their insertion before. I want to be sincere, and I do not want to make the people believe by going into the street and saying-"I am a religious man," that, therefore, I am a religious man.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
They would not believe you if you did.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
A man's actions and not his words denote what he is, and hypocrites in religious circles do more harm to religion than is done by persons outside religious circles. I oppose this amendment because I believe it will minister to, hypocrisy to put these words in the Bill. I sincerely and truthfully believe in the Almighty Power, but I do not wish to introduce any reference to that Power in the preamble to this Bill. You do not introduce it in your ordinary Acts of Parliament, and, therefore, why should you want to introduce it now? You know what happens in the House of Commons in England, as I have told you, and surely you do not want the same farce to be enacted here. I agree with our leader that we had better leave these things alone. I hope with him that a division will not be taken on this subject. Let every member of the Convention give his voice on the question; but let it end there. I do not think it is a matter in which, in a community like ours, a body like this Convention, which has been brought here for a particular purpose, should interfere. We should be travelling out of the range of the purpose for which we were sent here by inserting such words in the preamble to this Bill. If the question goes to a division, I shall
I desire to say just a few words, because I think there is a more serious question involved than the mere insertion of the words of this amendment. I am sure that we all listened with great pleasure to the speech of Mr. Higgins on the subject. He reminded us of the decision in America that the Christian religion is a portion of the American Constitution, and of the enactments that were passed in consequence. I do not know whether it has occurred to honorable members that the Christian religion is a portion of the English Constitution without any decision on the subject at all. It is part of the law of England which I should think we undoubtedly brought with us when we settled in these colonies. Therefore, I think we begin at the stage at which the Americans were doubtful, without the insertion of the words at all, and I would suggest to Mr. Higgins to seriously consider whether it will not be necessary to insert words distinctly limiting the Commonwealth's powers.

There are words printed in an amendment to that effect.

I feel more strongly than ever that that ought to be done, because I can very well understand the way in which the very persons who are presenting petitions and asking for this recognition would resent the consequences if they found that the religious control was taken away from the state and put into the Commonwealth. For my own part, I think it is of little moment whether the words are inserted or not. The piety in us must be in our hearts rather than on our lips. Whether the words are inserted or not, I think they will have no meaning, and will have no effect in extending the power of the Commonwealth; because the Commonwealth will be from its first stage a Christian Commonwealth, and, unless its powers are expressly limited, may I legislate on religious questions in a way that we now little dream of.

I desire simply to say that I strongly support the position of Mr. Glynn.

The amendment was agreed to.

The preamble, as amended, was agreed to.

The title of the Bill was agreed to.

The question now is that I report the Bill, with amendments.

Before the Bill is reported, with amendments, I would like to mention one matter, and to obtain an expression of the opinion of the committee upon it. There is a little difficulty which has arisen because of the order to print the Bill showing the amendments. That involves very careful and undivided attention on the part of the Clerk of the Convention (Mr. Blackmore), and the difficulty that arises is this: Unless he has some time during which the Convention is not sitting to facilitate the printing of the Bill, as ordered to be printed yesterday, with the amendments in the form in which honorable members would like to see them before the Convention entertains the question of the reconsideration of clauses, the Bill in that form will not be ready till Friday morning. Honorable members can easily understand that with night sittings, and sittings up to five o'clock in the afternoon, the time of the officers of the Convention has been closely occupied. They have to do more work than perhaps many of us know of after the hours of the sittings of the Convention. A print of the Bill can be obtained by half-past ten o'clock to-morrow morning, if the Convention does not sit this afternoon, and honorable members will then have the Bill in a form showing the amendments that have been made both by the Convention and in drafting. They would thus, of course, be able to deal with the question of the reconsideration of clauses much more conveniently, as they would have the Bill as it left the Convention in Sydney, and the Bill as it stands now, on the right and left hand pages respectively. Mr. Blackmore says that if the Convention do not sit this afternoon he will be able, by keeping the printers at work all night, to have the Bill in that shape by half-past ten o'clock to-morrow morning. I would put it to the committee whether that would not be the more desirable course to take. I am very sorry to have to make this suggestion, especially because of my honorable friend (Sir John Forrest); but I put it to the Convention whether it would not be more desirable to have the Bill to-morrow morning at half-past ten, by not sitting further to-day, than not to be able to have it till Friday. If we sit this afternoon Mr. Blackmore cannot attend to the preparation of the Bill in the way I have mentioned. I would ask the committee to indicate wh

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Have we not the print of the Bill as far as it was agreed to in Sydney?

Mr. BARTON. -

We have had that all the time before us; but since the Bill was dealt with in Sydney a number of clauses have been amended. While we have been sitting here, a large number of amendments have been made. Some clauses have gone out entirely; others have been altered very much in their scope; and in dealing with the question as to whether a clause as it now stands in the Bill should be reconsidered, it obviously would be more convenient to see before us the clause as it actually now stands, otherwise some confusion may arise.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Could we not deal with the dead-lock clause? The deadlock clause has not been altered.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am reminded, as an illustration of what I mean, that there was an amendment to be proposed by Sir John Forrest in clause 48, that after the words "this section shall not apply" there should be added the words "to the office of any Minister of the Crown in any state." I understand that the position now is that since we sat in Sydney that matter has been decided in such a way that the amendment is unnecessary and could not be put. As a matter of fact, I believe it has been put in as a drafting amendment. I regret exceedingly that there should be any occasion whatever for our delaying our work even for two or three hours; but when the question is one of choosing between a course which will facilitate the proceedings and a course which will rather tend to confuse honorable members I must say that my own opinion, at any rate, is in favour of not sitting this afternoon, in order that we may have the print of the Bill as quickly as possible.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I hesitate to express any lack of concurrence with the views of our leader; but as it appears that the chief, and indeed the only, reason why we are unable to go on is that the services of the Clerk are required elsewhere, I would ask would it not be possible for Mr. Blackmore to render those services elsewhere, and for the Assistant Clerk to perform the work at the table, so that we may be able to proceed with the discussion of some matters which might be dealt with this afternoon?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have ascertained that Mr. Blackmore cannot get this Bill in print by to-morrow morning unless he has the assistance of the Assistant Clerk. It requires the undivided attention of both to achieve that result. In answer to the question of Sir John Forrest just now, as to whether we could not go on with the dead-lock clause, I may say that I myself would be delighted to be able to do so; but the difficulty presents itself that you cannot go on with the proceedings of the Convention without the officers at the table, and if we are to have a print of the Bill tomorrow morning, it is necessary that both clerks should be engaged on the Bill.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

It seems to me that the Convention is at the mercy of the officers. Supposing they were both ill for two or three days, should we have to adjourn? I really think some plan should be adopted so that the delegates-many of them from distant colonies-should be able to get on with their work. Surely it is possible to make an arrangement by which certain clauses might be discussed this afternoon.

Mr. BARTON. -

I only wish we could.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The delay does not matter to some honorable members perhaps, but it matters a great deal to us from Western Australia. I really think there ought to be some means by which we could discuss the dead-lock clause, for example, to-day. I do not suppose we could come to a decision on it to-day-it is not likely we could do so-but, at any rate, we might discuss the question. I appeal to the honorable the leader to try and devise some plan by which this proposed adjournment may be avoided.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I have felt—and I dare say other members of the Convention have felt—that, not having kept an accurate record of the amendments as we have gone along, I scarcely know how the various clauses have been amended, and I think it would shorten very much the debate on some of those clauses if we could get a print of the Bill showing accurately what we have done. I spoke to the honorable the leader of the Convention about that matter the other day, and if we cannot get such a print until Friday morning, providing we sit this afternoon, I would certainly recommend that we adjourn over this afternoon, so as to get the print to-morrow morning. I think we will save time by doing that. There are many things in the Bill, perhaps, as it now stands, which may obviate the necessity for considering some of the matters that have been deferred. Under these circumstances, I think we ought to adjourn over this afternoon.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

Sir Richard Baker, I have such knowledge of your capacity as Chairman, that I am prompted to ask if you think the temporary absence of the clerks from the table would prevent the satisfactory transaction of the business of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. -

In answer to the question of the right honorable member (Mr. Kingston), I would say that if the Government of Victoria has some gentleman to place at the disposal of the Convention who can write a fair hand, I think we can go on without the clerks for to-day.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I can only say, on behalf of the Government of Victoria, Mr. Chairman, that we shall only be too happy to help you in any way if it is considered desirable for the Convention to sit this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would now suggest that, inasmuch as this is an arrangement which throws a good deal of burden upon me, some matters of minor importance might be considered this afternoon before I finally report the Bill. There are four such minor matters. First of all, there is the name of the Commonwealth, in connexion with which an amendment has been submitted by Mr. Symon. Secondly, there is the question of citizenship, in regard to which notice of several amendments has been given. Thirdly, there is the question of the power of the Commonwealth to legislate concerning religious questions; and, fourthly, there is the amendment proposed by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner in reference to the federal capital. If we could dispose of those four matters, at any rate, this afternoon, we should have made some advance. I will now put it that the following clauses be reconsidered-

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

Mr. Chairman, will you allow me to suggest that it would be rather inadvisable to put the whole of the clauses that are suggested for reconsideration together. The four subjects you have mentioned may involve a very great deal of, debate. At least, some of them may; and if we are to have this clean reprint to-morrow or on Friday morning-

The CHAIRMAN. -

We cannot do that according to our standing orders. The amendment that can be proposed is on the question that I report the Bill to the full Convention, with amendments.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The question can be put separately as to each clause on the question that the clauses be recommitted. Upon the motion that you, sir, report the Bill to the House I will, if it meet with the view of the committee, move as an amendment that the clauses you have specified be recommitted.
Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

A great body of drafting amendments have been introduced into the Bill by the Drafting Committee. They are not all formal. We have come to the stage when we have to consider them.

The CHAIRMAN. -

No, they are in the Bill.

Mr. SYMON. -

But we are now going to reconsider the Bill.

The CHAIRMAN. -

No; only two or three clauses in it at present.

Mr. SYMON. -

I submit that each honorable member who wishes a clause to be reconsidered should be able to move that that clause be reconsidered, on the lines, you, sir, have suggested. For instance, I have a matter for reconsideration in clause 3. I think I should be able to move that that clause be reconsidered and when my amendment is disposed of then some other honorable member can move a similar motion with regard to the next clause for reconsideration. But I point out that if we move the reconsideration of a whole body of clauses at once, we shall get into a perfect muddle, because it is stated that we shall have a reprint of the Bill to-morrow morning, and we do not know at what stage of the discussion we shall be at that time. The whole thing will, therefore, get into a confused state. We have a multitude of amendments to reconsider, and unless we have some sort of regularity it will be a strain upon honorable members to keep their attention on the work we are engaged upon. Therefore I suggest that you should call upon some honorable member to move that a particular clause be reconsidered.

The CHAIRMAN. -

There is no difficulty whatever. I think the honorable member does not exactly understand the position. It is this: On the motion that I report the Bill with amendments an amendment can be moved to reconsider certain clauses. Then, when that is done, I shall report the Bill to the Convention. Then this committee will have finished and done with the Bill altogether, and it will be for the Convention-the whole House-to say whether or not they will recommit the Bill or any portion of it. There is no difficulty about the procedure, nor will any confusion arise.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

May I ask if what you have stated, sir, goes as far as this: That we can ask for any clauses already dealt with to be reconsidered?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Yes.
Then we could ask to take a clause for the purpose of reversing any decision already given?

Yes.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is news to me. I did not know that that was so under the rules of the South Australian Parliament.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Are you not going to reverse the decision as to bonuses?

Mr. ISAACS. -

We are going to try, but I did not know that we could do it at this stage. I thought the only means of doing what we desire was when the Bill was reported to the Convention, when I thought that we should have to, ask the Convention to recommit the clause in question. I am therefore a little bit taken by surprise as to the procedure. I quite agree with my honorable friend (Mr. Symon) that it is impossible to know exactly where we are until we have not only a clean print of the Bill in our hands, but have also had some little opportunity of reading it. I have gone as carefully as I can through the amendments circulated by the Drafting Committee, and I have had them incorporated in my own copy of the Bill.

Mr. SYMON. -

You have been more industrious than most of us have been.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But I am still somewhat unable to consider these amendments without reference to the whole Bill. I think we should be able to reconsider the clauses with reference to the Bill as a whole, and we shall have to get a clean print of the Bill, and have some little time to read it, before we can do that with confidence. I have no doubt that you, sir, will be able to pursue the same course in the future as you have pursued in the past, and not restrict us too much to bare technicalities, but that you will allow us to thrash out the questions that come before us in the way in which they should be thrashed out. I hope that nothing will be hurried. I feel that we are in this position: That we ought not, especially in view of the enormous distance that seems to separate some of us on some vital questions, to do anything to close up the whole matter, and send the Bill to the people with the absolute certainty of its being rejected-in some quarters, at all events.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Rubbish!

Mr. FRASER. -
That statement is not a very wise one to make.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Well, I am going to be very frank indeed with this committee.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

You wish to make political capital out of it.

The CHAIRMAN. -

This debate is irregular. I have said that I will act without the clerks if certain small matters are gone on with, but if larger matters are to be gone into, I shall have to withdraw that offer.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Perhaps I have been drawn into a discussion that is, to a certain extent, irrelevant. However, I wish to say that I can only treat in the way it deserves to be treated, and the way the rest of the community will treat it, such a remark as has just been made.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

The public can judge you.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I know that no weight is attached to such remarks.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Not to remarks of yours.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But the time has come when we should not lay ourselves open to the charge by our fellow delegates of not expressing our mind fully and clearly, and we should devote ourselves to making the Bill such a measure as will commend itself to the sense of the people for their acceptance. We ought not to do anything which will be hurried, and which will make the Bill impracticable. Therefore, I hope that something will be done to give us a further opportunity of reviewing what has been done; and, as I said before, the Government of Victoria will be most happy to assist the Chairman in providing any necessary clerical assistance.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I think that if we adopt the suggestion which you have made, Mr. Chairman, it will be a very wise expenditure of the rest of the day; but I suppose it is understood that our adoption of that solution will not in any way prejudice our rights in regard to moving any subsequent amendments in the same clauses of the Bill?

The CHAIRMAN. -

After the Bill is reported, any clause can be recommitted.

Mr. REID. -

To put the matter pointedly—because my case will be that of others—on clause 3 I intend to propose an amendment. The fact that we only discuss the one matter referred to in clause 3 now will not prejudice my right of moving a further amendment on the clause hereafter?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Not in the slightest degree.

Mr. REID. -

Then I think that every one's rights are fully preserved.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The right honorable gentleman will see that the Convention, as a whole, committed this Bill to the committee of the whole House for consideration, and the full Convention is not supposed to know what goes on in committee. The committee will report what they have done to the Convention, and it is for the Convention to recommit any clause they like.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I quite agree with my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Symon) that it will be a mistake to recommit four subjects at once, with a view of employing the time of this Convention. These four subjects might occupy four days. Therefore, it will be far better, if we can do so, to reconsider simply one subject at a time.

Mr. BARTON. -

If the discussion upon these subjects lasts over to-morrow, it will be all the better for honorable members who wish to read the Bill through.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Would it not be better to reconsider one of these matters at a time, and then the Chairman could again put the question that the Bill be reported, and another clause could be recommitted as an amendment upon that? Then the Chairman could again put the question that the Bill be reported, and a third clause could be recommitted. Is not that possible?

The CHAIRMAN. -

I am afraid that the procedure suggested by Mr. Holder is not possible unless we suspend the standing orders. I shall, if it be the wish of the Convention, put the question that clause 3 be recommitted forthwith, and if that be carried I will put the other clauses which have been mentioned. If we have not finished the discussion to-morrow, it is entirely in the hands of the committee as to what course they will adopt.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

If the course suggested by the Chairman is adopted, perhaps the leader will say whether we shall be able to get a copy of the clean print of the Bill to-morrow, or if we shall have to wait until the following morning? My objection to this course of procedure was because it was stated that if we
Mr. BARTON. -
That was what I was informed at first.

Mr. LYNE. -
I am anxious to get on as rapidly as possible; but I do not desire to delay the obtaining of a clean print of the Bill.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I understand that the clean print will be here at half-past ten o'clock to-morrow morning. I only made the suggestion which I have made in order to let the committee decide some minor matters upon which the time today might be profitably expended.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I will ask honorable members to allow the question to be put now, so that we can get on to the first recommitted clause. It, is obvious, I think, from what has been stated, that the rights of honorable members to move further amendments in the clauses which will be recommitted will not be forfeited.

Clause 3 was recommitted for the purpose of considering the question of the name of the Commonwealth; clause 52 was recommitted for the purpose of considering the question of Commonwealth citizenship new clauses to replace clauses 109 and 110, omitted, were ordered to be considered; and clauses 118 and 120A were also recommitted.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The clause now before the committee is clause 3, which has been, recommitted for the further consideration of the name.

Clause 3. - It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honorable Privy Council, to declare by proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being later than one year after the passing of this Act, the people of [here name the colonies which have adopted the Constitution] (hereinafter severally included in the expression "the said colonies") shall be united in a Federal Constitution under the name of "The Commonwealth of Australia"; and on and after that day the Commonwealth shall be established under that name.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I beg to move-
That the words "The Commonwealth of" (line 10) be struck out.

That will leave the clause to provide simply that the colonies shall be united in a Federal Constitution, under the name of "Australia." Now, my honorable friend (Dr. Cockburn), earlier in the present session, moved in this direction in connexion with a later clause, but it was pointed out at that time that that clause did not deal specifically with the name, that the clause now under reconsideration dealt with that subject, and that the amendment he then proposed could be more properly dealt with under this clause.
Now, honorable members will recollect that in Adelaide I moved in the same direction. On that occasion there was a very short debate, and not wishing to press the matter exhaustively then, but rather to leave it until after the Bill had been before the public and the Legislature, pursuant to the Enabling Act, I did not on that occasion press the matter to a division;
but I wish to tell honorable members that I intend to press the question to a division on this occasion. I only desire to utter one or two sentences, because it seems to me the matter is so plain that any one who will consider it for a moment will agree with my view, and that it will be unnecessary for me to occupy a long time in commending it, as I do, to the acceptance of honorable members. I wish to clear away the misconception in the first place that I have any objection whatever to the word
"Commonwealth," or to the use of the word "Commonwealth," in this Bill.
I have no objection to that where it is confined to the expression of the political Union. In the preamble honorable members will find that what we desire to do is to unite in one indissoluble Federal Commonwealth—that is the political Union—"under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and under the Constitution hereby established."
Honorable members will therefore see that the application of the word
Commonwealth is to the political Union which is sought to be established.
It is not intended there to have any relation whatever to the name of the country or nation which we are going to create under that Union. The second part of the preamble goes on to say that it is expedient to make provision for the admission of other colonies into the Commonwealth. That is, for admission into this political Union, which is not a republic, which is not to be called a dominion, kingdom, or empire, but is to be a Union by the name of "Commonwealth," and I do not propose to interfere with that in the slightest degree. The first clause says—This Act maybe cited as the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act." I assent to all that. Then comes clause 3, which says it shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honorable Privy Council, to declare by proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being later than one year after the passing of this Act, the people of the colonies enumerated shall be united in a Federal Constitution under the name of—I say it ought to be "of Australia." Why do we want to put in "the Commonwealth of Australia"? We are there by our Constitution giving the name to our country, and, to the united people who are to be established as a nation under the Constitution. By what name, I would like to ask honorable members, will they call this Federal Union? It will be called by the name Australia, whether we like it or not.

Sir EDWARD BRADDO. -

The Dominion of Canada is called Canada, and why object to this?

Mr. SYMON. -

I cannot understand why honorable members should be afraid to put in the Constitution the name by which the country will be known. Sir Edward Braddon very properly reminds me that, in the case of the Dominion of Canada, Dominion is no part of the name, and it is known as Canada. Then, why not say it in the Constitution?

Sir EDWARD BRADDO. -

There is no occasion to put it in the Constitution.

Mr. SYMON. -

Why not call it by the name by which it is to be known? We are embedding in this Constitution a name for this country which is not intended to be used. The name we intend to use is Australia, and that is the name we are entitled to use. If we are as patriotic as I believe we all are, we ought to provide that the country shall be called Australia. We do not want a double-barrelled name, and such a mouthful as the Commonwealth of Australia, or the Dominion of Australia. The political Union is the Commonwealth, the name of our country is Australia. That is the name we should emblazon on the very, forefront of this Constitution, and no other. What possible objection can there be to it? We know quite well that in the United States of America they did not, in their Constitution, call themselves the republic of the United States.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If Queensland does not come into the Federation, will she not be a part of Australia?

Mr. SYMON. -

If she does not come in she will not be part of the political Union of Australia. We can recall the fact that some years ago it was sought by the oldest colony of the group to appropriate to itself the name of Australia.

Mr. ISAACS. -

As a geographical expression.

Mr. SYMON. -

It might be a geographical expression, but, so far as we are concerned, we hope and believe-it is our aspiration-that the whole of the Australian colonies, from sea to sea, will be united under this Constitution. If any one of the states stands out she must continue to be known by her state name, as distinguished from Australia, which will represent the Federal Union.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
She will still be in Australia.

Mr. SYMON. -
She will be within the continent, but not within the Union.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
You cannot legislate her out of existence.

Mr. SYMON. -
Nobody is attempting to do that.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
You are.

Mr. SYMON. -
The honorable member misapprehends the position, and I invite him between now and to-morrow morning to consider it with more care. I was not dealing with the geographical position at all. We all admit that we are dealing with the political Union.

Mr. FRASER. -
But if it is not a Union of Australia through Queensland not joining, how will the case stand?

Mr. SYMON. -
We will call ourselves Australia, and we will not interfere with her calling herself Queensland.

Mr. FRASER. -
Other parts of Australia might not join.

Mr. SYMON. -
We will not be interfering with any other part of Australia-we hope that there will be no other part out. But we have to give the name which we believe to be the most appropriate to our country, and that name is Australia. That is the name we are giving it under the Bill, except that word calling it the Commonwealth. I am not objecting to "Commonwealth." Commonwealth is the name I prefer for the political Union, because it is not a republic. I prefer it to Dominion, or anything else, if we want to describe a political Union. When you are calling your country the Commonwealth of Australia you are using an absolutely senseless redundancy of expression, when the word "Australia" is all you want.

Mr. FRASER. -
We have got accustomed to it.

Mr. SYMON. -
Are we not more accustomed to the word "Australia"?

Mr. FRASER. -
Not; in this way.

Mr. SYMON. -
Do not we value the name of Australia a great deal more than Commonwealth? Surely we do.

Mr. FRASER. -
There is nothing in it.

Mr. SYMON. -
Mr. Fraser says there is nothing in this, but Mr. Douglas says there is, and I agree with him that it is a mistake to put in the word "Commonwealth" in this place. You may use any expression to define the political Union; you may call it Dominion, Commonwealth, or anything else, but when you come to give the name to the nation which you wish to establish you do not want a double-barrelled name—you want Australia or United Australia.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
That would be a double-barrelled name.

Mr. SYMON. -
Not double-barrelled in that sense. It would get rid of the point that Mr. Isaacs has referred to. At any rate, I prefer the simple name, Australia. We are all proud of it, so let us put it in the Bill. It is the name everybody will wish to call the Commonwealth by when this Federal Union is accomplished. We do not speak of the Kingdom of England, and the United States of America was not called the Republic of the United States of America. Their Constitution describes it as the United States of America. It was essential to put in the words "of America," because America comprises a great many other countries besides the United States.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Suppose Western Australia stood out, what would happen?

Mr. SYMON. -
The position would be that we should be the United States of Australia, and Western Australia would be as she is now.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
That would be a very funny anomaly.

Mr. SYMON. -
Where is the anomaly? Does not my honorable friend see that if Western Australia and Queensland stand out they will be outside of the Commonwealth of Australia?

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Commonwealth is the principal portion of the term.

Mr. SYMON. -
No, you might call it the three united colonies of Australia.
Mr. FRASER. -
Supposing Western Australia and Queensland united, there would be two Commonwealths.

Mr. SYMON. -
Then they would have to find another name. I do not believe for a moment that those colonies will stand out. But supposing that they do, and if we call ourselves Australia, that will be an additional reason to them to come into the original and more triumphant Union. It will be an inducement to them to join, because otherwise they will not only part with their inheritance in a great country, but their inheritance in its name.

Mr. LYNE. -
Does the honorable member think it is worth fighting about?

Mr. SYMON. -
I do. My honorable friend, like myself, is proud of Australia and of the name, and I want to see the name Australia, without any prefix or anything of that kind, inserted in the Constitution. I am just as proud of Australia as I am, in other respects, of England.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Scotland, you mean.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
What about Ireland?

Mr. SYMON. -
I include Scotland; and Ireland comes in for a share of my affection; but I do want the name Australia." It is a beautiful name it is more beautiful in itself than the name "Commonwealth" in this connexion. Whilst I am agreeable to have the political designation retained-and I have no objection in the wide world to that-I want the name of the country to be established in the Bill, so that the nation shall be described by the name which we shall call it.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
This is a different question to the one which was raised before. When Mr. Symon proposed the motion in Adelaide he proposed to eliminate the "Commonwealth" altogether, which is a different proposal to what he is now making. I think the motion now moved is the correct one, and will recommend itself to a large majority of the Convention, just as the proposition formerly made by Mr. Symon to strike out "Commonwealth" was rejected by a large proportion of the Convention. It is not proposed in any way to alter the name by which the political entity is to be known—it is to be still the Commonwealth of Australia; it is simply the question of the title of the country. It is only right that this should be Australia, a simple name, so that if any state stands out of the Union, and any one says he is a citizen of Australia, it should not be necessary to ask him whether he comes from the Commonwealth or from a dissenting colony. The Commonwealth should be synonymous with Australia, and with that view I support the proposal.

Question—That the words "The Commonwealth of" proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause-put.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I beg to move-

That the following new sub-section be inserted after sub-section (21):-

XXIA. Commonwealth citizenship.

I propose to confer upon the Federal Parliament the power to deal with the question of Commonwealth citizenship. I have looked through the Bill very carefully, and I do not see the slightest allusion in it to a federal citizenship. We are creating a new political organization, entirely different from that of the states and from that of the even wider political organization-the empire. I do not think that this Constitution should touch the question of state citizenship, or in any way define the power of the states Parliaments in dealing with the qualifications of state citizenship, and of its incidence, its rights, and its liabilities. I have also given notice of a proposed clause defining Commonwealth citizenship, but I will not refer to it at the present time, although it might hereafter be inserted. It defines what constitutes Commonwealth citizenship, but it would not in any way dispense with the desirability or necessity of conferring on the Federal Parliament some power to deal with the question of state citizenship. This sub-section will stand entirely upon its own merits, and without reference to any cast-iron definition which may or may not be inserted in the Constitution. It will confer upon the Federal Parliament the power of defining the qualifications of Commonwealth citizenship, the mode of acquiring those qualifications, and also the mode of losing those qualifications. The Constitution would not be complete unless it had in it some such provision. It is quite true that in one of the earlier clauses of the Bill it is stated that, upon the passing of the Constitution, the people of the various colonies of Australasia joining in the Constitution are to be created a Federal Commonwealth under the Crown.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Does not that create them citizens?

Dr. QUICK. -

No, it does not in any way define citizenship. It refers to the people without in any way defining or stating the mode of ascertaining who are the people. If the word "people" in this earlier section is to be considered as giving the test of citizenship, then all the people within the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth of all races, black or white, or aliens, will be considered members of this new political community. What I want to see inserted in the Bill is a constitutional definition of citizenship.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Not in the Bill.

Dr. QUICK. -

I want to see either a constitutional definition in the Bill or the power conferred on the Federal Parliament to define what constitutes citizenship. If that be done, then of course there will be two citizenships within this United Australia. There will be the citizenship of the state in which a person resides, the rights and duties of which will be determined by the laws of the state, and there will be the wider federal citizenship, the rights and duties and incidence of which will be defined by the Federal Parliament. In submitting this proposal, I am not without precedent, because I find that in most of the great Federal Constitutions of the world, there is provision in express terms in the instrument itself for the ascertainment and determination of a common citizenship. In the Constitution of the German Empire, Article 3, there is this provision:-

There shall be a common citizenship for all Germany.

What we want is a common citizenship for the whole of this Australian Commonwealth. Then Article 4, section 1, says-

Under the supervision and legislative control of the empire shall be the right of citizenship.

That corresponds with the section which I propose to add to clause 52. Article 43, section 1, of the Swiss Constitution contains this provision:-

Every citizen of a canton is a Swiss citizen.

That acknowledges a citizenship higher than the citizenship of the canton. It acknowledges in express terms a citizenship of the Federation.

Mr. SYMON. -

Would not every citizen of a state be a citizen of the Commonwealth?

Dr. QUICK. -

No; there is no such provision in the Constitution. In the Constitution of the United States which preceded the amendments, there is a distinct recognition of the United States citizenship, because, although it does not create a citizenship in express terms, still, in the clauses relating to the qualifications of the President, there is a proviso that no person shall be qualified to be elected as President unless he has been a citizen of the United States for a certain number of years. Then, in referring to the qualifications of senators, there is a proviso that no person shall be a senator, or shall be elected a senator, unless he is a citizen of the United States of a certain number of years standing. So, also, with reference to the office of member of the House of Representatives, it is provided that no person shall be a member of the House of Representatives unless he be a citizen of the United States of a certain number of years standing. There is no express provision that there shall be a common citizenship of the United States.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes, in Article 14.

Dr. QUICK. -

I am about to come to that. When Article 14 was agreed to all doubts upon the question of federal citizenship were completely and for ever removed, because it is therein provided that-

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside.

Before that article was passed there was some doubt as to the origin of the United States citizenship referred to in the clauses I have mentioned relating to the qualifications of a resident senator and member of the House of Representatives. It was then contended that the United States citizenship proceeded from or originated in the state citizenship. But the 14th article did away with the doctrine of the origination of the federal citizenship in the state citizenship, and provided for the distinct creation of a federal citizenship apart from and independent of the state citizenship, and made the federal citizenship the avenue to the state citizenship by the provision that all natural-born and naturalized subjects of the United States should be citizens of the United States and, qua citizens of the United States, citizens of the states in which they resided. That article places the matter beyond all doubt, and furnishes a precedent, combined with the provisions in the other Constitutions to which I have referred, which I think we ought to follow in the Constitution we are now preparing. We ought either to place in the forefront of this Constitution an express definition of citizenship of the Commonwealth, or empower the Federal Parliament to determine how federal citizenship shall be acquired, what shall be its qualifications, its rights, and its privileges, and how the status may hereafter be lost.

Mr. SYMON. -

You had better define it in the Constitution. Dr. QUICK. - I am disposed to think that there ought to be something in the nature of a definition in the Constitution. In my mind, a reasonably approximate definition would be that which I have drafted, to the effect that all persons resident in the Commonwealth, being natural-born or naturalized subjects of the Queen, and not under any disability imposed by the Federal Parliament, should be citizens of the Commonwealth. That is not a complete definition, it is only an approximation of what I consider a definition. The conditions of citizenship seem to me to be that the citizen shall be either a natural-born or naturalized subject of Her Majesty the Queen, and resident within the Commonwealth, and that he shall not be under any disability imposed by the Federal Parliament. Such a disability might be imposed under the clause which we put into the Bill some time ago, empowering the Federal Parliament to deal with foreign races and undesirable immigrants. The Federal Parliament is empowered to declare that these races shall be placed under certain disabilities, among which might be that they shall not be capable of acquiring citizenship. The definition which I have suggested would not open the door to members of those undesirable races, and it would empower the Federal Parliament to exclude from the enjoyment of and participation in the privileges of federal citizenship people of any undesirable race or of undesirable antecedents. I hope that this proposal will not be opposed and denounced in the manner which has become somewhat fashionable in the Convention. Every generalization which is brought forward to interpret the Constitution, and to set forward more plainly the advantages that it is supposed will accrue from the union, if it goes an iota beyond what is absolutely or technically necessary, is denounced as a proposal to placard the Constitution. I hope that a proposal to define federal citizenship and the status of members of this new political organization will not be pooh-poohed, and spoken of as a proposal to placard the Constitution. In my opinion, there are certain substantial rights and advantages which would accrue from the placing in the Constitution of an expressed recognition of the federal citizenship. The Constitution empowers the Federal Parliament to deal with certain external affairs, among which would probably be the right to negotiate for commercial treaties with foreign countries, in the same way as Canada has negotiated for such treaties. These treaties could only confer rights and privileges upon the citizens of the Commonwealth, because the Federal Government, in the exercise of its power, could only act for and on behalf of its citizens. Therefore, it is desirable that the Constitution should define the class of persons for whom these rights and privileges would be gained. By placing in the Constitution a definition of citizenship, or by providing for its creation, we do not interfere with the citizenship of the states, which I propose to leave exclusively within the jurisdiction of the states themselves, nor do we interfere with that wider relationship which affects us all as subjects of Her Majesty and members of the great British Empire. We are affected by this relationship by virtue of our position as British subjects. It is, however, a relationship entirely different from that which will be created by this Constitution. A citizenship of the Commonwealth will, of course, be much narrower than our subject-ship of the empire. In my opinion, it would be a manifest imperfection in the scheme of union not to make provision in some shape or other to enable the Federal Parliament to deal with and legislate upon the subject of membership of the Commonwealth. Without in any way dealing with the questions to which reference is made by the other amendments and clauses on the notice-paper, and without in any way suggesting that federal citizenship should come into conflict with state citizenship, or that state citizenship should overlap federal citizenship, I propose to give to the Federal Parliament power to deal with this important question. Without such a provision as I wish to insert, I think the Constitution would be manifestly defective.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). - I am sure that the honorable member will have no reason to apprehend that the exceedingly important question which he has raised will not be properly dealt with. We all recognised, when we were dealing with clause 110, the extreme importance of the question which has been raised. I am entirely in sympathy with my honorable and learned friend as to the necessity for dealing with this question, but I think that it would be a mistake to deal with it in the way he proposes. I think it would be a mistake to give to the Federal Parliament the power of determining the qualifications of citizenship under the Commonwealth. In my opinion, the honorable and learned member's quotations from the other Constitutions all bear out the principle that in the making of a Constitution that which gives the right of citizenship and which includes citizenship is defined. Let me for a moment consider the proposal to give this power to the Federal Parliament. The Federal Parliament could do nothing in the way of defining the qualification of citizenship or the rights of citizenship beyond the limits of the Constitution. Now, you may regard the citizen from two points of view. In the first place, as regards his rights as a member of the Commonwealth, and in the second place, as regards his rights as a member of the state. The latter aspect seems to me much the more important. But let us take first his position in regard to the Commonwealth. Under the power which you have given to the Federal Parliament to make laws regulating immigration and aliens, you embrace every possible set of circumstances under which any person may enter the bounds of the Commonwealth. As you have power to prevent any person from entering any part of the Commonwealth, you have also the power to prevent any person from becoming a member of the Commonwealth community. There is no territorial entity coincident with the Commonwealth. Every part of the Commonwealth territory is part of the state, and it is only by virtue of his citizenship of a state that any person within the bounds of the Commonwealth will have any political rights under the Constitution. Of course, when I speak of a state, I include also any territory occupying the position of quasi-state, which, of course, stands in exactly the same position.

Mr. WISE. -

Is that clear?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

If the territory does not stand in the same position as a state, it is admitted to political rights at the will of the Commonwealth, and upon such terms as the Commonwealth may impose. Every person who has rights as a member of the Commonwealth must be a citizen either of some state or some territory. It is only by virtue of his citizenship of a state or of a territory that he has any political rights in the Commonwealth.

Mr. WISE. -

Before the 14th amendment was passed it was very much questioned whether a citizen of Washington had any rights at all, because Washington was only a territory.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes; but what the honorable and learned member says really supports my argument. The thirteen original states occupied a very small portion of the area now forming the United States of America, and of course the question might arise as to what the position of a person who is not resident of or a citizen of any state, but a resident of a territory, might be in relation to the Commonwealth. But I do not think that that question will arise here, because we cannot imagine, I think, any portion of the Commonwealth becoming a territory now, unless it has been a state at one time-unless it is some portion of a state which has been ceded to the Commonwealth, and in the cession to the Commonwealth there is no doubt that care will be taken to define what the rights of the residents of the territory would be in regard to the political rights of the Commonwealth. It appears to me quite clear, as regards the right of any person from the outside to become a member of the Commonwealth, that the power to regulate immigration and emigration, and the power to deal with aliens, give the right to define who shall be citizens, as coming from the outside world. Now, in regard to the citizens of the states—that is, those who are here already, apart from these laws—every citizen of a state having certain political rights is entitled to all the rights of citizenship in the Commonwealth, necessarily without a definition at all.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Would not every voter be a citizen? One man, one vote.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Exactly. The only rights which citizens have, as regards the Commonwealth, are political rights; there are no other rights I know of as yet. I have not heard any other rights mentioned. All those political rights are given by virtue of the person being resident in a state. It is only by virtue of such residence that he becomes entitled to those rights. So far as the power of the Commonwealth to legislate is concerned, the Commonwealth, under the two powers I cited, can regulate who shall be citizens of the state coming from outside, but the Commonwealth cannot interfere with the rights of those residents of the state who are entitled to political rights, and no such clause as the honorable gentleman proposes to put in can give them any such rights. Suppose, for instance, it should be thought desirable to insert some provision in a Bill passed by the Commonwealth that the rights of all citizens of the Commonwealth should be equal in regard to the ownership of land through every state, or that the rights of the citizens of other portions of the Commonwealth should be equal in regard to the ownership of mines or the right to mine, or take any other privilege or right which you may think fit; to make any general rule of that kind would be to interfere with the autonomy of the states. The states have, under the Constitution, already an absolute right to deal with everything except that which is taken away from them, and unless you place in the Constitution some distinct definition of equality of citizenship throughout the states or of some rights which a citizen of the Commonwealth will have through the states you cannot do it by legislation of the Commonwealth afterwards. Taking these two branches, which must include every point of view from which you can regard this question of citizenship—that is to say, the rights of those who enter from outside, or the rights of those who are here already, the Commonwealth has abundant power to legislate as regards those who come from outside, and it cannot legislate, even if you put such a power as this in, as regards those who are here already.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Do you say that this sub-section gives an extension of the power, then?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I say it cannot. I have said already that, in regard to those coming from outside, you have quite as much power as you can possibly require; you have the ampest power. As regards those who are here already, if the giving of any right of citizenship infringe on the rights of a state you cannot do that; you cannot take away the right of a state by implication in that way. Therefore, I am driven to the conclusion that it would be an incomplete way of effecting the honorable member's object to simply give this power over to the Commonwealth.

Dr. QUICK. -

It would not interfere with state rights, as you suggest. It is only intended to deal with Commonwealth rights, not state rights.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

What Commonwealth rights are there?

Dr. QUICK. -

Rights conferred by the Constitution.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

If they are political rights, they are conferred already by virtue of a person being an inhabitant of a state entitled to certain political rights, in such state. The honorable member cannot intend to give a different right to a citizen politically under the government of the Commonwealth from the right of a citizen of any state. The rights are coterminous-coincident-and the political rights of every citizen of the Commonwealth who is within the Commonwealth arise by virtue of his being a citizen of a state.

Dr. QUICK. -

Who is a citizen of the Commonwealth? You do not define who he is.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I have said already that I have no objection to some definition being given in another clause, laying down who shall be citizens of the Commonwealth for what it may be worth, and I can see one point of view in which there may be some reason for it. What I am pointing out now is that this proposal does not enlarge in any way the right to deal with the question, because the rights of the states politically are absolutely secured by the Constitution in its present form. But I see no objection to some kind of a definition being given of the rights of citizenship, that is to say, that every citizen of a state shall be a citizen of the Commonwealth, for this reason, that I can see one aspect in which new rights are given to the whole Commonwealth, that is to say, rights which they hold as members of the Commonwealth. The right to appeal to the courts of the Commonwealth is a new right. For instance, at the present time a resident of New South Wales cannot sue a resident of Victoria, except by going through a certain process, and getting judgment, and having that enforced, but he cannot sue him directly.

Mr. ISAACS. -
He may go to Victoria and do it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
That altogether depends on where the cause of action arose.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If you get your defendant you can sue him.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I know that there are circumstances under which you can do it, but we all know that there are circumstances under which, although you may have the clearest possible claim against a person, you cannot sue him, from the difficulty of the citizen of one colony suing a citizen in the courts of another colony.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Is there any difficulty about trusting the Federal Parliament in this matter?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I have said that I do not see that such a trust in the Federal Parliament would be effective. I sympathize with the honorable member's view, but I think it will be carried out by some kind of definition of citizenship, and I was pointing out the only aspect in which it appears to me it might be desirable to have some such definition, and that is, you are creating new rights to citizens of the Commonwealth as citizens of the Commonwealth in regard to your courts. You establish courts for the Commonwealth, and every citizen of the Commonwealth is entitled to the use of those courts.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Who is he?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
That is what has to be defined. A citizen of the Commonwealth is at present any person who has political rights which the Constitution gives him, which he gets by virtue of being a resident of a state. That is exactly the reason upon which the citizenship definition in the American Constitution stands.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Would it not avoid difficulty to leave the Federal Parliament to define it from time to time?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
That really gives no power whatever. It does not carry out the honorable member's object, because the power to deal with persons coming from outside, in regard to their being members of the community, is given in the powers to deal with immigration and aliens. The power to deal with citizens of states is limited by the rights of the states at the present time, and if you want really to have a definition which gives some right and some entity to a citizen of the Commonwealth, as different from a citizen of a state, I think you ought to do it in some way by definition.

Mr. ISAACS. -

When the Constitution America was framed, they did not think it necessary to define a citizen.

Mr. WISE. -

And they got into great trouble in consequence.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They found it necessary to introduce the definition by an amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That, the honorable member knows well, was caused by the intrusion of the negro question. You will find in dealing with this question of the definition of citizenship, that you will have to be very careful in your definition, because it would be rather too limited a definition to confine it only to persons who are natural-born or naturalized subjects, unless you are dealing simply with the political aspect. I think it would be better if reconsideration was given to clause 110, under the head of "States." I think it is in that place that the consideration of this matter should come.

Dr. QUICK. -

That has been rejected.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I think that clause was rejected a little hastily. There are very good reasons why it should be reconsidered from the point of view which has been put by the honorable member.

Dr. QUICK. -

That only deals with interstate citizenship, not federal citizenship.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The only kind of citizenship it is necessary for you to deal with is a citizenship of that kind.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

As one of those who strenuously denied that there was a necessity to define federal citizenship, I entertain some doubt, as Mr. O'Connor does, whether this proposal really meets the difficulty. I feel, as he does, that to confer on the Parliament the power to deal with federal citizenship does not give them the power to define the citizenship. They can only act within the limits of the Constitution, and, inasmuch as it might be necessary in defining the citizenship to trench in some way on the rights of the state, or to limit in some way the citizenship of the state, or to make certain consequences follow from being citizens of the state, it might be held that the matter is open to doubt, that any definition passed by virtue of this proposal would be ultra vires. I apprehend that the very much better course will be to withdraw the amendment, and to discuss the question on clause 110, when a clear definition can be put in which will deal with this matter thoroughly. For reasons which I will not mention, because the whole matter will have to be discussed, I feel that it is absolutely necessary for the Bill to contain a definition of citizenship, but whether this will do it or not is open to doubt. I would ask the honorable member whether he has really considered the objections put forward by Mr. O'Connor? It appeared to me, from some of his interjections, that Mr. O'Connor's argument was not appreciated by him.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

As usual, there are conflicting ideas among the legal fraternity, and really it is very difficult for laymen to come to a conclusion.

Mr. REID. -

There is no dispute amongst blind men.

Mr. HOWE. -

That has been the cause of the delay in this Convention in coming to conclusions. We have eminent men whom we respect and esteem, and it is only necessary for one eminent lawyer to make a proposition to cause another lawyer to rise and try, to knock it down.

Mr. REID. -

As a jury, you look on and decide.

Mr. HOWE. -

I heard legal gentlemen admit the other night that they had confused each other, so that this is some revenge, so far as I am concerned. But I will put one practical point to this Convention. It seems to me that in building up this nation we say that in Federated Australia commerce shall flow free and untrammelled from the centre of the Commonwealth to its circumference, and I say that it is not right for a state to have the power of declaring that any citizen within that state shall be penalized because he happens to have property in one state and resides just over the border in another state. Why should a special imposition be placed on him? Are we going to allow any state to treat a resident citizen of Federated Australia as an absentee, merely because he owns property in one state and resides in another? Of course it is quite right that his property should pay the impost levied on property in that state, but he should not be penalized because he happens to reside in another state. Such a thing would be an injustice, and no true federation can exist if this distinction between citizens of the Commonwealth is maintained. The Federal Parliament should have power to disallow any such restriction if any state seeks to place it on any citizen of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I confess the idea was new to me before Dr. Quick gave notice of his proposal, but it occurred to me, when we were dealing with clause 110, that there was need of some power to deal with Commonwealth citizenship, and the only question is as to whether Dr. Quick's mode of doing this is sufficiently good or not. I understand that Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Wise are in favour of this proposal in principle, and it is a mere interpretation of what I think are ordinary words as to whether Dr. Quick's amendment will meet the requirements of the case. Clause 52 provides that-
The Parliament shall, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, have full power and authority to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to all or any of the matters following:-

Then follows a long list of matters, in which Dr. Quick proposes to insert "Commonwealth citizenship." So that the amendment means that the Parliament shall have power and authority to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to Commonwealth citizenship. Who, unless he were a lawyer—I appeal now to the sympathies of Mr. Howe—could ever think that the Parliament could not make a law stating what Commonwealth citizenship shall be? Of course, there have not been any reasons given as to why this amendment should not be inserted. Mr. O'Connor, as the draftsman in charge of the Bill at the present time, is naturally diffident and timid about inserting this new proposal without full consideration, but, although I listened carefully to what he and Mr. Wise said on the subject, I failed to find any reasonable doubt in the speech of either of those gentlemen. Of course, if the object which Dr. Quick has in view can be more clearly attained by an amendment on his proposal, I shall vote for the alteration, but I believe in having the fewest possible words for this purpose, and Dr. Quick has put his amendment in two words, "Commonwealth citizenship."

Mr. KINGSTON. -

He might strike out one word, and leave it "citizenship."

Mr. HIGGINS. -

All I want is to leave the hands of the Federal Parliament free, so that, if it thinks fit, inasmuch as it has power to deal with alien races, it should also have power to deal with Commonwealth citizenship. I shall support the amendment.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I shall have to oppose Dr. Quick's amendment, although I would really go further than he intends. His object is to have a common citizenship, and he proposes to define that in a proposed new clause, 120A, which reads as follows:

All persons resident within the Commonwealth, being natural-born or naturalized subjects of the Queen, and not under any disability imposed by the Parliament, shall be citizens of the Commonwealth;

and he now wants to give power to Parliament to vary that subsequently.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is not clause 120A that he is proposing now.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is his amendment in clause 52-to insert "Commonwealth citizenship" as a new sub-section.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I am quite aware of that, but what I want to understand is whether Dr. Quick will propose the insertion of clause 120A, and also put it in the power of the Parliament to vary the Commonwealth citizenship under clause 52? That is the point about which I am doubtful. But I desire to point out that Dr. Quick is not going as far as they have gone in America or Germany. There is a common citizenship both of the Commonwealth and of the states in America. Citizenship of the Commonwealth carries with it citizenship of the states, and the Constitution provides that immunities and privileges enjoyed by the citizens of a particular state shall be equally shared, when in that state, by the citizens of all the other states. Now, the German Constitution makes a declaration that there must be a common citizenship. It does not state that the Parliament of Germany will have the power of providing for a citizenship of the empire, but that there must be a common citizenship of the whole empire, and that the privileges which are given in one part of the empire would apply right through the whole empire. That is to say, there is a Commonwealth citizenship and a state citizenship running the one with the other-a perfect equality of rights. All that is done in Germany is that Article 3 of the Imperial Constitution declares that there shall be a common citizenship for all Germany, and that the rights of the individual citizens of any state must be extended to the individual citizens of any other state as long as they come within the jurisdiction of the former state; but the German Constitution also provides that Parliament-and here is the distinction-may define what the conditions of that common citizenship are to be. The Constitution declares that there must be a common citizenship, but it leaves the determination of the particular terms of that citizenship to the Parliament. That is different from the proposal of Dr. Quick.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

You want citizenship of the states and citizenship of the Commonwealth to be uniform?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes; but it had better be provided for by a separate clause as in America. All persons born in the United States are citizens of the Commonwealth and of the states in which they reside.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But we need not jump before we come to the stile. We can leave citizenship to be settled afterwards by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN. -

But I want to prevent the Federal Parliament having power to cut down citizenship. By adopting this amendment you will really limit the effect of the provision which Dr. Quick desires to insert as clause 120A. If you here empower Parliament, from time to time, to limit the Commonwealth citizenship, you will prevent us subsequently enacting in the Bill that Commonwealth citizenship shall be state citizenship, or vice versâ, because you are putting it in the power of Parliament to say what citizenship is to be, although you may subsequently attempt to provide that the citizenship of the state shall be the citizenship of the Commonwealth, and vice versâ. If you adopt this amendment you will not thereby declare, as in Germany, in Article 3, that-

There shall be a common citizenship (indigenat) for all Germany, and the members (citizens or subjects) of each state of the Confederation shall be treated in every other state thereof as natives, and shall consequently have the right of becoming permanent residents; of carrying on business; of filling public offices; of acquiring real estate; of obtaining citizenship; and of enjoying all other civil rights on the same conditions as those born in the state, and shall also have the same usage as regards civil and criminal prosecutions and the protection of the laws.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

What do you suggest as a proper parallel here? To what extent would you go?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I would provide by proposed clause 120A, or by an amendment of it, that there shall be a Commonwealth citizenship.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

What definition do you suggest?

Mr. GLYNN. -

The American definition—that all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to its jurisdiction, are citizens of the Commonwealth and of the state in which they reside.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Would you make it "born or naturalized" in Australia?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I would probably suggest that; but at present I am not saying what ought to be done when we come to deal with proposed clause 120A. I am only pointing out that if you adopt this amendment you will be tying your hands as to what you will subsequently do when dealing with clause 120A. You cannot put it as an addition to the Constitution if you vest the power of varying it in the Parliament. I hope Dr. Quick will not insist on putting this into clause 52, but will stick to his proposed clause 120A, in connexion with which he will have support.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I hope we shall agree to Dr. Quick's proposal. I do not consider the case of Germany or the United States and the question of inserting a definition of citizenship in this Constitution as at all analogous. What they were doing there was this: They were creating a new sovereign state, above which, of course, from the very nature of the case, there was no superior. In connexion with the creation of a new state a sovereign State—they felt it necessary in Germany to make some provision for an Imperial citizenship. As to the United States, they omitted, although creating a sovereign State, to define what was citizenship of that new State—the nation—and they found it necessary, certainly through the negro question, to define at a later time what a citizen was. But here we do not stand in the same position. We have the citizenship of the British Empire on the one hand, and the citizenship of the state on the other. What we want to do is, not to insert a definition of citizenship of the Commonwealth in the Constitution, but to give power to the Parliament to provide against any contingencies which may arise, but which are out of our range of vision at present. We wish to provide for that possible case, and at the same time not to create a definition either too extensive or too narrow. What we should do, therefore, is to follow the course proposed by Dr. Quick, and simply insert power to legislate with regard to Commonwealth citizenship. If that is found to be unnecessary, it will never be acted upon, but, if it is found to be necessary, it can be acted upon to the extent of the necessity; and the definition can also be altered if it is found on trial to be either too wide or too narrow. I have, therefore, much pleasure in supporting the proposal.

Mr (South Australia). - I shall also support the amendment of Dr. Quick, and I trust that it will be carried. I cannot conceive that in the adoption of legislation on this subject Parliament would do aught else than make the definition uniform and of general application. If there was any necessity for making that clear, the insertion of the words "uniform citizenship of the Commonwealth" would accomplish that, but I hardly think it is necessary. I am impressed with the importance of taking power as occasion arises to define what shall constitute citizenship of the Commonwealth; and the Bill at present is altogether deficient in regard to giving any power to the Commonwealth Parliament to legislate on this subject. It seems to me it is a very difficult matter, and one with which we should not attempt to deal here, but rather should refer it to those who, when necessity arises to adopt some legislation on the subject, will have all the facts before them, and may reasonably be supposed to be able to make the best provision for the purpose in connexion with the subject. My honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) referred to the principle which he said obtained, I think, in Germany, where only native-born Germans, or those who are naturalized in the empire, are admitted to the privileges of citizenship. I asked in the course of his remarks how would that apply to citizens of the Commonwealth. It is a very difficult thing to deal with. If you provide that only those shall be citizens of the Commonwealth who were born in it or have been naturalized, you will undoubtedly be putting too strict a limitation on citizenship. It would be simply monstrous that those who are born in England should in any way be subjected to the slightest disabilities. It is impossible to contemplate the exclusion of natural-born subjects of this character; but, on the other hand, we must not forget, that there are other native-born British subjects whom we are far from desiring to see come here in any considerable numbers. For instance, I may refer to Hong Kong Chinamen. They are born within the realm of Her Majesty, and are therefore native-born British subjects.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. - Are British treaty ports British territory?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Hong Kong is undoubtedly a British possession, and a Hong Kong Chinaman is undoubtedly a native-born British subject. Thus, honorable members will see what difficulties might arise if the privileges of citizenship of the Commonwealth were extended to all British subjects. If that were done, we should be landed in a difficulty against which it is well to provide. I think the very best, thing under all the circumstances is to do-what is recommended by Dr. Quick, and give to the Federal Parliament power to, legislate on this subject as occasion arises. I have no fear whatever but that they will make wise provisions on the subject-provisions uniform throughout the Commonwealth—for extending to all British subjects those privileges which they ought to possess, while at the same time safeguarding the rights of the Commonwealth.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I would like to point out to Dr. Quick that he proposes to give a power to the Commonwealth to legislate in regard to a matter which is not mentioned from the beginning to the end of the Constitution. The word "citizen" is not used from beginning to end in this Constitution, and it is now proposed to give power to legislate regarding citizenship.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It was in the Bill.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

There is no portion of the Bill which gives any right of citizenship, or points out what citizenship is.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The word "citizen" occurred in clause 110, although it is now struck out.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The words in clause 110 do not define any right of citizenship; they prevent certain restrictions upon it. I would point out to Dr. Quick that he is proposing to give a power to regulate or describe rights of citizenship, when we really do not know at present what is meant by a citizen. I confess I do not know what the honorable and learned member means by that term. Does he mean only the political rights which you give to every inhabitant of a state who is qualified to vote, or does he go beyond that, as the American decisions have gone, and describe every person who is under the protection of your laws as a citizen? The citizens, the persons under the protection of your laws, are not the only persons who are entitled to take part in your elections or in your government, but every person who resides in your community has a right to the protection of your laws and to the protection of the laws of all the states, and has the right of access to your courts. If you are going to define citizenship for the purpose of giving these rights, you must say clearly what you mean by citizenship. You leave it to the Federal Parliament to say what citizenship is; and I think there is a great deal in what Mr. Glynn says, that we must not hand over to the Federal Parliament the power to cut down the rights the inhabitants of these states have at the present time. If we do not know what you mean by citizenship—

Mr. ISAACS. -

Commonwealth citizenship.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Exactly. But if we do not know what you mean by citizenship—whether you mean to restrict it to political rights or to the right of protection under your laws, which every person, whether a naturalized subject or a person for the time being resident in one of these communities, possesses—we may drive the Federal Parliament into some difficulty, in which it is not at all unlikely that some cutting down of what we believe to be the rights of citizenship may take place. I would point out that under the Bill the power of dealing with aliens and immigration gives an abundant right to the Commonwealth to protect itself, and, of course, the right of defining citizenship will have to be exercised with due regard to any laws which might be made regarding the position of aliens. I would ask my honorable friend (Dr. Quick) to say if he has considered how far he means the Federal Parliament to go in the definition of citizenship, and what he means by citizenship? Because, unless we have a clear idea of that, it seems to me that we are handing over to the Federal Parliament something which is vague in the extreme, and which might be misused.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

The honorable member who has just sat down has assumed a possible difficulty that I cannot conceive is likely to occur. He assumes that unless we define clearly what we mean by citizenship, the Federal Parliament may take such action as will infringe some liberties which we now possess, and which we ought to possess. When we remember that we have provided in the Constitution that both Houses of Parliament shall be elected on the broadest possible franchise, it seems to me to be utterly impossible to conceive that such a Parliament will proceed to infringe any of the liberties of the citizens. But it may be necessary for many reasons to declare some form of citizenship, and if such a necessity arises, Dr. Quick's proposal empowers the Federal Parliament to deal with it. If it be found that there is no necessity to legislate—that citizenship is sufficiently clearly defined, without any definition by Act of Parliament, by the usage of the Commonwealth, then no legislation for that purpose will be passed. But it certainly does seem that for the purpose of dealing with the varied conditions which prevail here, and the various sorts of men we have in these colonies, there should be a clear provision in the Constitution empowering the Commonwealth to decide what is to constitute that other citizenship that we are creating. We know pretty clearly what constitutes a citizen of Great Britain. We know what constitutes a citizen of our various states. But we are at present creating a dual citizenship—retaining the rights of citizenship which the inhabitants already possess, and, in addition, conferring what I think most people will be even more proud of, the citizenship of the Commonwealth of Australia. For that reason I think it extremely desirable that there should be a power on the part of the Commonwealth Parliament to define what is to constitute Commonwealth citizenship. I confess I was afraid of this clause when I first saw it. I was afraid that possibly it might lead to an Act of the Commonwealth infringing the right of a state to deal as it thought fit with the citizens within its borders, so long as it did not infringe upon that broader citizenship of the Commonwealth. But, on looking into the matter, it seems to me to be clear that the power given by this clause is a power that need not necessarily be used, and when it is used is only a power to define that greater and broader citizenship of the Commonwealth—a power which the Federal Parliament should have, and will obtain by the adoption of this proposal.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I only wish to say a word or two about this proposal. I think that Dr. Quick will probably see that his amendment may be raising a very serious difficulty on the one hand, or else that it is unnecessary on the other. I quite agree with him as to the necessity under some circumstances of giving some definition as to what shall be a citizen of the Commonwealth, but underlying the whole of that is this fundamental principle: That the citizens of the states are the citizens of the Commonwealth. That is the fundamental principle we must have regard to, and I ask my honorable friend to say whether a citizen of the Commonwealth is not a citizen of the state? I have no objection whatever to some definition being inserted similar to that which appears in the United States Constitution defining what shall be a citizen. My honorable friend himself has an amendment on the paper with that object in view, but if you are to insert this provision to give the Commonwealth Parliament power to deal with citizenship of the Commonwealth, you are giving it a power which might induce it to declare that some particular set of citizens in the state should not continue any longer to be citizens of the Commonwealth, or to enjoy the rights and immunities of the citizens of the Commonwealth.

Mr. TRENWTH. -

That is so highly improbable that it is scarcely worth while considering it.
Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable friend (Mr. Trenwith), whose views I have listened to and to whose opinions I have always paid great attention, asks in what way the Commonwealth can interfere with the citizenship of the Commonwealth. We have specifically empowered the Commonwealth to deal with the question of aliens.

Mr. WISE. -

Either this clause will be utterly ineffective or it will give the Federal Parliament power to outlaw certain persons.

Mr. SYMON. -

Mr. Trenwith has said he was not at first inclined to support this amendment, and I think that if he gives it further consideration he will feel that it is utterly unnecessary to do so, and that it is unwise to put into the hands of the Commonwealth Parliament a power which might be likely to be exercised, as my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Wise) has said, for the purpose of outlawing citizens of the state who are citizens of the Commonwealth. Of course the Federal Parliament would not do such a thing as that, and, therefore, it seems to me that it is unnecessary to put in such a power. Is there any person whom the Federal Parliament, by virtue of this provision, could make a citizen of the Commonwealth who would not already be a citizen of a state? You cannot do it. There is nothing to which this can possibly apply. You have given the Federal Parliament power to deal with the question of aliens, immigration, and so on, to prevent the introduction of undesirable races. Under that provision you enable the Federal Parliament to legislate within certain limits, and in a certain direction. Under that they may, within those limits, take away, or they may restrict, the rights of citizenship in a particular case. That is what we intend them to do. I am not going to give carte blanche to the Federal Parliament to say who shall and who shall not be citizens. The object of all who are represented here is that the Union of these states is of itself to confer upon the citizens of the states the rights of citizens of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You may depend upon it that the states will see that this is kept up.

Mr. SYMON. -

I agree with the honorable member, and I also think it is unlikely that the Commonwealth will seek to derogate from it, but I will not place a power in the hands of the Commonwealth which will enable them to derogate from it, and if that is not done it will be merely a dead letter. Is there any citizen of the Commonwealth who is not already a citizen of the state?
State citizenship is his birthright, and by virtue of it he is entitled to the citizenship of the Commonwealth. When you have immigration, and allow different people to come in who belong to nations not of the same blood as we are, they become naturalized, and thereby are entitled to the rights of citizenship.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

They are citizens if they are British subjects before they come here.

. - That is a point I do not wish to deal with. But they become citizens of the states, and it is by virtue of their citizenship of the states that they become citizens of the Commonwealth. Are you going to have citizens of the state who are not citizens of the Commonwealth?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

In some states they naturalize; but they do not in others.

Mr. SYMON. -

Then I think they ought to. The whole object of legislating for aliens is that there should be uniformity.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

They would not have that in the Federal Council.

Mr. SYMON. -

Very likely not. What I want to know is, if there is anybody who will come under the operation of the law, so as to be a citizen of the Commonwealth, who would not also be entitled to be a citizen of the state? There ought to be no opportunity for such discrimination as would allow a section of a state to remain outside the pale of the Commonwealth, except with regard to legislation as to aliens. Dual citizenship exists, but it is not dual citizenship of persons, it is dual citizenship in each person. There may be two men-Jones and Smith-in one state, both of whom are citizens of the state, but one only is a citizen of the Commonwealth. That would not be the dual citizenship meant. What is meant is a dual citizenship in Mr. Trenwith and myself. That is to say, I am a citizen of the state and I am also a citizen of the Commonwealth; that is the dual citizenship. That does not affect the operation of this clause at all. But if we introduce this clause, it is open to the whole of the powerful criticism of Mr. O'Connor and those who say that it is putting on the face of the Constitution an unnecessary provision, and one which we do not expect will be exercised adversely or improperly, and, therefore, it is much better to be left out. Let us, in dealing with this question, be as careful as we possibly, can that we do not qualify the citizenship of this Commonwealth in any way or exclude anybody from it, and let us do that with precision and clearness. As a citizen of a state I claim the right to be a citizen of the Commonwealth. I do not want to place in the hands of the Commonwealth Parliament, however much I may be prepared to trust it, the right of depriving me of citizenship. I put this only as an argument, because no one would anticipate such a thing, but the Commonwealth Parliament might say that nobody possessed of less than £1,000 a year should be a citizen of the Federation. You are putting that power in the hands of Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Why not?

Mr. SYMON. -

I would not put such a power in the hands of any Parliament. We must rest this Constitution on a foundation that we understand, and we mean that every citizen of a state shall be a citizen of the Commonwealth, and that the Commonwealth shall have no right to withdraw, qualify, or restrict those rights of citizenship, except with regard to one particular set of people who are subject to disabilities, as aliens, and so on. Subject to that limitation, we ought not, under this Constitution, to hand over our birth right as citizens to anybody, Federal Parliament or any one else, and I hope the amendment will not be accepted.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I think the Commonwealth should keep in its own hands the key of its own citizenship. Some colonies are somewhat colourblind with regard to immigration, other colonies may be somewhat deficient in their ideas as to naturalization. If we place in the hands of any state the power of forcing on the Commonwealth an obnoxious citizenship, we shall be doing very great evil to the Commonwealth. This power should be in the hands of the Commonwealth; it should itself possess power to define the conditions on which the citizenship of the Commonwealth shall be given; and the citizenship of the Commonwealth should not necessarily follow upon the citizenship of any particular state.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

We have provided in this Constitution for the exercise of the rights of citizenship, so far as the choice of representatives is concerned, and we have given various safe-guards to individual liberty in the Constitution. We have, therefore, given each resident in the Commonwealth his political rights, so far as the powers of legislation and administration intrusted to the Commonwealth are concerned. Let us consider the position. Before the establishment of the Commonwealth, each subject is the subject of a state. After the Commonwealth is established, every one who acquires political rights-in fact, every one who is a subject in a state, having certain political rights, has like political rights in the Commonwealth. The only difference between the position before the institution of the Commonwealth and afterwards is that, so far as there are additional political powers given to any subject or citizen, he has the right to exercise these, and the method of exercising them is defined. So far the right of citizenship, if there is a right of citizenship under the empire, is defined in the Constitution. Now, each citizen of a state is, without definition, a citizen of the Commonwealth if there is such a term as citizenship to be applied to a subject of the empire. I must admit, after looking at a standard authority—Stroud's Judicial Dictionary—that I cannot find any definition of citizenship as applied to a British subject. No such term as citizen or citizenship is to be found in the long roll of enactments, so far as I can recollect, that deal with the position of subjects of the United Kingdom, and I do not think we have been in the habit of using that term under our own enactments in any of our colonies.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You had it in the Draft Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes; but the term has since disappeared, and it disappeared owing to objections from members of the Convention. I am inclined to think that the Convention is right in not applying the term "citizens" to subjects residing in the Commonwealth or in the states, but in leaving them to their ordinary definition as subjects of the Crown. If, however, we make an amendment of this character, inasmuch as citizens of the state must be citizens of the Commonwealth by the very terms of the Constitution, we shall simply be enabling the Commonwealth to deal with the political rights of the citizens of the states. The one thing follows from the other. If you once admit that a citizen or subject of the state is a citizen or subject of the Commonwealth, the power conferred in these wide terms would enable the Federal Parliament to deal with the political rights of subjects of the states. I do not think the honorable member intends to go so far as that, but his amendment is open to that misconception.

Mr. HOWE. -
 Trust to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -
When we confer a right of legislation on the Federal Parliament we trust them to exercise it with wisdom, but we still keep as the subject of debate the question of whether a particular legislative right should be conferred on the Federal Parliament. When you give them the right then you may trust them to exercise it fully.

Mr. HOWE. -
And wisely.
Mr. BARTON. -

If the honorable member's exclamation means more than I have explained, then the best thing to do is to confide to the Commonwealth the right of dealing with the lives, liberty, and property of all the persons residing in the Commonwealth, independently of any law of any state. That is not intended, but that is what the expression "Trust the Federal Parliament" would mean unless it was limited by the consideration I have laid down. I am sure Dr. Quick will see that he is using a word that has not a definition in English constitutional law, and which is not otherwise defined in this Constitution. He will be giving to the Commonwealth Parliament a power, not only of dealing with the rights of citizenship, but of defining those rights even within the very narrowest limits, so that the citizenship of a state might be worth nothing; or of extending them in one direction, and narrowing them in another, so that a subject living in one of the states would scarcely know whether he was on his head or his heels. Under the Constitution we give subjects political rights to enable the Parliament to legislate with regard to the suffrage, and pending that legislation we give the qualification of electors. It is that qualification of electors which is really the sum and substance of political liberty, and we have defined that. If we are going to give the Federal Parliament power to legislate as it pleases with regard to Commonwealth citizenship, not having defined it, we may be enabling the Parliament to pass legislation that would really defeat all the principles inserted elsewhere in the Constitution, and, in fact, to play ducks and drakes with it. That is not what is meant by the term "Trust the Federal Parliament."

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You give the Federal Parliament power to naturalize.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes; and in doing that we give them power to make persons subjects of the British Empire. Have we not done enough? We allow them to naturalize aliens. That is a power which, with the consent of the Imperial authority, has been carried into legislation by the various colonies, and, of course, we cannot do less for the Commonwealth than we have done for the colonies.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Such legislation is only good within the limits of each state.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes; and here we have a totally different position, because the actual right which a person has as a British subject—the right of personal liberty and protection under the laws—is secured by being a citizen of the states. It must be recollected that the ordinary rights of liberty and protection by the laws are not among the subjects confided to the Commonwealth. The administration of the laws regarding property and personal liberty is still left with the states. We do not propose to interfere with them in this Constitution. We leave that amongst the reserved powers of the states, and, therefore, having done nothing to make insecure the rights of property and the rights of liberty which at present exist in the states, and having also said that the political rights exercisable in the states are to be exercisable also in the Commonwealth in the election of representatives, we have done all that is necessary. It is better to rest there than to plunge ourselves into what may be a sea of difficulties. We do not know to what extent a power like this may be exercised, and we should pause before we take any such leap in the dark.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I understood that, under the Federal Constitution we are creating, we would have a dual citizenship, not only a citizenship of the states, but also a citizenship of the higher political organization—that of the Commonwealth. It seems now, from what the Hon. Mr. Barton has said, that we are not to have that dual citizenship; we are to have only a citizenship of the states.

Mr. BARTON. -

I did not say that. I say that our real status is as subjects, and that we are all alike subjects of the British Crown.

Dr. QUICK. -

If we are to have a citizenship of the Commonwealth higher, more comprehensive, and nobler than that of the states, I would ask why is it not implanted in the Constitution? Mr. Barton was not present when I made my remarks in proposing the clause. I then-anticipated the point he has raised as to the position we occupy as subjects of the British Empire. I took occasion to indicate that in creating a federal citizenship, and in defining the qualifications of that federal citizenship, we were not in any way interfering with our position as subjects of the British Empire. I took occasion to indicate that in creating a federal citizenship, and in defining the qualifications of that federal citizenship, we were not in any way interfering with our position as subjects of the British Empire. It would be beyond the scope of the Constitution to do that. We might be citizens of a city, citizens of a colony, or citizens of a Commonwealth, but we would still be, subjects of the Queen. I see therefore nothing unconstitutional, nothing contrary to our instincts as British subjects, in proposing to place power in this Constitution to enable the Federal Parliament to deal with the question of federal citizenship. An objection has been raised in various quarters—as by the honorable and learned members (Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Wise)—to the effect that we ought to define federal citizenship in the Constitution itself. I have considered this matter very carefully, and it has seemed to me that it would be most difficult and invidious, if not almost impossible, to frame a satisfactory definition. There is in the Constitution of the United States of America a cast-iron definition of citizenship, which has been found to be absolutely unworkable, because, among other things, it says that a citizen of the United States shall be a natural-born or naturalized citizen within the jurisdiction of the United States, and it has been found that that excludes the children of citizens born outside the limits of this jurisdiction. That shows the danger of attempting definitions, and although I have placed a propose

Is not a citizen of the state, ipso facto, a citizen of the Commonwealth?

Dr. QUICK. -

It required the 14th amendment to place that beyond doubt in the American Constitution. In the proposition which I have put before the Convention I do not desire at all to interfere with state citizenship. I leave that entirely to the states. In my opinion, it is in no way desirable to trench upon state citizenship. But I think we are entitled to place in the Constitution a provision empowering the Federal Parliament to deal with the incidence of Commonwealth citizenship, its mode of acquisition, the status it confers, and the manner in which it may be lost. It has been suggested by, I think, the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn), that a definition of citizenship should be accompanied by something in the nature of inter-state citizenship, that is, that the citizens of one state should be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of another state. But I would point out that such a provision would be inconsistent with an amendment already placed in the Constitution. We have already eliminated interstate citizenship, upon the ground that it might interfere with the right of each state to impose disabilities and disqualifications upon certain races. I am sure that the Federal Parliament would not be able, under the provision which I wish to insert, to legislate in regard to state citizenship or to in any way enlarge the Commonwealth rights or privileges at the expense of the rights of the states. The power of the Federal Parliament could only be exercised in regard to the privileges and rights contemplated by the Constitution itself. I may point out roughly some of the rights which are contemplated by the Constitution. There is the right to assert any claim which a citizen might have upon the Government, the right to transact any business he might have, the right to seek the protection of the Government, to share its offices, to engage in its administrative functions, to have free access to the ports of the Commonwealth and to its public offices and courts of justice, to use its navigable waters, and to all the privileges and benefits secured by the Commonwealth for its citizens by treaties with foreign nations. In my earlier remarks I did not enumerate more than the last of these rights. When the Federal Government is negotiating with foreign nations, say for treaties of commerce, and certain rights and privileges are obtained thereby for the citizens of the Commonwealth, it ought to be able to point to a definition of Commonwealth citizenship. I am amazed at the force and the consistency with which technical objections are being raised against every proposal calculated to improve and popularize the Constitution. One would imagine that this was to be a mere lawyers Constitution, and that everything that seems to go beyond mere legal literalism must be rejected.

Again, I ask are we to have a Commonwealth citizenship? If we are, why is it not to be implanted in the Constitution? Why is it to be merely a legal inference? It is all nonsense to say that the Commonwealth Parliament is going to cut down and reduce the state citizenship. It will only deal with federal citizenship. Why should not the Federal Parliament be able to deprive any person who broke the Commonwealth laws of the Commonwealth citizenship? Would not that be within the functions and jurisdiction of the Commonwealth Parliament? I think that it would be strictly within its functions. If we are not to provide for this Commonwealth citizenship, what will be the position of those residing in territories which may hereafter be created? The honorable member (Mr. Walker), among others, is desirous that a certain portion of territory shall be set apart as within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Commonwealth for a federal capital. That is a view which I share with him. But I ask what will be the civic status of the inhabitants of the federal territory? I hope that the provision which I have brought forward will be dealt with by the Convention, not from a strictly legal aspect, but from the broad and comprehensive point of view from which we have been accustomed to deal with it when upon the public platform we have informed our people that by federation they will be placed upon a higher plane of citizenship. I would ask is a provision of this kind to be rejected merely upon technical grounds?

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I think we ought to protest against its being suggested that any of us are opposing this provision upon technical grounds. This is a very much larger question, and it is a question deserving of all the earnestness and energy which the honorable member (Dr. Quick) has thrown into its discussion. But when he submits as a reason for carrying the provision that it should not be dealt with as a lawyers' question, and one dealing with the rigid legal interpretation of the Constitution, I venture, with great respect and emphasis, to dissent from his position. This is a matter which goes to the very foundation of the Constitution which we are framing. At the very root of the proposed Union is the invitation to the citizens of the states to join the Federation, and to obtain, as their reward, citizenship of the Commonwealth. My honorable and learned friend has enumerated a number of things which might or might not be done under this provision. Will he tell me whether it is not a fact that the Federal Parliament could, under this provision, take away the citizenship which might be obtained by joining the Union?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Under other clauses of the Constitution, the Federal Parliament could take away the franchise from any one.

Mr. SYMON. -

The honorable and learned member is now dealing with another matter. Would not the provision which is now before us confer upon the Federal Parliament the power to take away a portion of this dual citizenship, with which the honorable and learned member (Dr. Quick) has so eloquently dealt? If that is the case, what this Convention is asked to do is to hand over to the Federal Parliament the power, whether exercised or not, of taking away from us that citizenship in the Commonwealth which we acquire by joining the Union. I am not going to put that in the power of any one, and if it is put in the power of the Federal Parliament, then I should feel that it was a very serious blot on the Constitution, and a very strong reason why it should not be accepted. It is not a lawyers' question; it is a question of whether any one of British blood who is entitled to become a citizen of the Commonwealth is to run the risk—it may be a small risk—of having that taken away or diminished by the Federal Parliament! When we declare—"Trust the Parliament," I am willing to do it in everything which concerns the working out of this Constitution, but I am not prepared to trust the Federal Parliament or anybody to take away that which is a leading inducement for joining the Union.

Berry, Sir G. Howe, J.H.
The next question is Mr. Higgins' proposed new clause in lieu of clause 109, which was struck out.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I was not aware that this clause would come on so soon; but, inasmuch as I have spoken to the words in the preamble so recently, I think I shall be able to save honorable members the infliction of a long speech on this subject. My idea is to make it clear beyond doubt that the powers which the states individually have of making such laws as they like with regard to religion shall remain undisturbed and unbroken, and to make it clear that in framing this Constitution there is no intention whatever to give to the Federal Parliament the power to interfere in these matters. My object is to leave the reserved rights to the states where they are, to leave the existing law as it is; and just as each state can make its own factory laws, or its own laws as to the hours of labour, so each state should be at full liberty to make such laws as it thinks fit in regard to Sunday or any other day of rest. I simply want to leave things as they are. I do not want to interfere with any right the state has. I merely want to make it clear that, having inserted in the preamble of the Constitution certain words which, 'according to United States precedents, would involve certain inferential powers, there is no intention on the part of the Convention to confer even inferentially these powers on the Federal Parliament. I want, in this respect, as I said, to preserve the states' rights intact, but upon my former amendment I went too far, according to the views of the members of the Convention, and, therefore, I am only going to the extent of making it clear that the Commonwealth Parliament is to have no such power. I went too far on my former amendment, inasmuch as I said that neither a state nor the Commonwealth was to have this power. I did that because the then existing clause 109 only referred to a state, and provided that-

A state shall not make any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion.

Well, I did not know that the Convention was willing to go so far as it has gone, and strike out the whole of that clause as to the state. However, it has done so. I beg to move the insertion of the following new clause to replace clause 109 already struck out:-

The Commonwealth shall not make any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion, or for the establishment of any religion, or imposing any religious observance, and no religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust under the Commonwealth.

I may state that most of this clause, with regard to the making of laws, is already in the American Constitution, either in the original Constitution or by way of an amendment of the Constitution. In the Constitution of the United States there is a provision that the Federal Parliament is not to make any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion, and there is also a clause, the very first amendment of the Constitution, that the Federal Parliament is not to make any law for the establishment of any religion. In the original Constitution you will find also a clause to the effect that there is to be no religious test required as a qualification for any post or office. The only difficulty, therefore, is in respect of these words about imposing religious observances, and that part, as I have already indicated this morning, is rendered necessary by the inclusion in the preamble of our Constitution of words which they have not got in the America will interfere with the power the states now have. Therefore, I have moved this new clause.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

If my honorable friend could point out in the Bill any subject allied with religion which would make it necessary to put such a clause as this in the Bill, I would vote with him.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The preamble.

Mr. REID. -

That can only be amended by reference to the people.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I feel some hesitation about voting for this proposed new clause. It was proposed originally in clause 109 that-

A state shall not make any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion.

Well, that clause has been struck out. It was decided that we should not prevent any state from making a law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion. That was done partly on the ground that we did not desire to interfere unnecessarily with the states. But clause 109 was struck out on the more solid ground, that there was no likelihood of any state ever prohibiting the free exercise of any religion—that there had been nothing of the kind in the past, and that there was not the slightest reason to expect the occurrence of any such thing in the future; that the more the institutions under which we live expanded, the less likelihood there was of any religious persecution of any kind. Now, if we hold that view with regard to the state, why should we not hold it in regard to the Commonwealth? If that is the reason which makes us strike out a clause prohibiting any state from making any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion, why should we not hold that as a valid and sufficient reason against inserting any clause prohibiting the Commonwealth from making any law prohibiting the free exercise of any religion? If we feel secure from religious persecution under the Parliaments and the Governments of the states, what reason have we to fear that we shall be subject to religious persecution under the Federal Parliament, which it is supposed will be superior in character to the Parliaments of the states? If the fear does not exist in the one case—and we think so little of it as to cause us to strike out clause 9, as we did—why should we entertain the same fear with regard to the Commonwealth any more than we entertain it in regard to the states?

Mr. WISE. -

You might say the same thing as to Congress.

Mr. BARTON. -
Certainly there is a decision in the United States to the effect that it is a Christian nation. What does that decision amount to? Is it not really a decision based on the fact that the institutions of England, under the common law, are Christian institutions, which, so far as they are not interfered with by any written Constitution, belong to citizens of the United States, as having been brought over by them as British subjects, and kept by them from that day to this? If that is the ground of the American decision, which I suspect it is, the same thing applies in some of these colonies. Decisions have been given to the effect that there colonies are Christian communities. I remember a case in which that doctrine was expounded at length by the late Chief Justice Martin, of New South Wales. Now, if the colonies are Christian communities, the common law of England will apply to the Commonwealth, except so far as this Constitution alters that law; and if it is part of the common law of England that we shall be regarded as a Christian community, what fear is there of our suffering any dangers of the kind indicated in the amendment, simply because we are a Christian community? I do not see any danger of the kind to be anticipated. I think that because we are a Christian community we ought to have advanced so much since the days of State aid and the days of making a law for the establishment of a religion, since the days for imposing religious observances or exacting a religious test as a qualification for any office of the State, as to render any such dangers practically impossible, and we will be going a little too far if we attempt to load this Constitution with a provision for dangers which are practically nonexistent.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That is the question—are those dangers non-existent?

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not think the fact that we may be held by law to be a Christian community is any reason for us to anticipate that there will be any longer any fear of a reign of Christian persecution—any fear that there will be any remnant of the old ideas which have caused so much trouble in other ages. The whole of the advancement in English-speaking communities, under English laws and English institutions, has shown a less and less inclination to pass laws for imposing religious tests, or exacting religious observances, or to maintain any religion. We have not done that in Australia. We have abolished state religion in all these colonies; we have wiped out every religious test, and we propose now to establish a Government and a Parliament which will be at least as enlightened as the Governments and Parliaments which prevail in various states; therefore, what is the practical fear against which we are fighting? That is the difficulty I have in relation to this proposed clause. If I thought there was any-the least-probability or possibility, taking into consideration the advancement of liberal and tolerant ideas that is constantly going on of any of these various communities utterly and entirely retracing its steps, I might be with the honorable member. If we, in these communities in which we live, have no right whatever to anticipate a return of methods which were practised under a different state or Constitution, under a less liberal measure of progress and advancement; if, as this progress goes on, the rights of citizenship are more respected; if the divorce between Church and State becomes more pronounced; if we have no fear of a recurrence of either the ideas or the methods of former days with respect to these colonies, then I do suggest that in framing a Constitution for the Commonwealth of Australia, which we expect to make at least as enlightened, and which we expect to be administered with as much intellectuality as any of the other Constitutions, we are not going to entertain fears in respect of the Commonwealth which we will not attempt to entertain with respect to any one of the states. Now, we have shown that we do not intend these words to apply to our states by striking out clause 109. That might be a provision that might be held to be too express in its terms, because there may be practices in various religions which are believed in by persons who may enter into the Commonwealth belonging to other races, which practices would be totally abhorrent to the ideas, not only to any Christian, but to any civilized community; and inasmuch as the Commonwealth is armed with the power of legislation in regard to immigration and emigration, and with regard to naturalization, and also with regard to the making of special laws for any race, except the aboriginal races belonging to any state-inasmuch as we have all these provisions under which it would be an advisable thing that the Commonwealth, under its regulative power, should prevent any practices from taking place which are abhorrent to the ideas of humanity and justice of the community; and inasmuch as it is a reasonable thing that these outrages on humanity and justice (if they ever occur) should be prohibited by the Commonwealth, it would be a dangerous thing, perhaps, to place in the Bill a provision which would take out of their hands the power of preventing any such practices.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Do you think that the Commonwealth has that power under the existing Bill?

Mr. BARTON. -
I am not sure that it has not. I am not sure that it has not power to prevent anything that may seem an inhuman practice by way of religious rite.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I want to leave such matters to the states.

Mr. BARTON. -

But inasmuch as we have given to the Commonwealth the power of regulating the entry of that class of persons, and the power of regulating them when they have entered, is it not desirable that in that process there shall be left to the Commonwealth power of repressing any such practices in the name of religion as I have indicated? If it be necessary that there should be some regulative power left to the Commonwealth, then the argument that we should leave the matter to the states does not apply, because we give such a power to the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Then all crimes should be left to the Commonwealth?

Mr. BARTON. -

No; because you do not give any power with regard to punishing crime to the Commonwealth, but you do give power to the Commonwealth to make special laws as to alien races; and the moment you do that the power of making such laws does not remain in the hands of the states; and if you place in the hands of the Commonwealth the power to prevent such practices as I have described you should not defeat that regulative power of the Commonwealth. I do not think that that applies at all, however, to any power of regulating the lives and proceedings of citizens, because we do not give any such power to the Commonwealth, whilst we do give the Commonwealth power with regard to alien races; and having given that power, we should take care not to take away an incident of it which it may be necessary for the Commonwealth to use by way of regulation. I have had great hesitation about this matter, but I think I shall be prevented from voting for the first part; and as to establishing any religion, that is so absolutely out of the question, so entirely not to be expected-

Mr. SYMON. -

It is part of the unwritten law of the Constitution that a religion shall not be established.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is so foreign to the whole idea of the Constitution that we have no right to expect it; and, as my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Symon) suggests by his interruption, I do not think, whatever may be the result of any American case, that any such case can be stretched for a moment in such a way as to give Congress power of passing any law to establish any religion. I do not suppose that there is a man in Congress who would suggest it; and I have no doubt that the same court that decided that the community was a Christian community would say that the United States Congress had no power to establish any religion. The only part of the matter upon which I have had the least doubt (having become more confirmed in my opinion since I have considered the matter further) is the latter part of the proposal, which is that no religious test shall be required for any place of public trust in the Commonwealth. I do not think that any such test would be required, and the only question is whether it is possible. I have come to the conclusion that it is not possible. Therefore, my disposition is to vote against the whole clause.

Mr. REID. -
I suppose that money could not be paid to any church under this Constitution?

Mr. BARTON. -
No; you have only two powers of spending money, and a church could not receive the funds of the Commonwealth under either of them.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -
I can conceive of no matter more fit for state control than that of religious observance, and, therefore, I am utterly unable to follow the leader of the Convention (Mr. Barton) in his contention. There should not be any opening for doubt as to the power of the Commonwealth to exercise control over any religion of the state. I wish I could share Mr. Barton's optimistic views as to the death of the spirit of religious persecution. But we have seen in our own time a recrudescence of that evil demon, which, I fear, is only scotched and not killed. At any rate, the period during which we have enjoyed religious liberty is not long enough for us to be able to say with confidence that there will be no swinging back of the pendulum to the spirit of the times from which we have only recently emerged. Consequently there is some reason for the alarms which have been expressed by a very large body of people, who have not been represented in this Convention, by long petitions, but who none the less are entitled to be considered when we are framing this Constitution, and who, rightly or wrongly—for my own part, I believe rather more wrongly than rightly—believe that the agitation for the insertion in the preamble of the words which we have i

Mr. HIGGINS. -
We had 38,000 signatures to a petition from the people in Victoria against the inclusion of these words in the preamble.

Mr. WISE. -
I am very glad to hear it. That strengthens my argument. if 38,000 citizens of Victoria sent a petition against the inclusion of these words, not because they disapproved of the words in themselves, but because I suppose they were afraid that the inclusion of them would confer upon the Commonwealth some power to legislate with regard to religious observances, I say that fears of that sort should be respected. I know a considerable body of people in New South Wales, who, perhaps, have not made themselves heard in this Convention by petitions, who are actuated by the same alarms. Now, why should we not meet the scruples of these gentlemen as we met the scruples and feelings of another class of the community, when we put the words to, which I have alluded into the preamble? We none of us here believe in our hearts that these words added much to the preamble, but we put them in, as we thought, because they were a just satisfaction of a, certain sentiment. May we not support this on the same ground? May we not say:"We will clear away once and for ever any doubts which you may feel by making it clear that all matters of religious observance and control over religion shall be left to the states to which they naturally belong." Is the fear which is expressed groundless? If it had not been for the speech of Mr. Higgins this morning we might say that the fear was absolutely groundless, and that it was impossible that the Commonwealth should exercise, or seek the power to exercise, any control over religious observances. Yet, when we have the example of the United States, not six years old, I do not think the leader of the Convention can carry the force of conviction to us here, when he asks us to believe that there is no fear whatever of the Commonwealth exercising a power which we cannot believe would be exercised by any state. Supposing the Commonwealth is swayed by some popular feeling, such as swayed Congress in 1892, and some law were passed, say, dealing with Sunday observance, which might reflect the wishes of the majority of the people, but which would be most distasteful and persecuting to a minority. In a matter of religious feeling, a minority are entitled to the utmost respect and should have their feelings guarded.

Mr. FRASER. -

Is not the majority entitled to respect?

Mr. WISE. -

Certainly.

Mr. FRASER. -

A very small minority might shock the great majority of the people.

Mr. WISE. -

Let every one follow his own religious observances without shocking anybody, and do not let him impose his rule on anybody else. I am pointing out that when we have got that example before us, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that there is something in the argument which has been raised.
When we find that the American Constitution took that power, without the words in the preamble which we have inserted to-day-without even the support of that contention which we have given by putting these words in the preamble-we ought to take care to put plainly in the forefront of the Constitution the provision that the Commonwealth shall not interfere in any way with the rights of the states to regulate religious matters. How can it be said that the observance of Sunday in Northern Queensland would shock the people of Victoria? There is no doubt the observance of Sunday is largely a matter of climate, and a great many religious observances are matters of climate. It might be that one rule should prevail in the tropical portion of this country, and another rule in the south. It ought to be made perfectly clear that the opinions of a large number of persons in one portion of the Commonwealth, as to adopting a certain method of observance of Sunday, shall not prevail in other states, and that those persons shall not have it in their power to impose a restraint on people in other districts, and that they shall not be able to impose a uniform method of Sunday observance. There are many other questions of a similar kind that might be referred to. What I fear is that we have not yet any sufficient security against a revival of the feeling which has existed for centuries, but which has not been able to make itself felt during the last 50 or 60 years in British-speaking countries, but which I believe, still exists in the hearts of hundreds and thousands of men only waiting for an opportunity to assert itself. If we put in Mr. Higgins' amendment we shall remove those fears and establish a sound principle, and, I believe, will commend the Constitution to a very large number of those who at present are doubtful as to its effects.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

May I ask the honorable member who moved the amendment whether there is any other power the exercise of which is forbidden to the Commonwealth?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I do not think there is an express prohibition.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I think there is not. It seems to me that by making one exception we are introducing a whole atmosphere of ambiguities; that is to say, the Commonwealth at present can only exercise such powers as are explicitly vested in it. If, in addition to that, we forbid the exercise of some power, we leave an ambiguous area between the powers specifically vested in the Commonwealth and the powers forbidden. That opens out a whole circle of ambiguity in this respect.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think I was wrong in what I just now stated; there is a prohibition with regard to the states in clause 108, and there was a prohibition as to the states in clause 109.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

There are many prohibitions with regard to the states. I am very much in sympathy with Mr. Higgins, and if he can point out any case of this kind I would go with him.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Clause 109 was a prohibition, but it has been struck out.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It seems to me that by passing this provision we shall open the door to the possibility of doubt as to the Commonwealth having more powers than we have vested in it.

Mr. WISE. -

There is a prohibition with regard to interference with trade and commerce.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

That is a limitation of power which is wholly vested and explicitly placed in the hands of the Commonwealth. It is simply a limitation of the exercise of its executive power, but this is of a different description. It seems to me that by introducing this clause we shall run the risk of indicating that there is another sphere of powers which, though not specified as belonging to the Commonwealth, are not forbidden.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The 117th clause says that a new state shall not be formed by the separation of territory from a state without the consent of the Parliament of that state. That forbids even the Federal Parliament forming a new state.

Mr. WISE. -

Clause 95 provides that preferences shall not be given.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

That is a limitation of the executive power, and none of the instances advanced have satisfied me on the point I have endeavoured to lay before honorable members. I see clearly in my own mind that an exception in this respect will throw some doubt as to the whole scope of the powers of the Commonwealth. By inserting these words, it may be decided that there are some powers in the hands of the Commonwealth which are not explicitly recognised and stated.
Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -
I entirely agree with our leader in this matter. I do not see that there is any necessity for this clause. We are now a homogeneous people, and the safer plan is to leave us so.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That is what we want to do.

Mr. FRASER. -
I am not so very sure about that. If you pass this date all sorts of extraordinary practices may be resorted to that would, as I have already interjected, shock the whole community.

Mr. WISE. -
Suppose the Federal Parliament passes a law allowing Sunday newspapers, would the Victorians like that?

Mr. ISAACS. -
They would have no jurisdiction.

Mr. WISE. -
Yes, they would, if this is struck out.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Under what clause?

Mr. WISE. -
Under the same clause as in America.

Mr. FRASER. -
If the Federal Parliament chooses to act in this matter of Sunday newspapers, the people will be cognisant of all that is done.

Mr. WISE. -
We do not think them wrong in New South Wales.

Mr. FRASER. -
The probability is that a majority of the people of New South Wales think that it is wrong to allow Sunday newspapers, but they have not the courage to put them down. I believe that is the real fact. I believe that the public men of New South Wales, have not the courage to tackle them. That is about the answer to that interjection. If the public men have not courage to deal with these matters, of course the public will follow them in various devious paths. I do not see the necessity for this clause. I hope that we are not going to be driven to accept all sorts of extraordinary proposals simply because of something that has taken place in the United States. We are able to take care of ourselves, and I think the clause would do more harm than good.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
What harm would it do?

Mr. FRASER. -
It might offend the susceptibilities of a homogeneous people, and in that way cause trouble and difficulty. There would be no danger in omitting the clause, but there may be danger in putting it in.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I beg to move, as an amendment—

That all the words down to "and" be omitted, with a view to the insertion in lieu thereof of the following:—"Nothing in this Constitution shall be held to empower the Commonwealth to require any religious test as a qualification for any office of public trust under the Commonwealth."

I do not oppose the earlier part of the clause on the same ground as I put before, because I am satisfied in regard to those matters, to which attention was directed when clause 109 was under discussion, that under the ordinary operation of the common law any inhumanities and cruelties could be effectually stopped.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

By which Parliament?

Mr. SYMON. -

By either the state or the Commonwealth Parliament. I mention that to show that I do not change my view that that part of the clause is objectionable. But I hold strongly that in consequence of the insertion of the new words in the preamble it is desirable that some provision should be made to make it clear that these words are not to overspread the whole Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Would not your view be carried out by leaving the residuum of the clause just as it stands?

Mr. SYMON. -

I should have no objection to that, but I think it would be better to say that the Constitution shall empower the Commonwealth to impose any religious test. I sympathize with Mr. Higgins in his fear that the insertion of the words we put in the preamble might lead to an impression amongst a larger or smaller section of the community that it would be possible to impose some religious test, and that the sentiment conveyed by the words might overspread the Constitution in some way. My honorable friend desires that there should be something in the nature of a counterblast, for the satisfaction of those who may entertain that apprehension.

Mr. FRASER. -

There is no necessity for it.

Mr. SYMON. -

There is great force in what Mr. Fraser says, but there are a number of us who, for reasons which do not militate against our deep reverence and the deep faith that may be in us, think that the words inserted in the preamble are, at all events, open to misconstruction on the part of a larger or smaller section of the community. I do not wish to enter into the subject, but I felt that, and it is with a view of getting rid of any apprehension of that kind, and of securing every vote possible for this. Bill, that I think it well to yield to the view that has been expressed so forcibly by Mr. Higgins.

Mr. FRASER. -

That is the only argument in its favour.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is a strong argument. We have inserted certain words in the preamble, and we should put in as a solatium, if you like, to those holding opinions in opposition to these words, something else on which the may rely.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Would not the amendment leave it open to the Federal Parliament to dictate to any state that it should not open its picture galleries and museums on Sunday?

Mr. SYMON. -

There, is no power under the Constitution that would enable the Federal Parliament to do that. I am satisfied that it is embodied in the Constitution as a part of the unwritten law that no church establishment shall prevail, and that religious freedom shall be observed.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I shall support the amendment in the form in which it has been proposed by Mr. Higgins. There is a great deal of force in the suggestion that, in view of the amendment in the preamble, we should make a declaration of this description in the broadest possible terms, for the purpose of allaying any apprehension that might otherwise be entertained on the subject. As the matter stands at present, the states have full power, if they so desire, to legislate. The Commonwealth will, undoubtedly, also have power to legislate in respect of a matter of this description, so far as the affairs of the people of any race for whom it is necessary to adopt special legislation are concerned. That power is expressly given to the Federal Parliament, and I have no doubt whatever that in the exercise of it a law might be passed concerning special races, and prohibiting the free exercise of their religion, or imposing something in the nature of a religious test. I do not think that power ought to be given to the Federal Parliament. It is a matter of purely domestic concern, with which the states are particularly qualified to deal. If we carry the amendment in the way in which it is now proposed, we shall secure to the states the power which they at present possess, and which they can be trusted to exercise with an intimate knowledge of all the local circumstances. We shall prevent any unnecessary interference by the Federal Parliament in a matter of domestic concern, and we shall allay those fears which have been referred to by various honorable members. I trust, therefore, the amendment will be agreed to as proposed.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I voted this morning for the amendment of the preamble moved by the honorable member (Mr. Glynn), but in speaking upon that amendment I said that I had been struck by the remarks of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins), though I did not see how the amendment then before the committee could bring about the results he seemed to think possible. The amendment which the honorable member is now moving will, however, get rid of the possibility of danger. As was said by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise), Sunday observance is to a very large extent a matter of climate. In New South Wales we open our museums, our art gallery, and other places of public resort upon Sundays, though I think that in other colonies that is not allowed. It would be hard, however, if a state in the northern part of the continent, where, in consequence of the extremes of the climate, the people require some recreation upon Sunday were prevented by the Commonwealth from doing what we have done. Then, take the case of Sunday newspapers. We in New South Wales do not object to the publication of newspapers upon Sunday, as the honorable member (Mr. Fraser) would object here.

Mr. FRASER. -

I did not say so.

Mr. LYNE. -

That was the conclusion I drew from the honorable member's interjections. However, that is beside the question. What I really want to impress upon honorable members is that it is not a wise thing, where you have a number of states to deal with, to allow the Commonwealth authority to decide how Sunday should be observed. The Commonwealth authority might have that power if this provision were not inserted in the Bill. To my mind, if the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Symon) were carried, you might as well knock out the whole clause, because it takes the kernel out of it. I hope that the Convention will carry the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) as it stands.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I should like, in two sentences, to put forward a matter to which I invite the attention of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon). If the arguments which prevailed in, the Supreme Court of the United States in 1892 were to prevail in the Commonwealth Supreme Court, the Commonwealth authority would have an implied power to administer the common law in respect to the observances of Christianity. Of course, I may say at once that I cannot understand the decision of the United States court.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Still it exists.

Mr. WISE. -

Yes. Unless the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) were carried, the Commonwealth authority might, under the ruling of the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth, have this implied power. For this reason, I appeal to the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) to withdraw his amendment, so that we may take a vote upon the clause as it stands.

Mr. FRASER. -

The decision of the Supreme Court might be the opposite to what the honorable and learned member proposes.

Mr. WISE. -

Of course it might.

Mr. FRASER. -

Why should we interfere at all?

Mr. WISE. -

That is what I think. I would leave it to each state to do as it pleases in regard to Sunday observance, but I would deprive the Parliament of the right to make any laws at all upon this subject.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I hope that the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) will not withdraw his amendment. I intend to support it. It appears to me the only provision before us for which there is any justification. I do not know that it is absolutely necessary, but I think that it would be as well for us to have it. With regard to the provision suggested by the honorable member (Mr. Higgins), I think that it would tend to run us into danger rather than, as the honorable member wishes, to enable us to avoid it. Upon the face of the Constitution the Commonwealth has certainly no power whatever to deal with religion, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Will you explain why they have these words in the first amendment of the American Constitution?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The provisions of the American Constitution in regard to the powers handed over to the Federal Parliament are not nearly so definite as the provisions of our Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The American Constitution has no recital in the preamble such as we have just inserted in our Constitution.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes. But the amendment of the American Constitution to which the honorable and learned member refers was rendered necessary by the fact that there is not the definite division of powers in that Constitution that we have in our Constitution. I cannot imagine that clause 52 gives any ground from which it could be argued that the Federal Parliament has the right to interfere in regard to the exercise of religion, or to deal with religion in any way.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Except in regard to special races.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Of course, in regard to special races the Federal Parliament could make any laws it liked, and I think it very desirable that it should have that power.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Would it not be better to intrust this power to the states?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, I do not think so. I think that the power to deal with alien races is given as an exclusive power.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It was put back.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Directly it is exercised it becomes an exclusive power, and there is no doubt that it will be exercised. By putting into the Constitution words prohibiting the Commonwealth Parliament from making certain specified laws you create the implication that the Parliament has power to deal in other respects with religious observances. If you looked at the prohibition containing this provision, you will find that it deals expressly with Sunday observance, with the exercise of religion, with the establishment of religion, and with the imposition of religious observances. But it might very well be argued that the closing of places of public amusement on Sundays does not rest upon any of these grounds; and if you inserted a provision of this kind in the Constitution, there would be the strongest possible implication that the Federal Parliament would have the power to legislate in regard to social questions which had a religious aspect other than those expressly excluded from its jurisdiction by this provision. That is the danger you are likely to run into by putting this limitation in the Constitution. The Commonwealth Parliament will have no right whatever to interfere with these matters unless by some implication arising out of a provision of this kind. With regard to the subject of the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon), there is no doubt that the Commonwealth might have the right to impose any form of oath which it thought fit as a qualification of office. I am quite willing however, that some such provision as the honorable and learned member has suggested should be inserted in the Constitution, so that it would not be possible for the Commonwealth to require a religious test.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -

I think that if we give the right to an infinitesimal minority to come here and indulge in extraordinary practices, under the pretence that this is a new religion, we may have all the theatres and all the music-halls in Australia open on Sundays. If that is possible we ought to do what we can to provide against it.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I want if I can to recommend the Commonwealth Bill and get it carried. But why should we be faced with this difficulty? You have put in the preamble a religious recital which is not in the Constitution of the United States of America, but you have not put in the safeguard against religious intolerance which they have there. I ask honorable members how I shall face that difficulty? There is a grave suspicion evidenced by what I said that there were 36,000 distinct signatures upon this very point. I do not think it is too much for me to say that we ought to reassure those persons. They may be wrong. It may be right, as my friend (Mr. Barton) says, that there is no power b

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again.
The motion was agreed to.
Progress was then reported.
The Convention adjourned at two minutes to five o'clock p.m.
Thursday, 3rd March, 1898.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at thirty-four minutes past ten o'clock a.m.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The question with which the committee has to deal first is Mr. Symon's new clause, to take the place of clause 110, struck out.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I beg to move—

That the following new clause be inserted in place of clause 110, struck out:

The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states.

The clause which I now propose in substitution of clause 110, struck out, is the first paragraph of section 2 of the fourth article of the American Constitution. It provides that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states. I would direct attention to clause 110 as it originally stood. Honorable members will recollect that there was an amendment upon that clause which was debated in this Convention the other day. That amendment was similar to an amendment which was inserted in the United States Constitution after the war, going further than the original provision, and dealing with a changed state of things. There was considerable debate in the Convention upon the clause, which eventually was struck out, as going a great deal too far beyond the necessities of the case which we were required to provide for. I will just point out in one word the difficulty that impressed me at the time the debate was proceeding, and led me to vote against clause 110. That clause was as follows:-

A state shall not make or enforce any law abridging any privilege or immunity of citizens of other states of the Commonwealth nor shall a state deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The effect of the first part of that was that apparently the citizen of one state would not merely enjoy the privileges and immunities he would be entitled to as a citizen of the Commonwealth on entering another state, but would carry with him into that other state any special privileges and immunities he enjoyed in the state from which he came: That was illustrated by several honorable members by interjections as to what would be the position if a member of one state who held immunity from military service, afterwards became a resident of another state where that immunity would still attach to him, although such an immunity did not attach to the ordinary residents of that state. That, of course, was a condition of things the consequences that might follow from which we could not foresee. Therefore, clause 110 was struck out. But in the course of the debate honorable members will recollect that it was pointed out that, unless some provision were inserted, there was a fear that a state might legislate so as to disqualify

the citizens of another state from holding land within its borders. The possibility of such an occurrence was very grave. In the course of the debate I used that illustration myself, and I confess that I recoil, if that possibility could exist, from the effect of my own argument. I think it would be imperative, if there were a risk of anything of that sort occurring, that we should introduce words into the Constitution so that no state could be at liberty, by laws of its own, to disqualify the citizens of another state from, for instance, holding land within its borders, or enjoying the same privileges and immunities as its own citizens would have.

Sir JOHN FORREST. —

What about coloured races?

Mr. SYMON. —

That matter is dealt with, my right honorable friend will see, under a special provision of this Constitution.

Sir JOHN FORREST. —

How would it be in a case of this sort: Suppose a Chinaman going to Western Australia from Victoria and claiming to have a miner's right?

Mr. SYMON. —

If he were a citizen of Victoria, and went to Western Australia, he would be entitled to the privileges and immunities of a citizen of Western Australia only. That is the effect of my amendment.

Sir JOHN FORREST. —

That is, he would be able to get a miner's right?

Mr. SYMON. —

If the law in my right honorable friend's colony permitted him to have it. Under clause 110 as it stood, we felt that the effect would be that if a citizen of Victoria went to Western Australia, although by the law there he might be disqualified from holding a miner's right, still he would take with him the privileges and immunities of a citizen of Victoria, and be entitled to hold a miner's right. My amendment, however, is that all he would be able to enjoy in Western Australia would be the privileges and immunities of a citizen of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
What is a citizen of Victoria?

Dr. QUICK. -
It is not defined.

Mr. SYMON. -
My honorable friend (Dr. Quick) has framed a definition to be inserted in clause 120A. I do not know whether he desires to move that, and if so whether he desires to modify or restrict it in any way. But if it would be convenient to the Convention that Dr. Quick's proposal should be considered in connexion with the amendment I am moving, I should be agreeable to that being done. At any rate, I do not think that there is any necessity for defining a citizen. Citizenship is another matter, but there would be no difficulty or confusion from the use of the word citizen in this clause. I only wish this matter to be put on a proper footing, and I should be quite willing for Dr. Quick's amendment to be discussed at the same time as my own; or, for the matter of that, I should be content to have the two amalgamated.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Would a Western Australian resident coming to Victoria have the right of voting whether he became a resident of Victoria or not?

Mr. SYMON. -
No.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Under this proposal, why not?

Mr. SYMON. -
Because that matter is specially provided for in another part of this Constitution. The state regulates the exercise of the franchise within its own limits, and that matter would be exempt from the operation of this provision.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Why? You say that the citizens of every state shall have the rights and privileges of the citizens of the federal states.

Mr. SYMON. -
No. In America the same provision is in operation. My honorable friend will see this provision word for word in the United States Constitution. My amendment is word for word the same as clause 1 of section 2 of Article 4 of the American Constitution, which provides that-The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states.

That has been working in America for over 100 years without confusion. At any rate, there can be no doubt at all that a citizen going from one state to another state ought not to take with him or have recognised in that other state the privileges and immunities of the state from which he goes. That should not be the measure. The measure should be the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the state to which he goes. If they are less than he enjoyed before he must submit to them; if they are greater he gets additional advantages.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Our laws only apply to the Asiatic alien, and he would not be affected by this, I have no doubt.

Mr. SYMON. -

A person coming from another colony to my right honorable friend's colony would be entitled to the privileges and immunities enjoyed by the citizens of that colony, no more and no less. What we have to guard against is this: I apprehend that we do not wish that any state should disqualify, or lessen the privileges and immunities of, citizens of other states should such citizens enter within its borders. As the Bill now stands, it might be within the power of one state to say that no citizen of another state should hold land within its boundaries, or that they should hold it only under certain conditions. It should not, however, be possible for such an enactment to have force. Every citizen of the Commonwealth should be entitled to hold land in any state under the same terms as were imposed upon citizens of that state. If a citizen of Western Australia went to Victoria he should be able to hold land in Victoria upon the same terms, and subject to the same qualifications and limitations, as a citizen of Victoria.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Could he be prevented from doing so? Would the Bill, the object of which was to prevent him from holding land, get the Royal assent?

Mr. SYMON. -

Of course, the absolute control by a state of everything within its own borders is retained by this Constitution, except in respect to such matters as are expressly handed over to the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

But subject to the Imperial control.

Mr. SYMON. -

The Imperial authorities might not interfere. Of course, these are mere possibilities that I am discussing. This is the principle involved: Is it not desirable that a citizen of Western Australia should have the same privileges and immunities as are enjoyed by a citizen of Victoria, and vice versa? If we do not insert such a provision as this in the Constitution, I do not think we shall have a Commonwealth citizenship at all.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do not think that could happen.

Mr. SYMON. -
I do not know about that. A state might do a great many things which would come uncommonly near to taking away advantages from citizens of other states, and this possibility is so grave that it ought to be very seriously considered. The arguments which I used in opposition to clause 110 will give me serious pause, unless some provision of this kind is introduced into the Constitution.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
How would you define the word "citizen"?

Mr. SYMON. -
I do not think that it is necessary to frame a definition of "citizen." A citizen is one who is entitled to the immunities of citizenship. In short, a citizen is a citizen. I do not think you require a definition, of "citizen" any more than you require a definition of "man" or "subject."

Mr. ISAACS. -
Would you include a corporation in the term "citizen"?

Mr. SYMON. -
Why not?

Mr. ISAACS. -
Well, in America they do not.

Mr. SYMON. -
I do not see why a corporation existing in one colony should not have the rights of a corporation in another colony. Otherwise you defeat the objects of this Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I agree that that ought to be so, but the word "citizen" will not include a corporation.

Mr. SYMON. -
Well, in my opinion it should. I think, however, though I am not prepared to say definitely, that other provisions in the Constitution would deal with that case. Clause 52 provides that we are to have uniformity, and I think would prevent any difficulty in regard to corporations, quite apart from the question of the meaning of the word "citizen." But if you ask me whether a corporation might not come within the definition of "citizen" to a certain extent—not, of course, in regard to the right of the voting and so on—I should say that it would. The difficulty is one that requires to be met. Although I admit that the amended American Constitution goes further than anything we require, and is directed to a particular and special condition of things, this provision seems to me absolutely essential, and, in my opinion, the Constitution would be incomplete without it.

There is one word in the proposed clause which, when the honorable member was speaking, did not strike my attention as it does now. I read the clause as if it provided that the citizens of each state should be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of all the citizens of the several states; but I find now that it is not so. The words in the clause are "in the several states," so that possibly it would not have the disadvantages which I thought at first it would have. I am afraid, however, that it will not do what the honorable and learned member wishes. In Dr. Burgess's work, vol. 1., pages 255-256, it is pointed out that Germany adopted a provision of this kind with the fall intention that is actuating us now. This is what the writer says about it:--

This is simply the old provision of Article 4, secure 2. of the Constitution of the United States. that "The citizens of each state" (Commonwealth) "shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states" (Commonwealths). It was fashioned from this provision. It was discovered and demonstrated in the Constitutional Assembly of 1867 that this provision would not secure the civil liberty throughout the German State which that body intended to establish, The difficulty was solved, not by fixing the immunities and privileges of citizenship in the Constitution, but by vesting the Legislature of the General Government with the power to deal with all these subjects by statutory provisions.

That is precisely what the honorable and learned member (Dr. Quick) tried to do yesterday. The provision which the Convention threw out yesterday is that which has been proved by experience to be the only one which in Germany could carry out the object wished for. The provision which they moulded upon the provision in the American Constitution failed to carry out that object, and I am afraid that the provision of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) will also fail to do so.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I agree with what has fallen from the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs). I think that we made a mistake yesterday when we rejected the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Dr. Quick), and I trust that before we finally separate, we shall be able to include that amendment in the Constitution, or, if not, to adopt a provision similar to that which was suggested by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn), which would have made the clause read as follows:-

A state shall not deny to the citizens of other states the privileges and immunities of its own citizens.

That, I understand, would mean that a Victorian citizen, whether a Chinaman or any one else, going, say, into the great province of Western Australia, would be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of a citizen of Western Australia. If Western Australia had legislated to restrict the rights of Chinese within her borders, a Chinaman going there would be subject to that restriction, but if no restrictions had been imposed upon Chinese residing within Western Australia, it would be impossible for Western Australia, simply because a Chinaman came from another colony, to treat him differently from the way in which Chinese residents there were treated. It seems to me an anomaly to use the word "citizen" in this Constitution, if you neither define it nor make provision for its definition. I asked the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon), what was his definition of "citizen," and I understood him to say that a citizen was a man who had the rights of citizenship. That reminded me of the definition once given of an archdeacon, who was described as a reverend gentleman who performed archidiaconal functions. Such a definition may be all very well in humorous conversation, but we have already been warned about the impropriety of inserting anything of this character in the Constitution. I trust that we shall make this Constitution perfectly intelligible within its four corners, and I do not think we can do that without adopting some provision of the kind suggested by the honorable and learned member (Dr. Quick).

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

I take it that what is required is that the position of citizens of the Commonwealth should remain practically what it is now, and that each citizen, when he went out of his own state into another, should be liable to the laws of that state, but to no special laws. On the other hand, he should not be able to carry with him any particular privileges. It seems to me that we should take care to prevent the states from passing any law which would restrict the rights and liberties of citizens of other states who happened to come within its borders.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

The criticism of my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) is, of course, perfectly sound. This provision does not provide all that we should like to provide. His citation from Burgess shows that probably something further will be required, but so far as the clause goes, honorable members will see that it is essential that such a provision should be introduced into the Constitution. Otherwise, we fall short of giving to the citizens of each state the privileges which it is intended that this Union shall confer upon them. The only real objection to the provision is that it does not go so far as may be necessary to give complete citizenship. But to the extent to which it does go, and following upon the lines of the American provision, which has worked so advantageously for over a hundred years, it seems to me essential that we should introduce it into the Constitution.

I do not propose to be as severe in my criticism of the provision of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) to-day as he was in his determined opposition to my proposed clause yesterday. I would point out, however, two difficulties in the way of adopting his provision. The first is that there is no definition of the status of "citizen." The clause does not say whether a citizen is a ratepayer of a state, an adult male, or any member of the population of a state-men, women, children, Chinamen, Japanese, Hindoos, and other barbarians. Who are the citizens of a state?

Mr. SYMON. -
That depends upon the law of the state upon the subject.

Dr. QUICK. -
So far as I am aware, there is no law in any colony defining colonial citizenship or state citizenship. I am merely adopting the line of argument which my honorable and learned friend adopted yesterday, in taking advantage of technical points.

Mr. SYMON. -
That was not my line of argument.

Dr. QUICK. -
The honorable and learned member gives no definition of state citizenship, but he proposes to place in the Constitution a provision relating to state citizens. At the present time there is no such entity as a state citizen. The status of elector, or ratepayers or member of the population of a state may exist, but the status of citizen does not exist. I am surprised that my honorable friend, with all his learning and acumen, has proposed to place in the Constitution a provision containing a term of which there is no definition, even in Professor Morrison's Dictionary. Another objection is this: The clause proposes to impose the obligation upon all the states to treat the people or citizens, as the honorable and learned member has described them, of other states upon the same terms as apply to their own citizens. Does not that provision interfere with state rights?

Mr. SYMON. -
Not a bit.

Dr. QUICK. -
Why should the honorable and learned member endeavour to interfere with state rights, when he has been one of the most determined advocates of and sticklers for the independence of the states?

Mr. SYMON. -
Are you not going to give citizenship throughout the Commonwealth?

Dr. QUICK. -
This is a Bill to establish a Federal Commonwealth, and while there may be strong arguments in favour of defining federal citizenship, I contend that there is no occasion for us to go further and to attempt to define state citizenship. On these two grounds I think that the proposed clause should be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. -
It will be advisable if Dr. Quick desires to move his new clause that he should move it as an amendment on this one, so as to save two discussions on the subject.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -
I am sorry it is impossible to obtain the last edition of Cooley's Constitutional Limitations. There is a most valuable note in it upon the importance of similar words in the American Constitution, which were introduced by an amendment as ancillary to the clauses relating to the freedom of trade. Judge Cooley points out that since that amendment has been introduced these words have been found of the utmost importance in preventing interference by the several states with the trade of their neighbours, under various pretexts. He points out that under these words such a tax as that on commercial travellers in New Zealand would have been declared illegal, although it could not have been touched under the freedom of trade clause. Devices really aimed at limiting trade between the states, although ostensibly taking another form, were dealt with under this amendment, and without it they could never have been prevented. I trust the amendment will be carried in this form, or perhaps Mr. Symon can see his way to alter the word "states" to "Commonwealth," which, I think, would meet Dr. Quick's view.

Mr. SYMON. -
If you move that, I will accept it.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
What is a citizen? A British subject?

Mr. WISE. -
I presume so.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

They could not take away the rights of British subjects.

Mr. WISE. -

I do not think so. I beg to move-

That the words "each state" be omitted, with the view of inserting the words "the Commonwealth."

I apprehend the Commonwealth must have complete power to grant or refuse citizenship to any citizen within its borders. I think my answer to Sir John Forrest was given a little too hastily when I said that every citizen of the British Empire must be a citizen of the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth will have power to determine who is a citizen. I do not think Dr. Quick's amendment is necessary. If we do not put in a definition of citizenship every state will have inherent power to decide who is a citizen. That was the decision of the Privy Council in Ah Toy's case.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

He was an alien.

Mr. WISE. -

The Privy Council decided that the Executive of any colony had an inherent right to determine who should have the rights of citizenship within its borders.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That it had the right of keeping him out.

Mr. WISE. -

In our case he was within our limits, but he was not allowed to sue in our courts.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

If it is a fact that citizens, as they are called, of each state are also citizens of the Commonwealth, there may be some little doubt as to whether this is not providing for practically the same thing.

Mr. WISE. -

No, there may be territories that is what I want to provide for.

Mr. BARTON. -

In other portions of the Bill we use the words "parts of the Commonwealth" as including territories, so that the object of Mr. Wise would be met by using the words "citizens of every part of the Commonwealth" or "each part of the Commonwealth." Mr. Wise will see that that follows the ordinary phraseology of the Bill, and I do not think it alters the meaning of what he intends to propose. I leave it to his consideration, because it would make the clause more consistent with the rest of the Bill. I still take objection to the use of the word "citizen" here without a definition, and I understand the definition is to be proposed by Dr. Quick. As this will be the only part of the Bill where the expression "citizen" occurs, I would like to support the suggestion of the Chairman that Dr. Quick should move his clause as an amendment on that of, Mr. Symon. Then the definition will be in the only clause which deals with the subject. As to ordinary matters, the part of the Bill called the Act has made some provision. Clause 7 of the covering clauses, as redrafted, provides that-

This Act, and all laws made by the Parliament of the Commonwealth in pursuance of the powers conferred by the Constitution, and all treaties made by the Commonwealth, shall be binding on the courts, Judges, and people of every state and of every part of the Commonwealth, anything in the laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.

So anything conferred by the Constitution or by any law under the Constitution upon any subject or citizen, as he has been called, will be retained by him, inasmuch as the liability to obey the laws involves the protection of the laws, so that a good deal of what is sought by this clause is already conferred by clause 7. As to the general object of Mr. Symon's proposal, I confess I am strongly in favour of it. My only doubt is whether we should not rather cumber the Constitution by using the word "citizens," and requiring a definition of citizens when we use it here, and when the ordinary term to express a citizen of the empire might be used. We are subjects in our constitutional relation to the empire, not citizens. "Citizens" is an undefined term, and is not known to the Constitution. The word "subjects" expresses the relation between citizens of the empire and the Crown.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Is a naturalized alien a subject?

Mr. BARTON. -

He would be a citizen under the meaning of this clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Suppose you say "subject" without definition, would that include naturalized aliens?

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. Dr. Quick's definition is: Persons resident in the Commonwealth, either natural-born or naturalized subjects of the Queen, and if they are subject to no disabilities imposed by the Parliament they shall be citizens of the Commonwealth. Why not use the word "subject," and avoid the necessity of this definition?
Dr. QUICK. -
This definition does not interfere with the term "subject" in its wider relation as a member of the empire or subject of the Queen.

Mr. BARTON. -
No, but the definition of "citizen" as a natural-born or naturalized subject of the Queen is co-extensive with the ordinary definition of a subject or citizen in America. The moment he is under any disability imposed by the Parliament be loses his rights.

Dr. QUICK. -
That refers to special races.

Mr. BARTON. -
But if he is under any disability under any regulation of the Commonwealth he would cease to be a citizen, however slight that disability might be. I doubt whether the honorable member intends that. There is power by law to regulate the people of any race requiring special laws. There may be some purely regulative law passed, not imposing any special restriction on any person of that kind who may be a subject of the Queen. That regulation, if it were of the mildest character, under this definition, would deprive him of his rights.

Dr. QUICK. -
The regulation would have to specify the ground of disability.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes; but my honorable friend says not under any disability imposed by the Parliament. Would not the difficulty be that if he were under any slight disability for regulative purposes, all his rights of citizenship under the Commonwealth would be lost?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
There might be a special disability on minors.

Mr. BARTON. -
That might be one of the disabilities. Of course here the disabilities as to minors would not matter much, but I would like to put this consideration to Dr. Quick, that if we use the term "subject," or a person subject to the laws, which is a wider term, we shall avoid the necessity for a definition of "citizen." You might say a subject or resident being the subject of the Queen.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Subject to the laws will be too wide.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, it might be. The expression "resident subjects of the Queen" would avoid the necessity of having a definition of a term which only occurs in one place in the Constitution. I do not know how Mr Symon would take the suggestion, but it is far better not to import the word "citizen" here if we can deal with it by a term well known in the constitutional relations of the empire between the Queen and her subjects.
Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I have expressed the opinion, whether rightly or wrongly, that the word "citizen" does not require a definition at all in the Constitution. We are not dealing with rigid terms or with a Constitution which is not to be perfectly elastic, and under the construction and interpretation of the Constitution the word "citizen" seems to me to be capable of very easy determination. It is one of those expressions which in the Constitution is just as easy of determination as the word "person." I really do not see where the difficulty is.
Mr. ISAACS. -

It has been found very difficult to define it by decisions in the United States.
Mr. SYMON. -

There is no man in Australia who is more profoundly versed in constitutional law than Mr. Isaacs, and he knows that every point and every question has been the subject of more or less debate and discussion, and will be until the end of time.

The words "subject," "person," and "citizen" can be made subjects of controversy at all times if occasion requires it. At the same time, it does not affect the principle that there should be a definition of "citizen," either in the form suggested by Dr. Quick or by Mr. Barton. I will be quite content.
The principle is what I am contending for: The principle that our labours will be incomplete unless we make the rights of citizens or subjects in one state to extend to the citizens of another state who may go from one state to another. There ought to be no possibility of any state imposing a disqualification on a person in the holding of property, or in the enjoyment of any civil right, simply because he happens to belong to another state.
That would not give us the uniformity of citizenship we all desire, and therefore I am willing that the word "citizenship" should be defined as Dr.
Quick suggests, with perhaps some modification. I also support the suggestion from the Chair that the two propositions might be considered together. The clause would do something to meet the difficulty, not perhaps finally or conclusively, as Mr. Isaacs, said, but at any rate to a large extent and almost completely.
Would this do:-

Any subject of the Commonwealth, resident in any part of the Commonwealth, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of subjects resident in other parts of the Commonwealth?

Mr. SYMON. -

I should be quite satisfied with that.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

There can be no doubt that this subject is surrounded with considerable difficulty, and probably any decision arrived at will be reviewed either by the Drafting Committee or the Convention at a subsequent stage. The Hon. Mr. Wise's suggestion to amend the Hon. Mr. Symon's clause so as to make it read-

The citizens of the Commonwealth shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several states, offers a method by which the difficulty might be solved, but a definition ought to precede any legislation on the subject, and I shall therefore propose that the new clause of which I have given notice defining citizenship be placed in front of the words proposed by Mr. Symon. It is as follows:-

All persons resident within the Commonwealth, being natural-born or naturalized subjects of the Queen, and not under any disability imposed by the Parliament, shall be citizens of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Symon's words would then follow:-

And the citizens of the Commonwealth shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states.

Mr. SYMON. -

Is it necessary to leave in the words "natural-born or naturalized"?

Dr. QUICK. -

That is a detail that is open to discussion. I feel that there is a considerable difficulty in connexion with this definition, but, as it has been suggested, I will propose it, and leave the committee to amend it if they think proper. The words proposed to-day may not give exact expression to the views of the Convention, but it would be a very serious mistake if some provision of this kind were not inserted in the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment proposed by the Hon. Mr. Wise is now before the Chair.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I will withdraw my amendment for the time being, to enable Dr. Quick to submit his amendment.

The amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -
I beg to move—
That the following words be inserted at the commencement of the proposed new clause:—"All persons resident within the Commonwealth, being natural-born or naturalized subjects of the Queen, and not under any disability imposed by the Parliament, shall be citizens of the Commonwealth."

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
That, of course, makes the clause much wider. The Hon. Mr. Symon proposes that any person coming into a state shall be subject to the laws of that state. This amendment provides that he shall be subject to the laws of the Commonwealth. That might be found to be inconvenient, and I do not think it can be necessary. I shall, therefore, vote against the amendment.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I am afraid that the amendment is far too wide, unless we say that the disabilities imposed by Parliament may extend to birth and race. This would, notwithstanding the rights conferred under clause 52, deprive Parliament of the power of excluding Chinese, Lascars, or Hindoos who happened to be British subjects.

Mr. WISE. -
Might not place of birth be a disability?

Mr. ISAACS. -
It would be difficult to persuade me that place of birth is a disability that could be imposed by Parliament. The amendment provides that a natural-born subject of the Queen, unless he is liable to some disability imposed by Parliament, such as lunacy, shall be a citizen of the Commonwealth. It does not say except such persons as Parliament chooses to exempt, and it seems to me, from the very nature of the expression, that this cannot refer to place of birth. That is not a disability imposed by Parliament, and unless a natural-born or naturalized subject of the Queen does something or gets into such a condition as amounts to, so to speak, a disqualification, he would be entitled to be admitted as a citizen of the Commonwealth. I am quite sure that the doubt is at all events sufficiently great to cause a very strong feeling against the thing. We could not insure such an interpretation as honorable members desire. The effect of it certainly may be, and I think probably will be, what I have stated, and it seems to me that the only safe course to adopt is to do what Dr. Quick proposed to do yesterday.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
When this matter was before the Convention on a former occasion in connexion with clause 110, I raised this very point, but I did not succeed in getting honorable members to pay any attention to it: Its importance evidently was not recognised. I intended, when Dr. Quick's amendment was proposed, to make an addition to it, so that it would read as follows:-

All persons resident within the Commonwealth, being natural-born or naturalized subjects of the Queen, and not under any disability imposed by the Parliament, shall be citizens of the Commonwealth and of the state in which they reside, and shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states.

The one clause would then cover everything, and I put this forward for the consideration of the honorable member. He may not wish to go to the extent of saying that they shall be citizens of the state in which they reside, but the latter words would embody the principle Mr. Symon is now suggesting, and which I suggested on clause 110.

Mr. BARTON. -

What about territories?

Mr. GLYNN. -

There is power under the Bill to make special laws with regard to territories, and I am not sure that we could not constitute a certain class of citizenship for the territories.

Mr. BARTON. -

That power would be exercised subject to the Constitution. If you make the matter safe so far as the citizens of the territories are concerned in the Constitution, legislative power could not interfere with them.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I understand that you can make any provision you like as to representation and otherwise until the territories become states. Their position in the Constitution is purely provisional. I can see the force of the point, and I admit that my amendment does not cover it. The proposal I have suggested puts the definition in the same position as in America. Citizens of the Commonwealth are citizens of the state in which they reside, and they also have, as Mr. Symon suggests, the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states. There is only one other means by which you could do what is wanted, and perhaps it is the best: That is to adopt the principle of the German Constitution, which says that there shall be a common citizenship, and that the rights of the citizens in one state shall attach to the citizens in the other states. That would place it in the power of the Federal Parliament to declare what are the conditions of citizenship. There would be power under a provision of this kind to say that an alien should not be a citizen until he had resided five years in the colony, while the citizenship would be uniform in its character throughout the Commonwealth. In America, aliens have been prevented from becoming citizens unless they have resided in the place for five years. They must then be citizens for seven years before they can stand for Parliament. Honorable members will see that by adopting the principle of the German Constitution we could prevent any special rights being given to aliens, and I think it would be better in that form. I desire to call attention to this point also, that even if you do not define citizenship at all in the Constitution there would be very little harm done. It seems to be forgotten that in the American Constitution the word citizen is used. It is not used in our Constitution. In the original American Constitution the word "citizen" is for instance used in connexion with representation in Parliament. A man must be a citizen for seven years before he can be returned as a representative, so that there is a special reason for the definition given to the term citizen. Here we do not use the word citizen. We use the word "resident" only. The qualification for a Member of Parliament is residence for three years, and very little harm will be done if we leave out "citizen" altogether. If the Convention do not adopt a suggestion such as that I have made, the better plan will be to fall back on the principle of the German Constitution, which would enable us to make special laws regarding aliens. I would like to mention, in connexion with what Mr. Isaacs said as to aliens, that this provision would not interfere in the slightest degree in the way of preventing aliens from coming in, because it is only when the aliens get inside the Commonwealth that this provision is to apply to them. The decision of the Privy Council in the case of Ah Toy v. Musgrove was that an alien had no right to land here, but that decision does not affect his citizenship after he has landed. Mr. Musgrove, then Secretary for Customs, prevented Ah Toy from landing. Ah Toy brought an action for assault and battery against him, but the Privy Council held that that action could not be justified.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I think that there are grave objections both to Mr. Symon's proposed new clause and to Dr. Quick's amendment thereto, and the objections are perhaps even more grave in the case of the amendment than they are in the case of the original motion. No chain is stronger than its weakest link, and therefore citizenship throughout the Commonwealth would not be more restricted than it was in the colony which least restricted citizenship. There might be one state in the Commonwealth which gave citizenship far too freely, in the opinion of the other states of the Commonwealth, and yet, according to Mr. Symon's proposal, the state which was so lax in its methods and conditions of granting citizenship would confer citizenship all through the Commonwealth, in so far as related to citizens of that state.
who went to reside in other states.

Mr. SYMON. -

No; the citizens of the lax state would be limited, when they went to another state, to the privileges and immunities of that other state.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I read your proposal in precisely the other way.

Mr. SYMON. -

They do not take with them to that other state the privileges and immunities of citizenship of their own state. They only get the privileges and immunities of the state to which they go.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I still think the words might be interpreted to mean what I thought they meant.

Mr. SYMON. -

I did not intend that.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I accept that statement of the honorable member, but I submit that his proposed new clause might be interpreted as I interpreted it by some authority, and, in that case, we should be landed in a very unfortunate position. Dr. Quick's amendment is even worse, because it provides that-

All persons resident within the Common-wealth, being natural-born or naturalized subjects of the Queen, and not under any disability imposed by the Parliament, shall be citizens of the Commonwealth.

Now, it might be easily conceivable that, simply because a man was born under British rule in India, China, or elsewhere, therefore, of necessity, on arriving in one of these colonies, he could claim citizenship of the Commonwealth. Is it not a mistake to stereotype in the Commonwealth Bill at this period our opinions on this subject? Would it not be better to authorize the Federal Parliament to deal with this question, not once only, but from time to time as circumstances and conditions may change? I hope that both the proposals will be withdrawn or negatived, and that at a later stage an opportunity will be given to Dr. Quick to try again what he tried yesterday, a provision which, as then proposed, or with a slight alteration of the words, would give to the Federal Parliament power to determine the citizenship of the Commonwealth from time to time, and thus to meet any changes of conditions, which certainly ought to be met if they arise, but which cannot then be met if we now arrive at some decision and stereotype it once for all in this Constitution.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. -

I submit there is a still better course open to us, and that is to give consideration to the amendment proposed by the Assembly of Tasmania, which has received up to the present time no attention whatever.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Not sufficient attention, at all events.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

The amendment is to omit clause 110, and insert the following now clause:-

The citizens of each state, and all other persons owing allegiance to the Queen and residing in any territory of the Commonwealth, shall be citizens of the Commonwealth, and shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the Commonwealth in the several states, and a state shall not make or enforce any law abridging any privilege or immunity of citizens of the Commonwealth, nor shall a state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws.

Now, there is a clause that covers the whole ground—a clause that is all-sufficient for the purpose-bearing in mind that every provision is made for securing to the Commonwealth that its citizens shall not be people of alien races to any considerable extent. There are in India some 150,000,000 British subjects, but of those 150,000,000 people very few indeed could stand the test applied by the Natal Immigration Restriction Act, which I think has been adopted already in Western Australia; which will no doubt be adopted in other colonies of Australasia, and which will be effective in keeping from our shores the natives of India who cannot pass the education test that is applied under the Natal Act. This education test is one which would debar some 149,000,000 at the least out of 150,000,000 from qualifying, and would so keep them out of Australia. There you have a very much wider disability—and I think a very wholesome disability—which goes far and away beyond that suggested by the learned and honorable member (Mr. Isaacs). I think if we took this clause into our consideration, it might be found to do all that is required for us.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

It seems to me that the clause that has just been read by the Right Hon. Sir Edward Braddon—the one suggested by the Tasmanian Assembly—would land us in greater difficulties than anything we have thought of yet, and I think we shall be incurring a very great risk in endeavouring to define who is in future to be considered a citizen of the Commonwealth. We have a right to deal to-day with what we think is right for to-day, but we have no right to tie the hands of the future people of the Commonwealth in this connexion. Therefore, I think it would be extremely wise to reject both of these amendments, with the view, as suggested by Mr. Holder, of getting back, if we can, to the proposal which we had before us yesterday, and which says exactly what I think we ought to say in connexion with all questions, namely, that the Parliament shall have the power to deal from time to time, as necessity dictates, with the question of citizenship, if we are to deal with the matter at all. The clause we have here, proposed by Dr. Quick, reads as follows:-

All persons resident within the Commonwealth, being natural-born or naturalized subjects of the Queen, and not under any disability imposed by the Parliament, shall be citizens of the Commonwealth.

I think it has been shown that it would be unwise to insert that provision in the Bill. The Attorney-General of Victoria suggested that there may be here—indeed experience has shown that there will be—as in various countries of the world, races within the nation that remain distinct; that do not blend with our people; that are by their existence and by their rapid increase inimical to the well-being of the whole community. This has been made very manifest in America. Any student in the history of America must see that the negro population is a disturbing factor which is increasing with immense rapidity.

Mr. SYMON. -

They did not make them citizens; they gave them the franchise.

Mr. BARTON. -

They were made citizens.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

They were constituted citizens under an impulse of generosity that we must all admire; but the circumstances that have since developed prove that that act was extremely unwise, and America is only prevented from taking this right of citizenship from the negroes by the rigid cast-iron character of its Constitution. Now, we are here making a Constitution, and we must be careful not to do something which may seem for the moment wise, but which may tie the hands of the future people of the Commonwealth from doing what they, judging from circumstances altogether different from those we are acquainted with, positively know to be wise. It seems to me we have already power in the Commonwealth to deal with aliens, and we have power to declare in a certain sense the character of citizenship in connexion with the form of naturalization that may be adopted. And if more than that is required—and I think it is—it is sufficiently and adequately provided by a simple declaration that, in future, the Commonwealth Parliament shall have the power to deal with Commonwealth citizenship. Now, I think that if any of these proposals were carried, what would happen would be that a citizen coming from another state would not be entitled to all the immunities possessed by a citizen of the state from which he came, and if be happened to be a Chinaman, coming from a state where no disabilities were imposed on Chinamen, and went, say, to Western Australia, where very rigid disabilities are imposed, I think he would have to be subjected to the disabilities that existed in the state into which he came. But we have to remember that this Bill has to be carried, if at all, not by a Convention like this, where most of the members are intimately acquainted with constitutional law, intimately acquainted with constitutional history, and are experts upon the exact definition of terms—men who know exactly what will accrue from any resolution we pass here—but it will have to be carried by the people, who will be scared by a suggestion which they do not clearly understand—that they may be perhaps compelled to give within their own respective states privileges and immunities that are given in other states, because the persons coming to them from those other states are citizens of those other states. I see a great deal of danger from that point of view in voting either for the proposal of Mr. Symon or for the proposal of Dr. Quick, and I hope that if these proposals are not withdrawn they will be negatived, because I think we are sufficiently safeguarded in the power we already possess to deal with naturalization and with aliens; and I am afraid we may, perhaps, in a way we do not now see, tie the hands of the future people of the Commonwealth by carrying either of these proposals.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

My mind has waivered very much during this debate. I have come to the conclusion that my original suggestion was wrong, that the best form of all in which the original amendment could be moved is that in which it was proposed by Mr. Symon, and that then no definition such as is suggested by Dr. Quick will be really required, because, if we allow each state to make its own standard of citizenship, we shall reserve all the rights of the states, and obviate all the difficulties contemplated by Mr. Trenwith, by retaining to each state the right to determine the qualification of its own citizens. And then we will make a provision that is necessary as part of the Federal Constitution, that when a man has acquired citizenship in one state he shall be entitled to the right of citizenship in the other states.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That is to say, if one state has been lax in its gift that laxity must govern the whole.

Mr. WISE. -

Not at all. All this, of course, is to be subject to the general power conferred on the Commonwealth by subsection (26) of clause 52 to make special laws for particular races. Probably it would be more apt to use these words:-

Every subject of the Queen resident in any state or part of the Commonwealth shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of subjects resident in other states or parts of the Commonwealth, but this section shall not apply to the people of any race in respect of which the power conferred by sub-section (26) of clause 52 can be exercised.

That would give Parliament every control, and prevent the states from being coerced in respect of the coloured races, while it would get over the difficulties which have been suggested by attempting to define Commonwealth citizenship. I would like to say one word as to the necessity for the clause at all. Mr. Inglis Clark has written a memorandum which I shall be very happy to show to any one here, in which, after pointing out, as I endeavoured to mention just now, that the clause was necessary to prevent discriminating legislation for the real purpose of interfering with the freedom of trade, but for some other purpose ostensibly, goes on to illustrate the kind of cases in which the clause has been effective in the United States.

Mr. Higgins. -

Is the concrete case you have in mind the commercial travellers' tax?

Mr. Wise. -

The commercial travellers' tax was put on between two states, and dealt with, not under the commerce clause, but under this clause. Another one is that between the State of Maine and the adjoining states. Mr. Clark says-

There was a public road running from an adjoining state into the state of Maine, which was used in common by the residents of both states, and the people of Maine felt they had a grievance against the adjoining state in regard to the repair and maintenance of the road. The legislature of Maine passed a law forbidding a citizen of any other state to bring any action for damages on account of injuries received from the defective condition of the road in the state of Maine, but the law did not impose a like disability upon the citizens of the state of Maine, and the law was declared unconstitutional, because it violated the provisions of the 14th amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

That is a very clear concrete illustration of the necessity for a clause of this kind.

Mr. Symon (South Australia). -

I think some misapprehension has been developed during the debate, on which I fancy the objections to this clause have been founded. I think the amendment of Dr. Quick is not open to some of the criticisms which have been levelled against it. All he does is to say that all persons within the Commonwealth, being natural-born or naturalized subjects of the Queen, shall be citizens of the Commonwealth. Some honorable members have been dealing with them as though by making them citizens of the Commonwealth we are conferring upon them the franchise, and so on. We are doing nothing of the kind. It is merely giving the persons resident in the Commonwealth the privileges of the law applicable to all the recognised inhabitants.

Mr. BARTON. -

The rights of free men.

Mr. SYMON. -

All that Dr. Quick's definition does, it appears to me, is to give the inhabitants of the Commonwealth the rights of free men; that is to say, the protection of the law?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Which law—the Commonwealth law or the state law?

Mr. SYMON. -

Both laws. Dr. Quick's amendment refers to citizenship of the Commonwealth, and, therefore, it would be rights under the Constitution of the Commonwealth.

Mr. FRASER. -

In that case, does that override the state law?

Mr. SYMON. -

No.

Mr. FRASER. -

If they clash, which will prevail?

Mr. SYMON. -

The state declares its own law, subject to the exception in regard to aliens and naturalization. If a man is a citizen of a state, he is a citizen of the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth cannot take away that citizenship; it cannot interfere with that citizenship. I am sorry that Dr. Quick felt that I was urging it with undue determination, but that was the point which influenced me strongly yesterday in regard to his amendment, which, I think, went a great deal too far. The state citizenship is not interfered with, and cannot be interfered with, by the Commonwealth unless under such an amendment as was suggested yesterday, except in the cases governed by the provisions of clause 52, as to aliens and naturalization. It cannot be affected by it. The object of this amendment, I would point out, particularly to my learned friend (Mr. Holder), is exactly the reverse of that contemplated by the original clause 110, and that which he, in common with myself, feared would be a very unjust thing. That is under clause 110. Suppose there was a more lax citizenship in South Australia than in Western Australia. If a resident of South Australia went to Western Australia he would take with him his more lax citizenship, or his more extended rights there. But this is the other way about. If he went from South Australia to Western Australia he would only acquire, when he went there, the more restricted citizenship of Western Australia. For instance, the expression "citizen" does not mean only persons exercising the franchise; it includes infants and lunatics, if you like. Every one who is recognised as an inhabitant and is under the laws, is a citizen. Women in most of the colonies except South Australia do not exercise the franchise, but no one can say that they are not citizens. The object of my amendment is to say that when they go to another colony they are entitled to the rights conferred on the citizens of that other colony in the same way as though they had been residents or born there, subject to this: That if a woman goes to South Australia, she is entitled to all privileges and immunities of a citizen of South Australia, but she is not entitled to exercise the franchise until the conditions of the local laws on the subject have been complied with by her. The local Government has absolute control of that, and the only effect of this amendment, even with or without a definition, which I still think is unnecessary, is to place persons going from one state to another on exactly the same footing as the persons in the other state, and it seems to me that that lies at the very foundation of what we are trying to do under this Constitution. Every one, I think, recognises that something of this sort is essential. It may not go far enough. It does go a very long way, and it brings about that common citizenship which is expressed, to that extent at any rate, in the German Constitution, referred to by Mr. Glynn. I do not think the definition is necessary, but if honorable members think that some definition should be inserted, it is merely a repetition of the first part of the clause. All it amounts to is that all persons resident within the Commonwealth are entitled to the protection of the laws; but, without that clause as I have moved it, it is one which has the essential elements of our Constitution, and I venture to say that no definition is required.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

If the word "citizen" simply means resident or inhabitant, why should we go to all this trouble about it? If it means inhabitant, what is the use of saying the inhabitant of one state going to another state shall be an inhabitant of that other state? It seems to me that if you are going to use the word "citizen" in the sense of being equal to resident or inhabitant, and it is to have no other meaning such as has always been attached to it, we had better leave out the clause.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I understand that Dr. Quick has moved, as a preface to the new clause of Mr. Symon, the amendment which stands in his name on the notice-paper?

Dr. QUICK. -

Yes.

Mr. REID. -

It seems to me that, so far as the amendment of Dr. Quick is concerned, we do not need to take the slightest trouble as to the citizens of the Commonwealth, so far as the Commonwealth is concerned. Every man who becomes an elector of the Commonwealth enjoys all the privileges of the Commonwealth Constitution and all the rights which he may get thereunder. Aliens are dealt with under special powers, and so with other races. Consequently, I think we are wasting a great deal of time in trying to define what a citizen of the Commonwealth is. We understand what "An elector of the Commonwealth" means. We understand what "A man who has got the suffrage" means. We also understand that no question can arise as to whether Commonwealth laws will equally apply to male and female persons, and so on. I thi

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I would suggest that Mr. Symon should accept the amendment suggested by Mr. Barton, so that his clause shall read-

Every subject of the Queen resident in any state or part of the Commonwealth shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of subjects resident in other states or parts of the Commonwealth.

I am altogether in favour of the principle of Mr. Symon's amendment; but the word "citizen" creates a difficulty. If, instead of the word "citizen," we use the words "Every subject of the Queen resident in a state," it really means the same thing. The meaning to be given to the word "citizen" in Mr. Symon's amendment is not the narrow limited meaning of the citizen who can exercise the franchise, but it is the broad general meaning which the word has been held to have under the United States Constitution. It has been decided there that the word "citizen" has,

In its broad sense the word is synonymous with subject and inhabitant, and is understood as conveying the idea of membership of the nation, and nothing more.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Look at page 212, No. 14, and the next page, and you will see another decision.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The decision referred to by Mr. Isaacs states that in regard to offences against the citizens of the United States for which punishment is prescribed in section 5508, the word "citizen" is used in its political sense, as it is in the 14th amendment, and is not synonymous with "resident, inhabitant, or person." When dealing with offences, the word "citizen" appears to be used in another way.

Mr. ISAACS. -

As it is in the 14th amendment.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The reference my honorable friend has put before me emphasizes what I say, that the word "citizen" is used in its general sense, and at the same time there appears to be a particular sense in which it also may be used.

Mr. ISAACS. -

In a sense which is "not synonymous with resident, inhabitant, or person."

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Exactly. It has two meanings, but we are only dealing now with the one meaning-the general meaning. Mr. Isaacs' reference shows the danger that might be incurred by using the word "citizen," because it might have the restrictive meaning the last decision imposes. All we mean now is a member of the community or of the nation, and the accurate description of a member of the community under our circumstances is a subject of the Queen resident within the Commonwealth."

Mr. SYMON. -

A person for the time being under the law of the Commonwealth.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

A person for the time being entitled to the benefits of the law of the Commonwealth.

Mr. FRASER. -

But as the whole Constitution has been passed for the benefit of subjects, surely the clause is not necessary?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is another question. I am now simply dealing with the use of the word "citizen." It seems to me that the word "citizen" is not a proper word. The only reason I see for the amendment is the reason put forward already, and I would remind the honorable member (Mr. Fraser) that that reason is that there should be no power in a state to treat the inhabitants of another state differently from its own.
Mr. FRASER. -
Hear, hear.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
That is the only thing to be provided against. I think that Mr. Symon's amendment, if altered as Mr. Barton suggests, will carry that out. The alteration provides that every subject of the Queen resident in a state or part of the Commonwealth shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the subjects resident in the other states or parts of the Commonwealth. The only meaning of that is that when the subject of a state goes into another state he will be treated equally with the subjects of the Queen in the state to which he goes.

Mr. SYMON. -
Hear, hear; no more and no less.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
A subject would only have the rights of inhabitants of the state to which he goes. He does not take with him the privileges of his own state.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Could that not be construed to mean that a subject of the Queen resident in one state should, although resident in that state, have all the rights, privileges, and immunities of a subject resident in another state?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I do not think so. I am prepared to support the amendment, of Mr. Symon if altered as suggested.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
Might the amendment not mean that a subject resident in one state, and contemplating the continuance of that residence, is to have all the privileges and immunities of residents irk another state?

Mr. WISE. -
No, no.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It says that a subject of the Queen resident in one state shall have the privileges and immunities of a subject of the Queen resident in another state. It seems to me that the proposal is quite open to the objection I have mentioned. I fear that all the attempts to define citizenship will land us in innumerable difficulties.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
Shall we not, by drawing those lines of distinction, be drawing lines which at present are not drawn in Australia? The words "subject of the Queen" introduce a dividing line among the Asiatics we have at present in Australia, some of whom are subjects of the Queen, and others of whom are not. We want to deal with Asiatics on broad grounds without any such distinction, but the proposal if carried would prevent our doing so. The moment any legislation was introduced the question would arise as to which Asiatics were subjects of the Queen, say from Hong Kong, and which were. Asiatics which came from some other part of China and were not subjects of the Queen.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Asiatics will be dealt with by special laws, which will be the same all through the Commonwealth.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

But the present proposal if carried would raise an initial difficulty in framing special laws. It might be urged that it was necessary to discriminate between residents who are subjects of the Queen and those who are not, and the amendment would introduce an element which would give rise to a great deal of trouble in the future.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You want to keep both classes out.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

We desire always to deal with Asiatics on broad lines, whether they are subjects of the Queen or not; and in South Australia, and, I believe, other colonies, those lines of distinction are obliterated. In South Australia we make no difference between Chinese from Hong Kong and those from other parts of China. That, I think, is the most effective way of dealing with this matter.

Dr. Quick's amendment was negatived.

Mr. SYMON. -

Does Mr. O'Connor move an amendment?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I thought my friend (Mr. Symon) would have accepted my suggestion.

Mr. SYMON. -

If Mr. O'Connor will move his amendment, I will be content with it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I would suggest words which I think will meet the criticism of my friend (Mr. Isaacs):

Every subject of the Queen resident in any state or part of the Commonwealth shall be entitled in any other state or part of the Commonwealth to all the privileges and immunities to which he would be entitled if a subject of the Queen resident in that latter state or part of the Commonwealth.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Don't you want to say that a citizen shall be entitled to the privileges of the state in which he resides?
Mr. SYMON. -
Oh, no, that he already has.
Mr. DOBSON. -
But I mean on leaving one state and going to another.
Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
Take the matter of the income tax, for example. A subject from a state where there was exemption might claim exemption in another state, although there was no exemption in the latter.
Mr. OCONNOR. -
He could not be entitled to greater or less privileges than the inhabitants of the state itself.
Mr. ISAACS. -
Allow me to point out that the subject, although resident, we will say, in Queensland, is to have the same privileges and immunities as if resident in Victoria. In Victoria, if he were resident, he would have the right to claim exemption under the income tax up to a certain point. Under the proposal, although he is not resident in Victoria, he is to have that exemption.
Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
That is the very point. My honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) has really done more in his last few words to explain the true position of this matter than has the whole of the rest of the debate. The sort of thing he has mentioned is exactly the sort of thing to be remedied. In the debate, the whole question was whether any one state could impose an increased tax on the ground of residence in an adjoining state. There was a consensus of opinion that a state should not do so.
Mr. ISAACS. -
No.
Mr. SYMON. -
That was the consensus of opinion. There was a difference of opinion, but there was a strong feeling that that sort of thing
Mr. ISAACS. -
I am speaking of taxation for state purposes, and not for federal purposes.
Mr. SYMON. -
I am speaking of the same thing. Unless you have this amendment, or the amendment as modified by Mr. O'Connor, that state of things would prevail. Victoria might impose an income tax on its own citizens of 10 per cent., and a tax of 30 per cent. on people resident in South Australia who derived income from Victoria.
Mr. WISE. -
Or attempt to impose a fine of 50 per cent. on people from South Australia who tried to buy land in Victoria.

Mr. SYMON. -

Or impose a tax on commercial travellers, as was done in New Zealand. We ought really to be indebted to Mr. Isaacs for putting the point he did before us, for that is the very point we are seeking to remedy. The remedy may be open to criticism, but that a remedy is demanded is clear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The effect mentioned by Mr. Isaacs is not the only effect. If it were the only effect I would go the full length with you, and whenever we pass a law relating to absentees would make it operate outside Australasia.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is not the only effect.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Then that ought to be made clear.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is made clear by the amendment, which, I think, meets every case of the character, and prevents one state from imposing disabilities on the residents of another state.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I would like to add that the point I placed before the Convention was only by way of illustration of how the proposal would operate. But apply the proposal to another matter. Under the Victorian Land Act land is selected by persons resident in Victoria only, but under the proposal before the Convention a subject, although resident in South Australia, could claim a right to select land in Victoria.

Mr. WISE. -

Hear, Hear. Subjects would not be Victorians, but Australians.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We are talking now of the purely state matter of selecting land for Victorian development, and yet it is proposed that a subject is to have the same right of selecting land in Victoria wherever he may reside.

Mr. REID. -

If you attach the condition of residence in case of land selection it surely means residence on the particular land selected.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Under the proposal a man will be able to say he must have exactly the same rights under the Constitution, if he did not reside in New South Wales, as if he did.

Mr. REID. -

Our land laws in New South Wales have not been framed in that way.
Mr. KINGSTON. -

Cannot you apply that to electoral laws as well?

Mr. ISAACS. -

It may apply to electoral laws. The electoral law of a state might say that a person not resident for, say, six months in New South Wales or in Victoria, should not have a right to vote, but under this he might be held to have such a right.

Mr. WISE. -

He would have to live six months in the same way in Victoria before he could vote.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It may give him the same rights as a person who has lived for six months in the state. Look at the wording of the provision. It states that-

Every subject of the Queen resident in any state or part of the Commonwealth shall be entitled in any other state or part of the Commonwealth to all the privileges and immunities to which he would be entitled if a subject of the Queen resident in the latter state or part of the Commonwealth.

These words are tremendous.

Mr. WISE. -

But if such privileges only attach after six months' residence to a person in a colony, they would apply to a person going into the colony.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Residence in some other part of the Commonwealth is made equivalent to residence in the state under this provision. I am afraid that it will carry the matter further than we intend to go. What has been said regarding the absentee tax shows to me more and more the unwisdom of attempting to define these things in the Constitution. I feel that we shall be landing ourselves in difficulties that we do not anticipate.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is a different question altogether.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, it is the same thing, and this is an attempt—and it seems to me a dangerous attempt—to constitute a definition of Commonwealth citizenship. That is really what it comes to. I do press upon the committee once again the desirability of going back to the clause proposed by Dr. Quick.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

The last observation of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) is quite inapplicable to this proposal, because it certainly does not deal with any definition of citizenship at all. It only prevents the discriminative laws now made by a state against the subjects of other states. The answer to the point put before that by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) is this: The use of the word "resident" cannot satisfy any condition of a state law regarding a period of residence.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That would not touch the absentee tax.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

They cannot possibly have that, because if you have a condition that there shall be a residence of a certain period before a person can acquire a right of any kind, that period of residence is required from every inhabitant of the state, and it will be equally required from an inhabitant of another state. This proposal does not touch that question at all.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I am inclined to think that the remarks which have just fallen from Mr. O'Connor cut away the strength of the argument that a clause of this description would prevent an absentee tax being imposed. I am thoroughly opposed to absentee taxes which are levied by states on the inhabitants of other states of the Commonwealth, but, when it is put by Mr. O'Connor that this clause would not meet the case where a certain period of residence is required in a colony, then it is impossible to hold that it will exclude the operation of an absentee tax. Because what does this clause do? It provides that certain people, unless they have been resident or have worked or spent years in a colony may be subject to this special tax; so that it will not meet the case where a period of residence is required to prevent exemptions from the tax.

Mr. SYMON. -

It does not say that.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I understood Mr. O'Connor to say that it was so. Either it does not meet the case or it does. If it does not, it has not the recommendation of abolishing the absentee tax. If it does specify a period of residence, it is open to the objection which Mr. Isaacs has raised that it would confer an electoral qualification such as is required in each state before a man can register on the electoral roll. Under these circumstances, it seems to me very hard to decide how to vote. I want to see a common citizenship. I think that any Commonwealth Constitution which is deficient either in its definition or its power of definition, as circumstances arise, is a mistake. We have been labouring here for some time to secure a definition. Various definitions have been offered for consideration which seem to me to be open to a variety of objections. I think, therefore, that the better plan will be to go back to the amendment of Dr. Quick, and confer upon the Federal Parliament the power of defining, when occasion arises, what shall constitute citizenship of the Commonwealth. I wish to be clearly understood that in any vote I shall give against the insertion of a definition, I am not to be understood as being desirous of voting against a uniform citizenship, but rather am I to be accredited with the desire to confer upon the highest power, at the proper time, when it will have the best means of securing a proper definition, the full opportunity and authority of doing so.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I think that Mr. O'Connor has been rather misunderstood. What I understood him to say was that in the case of any state which imposes a condition of residence (for instance, in respect to the particular case put by Mr. Isaacs in relation to the taking up of land under any Land Selection Act), and which requires that there shall be personal residence (or, as we have it in South Australia, substituted residence, or any other form of residence for a definite period), that same condition shall apply to every inhabitant of every other state coming to live in the state imposing such conditions. The effect of this amendment would be to make the matter uniform. A state would be able to say that persons desiring certain privileges should have to reside within its territory for six months in a year, but not that residents from other states should be obliged to reside for twelve months whilst their own residents had to reside for only six. What we want is uniformity of law, so that the privileges of a citizen of one state shall be applicable to the subjects of another state, and be neither greater nor less than those that apply to the other states.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We want to get that if we can.

Mr. SYMON. -

What we want is uniformity. If, for instance, in the case of an income tax, it were provided that the residents in Victoria should pay 10 per cent., you should not be able to apply an income tax of 50 per cent. to the inhabitants of Western Australia holding property in Victoria. And so, in regard to residents, there should also be uniformity, so that if you have a condition of residence it must apply equally, whether the applicant for privileges resides in the state conferring those privileges or in another state. The condition seems to me as plain as possible, and that is what Mr. O'Connor intended to convey. Of course, you cannot prevent any state levying an absentee tax, or prevent it imposing conditions with regard to taking up land, but you should prevent it from imposing differential conditions with regard to the citizens of one state as compared with the conditions which you apply to the citizens of another state.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I beg to move—

That there be inserted at the beginning of Mr. Symon's new clause the following words:—"Every subject of the Queen resident in any state or part of the Commonwealth shall be entitled in any other state or part of the Commonwealth to all the privileges and immunities to which he would be entitled if a subject of the Queen resident in the latter state or part of the Commonwealth."

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Cannot you reverse the mode, and say that the person outside the state shall not be subject to greater disabilities than a person in such state?

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I think that Sir George Turner has exactly bit the nail on the head. The form of expression used in Mr. O’Connor's amendment is affirmative, and it operates too widely. I would suggest therefore that, as we have all a common obj

There shall be no discrimination by state laws based on residence or citizenship in another state.

That would attain the purpose exactly, and it would allow Sir John Forrest at the same time to have his law with, regard to Asiatics not being able to obtain miners' rights in Western Australia. There is no discrimination there based on residence or citizenship; it is simply based upon colour and race. It would also prohibit a law like that of the state of Maine, in the United States, alluded to by Mr. O'Connor, to the effect that a resident of an adjoining state should not be allowed to sue for damages in Maine for any want of repair of roads. What we want is to get a negative prohibition for the purpose of securing free intercourse between the various states. We want, as I understand it, to prohibit any discrimination which is based upon a false principle; and if you say that there shall be no discrimination made by state laws based upon residence or citizenship in another state I think that would answer the purpose. It is a form of expression which is preferable to the affirmative form used in Mr. O’Connor's proposal.

Mr. WISE. -

If you had a colony like Northern Queensland, where coloured labour is employed, you could not exclude them.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That would not be a discrimination based on residence or citizenship in another state.
Mr. WISE. -

It might be.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No, it would be based on colour. We want a discrimination based on colour. With regard to Dr. Quick's amendment, I would point out that we want to give the Federal Parliament power to dictate its own terms as to citizenship, but this is a distinct subject, and we should not mix up the subject of discrimination with citizenship of the Commonwealth. I think we need not have the two in the same clause. I would suggest to my honorable and learned friend (Mr. O'Connell), who appears to have charge of the amendment, that he should put the proposal in a negative form, such as I have suggested.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

Of course we only want to arrive at a conclusion on this subject which will be satisfactory to all. The suggestion of Sir George Turner, as embodied in the form of words suggested by Mr. Higgins, puts the matter negatively, and we have asked for it to be put affirmatively. It is a matter of indifference to us how it is put, so long as the common object we all have is secured. I think, if Mr. Higgins will allow me to say so, that the better form will be the following:-

No citizen of a state shall be subject in any other state to a disability or discrimination not equally applicable to the citizens of such other state.

I prefer this form of words to the form suggested by Mr. Higgins, because his is more general.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

A few days ago, when clause 110 was under discussion, the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) made a suggestion which, I think, would meet the case entirely. I raised the question of absentee taxation when I spoke yesterday in regard to the proposition of the honorable and learned member (Dr. Quick). Mr. Glynn's amendment read thus:-

A state shall not deny to the citizens of other states the privileges and immunities of its own citizens.

I believe that that is exactly the provision which the committee desires, and I would suggest that the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) should bring forward his amendment again.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I think that the suggestion made by the honorable, and learned member (Mr. Symon) will do very well if the word

"citizen" is altered as I have suggested to the words "subject of the Queen resident in a state." The amendment which the honorable and learned member has now drawn up, though it may have to be recast afterwards, will, I think, meet the present occasion, and to allow him to move it, I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. O'Connor's amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Symon's proposed new clause was, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I adopt with gratitude the suggestions of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner and of the honorable and learned members (Mr. Isaacs and Mr. Higgins), and, with the consent of the committee, I will ask leave to substitute this motion for that which I have already made. I beg to move-

That the following words stand a clause of the Bill:-

No subject of the Queen resident in any state shall be subject in any other state to any disability or discrimination not equally applicable to the subjects of the Queen in such other state.

The clause was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The next question the committee have to consider is the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's proposed amendment of clause 118.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

Clause 118 provides that the seat of the Commonwealth Government shall be determined by the Federal Parliament. I think, however, that it would be wise to take care that, wherever the seat of government may be fixed, the federal authority shall have absolute control over it. Therefore, I propose to declare that it shall be within federal territory. I do not know that there can be any objection to this proposal, and I would leave it entirely to the Federal Parliament to say what the area of the federal territory should be. I therefore beg to move-

That after the word "Parliament," in clause 118 the words "and shall be within federal territory" be inserted.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Make it 100 square miles.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

I am delighted that our right honorable friend has proposed this. It may perhaps be within the recollection of honorable members that I made a somewhat similar suggestion in Adelaide. At that time my suggestion was thought to be premature, but now that we have had three sessions, seeing how prejudiced some persons are against leaving this matter without some such provision, I trust that the motion will be carried unanimously.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

On the previous occasion when this matter was under discussion I moved a motion in regard to the fixing of the site of the federal capital, which was not pressed to, a vote. I now beg to move—

That the amendment be amended by the addition of the words "and within the colony of New South Wales."

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I shall have to move another amendment substituting "New South Wales" for "Victoria."

Mr. LYNE. -

Honorable members can laugh as they please, but I am going to press the amendment to a division. It is unnecessary for me to make a long speech. I have very little doubt in my own mind as to what the opinion of honorable members is in regard to this matter. I certainly think, however, that the Constitution should make some provision in regard to the location of the federal capital. I was never more satisfied of anything in my life than I am that, if the Constitution comes into force without a provision to the effect that the site of the federal capital must be within New South Wales, the federal capital never will be within New South Wales. I think it is as well to face this question at once, so that we may know who is in favour of having the federal capital in the mother colony, and who is against it. I consider that New South Wales is, beyond all argument, entitled to have the federal capital within its borders, and it is as well that we should know who are against this.

Mr. HOLDER. -

You will not find that out by taking a vote now.

Mr. LYNE. -

I think that we shall find it out pretty well. I think that any one who votes against the insertion of this provision may be considered as intending to vote hereafter against the locating of the federal capital within New South Wales.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

No.

Mr. LYNE. -

Well, I do not care for professions without acts.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

I might as well move that the site of the federal capital be Ballarat.

Mr. LYNE. -

I have no doubt that you would be more likely to carry that proposal than I am to carry my amendment.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

This is not the place in which to move such a proposal.
Mr. LYNE. -
I think that Ballarat would receive more votes than any place in New South Wales.

Mr. WISE. -
If it would be federal territory?

Mr. LYNE. -
Yes. It is a very simple thing to convert any part of a state into federal territory, and I have no doubt that the opportunity would be embraced by the people of Ballarat with great pleasure.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
We should have to buy the place first.

Mr. LYNE. -
It is all very well for honorable members to say that they are in favour of establishing the capital in some part of New South Wales hereafter, but that they will not vote for it now; but I think that we should decide the question at once. I regret exceedingly that I was overpersuaded on another occasion, and did not press my amendment to a vote. On this occasion, however, I will do so.

Mr. DOBSON. -
You are doing absolute harm to the colony of New South Wales.

Mr. LYNE. -
I do not think so. I am accustomed, to be the judge of my own actions, and I will be so now. I am as satisfied as that I am standing here that unless this provision is inserted in the Constitution the federal city will not be within New South Wales, at any rate not unless Queensland joins the Federation.

Mr. DOBSON. -
I shall vote for Ballarat.

Mr. LYNE. -
I have not the slightest doubt that you will. I think that most of the Tasmanians will vote for Ballarat, and that the majority of the South Australian representation will. I do not know what the erratic Western Australians will do-anything that will suit them at the moment. I think that, in justice to New South Wales, and as a matter of duty, I am called upon to propose this amendment at the present time.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -
Having regard to the old proverb that coming events cast their shadows before, one cannot help feeling a considerable amount of sympathy for the leader of the opposition-I mean the honorable member (Mr. Lyne)-for the position in which he finds himself.

Mr. LYNE. -
I do not want your sympathy.

Mr. WISE. -

I extend it to the honorable member most cordially, whether he wishes for it or not. I remember that, in 1891, at the first meeting of the Convention, a gentleman who is the avowed leader now of the opponents of federation, and who was then hostile to it, sta

Mr. LYNE. -

That is not true.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The honorable member is not in order in imputing an untruth to the honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise).

Mr. LYNE. -

Mr. Chairman

[P.1804] starts here

The CHAIRMAN. -

I will not hear the honorable member. I must ask him to withdraw his interjection.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

Surely I can put myself in order by withdrawing. I think that your ruling, sir, is rather extreme. I do not wish to do anything disorderly, but when I heard a statement made which was not borne out by what I recollected of the facts, I interjected, perhaps rather hurriedly, that it was not true. What I meant to say was that, so far as I recollected, the statement was absolutely incorrect.

Mr. WISE. -

I accept the disclaimer of the honorable gentleman of the desire to impute any wilful inaccuracy to me, but I maintain that my statement was substantially correct, and that the bombshell thrown into the Convention of 1891 was a proposal to the effect that the site of the federal capital should be fixed by the Convention, and not left to the Federal Parliament to determine. I care not that there was some slight difference as to the place for the capital. The motion was the same. I do not know whether the intention was the same, but the effect will be the same. So far as one representative for New South Wales can do so, and perhaps one may speak with authority equal to that of any other, I utterly repudiate this idea. I have as much knowledge of the feelings of the Convention as the honorable member (Mr. Lyne), and perhaps more, and I am sure that there is no attempt whatever to exclude New South Wales from possessing the capital. So far as I can judge, the feeling of the Convention is all the other way.
HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. WISE. -

I believe that, if we were at liberty now, having regard to the obligations we owe to our constituents, to take a vote upon this question—and we certainly ought not to do so unless there is a strong feeling upon every side—there would be an overwhelming vote in favour of the mother colony. I also repudiate the idea that this vote will indicate the feelings of honorable members on this question. It will do no such thing. I do not know what will be done by my colleagues, but I shall certainly not vote in the division.

Mr. LYNE. -

You are not game, that is the reason.

Mr. WISE. -

The honorable member knows I have not got a reputation for any lack of gameness.

Mr. LYNE. -

I do not know anything of the kind, nor anybody else.

Mr. WISE. -

I have a strong conviction that the motion is ill-timed. Having that conviction, I shall be acting contrary to the intention of those who sent me here if I occupy a position which might have the effect of damaging the favorable consideration of this Bill elsewhere, and which ought not to have the effect of damaging in any degree the manner in which the Bill will be received in New South Wales. Sir George Turner's amendment has put it beyond all doubt that there is no idea of having Melbourne as the capital of the Federation. Mr. Lyne informed the people of New South Wales, a week or a fortnight ago, that there was a plot in this Convention to make Melbourne the capital.

Mr. LYNE. -

I never said so.

Mr. WISE. -

It was so reported.

Mr. LYNE. -

It was never so reported; the honorable member ought to be a little more careful.

Mr. WISE. -

I was referring to an interview with the honorable gentleman published in the Sunday Times, in which the honorable member was reported to have said that there was a plot, and that the capital was going to be in Melbourne.
Mr. LYNE. -
I said it was to be in Victoria-Ballarat.

Mr. WISE. -
Melbourne was the place reported.

Mr. LYNE. -
I never said so.

Mr. WISE. -
Then I am glad the honorable member was misreported.

Mr. LYNE. -
The statement was not published; it was not misreported.

Mr. WISE. -
Then my recollection is at fault. But the same statement was made in a leading article in the Daily Telegraph the next day. Sir George Turner's amendment has put it beyond all doubt that the capital is not to be in Melbourne or Sydney. It has put it beyond doubt that neither of those large towns will be the site of the capital. It is unnecessary to go into the reasons for that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Is Ottawa federal territory?

Mr. WISE. -
I am not sure; but I know Toronto was not in the old days of the Union, and Parliament House in Toronto was burnt down because the state and the municipality both refused to render any assistance.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Were they insured?

Mr. WISE. -
I hope this motion will not be taken seriously, and I hope it will be made clear throughout the length and breadth of Australia that whatever vote is given has no significance whatever as indicating the feeling of this Convention upon the question of the site of the future capital.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -
I wish to make a few remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I would remind the honorable member that I have to report this Bill shortly to the whole House, and I will not have an opportunity of going through it.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
At the request of the Chairman, I shall not proceed with my remarks.
Question—That Mr. Lyne's amendment be agreed to—put.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The "Noes" have it.

Mr. LYNE. -

I call for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. -

There were no Ayes.

Mr. LYNE. -

I gave my voice with the Ayes.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I heard no voice with the Ayes.

Mr. LYNE. -

I beg your pardon. I said "Aye" as distinctly as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. -

According to the standing orders under which we are sitting, there can be no division unless there is more than one "Aye." The standing order is 374.

Mr. LYNE. -

I think surely there should be fair play. I gave my voice with the Ayes.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I will put the question again, and if there is not more than one "Aye" there can be no division.

Question again put.

Mr. PEACOCK (Victoria). -

I beg to move—

That the following words be inserted:-"and within the colony of Victoria."

Mr. Lyne has made a statement here, as a member of this Convention, that it is the determination of honorable members, so far as their opinions are concerned, that they have settled beforehand that the capital is to be in Victoria. I do not believe it. I do not believe this is the proper place to decide the question, but I want to test the opinions of the members of the Convention as to whether it is their desire that the capital should be in Victoria.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

It is very evident to all those who have heard the speech of Mr. Peacock that this is done for a purpose.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

I have taken you at your word.

Mr. LYNE. -

It is being done for the purpose of trying to detract from the vote which has just been given. There is no doubt about that. It is not intended to be a conscientious vote.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

It is just as conscientious as the vote the honorable member just gave.

Mr. LYNE. -

Then the honorable member is very anxious that the capital should be in Victoria, because I was very anxious that it should be fixed to be in New South Wales.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

So am I that it should be in Victoria.

Mr. LYNE. -

Any one who attributes anything else to me is very much mistaken.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
I am anxious that it should be in Victoria, but this is not the place to decide the question.

Mr. LYNE. -

I am of opinion that this is the place to settle the question, and for that reason I have forced it to a division. I still think I am right. It has been stated that I said to a reporter in Sydney that it was intended by this Convention to have the capital in Melbourne. I regret that the gentleman who made that statement did not adhere more closely to fact. Unfortunately, he does not always do so. I think he gets a little excited at times. He becomes more excited than he should.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

At the time of the adjournment for lunch I was giving the reason why I considered that this was an opportune time at which to decide in what colony the federal capital should be situated. I think that in the interests of the colony I represent that should be done, more especially as we are proposing to federate without our natural ally, Queensland. If Queensland was in, or was likely to come into the Federation there would be a chance of justice being done to New South Wales in the matter of the federal capital.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

I object to that. What do you mean by justice?

Mr. LYNE. -

I mean exactly what the word expresses. I think it justice to New South Wales, as being the mother colony and the wealthiest colony in the group, to place the federal capital within her territory. I cannot see why there should be any objection to dealing with the matter now. I cannot see why those honorable members, who showed by their demonstrations a little before lunch that they were in favour of the federal capital being in New South Wales, should object to saying so by their votes at the present time. On the other hand, if honorable members are in favour of the federal capital being in any other colony, the honest and straightforward course is to say so now. It is not fair, it is not honest, it is not just, for any of the states to leave this question as a matter of doubt, because, being a matter of doubt, you may take my word for it that it is a matter of danger.

Mr. BROWN. -

We have heard that before.

Mr. LYNE. -

It is as well that the honorable member should hear it more than once. The danger must be apparent to all. For what reasons do my honorable friends (Mr. Brown and Mr. Douglas) wish to have the matter deferred? Surely they do not anticipate that the federal capital is going to be in Tasmania.

[P.1807] starts here

Mr. BROWN. -

It is not impossible.

Mr. LYNE. -

It is next to impossible. What reasons can the honorable members who represent Western Australia give for refusing to vote now?

Mr. VENN (Western Australia). -

We will not vote under compulsion.

Mr. LYNE. -

Do they want the federal capital at Perth or Fremantle?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No, at Coolgardie.

Mr. LYNE. -

Probably; but they have no sufficient justification for refusing to give their votes now. Then there are the representatives of South Australia. Unless they desire to see the federal capital in Adelaide, what honesty is there in with-holding their votes?

Mr. SYMON. -

We do desire to see it in Adelaide, but our desires are not always accomplished.

Mr. LYNE. -

If talking to the Convention would do it the honorable member might succeed. I have not counted the number of speeches the honorable member has made, but the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest took that trouble, and he gave him the palm as being the principal talker in the whole Convention. Since then the honorable member has well maintained his reputation.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -

I desire to ask, Mr. Chairman, if the honorable member is in order in addressing the Convention on the question of whether the federal capital should be in New South Wales? That has already been decided, and the question before the committee is that the federal capital should be in Victoria.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The honorable member is not in order in advocating that the federal capital should be in New South Wales when the committee have negatived that proposition.

Mr. LYNE. -
I have said all that I wanted to say on the subject. Although I was wandering, perhaps, from the strict rule under the South Australian standing orders, still, one proposition is so linked with another that it is very difficult to refrain from referring to any of the colonies. It was stated by the Hon. Mr. Wise that I had said that there was a plot in the Convention to place the federal capital in Melbourne. I denied that at the time, and I regret the honorable member made the assertion, because it is not in accordance with facts. What I did say, and what I believe, is that if a straight-out vote were taken in the Convention now, the federal capital would be in Victoria, and at Ballarat.

Mr. WISE. -
You never mentioned Ballarat at all.

Mr. LYNE. -
The honorable member is as correct as he is usually.

Mr. WISE. -
I challenge you to produce the report.

Mr. LYNE. -
What I say cannot be contradicted. The honorable member can appeal to the reporter to whom I spoke if he likes. What was reported I do not know. I have not been able to find the paper. A strong feeling exists in another colony on this subject, and it was for that reason I submitted my motion. The honorable member had no right to make the assertion he did make. He said also that he sympathized with me in the course I was taking. Thank heaven, his sympathy is not worth much. It is the sympathy of a party of one-of himself alone.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
What has that to do with federation?

Mr. LYNE. -
I have a right to reply to the honorable member. He made reference to his sympathy. I do not wish for his sympathy, nor have I ever had it. He would not offer it to me now excepting with a double meaning. I am reminded of a statement I once heard when a reference was made to him.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Is this in order?

Mr. LYNE. -
I think it is. When an honorable member attacks me I have a right to reply.

Mr. DOBSON. -
You have stated two or three times that you do not want his sympathy; why not let us get on?
Mr. LYNE. -

These interruptions will not affect me. I have heard the honorable member described by a man whom he very much admires as a gentleman who could not sit long in one place. That description was very apt and very good. The honorable member's mind travels with his body. It does not remain very long in one groove. I only wish to say further that I recognise that the Hon. Mr. Peacock has not submitted this motion with a view of getting a true expression of opinion upon, it or with a hope that it will be carried. The public outside will be able to see exactly what his motive is. I do not think that that motive will be indorsed by any large section of the community. The honorable member casts, or attempts to cast, ridicule in a small way on the proposal I submitted. I was in earnest in what I said and did, and I had ample justification. In my opinion, the federal capital should be placed in the colony which I represent.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I only wish to say-

Several HONORABLE MEMBERS. - Divide!

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We have only two days in which to finish this part of our work.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, and the whole of this proceeding is the most pitiable misuse of the time of the Convention that has ever taken place. It is utterly derogatory to the dignity and position of the Convention. I intend to vote against the motion. If a similar motion is brought forward on behalf of South Australia, I shall not walk out of the chamber; I shall vote against it, and for this reason, that this is neither the time nor the place, as we decided a week or two ago, for the determination of this question.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Nor have we any commission to decide it.

Mr. SYMON. -

No; and it is necessary that some one should express this view in no hesitating manner. The honorable member who has justsat down said that the Hon. Mr. Wise's conduct reminded him of something. His conduct reminds me of the nursery rhyme:-

There was a little girl who had a little curl,
Right in the middle of her forehead,
And, when she was good, was very, very good,
And, when she was bad, she was horrid.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I should like to say one or two words on this subject before the division is taken. I have not been in the habit of taking up too much of the time of the Convention, considering the duties that are imposed upon me. I wish to add two or three words in approbation of what Mr. Symon has said. I take the same position entirely as he takes on this question. From 1891 down to the present moment it has been recognised by the representatives of the various colonies that it does not rest with them to choose the capital of the Commonwealth, and that a free people, through their free Parliament, should choose their own capital. That is the position I have always occupied in regard to this matter, and that has been the position of every Convention.

Mr. SYMON. -

And Mr. Lyne practically assented to it the other day when he withdrew his call for a division.

Mr. LYNE. -

Nothing of the kind.

Mr. BARTON. -

If any part of Australia or Tasmania were proposed specifically as the place for the capital of the Commonwealth, I should vote against the proposal, and I should expect the whole Convention except the mover to vote with me. I think it is quite out of place to make proposals of this kind; and when we know they are absolutely condemned to defeat, we are not

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I rose before to speak on this point, and, in deference to your wish, Mr. Chairman, I resumed my seat, but, in view of what has since transpired, I desire to say now what I would have said then, namely, that I think the proposal to put the capital in any of the colonies by this Convention, is neither calculated to improve the prospects of federation, nor the prospects of that colony of ultimately securing the capital. So that from both points of view it is extremely unwise, not to say unpatriotic. I personally determined, before I was elected to this Convention, that I would not vote for any proposal to place the capital anywhere by a specific provision in the Constitution. I said that to the electors, and I believe most of the candidates in Victoria said the same thing, believing that the selection of the capital of the Commonwealth is a matter of legislation in the interests of the Commonwealth, and not a matter that ought to be in the Constitution. I shall therefore vote against this proposal to place the capital in Victoria, not because at the present moment I am prepared to say it ought not to be in Victoria, but on the same ground as I voted against placing the capital in New South Wales, namely, because I thought this Convention is not constructed on the right lines to settle questions of that character.

Mr. HOLDER. -

And we have no authority to do it.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I do not know that. It seems to me that the Convention has authority to do anything it chooses as far as putting together a Constitution is concerned; but it would be extremely unwise, and, I venture to say, unpatriotic, to do anything of the kind. I say that it would be unpatriotic to do so, because it would be prejudicial to federation; and it does seem to me that any proposal to do it here would, rather than be an effort to obtain an expression of opinion as to where the capital ought to be, have the effect of evoking an expression of opinion that would injure federation. I feel strongly on this point, and I feel that I would not be doing my duty unless I said so. I desire the federation of the colonies, and for that reason I wish to leave to the Parliament every question of legislation in the interests of the Commonwealth. Therefore I wish not to be misunderstood. When I voted against the capital being placed in New South Wales, it was not because my mind is made up that New South Wales is an improper place for the capital of the Commonwealth to be in; and when I vote against the placing of the capital in Victoria, as I shall do if a division is taken, it will not be because my mind is made up at present that Victoria is not a proper place for the capital of the Commonwealth; but because, in my opinion, this Convention ought not to pass any resolution on the point. I shall oppose any such proposal by every means in my power.

Mr. PEACOCK (Victoria). -

I desire to say that I certainly never would have moved my amendment but for the tactics that have been adopted. I hold the same views as most members of the Convention on this question. I have always been of opinion that the determination of the place where the capital of the Commonwealth is to be should be left to the Federal Parliament, but now an honorable member representing another colony has brought forward a proposal with regard to New South Wales, I feel it to be my duty to submit this amendment, and ask the members of the Convention to vote against it. If another honorable member will go with me I will take a division on the amendment, in order to show the people of Australia that the Convention is determined that this question shall not be settled here, and that it is a matter purely for the Federal Parliament to decide. I am determined to show the people of Australia the tactics that have been adopted on this question.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -
I am absolutely out of sympathy with this move in every way, and I think that it will do nothing but bring this Convention into disrepute.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
Which move?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I was alluding to the proposal that the capital of the Commonwealth should be in the territory of New South Wales. That question had been absolutely settled already, and when we are trying to save time in order to bring our labours to a speedy conclusion it seemed to me almost childish to introduce it here.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

I hope that this Convention will not agree to the proposal to add to clause 118 the words "and shall be within the federal territory," and I take the same broad ground which has been enunciated by the leader of the Convention. I use his own words, in which he said he would vote against any proposal to establish the capital of the Commonwealth in any place, because he preferred to leave the matter to the free Parliament of a free people to have its free choice. Now, you will distinctly be taking away from that free Parliament a free choice if you carry this proposal. You at once put outside the range of choice all the great capital cities of Australia. I do object to tying the hands of the Federal Parliament in such a fashion as that. Why should we assume that we have all the wisdom of the world in regard to the proper choice of a federal capital? There is absolutely no necessity to have this site on federal territory. It may be open to very good argument in favour of having it on federal territory, but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that very good argument may be used against having the federal capital dissociated from those centres of trade and commerce and culture which exist in Australia. I, for one, look at the example which the United States has afforded us as one not worthy of being copied—to establish the capital almost in the wilderness, away from where commercial men, professional men, men of education, are wont to congregate, away from where their business keeps them together, and to set the affairs of the State, forsooth, to be conducted in some far distant place, where there are not those surroundings of civilization which tend to make life pleasant or to make society happy. I think that one of the results of establishing the capital of the United States at Washington, has been largely to divorce from political life some of the best elements of the community. We do not want to copy a mistake of that character. Let us contemplate for one moment the establishment of a federal capital, as has been proposed in some places, in the interior of Australia. There are many who advocate its establishment there on the ground that it will be easily defended.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Too hot.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I do not say that all propositions in regard to this Constitution emanate from within the walls of this chamber, but it has been seriously proposed that the federal capital should be established in the interior of Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Only by lunatics.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

We can imagine, then, the establishment of the Federal High Court there, because it will have to hold its chief sittings in the federal capital. You will require a bar to attend there, and I undertake to say that almost for a century to come the leading members of the bar will be found practising their profession in the capital cities of the various colonies, and for litigants to engage a bar to attend to their cases in some distant so-called federal capital will mean to penalize litigants to an enormous extent before the Federal High Court. Again, take the class of men who will be eligible for election to the Federal Parliament which must sit in that federal territory. Men must go far away from their homes, far away from the society they are accustomed to.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That must apply to some, any way.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

It will not apply to so large an extent.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

If it sits at Sydney it will apply to all the Melbourne people.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

Not to the same extent. I can assure the honorable member that the ground can be largely cut from under his feet in that respect. If it is in federal territory away from these cities it conveniences no one; it inconveniences every one. You will be largely handing over politics to political adventurers if you isolate the Federal Parliament from all the populous centres of Australia. You will not find men largely engaged in commerce, men largely engaged in professional pursuits, men who have large interests to look after in the various centres-you will not find these men willing to give up a large proportion of their time each year to go into the wilderness of Australia. Sir John Forrest says that the same thing will apply if we have the capital established in any leading city.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Why not?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

It will apply to some extent, but not to the extent that it would apply in the case I have just cited. Nearly all men engaged in mercantile pursuits or commercial pursuits can to some extent be conducting their business in whatever city they may be, can establish a branch business there; and a lawyer, a doctor, or an engineer will always find scope for the practice of his profession in any of the great cities of Australia, but he will not find that scope if he has to go to a little town in the bush. As it is a matter which is fairly open to argument, and as the Convention has resisted doing anything which would locate the federal capital at all, on the ground of consistency, do not do that which at once by a negative vote says that the capital shall b adoption of the Constitution? I can assure honorable members that whilst men may be slightly inclined to view with favour the Constitution, in view of the fact that Sydney is not selected, they will go into open antagonism to the Constitution when they find that by express enactment the claims of the city of Sydney are absolutely to be shut out. Those claims can only be appreciated by those who look at the fact that in the city of Sydney you have the first capital of Australia, the mother city of Australia—a city whose claims are regarded by its citizens, and many of the people of Australia, as standing on higher grounds than the claims of any other city. I do not want to urge the Convention to pass a vote in favour of the claims of one part of the colony over another part, or of one, part of Australia over another part, but I do say that nothing should be done now which will prejudice the free choice by a free Parliament of a free people of a site for the capital, when the time comes for that selection to be made.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -
I agree with, I think, every word that Mr. Carruthers has uttered, and my only regret is that when the narrower view was taken, and it was sought to interfere with the free choice of a free people, he was found endeavouring to fix the location of the federal capital.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
Yes, but I only quoted Mr. Barton.

Mr. BARTON. -
You spoke very strongly in favour of the view you thought I expressed.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -
I listened to the honorable gentleman with great attention, and with quite as much interest as attention, when he laid down what I think is an absolutely true principle—that it should be left to the free choice of a free people; and in the face of that statement I regret that he was a party to producing so much of this discussion, and to endeavouring to provide that it should not be left to the free choice of a free people. I follow my honorable friend entirely in his later and broader view, which I am willing to believe was his view throughout, but which he had not the consistency at the moment to advocate. I have no fear of the dangers which the founders of the American Commonwealth anticipated through the federal capital being a central city. We can understand very well in this Convention that there was no reason for it. The Convention has met in Adelaide, it has met in Sydney, and now it is meeting in Melbourne; and I would like to ask any honorable member whether the locality where the meetings of the Convention were being held has had the slightest effect on the mind of any honorable member? It may have been beneficial. The changing of the locality is distinctly beneficial, because we have seen in many instances that the removal of honorable members from the more immediate influences that ordinarily surround them has developed a breadth of view which the limitations of home might have prevented. But apart from that, I would like to know what honorable member has been in any way influenced by his local surroundings where the meeting of the Convention was held in one place or in another, or has not conscientiously and thoroughly adhered to what he thought to be fair and right, quite apart from the place where it happened to be meeting? I think, therefore, the question of whether the federal capital should or should not be in a city is a matter of no consequence; but, following the last expressed view of my honorable friend (Mr. Carruthers), that this should be the free choice by a free people, I object to the amendment which has been moved.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I think it would be a great mistake for the Convention to attempt to locate the federal capital anywhere, but, on the other hand, I see no objection, but every advantage, in laying down a broad general principle, which is done by the amendment of Sir George Turner. A broad principle, I think, is necessary for the well-being of the Federation, and it is simply this: That wherever it is located the Federal Parliament is to be master in its own house, and not subject to the conflicting authority of any municipality or any other form of state government.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I think the principle we have to adopt is that wherever there is full power given with full discretion to the Federal Parliament, to leave that power to work out itself. Many of us may believe that no capital city of Australia ought to be the federal capital. Many of us may believe that it ought to be federal territory. But, at the present time, this does look like a side-blow at any attempt to make any city the federal capital, and while many of us might be against that, we would resent altogether an attempt to dictate to the Federal Parliament in a matter of this kind. It is just one of those questions on which it is not possible at the present time for us to give an opinion. It is a matter which will be surrounded by various circumstances and conditions, and before the Commonwealth is formed there may be many reasons to alter the views we have at present. It seems to me, from every possible point of view, that it is better to leave the Federal Parliament to decide according to its own discretion and entirely untrammelled.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I am very much in accord with the proposal of Sir George Turner. It seems to me that the Federal Parliament we desire to constitute must have some habitation, and to locate it in one of the larger towns or cities of Australia would have one effect, at any rate, which, as far as I am able to gather, is not desired; it would lessen altogether the prestige of that colony. For instance, if we had the Federal Parliament and the Governor-General in Melbourne, we would have two Parliaments, perhaps within a stone's throw of one another, carrying on their business. We would have the Governor-General out on the hill there, and the Lieutenant-Governor somewhere else. The thing would be absurd. The state would be disparaged altogether. There are a great many here who are very much afraid that the dignity of the states will be imperilled when we have a Federal Constitution. I think, if there is one thing which would tend to lessen their importance and dignity, it would be to have the Federal Parliament and the Governor-General in the same place as the local Parliament. The local Government would be altogether over-shadowed by the Federal Government. I should very much like to see a new city erected in some suitable place, where we could all go in summer. It ought to be a cool place; indeed, the coolest place in Australia. It ought to be a place where we could build a federal city, looking forward with great ideas in our minds to the future. It ought to be a place where a city could be laid out which would be the admiration not only of the present but of future generations. I cannot help remembering that the lands of this territory, in the early days of the Federal Constitution, would be a source of great revenue. I should like to see it inserted in the Bill that the federal area should not be less than 100 square miles. No doubt, as Mr. Carruthers has said, such a federal territory might cause inconvenience at first, but this inconvenience would disappear as time went on. It would, no doubt, be inconvenient for the Sydney people to come to Melbourne, for South Australians to go to Sydney or Brisbane, or for the Western Australian representatives to come to the east. But these difficulties we have foreseen from the beginning, and I do not think they would get greater, but less, as time goes on. We have the examples presented by Washington and Ottawa, and I have never heard that there has been any desire to change what was adopted by the American people or the Canadian people. I hope, therefore, that the proposal will be carried. I do not see how it would be possible to have a Federal Parliament unless it be situated on some territory over which it would have control. If the seat of the Federal Government were in Melbourne, the very Parliament House would have to be inside state territory, and there could be no federal army or police.

Mr. KINGSTON. - And the federal territory would be subject to state laws?

Sir JOHN FORREST. - And it would be subject to state laws.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). - This amendment is a declaration that the federal capital should not be any already established town or city.

Mr. DEAKIN. - Unless the state is willing to cede it.

Mr. SYMON. - Then there is no necessity whatever for putting the provision in the Constitution.

Mr. FRASER. - Hear, hear; that is the point.

Mr. SYMON. - I intend to vote against the amendment, and I take exactly the view expressed by Mr. Carruthers, Sir John Downer, and Mr. McMillan. The intention of the Convention is to leave the choice of the federal capital to the Federal Parliament unlimited and unrestricted. To whatever extent the amendment goes it is a limitation in that direction. I agree with every word Sir John Forrest has said as to the undesirability—in fact, the impossibility—of choosing a site for the federal capital. I also agree with Sir John Forrest entirely as to the necessity of having the federal capital set apart. But the Federal Parliament is perfectly competent to do that, why should we, when we are disclaiming all intention of interfering with the Federal Parliament, seek to interfere with it in this apparently slight respect? The Federal Parliament would surely be perfectly competent to deal with the matters referred to. At any rate, if we do leave these matters to the Federal Parliament, let us leave them free of all restrictions, direct or indirect. For this Convention to peace any restriction would be to derogate from the position we have already taken up.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). - I quite agree with Mr. Carruthers that the hand of the Federal Parliament should not be forced. There is no provision in the American Constitution putting a ban on state capitals. At the time the American Constitution was drawn provision was made that the capital was not to be within any of the states, but should be on territory ceded by the various states. The object was not to get rid of the danger of any pressure from outside, but to get rid of the danger of the states interfering with the independence of the Federal Government. It was not until 1800 that the present city of Washington was fixed. It was then fixed as the result of a bribe by Hamilton to Virginia and Maryland. The fact was that Virginia and Maryland, when the proposition was made some years before that the debts should be amalgamated, raised the objection that their indebtedness was exceedingly small. The proposition of Hamilton was to pool all the debts without regard to excess or minimum, but Virginia and Maryland were promised by Hamilton that Washington would be placed on the banks of the Potomac. That was not the result of any policy to exclude capitals. Many writers have said that as the result of having Washington away from the direct influence of the public, and away from the opportunities which would be afforded to politicians of mixing with the professional, literary, and other classes, Washington has become the centre of political cliquism and a good deal of corruption. I hope the restriction will not be provided for in the Constitution. It would be impossible to get sufficient federal territory near to any of the present capitals, and the result of putting such a provision in the Constitution would not only be inexpedient generally, but would have the result of alienating a considerable number of city votes. It might have the effect, as some representatives of New South Wales have said—although I know Mr. Walker takes a different view—of a number of votes in Sydney being cast against the Constitution rather than for it. A similar result might occur in Melbourne. The American federal territory was granted about 1800 by Virginia and Maryland, at a time when the land had practically no value. I ask the Convention whether it would be likely to get the quantity of land necessary within 10 miles radius of any of the present Australian capitals? I say it would be impossible. Either a large sum would have to be paid for it, or it would have to be granted by the state, and both of these would be next to impossible. By passing the amendment of Sir George Turner the Convention would exclude Sydney and Melbourne, and probably Adelaide, from all chance of ever becoming the site of the Federal Government.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria).—

I find from Longman's Gazetteer of the World that Ottawa, the capital of Canada, is in the province of Ontario. It may be right or it may be wrong, but it is not provided that it should be on federal
Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

As has been pointed out, the voters of New South Wales may be embarrassed. An idea has been disseminated in New South Wales, and has found expression in the press, from what source I do not know, that Melbourne is to be the capital. There are a very large number of people in New South Wales who, from what has appeared in the public press, believe they would be specially prejudiced, and who would vote against the Bill if there were any chance of Melbourne becoming the capital of the Federation. Logically, I would be prepared to leave the matter to the Federal Parliament, who must declare the capital to be on federal territory. But, as a matter of tactics, I believe it would assist the passing of the Bill in New South Wales if the amendment of Sir George Turner were carried.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I shall support the amendment of Sir George Turner. We practically admitted the principle in clause 53. In that clause we have given exclusive powers to the Federal Parliament. We say that the Federal Parliament shall have, amongst other powers, the power to make laws in regard to "the government of any territory which, by the surrender of state or states, and the acceptance of the Commonwealth, becomes the seat of government of the Commonwealth." It must be borne in mind our position is absolutely different. In the United States they were seeking, as we are seeking, to make a Government of enumerated powers. In Canada the Commonwealth has absolute power to make laws, subject to restrictions expressly set forth, so that wherever the seat of government is the Government may exercise legislative power. But here we have to take territory in order to give the Commonwealth exclusive jurisdiction. It seems to me, therefore, that the course pursued in the United States is the one to pursue here, on account of the similarity of the Constitution we are endeavouring to frame, and the difference between our position and that of Canada.

Question-That the words "and shall be within federal territory" proposed to be added be so added-put.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
The clause as amended, was agreed to.
The Bill was then reported with amendments.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Before I move that the report be adopted I had better ask leave for the standing orders to be suspended, with a particular purpose. Under Standing Order 304 it is provided that-

At the close of the proceedings of a committee of the whole House on a Bill, the Chairman shall report the Bill forthwith to the House, and if amendments have been made thereto, a time shall be appointed for taking the report into consideration, and moving its adoption; and the Bill, as reported, shall, in the meantime, be printed.

So that, amendments having been made in the Bill, it would be necessary under the standing order I have read to appoint a future time for the consideration of the report. We should thus lose perhaps a day; so that I beg to move-

That the standing orders be suspended to enable the report of the committee to be taken into consideration forthwith.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
Before that motion is put I should like to know what opportunity is to be afforded to those who wish various clauses to be recommitted? If the report be adopted now there should be at the same time a motion to recommit.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
There will be. If we consider the report now an amendment can be moved for the recommittal of certain clauses. I have a number of amendments ready and printed, and I intend to move that the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of reconsidering the clauses in which I wish to move amendments. I suppose it will be competent for any honorable member to move to amend my motion by adding other clauses.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. -
I shall now put the question-
That the report be adopted;
and upon that motion it will be competent for the leader of the Convention to move an amendment for the recommittal of certain clauses.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-
That all the words after "That" be omitted, with a view of inserting the following words:-the Bill be recommitted in order to insert a new clause after clause 6 of the covering clauses; to amend clauses 10, 12, and 24; to omit clause 25, and insert a new clause 24A; to omit clause 26; to amend clause 27; to omit clause 28; to amend clause 29; to omit clause 42; to amend clause 44A, and insert new clause 44AA; to amend clause 52 by amending sub-section (12), and inserting new sub-section (31A); to amend clause 53; to omit the first paragraph of clause 56B; to insert in clause 73 new sub-section (7), and amend sub-section (8); to amend clauses 74, 77, 79, 80, and 83; to omit clause 86; to insert new clause 85A; to amend clauses 90 and 93; to amend clauses 95 B, C, and D, clause 99, and clause 101.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-
That the motion be amended by adding the following words:"Also for the purpose of adding words to clause 3, to insert words in clause 46, to add a paragraph at the end of clause 52, to omit sub-section (4) of clause 54, to insert a sub-section in clauses 73 and 74, and to add words to clause 101."

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I beg to move-
That the motion be further amended by the addition to the amendment of the following words "to amend clause 9," clause 24-

Mr. BARTON. -
I have moved the recommittal of clause 24.

Mr. ISAACS. -
But I understand that that is only for a particular purpose. Will the clause be open to amendment by any honorable member?

Mr. BARTON. -
I take it that it will. By the recommittal of the clause I shall acquire the right to propose an amendment in it, and I take it that every other honorable member will acquire the right to propose an amendment of my amendment, or to propose a different amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I would ask whether, when a clause is recommitted at the instance of an honorable member, for a particular purpose, it will be open to any honorable member to move any amendment upon that clause?

The PRESIDENT. -
I take it that it will be better, unless the Convention is afraid of opening up too much ground for argument, to simply recommit the Bill for the purpose of reconsidering certain clauses and certain new clauses, making no limitation in regard to the amendments it is intended to propose.

Mr. SYMON. -
I would point out that the Premier of New South Wales moved as an amendment the recommittal of certain clauses with a view to the addition of certain words. I presume that this limitation will be disregarded.

The PRESIDENT. -
That would depend upon the way in which the Convention asked me to put the amendment from the Chair. I shall put it in the largest form.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Then I need not ask specifically for the recommittal of clauses which have been mentioned by other honorable members?

The PRESIDENT. -
I propose to put it to the Convention that the clauses mentioned be recommitted, but where honorable members simply desire to reconsider a paragraph of a clause, I think it will suit the convenience of the Convention, as some of the clauses are very lengthy, if I simply put it that the clause be recommitted for the consideration of the paragraph.

Mr. BARTON. -
I take it that you will, sir, state the purpose for which it is proposed to recommit the clause, and that an honorable member will be able to move that the whole clause be thrown open to discussion.

The PRESIDENT. -
Where it is proposed to amend a clause by the insertion or the addition of certain words, I will put it that the clause be reconsidered, but where the suggestion is that a certain paragraph only shall be dealt with, I will put it that paragraph so-and-so of clause so-and-so be reconsidered.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I should like to point out that if a clause is recommitted simply to insert certain words, it does not matter what your opinion maybe, sir; the Chairman of Committees must be guided by the terms of the motion to recommit. If the recommittal of a clause is moved for the purpose of inserting certain words, when we get into committee we shall find ourselves in this position, that the Chairman, under the parliamentary rules, will feel that he is restrained from allowing any amendment except the specific amendment for which the clause was recommitted. I want it to be clearly understood that where clauses are recommitted they will be open to full is not what, I think, the Convention desires.

The PRESIDENT. -

It will depend upon the mode in which the motion is carried by the Convention as to how the clauses can be dealt with in committee. I propose to put the question-where the recommittal is not limited to a certain paragraph-in a general form, so that the whole clause may be open for reconsideration. The Chairman of Committees will not then be hampered as the honorable member suggests.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

It would be extremely inconvenient if a clause were recommitted for the purpose of dealing with a certain part of it, and, when we had made an amendment in that part, we found that that necessitated a consequential amendment in some other part which we were unable to make. For this reason, it seems to me advisable, where a clause is recommitted, to throw the whole of it open for discussion.

The PRESIDENT. -

There can be no doubt of the force of the honorable member's suggestion. At the same time, where it is merely proposed to recommit a paragraph of a clause, I think only that paragraph should be open for discussion, seeing that the various paragraphs deal with separate subjects. Where the motion is for the recommittal of a paragraph I do not propose to put the question that the clause be reconsidered, because that would be giving an opportunity for unnecessary discussion.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I think that, under the circumstances, I had better name the clauses which I desire to see recommitted. They are clauses 9, 24, 26-

Mr. BARTON. -
I have mentioned clause 24 generally.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes, but I want to mention it again, because I am not quite clear how this will be dealt with in committee. The clauses which I wish to have reconsidered are clauses 9, 24, 26, 27; clause 52, sub-sections (2), (3), (8), (22), (24). Then I want clause 52 to be recommitted for the purpose of reconsidering bounties, in case it should not come in under any of these particular sub-sections, with the power to put in a sub-section. It may, perhaps, be better to deal with it in clause 86B, but before I get to 86B there is clause-55. I only want to have that reconsidered with a view to the question of whether it shall be laws or proposed laws, which seems to be a very important matter. Then there is clause 56B.

Mr. BARTON. -
I have given notice to reconsider that.

Mr. ISAACS. -
But only for a certain purpose. Then there is clause 86B, to which I have already referred, also clauses 89, 92, 95A, 98, 121. Then there is clause 52, which we desire to have recommitted, with the view of dealing with the same subject as is raised by clause 95A, so that, if the committee thinks fit, we can give the Parliament power to make laws without reference to the railways. It is only the complement to recommitting 95A.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I want to amend the motion by inserting clauses 80 and 95B.

Mr. BARTON. -
I have given notice of those clauses.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
I wish to move that clauses 13 and 68 be recommitted.

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -
I wish to recommit clause 90, for the purpose of moving a new sub-section.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -
I wish to propose a new sub-section in clause 52 to stand as 23A-invalid and old-age pensions.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -
I wish to repropose clause 117A.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
I think we had better move that the whole Bill be recommitted.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
I have one or two clauses which I wish to amend, but, it seems to me, it will take along time to get rid of those already proposed. May I suggest to honorable members who propose amendments, and I shall be glad to follow the same course myself, that they should put their amendments in print? They should place the amendments on the notice-paper to-morrow. It is very easy for honorable members to get up and say I propose to amend a clause, but we may not know that he intends to amend it at all. I intend to ask leave to amend clause 45. My object is to allow Ministers of the Crown in the various states to be members of the Federal Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Will you put that in print?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It has been in print for several days. I also propose to strike out clause 56B, with a view to insert a new clause which has been on the paper for two or three weeks.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -
Is it not desirable that all these proposed amendments should be in print before we take them into consideration? It would be absurd for us to consider all these various clauses without any previous knowledge of what is proposed. We do not know in which direction the amendments will go, and we shall come here quite unprepared unless we have these documents before us so as to compare one alteration with another.

The PRESIDENT. -
That might be desirable and convenient; at the same time, the motions now being submitted are perfectly in order.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
I desire to have leave to propose a new clause, to follow clause 93.

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -
I would point out that this practically amounts to a reconsideration of the whole Bill. We have already been here for seven weeks; are we to be here for another seven weeks in order to enable honorable members to re-open questions that have been already decided?

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I rise to a point of order.

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -
I am perfectly in order.

Mr. REID. -
That is for the President to decide. What I desire to ask is, whether it is in order to interrupt honorable members in giving these notices? They are titled to give them, and if they assume any alarming proportions, it will be within the power of the Convention to strike out all those that they do not care to take.

Mr. BARTON. -

There are 31 already, in addition to the Drafting Committee's amendments.

The PRESIDENT. -

I think that Sir Richard Baker was perfectly in order in rising to speak to the question. Any honorable member may suggest the recommittal of any clause, and it is competent for any other honorable member to speak on the subject.

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -

I do not desire to say anything more.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I would ask the leader of the Convention if he is prepared to recommit the whole Bill? There are two clauses that I desire to have reconsidered- clauses 74 and 75.

Mr. BARTON. -

I propose a general recommittal of clause 74.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Consent to the recommittal of clause 75 also, and I will say no more.

Mr. BARTON. -

I cannot say what I will consent to yet. We are only now taking the course of indicating what the clauses, are that we desire to have recommitted.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

If an honorable member moves a motion now he may be held to have spoken on it.

Mr. BARTON. -

No; honorable members are simply intimating what clauses they desire to have recommitted. They are not proposing their amendments.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Apparently we are not bound by the rules of Parliament. There have been irregularities already.

The PRESIDENT. -

If there are any irregularities it is the duty of honorable members to call attention to them.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
It is unjust to make a statement of that kind. The Hon. Mr. Isaacs made an assertion, and I answered it.

The PRESIDENT. -

I will ask the honorable member to kindly take his seat. I do not think the honorable member will desire to persist in a remark of that sort, and I will ask him again to withdraw it.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Then I won't. I do not think you could have heard what Mr. Isaacs said.

The PRESIDENT. -

I would ask the honorable member to exhibit that respect to the Chair which generally characterizes him, and to withdraw the observation.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I am sure you are under a misapprehension. I attribute nothing whatever to you, or to the Chair. What I said was that, apparently, we were not bound by the rules of Parliament, although we agreed to follow the rules of Parliament at our first sitting. I am not one who would reflect on the Chair for a moment, and I at once withdraw any words I used that you rule to be out of order. I should be exceedingly sorry to have any disagreement with the Chair.

The PRESIDENT. -

It is absolutely unnecessary for the honorable member to say anything more.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I was asking whether honorable members, being bound by the rules of Parliament, would, if they gave notice of motion for the recommittal of a particular clause, be taken to have spoken, and whether they would have a right to speak again. I want to have clause 75 recommitted.

The PRESIDENT. -

I think I shall be studying the convenience of the Convention in allowing every latitude consistent with the discharge of business. That is the rule I have endeavoured to adhere to, as I recognise that our proceedings are governed by certain standing orders, with which four-fifths of the members of the Convention cannot be expected to be familiar.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I desire to move that clause 93 be recommitted.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I might intimate to honorable members who have not read the long notice I have caused to be distributed that the amendments it contains, with a very few exceptions, are little more than mere drafting amendments. They have been placed in the notice for recommit

The motion was amended accordingly.
Are we to understand that the motions we are considering will commit us to a reconsideration of all the clauses that have been mentioned, or is the question of what clauses shall be recommitted to be debated?

The matter is in the hands of the Convention. If they choose to sanction the recommittal of certain clauses they may do so. The motions may be put together or separately.

If we take each motion separately, and have to give our reasons for asking for the recommittal of each clause, we shall be kept here for a great length of time, because we should have to enter into the merits of the amendments we desire to submit. The better course would be to allow the clauses to be recommitted without debate.

I would point out that if these clauses are recommitted the committee will have the power of calling into force the standing order which enables any honorable member to move that the committee do now divide, when the discussion would be brought to a close. That would not, of course, be done under ordinary circumstances.

It is a distasteful thing to do.

Yes, and none of us would be likely to do it. I simply desire to point out that we will have the power in our own hands to stop the discussion.

What I fear is that we will not know what we are voting upon. A number of honorable members have intimated that they desire to amend certain clauses. If we knew what the nature of the amendments were we might reject the proposal for recommittal. I think it is too much to ask us to agree to the recommittal of a clause before we know what is the nature of the amendment to be proposed. That surely is not the procedure that is generally followed. If we saw the amendments we would know what to do.

We ought to have them in print by to-morrow morning.

Yes, but if we give leave to recommence now we may have to again discuss such Questions as the control of the rivers. That alone might occupy a week.
Surely you could not refuse to rediscuss that very important question.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I think, at any rate, honorable members ought to have an opportunity of saying whether they will allow the question to be re-opened or not, and they certainly will not have that opportunity if they vote on the motion for recommittal of a clause without any indication as to the nature of what is proposed.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -

I am not quite sure if it be competent to include in the instructions to the committee on this recommittal that they should consider first those amendments of which notice has already been given.

Mr. HOWE. -

They are nearly all in print.

Mr. BROWN. -

If that course were adopted the objections of Sir John Forrest would be met, and we could proceed with the business without any interruption. I hope there will be no suggestion of adjourning the business in order to have proposed amendments put in print, because we already have a certain amount of work with which we can proceed. If it is competent to instruct the committee in the way I have indicated so that the business may be carried on, I hope that that course will be adopted.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The standing orders have been suspended for the consideration of the report, or, rather, for the consideration of any amendment on the motion for report; but the instruction-will have to be the subject of a separate suspension of the standing orders, or, at any rate, a separate motion.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

As far as the Drafting Committee's amendments are concerned, they are, as the leader of the Convention has said, substantially, endeavours to carry out the known wishes of the Convention in a better way than they were previously expressed. There are two or three matters of substance, however, to which the attention of the Convention will be called. We suggest that the whole of the Drafting Committee's amendments should be taken together. As to whether that course is adopted" however, the Convention will please itself. But to say that an honorable member has only to state that he wants a clause to be recommitted, in order to get it recommitted, would be a very inexpedient course to take. Are we to go back into committee for the purpose of reconsidering a question over which we may spend days?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Not days.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Who can fix the limits of discussion when once we are started? Certainly not my right honorable friend.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The Convention can do so by moving that a division be taken.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Exactly; but that would be a most ungracious course—a course which it would be peculiarly inadvisable to adopt.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Is it not as bad to refuse to reconsider a clause which an honorable member desires to have reconsidered?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Any question of that kind can be just as well settled in the Convention as in committee, and in less time. If my honorable friends have fresh clauses to propose, or want certain clauses to be reconsidered, they can move accordingly in the Convention. There are substantially no new matters to be considered. It is only going over old ground again, and surely we have reached that stage when honorable members may fairly and justly be prevented from speaking more than once on the same subject, which is substantially all that is involved between taking matters in the Convention or going into committee. At this stage of the Convention, I think, we are justified in adopting the course I suggest in order to shorten the proceedings.

Mr. HOWE. -
It is all in the hands of the lawyers.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
If honorable members have fresh proposals to submit, they can tell the Convention so, and if the Convention thinks they are proper matters to be reconsidered they will be reconsidered; but if it is the old ground that we are asked to go over again, the Convention can reconsider that, too. At all events, we can express an opinion about such matters. Now, if all the motions for reconsideration have to be dealt with separately a great deal of time will be wasted, and, in my judgment, we shall save a considerable amount of time and dispose of them finally if we deal with them in the Convention instead of in committee.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -
I think it would be advisable that all the members who wish to have clauses recommitted should give notice of their proposals now and have them printed at once, and then we could deal with those proposals the first thing to-morrow morning. If that course is not adopted, and we are to recommit clauses generally, the whole of our debates will be repeated over again, and we may take many weeks to finish our business. Now, some of us, even among those who are living in Victoria, cannot afford to give very much more time to this business; therefore the best way would be to compel honorable members to give notice in the way I have suggested, so that we can deal with those amendments to-morrow, and not be called upon to discuss matters outside them.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I would point out to my honorable friend and others who have urged that we should not give permission in this general way for the recommittal of clauses that if we do not adopt that course it is highly probable the proceedings will be very much more protracted than if we do adopt it, because any honorable member has the right to move the recommittal of any clause, and be can move the recommittal of each clause in a separate speech.

Mr. FRASER. -

Let honorable members give notice of their amendments now.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

The honorable member must see that we are in a novel position. The standing orders which we are working under provide there shall be an adjournment to give us time to do this thing, but at the request of the leader of the Convention, in the interests of expedition, we have suspended the standing orders, and honorable members are therefore not in a position to prepare and give notice and print their amendments and we are consequently adopting this course. But surely we can trust the good sense of the representatives to see that it is necessary we should come to a conclusion of our labours very soon. It is utterly impossible to keep this Convention together much longer, and, therefore, if we give this permission, as a matter of courtesy, very much as we give leave to introduce a Bill without notice, we shall get along much more quickly than by insisting that honorable members shall move for leave in the Convention as a whole, where we may be longer in discussing the various subjects than if we discussed them in committee. Because honorable members know that in the Convention they will only have the opportunity of speaking once, and an honorable member moving for the recommittal of a clause would, under those circumstances, feel it to be his duty to support his proposal by arguments on every side, whereas, if they can submit their proposals in committee, they will appeal in a few words to the good sense of honorable members to carry their views. In some instances the reasons for doing that will be so obvious that it will be done at once, and in other cases the reasons against doing it will be so equally obvious that honorable members will refrain from speaking, and give a silent vote. Now, in view of the immense number of recommittals sought, it seems to me that there is no other course than to grant them, as a matter of courtesy, and trust to the good sense of honorable members not to occupy more time in proposing and discussing them than is absolutely necessary.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I do not know whether it would suit the convenience of members of the Convention, but there is a course which it seems to me might very well be adopted. It is a view that has been frequently expressed. The Bill can be, if necessary, twice recommitted. By doing that time may be saved. If the Bill is recommitted merely for the purpose of the Drafting Committee's amendments that I have proposed (which are mainly drafting amendments, with one or two exceptions) and honorable members in the meantime write out their notices of amendments and have them printed, then the Bill can be again recommitted for the reconsideration of such provisions as are embraced there. And when honorable members see the nature of the amendments which we propose, it will take very little time to decide whether they are amendments of substance, and whether there is the slightest reasonable prospect of a decision which has been come to being reversed. There are many cases, no doubt, in which there is such a prospect. There are other cases in which I suppose honorable members who are making the proposals may have no very definite expectation of succeeding in reversing a decision.
Mr. SOLOMON. -
Are all the amendments to be proposed by you merely drafting alterations?
Mr. BARTON. -
Not all. They cannot be left to the drafting stage, but they are endeavours to carry out what has been gathered as the sense of the Convention, except in two or three cases in which I have endeav
Mr. SOLOMON. -
You had better separate them.
Mr. BARTON. -
I would suggest that we take the matters which are in print at the instance of the Drafting Committee, and also two or three other matters which are mentioned in their notice, but which are not in the printed list.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
You asked us to give notice of these proposals.
Mr. BARTON. -
I made several requests.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

That has been done.

Mr. BARTON. -

It has been done in some cases, but I can assure my honorable friend there is a vast number of cases in which I have seen no notice of them at all. What I wish to suggest, in order to save a great deal of discussion, is that those matters which have been in print at the instance of the Drafting Committee or of myself may be taken now, in order to give time for other members who have not circulated their amendments to have them printed and circulated. That will give the Convention an opportunity at once to decide on its course, and will leave it perfectly open to obtain a second recommittal. The obtaining of a second recommittal will, under the circumstances, take no more time, but much less time than the obtaining of it now.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Why not take all the amendments that have been printed?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

We will have quite enough to go on with.

Mr. BARTON. -

If honorable members will withdraw their notices for recommittal in cases where they have not had their proposals printed, and let us go on with those which are in print, they can move for a second recommittal, and they can trust to the good sense of the Convention to grant it where there is any substance in the matter.

The motion, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. -

I will put the next motion, which is moved by Mr. Reid.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I recognise the force of what has been said, and I think it would be greatly to the convenience of the Convention if those of us who have not given in print notice of the character of our proposed amendments are given an opportunity to do so. If we now carry a recommittal of the Bill for the purposes already mentioned, ample time will be given to all of us to put on the table in print the nature of our objects in proposing the recommittals. It will be understood, of course, that we will not be prejudiced by deferring our notices, because it would be a second recommittal.

Mr. BARTON. -

Certainly there will be no attempt on my part to refuse a second recommittal all round.

Mr. REID. -

I quite agree that if, in matters likely to provoke a long debate, a clear majority of the Convention has made up its mind, it would save time if that mind were expressed on the proposal to go into the matter again. We have reached a stage, I admit, at which it is of great importance that we should save time. I am prepared to withdraw my proposals till I can put them in print on the paper. I will engage to have my proposals in print for tomorrow morning, and I suppose every other member can make an effort to do the same. I may say that the proposals for recommittal which we have agreed to will take us into next week. For instance, the clause about the dead-locks clause 56B - will lead to a long debate, so that honorable members will have plenty of time to put their proposals in print for the information of the Convention. I am sure that Mr. Barton's proposals will not be dealt with in two days. We will have plenty of time to put our proposals in print, without prejudice, I hope, to their, full discussion afterwards. On the understanding that I shall have an opportunity after I have put my proposals in print to move the further recommittal of the Bill, I ask leave to withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

Before the question that leave be granted is put, I wish to suggest to the leader of the Convention something which I think is important. Just now the idea was that we should take those questions which were more debatable first, and leave those which were less debatable until afterwards. The course we are now about to pursue I am afraid will lead to this result: We will take mere drafting amendments and matters which are not specially contentious during the next two or three days when we have a full Convention, and then, next week, when a number of honorable members will have left us, we will be at the points where we ought to have the fullest attendance of honorable members. I ask the leader of the Convention to consider that point, and to take care that that does not happen.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

My amendments, with one or two exceptions, will not take any time to discuss, but where it is considered anything will take substantial time to discuss I could refrain from dealing with it on the first recommittal, so long as I have my right of proceeding with it on the second recommittal. I want to meet the convenience of members in every way. The reason it is wise to consider this schedule first is that it gives honorable members an opportunity to put their amendments in writing and have them printed. If any little further time is required for that purpose, then instead of adjourning from half-past five until half-past seven I would ask for an adjournment from five o'clock to eight o'clock. By doing that we should be enabled to proceed with business.

The PRESIDENT. -

If I understand there is a general desire that all these motions, other than that already carried, should be withdrawn for the present, I will put it in a general way that honorable members who have moved the recommittal of clauses have leave to withdraw.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

Some days ago Mr. Barton invited honorable members to submit in writing notices of motion of their desire to have clauses recommitted. I and others have done so, and why should we be placed at a disadvantage because other honorable members have not taken the trouble to give notice? It would only be fair to submit to the Convention every motion of which notice has been given, and which appear on the notice-paper. There are two notices of motion which I gave some weeks ago, and I cannot consent to the suggestion of the President. If the Convention chooses to reject my motion, well and good.

The PRESIDENT. -

Under the circumstances, I shall not put any motion for leave to withdraw which is not asked for.

Leave being given, Mr. Reid's motion was withdrawn.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

Mr. Reid having asked for leave to withdraw his motion for the present, I am bound to follow his example-on this occasion-the understanding being clear that I shall be at liberty to propose the same matter again. With all honorable members who have spoken on the subject, I do hope there will be an effort to save time, but also an effort to save the Bill. I hope there will be no difficulty thrown in the way of a fair reconsideration of such matters as honorable members generally think important. It is really important that there should be no idea outside that there is any attempt to avoid the fullest discussion consistently with a fair and reasonable time being afforded for that purpose.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

We have avoided that by reversing our decisions every second day.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We are now trying to arrive at the original decision.

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia.) -

In the House no honorable member can address the Chair more than once. I raise no objection when an honorable member confines himself to withdraw his motion, but when a member proceeds to make a speech on the merits or demerits of a particular question, it is time the standing order is put in force.

The PRESIDENT. -
As that point is taken, I shall have to say it is well founded. Do I understand that the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) asks leave to withdraw his motion?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I ask leave to withdraw my motion.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
Mr. President, I have not spoken-

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -
Spoken, spoken.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The honorable member has spoken three or four times.
Leave being given, Mr. Isaacs' motion was withdrawn.
Leave was granted to Sir George Turner (Victoria), Mr. Deakin (Victoria), and Mr. Holder (South Australia), to withdraw their motions for recommittals.

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -
There are notices of motion which have been printed for several days past.

The PRESIDENT. -
All the motions not duly withdrawn will be put to the House.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
We have accepted the leader's proposal-

The PRESIDENT. -
I am afraid I must rule the right honorable gentleman out of order. Unless there is any further request to withdraw I will put the remaining motions.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
I ask leave to withdraw my motion.
Leave being given, the motion was withdrawn.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
Then I ask leave to withdraw my motion.
Leave being given, the motion was withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT. -
If there is no other motion for withdrawal, I will put the motions which remain.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
As Sir John Forrest, Sir Philip Fysh, and Mr. Holder have asked leave to withdraw, I also ask leave to withdraw my notice of motion.
Leave being given, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I happen to have been out of the chamber for a moment. I understand that if the honorable leader's motion for recommittal involves a clause as to which I have given notice, the whole clause is open to me.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I was under the impression, Mr. President, that the intention was simply to discuss the notice I have given in the first instance. In that case the honorable member's purpose would be served by having his notice printed for the second recommittal.

The PRESIDENT. -
I think the motion of Mr. Higgins had reference to clauses 80 and 93B, both of which are in the motion carried at the instance of the leader.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I have already handed the few amendments I had in my mind to the Clerk, and these amendments are either printed or in the Clerk's hands. I do not want to have the same clause recommitted twice.

The PRESIDENT. -
The clauses mentioned by Mr. Higgins have already been recommitted at the instance of the leader of the Convention.

Mr. HOWE (Tasmania). -
I apprehend that clause 52 will be recommitted.

The PRESIDENT. -
Only as to a certain paragraph.

Mr. HOWE. -
My notice of motion in regard to this has been on the paper, and, as it is an important matter, I would like it discussed by the full Convention.

The PRESIDENT. -
Does the honorable member ask leave to withdraw his motion?

Mr. HOWE. -
I cannot be exceptional, and I ask leave to withdraw.
Leave being given, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -
Although my notice of motion is in print, I ask for leave to withdraw it.
Leave being granted, the motion was withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT. -
The only clauses that have been recommitted are those recommitted on the motion of Mr. Barton.
The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the recommitted clauses.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the following new clause (6A) be inserted after clause 6 of the covering clauses:

After the passing of this Act the Colonial Boundaries Act 1895 shall not apply to any colony which becomes a state of the Commonwealth; but the Commonwealth shall be taken to be a self-governing colony for the purposes of that Act.

This new clause becomes necessary for this reason: There is an Imperial Act, called the Colonial Boundaries Act, passed in 1895, which gives the Imperial authorities power to fix the boundaries of the colonies, and makes provision that those boundaries shall not be altered except with the consent of certain self-governing colonies named in the schedule. If this provision were not inserted there might be a difficulty as to how the Imperial Act affected the right of the Crown to still deal with the boundaries of the States of the Commonwealth, and it is to make it clear that the Commonwealth has control over the boundaries within itself that the insertion of these words becomes necessary.

The new clause was agreed to.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That paragraph (2) of clause 10 be omitted.

It is proposed to omit the second paragraph of clause 10, with a view of dealing with the question, and with another matter of the same kind relating to the House of Representatives, comprehensively in one clause. Clause 10 provides for the keeping up of the electoral laws of the different states until the Parliament of the Commonwealth may legislate. We think it will be better to deal with the matter in one way, and I propose, therefore, that the second paragraph of clause 10 be omitted, in order that the whole subject may be dealt with comprehensively later on, when there will be one clause for both Houses. The one clause will be new clause 44AA, which is as follows:

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, but subject to this Constitution, the laws in force in each state for the time being relating to elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the state shall, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections in the state of senators and of members of the House of Representatives.

Honorable members will see that in clause 44 there is a similar provision to the one we are dealing with, but we think it will be better to deal with both matters together. That, as honorable members see, will make the provision very much shorter, whilst the difference really is that the second paragraph of clause 10 mentions a number of matters relating to local affairs in regard to which the same laws will apply to federal elections.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Have you examined the local laws to see if they can apply?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Oh, yes, we know what the local laws are.
The amendment was agreed to.
The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 24. - The House of Representatives shall be composed of members directly chosen by the people of the several states, according to the irrespective numbers; as nearly as practicable there shall be two members of the House of Representatives for every senator.

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the member of members to which each state is entitled shall be determined by dividing the number of the people of the state, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by a quota, which shall from time to time be ascertained by dividing the number of the people of the Commonwealth, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by twice the number of the senators; and there shall be one member for each quota of the people of the state. But [here name the colonies which have adopted the Constitution] shall be entitled to five representatives at least.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-
That all the words from the words "several states " (line 3) inclusive to the end of the clause be omitted, with a view to the insertion of the following words:-
"Commonwealth. The number of members chosen in the several states shall be in proportion to the respective numbers of their people. But if by the law of any state the people of any race are not entitled to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the state, then, in reckoning the number of the people of the state, the people of that race shall not be counted."

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
Does not this amendment involve an alteration of the quota principle?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
No; that comes later on.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
This amendment provides that if by the law of any state the people of any race are not entitled to vote, then, in reckoning the number of the people of the state, they shall not be counted. I should like to know whether the honorable and learned member has considered this in relation to the clause which gives the Commonwealth power to legislate with regard to the people of any race. Suppose that power is exercised by the Commonwealth in a manner over-riding the law of the state—is this provision sufficient?

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I think so, because the honorable member will see that what we want to get at is the number of persons to be counted. If by any law of any state persons of a certain race are not counted they will not be counted in this enumeration.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will the honorable member consider it?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes. At the present time I think it is sufficient, but I will consider it.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

The words proposed to be inserted are—

Commonwealth. The number of members chosen in the several states shall be in proportion to the respective numbers of their people.

And so on. That provision directly negatives proposed new clause 24A, which seems to continue the quota principle.

The CHAIRMAN. -

There is a mistake in the printing. The amendment should read—"Omit to the end of the paragraph," not "to the end of the clause."

Mr. GLYNN. -

That makes a difference.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

If there has been a mistake in the printing it will make a difference to the course of procedure which we shall have to take.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Any of these clauses can be recommitted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The amendment that has just been agreed to proposed the omission of certain words at the end of the clause, with a view to the insertion of other words, which are set out. Lower down, clause 24A provides that—

The number of members to be chosen in each state shall be determined by dividing the number of the people of the state, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by the quota.
If we retain the second paragraph of the proposed new clause we shall have to raise the question of quota when we are discussing it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The honorable member is quite right. It is necessary that the words at the end of the clause should be omitted, and that clause 25 should be omitted. Then the whole question can be raised again.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I understand that the third paragraph of the clause stands in.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That paragraph is contained in clause 24A.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 25 was omitted.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the following words stand clause 24A of the Bill to follow clause 24:-

The number of the members of the House of Representatives shall be, as nearly as practicable, twice the number of the senators. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the number of members to be chosen in each state, shall, whenever necessary, be determined in the following manner:-

I. A quota shall be ascertained by dividing the number of the people of the Commonwealth, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by twice the number of the senators.

II. The number of members to be chosen in each state shall be determined by dividing the number of the people of the state, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by the quota; and if on such a division there is a remainder greater than one-half the quota, one more member shall be chosen in the state.

But notwithstanding anything in this or the last preceding section, five members at least shall be chosen in each original state.

This clause is nothing more than a shortening of the provisions of two or three previous paragraphs. We have omitted clause 25 and the latter part of clause 24, and clause 26 is to be omitted. The provisions contained in these clauses have been embodied in this new clause. The Right Hon. Sir George Turner will see that there is nothing new in the clause which I am now proposing, though it embodies a principle, to which he has taken exception, but to which the Convention has already agreed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
As I intimated in Sydney, I propose to again test the feeling of the Convention with regard to the proposal to have a fixed quota. With that view, I move—

That the proposed new clause be amended by the omission of the words "The number of the members of the House of Representatives shall be, as nearly as practicable, twice the number of the senators," with a view to the insertion after the words "Until the Parliament otherwise provides" of the words: "each state shall have one representative for every 50,000 of its people."

In the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 we provided that each state should have one representative to every 30,000 of its people. That provision may, perhaps, have given us a somewhat large House of Representatives, but I think that the alteration which I now propose would provide a very reasonable number to commence with. As we know, provision is made for the increasing or the reducing of the number of members of the House of Representatives. But if we adopt the peculiar provision that the number of the members of the House of Representatives shall be determined by the number of senators, we shall be taking a very unwise step. I fail to see what connexion there can be between the number of the members of the Senate and the number of the members of the House of Representatives, which should limit the number of the House of Representatives in accordance with the number of the senators.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Or with the number of the states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes, or with the number of the states. If we adopt this provision we shall be in the peculiar position that as population increases the number of the members of the House of Representatives must be determined by the number of members of the Senate. If new states came in, that would increase the number of senators, and the popular representation of the existing states, although their population might not have increased. Surely that, upon the face of it, would be unreasonable. Then, as was pointed out in Sydney, there might also be this difficulty: Some of the states would have five representatives in the House of Representatives, although their population would only entitle them to two. That, upon the basis upon which we worked in Sydney, would give a House of 78 members. But as these states became entitled as of right to their five representatives, the other states would have their representation reduced, because the provision is that the number of the House of Representatives must, as nearly as practicable, be twice the number of the Senate. Therefore, as the smaller colonies became entitled as of right to five representatives, colonies like South Australia, Victoria, and New South Wales would be reduced in their representation. Then, taking the figures which were supplied in New South Wales, it may happen that in a very few years New South Wales will be entitled to a representation of 26 or 27 members, while, on the other hand, Victoria, whose population may not increase so rapidly as that of the sister colony, may have her representation reduced from 24 to 13. While I cannot deny that the representation of Victoria will be, in proportion to her population, I think we shall find it difficult to make the people of this colony understand why their representation should be reduced from 24 at the present time to perhaps 13, twenty or thirty years hence. But that would undoubtedly be what would happen if the figures which were quoted in Adelaide and in Sydney are correct. I am not prepared to say that they are correct, because they come from New South Wales, where other figures have come from. It is probable, however, that some of the colonies will increase at a greater rate than others, with the result that the representation of some of the colonies will increase while that of the other colonies will decrease. After thinking over the matter carefully I cannot see what reason there is why we should fix this quota at all, unless we are to have what is called the Norwegian system, but which is not that system, unless we are to have that system as a means of settling dead-locks by the two Houses meeting together. To my mind, that can be the only basis upon which we can rest any such position. This matter was very fully discussed in Sydney, and I propose now to set a good example with regard to these amendments. I do not propose to discuss them at any great length, because I am sure everything that was said in Sydney must be fresh in the minds of honorable members. We did take a division on the subject, but not in a full Convention. I think the matter is of so grave importance to some of the colonies that we are justified in having the matter reconsidered and voted upon again. This is undoubtedly a blot on the Bill which we ought not to allow to remain in. There is no reason whatever why we should adopt this system and not follow out the practice of 1891. It was also really adopted in Adelaide. That method is having some fixed number as a quota, if you like, on which the House of Representatives should be constituted. In the House of Representatives we provide for the representation of the individual people, and the population of the different colonies ought to be entitled to have representatives for a certain number of people. It may be said that will render necessary an immensely large House, but that has not been the experience in America. When it was necessary to prevent the House from becoming too large, steps were taken in that direction.
Mr. BARTON. -

But, as you put it, would it not require an amendment of the Constitution?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No; my proposal is, until the Parliament otherwise provides, each state shall have one representative for every 50,000 of its people, so that it will be entirely in the hands of Parliament to make the necessary provision. The Treasurer will not allow the members to increase at so rapid a rate as to involve very heavy expense, and no doubt Parliament would say that, whereas 50,000 was considered a sufficient number when the total population was 3,500,000, now that it is 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 the number for each representative should be increased to 60,000 or 70,000. It will be wise to revert to the original number proposed, and with that object I move my amendment, to test the feeling of the Convention, so that, instead of having a fixed quota for all time, which would require an alteration of the Constitution to change we shall have a fixed number as I suggest. At present it is made absolutely a portion of our Constitution that, until we alter the Constitution by the very difficult mode we have adopted, the number of representatives in the House of the people must be decided by the number of members representing the various states. It is immaterial whether you have a state represented by four, five, or six members, but it is very material that you should have the people in the House of Representatives represented by a limited number in conjunction with the number in the Senate. It will be wise to retrace our steps and go back to what was originally proposed.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I would point out to the right honorable member that his amendment is not directed against the quota; it is directed against the relative proportion of members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BARTON. -

It proposes to omit the ratio, and to put in one member for every 50,000 people.

Mr. SYMON. -

I do not care what becomes of the quota if you can substitute something else which the right honorable gentleman desires, but I object very strongly to alter the relative proportion between the Houses. This is the old story of cutting away all the benefits we were supposed to acquire from a strong Senate. I point out that the honorable member's amendment now is not directed to the question of the quota so much as to the destruction of, the relative proportion between the two Houses.
Mr. WISE. -

Why not strike out the third line and let the first two lines stand?

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

The first two lines involve the whole question. This is a matter which goes very deep down upon the subject. I would like to point out to honorable members that by putting in this provision something is put in that is absolutely novel in any Constitution. It is not only novel to a Constitution, but it is taking from the larger states—the most populous states—something beyond the concession that was agreed to, with regard to equal representation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Not agreed to, but given.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I should like to point out again to the Convention, as briefly as I can, the ground I took in Adelaide when this was first proposed. I would like to impress on honorable members what a rooted objection we have to it, and what an objection there is which can scarcely, if at all, be got over. It has been, accepted, by way of compromise and concession in this Constitution, by those who do not believe in it, as a principle that the two Houses should be appointed on totally distinct and antagonistic lines.

Mr. SYMON. -

No.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Not antagonistic lines.

Mr. ISAACS. -

One to be the House of the people, and the other to be the House of the states, to check, or, if necessary, to checkmate the people, to use the words of a learned writer. The Senate we have agreed to is a concession, specially based upon the equality of the various states independently of their population. Indeed, we are to say that for the purpose of constituting the Senate population is to be disregarded altogether. But we have claimed that the House of Representatives—the National House—shall be framed on the basis of population, not population as checked, or altered by the Senate but population simply, and we claim that this is to be a House of Representatives, and representation is to have its fall sway. I do not hesitate to say that unless the people of Victoria are to have a genuine House of Representatives they will find considerable difficulty in acceding to this Constitution at all. I desire to make myself perfectly clear, because this is the moment to do so. We are now beginning to consider questions at a juncture when we should be acting dishonestly with each other if we did not speak frankly. Hereafter, if we should unfortunately find it to be our duty to take a position adverse to this Bill, which I trust will not be the duty of any of us, we should justly be chargeable with had faith to our follow delegates, to the sister colonies, and to our own colony, if we did not express our views clearly and unmistakably in the Convention, so as not to allow particular questions to create any errors. Now, I would point out how very important this is. The Senate is not to be checked by the House of Representatives, but the House of Representatives is to be checked by the Senate.

Mr. BARTON. -

You mean that the Chamber that speaks second is always a check on the other.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, I mean that you can make the Senate as large as you like without reference to population at all. But although the needs of the population may require a larger quota in the House of Representatives, and although there may be no need whatever to extend, the number of representatives in the Senate, the House of Representatives cannot, be altered without altering the Senate, and what is worse, without the consent of the Senate. I do not argue that this should be done without the consent of the Senate, but I want that consent to be required only, as in America. If, for the purpose of enabling the people to choose their representatives freely and voluntarily, we intend to say that there shall be one member for every 50,000 or 60,000 of the population, we may find that we have agreed in this way that there shall be only one member for every 100,000, 200,000 or 300,000 of the population. What opportunity will there be for a fair representation? The quota will be constantly altering, but the ratio will remain the same. When the people of the colonies are told that each state is to have six representatives in the Senate without relation to its population, they are also told that, although the population requires for a fair representation a quota less than that which prevails, the matter is to be governed, not by the population of the Commonwealth, but by the number of representatives in the Senate. What connexion is there between a House which is avowedly based upon equality of statehood without regard to population, and a House of Representatives elected on the basis of population? We are told that this is the most democratic Constitution in the world. Is it to be converted into the most conservative Constitution in the world? There is no Constitution that I am aware of under which the people's House cannot be constituted, if desired, on the basis of population pure and simple. Why have we departed from the example of America in this regard and slavishly followed it in other respects?

Mr. SYMON. -

We do not object to the House of Representatives being based on population pure and simple. All we say is that the ratio should be preserved.

- That is not basing it on population pure and simple. In America the Constitution started by fixing the number of senators for each state at two. It was then provided that the House of Representatives should be constituted by giving not less than one member for 30,000 inhabitants. If no further legislation had taken place the House of Representatives would by this time have been enormous. There would have been from 2,000 to 3,000 members in it, but public opinion compelled them, as it always will compel them, to reduce the number by increasing the quota. Gradually, as the population increased, the quota went up from 30,000 to 40,000, and from 40,000 to 50,000, until now it is close upon 200,000. They did not trouble to ask themselves how many members there were in the Senate. What they did consider, was the number of people that each member should represent, and the House of Representatives then proposed an amendment of the law in that regard. The Senate has always agreed to these amendments, because it knew that if it did not the House of Representatives would simply be enlarged. Inasmuch as it is always for the benefit of the Senate to agree to such a Bill, there is no difficulty whatever. The House of Representatives, every ten years, proceeds to diminish its numbers proportionately by increasing the quota. Here we are to start with about one member to every 50,000 of the population. At a future period we may find that there is one member for every 100,000 of the population, and we may desire to make the quota one member for every 80,000. We could not do that without the consent of the Senate, and the difference between us and America is simply this, that if the Senate does not agree, the House of Representatives is kept lower in numbers and the representation is made more difficult than would otherwise be the case. But if the Senate does agree its numbers must also be increased. What a farce that is! We are told that if the population of Victoria, as was shown by the figures supplied from Sydney, increased to 4,000,000-

Mr. WISE. -

Are those Mr. Coghlan's figures?

Mr. ISAACS. -

They came from New South Wales. We are told that if the population of Victoria increased to 4,000,000, she would have on the basis of these figures 13 members, as against the 24 with which she starts the Federation.
Mr. WISE. -

Many of us would go with you to knock out the quota.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is quite a different thing. You cannot alter the quota if you keep the ratio.

Mr. WISE. -

You can increase the number of members of the Senate.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Let us look at the position. If we want, owing to an increase of population in Victoria or New South Wales, to increase the number of members of the House of Representatives, so as to keep pace with the population, so as to allow the electors to have a full and free choice, and so as to prevent men of great wealth from having supreme command of the constituencies, then we are told that we must increase the number of members of the Senate. What necessity is there for increasing the number of members of the Senate? If the states are on an equal footing, what difference does it make to them whether they have each six members or twelve?

Mr. WISE. -

The Senate will be the people's House.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then all the more reason why we should alter this. I agree that this proposal, with its attendant consequences, will go far to emasculate the House of Representatives, and this is one of the points on which we must make a stand. It is one of the points I do not see my way to yield. We have conceded equal representation in the hope of getting some concessions. Not one solitary concession has been made to us. On the contrary, the advantage has been pushed further than we anticipated. The only House the people of the Commonwealth, as a people, have to rely on is to be tied hand and foot to the Senate, and its number cannot be extended as the requirements of population demand. It may be said where is the injustice if there are 60 members, as there will be without Queensland, and those 60 members are evenly distributed over the Commonwealth? That is no answer. You might as well say that if there were twenty members, they would be distributed over the Commonwealth, but we want to see that the people of the Commonwealth have opportunities in moderately-sized constituencies for electing their House of Representatives. And this does not give any play to that, because, as I said before, it simply appeals to the Commonwealth to increase the Senate at the same rate, and the Senate may not comply with the request. And when we recollect that there is no, provision for dead-locks—none whatever that is workable; and that this provision of the ratio of one to two is almost altogether futile, that is, the desirable so-called provision for dead-locks which is at present in this Constitution—it seems to me almost impossible to commit to the Commonwealth or to the Federal Parliament the gigantic interests at stake in this Federation. Now, I desire to take no uncertain ground in this matter, because it seems to me to be an objection which cannot be got over. There being no precedent for it, there can be no excuse for it, certainly not on the ground of economy, because on that ground we could reduce the number of the Senate. You could have three as well as you could have six senators, and the states equally represented. In America they have two, and the states are equally represented. But on the ground of economy it is idle to consider this question when we are framing a Constitution for the Federation. The whole basis of it is a Constitution of two Houses. The earth rests on the tortoise, but what does the tortoise rest upon? And when we get a Constitution resting upon the formation and operation of the House of Representatives as well as of the Senate, we may well ask ourselves what is the reason for departing from well-known rules and creating this new scheme of tying the House of Representatives to the Senate. The House of Representatives is the National House. It is supposed to be. It is supposed, I said, to be based on population only. The Senate is the States House—a false position as I understand it, but still we have constituted it. Why mix these two things to the disadvantage of the people's House?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

They are both people's Houses.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There can only be one reason for doing that, and that is aggrandizing the Senate or crippling the House of Representatives. Without reiterating the arguments I urged in Adelaide, I do say that this is a matter that I do not see my way to get over. There are some thing one would be glad to get over, but this is not alone a mistake, for it carries with it other mistakes because it carries with it a proposal for the two Houses to sit together. When we consider that, and consider that under these provisional don't propose to discuss them in detail, but I must just briefly refer to them, because they are in connexion with this, showing as they do, the results that flow from it—when we remember that, when those two Houses meet together this Constitution gives Tasmania 5 members in the House of Representatives and 6 in the Senate, making 11, while Victoria will have 24 members in the House of Representatives and 6 in the Senate, making 30, we see that it gives Tasmania, a state that will contribute only one-tenth of the revenue that Victoria will contribute, more than one-third of the ultimate voice in the disposal of the revenue. I say it is impossible for us to accede to that. So far from extending our self-government, and making this a free and democratic Constitution, we are unmistakably, as it seems to me, taking the sure course of making the most conservative Constitution we have ever seen—more conservative than any colonial Constitution, and much more conservative than the British Constitution. For those reasons I do hope that the Convention will excise these words.

2954

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Give a dog a bad name, and you may kill him at once.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I do hope that the Convention will excise these words, not only to keep the Constitution in harmony with what we anticipated when we started, but for the purpose of making the Constitution a liberal Constitution, and not saying to the men—and I hope the women—in the future, who have the franchise under this Constitution, that they are restrained in the exercise of the function which is nominally given to them by the fact that the principle of equality of representation prevents them from exercising it as freely and fully as they deserve to do.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I think the matter on which my honorable and learned friend touched the most lightly was the matter to, which he ought to have devoted most attention in his very elaborate and admirable speech—the fact that there is a provision in this Constitution to that effect that when there is a difference between the two Houses, under certain circumstances, they shall sit together, and that a majority of three-fifths shall carry a Bill. Now, we will put an instance of this kind. Supposing as a result of the adoption of the proposal of Sir George Turner there were a House of Representatives of 120 members, while the Senate stood at its original number of 30. There you have 150 members altogether. I am putting an illustration in fact first, which I think is the wisest thing to do in a matter of this kind. There you have 150 members with a provision that if they disagree and there has been a dissolution after which they still disagree, a vote shall be taken at a joint sitting; and that three-fifths of the members shall control the matter. Thus out of that number of 150, 90 votes would rule the roast, and, those 90 votes might be every one of them votes of members of the House of Representatives, while of the 60 there would be in that case 30 members of the House of Representatives and the whole body of the Senate.

Mr. ISAACS. -
But we do not accede to that joint meeting.
Mr. BARTON. —

No doubt you do not accede to that joint meeting; but for the present you must take the Constitution as it stands, unless we are to take it for granted that you are going to alter it wherever you will, and we are not going to take that for granted. Certainly, not to begin with. Now, I take it that a resolution which is likely to lead to that result is a resolution aimed, whether directly or not, at the subversion of every principle of federal government; that you cannot, if you retain this three-fifths proposal, consent to an amendment of this kind without contending that you intend to make this Constitution other than federal.

Mr. ISAACS. —

I do not intend to do that.

Mr. BARTON. —

I can quite understand my honorable friend wants the two things; but I say that, unless we intend to give him both, we should not give him this. If we intended to give him what he wants, which is a general referendum instead of a joint vote, then he may well ask for this as being consistent with that general referendum. But the very enormity of the one proposal will show honorable members the great enormity of the other.

Mr. ISAACS. —

They have no referendum in England, and yet they do not have this provision there.

Mr. BARTON. —

But the honorable member is leaving out of sight the fact that we are dealing with a Federal Constitution, and we do presume to preserve some equilibrium of power as respects the two Houses. I can understand those who think that there ought to be only one House either in a Federal Commonwealth or in an amalgamated Government taking up the position that, for instance, there should not be a House which Mr. Isaacs describes as a House to check or checkmate the people. If it is assumed that the people are only represented in one House the logical assumption to follow is that there should be only one House, and it is better for honorable members who think that to throw off the mask at once and move that there shall be only one House. If you are going to make one House all-powerful and the other House absolutely powerless and not fit to be occupied, by branding politicians on the ground that all they do must be futile—if you are going to take that course, why not say right out you are going to take it instead of adopting expedients of that kind?

Mr. ISAACS. —

Does the honorable member think it is fair to put it in that way, having regard to the fact that in America there is no such provision as I object to, and yet there is not government by one House?

Mr. BARTON. -

It is fair, because I cannot understand my honorable friend making a proposal of this kind, and clothing it in the remarks which he made, unless he really feels that there ought to be only one House. If you are going to say that there should be only one House to determine everything, then you are saying that there should be only one House. If you are going to the Senate. But let the honorable member consider this position. If the powers of dealing with and amending Appropriation and Tax Bills, and the other strong monetary powers of the American Senate, as well as its executive powers, which are very large also, were to be taken away from it in favour of responsible government, do you think that the Senate of America would consent to an alteration of the Constitution to that effect without being guaranteed some numerical proportion to the other House which would enable the Senate to be reasonable factors in discussions outside money matters? All that is desired, all that is attempted, in this Constitution is that, apart from Appropriation and Tax Bills, the Senate should have some voice in ordinary legislation, and it is not sought to give the Senate the powers which have been so often contended for by Upper Houses in respect to Money Bills. There is the whole difference of the case. Who would ever dream of proposing in the Senate of America to give up the great powers they have in that respect for a system of responsible government, unless some ratio was to be preserved between the two Houses which would enable the Senate, at any rate, to be considered a strong factor in ordinary legislation? It is not correct to say that one of the Houses here is devised or will act as a check or checkmate on the other. That is, with the greatest respect to my honorable friend, an entire misdescription of the position. One of these Houses is devised in order that it may give some representation to the corporate capacity of the states, and in order that the voice of those states may be heard in ordinary legislation whenever it is necessary for the representatives of a state to act together. That is the main object of the proposal of a Senate. The entirety of that object would be done away with if the proposal of my honorable friend were carried. As the honorable member (Mr. Symon) has pointed out, it is aimed, not at the quota which was so much objected to by Sir George Turner, but at the numerical proportion between the two Houses. The real object of this amendment, if it is carried, is to make impossible any provision for dead-locks, if any is necessary, unless there is some such method as a referendum, because many honorable members say-"We had better take the chance of a national or general referendum than leave the Senate in this position, because the Senate then would be totally powerless in the event of a joint vote having to be taken." Therefore, this is a proposal, whether my honorable friend means it or not, to undermine the collective vote, and to make that collective vote a merely nugatory proposition, which, by consequence, would have to be taken out of the Constitution and make room for something more drastic for the purpose of entirely emasculating the Senate. I have always been in favour of working this Constitution by the method we know of—of the method of responsible government. I have always been in favour of so much preponderance of power being given to the House of Representatives as will make that responsible government something more than a name, and will insure the due working of that machine. I have always been ready to go that far. I have always insisted that there is justice in the position of the states themselves when they say that, granted you provide for the working of responsible government, you must outside that allow the states to have some voice in legislation as the entities of government that they are themselves. My honorable friend's proposition has relation to other clauses, for instance, to clause 9. I will read the clause as it appears in print now:-

The Senate shall be composed of senators for each state, directly chosen by the people of the state, voting, until the Parliament otherwise determines, as one electorate. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, there shall be six senators for each original state. The Parliament may, from time to time, increase or diminish the number of senators for each state, but so that equal representation of the several original states shall be maintained, and that no original state shall have less than six senators.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not think it touches that.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think it touches clause 9, for this reason: That Parliament may increase or diminish the number of senators for each state. That requires the assent of two Houses. If there is a proposition that the number, of the House of Representatives shall be increased without a corresponding proposition that the number of senators shall be increased that proposition may be expected to be rejected by the Senate. That is to say, if the matter is left open, as proposed by the amendment, that proposition may then be expected to be rejected by the Senate, and, under this dead-lock clause, if it is quite twice rejected, once before a dissolution and once afterwards, there may be a collective vote, which may be carried by a majority of three-fifths, or, if my honorable friend has it his way, there will be instead of that collective vote a mass referendum, of which he thinks he foresees the result.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I have never advocated a mass referendum.

Mr. BARTON. -

No. I was speaking of my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs), whom I have always understood to be a proposer of a dual referendum as an expedient in the Constitution, and to prefer a mass referendum. I am taking that as his honest opinion. The result would be simply this: Either there would be a constant state of dead-locks whenever a proposition of this kind came up, which would be finished in the way which has been spoken of, according to the expectations of those who would support such amendments as this, a crushing of the Senate on each occasion; or else, if the Senate had its way, it could hold out, if it was not altogether held down by a collective vote or by a referendum, it could go on refusing the proposition to increase the number of the House of Representatives till the Senate, in its own good time, chose to pass the Bill with a provision that the proportion of two to one, or any other proportion they thought right, should be maintained. I do not think that propositions which are likely to be fruitful of dead-locks, and fruitful of disagreements, should find a place in this Constitution, and I do think it is some security to the smaller states, which they ought to have, that the Senate should bear some fixed ratio to the House of Representatives. I have heard of honorable members who before voted for this proposal for a fixed ratio say it might be guarded by the words-"Until Parliament shall otherwise provide." I have always held there should be no words in the Constitution which should be altered without the process for the alteration of the Constitution being gone through. I hope to adhere to that opinion. I hope I have not spoken at undue length. I know this is not a time for long Speeches on the question of the ratio of representation in the Houses, which is now being discussed for the third time. Much more I might say, but I shall leave the matter now, and ask honorable members not to accept the amendment.

Question-That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the proposed new clause-put.

The committee divided-

AYES.
Abbott, Sir J.P. Henning, A.H.
Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). - I have not had time to look at the last sub-clause, which reads as follows:-

But notwithstanding anything in this or the last preceding section, five members at least shall be chosen in each original state.

What is the precise meaning of those words?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). - It means those who have joined the Constitution in the first instance. You will find that in clause 9, as amended in Sydney.

The new clause was agreed to.

Clause 26. - When in the apportionment of members it is found that, after dividing the number of the people of a state by the quota, there remains a surplus greater than one-half of the quota, the state shall have one more member.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-
That clause 26 be omitted.
It is a necessary amendment, consequential upon the last one made.
The clause was struck out.
Clause 27. - Notwithstanding anything in section 24, the number of members to be chosen by each state at the first election shall be as follows:
[To be determined according to latest statistical returns at the date of the passing of the Act, and in relation to the quota referred to in previous sections.]

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-
That the words "section 24" (line 2) be struck out, and that the words the last preceding section" be substituted.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I see in this clause that there is a gap after the words "as follows." At what stage is it proposed to have that gap filled up? Is it before this Bill is sent home, or afterwards?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
It is to be filled up according to the latest statistical returns, at the date of the passing of the Act, by the Imperial Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You leave it for the Imperial Parliament to fill in the gap?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Undoubtedly. The figures may change in the meantime.
The amendment was agreed to.
& (New South Wales). - I beg to move-
That the word "by" (line 3), be struck out, and that the word "in" be substituted.
The amendment was agreed to.
The clause, as amended, was agreed to.
Clause 28-Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, the number of members of the House of Representatives may be from time to time increased or diminished by the Parliament.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-
That clause 28 be omitted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I want to call attention to the striking out of this clause. It provides that, according to the provisions of the Constitution, the number of members of the House of Representatives may be from time to time increased or diminished by the Parliament. We have made a special provision that the number of the senators may be increased or diminished, and we have determined that there shall be as nearly as practicable two members in the House of Representatives to one member in the Senate. I assume that, as we have done that, my honorable friend and his colleagues on the Drafting Committee think that this clause is unnecessary. I do not know whether it is so or not, but it maybe argued afterwards that as we have inserted a power to increase the number of the Senate, we have no power to increase the number of the House of Representatives. Consequently, a difficulty may arise as to whether we could really carry out the intention of the Bill, and from time to time, as necessity arose and the number of the senators was increased, whether we should have power to increase the number of the House of Representatives. However, I do not feel that I am called upon to take the responsibility of moving in this connexion. I assume that the Drafting Committee have carefully considered the matter. I simply draw attention to it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The fact of the matter is this: In clause 24A there is a provision at the beginning, which is absolute, that the number of members of the House of Representatives shall be as nearly as practicable twice the number of the senators, and that the number of senators to be chosen in each state shall, whenever necessary, be determined in the manner set forth in the clause.
Then it is provided that the number of members shall be settled according to a quota, the provision being that there shall be two members of the House of Representatives to one member of the Senate, as nearly as practicable. But there are governing words "until the Parliament otherwise provides," which give the Parliament further scope to deal with the whole question, except that the proportion of two to one is to be maintained. And then if my right honorable friend will turn to clause 52 he will find that there is a provision, in the shape of new sub-section 34B, that the Parliament is to have power to legislate with respect to all matters in regard to which provision is made by this Constitution until the Parliament otherwise provides. So that we give power to make laws in respect of all matters in regard to which provision is made by the Constitution, and accordingly the Parliament is empowered to legislate whenever it is found necessary.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Surely that is determining the number of members?

Mr. BARTON. -

It is quite clear there is a power at any time to determine the number of members until separate provision is made in that matter. But, at the same time, I do not wish to express a strong opinion upon the point. We thought that this clause might well go out, but if my right honorable friend suggests that it should be retained, we will leave it in subject to reconsideration when we come to the adjournment for drafting purposes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am content to be guided by the opinion of the Drafting Committee.

Mr. BARTON. -

We will leave the clause in at this stage.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I would suggest to the Drafting Committee that they should consider at the same time this point: If this clause be left out, no Bill can be introduced for the purpose of increasing the number of members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think that is so.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think it is so. You could introduce a Bill to increase the number of the Senate, and then the law of the Constitution would operate upon that, and the number of the House of Representatives would be consequentially increased. This only emphasizes the objection I formerly had to the clause—but that matter is past and gone.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is quite true that a Bill would have to be introduced for increasing the number of the one without the other.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The way the matter presents itself to me is this: The only power by which the Parliament could act would be by increasing the number of the Senate, and, according to the Constitution, having done so, the House of Representatives would have to be as nearly as possible constituted in the proportion of two to one of the Senate.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Then if necessity arose for increasing the number of the Senate, the provision is quite simple, inasmuch as the number of the House of Representatives it is provided shall be increased proportionately. So that the purport would be to increase the number of the House of Representatives at the same time as the number of the Senate was increased. It is, however, probably just as well that the clause [P.1840] should be left as it stands at the present stage.

The motion for striking out the clause was negatived, and the clause was agreed to.
Clause 29. - Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the electoral divisions of the several states for the purpose of returning members of the House of Representatives, and the number of members to be chosen for each electoral division, shall be determined from time to time by the Parliaments of the several states. Until division each state shall be one electorate.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the words "of the several states" be omitted, and the words "in each state" inserted in lieu thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the words "Parliaments of the several states. Until division each state shall be one electorate," be omitted, with a view to the insertion of the words "Parliament of the state. In the absence of other provision each state shall be one electorate. No electoral district shall be formed out of parts of different states."

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

I should like the leader of the Convention to explain the meaning of the words "No electoral district shall be formed out of parts of different states." Has that ever been contemplated?

Mr. BARTON. -

Whether it has or has not been contemplated, it might be done unless it were prohibited. I think that the provision is necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 42 (providing for the continuance of existing election laws until the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides) was omitted.

Clause 44A. - No elector who has at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or who afterwards acquires, a right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of a state, shall, whilst the qualification continues, be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from exercising such right at elections for either House of the Parliament.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the words "has at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or who afterwards acquires" (lines 1-3), be omitted, with a view to the insertion of the words "at the establishment of the Commonwealth or afterwards has under the law in force in any state at the establishment of the Commonwealth."
Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

It appears to me that this proposal would make a very important alteration.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

That is an alteration of substance which I will explain. I agree with the object of the clause as proposed to be limited by the amendment which I am now proposing. That is to say, I quite agree that any elector who, at the establishment of the Commonwealth or afterwards, has, under the law in force in any state at the establishment of the Commonwealth, the right to vote at elections should not be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from exercising that right. But I wish to bring again under the notice of the Convention this point. The matter was discussed at Adelaide, and it did not receive as full discussion as it might have at the time. I wish to draw the attention of the Convention, lest honorable members should think that the matter had been in any way hastily done, to the effect of the provision inserted in Adelaide. I was induced to propose this as a matter of substitution, by the consideration that a great deal of harm might be done by the unlimited effect of the provision as in the Bill. Under the provision adopted in Adelaide, not only the elector who had at the establishment of the Commonwealth a right to vote at an election for the Legislative Assembly retained the right to vote for both Houses of Parliament of the Commonwealth, and could not have that right taken away whilst he remained qualified, even though the Commonwealth passed a law for a uniform suffrage. Not only could that be done—to which I did not object—but by the effect of the clause, as passed in

[P.1841] starts here

Adelaide, any state might alter from time to time its suffrage for its House of Assembly, and, having altered it, notwithstanding the existence of the Commonwealth, the person who acquired under that alteration a right to vote for the House of Assembly in that particular state might vote—although the extension of the suffrage gave it not only to women, but, perhaps, to such a class as the young persons of sixteen years of age who are now agitating in some places for a vote—withstanding the different suffrages of other states, at elections for either House of the Commonwealth. It all along struck me that in doing that we went too far; that we made a mistake in Adelaide. We did not make any mistake in Adelaide in allowing a person to retain, and preventing the Commonwealth from taking away from him, his qualification by any law in force at the establishment of the Commonwealth, but we made a mistake in leaving it open to every state to alter its own suffrage, which is right, but by altering its own suffrage to confer on persons not entitled to vote in other states the right to vote at elections for the Commonwealth, because, as they were given that right under the law of the state, they, by the operation of this clause, would be entitled to the benefit of every successive alteration of the law, no matter to what length or depth it went, and in such a way that they would be entitled to influence, and very strongly influence, the composition of both Houses of the Commonwealth. While we may legitimately say that until the Parliament makes a law for a uniform suffrage, the suffrage existing in the states at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth shall prevail for the election of members of both Houses of Parliament it is not a rational provision to allow it to be in the hands of any state, not merely to alter its own suffrage for its own internal Legislature, but to alter it in such a way that it might affect the composition of the two Houses of the Commonwealth Parliament, and the character of its legislation.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Would not the effect of the proposal be that, if female suffrage were granted in Victoria after the establishment of the Commonwealth, it could not be exercised in elections for the Commonwealth?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes; we would have it, and you would not.

Mr. BARTON. -

The right to vote which any person had at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth would be continued. Alterations might afterwards be made in the suffrage of any state, which, if extended to Commonwealth elections, would, as I have said, affect the composition of both Houses of the Commonwealth Parliament and the character of its legislation. That is not a rational provision. It is a rational thing until the Commonwealth Parliament legislates to retain to every person the right which he possesses at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth, but to do more than that would be to give the states power to legislate for the purposes of the Commonwealth. That is a power that the states ought not to have, and I do not think it is consistent with the freedom of state rights which we wish to confer. Our purpose is to protect the states in the management of their own internal affairs, in the election of legislators, and in the carrying out of state legislation. To give a state the power, after the Federal Parliament is established, of altering the composition and character of the Legislature and the legislation of the Commonwealth, would certainly be unwise. The states might be satisfied with the rights that existed at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth, knowing that, by the influence they can exercise on the Parliament of the Commonwealth, they can secure any legitimate reform. If a state passes a law giving the suffrage to persons of sixteen years of age-and an agitation is already in force with that object-that would certainly have a serious influence upon the character of the Commonwealth Parliament.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Where has that been seriously proposed?

Mr. BARTON. -

I have seen it in the newspapers already. Let the honorable member not be under a mistake about this matter. It is quite certain that movements for the extension of the suffrage will not cease at any point at which he thinks they will cease. These movements go on, from time to time, and those who have succumbed to them from the beginning have done so, in many cases, rightly. But these movements will go on. When you have granted female suffrage, then you will have an agitation for the extension of the suffrage to persons who are not of the ordinary age of discretion. It has begun already, and will continue. There is no use blinding our eyes to that fact, because we all of us ought to know it will come on. But, however that may be, the proposal is that the state should not be allowed after the establishment of the Commonwealth so to alter its law as to the franchise that whenever the Commonwealth comes to make a uniform suffrage it will be blocked because it cannot legislate against rights thus created, if one state has altered its law so as to give an expansion of the franchise with which other states do not agree. Still the suffrage of the Commonwealth cannot be made uniform without conceding the Same form of Suffrage, not only to that state, but to all the states in which no agitation for it exists. For instance, if in one state the suffrage were granted to persons of twenty or nineteen years of age, males or females, or both, and the Commonwealth wanted to make a uniform suffrage under this clause, it would be utterly impossible for the Commonwealth to do that without making that concession in every state, whether the persons in that state wished to have the concession mad to them or not. So that, by the action of one state, the Commonwealth would be left in this position: That it must either make a suffrage repugnant to the public feeling of all the states except one, or else not only leave the suffrage not uniform, but rugged and uneven; because it would be deprived of making the suffrage uniform, unless it acted in a manner acceptable to that one state. Now, I do not think it is right that by the action of one state the Commonwealth should be coerced in that manner. This clause would, in my opinion, be a serious blot in the Bill. I am perfectly willing to assent to it if it be amended as I propose, in which shape, I think, it would be entirely liberal to every state in the Union.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I think this clause was put in because of a motion I moved in the Adelaide Convention, and I regret exceedingly that, as the matter was fully discussed there, and this very issue we are now debating was raised and deliberately provided for, the question should be resuscitated now. Not at the instance of a private member, but at the instance of the leader of the Convention, we have here an effort made to upset the decision which was come to in Adelaide. I protest against this course of procedure, and I hope the Convention will stand by what it did in Adelaide. I am supported by a reference to clause 30, which is entirely in harmony with this clause, as it ought to be; but it is entirely out of harmony with this clause as the leader of the Convention seeks to make it. In fact, if this clause is altered as the honorable member now proposes, clause 30 will unquestionably have to be altered also. Clause 30 provides what we intended, namely, that until the Federal Parliament adopts a uniform federal franchise, the qualification of electors and members of the House of Representatives shall be in each state that which is prescribed from time to time (until the Commonwealth Parliament moves in the matter), as the qualification of the electors of the more numerous House of the Parliament of the state. The idea clearly was that until the Federal Parliament moved in the matter, the state Parliaments were free to make the franchise what they pleased. I remember that, at Adelaide, Victoria was mentioned. It was said that it was possible that in the near future Victoria might adopt the adult suffrage. The question was asked whether the franchise in Victoria would permit women to become electors, and it was distinctly stated that the clause, as then framed, would certainly permit them to exercise the franchise. Now, we are asked to go back and provide that only the franchise in force in the various states at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth shall prevail. So that this extraordinary position would be the effect, that whilst in South Australia women had the franchise, in the other colonies they could not get the franchise until the Federal Parliament chose to give it to them. If the clause is altered as our leader wishes it to be altered, the right of the state Parliaments to expand the franchise would cease on the establishment of the Commonwealth, and the federal action in reference to the franchise might not be taken for some years.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Wasn't it a concession to South Australia?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I moved it as a special concession to South Australia; but when an honorable member—either Sir George Turner or Mr. Isaacs—pointed out that the concession ought not to be confined to one colony, but ought to be made large enough to take in any, colony which might desire to avail itself of it, I at once saw the force of that argument. The Convention saw the force of the argument, and it deliberately determined that, until the Federal Parliament acted, the rights of the state Parliaments should be protected. It is that for which I am striving now. I do not want there to be an interval, up to which the state Parliament may act, but during which the state Parliament may not act, although the Federal Parliament has not acted. I want the right of the state Parliament to be protected up to the moment when the Federal Parliament moves. We have done that with everything else. There is not another case where we have stayed the power of the state Parliaments in these optional matters except by the action of the Federal Parliament. Then, why make an exception in this case? I ask honorable members to accept this amendment only with the omission of the words, "at the establishment of the Commonwealth." If those words are omitted we will give effect to what we desired in Adelaide, and in a somewhat more scientific way, I think, than we did then, but if we retain the words we will be reversing our decision in what seems to me to be a most mischievous way.

Mr. HIGGINS. - I find that it was carried by eighteen votes to fifteen votes.

Mr. HOLDER. - I beg to move-

That the proposed amendment be amended by the omission of the words "at the establishment of the Commonwealth."

Mr. BROWN. - Will the honorable member answer Mr. Barton's argument as to uniformity of suffrage?

Mr. HOLDER. - I did not think that that needed answering. If there was a uniform suffrage now, and it was desired not to depart from that uniformity, I think there might be great force in the argument that we should not depart from it. But there is no uniformity now. The only question is whether one out of five states shall have a special form of suffrage and the other four be the other way, or whether two shall have a special form of suffrage, and the other three be the other way.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - Did not we give up to the Federal Parliament the right of the states to determine the suffrage?

Mr. HOLDER. - As soon as the Federal Parliament moved, not before. If the honorable member will look up the debates he will see that the particular issue which is raised in this amendment was raised, debated, and decided then.
Mr. BARTON. -

How many things have we undone which were raised, debated, and decided then? Dozens! For instance what has the Finance Committee done, and very properly done?

Mr. HOLDER. -

We have, I am sorry to say, altered some things, but I have never heard any request made for this alteration. If the suggestion had come from any other member than the leader of the Convention I should have had no complaint to offer, although I should have given the same resistance to it.

Mr. BARTON. -

Am I deprived of the power of suggestion then?

Mr. HOLDER. -

If the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) will look at the debates, he will find that this particular issue was raised at Adelaide, and it was deliberately determined that the power of a state to extend its franchise should be protected till the Federal Parliament took action. We deliberately arrived at a conclusion then, and I do hope we will not upset it now. As to the leader of the Convention losing his personal rights, he has all these as an individual, and a weightier influence far beyond these. I do not like the idea of the special weight and influence which attaches to his position being cast, without the request of a single honorable member, so far as I know, against the decision so deliberately arrived at, and so consistently arrived at.

Mr. BARTON. -

I can assure my honorable friend that many members have been discontented with that decision ever since.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not know that any Parliament has raised its voice against it, or that the Sydney Convention raised its voice against it; and I hope the present Convention will adhere to its previous resolution.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

So far as I understand the history of the affair, it was understood in the Bill of 1891 that each state, according to the American system, should have the right to decide its own franchise, and then, by a certain amount of evolution in public opinion, the Federal Parliament would have the right to dictate its own franchise. That, I think, was admitted by almost the whole of the Convention. Then came the question of South Australia, which we admitted was a great difficulty. A certain state of affairs existed there, and out of deference to that state of affairs, it was decided that no interference should take place in existing conditions. Beyond that the whole matter was left absolutely in the hands of the Federal Parliament. It was looked upon as an infringement of the rights of the Federal Parliament to dictate the franchise in any other state outside South Australia. It was purely in deference to the condition prevailing in that colony that the clause was drafted. I recollect the debate very well, and I do not think the construction Mr. Holder puts upon it could very well be sustained. The point was brought up and it was settled that it should only apply to the people of South Australia.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I assure you the reverse.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

My honorable friend the leader of the Convention appears to attach great force to something he has discovered something which none of us appear to have discovered - that an agitation has arisen to reduce the voting age from 21 years to sixteen years. I think we may dismiss that from our minds, because, if federation is to come about in a reasonable time, we need have very little, if any, fear that when the time arrives we will have reduced the age to sixteen. But this amendment certainly strikes a very unfair and unreasonable it would be to other colonies. South Australia had gone in the van and proposed the adult vote, but New South Wales and Victoria were discussing the matter, and probably would, before long, pass laws on the lines adopted in South Australia. I have no doubt in my mind as to what was the intention at the time. The intention was simply this: We said we were prepared to leave to the Federal Parliament the right to lay down a uniform franchise whenever they chose, but when they did, that they must not take away from anybody who had the right to vote that right. I pointed out then, as I do now, that if the right were simply limited to those who had it at the establishment of the Commonwealth, and a day or two afterwards, or a month or two afterwards, before the Federal Parliament legislated, Victoria should grant this right to the women of that colony, those women would not have any right to vote in the election for the Federal Parliament. That was thought to be very unfair, and, therefore, if my recollection serves me right, it was determined that all who had the right to vote when a uniform franchise was brought into operation should retain that right. If that be not done, see what will happen under this proposal. We should have a uniform franchise with an exception, which is this: That those who at the inception of the Commonwealth have the right to vote, and are not included in that franchise, are to still continue to exercise that franchise; that is, that the women of South Australia having that power at the establishment of the Commonwealth will continue to have it even after the uniform franchise has been laid down by the Parliament. But, perhaps, a few days before the uniform franchise is established our friends in New South Wales will think proper to do justice to the women there, and give them a vote; and a little later we in Victoria may follow the good example of New South Wales and give our women a right to vote. Then we shall have the anomaly that the women of South Australia will have this right, whilst the women of New South Wales and Victoria, because those colonies extended the franchise to women rather later, will be deprived of that right. Surely that is not what we intend. We give the Federal Parliament full power to establish a uniform franchise, and if at that time the states have not thought fit to give the right of voting to certain persons within their colonies those persons will have to suffer. But I do not think we could cut it down any lower than saying that all who have the right to vote at the time of the fixing of the uniform franchise should continue to have that right. We should not, of course, after the federal franchise has been fixed, allow the states to impose a law having the effect of compelling the Commonwealth Parliament to give votes to persons whom it does not think ought to be enfranchised; but it is going too far, and doing what was never intended at Adelaide, and what the leader of the Convention has shown no justification for, to agree to the amendment which has been proposed. I am prepared to agree, so far as I see at present, that, when the Federal Parliament chooses to legislate early or late, as the time may be-after they have laid down such a uniform franchise as they think fit, all persons who up to that time have obtained the right of voting should have that right granted to them.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I should like to remind my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan) of what took place at Adelaide. If he looks at the report of the proceedings of the Convention there, page 732, he will see that Mr. Holder clearly expressed his views in the following words:-

What I wish is that these rights should be preserved which have been acquired up to the time that the Commonwealth makes its franchise.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I do not doubt the debate, but I doubt what the effect of the division was.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

This statement was made just before the division.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I am speaking of the effect of the vote that was given.
Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think that if my honorable friend looks at page 732 of the Adelaide debates he will alter his view. I may also say that some misapprehension has arisen as to the necessity for a uniform franchise being prescribed by the Federal Parliament. That is a mistake. The Premier of Victoria has just spoken as if the franchise must be a uniform franchise all over the states. But if honorable members will look at clause 30, they will see that it simply says that "Until the Parliament otherwise provides the qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives shall be that which is prescribed in each state by the law of the state. So that the Federal Parliament can prescribe, if it thinks fit, that in Victoria males and females may vote, and that in South Australia males and females may vote, but that in Western Australia only males may vote. It is possible, and, inasmuch as the number of electors does not in any way act as the test of the number of the members of the House, it is not at all beyond the bounds of probability, that matters may be so arranged. Therefore I think the criticism of the leader of the Convention upon this provision must fall to the ground.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I only desire to support what I said on this particular issue when it was raised in Adelaide. I would ask the attention of honorable members to page 1196 of the proceedings of the Convention in Adelaide, on 22nd April, 1897. I find it recorded there that Sir George Turner moved precisely the same amendment which I have moved, and used in support of it almost the same arguments. The amendment was to strike out the words "At the establishment of the Commonwealth," and a little later on the words were struck out. So that we voted there upon the same issue.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

My honorable friend is quite right as to what took place at Adelaide, but if he looks at the clause which was carried there, even after being amended by the Drafting Committee's amendments, he will find-as we thought-that the clause as it stands goes far beyond anything that he asked for, even in the course of the debate. I will point out why I say that. If the honorable member looks at clause 44A as it stands, he will find that it is provided there that if a right to vote has been granted by a state the Commonwealth cannot take away that right to vote, even though subsequently the state itself may have taken away the right to vote. That is the clause as it stands now. That is to say, so long as the qualification which gave the vote continues, although the qualification in the state may have ceased, the right to vote must be still continued, and cannot be altered for all time. That is to say, for instance, supposing it should be thought fit at any time to impose certain disqualifications upon persons who have a right to vote at the present time-
Mr. HOLDER. -
Are you going back to alter clause 30?
Mr. OCONNOR. -
Supposing it was seen fit to impose disqualifications on persons voting now, notwithstanding that the persons would thereby be prevented from voting in the state, they would be still entitled to vote for elections in the Commonwealth.
Mr. ISAACS. -
What effect do you attribute to the words "whilst the qualification continues"?
Mr. OCONNOR. -
They are the words upon which I rely for the statement which I made just now. There is a difference made between that qualification and the right to vote. No person who has acquired the right to vote shall, says the provision, whilst the qualification continues, be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from exercising such right at elections for either House of the Parliament of the Commonwealth.
Honorable members will observe that it is not while the right to vote in the state continues, but while the qualification continues, and it is clear that a blot would be placed against the establishment of the Commonwealth law, which I am certain was never contemplated. It seems to me that although Mr. Holder's opinion and view with regard to the matter were clearly expressed, yet this clause goes beyond his view, and, in addition to that, the views he expressed were so directly contradictory to the right to impose uniform legislation on this question that the Drafting Committee thought it fairly a matter for reconsideration. What is the position with regard to the preservation of these rights?
Mr. DEAKIN. -
If you substitute "the right to vote" for "qualification," it would get rid of the difficulty.
Mr. OCONNOR. -
It would; but I am only pointing out the condition in which the clause was left to show that there was a clear apprehension of what the honorable member intended. After all, what is the position in which the Commonwealth stands in this matter? Surely the intention is that this House, which is to represent the whole Commonwealth, shall have its franchise settled by the Parliament of the Commonwealth as early as possible, and that what we are speaking of as a uniform franchise shall be imposed. I agree with the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) that, as a matter of law, it would not be necessary to have this franchise absolutely uniform throughout the Commonwealth. But the difficulty is this: The more differences you create in the franchises of the various states, the more difficulty there will be in arranging for anything like a uniform franchise. I hardly see the use or the necessity for legislation by the Parliament of the Commonwealth upon the subject, if it is met in every state by conflicting systems of franchise, of which any reconcilement is impossible. Therefore, it appears to me just that we should preserve the rights we know of, that is to say, all rights existing under laws in force at the establishment of the Commonwealth; but that in the interval no state should have the right to pass, perhaps, fantastic legislation to satisfy public opinion at a particular time, and to imprint that legislation upon the Constitution for all time.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
A state might increase its representation.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
In this way a state might increase its representation. Whatever franchise may exist in any state, if this clause is to stand as the honorable member (Mr. Holder) wants it to stand, is for ever afterwards to be embodied in the political system of the Commonwealth, and cannot be altered. I say, let up preserve what there is, and what we know of; but do not let us give power to the states to increase the difficulties to uniformity, and to throw further obstacles in the way of anything like a universal franchise.

Mr. HOLDER. -
The difficulty can be got over by the Federal Parliament passing a franchise law.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -
I should like to say a word in regard to the remarks of the honorable member (Mr. Holder), as to the action of the leader of the Convention in bringing before us the amendment which has been proposed. I think that, so far from the honorable and learned member being condemned or criticised in a hostile spirit for introducing an amendment which the close study that he has made of this subject has recommended to him, he should be thanked for what he has done.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I did not intend to make any hostile reference to the honorable and learned member's action; but the amendment nearly slipped through as a draftsman's amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -
Nothing of the kind. How can you say that, when I was ready to explain the amendment? If the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) had not said a word, I should have explained the amendment.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I accept the honorable and learned members assurance.

Mr. BROWN. -

Passing away from this subject, I wish to point out to honorable members that if the clause which we are now considering is to remain as it stands, it will simply mean that, although we ostensibly give to the Federal Parliament the power to provide for a uniform franchise, that power can be only exercised in the direction of framing the franchise upon the broadest suffrage existing in any colony. I can understand that our friends from South Australia, with their ardent desire for maintaining female suffrage—

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Their chivalrous desire.

Mr. BROWN. -

I can understand that, with their chivalrous and ardent desire to retain female suffrage for themselves, and to impose it upon the electors of all the states, they must be very much opposed to the amendment of the leader of the Convention. But I should like to point out that, in regard to this matter, as in regard to others, honorable members appear to be too much inclined to regard the Federal Parliament which we are about to create as a foreign body - as though it were a body which would be disposed to act in a hostile manner, and to tyrannize over the states, instead of as a body composed of those who will have a direct interest in doing the best they can to arrange the suffrage upon the best basis for all the states. If public opinion takes the turn which I have no doubt the honorable member (Mr. Holder) and others hope that it will take, and there is a general desire to include in future arrangements for elections the voting of women, the Federal Parliament can, of course, make provision for that.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I am content to leave the matter to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. BROWN. -

It appears to me that, in his opposition to the amendment, the honorable member is not content to leave the matter to the Federal Parliament. If we do not adopt the amendment proposed by the leader of Convention the practical result will be that the uniform franchise must be based upon the broadest possible suffrage now existing in any state.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That will be so even if the amendment is agreed to.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

The honorable member would not like to see the franchise based upon the Tasmanian suffrage.
Mr. BROWN. -

I do not think that that would be a bad basis for it. I am not at all sure that the honorable member (Dr. Cockburn) will not, before he is very many years older, see a revulsion of feeling in regard to the franchise of South Australia which will astonish him.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Tasmania is decently conservative.

Mr. BROWN. -

We all know that communities go a little astray occasionally; but they correct their mistakes again, and I think it is quite possible that those who are now such ardent advocates of the reform which is so dear to the heart of the honorable member (Dr. Cockburn) may perhaps see that they have gone a little too far, and they or their successors will perhaps desire to retrace their steps. The practical question which I wish to put before the Convention is this: That, as I understand matters, unless the amendment proposed by the leader of the Convention is carried, there can be no uniformity of suffrage except upon the broadest basis adopted in the most radical - perhaps progressive would be a less offensive word - colony of the group. I think that that is a provision which we should not place in the Constitution.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

There are two difficulties in connexion with this matter which we must recognise. There is the difficulty suggested by the leader of the Convention, that you ought not to place it in the power of a state to fix a maximum of uniformity, and the difficulty suggested by a representative of Victoria, that the women of Victoria, so far as the federal suffrage is concerned, should not be placed in a worse position than the women of South Australia. We are not going to argue the policy of this clause again, because it was settled in Adelaide, but I should like to suggest a way out of both these difficulties. It would lie this way, to provide for the insertion of words after "right" in the second line of clause 44A, to this effect, "similar to that enjoyed by the electors of any other state at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth." The clause would then read:-

Any elector who has at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth, or who afterwards acquires, a right similar to that enjoyed by the electors of any other state at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth to vote at elections for the more numerous House of Parliament of the state, &c.

The position would then be this: If Victoria adopted adult suffrage, that is, the South Australian suffrage, which is the maximum suffrage at present as to the right to vote, the women of Victoria would have the right to vote not only in the state elections, but also for representatives in the Federal Parliament because the right would be fixed by the similar or adult suffrage which obtains in South Australia. I think honorable members will recognise the expediency of adopting that course. As long as the change is made, subsequent to the establishment of the Commonwealth, to a suffrage in existence in any other state at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth, then that extension of suffrage should apply to the federal as well as to the state Parliaments. That would conserve every right that Victoria asks for, and at the same time it would recognise the difficulty pointed out by Mr. Barton, that if you make a still further state change, for instance, by fixing sixteen years as the limit, that must not be the test of uniformity with regard to the Federal Parliament. It may be made by the Federal Parliament the universal suffrage, but it is not to be made the test of uniformity by the Constitution. Unless you make an amendment from the point of view of Mr. Barton, you will certainly put it in the power of the states to interfere with the breadth of uniformity of the suffrage. Then you will bring about this result: That any state may, after the establishment of the Commonwealth, bring about the change of suffrage to the extent enjoyed by any other state. If the committee wishes it, perhaps I had better propose that addition. Any state can establish the South Australian suffrage, and why should it not do so? There will be no diminution of the powers of the Federal Parliament, and, if Victoria wishes to extend its suffrage to the same extent as South Australia has done, why should it not be able to do so?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It would exclude baby suffrage.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Undoubtedly it would. Mr. Kingston has pointed out that my amendment would make it apply to the same rights as are in existence at the time of the Commonwealth. That is quite fair. After the establishment of the Commonwealth, if there is to be uniformity on a broader basis, it must be the federal policy, because it is the Federal Parliament that would be affected by the change. I recommend the insertion of the words I propose in the old clause, instead of putting in Mr. Barton's amendment. If Mr. Barton's amendment is put in, I would ask for a change in the grammar, because at the present it is not correct. The word "has" only governs the last part of the disjunctive proposition, whereas it ought to govern both parts, and it should be put after the word "Commonwealth."

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Would there be any difference in the meaning?

Mr. GLYNN. -

There would be a difference in the grammar. My proposal may now be rejected and afterwards be carried out, because I notice to-day that what I proposed three days ago, and which was rejected, was adopted by the Convention.

I do not insist on the particular words I have suggested, but I think they would provide a way out of the difficulty.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

I am sure the Convention owes a deep debt of gratitude to Mr. Glynn, because during the debates he has always been forward in offering a solution of many difficult questions. But in this particular instance I do not go with him, because he aims at uniformity. I believe, in electoral matters and as far as the franchise goes, that in the vigorous life of a free people each individual state should be allowed to work out its own destiny. What does it matter to the Commonwealth whether South Australia has female suffrage, or even if they go further, and say that every one who has attained the age of eighteen years shall have a vote? They can only send a certain number of representatives to the Federal Parliament according to the population of the state. It is not because we have two or three times the number of electors within our own boundaries that the other states have got that we should try to dominate any other state. Under this Constitution South Australia can only send seven members to the Federal Parliament, it matters not whether you give a vote to women or to people of eighteen years of age. Why should not each individual state be permitted to work out its political destiny in its own way? I do not believe in uniformity, even in families. So long as people are created as they are now, they should be allowed to do the best they can for themselves. If that applies to the individual, why should it not apply to the state? I cannot understand honorable members objecting to the state enfranchising its own people when they are limited by their population as to the number of members they can send to the Federal Parliament. So far as women's suffrage is concerned, if we pass the clause in the form in which it is proposed by the leader of the Convention, we shall undoubtedly say to the states that they are not to adopt women's suffrage.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

It does not say anything of the sort.

Mr. HOWE. -

If they adopt women's suffrage it is not to apply to the Federal Parliament. That is the meaning of it. It is to insert the thin end of the wedge to say that the states shall not work out their own destiny so far as the franchise is concerned. The only fear I have in regard to women's suffrage is that there may be an alteration in the franchise of the states that have it, and if so it will be owing to conservative influence. The vigorous life of the Commonwealth depends on the vigorous life of the several states that compose the Commonwealth, and I should be sorry to see any proposal carried that would interfere with the right of the people to adopt any franchise. I should object to a franchise being adopted by a state that would double the number of members it returned to the Federal Parliament. But so long as the representation is on the basis of population, I see no reason why the more populous states or the Federal Parliament should interfere with the state franchise.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I beg to move my amendment in this form—

That the following be added to the clause:—Provided any such right acquired in any state after the establishment of the Commonwealth shall not be more extensive than the same right enjoyed in some other state at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

What will be the good of that?

Mr. GLYNN. -

It will enable any state to adopt a suffrage as extensive as that of South Australia. The complaint is that you tie us down to the narrow suffrage we have at present, and that if we do extend the suffrage the extension will not apply to elections for the Federal Parliament.

Mr. GORDON. -

Supposing that women's suffrage is adopted in Victoria to apply only to women having property.

Mr. GLYNN. -

It would not be so extensive as the suffrage we have in South Australia, and my proviso would meet such a case.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would ask the Hon. Mr. Holder if he desires to submit his amendment?

Mr. HOLDER. -

Yes, I beg to move—

That all the words after "state" be struck out.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

We should be willing to consent to some such modification of the clause.
as this: To insert, after the word "afterwards," the words "and before the Parliament prescribes the qualification of electors for the Houses of Parliament." It would then read: "Any elector who has, at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or who afterwards, and before the Parliament prescribes the qualification of electors for the Houses of Parliament, acquired a right to vote," and so on.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - Is not that the same?

Mr. ISAACS. - No; it takes away one objection. Th

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). - If the Convention desires some compromise as between the clause as it stands and the amendment proposed by our leader, I think that Mr. Glynn's suggestion is an admirable one. There is an objection to the clause which makes me rather incline to the amendment of Mr. Barton. We ought not in this Constitution to interfere more than is absolutely necessary with state rights and state affairs. The clause as it stands will have the effect of exerting an influence in state politics. The representatives of South Australia-and I admire their earnestness and loyalty-have obtained women's suffrage, and are so much in favour of it that they are not content with having it themselves, but they desire to drag other states along with them. I hardly think that is quite fair. If you lay it down in the Constitution that if, after the establishment of the Constitution, any state enlarges or liberalizes- I think that is the favourite word-its franchise, that enlarged or liberalized franchise may be exercised in Commonwealth elections, you deliberately affect state politics, and in this way: If the Government in Tasmania, say, were advocating women suffrage, and if the Opposition were against it, you would put a weapon into the hands of the woman suffrage party by enabling them to say-"The ladies of South Australia have votes, and if you pass this Bill the ladies of this colony also will have votes for both Houses of the Federal Parliament." Now, there may not be very much in the argument, because I look forward to the time when the fact that the women of South Australia having votes will compel the Federal Parliament, in the interests of justice, to make the franchise uniform. I can well understand energetic politicians in opposition, who want to play a good card against the Government, running this proposal for what it is worth; but how absolutely unfair it would be to interfere with our state franchises. I do not think the honorable members for South Australia need to be so earnest in this matter outside their own state, and insist on grafting women's suffrage on the franchise of other states.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We do not ask the other states to do that.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The South Australian representatives evidently want the other states to take a step forward faster than they are inclined to do. Whenever this matter comes forward, they try to engraft women's suffrage on to the franchise of every other state. Now, I ask them to leave us alone. As a representative of Tasmania, I ask them to leave the women of Tasmania to do as they like in the matter. May I point out to them that in the United States the movement in favour of the extension of the franchise to women is dying out? There are two or three little states in the backwoods where they are agitating for women's suffrage, but the movement, generally speaking, is not within the range of practical politics. The South Australian representatives are the champions of women's suffrage in their own colony. Well, they have women's suffrage there, and why should they not leave our women and the men in our Parliament to do as they think fit in regard to this matter? I say to them-'Do not hold out to the women of Tasmania a kind of bait to get them to go faster than they otherwise would go.'

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then you admit it is a bait to the women of Tasmania?

Mr. DOBSON. -

I admit that in many things we are going far too fast already, and I do not wish the representatives of these colonies to attempt to influence the women of our colony in regard to the franchise.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I do not know that there is anybody here who wishes that persons under 21 should have the vote. If there is, I should like him to say so.

Mr. HOWE. -

Your leader said so.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

The leader of the Convention did not say that he wishes it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

What I said was that I do not believe anybody here wants the franchise to be given to persons under 21 years of age. I was not referring to anybody outside. Now, what are we discussing? You certainly have provided in the clause with regard to the amendment of the Constitution to the effect that the South Australian vote, being an adult vote, shall be allowed to continue. You want to carry that out logically, and therefore you provide that any other colony shall be allowed to adopt franchise laws similar to the franchise law of South Australia. I do not suppose that anybody wants to provide more than that; but you want to make the provision of this particular clause broad enough to allow any other colony to extend its franchise to the same extent as the franchise has been enlarged in South Australia. The amendment of Mr. Glynn would certainly allow the colonies to make any laws they like—baby suffrage, I think, was one of the interjections I heard.

Mr. GLYNN. -

None of the states could do that. They could not go beyond the South Australian suffrage, and have baby voters.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

But I think the honorable member will admit that this does not relate to the present time, but to the time when this Bill is passed by the Imperial Parliament.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

We are on very dangerous ground.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think so too, and if we are going to alter the clause at all we had better have a very precise limitation as to what we mean. Many of the colonies consider that, the South Australian law is an innovation on the laws that they are accustomed to, and I do not think that anybody in Australasia wants to go one bit further than South Australia has gone in the direction of extending the franchise.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Oh, yes; there are such people.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Are there? I did not know there were. I do not think any responsible person in Australasia would contend for more than adult suffrage. That being so, may I suggest that we make the clause commence:-

No elector who at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or who, being an adult, has the right to vote at elections, and so on. That is the wording we have used in clause 121, where we have provided that—

Until the qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives becomes uniform throughout the Commonwealth, only one-half the votes for and against the proposed law shall be counted in any state in which adult suffrage prevails.

Mr. HOWE. -

That is the clause for amending the Constitution.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Exactly. I must say, speaking for myself and not for anybody else, that it appears to me that it would be an exceedingly unreasonable thing if South Australia was placed in a different position from the other colonies. I think it is highly reasonable, seeing that we have recognised the position of South Australia, that the other colonies should have the same right. It might prevent much discontent, and it is only fair and just. I would ask the committee to consider whether, if we use the words I have already suggested, we shall not do all that is needed. I think that the amendment I have recommended would express all that is required. However, I only put it as representing my view of a proper policy to be adopted in this case. I do not suggest it on behalf of the Drafting Committee. I speak for myself only. In fact, the Drafting Committee has no politics. Their business is to draft. I think these words would do all that is wanted, and prevent much that is dangerous in the amendment proposed.

Mr. HOLDER. -

After the suggestion that has been made by Sir John Downer, I think the best direct way of taking a vote would be to accept his advice, and insert the words "being an adult" after the word "who" in the second line of clause 44A as it appears in the Bill, and then keep the clause as it stands. I have no doubt that Mr. Isaacs would accept that, but the amendment cannot be submitted until Mr. Barton's proposal is withdrawn.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The suggested amendment would simply go to this extent: That if the Parliament of the Commonwealth wish to make a uniform suffrage, it would be of necessity that that suffrage should be an adult suffrage—that is to say, that it should include womanhood suffrage—and that, until the Parliament of the Commonwealth so legislated, the existing legislation of any colony would be preserved, together with such extension, but not beyond adult suffrage, as might be established. I think, on the whole, that I might consent to that amendment. I therefore withdraw my own amendment and accept this.

The amendments were, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Insert the amendment after the word "afterwards." "Who, being an adult," would mean at the time of the passing of the Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. I beg to move—
That after the word "afterwards" the words "being an adult" be inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not know whether there will be any objection to a further verbal amendment; at any rate, it seems to me to be almost a verbal amendment. There was some question raised, I do not remember what it was, but perhaps Mr. Holder can help me, in regard to it, as to the word "qualification" in this clause.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

An elector would be liable to be disqualified for crime.

Mr. HOLDER. -

If the elector's name was struck off the roll he would lose his right to vote.

Mr. BARTON. -

Is not the right process to alter the word "qualification" to "right"?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Qualification means registration.

Mr. BARTON. -

If the person has a legal right, he has to retain that legal right. Supposing he lost the legal right, but in some mysterious way retained the qualification, it is not intended that the law should help him? It is only intended that the law should help him if he has a legal right. I should say that, unless there is some reason given for what we did in Adelaide, which I do not recollect at this moment, the word "right" would be the proper word to use.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

In our Electoral Act a difference exists between the right to vote and the qualification. A man is qualified to become an elector.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

This is a limitation on the right to vote.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Suppose a man has a right to vote in some colony by virtue of property. While the qualification continues to exist you cannot take away that right.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Suppose he has the right to vote by virtue of an elector's right, and that by some accident he does not renew his elector's right for a day. Is he to be deprived of his vote because he takes out an elector's right the day afterwards? The qualification exists, but the right to vote does not.

Mr. BARTON. -

Would you mind putting that again?

Mr. ISAACS. -

A man is qualified to become an elector. He has not the right to vote until certain conditions are fulfilled; he may have to register, or be may be struck off the roll through some accident. His right to vote is gone through some accident, but his qualification continues. He is a person whose right would not be preserved under this clause, because it applies to the individual—the elector.

Mr. BARTON. -

If he loses the right in his own state by his own negligence, is it not right that he should lose the right also in the Commonwealth?

Mr. ISAACS. -

He may lose it without negligence; he may lose it without any fault of his own. That has been the case with tens of thousands in Victoria.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I was going to put the converse case. In Tasmania, and I suppose in every colony at every election, there are a number of persons whose names are on the roll, but who have lost their qualification. As our Electoral Act makes the roll the evidence of the qualification, you find a number of men who have sold their property to somebody else whose names remain on the roll, but who have lost their qualification, while the name of a man who has bought a property just after the roll has been made up, although he has the qualification, is not on the roll. I think we ought to consider whether the word "qualification" is to remain in the clause, because you may have a number of persons on the state rolls who have lost their qualifications, and who therefore, under this clause as it stands, would not be able to vote in the Commonwealth, but they would have a vote in the state. You will have a roll which governs all state elections, but which does not apply to Commonwealth elections, and you will have to direct an officer to go through the different state rolls, and see whether a man is entitled to vote for the Commonwealth, if you keep in the word "qualification."

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

The honorable member (Mr. Dobson) is perfectly correct in what he says. The rolls are made up from time to time. A man sells a property, and his name remains on the roll for years and years, because no notice is taken of the change of property. The man is not qualified to vote in strict law, but, as his name is on the roll, he is entitled to vote. Therefore the word "right" should be inserted in place of the word "qualification." He has not the qualification, but he has the right to vote, because his name is on the roll, and no objection

[P.1855] starts here

can be taken at the time of an election to any person whose name is on the roll. Under the old system of voting a man, when he came up to vote, had to show his qualification, and, therefore, the roll should settle all questions of dispute. The only question which can be put to him is: Is this your name on the roll? He signs his name, and he is not asked his qualification at all. The word qualification is entirely misleading. It does not carry out the meaning of the clause. Apparently it was put in because the draftsman could not consider it proper to use the word "right." I move-

That the word "right" be substituted for the word "qualification."

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I would suggest to my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) whether it would not be better to chance "elector" into "person," and make the clause begin-"Any person who at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth is or afterwards becomes entitled to." As it stands, the word "elector" excludes persons who are not registered, and there is a very great body of people who are not registered. For instance, in South Australia there are a good many Germans who are not naturalized, but who, under a change in our laws, are becoming naturalized. They are entitled to become electors, but they are not electors, and they would be excluded under the clause as it stands. We do not want that to be brought about. It would apply to other colonies. The first part of the clause deals with persons entitled to vote under laws existing prior to the passing of the Bill. I hope the honorable member will consider the advisability of substituting "person" for "elector" in the beginning of the clause at a subsequent stage.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It seems to me that the suggestion is well worth considering. The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I move-

That the following new clause follow clause 44A:-

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, but subject to this Constitution, the laws in force in each state for the time being relating to elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the state shall, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections in the state of senators and of members of the House of Representatives.

This proposed new clause is to be substituted for the last portion of clause 10, and for the corresponding clause dealing with the House of Representatives. These are clauses which prescribe that until the Parliament makes laws on the subject the laws in force in each state relating to certain electoral matters shall as nearly as practicable apply to elections in that state of senators and of members of the House of Representatives. This is a substituted provision which deals with both the elections to the Senate and the elections to the House of Representatives, and practically puts into one clause the work of two. It shortens up the provisions by speaking of the laws relating to elections instead of enumerating certain laws which are parts of the electoral law, and it guards the change by inserting the words "subject to the Constitution," and saying the application shall be as nearly as practicable. It seems to me to be a beneficial shortening of the matter, and I propose that it should take the place of the two clauses which have been struck out.

The new clause was agreed to.

Clause 52. - (12) Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the sub-section be amended by the insertion, before "fisheries," of the word "Sea"; and the omission of beyond territorial limits."

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

What I am going to say may be a little out of order, but I would like to draw the Drafting Committee's attention to the fact that in clause 52, sub-section (2), there has been a considerable change. Two matters in that sub-section seem to me to deserve attention. First, it is provided that all taxation shall be uniform throughout the Commonwealth. That means direct as well as indirect taxation, and the object I apprehend is that there shall be no discrimination between the states; that an income tax or land tax shall not be made higher in one state than in another. I should like the Drafting Committee to consider whether saying the tax shall be uniform would not prevent a graduated tax of any kind? A tax is said to be uniform that falls with the same weight on the same class of property, wherever it is found. It affects all kinds of direct taxation. I am extremely afraid, that if we are not very careful, we shall get into a difficulty. It might not touch the question of exemption; but any direct tax sought to be imposed might be held to be unconstitutional, or, in other words, illegal, if it were not absolutely uniform.

Mr. BARTON. -

We were inclined to the opinion that "uniform" would not apply so as to prevent the graduating of a tax. I am glad to have the suggestion from the honorable member, because the committee will be going into the matter again.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I will point out to the leader of the Convention the last words of the sub-section, and ask whether they are necessary in view of clause 89? The words are-"No tax or duty shall be imposed on any goods exported from one state to another." I want to point out that, though it might be thought necessary no duty should be imposed on goods, it might be held possible to put a tax on persons passing from one state to another. I should also like to know whether this provision as to navigation and shipping is necessary in view of subsection (1)?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am very much myself, although I cannot say I represent my colleagues, inclined to the opinion that the trade and commerce sub-section is sufficient without the insertion of the words about navigation and shipping. The committee have not come to any conclusion about it, and I would prefer to leave the matter open until we arrive at what is called the drafting stage. As to whether the words in new sub-section (2) are necessary in the light of clause 89, a great deal might be said, and I will pay the matter the best attention.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

As to the emission of "Navigation and shipping," I hope the honorable member is not overlooking the fact that there are many enactments requisite on the part of the colonies, in order to take advantage of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, which are very indirectly, if at all, connected with trade and commerce, but affect in the the most important way the well being of seamen, the safety of passengers, and a variety of other matters of the same nature.

Mr. BARTON. -

In the United States they have been enabled to legislate on the subject under the trade and commerce clause.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

But there the interpretation of the trade and commerce clause, and in fact of the whole Constitution, from the days of Marshall downward, has been quite as liberal as any one could expect, and possibly more liberal than anything we can calculate on.

Mr. BARTON. -

I might mention that this is another of those matters still under the consideration of the Drafting Committee.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

If there be any effect of sub-section (8) as a limitation on sub-section (1), words might be added to make it clear that it was not a limitation. The sub-section in regard to navigation and shipping would then continue to have effect as regards matters not connected with trade and commerce.

Mr. BARTON. -

So as not to limit the construction of sub-section (1).

Mr. DEAKIN. -

So as not to limit the construction of sub-section (1), and give both powers.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I would like to ask Mr. Barton whether it is intended to take away the state control of fisheries on the coast by this clause?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It says "Sea fisheries."

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

But sea fisheries means fishing close to the port. It would not be desirable to take away any power from the state of legislating in regard to these kinds of fisheries. The words "beyond territorial limits," which it is proposed to omit, are very good words. The Federal Council, under the Imperial Act, has exercised the power of legislating for waters beyond territorial limits with great advantage to some colonies. Western Australia and Queensland have both Acts of the Federal Council which have been very useful in controlling fisheries, such as pearl fisheries, far beyond the 3-mile limit. It may probably be said that without those words the power would be there, but I see no reason why we should not take the power.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

You have no power unless it is given.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We have the power - we have an Act.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Because the power is expressly given.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The power is expressly given by the Imperial Act, and I think we ought to take power for the Federal Parliament to legislate on matters beyond the territorial limits. I would like to ask what object Mr. Barton has in desiring to strike out "beyond territorial limits"?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have had considerable doubts about the sub-section all the time. If I remember rightly, it is taken from the Federal Council Act. I do not think any law has been passed by that body in connexion with the matter.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes, in relation to both Queensland and Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Yes, in regard to Queensland and Western Australia.

Mr. BARTON. -

The doubt I feel about the whole matter is this: What effective legislation can be passed in regard to fisheries beyond territorial limits, except so far as that legislation relates to a commercial operation in connexion with the catching and selling of fish? That might possibly be dealt with under the navigation clause, or more presumably, under the commerce clause. I have a doubt as to the efficacy of this sub-section, and whether it is absolutely necessary to give the Commonwealth any rights in this respect.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It is another of the powers derived from the Federal Council.

Mr. BARTON. -
A law giving such a right had better not be subject to conflict. If you have a state law for fisheries within the 3-mile limits under the state, and a Commonwealth law beyond the 3-mile limit, the unlucky fisherman who does not always know whether he is 21/2 or 3 miles away will get into the pickle instead of his fish.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
The state now has no power to legislate.

Mr. BARTON. -
Within its territorial limits?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
No, beyond.

Mr. BARTON. -
The state cannot legislate beyond territorial limits.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Yes, it can, in regard to British subjects.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I must ask the honorable member (Sir John Forrest) to allow the honorable member (Mr. Barton) to address the Chair.

Mr. BARTON. -
Oh, it is usual when I am speaking. I am afraid there is a great deal of law about the subject, and I thought that was the reason the honorable member asked me the question. I quite agree that every state has the right to legislate as to its own fisheries within the territorial limit of 3 miles, but it has no right to legislate beyond that limit. It is questionable whether the power as it stands in the Bill would enable the Commonwealth to legislate for anything beyond territorial limits. Although it has been taken and acted upon in regard to the Federal Council, and granted also that the states have power to legislate within territorial limits, it is nevertheless obvious that you come at once into a conflict of laws, because there are vessels which are occupied in fishing within the territorial limits, and which are at the same time often occupied in fishing without those limits, and very often the men having charge of those vessels will be unable to distinguish whether they are within or without the 3-mile limit. It will be very hard on them that there are two sets of laws, because they will not know where they are. Fishing may sometimes be conducted by wealthy syndicates, but, as a rule, the persons employed in this occupation are a very poor and humble class, who certainly ought not to be bothered by having to ask whether they are under one set of laws or another. I can understand that the law in regard to fisheries within territorial limits might apply to the regulation of ships engaged in fishing outside those limits. But, in the first place, it is a doubtful subject for legislation, and might lead to conflicts. That is why I have proposed "Sea, fisheries." It will allow the Commonwealth to legislate with regard to the whole area.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What are "Australian waters"? How far do they extend?

Mr. BARTON. -

It is impossible to say. I suppose that with all my honorable and learned friend's ingenuity it would puzzle him to say what are "Australian waters." I question whether there is a lawyer in the land who could say. If you insert the word "Sea" before the word "fisheries," and leave out the rest of the provision, you leave one jurisdiction with regard to legislation, and get something clear, and something which the persons conducting, the fishing business can understand; but if you leave the thing as it is you will have something which is not very clear, because you will have a conflict of laws. If you leave the clause out it is possible that it may be done very well without. I do not know myself how far, even with the authority of the Imperial Parliament, any legislation with regard to fisheries may be applicable beyond territorial limits, except as affecting the regulation of the vessels conducting the trade, and that can be done under the trade and commerce or the navigation sub-sections. Consequently, I do not think there is much necessity for the sub-section at all. But my position is this: We do not want to establish a conflict of laws between the Commonwealth and the state with regard to a class of persons who will suffer severely from that conflict. We can, perhaps, do without the clause at all, because I do not know how far any power given to us by the Imperial Parliament will allow us to legislate upon the subject, except with regard to vessels engaged in the fishing trade, and that regulation can be done under the navigation and shipping provisions. We had better avoid falling into either the trouble of legislating outside our jurisdiction or of establishing a conflict of laws. If you insert the word "sea" before the word "fisheries" you will not fall into the trouble you may otherwise fall into. So far as the jurisdiction may extend from the coast outwards, the Commonwealth would be entitled to legislate in regard to these fisheries. Let me take the case of the trawling operations which are now in progress upon parts of our coast. These operations extend over short distances, varying from 15 to 20 miles from the coast. It is obvious that a vessel conducting this trawling ought not to be under one set of laws when she is close to the coast, and under another set of laws when she is compelled to go further out to find fish. I take it that it would be a ridiculous state of things to have two sets of laws applying to such vessels. I shall move the amendment which I have suggested, but I should be just as content if the whole sub-section were struck out.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I hope that we shall keep to the words which have been taken from the Federal Council Act, unless there is a very strong reason to the contrary, as these powers have been given to the Federal Council by the Imperial authorities. I might inform the leader of the Convention that a few years ago an attempt was made in Tasmania to stop or to interfere with a Victorian fisherman, who was fishing for trumpeter off the coast. It is of importance that while we are trying to establish free-trade within the Commonwealth power should be given to the federal authority to say that there shall be no obstruction to fishing upon any part of the coast by any member of the Commonwealth.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I hope that the leader of the Convention will pause before he asks us to finally decide to strike out these words. Under the Federal Council Act power was given to legislate for the control of fisheries beyond the territorial limits; and, whatever the effect may be, there is no doubt that by the passing of that Act power was given to the Federal Council to do that which neither any particular state alone nor all the states collectively could do. It was a concession and a grant to Australia. As to its importance, I recollect being present at a session of the Federal Council when a Bill was introduced, I think by Sir James Lee Steere, affecting the control of pearl fisheries in Western Australian waters, but beyond the territorial limits. That Bill was, I believe, to some extent founded upon a similar measure passed at the instance of Sir Samuel Griffith, and which related to Queensland fisheries; and I have the most lively recollection that Sir Samuel Griffith, than whom there has been no greater federal apostle, always attached very considerable importance to this particular clause, as giving to Australia a power which was not possessed by the states, either collectively or individually. It seems to me that if we retain a clause of this description we ought to amend the previous clause, which regulates the application of the laws of the Commonwealth, by providing that they shall run in Australian waters. Of course they only apply to British subjects and to British ships. That provision will necessitate either a definition of "Australian waters," or the constitution of Some authority by which this definition may be framed. For my own part, I am disposed to think that the better plan would be to provide this definition within the four corners of the Bill. By parallels of latitude and longitude that could be easily done, or the power could be declared to exist in the Imperial Executive or the Federal Executive or the Federal Executive, with the consent of the Imperial Executive, could by proclamation provide for the definition of what should be termed Australian waters. But the point to which I wish to direct especial attention is this: The Bill, as we passed it, gives us an authority which otherwise it will be impossible to exercise in Australian waters, and we have proof that this is a matter of considerable importance by the fact that the chief legislation of the Federal Council has been in connexion with the exercise of these powers. I ask the leader of the Convention not to lightly surrender the concessions to Australian self-government such as will be given if we retain the Bill as we passed it in Adelaide and Sydney, and in the shape in which we originally had it in the Federal Council.

Is it much better than the blessed word "Mesopotamia"?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I think it is of considerable importance. I think the Premier of Western Australia will say that it has been of considerable importance, and that he would be sorry indeed to lose it. If we had the good fortune to have representatives of Queensland in this Convention tonight, I am sure the same testimony would be forthcoming. As regards what has been said by Mr. Barton as to the possibility of the clashing of state regulations and federal legislation, my recollection and experience is that this legislation is generally prompted by the state which is nearest to the fisheries concerned, and that it simply harmonizes with the local legislation on the subject. If you had not this power it would simply stand thus: Instead of the possibility of the clashing of local and Commonwealth legislation you would be utterly without power to regulate the fisheries once those engaged in them had passed without the territorial limits. I think the possibility of clashing which has been referred to will be infinitely preferable to the absence of any Australian law to regulate the subject. I would urge Mr. Barton not to ask us at this particular moment, without further consideration, without an opportunity of studying the legislation which has been passed on the subject by the Federal Council, to commit ourselves, by striking out these words, to a deprivation of Australia of a power which is sought to be conferred on it willingly by the Imperial Government, following the course which was adopted with regard to the Federal Council Act, and which can undoubtedly be exercised to the advantage of Australia.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I feel a difficulty about this matter, because I cannot understand how any law, unless it was merely for the regulating and registration of vessels-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

There is also the collection of duties in our case.

Mr. BARTON. -

I cannot understand how any law affecting fishing outside territorial limits would be operative if once tested. It is all very well to say that the Imperial Government can give us power to legislate outside territorial limits, but the Imperial Parliament cannot give us any powers which they do not possess themselves.

Mr. SYMON. -

How far is the limit to extend beyond territorial limits?

Mr. BARTON. -

That is what I say. The words here are "Australian waters." The words in the Federal Council Act were "Australasian waters." Will any honorable member point out the difference between Australasian waters and Australian waters? Can he tell me where he finds the line of demarcation?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You can legislate for British subjects.

Mr. BARTON. -

You can; but that is shipping law, and you have power already to do that under the Constitution. You would not get any additional power from the words "beyond territorial limits."

Mr. KINGSTON. -

You would have to define the waters.

Mr. BARTON. -

Will any honorable member assist me in defining, within the limits of the law, what Australian or Australasian waters are? It would be idle to take a power to legislate which would break down immediately it was tested.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Can there be any Australian waters beyond the territorial limits?

Mr. BARTON. -

No. But in connexion with an Act like the Naval Agreement Act you may make an agreement for the purpose of effectuating your compact. You may say that certain ships shall not be taken beyond Australian waters, and you may define those waters, but the Act would simply be a contract between the two parties. If you were to attempt to define Australian waters except within the limits of a contract you would have no locus standi or aqua standi at all. The Queensland Fisheries Act does define Australian waters in the schedule. That is a Federal Council Act, and so far as it applies beyond the 3-mile limit it would if tested break down. Surely we are too sensible to take powers here which would break down in their exercise, and would make the Commonwealth not a power but a laughing-stock. I would suggest strongly that the words "in Australian waters beyond territorial limits" would have no application in law to give them any validity. It would be an attempt to transfer power from the British authority to the Australian authority, which the British authority does not possess.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It is the highway of Great Britain.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes; Britannia rules the waves. The sea is a highway that belongs to all nations. We have a right of passage on it under international law; but how does that help us? Your jurisdiction is limited to the land and 3 miles of water around it. You have no more jurisdiction, and the Imperial authority could not give it to you.

Mr. SYMON. -

How could you regulate a fishery to which all the nations of the earth have access as well as yourself?

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, and this was suggested to me. Supposing that the Commonwealth did pass such a law, and a German ship over 3 miles from land took no notice of that law, what could be done? I replied in the words which were attributed to a certain speaker when he was asked what would happen if he "named" a member. Then I was informed that the only thing the Federal Council ever did was to pass a law which, if it was tested, would be laughed at. We had better alter these words to "Fisheries," if we do not strike them out altogether. That will give the Commonwealth the power of legislating within its own limits, and outside them, if there is any power to legislate outside its limits. Is it not better, after all, that we should leave the state to legislate within its own borders? There can be no legislation outside that 3-mile limit, except under the navigation and shipping law, under which we have sufficient power to regulate matters for all practical purposes.
Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

The original Act gives the power to the Federal Council to regulate the pearl-shell and beche-de-mer fisheries in Australian waters beyond the territorial limits. Then, in pursuance of that Act, in 1889 an Act was passed by the Federal Council limiting the power of the original Act by providing that-

This Act applies only to British ships and boats attached to British ships.

Therefore, the jurisdiction is complete. There was a very elaborate and most important decision delivered some years ago by Judge Cockburn with respect to a murder on the high seas. The question was whether in England a foreigner, a Dutchman, could be tried for a murder on the high seas committed beyond 3 miles from the territory. Although the man had been found guilty of murder, Judge Cockburn, one of our best, Judges, held on appeal that he could not be found guilty according to the English law, the murder not having been committed within the 3-mile limit. But this only refers to British subjects, and it is most important as regards Queensland and Western Australia that this power should be retained. Therefore, why not retain the words used in the British Act of Parliament giving the Federal Council the power? I see no difficulty in adopting the clause in the Bill as it now stands.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I take it that a British ship is floating British territory, and just as the British Parliament has the right to legislate in reference to that ship, so it has the right to delegate its right of legislation to another Legislature. That is what was done in connexion with the Federal Council, and it is what is proposed to be done here. Therefore, I hope we shall adhere to it. As pointed out by Mr. Douglas, that is the limitation affecting Queensland, and no doubt Western Australia, namely, that their control applies only to British subjects and to British ships.

Mr. BARTON. -

Then the navigation and shipping law goes beyond that power.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I think not. That is distinctly provided. The other provisions of the Act only apply within the Commonwealth and to ships whose port of clearance and destination is specified; but otherwise there is no power to legislate beyond the territorial limits. On a previous occasion the leader of the Convention made a similar point as to want of uniformity and clashing, arising from the state and Commonwealth jurisdictions. The preamble of the Queensland Act, which, no doubt, is followed in the Western Australian Act, shows that the very reason for asking the Federal Council to legislate on this subject was for the purpose of securing uniformity and preventing anything in the shape of clashing—for extending Queensland legislation beyond territorial limits. The recital in the preamble to the Act is as follows:—

Whereas, by certain Acts of the Parliament of the colony of Queensland, provision has been made for regulating the pearl-shell and beche-de-mer fisheries in the territorial waters of that colony; and whereas, by reason of the geographical position of many of the islands forming portion of that colony, vessels employed in such fisheries are, in the prosecution of their business, sometimes beyond the territorial jurisdiction of Queensland; and whereas it is expedient that the provisions of the said Acts should extend and apply to such vessels during all the time they are so employed, and that for that purpose the provisions of the said Acts, so far as they are applicable to extraterritorial waters, should be extended to such waters by an Act of the Federal Council of Australasia.

Mr. DEAKIN. —
The preamble to the Western Australian Act is identical.

Mr. HIGGINS. —
What is the number of that Act?

Mr. KINGSTON. —
It is an Act of the Federal Council passed in the session of 1888. I think the leader of the Convention will see that the power so conferred for the purpose of securing uniformity, and which has been exercised for that purpose—

Mr. BARTON. —
You take the trade and commerce, navigation, and shipping provisions together, and they give you every bit of this power, so far as those Acts were valid.

Mr. KINGSTON. —
I do not think they give us any power to legislate beyond territorial waters.

Mr. BARTON. —
Well, then, nobody else can.

Mr. KINGSTON. —
Not even the Imperial Parliament, with reference to a British ship, which is a portion of British territory? I take it that it can, that it intended to do so, and that it did. The Imperial Parliament passed a Bill conferring in good set terms the power and the Bill was assented to in the ordinary course. A Bill was passed by the Federal Council, in pursuance of that power, for Queensland and also for Western Australia; each Bill was reserved for Imperial consideration, and the Imperial consent was granted. I trust, at least, that at this moment our leader will not ask us to strike out the provision.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I think the clause is very well as it is. We have toiled over the clause for an hour, and we have caught nothing. I think we ought to pass on to the next subject. Great Britain has given us a concession in the Federal Council Act, and I do not think we ought to inquire too closely into her title. We can assume that it is good enough. It would be a mistake to limit the extension of these fisheries outwards, and it would be a pity to bring them further inshore. It would be a pity to bring the federal authority within the territorial waters. The question of fishing within the territorial waters is a local question, much better left in local hands. It would be much better to leave the clause as it is, and to go on with the next business.

Mr. BRUNKER (New South Wales). -

I would suggest to the leader of the Convention that this matter should be given very much further consideration. It is one of far greater importance than perhaps honorable members can realize just now. I am one of those who have believed for very many years that our fishing industry has been very seriously neglected. I am also of the opinion that it might be made one of our most profitable resources. It is quite clear to me from the course the discussion has taken that this is a matter which might be further considered, and I would suggest to my honorable friend that we might postpone the consideration of the clause until he has been able to inquire into the technicalities and also to understand what has been done by the Federal Council.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think there is any doubt about the legal position.

Mr. BRUNKER. -

If there is any doubt about the legal position, we should have some power to deal with this matter from a local stand-point. It is said a little practical experience is worth a great deal more than theory. It happens that during the last fortnight or three weeks we have been experimentalizing in New South Wales in regard to trawling for deep-sea fishing. I am pleased to say that an hour or two ago I received a telegram from the person in charge of the trawling vessel to say he has had very great success again to-day. He says-

I am glad to find your opinion as to the Newcastle Bight has been borne out. We trawled there at different depths, and obtained over 15,000 fishes. We got these in three travels, and as much as one ton in one cast of the net. We have now tested waters 8 miles by 20 miles.
So he has been beyond territorial limits. The telegram goes on—

I am leaving for the Manning to-morrow, and will try the southern waters after that visit is made. I could not wish for more success than has been obtained to-day.

I think that is very pleasing information in regard to this industry, and, therefore, I suggest the subject should receive attention. We should endeavour to legislate in such a way that we will contribute to the benefit which is likely to be derived from the industry.

Mr. Howe. —

Take possession, that is the way to do it.

Mr. Brunker. —

I should like to know from the leader of the Convention whether it is likely anything can be suggested which would give us the power to treat this matter in the same form as it has been treated by the Federal Council? If the Federal Council can establish a law which gives the right to fish in Australian waters, I see no reason why this Convention should not give the Federal Parliament equally liberal powers.

Mr. Barton (New South Wales). —

I will ask, in a few moments, that progress be reported, because I think a little thought over this matter will lead us to a very early determination tomorrow morning. The position is that, under the commerce clause and the navigation and shipping clause, there is a right to deal with a British subject carrying on a trade. If people go fishing for pearl-shell, schnapper, or anything else, when they come back, and the fish is marketable, then the trade and commerce clause will apply. If the trade is conducted purely within the limits of the territory, then the state itself can deal with it. That is so far as licences are concerned—the mere licence for carrying on trade. The registration of the vessels themselves comes clearly under the navigation and shipping law, so that it seems, one way or another, there are already powers in the Commonwealth and the state which render any question unnecessary. I cannot see how the addition of the words would give any added powers or any particular validity to a law if the law exceeded that for the regulation of trade apart from it, and for the regulation of navigation and shipping. Decisions would be liable to be tested, and there would arise the danger of litigation, which honorable members depreciate.

Sir John Forrest (Western Australia). —

Before progress is reported, I would like to say that, in my opinion, no reason at all has been advanced why those words should not remain in the Bill. They have been in since 1891, and now it is suggested to remove them because some other words of a general character may cover the ground. It should be plainly stated that the Federal Parliament will have power to deal with the question. An Imperial Act was passed giving the Federal Council power to legislate in this matter in regard to British ships and British people in the territories named in the Schedule. The Federal Council passed the Queensland and Western Australian Acts. Those Acts have been in force for years, and there has been no difficulty. Duties of customs have been collected, the trade has been protected, the pearl fisheries have been protected, police regulations have been enforced, and everything that was expected and desired has been attained. That being so, why should we hesitate to put these words in this Bill? The Imperial Parliament surely considered the question when they passed the law giving the Federal Council power; the Home Government thought of it when they advised Her Majesty to assent to the two Bills—the Queensland Act and the Western Australian Act; and it is rather too late for us to be afraid to give the Federal Parliament power in this direction. If we do not put these words in, it is questionable whether it will be within our power to legislate, because the Federal Council Act will be swept away, the Imperial Act will be of no effect, and we shall have to fall back upon the trade and commerce sub-section or the navigation and shipping sub-section in order to exercise authority. This matter is of considerable importance in connexion with the pearl fisheries, the beche-de-mer fisheries, and the deep-sea fisheries. We should not be acting wisely at all. I am speaking on behalf of a colony that has a great interest in this matter, and I am not saying too much when I urge honorable members to take the power under this Constitution which has been given to us after a good deal of trouble by the Imperial authorities. My honorable friend (Mr. Barton) says that the power exists already. We have been told that a good many times. Perhaps it does. But if it exists already, hidden away in other clauses, what object can there be in not having it inserted here in plain words? I hope that the words will be allowed to remain in the Bill. I presume that they refer to all kinds of fisheries. The pearl fisheries are the most important to us, and, of course, the deep-sea fisheries are also important. In regard to the 3-mile limit, I do not think that the Federal Parliament need trouble itself. It will be very undesirable that the sea within 3 miles of our coasts should be under the control of the legislation of the Federal Parliament. The Federal Government will not have the means of carrying out the provision without great expense. The police protection which will be necessary will be expensive. It will require an army of officers all over the coasts to supervise our local fisheries, and that can be better and more cheaply done by the local Government.
Mr. OCONNOR. -

The Western Australian and the Queensland Acts are preserved by this Constitution. All Acts passed under the Federal Council of Australasia are preserved.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That removes some of my objections, but there are other places besides Western Australia and Queensland. Some of the finest pearl fisheries in the world are located on the coast of the Northern Territory of South Australia.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

You might want to extend your Act.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Certainly we might. I hope the leader of the Convention will not be so—shall I say obstinate? No. I will say that I hope he will give way on this matter, as it is one that is considered of very great importance by the people of Western Australia, and, I am sure, also by all those colonies that have fisheries, especially pearl fisheries and beche-de-mer fisheries.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

The Right Hon. the Premier of Western Australia need not have any apprehension with regard to the local control of fisheries, inasmuch as it is only a concurrent power which is proposed. Until the Federal Parliament chose to exercise it the power of control in the several states would absolutely remain. I have no doubt that the control of fisheries within territorial limits would remain with them for all time. I interpose at the present moment to call the attention of the leader of the Convention to the fact that there are sections in both these Acts which a good deal exceed mere trade and commerce regulations, and regulations relating to navigation and shipping. In the Queensland Act there are provisions regulating the employment of Polynesian labour, and, curiously enough, the Western Australian Act also contains a special provision with regard to the coloured labour employed in those fisheries. I find, too, that in the schedule to the Western Australian Act jurisdiction is actually given, and with the Queen's consent, over the whole of an enormous territory of ocean. The boundaries are parallels of latitude and longitude, and an enormous slice of the Indian Ocean is brought within the scope of this Act.

Mr. SYMON. -

What will the Russians say to that?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That is not a matter of concern, but a jurisdiction which Her Majesty's Government have thought fit to define cannot be a mere façon de parler.
The schedule to which I am drawing attention confers rights and powers which the Imperial Government have thought worth conferring. These circumstances might be weighed by the leader of the Convention and his colleagues before they lightly part with anything which contains a promise of a power. Personally I will seek to keep in this Constitution not only every power, but every promise or shadow of a power, we can obtain for the Federal Parliament.

On the motion of Mr. BARTON, progress was then reported.

The Convention adjourned at three minutes past ten o'clock p.m.
Friday, 4th March, 1898.

Petitions: Appeals to the Privy Council - Days of Meeting - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at thirty-four minutes past ten o'clock a.m.

PETITIONS.

APPEALS TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria) presented a petition from the Melbourne and Metropolitan Board of Works praying that the Convention would preserve the right of the Queen's Australian subjects to appeal to the Privy Council, and moved that it be received and read.

The motion was agreed to.

The CLERK read the petition, as follows:-

To the Right Honorable the President and the Members of the Australasian Federal Convention, in session assembled.

The petition of the Melbourne and Metropolitan Board of Works humbly sheweth-That your petitioner is a body corporate created by Act of the Parliament of Victoria, composed of representatives elected by the councils of the city of Melbourne and the municipal councils of the other 23 cities, towns, boroughs, and shires of the metropolis of the said colony, which comprises an area of about 160 square miles, with a population of more than 451,000, who will be responsible for rates to be levied by your petitioner.

That the principal duties assigned to your petitioner are to manage and extend the water supply of the said metropolis, and to undertake the sewering and draining thereof.

That in relation to the former of the said duties your petitioner is charged with liability to the Government of Victoria for a sum of £2,359,156, the balance of money lent for construction of the waterworks by creditors who are mostly resident in Great Britain. And for extension of the said works, and to sewer and drain the metropolis, your petitioner has borrowed £3,893,580 upon debentures, the holders of a large proportion of which reside in the United Kingdom.

That your petitioner will need to borrow upwards of another million of money for completion of the work now in hand, and will need to borrow successive millions at recurring intervals hereafter to meet the obligations so entered into.
That in expending the money so borrowed, and the revenue from water supply, your petitioner has entered into very many contracts and engagements with individuals and firms in this colony, New South Wales, and England. That those obligations, contracts, and engagements have been entered into with the mutual knowledge and confidence of both parties that, in the event of litigation arising out of them, recourse for the final settlement thereof could be had to the highest tribunal of the empire, Her Majesty the Queen in Council.

That, as your petitioner is informed, and believes, it has been decided by your honorable body that by the Bill for federating the Australasian colonies, which is under consideration, such right of appeal to the Sovereign shall be abolished.

That, as your petitioner respectfully submits, such abolition, if enacted and made law, would seriously derogate from the existing rights of creditors and contractors with your petitioner on the one hand, and of your petitioner on the other, and would materially weaken the credit and put a difficulty in the way of your petitioner when floating loans in the United Kingdom, as it will be necessary for your petitioner to do hereafter.

That apart from the aforesaid considerations, in so far as your petitioner represents and can speak for the inhabitants of the metropolis, your petitioner respectfully submits that to take away the right of Her Majesty's subjects in Australasia to appeal to Her Majesty is to break a connecting link between Australasia and the mother country, and that the binding of the Australasian colonies together does not necessitate, and ought not to be made the occasion for, in any way, unbinding Australasia from England.

Your petitioner, therefore, humbly prays that your honorable body will be pleased to reconsider the question of the Highest Court of Appeal and to strike out of the Bill for federating certain of the Australasian colonies the clause which would deprive Her Majesty's subjects in Australasia of the right of appeal to Her Majesty.

And your petitioner will ever pray.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I cannot, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, allow that petition to pass without calling attention to its inaccuracy.

The PRESIDENT. -

I do not think this is the occasion on which to discuss the petition.

Mr. WISE. -

Not as a matter of privilege?

The PRESIDENT. -

The motion was that the petition be received and read. It has been read.
Mr. WISE. -

Until a petition is read we do not know what is in it. There is a statement in this petition which is manifestly incorrect.

The PRESIDENT. -

There will be an opportunity of discussing the petition when the matter comes up in committee.

Mr. WISE. -

Am I in order in moving that the petition be printed?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I would submit that the honorable member is not in order, because a petition is printed as a matter of course. At any rate, it is so under the New South Wales standing orders.

The PRESIDENT. -

It is not so in this Convention. The standing orders of the House of Assembly of South Australia provide that notice must be given of a motion for the printing of a paper unless the motion is moved by a Minister. If the honorable member desires to move that this petition be printed he must give notice.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria) presented petitions from the Incorporated Institute of Accountants, Victoria; the Victorian Division of the Society of Accountants and Auditors Incorporated, England; and the Accountants and Clerks Association Limited, praying the Convention to preserve the existing right of the Queen's Australian subjects to appeal to the Privy Council, and moved that they be received.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

Before that motion is put, I should like to ask the Hon. Mr. Fraser whether these petitions contain a statement similar to that in the last petition-namely, that the Convention has abolished appeals to the Privy Council?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I would submit that the honorable member has no right at this stage to interrogate any honorable member who presents a petition. That would practically allow the honorable member to make certain statements. Standing Orders No. 104 and 105 have reference to the manner of dealing with petitions. Standing Order No. 105 says-

No member shall move that a petition be printed unless he intends to take action upon it, and informs the House thereof.

If the honorable member is allowed to ask the Hon. Mr. Fraser questions, he is practically permitted to initiate a debate.

The PRESIDENT. -
I think the honorable member is in order. He can speak to the question that the petition be received, and in so doing he may ask any honorable member a question.

Mr. Wise (New South Wales).- Then I object to the petition being received, and I shall take the same course, if the Convention approves, with regard to all petitions in this form. I do so on the grounds that the petitions misstate what has been done by the committee. They declare that the Convention has abolished the existing right of the Queen's Australian subjects to appeal to Her Majesty in Council, and the expression is used—"The effect of depriving Australians of this right of approach to the Sovereign." I am not going to initiate any debate, but honorable members know that it is an utter misconception of the work of the Convention to say that we have abolished appeals to the Privy Council. No such thing has been done.

Mr. Fraser. - What have we done?

Mr. Wise. - All we have done is to say that there shall be no appeal as of right, but the prerogative appeal will continue almost if not entirely as heretofore. To say that the right of appeal has been abolished is to state what is not the fact. If the Bill becomes law, matters will practically be left in the same state as in Canada. That is to say, the Queen in Council will herself give permission to appeal in all cases of public importance.

Sir John Forrest. - Between states.

Mr. Wise. - And in all cases between states. The Queen and the Privy Council will have the right of interpreting the phrase "public importance," as they have done in regard to appeals from the Dominion of Canada. It is, I have no doubt, unintentional, but it is a complete misstatement and misconception of what has been done to say that the right of appeal to the Privy Council has been taken away. Sir John Forrest interjected that the appeal under the Bill would only apply to cases between states. That is not so. It will apply to questions between states raised at the instance of citizens, and to suits between citizens. In using the words "public importance" the Judiciary Committee have tried to adopt the language of the Privy Council itself in determining what appeals shall be allowed from the Dominion of Canada. It is a misconception that would be injurious to the future of the Bill, if it were allowed to pass, and if it were tacitly acquiesced in by a petition like this being received, that appeals to the Privy Council have been abolished. I object, therefore, to the petition being received.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

It would be very wrong if the honorable member were allowed to take a course such as this with regard to petitions that are respectfully worded. Whether the petitions are erroneous or not with regard to the statements contained in them, I do not think it is at all usual, if the petitions are framed in proper and respectful language, to comment upon their contents, and the honorable member is only doing that for an ulterior purpose. Everything the honorable member has said now he could say on the debate with regard to the clauses, and on a more fitting occasion.

Mr. WISE. -

I wish to correct a misapprehension as soon as possible.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

The honorable member wants to get some statements into the press, which I have no hesitation in saying are, in my opinion, absolutely incorrect. The statement of the honorable member that the right is not taken away by the Bill now before the Convention, so far as I can judge, is incorrect. It may be his opinion that that is not the case, but it is not the opinion of people outside who are deeply concerned in this question.

Mr. WISE. -

I want to move a misapprehension.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

The honorable member has no right to interrupt me.

Mr. WISE. -

I rise to order. The honorable member has, unintentionally no doubt, imputed to me an ulterior purpose. I desire to be allowed to make reference to that.

The PRESIDENT. -

Does the honorable member object to the words as offensive?

Mr. WISE. -

Yes, unless the honorable member allows me to make an explanation.

The PRESIDENT. -

The honorable member cannot make an explanation to interrupt an honorable member who is in possession of the Chair. When the honorable member states that the words are offensive, no doubt Sir Joseph Abbott will qualify them.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I am exceedingly sorry that the honorable member is so sensitive.

Mr. WISE. -

I am not going to be misrepresented by anybody.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I must appeal to you, sir, to keep this unruly member in order. Every honorable member addressing himself to the Convention under parliamentary rules, as the honorable member knows, is to be heard without interruption, and I think gentlemanly instincts ought to lead honorable members to listen to one another without interruption. The honorable member has made a statement, and he takes exception to my charging him with having done so for an ulterior purpose. If that word "ulterior" is offensive to him in any shape or form, I will withdraw it. But I cannot imagine for what purpose, except that it might have an effect hereafter upon the public mind, the honorable member took this extraordinary course of objecting to the petition. The honorable member stated that no right which exists at present has been taken away.

Mr. WISE. -

I did not.

Mr. SYMON. -

The honorable member did not say that.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

The honorable member said that every right which subjects now had was retained in this Bill.

Mr. SYMON. -

He did not say that.

Mr. WISE. -

I must ask leave to correct.

The PRESIDENT. -

The honorable member will have an opportunity of explaining afterwards, if he wishes.

Mr. WISE. -

Am I not at liberty?

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

Chair!

The PRESIDENT. -

Order.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

The honorable member takes a most unusual course. Evidently he wants to prolong the sitting of this Convention unreasonably. This extraordinary exception that he has taken to the petition might have been dealt with hereafter, at the proper time, and in the proper place. Whatever the honorable member said, the impression left upon my mind, and upon the minds of Sir William Zeal and Mr. Fraser, who are not novices in parliamentary law, was that the honorable member said that practically nothing was proposed to be taken away from the subjects of the Queen in this Bill.

Mr. FRASER. -
That is what I understood.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
If the honorable member refers to clause 75, he will see that it provides: No appeals shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from any court of any state, or from the High Court or any other federal court, except that the Queen may, in any matter in which the public interests of the Commonwealth or of any state or of any other part of her dominions are concerned, grant leave to appeal to the Queen in Council from the High Court. The honorable member tried to make out that these interests were the interests of the inhabitants of the state. That is absolutely true as a collective body, but as individuals it is absolutely incorrect to make such a statement. The honorable member knows well enough that under clause 75 the subject will have no right of appeal whatever. The state matters which affect the interests of the Commonwealth, or affect the state and not the individual, will be the subject of appeal.

Mr. SYMON. -
But they affect the individual and the state.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Again I would appeal to my honorable friend to bear in mind that it is disorderly for him to interrupt any honorable member who is addressing the Chair.

Mr. SYMON. -
I think the honorable member is very disorderly.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
The honorable member invariably interrupts everybody who disagrees with him.

Mr. SYMON. -
I rise to a point of order.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -
What is the point of order?

Mr. SYMON. -
That being the most good-natured and least interrupting member-

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
That is not a point of order.

Mr. SYMON. -

The point of order is, that the remarks of the honorable member are not according to fact, and they are offensive, and ought to be withdrawn.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

That is no point of order.

The PRESIDENT. -

I call attention to the fact that the remark referring to Mr. Symon has been objected to as offensive. I should like to call the attention of honorable members generally to the fact that it is not usual to debate these matters at length. There will be an opportunity later on of doing so.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I am quite prepared to allow the matter to drop, but I say the course which has been taken has been very exceptional, and a course which I have never known to be taken in another place, during eighteen years that I have been there, with regard to petitions. Mr. Wise says he has no ulterior object. He said the word "ulterior" was offensive. As he had no ulterior object, he had no right to make the remarks he did.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I very greatly regret that at this early stage-

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -

I rise to a point of order, that is, that the discussion is altogether irregular. I will point out what May lays down on the practice with regard to petitions. Our standing orders 104 and 105 do not contain explicit words stating whether or not the question can be debated on the motion that the petition be received, but that is the practice, and that practice is in pursuance of the practice of the House of Commons, which is referred to in the following words by May:-

It will be observed that although the standing orders restrict debate to urgent cases (this is in reference to petitions), that restriction does not extend to a petition complaining of a matter affecting the privileges of the House, such a case being governed by the general rule that a question of privilege is always entitled to immediate consideration. But if the matter does not demand the immediate interposition of the House the course would be to appoint by order that the petition be taken into consideration on a future day, and be printed for the information of the House.

And, then, May goes on to lay down the practice that when a notice of motion is given, and the motion comes on that the petition be printed, the matter can be debated. I submit that at the present time this debate is out of order.

The PRESIDENT. -
I should be very glad to rule in favour of the point raised by Sir Richard Baker, but I do not think that our practice permits of it. I think that the motion which has been moved, that the petition be received, is open to debate; but still, at the same time, I would again venture to remind honorable members that there will be no opportunity of discussing this matter.

Our time is short; there has been a speaker on each side of the question, and probably that will induce an early conclusion of the debate.

Mr. SYMON. -
   In deference-
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
   Oh, oh!

Mr. SYMON. -
   Why should Sir William Zeal, who is the greatest sinner in respect of interruptions, interfere on this occasion? We bear with him as long as we can.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
   I do not want you to bear or forbear.

Mr. SYMON. -
   I was going to say, in deference to the indication you, sir, have given, that I shall not continue the remarks I intended to make. I simply wish to deprecate, at this stage, the introduction of heat into a matter which is one purely of constitutional arrangement. I would deprecate, also, the fact that my honorable friend who has just sat down is more responsible than any other honorable member of this Convention for introducing heat into the discussion. I may say that I mean Sir Joseph Abbott. I heard him trying to fix the blame on Sir Richard Baker.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
   My honorable friend should not be a listener.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
   In order to save time, I beg to present petitions which, I believe, are worded in the same language as the last petition. One is from the Victorian Chamber of Manufactures, a second from the Society of Notaries of Victoria, a third from fifteen or twenty insurance companies, underwriters' companies, and other companies with foreign relations, and a fourth from the Cambrian Society.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
   I beg to present similar petitions from the Melbourne Chamber of Commerce, the Melbourne Chamber of Mines, the Geelong Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures, the Federal Institute of Accountants, the

I beg to present similar petitions from the Victorian Employers' Union, the Pastoral Association of Victoria and Southern Riverina, and the Melbourne Wool Brokers' Association.

The petitions were received.

DAYS OF MEETING.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I should like to ask our leader whether it would not be possible for us to sit on Saturdays, and also every evening in the week? It has always appeared to me since I have been here that, seeing we have Sunday to ourselves, it is a great mistake to adjourn over Saturday. I would have moved this motion long ago if I had followed my own wishes. I think our labours have been so prolonged that we certainly ought to sit on Saturday, and I would be very pleased if we could sit every evening in the week as well. I ask fo

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -

I join with Sir John Forrest in the remarks he has made. There is no one on whom the work will tell harder than on myself, but at the same time I am quite content to sit every night and on Saturday in order that we may finish this work.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am quite alive to the extreme necessity that exists for the Convention to give every possible attention to its work. I am rather of opinion, however, that the Convention has worked very hard. It might be possible to sit every night next week, but I should certainly be an objector to sitting on Saturday. I do not think some honorable members can realize the work cast on other honorable members and the officers of the Convention. I think, if they did realize it, they would see that there must be a small hiatus in the work of the week. There must be some rest on Saturday, and it is very wearying work for those who have duties outside their mere work at this table or on these benches to be expected to sit every night. The work which has been done in connexion with the Convention by some of us is very much harder than anybody supposes. I really do think that some consideration must be given to the fact that if the work is to be effective it must be done well. If it is to be done well, there must be time to do it. As far as I am concerned, I shall oppose any sitting on Saturdays. So far as the officers of the Convention are concerned, they must have a day on which to keep up the work. There is a vast deal of work to be done in connexion with the Convention, particularly in relation to the Printing office, and it must be done at times when the Convention is not sitting. At the same time, a great deal of that work has to be done while the Convention is sitting. A great deal of work has to be done when the Convention rises. If the officers do not have Saturday to do some of the work it will be impossible to keep up with it, and, indeed, they ought to be entitled to a rest on Saturday. It involves sitting into the small hours every morning after the Convention has ceased sitting. I do not think that the Convention, as a matter of humanity, ought to ask anything of that kind to be done. Very hard work is being done for this Convention by the officers; I need not speak of any work that is being done by others. It is too much to ask this Convention to sit on Saturdays as well as five days and two nights a week. Up to the time of Sir John Forrest's departure, I shall be content to sit on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday next week.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I have to go on Wednesday.

Mr. BARTON. -
I cannot help saying that I think we ought to lay before ourselves, as Sir Richard Baker said the other day, the paramount claims of this Convention upon our attendance.

Mr. GLYNN. -
It was the same way at Adelaide; they wanted to clear off.

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not think that any necessity arising in any particular colony justifies any of us in departing from this Convention and its sittings unless it is of so pressing a character that great damage would be done to our particular colony by our absence from that colony. If such a case occurs, well and good; but if such a case does not occur, then the trouble of the whole matter should not be shunted on to the Convention. That is the position I hold in regard to it, and I hope my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) who, I know, has the work of this Convention at heart, may be able to persuade himself to stay until Wednesday week. There is no member of the Convention we are more glad to see on these benches, and there is no more popular member of the Convention.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
And nobody we shall miss more.

Mr. BARTON. -
I am sure we shall all miss him, and we are very anxious in completing our work to have his assistance. I therefore hope he will see his way to remain. For myself, I shall not be able to speak with the force and effect with which my right honorable friend has hitherto enabled me to speak by his running fire of interjections. I shall miss him extremely if he takes his departure before we have concluded our labours. I hope, therefore, that he will stay. I will not ask honorable members to sit to-morrow, but I will ask them to sit every night next week, that is, on Monday and Tuesday, and, if necessary, to-night.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
Honorable members have made arrangements on the understanding that the Convention would not sit tonight.

Mr. BARTON. -
So have I; but if it be necessary to sit to-night I must disappoint my friends.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
I intended to give notice that I will move on Monday next-

That, unless otherwise ordered, the Convention shall sit each day for the future from half-past seven p.m. to half-past ten p.m.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I ask my honorable friend not to give notice of that motion, and I will tell him why. It is perfectly competent for the Convention to sit every night. The only order on the minutes with reference to our sittings is that we shall meet every day at half past ten o'clock a.m. We can adjourn at what time we please. So that, without Sir Joseph Abbott's motion, we can sit every night in future if we see fit to do so. The only object of proposing such a motion, therefore, would be as a direction to myself, and there is no necessity whatever for that, because I am entirely in the hands of the Convention.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Under these circumstances I. certainly shall not give notice of the motion.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on-

Clause 52, sub-section (12). - Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits; and on Mr. Barton's amendment-

That the sub-section be amended by the insertion, before "fisheries," of the word "Sea"; and the omission of "beyond territorial limits."

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I do not think that anybody can doubt the absolute correctness of the criticism of the leader of the Convention upon the words of sub-section (12) as they stand in the Bill at the present time, as a matter of law. But the debate on this question has satisfied me that there are many practical reasons why those words should remain unaltered. I am sure Mr. Barton only expressed his opinion of the words themselves, and that he has no very great wish either one way or the other. I will state briefly why I think sub-section (12) should remain as it stands. We have, over and over again in this Convention, shaped our course by considerations as to the practical condition of things. It may be that the words in question are vague, but we find in exactly the same words a distinction, accurate and definite, of the sphere within which this jurisdiction has been already adopted in some Acts passed by the Federal Council, which have been in force for over ten years. During those ten years the fisheries of Western Australia and Queensland have been controlled by those two colonies respectively, and those colonies have exercised very important duties in regard to the fisheries in question. I take it that we shall wish, as far as possible, in regard to all matters handed over to us that we should occupy the place of the Imperial Government, and be able to assure Queensland and Western Australia that we will not derogate from their power of dealing with these matters. Now, although we have preserved, by an early clause in this Constitution, all rights existing under Acts passed by the Federal Council, there would be a danger to those rights if those laws could be amended or dealt with in any way. Interests have grown up, these spheres of influence have been actually used, and the laws of these colonies have been brought to bear on them. Therefore, I think it would be undesirable, by altering the wording of this Act, to throw any doubt on the exercise of that jurisdiction.
There is another view, and I think a rather important one. No continent such as ours could ever exist without having around it some right of control over waters outside the ordinary territorial limits for some distance from the coast, in the same way as rights have been claimed over fisheries off Newfoundland, and other parts of the world as being appendant to the ownership of the continent. It is only proper, as we are beginning now, as representing the empire here, that any right of control over these waters, no matter how far from the coast, should not be abandoned, as it will be necessary for us. As by-and-by, this continent will become a sovereign State, as it must some day, although remaining a part of the British Empire, it is necessary for us now to see that we begin to lay out what we think will be that sphere of operation and influence round about this Continent of Australasia which we will require in the time to come and which we are beginning to require now. Therefore, from the point of view of Imperial interests handed over to us in this matter, I do not think we ought to abandon one jot of what we have acquired already. To show that this is the true description of the state of the case, I may point out that Western Australia goes 600 miles from the coast at the furthest point, and 300 miles from the coast at the nearest point, and extends her control right round the coast of that colony. Queensland's sphere extends from the southern point of Queensland away north to a considerable distance, and embraces a number of islands along the coast within the area of which these profitable sources of revenue to the colonies exist. Although I think that the criticism of Mr. Barton is perfectly justified, being brought face to face with the practical condition of things, I think we ought to leave subsection (12) as it stands.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I am very glad Mr. O'Connor has decided that it is better to retain the words of sub-section (12) of clause 52. The words as they stand may lead to the result that Mr. Barton indicated last evening, in seeming to give a power of legislation which would interfere with international law and affect foreign vessels or peoples engaged in these fisheries. But the provision in sub-section (12) which we wish to retain will always be subject to inter-national rights, whatever they may be, and, therefore, no confusion can possibly result from legislation. There are many conceivable cases in which we would not be able to exercise that control over crews and ships in Australian waters under the ordinary laws of navigation and shipping, unless we had some such provision as this. I think these words will be very effective and useful, and they have already been adopted and acted on.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I am very glad, too, that Mr. O'Connor has decided that it is better to retain the words of sub-section (12), and I thank him for the assurance he has given us on the question. I am aware of the narrow view—the legal view—of this matter, but I am glad Mr. O'Connor takes a broader and more Imperialistic view of this question. I think we should retain all we have got, and get as much more as possible. This continent of ours belongs to Great Britain, and the waters around it, at any rate, should be within the influence of the British Government. Therefore, I am very glad indeed that Mr. O'Connor has consented to allow these words to remain in the Bill.

Mr. BRUNKER (New South Wales). -

I am very pleased indeed that the reconsideration of this matter will lead to a concession which, I think, will prove to the advantage of all the colonies. When I made a suggestion in regard to this matter last night, I was not aware of the privileges that had been conceded to Western Australia, but since then I find that, in the Act dealing with this matter of the fisheries, the following words occur:-

And whereas vessels employed in such fishery are, in the prosecution of their business, sometimes within and sometimes beyond the territorial jurisdiction of Western Australia.

I suggested last night that, seeing that this concession was made to the Federal Council, there is no reason why it should not be made to the Federal Parliament. I am very pleased indeed that we have come to a decision which we all approve.

The amendment was negatived.

Sub-section (12) was agreed to.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I beg to move the insertion of the following new sub-section:-

The acquisition of property on just terms from any state or person for any purpose in respect of which the Parliament has power to make laws.

Some question has been raised as to whether the Commonwealth has the power inherently of acquiring property under just terms of compensation; that is to say, whether it is not driven to bargain and sale only. It is quite clear that there must be a power of compulsorily taking property for the purposes of the Commonwealth.

Mr. FRASER. -

Certainly.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

And this clause is framed to provide for that.

Mr. FRASER. -

Are the terms to be stated?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, you do not want to state the terms in the Constitution. Of course an Act will have to be passed by the Commonwealth Parliament elaborating this enactment, and no doubt proper provision will be made in that Act for the method of acquiring lands, and the mode in which lands shall be obtained for the purposes of the Commonwealth.

The new sub-section was agreed to.

Clause 52, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 53, subsection (2). - The government of any territory which, by the surrender of any state or states, and the acceptance of the Commonwealth, becomes the seat of government of the Commonwealth, and the exercise of like authority over all places acquired by the Commonwealth, with the consent of the state in which such places are situate, for the public purposes of the Commonwealth.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I beg to move—
That the words from "with the consent of the state in which such places are situate" (line 7) be struck out.

The object of this amendment is to put in the most general possible terms the purposes of the clause. The clause gives a right of government for certain purposes to the Parliament, and it is just as well that it should be stated in such general terms that it will not be possible that any purpose which we do not think of now will be omitted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The sub-section, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 56B, paragraph (1). - If the House of Representatives passes any proposed law, and the Senate rejects the same, or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree, and if the Governor-General thereupon dissolves the House of Representatives, and if, within six months after such dissolution, the House of Representatives, by an absolute majority, again passes the proposed law, with or without any amendments that may have been made or agreed to by the Senate, and if the Senate again rejects the proposed law, or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree, the Governor-General may dissolve the Senate.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The amendment on the paper to be moved at this point is—
That paragraph (1) of clause 56B be omitted.

But I should like to mention that this is particularly an amendment of substance. It is a proposal to omit from the dead-lock clause the portion which was carried at the instance of Mr. Symon, in Sydney, leaving the rest of the clause to stand. Now, I stated yesterday, when we were discussing the propriety of taking this list of recommittal amendments, that so long as I had the right of moving amendments of substance at the second recommittal stage, I did not wish to force on the attention of the committee at this stage any matter which would occupy any great length of time. Therefore, I am in the hands of the committee with regard to this, as with regard to other matters of considerable substance. I think we are all agreed that this dead-lock provision will take some time to discuss, and perhaps it will be more convenient if I do not move this amendment now. But I should like to ask the Chairman whether I can retain my right of moving it at the second recommittal stage?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Certainly.

Mr. BARTON. -
Then, if it be the wish of the Convention, I will not move the amendment now.

Clause 73 (Extent of judicial power),
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-
That the following sub-section be inserted as subsection (7):

In which a writ of mandamus or prohibition or an injunction is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth.

This, Mr. Chairman, is an amendment of substance, but the discussion of it ought not to occupy very long. It will be remembered that in the former committee this sub-section was left out. Now, I have come to the conclusion that it was scarcely wise of us to leave it out. The clause is that which States-

That the judicial power of the Commonwealth shall extend to all matters; and then follows a list of the matters, of which sub-section (7) was one. I proposed in the former committee to make it apply to matters in which an injunction is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth, but ultimately the sub-section was left out, on the ground that the proceeding could probably be taken without any express power being given for them. I am under the impression that we came to rather a hasty conclusion upon that matter, and that it would be advisable to restore these cases of judicial power. The question would be this: Whether without an express authority given in the Constitution to entertain such cases the High Court could grant a writ of mandamus or a prohibition or an injunction against an officer of the Commonwealth? Ordinarily speaking, any such proceeding as amounts to a proceeding against the Crown cannot be taken without an express Act to authorize it. A matter came before the Supreme Court of the United States, and there was a decision by the very high authority of Mr. Justice Marshall, which will help us to come to a conclusion whether we should retain these words or not. In the case of Marbury v. Madison, and in other cases, the following was the decision:-

It is only such Acts of Congress as are within the scope of their powers as conferred by the Constitution that became the supreme law of the land. Where such Acts are in violation of the Constitution, it is the province of the courts of the United States to declare the law void and refuse to execute it. The final appellate power upon all such questions is in the Supreme Court of the United States.

What happened in that case was that the United States Congress, without having this right of entertaining cases of mandamus or prohibition against an officer of the United States, had passed an Act upon the subject; but, inasmuch as the Constitution did not place in the hands of the High Court the power to entertain these questions, it was held that an Act of Congress giving power to entertain them was not within the powers conferred by the Constitution, and was therefore a void Act. So that the power was not exercisable. The principle on which the whole matter rests is laid down in another case.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Does it remain so still?

Mr. BARTON. -
So far as I am aware. I do not know that there has been an amendment of the United States Constitution to that effect. In the case of The Board of Liquidation against McComb, it was laid down that-

A state without its consent cannot be sued by an individual; and a court cannot substitute its own discretion for that of executive officers in matters belonging to the proper jurisdiction of the latter.

Then there is a statement as to the granting of a mandamus:-

But it has been well settled that when a plain official duty, requiring no exercise of discretion, is to be performed, and performance is refused, any person who will sustain personal injury by such refusal may have a mandamus to compel its performance; and when such duty is threatened to be violated by some positive official act, any person who will sustain personal injury thereby, for which adequate compensation cannot be had at law, may have an injunction to prevent it. In such cases the writs of mandamus and injunction are somewhat correlative to each other. In either case if the officer plead the authority of an unconstitutional law for the non-performance or violation of his duty, it will not prevent the issuing of the writ. An unconstitutional law will be treated by the courts as null and void.

The courts there declared to be null and void an unconstitutional law passed by the United States Congress to give such power. Consequently, it seems to me that it might be held here that the courts should not exercise this power, and that even the statute giving them the power would not be of any effect; and I think that, as a matter of safety, it would be well to insert these words.

Mr. SYMON. -
They cannot do any harm.

Mr. BARTON. -
They cannot do harm, and may protect us from a great evil.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -
I think the leader of the Convention has made out a good case for the re-insertion of these words, on the ground that without the sub-section in question the clause would have the effect of limiting the particular class of writs or remedies which it will be within the power of the Federal Court to administer. But I should like to ask, for instance, would the court have power not only with regard to the three writs specified in the sub-section, but would it have power to issue writs of certiorari to bring up writs and quash them, and would it have power to issue writs of habeas corpus against an authority which might improperly imprison a citizen of the Commonwealth? It seems to me that the Supreme Court would be limited to the three classes of writs, and would not have power to issue other writs which it might be desirable that the court should issue.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

It is well determined that there is power to issue a writ of habeas corpus independently of words of this kind. That has been decided in America. It was decided that the right of a citizen to have the cause of his detention inquired into was clear; that the right of habeas corpus existed under the common law of England, and did not need any provision with regard to it whatever.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I should like to ask whether this power could be exercised against a Governor of a state for any act of his? Would it include the Governors of states acting under Ministerial authority?

Mr. BARTON. -

The Governor of the state is not an officer of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Could it apply to Ministers of state or the Governor of a state?

Mr. BARTON. -

No.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Upon this subject I should like to call particular attention to an article which appeared in the Law Times on the 13th February, 1897. The article deals with this very point of the right to issue a mandamus against a Governor. It was decided in the case of Marbury v. Madison that an injunction could issue as regards the state courts, and the writer complains of this as an interference by one department of the state with another. He says -

But following the doctrine of this decision, or rather, of this extrajudicial fulmination - for the court had really nothing to decide except its own want of jurisdiction - the state judicatures have, almost without exception, asserted the power to control the executive department of their state Governments in what are called Ministerial matters which do not involve the exercise of an exclusive discretion, by sending writs of mandamus to the heads of executive departments, and even in some instances to the Governor himself.

It is done, then, in America. There may be a slight distinction—one cannot answer questions of this kind on the spur of the moment—but it is a matter worth a little more consideration. We are putting it in the power of the Federal Judiciary to interfere with the Federal Executive, which, in America, is complained of as an unconstitutional interference with the executive departments of the state.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I hope we shall not hastily adopt this amendment, but that we shall have an opportunity of further considering it. I understand that Mr. Barton proposes to give to the Federal Court a power which the authorities cited by Mr. Glynn seem to declare would extend even to the executive acts and restrain the executive action of the Federal Government. That power is not possessed in America, and to confer it here, when the states have been able to do so well without it, seems to me to be a step we should not take, except after the most mature consideration. No doubt we have had this proposal on our files, but still it is a matter of such moment that I make the suggestion of delay.

Mr. BARTON. -

What evil consequences can arise from it?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

The clashing of the courts and the Executive. We should be sorry to implant in the Constitution a provision by which the federal courts would have any control over the executive acts. For the executive act of the Commonwealth the executive officers would be responsible to Parliament, which, no doubt, would see due regard is bad to all constitutional provisions. But if we specially provide for interference by the courts in federal matters, we will be giving to the High Court of Australia a power it is unnecessary that court should possess, and which might, at various times, be exercised to the very great detriment of constitutional government.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It is not exercised in England.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

No, and why should we put it in this Constitution? We have already put it within the power of the Federal Parliament, by express provision, to legislate so as to confer the right of proceeding against the Crown. That seems to me quite sufficient. To further embody in this Constitution a declaration that the Judiciary should interfere with the Executive, or that it should be within the judicial power to do so seems to me a retrograde step which cannot be defended.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

The apprehensions just laid before the Convention are, I think, not well founded. The provision will not in my view enable the Federal High Court or any court to interfere in any way whatever with the political Executive of the Federation. The provision does not confer, and is not intended to confer, and I am sure Mr. Barton will agree with me in this-any right whatever to interfere in such cases. It merely gives a jurisdiction.

Mr. BARTON. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON. -

Applications may be made now.

Mr. BARTON. -

This proposal does not confer any right.

Mr. SYMON. -

I was going to say that it does not confer any right. It is a safeguard, because it will prevent any application for mandamus or prohibition, both of which are prerogative rights, being made in any court except the courts invested with federal jurisdiction. The provision says that if you apply as against an officer of the Commonwealth-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It might be against the Governor-General of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SYMON. -

No, but supposing it is? I will take that position, and say that it does not give any right to get mandamus or prohibition.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It is optional.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is not optional. It merely gives a jurisdiction in certain applications.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No.

Mr. SYMON. -

Will my honorable friend pardon me? We have had applications in my own colony-I don't know that this has been the case in other colonies-for mandamus and prohibition directed against officers or a body constituted under the Executive Government of the day, and the question has been raised whether or not that was an interference,. That was a case of seeking to proceed by mandamus for the performance of some act by the Executive through somebody to whom the control had been delegated. It is not provided that the right shall exist to get the mandamus or prohibition.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It means nothing then?

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, it means a great deal. It means that no court, except the Federal High Court, or other courts under the Federal Constitution, shall have the power to entertain such an application. If this provision be not inserted, it follows that anybody who is discontented with something done by an officer of the Commonwealth in any state might apply to the court of the state for mandamus or prohibition. He might not get it, but be might apply for it, and there are cases in which be would get it. But if this provision be inserted the application would have to be made to the Federal Court. That, I take it, is a safeguard.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Is this exclusive?

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, as to the officers of the Commonwealth.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

It is a limitation of the right of the people against the Crown.

Mr. SYMON. -

No; it is not a limitation. All it says is that an application for mandamus or prohibition against an officer of the Commonwealth must be taken to the High Court or other of the Federal Courts. An application cannot be made to a state court, although the incident which brings the application about may happen in a particular state. The right to mandamus or prohibition is not conferred one whit more than at present. The provision merely throws within the ambit of the jurisdiction of the federal tribunal the right to determine the question. That question will be determined by the ordinary law of England-by the principles of constitutional government and the prerogatives of the Crown. There have been prohibitions and writs of mandamus granted against officers of the Crown in England, as well as in other places, where the officer has not been exercising an executive discretion, but where he has been what might be called a conduit pipe through which money ought to pass from the Treasurer or some fund to the intended recipient. If an officer has not paid that money over, application may be made for a writ of mandamus to compel him. But it is not necessary to discuss these things now. The only question is whether the proposal confers a right on anybody, no matter what the circumstances or whether the application impinges on the prerogative, to obtain a writ of mandamus or a prohibition against an officer of the Crown. The provision has not that effect at all. It is a safeguard and a limitation. It prevents an officer of the Commonwealth, whether Minister or anybody else, from being proceeded against in any state, in regard to the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I should say it would be a very cumbrous and undesirable method.

Mr. SYMON. -
It would be very cumbrous and undesirable if an officer of the Commonwealth could be proceeded against in a state court.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
In the colonies now, I think writs of mandamus are issued to prevent officers doing certain things.

Mr. BARTON. -
A mandamus is issued to compel the performance of a plain official duty laid down in an Act of Parliament.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I know the court interferes with officers of the Crown to compel them to do certain things. Prohibitions are common enough, even in the colony I come from.

Mr. SYMON. -
My honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) will see that the proposal before the Convention would not interfere in any way with the proceedings he has mentioned. Whatever jurisdiction the state courts have now in regard to writs of mandamus and to prohibitions against officers of the state will remain. All the provision says is that writs of mandamus and prohibitions against officers of the Commonwealth shall be within the jurisdiction of the Federal Court. The point that my honorable friend. (Dr. Quick) has referred to is one worthy of the attention he has given to it. The distinction is that writs of mandamus and prohibitions are prerogative rights, and these other cases are not.

Dr. QUICK. -
Is not habeas corpus a prerogative right?

Mr. SYMON. -
It is not a prerogative right.

Mr. ISAACS. -
You will have to put all sorts of other things in the provision.

Mr. SYMON. -
I think not. I doubt whether it is necessary to introduce the reference to injunctions but still there is no harm in saying that the only court having jurisdiction to deal with injunctions against officers of the Commonwealth shall be the Commonwealth Court. That was the object of the provision; at any rate, it was the sole object that the Judicial Committee had in view in inserting it in the first instance. When the time came to revise the provision, some honorable members seemed to doubt whether it ought to be there, and it was eliminated. Second thoughts are the best, and I think the provision ought to be inserted.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Where is the necessity for it?

Mr. SYMON. -
The necessity is to bring all those applications for writs of mandamus, prohibition, and injunctions as against officers of the Commonwealth in the Commonwealth courts, and not to have them brought in the state courts, in which they undoubtedly ought not to be brought.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
The provision does not say that such an application shall not be brought in the state courts. It is not exclusive, and if the power to make such an application in the state court exists the insertion of these words cannot take that power away.

Mr. BARTON. -
It is an appellate jurisdiction, according to the American decision.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If it is an appellate jurisdiction it necessarily assumes there is power to make application to the state court to start with, and the provision would not derogate from that power. The judicial power is conferred in respect of certain matters. Power is given to legislate in respect of certain matters, and in all things incidental or necessary in regard thereto. Surely that covers matters such as writs of mandamus, injunctions, prohibitions, habeas corpus, writs and attachments, and everything which constitute the means of the court to carry out its decrees. Parliament has the fullest power to confer those powers. My great objection to the proposal is that it will operate as a limitation upon other provisions for judicial power. It assumes there is no, power to grant a mandamus. The latest American case I know of on the subject—it is not in Baker, though it was decided before that book was published—is the United States ex rel. Boynton v. Blaine, decided in 1891, and rep

The writ of mandamus cannot issue in a case where its effect is to direct or control the head of an Executive department in the discharge of an executive duty, involving the exercise of judgment or discretion.

Now, the converse of that is also stated:--

When a mere Ministerial duty is imposed upon the executive officers of the Government, that is, a service which they are bound to perform without further question, then, if they refuse, the mandamus may be issued to compel them.

That power exists in the United States without any provision to the effect in the Constitution. And it would exist with us without any such provision. If we go putting in limitations, we should be in exactly the same position as we would if we put a series of limitations on the trade and commerce clause. We have heard it said frequently that if we put in these limitations on the trade and commerce clause, they will operate as a means of cutting down the wide operation of that clause. We are doing exactly the same if we put this in. What the Chief Justice of the United States stated was this:-

The writ of mandamus cannot issue in a case where its effect is to direct or control the head of an Executive department in the discharge of an executive duty involving the exercise of judgment or discretion. U.S. ex rel., Redfeld v. Windom 137 U.S., 636, 644. When by special statute or otherwise a mere Ministerial duty is imposed upon the executive officers of the Government; that is, a service which they are bound to perform without further question, then, if they refuse, the mandamus may be issued to compel them. U.S. ex rel. Dunlap v. Black, 128, U.S. 40, 48 The writ goes to compel a party to do that which it is his duty to do without it. It confers no new authority, and the party to be coerced must have the power to perform the act. Brownsville v. Loague, 129, U.S. 493,501.

What more do we want? If it is intended to go further, and put into this Constitution a power by which the court can have the right to do whatever it thinks just and proper on a mere application by way of mandamus, or prohibition, or injunction, then it is going a great deal too far.

Mr. SYMON. -

That you cannot prevent the application now you have just shown.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think you cannot; but the court in construing such a clause would say there must have been some special reason for putting it in, and the only reason they could have for putting it in would be either to indicate that the previous power given was too small to confer it, and, therefore, would exclude other matters, or it would say that it was intended to enlarge that power and give a right to the court to act as it pleased on such application being made. Both of these positions I think we ought to avoid, therefore I would ask my honorable friends to consider very seriously before they insert this clause. It seems to be wholly unnecessary; it cannot work any good and it may work a great deal of harm.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I would direct the attention of the leader of the Convention to the fact that the Constitution of the United States contains a distinct provision in favour of the writ of habeas corpus. Section 9 says-

The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is part of the Declaration of Rights.

Dr. QUICK. -

I would point out to Mr. Symon that the writ of habeas corpus is a high prerogative right, because, according to Storey, vol. 2, page 237:-

In England this is a high prerogative, issuing out of the Court of Queen's Bench not only in term time, but in vacation, and running in all parts of the king's dominions, for it is said the king is entitled at all times to have an account why the liberty of any of his subjects is restrained.

I think that lends force to some observations I made at an earlier stage of the discussion to this effect: That if you are going to have a section enumerating writs which it is within the jurisdiction of the High Court to issue, then that enumeration ought to include all possible desirable writs. The Constitution of the United States contains a distinct recognition of the writ of habeas corpus, and the section creating the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States does not enumerate any of those writs which it is now proposed to enumerate.

Mr. BARTON. -

That does not provide for the writ of habeas corpus. It recognises an existing writ, and it only says that it shall not be suspended.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is like a declaration of rights.

Dr. QUICK. -

But in the Constitution of the United States there is no section such as is now proposed, limiting or defining the writs which may be issued by that court; it is left to the operation of the common law. Here it is proposed to put in a clause limiting and defining the class of writs to be issued to three, viz., mandamus, prohibition, and injunction. That, according to the great doctrine of limitation which has been so often impressed on the Convention, would exclude, by process of definition, the right to issue a writ of habeas corpus or a writ of certiorari. If there is to be a clause defining those writs, then I contend that it ought to be a complete definition and a complete enumeration embracing all possible writs for the enforcement of remedies, otherwise it is best to leave out the clause.

Mr. BARTON. -

The object of this clause is a very clear one, if I may mention it without interrupting the honorable member. In certain cases the Supreme Court would have original jurisdiction, in others appellate. If you do not specially mention this, then in cases of mandamus, prohibition, and injunction, it can only have the ordinary appellate jurisdiction, but if you mention it specially as within the judicial power, and provide for it as an original jurisdiction, then a case may be taken straight to the court instead of having to filter through another court.

Dr. QUICK. -

I have not the slightest objection to the clause provided that it is made sufficiently comprehensive to include all desirable remedies. I contend that these other remedies are equally as desirable as are those three.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

If the court, under one of these sub-sections, has the power to deal with all cases arising under the Constitution it would have the power necessarily, or certainly the Federal Parliament would have the right to give the power, to exercise its jurisdiction by way of mandamus, or injunction, or prohibition.

Mr. BARTON. -

In the United States it is extended only to cases of law and equity arising under the Constitution, but it was held not to confer this power as an original power. It only exists as an appellate one.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I should like to ask the leader of the Convention whether this would be an exclusive right? If so, there is no doubt whatever that it would limit the liberties of the people of the states to some extent. Suppose, for instance, in any state a citizen had a grievance arising out of some neglect on the part of a federal officer, say a postmaster or a telegraph operator, would it be required by this clause that the person so injured, or fancying himself so injured, would have to proceed by way of mandamus or otherwise in the federal and not in his own local court, because of the exclusive jurisdiction we vest in the Federal High Court? If it is, then that citizen would be put to very considerable inconvenience by exercising one of his privileges of citizenship.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

There is no doubt whatever if the possibility which Sir Edward Braddon has indicated could arise, it would be a very grave blunder, and it would be a mischief which we ought at all hazards to avoid; but that would not be the position. If such a case as he put were to arise, it would not be necessary for the person who was aggrieved or considered himself aggrieved by the federal officer to proceed in the Federal High Court. He could proceed in any federal court or in any court invested with federal jurisdiction. In the United States these federal courts are distributed all over the country. There are circuit courts and there are other courts to dispense justice in all parts of the Commonwealth. That, of course, necessitates a network of courts, involving very great expense and very great complexity. With the view of avoiding all that expense and all that complexity, we have provided in the Constitution that the Parliament, instead of duplicating a lot of federal courts, may invest the courts of the states with federal jurisdiction. That is the course which will be adopted, because it is not contemplated that such applications as those should come before the Federal High Court. Therefore, if any citizen of the state had a grievance against a federal officer within that state, for the redress of which he required a mandamus or a prohibition, his remedy would be in the state to which he belonged-not to the local court or the Supreme Court of the state, but to that Supreme Court as invested with federal jurisdiction. He would not be compelled to go to the Federal High Court. He would have the remedy at his own door. Whether this clause is necessary or not is a matter I do not want to enter upon again. I agree with Mr. Isaacs that the federal courts would have the jurisdiction. What we want to prevent is that state courts shall have the jurisdiction over Commonwealth officers, and the remedy, if it was called for at all, would be a remedy enforceable within the bounds of the state at the door of the person aggrieved, and he would not be compelled to go away to the Federal High Court, in which the jurisdiction is not made to reside. That court would have jurisdiction, as a matter of appeal, from the decision of the court invested with federal jurisdiction.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

That is all right.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Under clause 71 the Federal Parliament can give the Federal Court in a state only such jurisdiction as it thinks fit, and it may reserve some of these prerogative writs.

Mr. SYMON. -

It may, and that is reaffirmed by clause 76. The whole scheme of jurisdiction is laid down here in skeleton, so to speak. The Parliament would then invest, no doubt, certain of the courts of the states with federal jurisdiction, otherwise there would be a possibility of a grave miscarriage of justice.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I did not, until a moment or two ago, quite apprehend the difficulties in the minds of Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor, and if they will not mind following me for a minute I think I can clear away those difficulties. In the United States it is quite clear how it is held that the Supreme Court has nothing but an appellate jurisdiction in respect of mandamus, that is, as to Commonwealth officers, because the Constitution says that the only cases in which the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction are-

Cases affecting ambassadors, other public Ministers, and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party.

This is not a case where a Commonwealth officer is a party at all, and, therefore, there is no original jurisdiction in any respect as to the matter of which we are talking. The Constitution goes onto say-

In all the other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

Therefore, as they have only appellate jurisdiction in regard to the merits of the case, they have only appellate jurisdiction in regard to an amendment in that case. But in our Bill we say-

In all matters-

III. In which the Commonwealth, or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth, is a party:

IV. Between states:

the High Court shall have original as well as appellate jurisdiction.

The Parliament may confer original jurisdiction on the High Court in other matters within the judicial power.

Mr. BARTON. -

They would not be matters within the judicial power, and therefore would have to come into this clause.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes; but you cannot give a mandamus to the High Court in any matter which is not within the judicial power.

Mr. BARTON. -

We want it in the judicial power.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No. My honorable friend does not quite see what I mean. This is, only a remedy for carrying out the powers of the court, and you cannot put within the judicial power a mere remedy where there is no right. The great distinction between the Constitution as we frame it and the Constitution of the United States is that in the United States there is no original jurisdiction at all, in a case where the Commonwealth or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth is a party, and therefore you can understand how a mandamus being a remedy in such a case is not within its original jurisdiction. But we put it within the original jurisdiction here, and it seems to me that a mandamus follows with it. It is only ancillary to the case, and it seems to me to follow the main issue.

Mr. WISE. - Are they ancillary to every case?

Mr. ISAACS. - I should say that they are ancillary to every case where the court has jurisdiction. No doubt it is in the power of the Federal Parliament to confer original jurisdiction within the judicial power, but you cannot have a mandamus outside the judicial power. Therefore, it appears to me that it is not analogous to the case of the United States.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). - I think that this matter can be put on a clear footing without much difficulty. Perhaps it will be necessary to read section 2 of Article 3 of the United States Constitution, so that we may see where the difference lies. That section says-

The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public Ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more states; between a state and citizens of another state; between citizens of different states; between citizens of the same state, claiming lands under grants of different states, and between a state, or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens, or subjects.

These are the jurisdictions of the High Court. Then we come to a paragraph defining the cases in which the jurisdictions are original, and those in which they are appellate. That paragraph is as follows:

In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public Ministers, and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make.

It is because of this limitation that the decision in the case of Marbury v. Madison appears to have been given. In other words, although jurisdiction was given as to cases arising out of the Constitution that itself was only an appellate jurisdiction. Jurisdiction was not given in any express terms as to writs of mandamus, prohibition, or injunction. Therefore there was only an appellate jurisdiction. When the United States Congress tried to confer an original jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court of the United States, it was held that, as there was no such jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution, it could not be conferred by an Act of Congress, because such an Act was outside the Constitution. For that reason, the statute was held to be void.

Mr. ISAACS. -

At this juncture the difficulty arises, could the court grant a writ of mandamus except in the cases in which jurisdiction has been given?

Mr. BARTON. -

I think it would apply to any case in which, under the common law, or under any statute made for the furtherance of the duties imposed by it, you could obtain, we will say, a writ of mandamus. Similarly, it would apply in regard to writs of prohibition and injunction. I want honorable members to bear in mind that this is simply a provision conferring jurisdiction. It does not confer-and this answers the doubt of the Right Hon. Sir Edward Braddon-upon any person any new right. It does not give anybody a right to pursue in any way an officer of the Commonwealth, except such right as arises out of the known principles of law, which go to this extent: I will take the writ of mandamus as an illustration. Where there is a duty imposed by an Act of Parliament, and that duty has to be performed, not merely in relation to the Crown, but also for the benefit of the public, any person aggrieved by the non-performance of it may obtain a writ of mandamus. In the same way, where it is proposed to put into operation against him some process of the law, he, as a subject, having the right to have this process of law properly exercised, can obtain an injunction against its wrongful exercise. Those are the class of cases to which these provisions are intended to apply. If you did not put this power into the Constitution the result would be that it could only be exercised upon an appeal from another court. The position under this Constitution will be somewhat analogous to the position under the United States Constitution. In clause 73 we enumerate the judicial powers. We propose to include among them, as we did before, this power to decide cases in which writs of mandamus, prohibition, and injunction are applied for. Then, we propose to put into clause 77-and I think the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) will hear me out in this-the same words as to these writs. This will give the High Court original jurisdiction, as well as appellate jurisdiction, in these cases, so that when a person wishes to obtain the performance of a clear statutory duty, or to restrain an officer of the Commonwealth from going beyond his duty, or to restrain him in the performance of some statutory duty from doing some wrong, he can obtain a writ of mandamus, a writ of prohibition, or a writ of injunction.
Mr. ISAACS. -

Would not that be so under sub-section (3) of clause 77 in any case?

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think that it would. My honorable and learned friend has argued that a provision relating to all matters in which the Commonwealth or a person suing or being sued upon behalf of the Commonwealth, or to which the Commonwealth is a party, would cover the case, but I do not think that it would. It is a grave question whether the expression "a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth" does not mean a person who is being simply impleaded in an action of law. That is more strongly shown by reference to the other words of the clause, because original jurisdiction is given in cases to which the Commonwealth is a party, but only in respect to a person representing the Commonwealth, that is, a person suing or being sued upon its behalf. I think there is the very gravest doubt as to whether the words in subsection (3) of clause 77 would be sufficient authorization for an original jurisdiction. Now I come to the point raised by the honorable and learned member (Dr. Quick), that this does not specify all the writs in respect to which jurisdiction may be exercised. But it was not intended to do that. A writ of habeas corpus is a common law writ, in regard to which you have no trouble as to its exercise. It is one of the rights which the subject carries with him so long as he is within British territory, and there is no necessity to put enabling words as to that writ into the Constitution. Even in America, where they had acted up to the time of the framing of the Constitution under the rules of the common law of England, and where they still do so except where they have statutory provisions limiting or modifying or taking away its operation—even there it was not held to be necessary to place any provision in the Constitution to insure that the writ of habeas corpus should run. All that was held necessary was to protect the writ of habeas corpus by preventing it from being suspended under the circumstances mentioned in section 9. So we come back to this position. What we want here in the case of these three writs, which are specially in their nature addressed to persons who may be carrying out the provisions of the statute law, is to enable proceedings against those persons to be taken directly in the High Court, instead of its being necessary to go first to another court and then to proceed on appeal to the High Court. If we do not insert a provision in regard to this matter into this clause, then in such cases application will have to be made first to some court other than the High Court, because you have not given the High Court jurisdiction.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But you have empowered Parliament to confer it.
Mr. BARTON. -

Yes; but application will have to be made to another court first, because you have not given the High Court original jurisdiction. The matter can only come before the High Court after it has filtered through another court, and by way of appeal. Is it not right, however, that the subject should be empowered, when he has a right to one of these writs against an officer of the Commonwealth, to go to the High Court at once-to the court which protects the Constitution-to obtain his rights under the Constitution? That is the sole question. The Premier of Tasmania seemed to have great doubt as to whether this provision did not confer rights. I would, therefore, point out to him that it does not enable the High Court to grant a prohibition or a mandamus or an injunction against an officer of the Commonwealth unless the law already enables that to be done. The object of it is to make sure that where a person has a right to ask for any of these writs he shall be enabled to go at once to the High Court, instead of having his process filtered through two or more courts. I think that the honorable and learned member (Dr. Quick) will see why other writs are not enumerated. This provision is applicable to those three special classes of cases in which public officers can be dealt with, and in which it is necessary that they should be dealt with, so that the High Court may exercise its function of protecting the subject against any violation of the Constitution, or of any law made under the Constitution.

New sub-section (7) was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the following words be added to sub-section(8):"Or between residents of different states, or between a state and a resident of another state."

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 74. - The High Court shall have jurisdiction, with such exceptions, and subject to such regulations as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe, to hear and determine appeals from all judgments, decrees, orders, and sentences of any other federal court, or court exercising federal jurisdiction, or of the Supreme Court of any state . . . . . .

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the words "with such exceptions and subject to such regulations" (lines 2 and 3) be omitted, with the view to the insertion of the words "subject to such conditions."
My honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott) seemed to entertain the idea that the pass in of this slight amendment might affect his right to propose an amendment in the clause, but I think, sir, you will support my statement that it would be perfectly competent for him to move his amendment upon the second recommittal?
The CHAIRMAN. -
Certainly.
Mr. BARTON. -
Honorable members will see that this provision gives the High Court jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals, "with such exceptions and subject to such regulations as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe." The difficulty about the clause as it stands is this: That it allows the Parliament to legislate in reference to the jurisdiction of the High Court in regard to appeals in such a way that, little by little, the High Court may become the mere shadow of a Court of Appeal. That position arises because we have placed in a parenthetical part of the clause words which appear to be too strong. For these words I therefore propose to substitute the words mentioned in the amendment. The Parliament will still be able to prescribe regulations for the hearing of these appeals, but it will be unable to take aw
Mr. HIGGINS. -
Does that mean that a man will be able to appeal even in a case concerning only 10s.?
Mr. BARTON. -
I do not think so. The right of appeal relates to the question of law or fact that is decided. The Parliament might impose conditions of appeal, just as Orders in Council impose conditions of appeal, which would limit the right of appeal so as to exclude minor or trumpery cases.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
I understood that the object was to enable some common sense to be exercised in determining what appeals should be allowed. If the amount involved was not beyond a certain sum, there ought to be no appeal.
Mr. BARTON. -
It was exactly what the honorable member describes, and that is the object of this amendment. The question is: Which is the better way of saying the thing? We are afraid that if we say "with such exceptions and subject to such regulations," it will be in the power of Parliament by successive regulations to cut down the right of appeal.
Mr. ISAACS. -
Does not the honorable member think that if there is no power to make exceptions, every man might appeal, even in connexion with criminal matters?

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think so, but it is difficult to find suitable words.

Mr. SYMON. -

Would it not be better to adhere to the words we have got?

Mr. BARTON. -

There is a reference to the subject to which Mr. Glynn called my attention in Mr. Burgess' well-known book, which shows that a difficulty has arisen from the use of these words, and that it is a real difficulty. If the present provisions of the Bill are retained in relation to appeals to the Privy Council, and appeals can only be taken from the High Court or from the court of a state when the cases come within certain limits, and if in addition to that the Parliament is given the right to take away appeals, then the right might be limited not only on the side of the Privy Council, but also on the side of the High Court. The state court would really be the final court of appeal. What I object to is the retention of words which would enable Parliament so to cut down the jurisdiction of the High Court in appeal cases as to leave, in some cases, a person who has a right practically without any remedy by way of appeal.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

This amendment takes me by surprise. It is far more than a drafting amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is not a drafting amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

When the clause was discussed before, an honorable member distinctly asked whether it related to appeals in criminal matters. I think it was asserted that, as the words now sought to be excised were in the clause, it would be within the competence of the Federal Parliament to prevent appeals in criminal cases. The clause, as it stands, provides that the High Court shall have jurisdiction, subject only to any exceptions Parliament may impose, to hear appeals from any Federal Court or from the Supreme Court of any state on judgments, orders, and sentences. Sentences would include criminal matters. I would point out, also, that if the state Legislature chooses to say that a decision of the Supreme Court of the state shall be final and conclusive, and without appeal, in any particular state matter, yet under the terms of this clause the provisions of that state legislation would be nugatory in that respect, and they would have a right of appeal under the Constitution. Surely we do not intend to do that. But let us carry the matter a little further. Let us take the case of a man who has been fined in a police court for an assault. He appeals to the Supreme Court under the law of the state. Under this clause he could carry the case to the Federal High Court, notwithstanding any negative provision in the state legislation. We are not trusting the Federal Parliament. We are really taking it out of their power to prevent an abuse of the judicial machinery. I think that is going too far. I war, not aware that anything had occurred in the Convention that invited the alteration that it is now sought to make, and I think it will go very much further than any of us contemplate.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I join with the Hon. Mr. Isaacs in deprecating a change of this language. There is no doubt whatever that some tribunal or other should be able to say, when the details of the Judiciary Act are being dealt with, within what limits appeals in these various matters against orders, judgments, sentences, and so on, should take place. If we leave in the words "with such exceptions and subject to such regulations we undoubtedly leave it to the Federal Parliament to do that. If we take the words out and say "subject to such conditions" it would undoubtedly mean that in every case of every judgment, every order, every sentence, there may be a right of appeal, but the conditions under which it may be conducted are to be left to be regulated by the Federal Parliament. That would not be a desirable condition of things. This is one of the matters in connexion with which we should not tie the hands of the Federal Parliament, but we have to prescribe the machinery for carrying out the whole of these provisions.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I have called attention to this matter two or three times already in the Convention, and, as the amendment is proposed, I may be allowed to refer to authorities who recommend a change in the direction suggested by the Drafting Committee. Under this and subsequent clauses you are taking away front the states the Court of Appeal they have at present—that is, the Privy Council—and you are putting it in the power of the Federal Parliament to deprive the states of the right of appeal to the Federal High Court. The proper procedure would be to give a complete appellate jurisdiction to the Federal High Court, but to say that the state or the Federal Parliament might declare that in particular cases the appeal should not be allowed. It is to the method of accomplishing what is desired that I object. We ought to arm the Federal High Court with absolute authority, but we ought to leave the power in the state, in the case of state laws, of saying that in certain cases appeals should not be allowed. You are proposing to emasculate the power of the High Court instead of taking away the right of appeal by a state Act of Parliament, and that is the wrong way to proceed.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is the Federal Parliament under any temptation to emasculate the system of appeals?

Mr. GLYNN. -

The Federal Parliament has done it in America, and Mr. Burgess and several other writers point out the danger arising from the words used in the Constitution. I will first quote Mr. Wilson on Congressional Government. He points out that for many years the Federal Judiciary has had a distinct political complexion taken from the colour of the times during which its majority was chosen, and he says-

The federalists were backed by a Federalist Judiciary; the period of democratic supremacy witnessed the true triumph of democratic principles in the courts; and republican predominance has driven from the highest tribunal of the land all but one representative of democratic doctrines. It has been only during comparatively short periods of transition, when public opinion was passing over from one political creed to another, that the decisions of the Federal Judiciary have been distinctly opposed to the principles of the ruling political party.

That, it is pointed out, is owing to the dependence of the Judiciary for its jurisdiction on the High Court. Then Mr. Wilson also says that, in 1883, owing to a dispute as to the political complexion of the court, Parliament interfered and swept away the whole of its jurisdiction. He quotes these words as giving undue power to Parliament:-

The High Court shall have jurisdiction, with such exceptions and subject to such regulations as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe.

Then Mr. Wilson says-

A democratic Congress swept away root and branch the system of circuit courts which had been created in the previous year, but which was hateful to the newly successful democrats, because it had been officered with federalists in the last hours of the John Adams Administration.

That has been the result of keeping these words in the United States Constitution. I would call the attention of honorable members to the decision of the High Court itself. In the case of Turner v. The Bank of North America, it was distinctly laid down that the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court, except in one or two matters, was altogether at the mercy of the Federal Parliament. Mr. Burgess, in the last edition of his work Political Science and Constitutional Law, says-

The second limitation is the general one contained in Article 3, section 2, paragraph 2, which vests in the Legislature the power to regulate, and make exceptions to, the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. This power of the Legislature over the Judiciary is a most serious one. It places the appellate power of the court very nearly at the mercy of the Legislature. The Legislature has made use of this power in the passage of the several Judiciary Acts, and I do not know that it can be said to have abused it.

Mr. Wilson says the contrary.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

He was a party writer. Mr. Burgess is impartial.

Mr. GLYNN. -

He is not so strong on the subject as Mr. Wilson. Mr. Wilson bases his judgment on the fact that in America attempts have been made to take away the jurisdiction of the Judges where the Judges have not been complaisant to Parliament. Mr. Burgess also says-

It seems to be, however, an unnecessary surrender of the independence of the courts to require that things which can be better accomplished by the rules of the court shall wait upon the pleasure or, possibly, caprice of the Legislature.

That has been the effect of the retention of these words in the American Constitution. I would ask whether it would not be better to allow the High Court to hear any appeals, and to make some specific provision to enable the state or the Federal Parliament to say that no appeal should be allowed in certain small matters? That is really the law of the English Judicature at the present time. If you want to take away the right of appeal, you do not pass an Act saying the Supreme Court is not to hear the appeals; you say, in these cases, no appeal is to lie. The general rule of law is that, unless the appeal is granted by an Act of Parliament, no appeal lies. There will be no interference with the complete jurisdiction of the Federal Court. That is what ought to be done.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Do you want to leave the limitation of appeals to the Judges?

Mr. GLYNN. -

No; I want to continue the existing law, when the right of appeal will depend upon the law in the state, and not on the courts. If we abolish the appeal to the Privy Council, we should retain the same right to the state of going to the High Court as it has to go to the Privy Council, and we should apply the same rules as the Privy Council applies to small matters. I think the Privy Council has power to say that, although an appeal may be granted, it will not hear it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The Orders in Council issued with regard to the Privy Council deal with that matter.
Mr. GLYNN. -

The same thing can be done here by giving power to the Judges of the High Court to make rules. I think that is the true principle, and it should be carried out by a slight addition to the wording of the clause. I will again press this matter upon the attention of the Convention, because I regard it as very important.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

The Convention owes a debt of gratitude to Mr. Glynn for the clear way in which he has put this question. I shall support the amendment of Mr. Barton in consequence of the very lucid exposition given by Mr. Glynn and the examples he has cited from the history of the United States. I recognise a very grave danger in putting it in the power of Parliament to limit in any way the right of appeal, and, consequently, the power to d

Mr. ISAACS. -

But there are County Court cases in which there is no appeal to the Supreme Court.

Mr. WISE. -

If a case is of sufficient importance to go to the Supreme Court it ought to be of sufficient importance to be appealable to the High Court. A County Court case can go to Privy Council by special leave.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

So can a case in any court go to the Privy Council by special leave.

Mr. WISE. -

I would not limit the right of appeal any more than it is limited at present, although I quite admit there may be a certain absolute right of appeal to the High Court conferred by this Constitution which does not exist in the case of the Privy Council. I am prepared to run that risk rather than run the greater risk of saying that the right of appeal to the High Court should be dependent upon a chance majority in Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

How does Mr. Barton's amendment cure the case?

Mr. WISE. -

By striking out the word "exceptions."

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But by imposing conditions you can practically prohibit a man getting into the court.

Mr. WISE. -

I don't think so, because any such Act would be held to be ultra vires. The honorable member knows that the power to impose conditions is granted, but it does not allow you to impose such conditions as would render the right impossible.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But giving the right to Parliament is totally different.

Mr. WISE. -

Any condition which would prevent the right of appeal would be held to be ultra vires. There is one slight alteration which might meet the difficulty of the honorable member. We might put in the words "condition as to amount" but at the same time that might limit it too much. I think Mr. Barton's suggestion is the right one.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I hope the amendment will not be carried. I quite admit that Mr. Glynn has done good service in calling attention to the question, but we have to accept one of two risks. We have either to prescribe that every application or order, no matter how trumpery, is to involve a right of appeal to the High Court, or else we shall have to trust the Federal Parliament that it will not do injustice.

Mr. WISE. -

Every order of a Supreme Court of a state, that is the distinction.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It might be the order of a Supreme Court for security for costs, or an order of the Supreme Court that certain particulars shall be given on a statement of claim, or an order that there shall be a certain thing done—say, a certain pleading, delivered in eight days, fixing the time within which it is to be done. According to that, we must give the party defeated a right of appeal to the High Court. That would be quite unworkable. It may be very important to have good law, but it is far more important that we should have an end to trumpery applications and some finality in small matters. Every court in the world has some limit as to appeals. For instance, in appeals to the Privy Council there is no right of appeal from our courts unless the amount exceeds £500 in one case and £1,000 in another. The Privy Council does not hear all appeals, and it needs a very special caw to induce it to hear an appeal as to a small sum. Then it said that there is a danger that the Federal Parliament may cramp or cripple the High Court by making the exceptions very numerous, and Mr. Glynn has read some passages on that point. Reading Burgess, it is very clear from that writer that there has been no abuse of the power at all by the Federal Parliament of the United States. The danger is more theoretical than practical. I ask honorable members what temptation or inducement will the Federal Parliament have to cripple its own court? The Federal Court is under its thumb in many respects, and, if anything, the Federal...
Parliament would be more inclined to go in favour of the federal jurisdiction. Where does the inducement come in to the Federal Parliament to cripple the powers of its own courts? It is true that the Federal Court has to stand between the states and the Commonwealth, but, at the same time, it is to the Federal Parliament that you give the power of appointing the Judges and removing the Judges. Although those Judges are to stand as buffers between the Federal Parliament and the individual state Parliaments, if you trust the Federal Parliament with that power I think it is only fair for us to trust the Federal Parliament to lay down some general rule, which is not applicable to a particular case, but to all cases, and to say that, inasmuch as the power; has not been abused in America, it will not be abused here. There was an abuse of a certain power in America when one party came into power and abolished circuit courts, but that is very different from abolishing generally the right of appeal. As Burgess says, there has been no instance known of an abuse of this power. There is no doubt there is a danger in theory, but not in practice, because, as far as we can see, there is no temptation. If Mr. Barton's words are introduced, the danger is equally great, because he says the High Court shall have power to hear appeals subject to such conditions as Parliament may prescribe, and so forth. I ask any honorable member if he cannot confirm me in this, that by imposing conditions you can practically interfere and take away the power of appeal? Supposing, for instance, there was an order made that interrogatories should be administered, and if Parliament said there should be no appeal from the order for interrogatories unless there was a deposit of £10,000 security, that would practically knock the thing on the head. First, there is no practical need for the provision; and, secondly, the proposed amendment will not cure the evil if there is one.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I hope this amendment will be carried. I do not think we can bear too strongly in mind the fact that we are taking away the Privy Council appeal in a very large number of cases.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOX. -

I hope not.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Whether it is done as; in the Bill, or in a more limited way, the right will be taken away to a very large extent. If we do not take away the right of appeal we are at any rate, substituting in very many cases this High Court for the Privy Council, and I think we should be very careful not to give power to Parliament to take away the right of appeal as it exists now, to the Privy Council.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Do you mean to take away the right of appeal as it exists now or in the case of new appeals?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No; this clause gives Parliament the right to determine the method of appeals. If you give it the right to make exceptions, you give it the right to except certain cases. Mr. Isaacs referred to appeals in criminal cases. There might be strong reason as a matter of general policy why there should not be appeals in criminal cases, involving, as they necessarily would great delay between the time of the passing of sentence and the carrying of it out. For that reason, I think appeals to the Privy Council in criminal cases are only allowed under very exceptional circumstances, but the case will be altogether different when you have a Court of Appeal sitting in Australia, the sittings of which can probably be made available for a criminal case in a very few weeks.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If a man is tried in a Supreme Court he has an inalienable right of appeal to the Federal Court. At the General Sessions he may be given a much heavier sentence, but he has no right of appeal to the Federal Court.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

With all respect, I do not think this touches that point.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is what you are doing here.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No; a man subject to a sentence of any kind is entitled now to appeal to the Supreme Court of the state.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

No, not under this section.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I am taking it step by step, and I am taking the law as it is now. A man is entitled to an appeal to the Supreme Court in all the states.

Dr. QUICK. -

Unfortunately that is not the case in this country, although, I admit, it is by a mistake in our legislation.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That may be; but I am speaking with regard to most of the colonies. It is true that there is a right of appeal generally in criminal cases.

Dr. QUICK. -

No.
Mr. OCONNOR. -

Whether there is or not, there ought to be. There can be no question that if you allow a right of appeal in cases of property, there ought to be a full right of appeal, in all cases where a man's liberty, and perhaps his life, is involved. I am pointing out that there is a great deal of difference in restricting that right of appeal in a case where you have to appeal to the Privy Council, in which case the decision may not be given for some months, and where you can appeal to a Supreme Court in a few weeks. I think that the right of appeal in all criminal cases ought to be reserved to the High Court, which we have put here in place of the Privy Council. But you would put it in the power of the Legislature to take away that class of appeal altogether. It would be better to use the words here which would enable the Legislature to make a law leaving the determination as to the terms of appeals to the High Court. Probably the Federal Court would be the best authority to decide the conditions of appeals.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Would not this allow a case to be reheard in the Full Court?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No; that would be to completely reverse the common law as we know it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You are going to do that here.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not think so. But whether that is so or not, this amendment would not make any difference one way or the other. I hope that earnest attention will be given to Mr. Glynn's appeal, and to the cases which he has cited. This is not an imaginary danger, and although we need not impute any improper or indirect motives to the Parliament, we ought to take care that this High Court, which we are setting up instead of the Privy Council, will insure an appeal in all cases where appeals ought to be allowed.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

There is another matter which bears on this question, and which suggests the importance of exceptions. There is included in the 140 amendments suggested by the Drafting Committee an amendment in the latter part of clause 74 involving what is a new matter. It is not merely a drafting amendment. It refers to appeals from the Inter-State Commission. Surely it was intended that those appeals should only lie on questions of law. I cannot understand our allowing appeals on questions of policy or of fact.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We fought several days against that.
Mr. HOLDER. -
Appeals on points of law certainly ought to lie, but not appeals on matters of fact.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
And appeals on points of law are not provided for in all cases.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I do not know that there may not be cases in which appeals on points of law would not be allowed. At the proper time I shall seek to make an addition to the clause; but in the meantime I shall ask the Drafting Committee to consider it.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK (Tasmania). -
If our adoption of this amendment depends on, or is justified by, the action we have taken up to this time with regard to the right of appeal to the Privy Council, I hope we shall pause before we accept it. I am not without hope that on further consideration this Convention will very much modify the decision in respect to the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. SYMON. -
I hope it will not.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. -
That does not interfere with my hope. The honorable member will surely allow me to entertain and express a hope contrary to his own.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -
I think that if the amendment which Mr. Barton has proposed is negatived, we might leave the clause as it stands, and yet secure our object, which is to prevent any undue interference by Parliament with the High Court, by putting in this proviso:-
Providing that in respect of any exception or regulation prescribed by Parliament by virtue of this section, the High Court may grant special leave to appeal in any case under this section, but on such terms as to the court may seem fit.

Mr. ISAACS. -
And then the High Court may override the Parliament.

Mr. WISE. -
Precisely. That is what is intended.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Had we not better abolish Parliament?

Mr. WISE. -
Orders in Council are made which will correspond to the exceptions and regulations provided for in this clause; but, in spite of that, the Privy Council always has power to disregard those orders, and to grant leave to appeal. The danger here-and it is a very grave danger-is that the powers of the Parliament may be so abused as to destroy the jurisdiction of the court. This is only a weapon of defence against an unwarrantable attack.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

But Parliament can only act under the authority of the people.

Mr. WISE. -

On two occasions the power of the United States Parliament was invoked to destroy the authority of the High Court.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I cannot conceive it possible that the Federal Parliament or any other Parliament of an English speaking people will do anything to degrade or improperly interfere with the administration of justice, and that is what the contention amounts to. I am not wedded to either the one form of words or the other, but I undoubtedly think it would be a very grave mistake to introduce in this Constitution a provision which would in effect give unrestricted right of appeal in every case, without allowing Parliament to say that there should be some exceptions. For instance, a decision in which a fine of 5s. was imposed for common assault might be made the subject of appeal, and I do not think that any of us desire that that should be the case. The only thing we have to determine is whether we have such a district of the proper administration of justice that we are going to tie the hands of the Federal Parliament. I would be quite willing to assent to the words proposed subject to such conditions, if I thought those words would enable the Federal Parliament to restrict appeals to cases in which appeals ought to be allowed.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Why not insert "and with such limitations as to the amount involved"?

Mr. SYMON. -

Honorable members forget that this is a Constitution we are framing, and not a Judicature Act. For instance, there might be appeals against interlocutory orders. We are becoming altogether too technical; and if we are to proceed in this fashion, we might as well introduce in the Constitution the latest edition of Roscoe's Pleadings and Evidence.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I know that great weight is to be attached to what Mr. Symon says, but I would like to point out that this possibility which he evidently believes never would arise has actually arisen in America. I have only quoted two cases, but I could have cited another authority who deplorer the existence of this power in Parliament. In view of these facts, what becomes of the allegation that such a thing is impossible? It has actually occurred in the only Federation in whose Constitution these very words stand. This is one of those cases in which an ounce of fact is worth a pound of theory. Mr. Symon says that if we do not leave these words in there will be appeals in almost every case of minor importance, and that Parliament will have no power to interfere. But we do not wish it to remain in that way. I suggest that Parliament should be empowered to authorize that the state court or the Federal Court should have power to place restrictions on puisne appeals.

Mr. SYMON. -
That is a very intelligent proposal.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Well, I made that proposal before, and it is only a matter of drafting. If we retain these words we will really destroy the whole thing, and it seems to me that the object we have in view would be attained by inserting after the word "appeals" the words "in all cases in which they lie, and under such conditions and regulations as the High Court may prescribe by rules." Then the High Court may put, as the Privy Council does, a ban on appeals of a trivial nature. If the words we object to are retained they will put the whole jurisdiction of the High Court at the mercy of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is impossible under clause 77.

Mr. GLYNN. -
But clause 74 limits the operation of clause 77. In some cases there is an original as well as an appellate jurisdiction, but the foundation of the right of appeal in the High Court rests on clause 74, which contains the words to which I object.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
The amendment about the Inter-State Commission in subsection (2) of clause 74 would certainly have escaped my attention but for what has just transpired. I have a very strong objection to the words "Inter-State Commission" being inserted in this clause.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I understood that the drafting amendments were to be placed in the Bill, but that that did not give away the right of any honorable member to canvass them at a later stage. The amendment to which Mr. Isaacs objects is merely an attempt to express the sense of the Convention as members of the Drafting Committee gathered it in the debate on the clause relating to the Inter-State Commission. There seemed to be, I will not say a general consensus of opinion, because some honorable member who said nothing might think something the other way, but several honorable members said, without any opposition being manifested, that there ought to be provision for an appeal to the High Court from a decision of the Inter-State Commission. The amendment merely expresses that view, which we gathered to be the sense of the Convention on the subject. The honorable member will have every opportunity of moving to strike out these words at another time. I understood that we were simply going through the amendments that I proposed on recommittal, leaving the other amendments to be dealt with afterwards.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 77 (Original jurisdiction of High Court)

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the following words be added to sub-section (3) of clause 77:-"or between residents of different states, or between a state and a resident of another state."

It is necessary to add these words.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I should like to know a little about this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It is the same as an amendment which we have already made in clause 73. It is consequential.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

"Or between residents of different states." Will not the effect of that be to alter the law as it stands by which, say, a person living in New South Wales can be sued by a person living in Victoria or South Australia? Will this provision take away the jurisdiction of the local courts and compel actions to be brought only in the Federal Court?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

This amendment does not, take away the jurisdiction of any local court.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am not sure that it does not.

Mr. BARTON. -

What the provision does is to give a certain jurisdiction to the High Court, which enables a litigant to go to the High Court in the first instance. Of course, in the case of an appeal he would go to the High Court first, but the High Court has original jurisdiction, and can entertain a case in the first instance. That is all.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales) moved -
That the following new sub-section (5) be added to the clause:
In which a writ of mandamus or prohibition, or an injunction, is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 79. - The trial of all indictable offences against any law of the Commonwealth shall be by jury, and every such trial shall be held in the state where the offence was committed, and if the offence was not committed within any state the trial shall be held at such place or places as the Parliament prescribes.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the words "of all indictable offences" (line 1), be struck out, and that the words "on indictment of any offence" be substituted.

The object of this amendment is simple. As the clause stood it provided that the trial of all indictable offences against any law of the Commonwealth "shall be by jury." This meant that, however small might be the offence created by any Commonwealth enactment, supposing an offence that should be punishable summarily, it would, nevertheless, have to be tried by Jury. Then there are cases of contempt which are, we know, indictable offences, and these, under the clause, would have to be tried by jury. The better way, however, is as we suggest, that where there is a power of punishing a minor offence summarily, it may be so punished summarily. But where an indictment has been brought the trial must be by jury. The object was to preserve trial by jury where an indictment has been brought, but such cases of contempt should be punishable by the court in the ordinary way. The clause as it stood would compel the trial of all contempts by jury, and so.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

When the clause was before us previously, I pointed out that I did not think it would have any real effect at all, because it is within the powers of the Parliament to say what shall be an indictable offence and what shall not. The Parliament could, if it chose, say that murder was not to be an indictable offence, and therefore the right to try a person accused of murder would not necessarily be by jury.

Mr. BARTON. -

It might drive the Commonwealth to deal differently with this class of offences.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It might. If you say "on indictment of any offence," if it means proceedings by means known technically as indictment, that could be got over by what is known as a presentment, and then the trial need not be by jury at all. It could be got over in various ways by saying that the jury should be composed of two persons, or, of only one person. The alteration here proposed prevents the difficulty Mr. Barton refers to, but I must say that I do not see much effect in the clause as it stands in regard to preserving in all circumstances trial by jury.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

There are many offences dealt with summarily which are indictable, and we must be careful not to do away with summary jurisdiction. That would not be at all desirable.

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 80. - No person holding any judicial office shall be appointed to or hold the office of Governor-General, Lieutenant-Governor, Chief Executive Officer, or Administrator of the Government, or any other executive office.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That at the end of the clause there be added the words "of the Commonwealth."

The object of this amendment is to make it clear that a person, holding a judicial office may not hold any other executive office in the Commonwealth. Without this addition at the end of the clause, it might be possibly construed to mean that the Chief Executive Officer or Administrator of the Government is an officer of the state. To restrict the clause to what is really intended, that is to say, to prohibit all judicial officers from holding offices in the Commonwealth, we propose to add these words. There seems to be a strong opinion in the Convention that the holder of any judicial office should be prohibited from holding these Commonwealth offices.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Would he necessarily be excluded under the words as now?

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not say that; but I have an impression that he would. The words are-"No person holding any judicial office."

Mr. SYMON. -
Any person in active service.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, as my friend says, any person in active service—any Judge who is not a retired Judge.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
That would exclude a justice of the peace.

Mr. BARTON. -
No, I do not think it would. Primarily a justice of the peace was a ministerial officer who inquired into indictable offences, and committed or not, as there might be a prima facie case. But a justice of the peace has since been invested by statute with summary jurisdiction. I question whether that makes the office of justice of the peace a "judicial office."

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
Before the amendment is put, I desire to say I have given notice of an amendment. I suppose this will be the proper time for me to submit that amendment, as clause 80 has been recommitted.

Mr. BARTON. -
The amendment of the honorable member is for the second recommittal.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I understood the consensus of opinion was that on this particular recommittal we should only deal with the amendments of the Hon. Mr.
Barton, and that afterwards there was to be another recommittal to deal with the suggestions of other honorable members of the Convention.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Very well, so long as that is understood.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
It might, perhaps, be desired to make an exception such as is suggested in regard to the office of justice of the peace, but it is not intended that a person who holds merely the office of justice of the peace should be excluded.

Mr. SYMON. -
If a gentleman were offered the post of Lieutenant-Governor he would not hesitate to resign his position as justice of the peace. I see no practical difficulty in the way.

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not think myself there will be any practical difficulty. If the Convention consider it necessary to insert, after the words "judicial office," the words "not being that of justice of the peace," there could be no objection, but I think that would be overloading the clause.

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 83. - No money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the Commonwealth, except under appropriation made by law.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That at the end of clause 83, there be added the words "but until the first appropriation the Governor-General in Council may draw from the Treasury, and expend, such moneys as may be necessary for the maintenance of any department transferred to the Commonwealth under this Constitution."

This is an amendment of substance, which I will explain in a few words. Clause 83 means that no money can be spent unless Parliament passes an Appropriation Act. But before Parliament is in existence certain departments will have been transferred to the Commonwealth. These departments will have to be administered by the Commonwealth, and that will necessitate expenditure for the maintenance and continuance of the departments.

Mr. ISAACS. -

How about the expenses of electing the first Parliament?

Mr. BARTON. -

That might have to wait. One is so chary about giving power to spend money that is not appropriated by law that I and my colleagues on the committee have endeavoured to keep the power down as low as possible, so as to confine it to expenditure absolutely necessary for the administration of departments.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What would happen if the Government of the day did spend the money? Could the High Court do anything?

Mr. BARTON. -

Well, I am not quite sure about that. I do not think Sir John Forrest need have any particular apprehension that any of the results which he thought was threatened when the previous discussion was going on will come about.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It is a very important matter.

Mr. BARTON. -
The amendment reads "but until the first appropriation the Governor-General in Council may draw upon the Treasury, and expend, such money as may be necessary for the maintenance of any department transferred to the Commonwealth under this Constitution." It is obviously clear there must be some expenditure, and it is provided in the clause that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except under appropriation made by law.

If the amendment were not passed, the Executive, in the organization of the departments, must be hampered. It is obvious that some provision must be made. No provision can be made by Parliament until Parliament is in existence, and any payments made in the interval would, at any rate, be technically breaches of the Constitution, unless they are provided for in the way the amendment suggests.

Mr. ISAACS. - Would the honorable gentleman not be disposed to say-"Until the first meeting of Parliament"?

Mr. BARTON. - I doubt whether that would be any good. You cannot expect Parliament to pass an appropriation immediately it meets. I take it for granted that possibly the first meeting of Parliament will be employed in providing for necessary expenditure of the Commonwealth, and that the session will be a financial session to begin with. Provision must be made for the ordinary services of the year, and that being done, an Appropriation Act will have to be passed. Under the circumstances, it may be Parliament would not care to sit after an Appropriation Act had been passed.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Are you not making the first Ministry independent of any appropriation? Are you not making the Ministry independent of Parliament, in the sense of enabling Ministers to say-"Oh, if you don't give us an Appropriation Act we can still spend."

Mr. BARTON. - I quite agree that is what might be urged against the clause. But the difficulty is that unless you pass the amendment you drive the Executive Government into making a daily infringement on the Constitution. If you begin the Constitution by having a daily infringement of that sort, you altogether weaken the authority of the prohibition against any appropriation which is not made by law.

Mr. HIGGINS. - The answer given before, when this matter was discussed in Sydney or Adelaide, was that the Ministry would draw expecting to be indemnified.

Mr. BARTON. -
Expecting to be indemnified by Parliament; but in drawing in that way they would be making a daily breach of the Constitution. Is it not better under all the circumstances of the case that the first Ministry should be invested with a power to draw so long as that power was limited to the necessary maintenance of departments? The department of Customs and Excise will go over at once to the Commonwealth, and salaries must be paid month by month. By proclamation the Commonwealth will take over the Postal and Telegraph, Quarantine, and other departments, and necessarily there must be an expenditure of money for the upkeep of these departments. If the Commonwealth have to expend money in this way, why should we enact that such expenditure is a breach of the Constitution? When we have that expenditure within our knowledge, why should we take such a step as to necessarily cause the first Ministry to make a breach of the Constitution?

Mr. FRASER. -
There is no danger.

Mr. BARTON. -
There is.

Mr. FRASER. -
But there is no danger of the first Federal Ministry spending improperly.

Mr. BARTON. -
There is no danger of the Ministry spending improperly, because, as

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
There are two points which I want to suggest to the consideration of the leader of the Convention. The first is whether the words of the amendment will cover the expenses of the first election of the House of Representatives?

Mr. BARTON. -
No, they will not.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Then would it not be wise to insert, after the word "for," the words "the first election of Parliament and," or such other words as the Drafting Committee may suggest? The next point is that the clause, as it stands, to which the words of the amendment are proposed as an addition, is a little bare. While on the general principle, I think, no objection could be taken, yet still we all know there are emergencies which arise. There is such an emergency as the necessity for quarantine. I see that a vessel has just arrived on the west coast with smallpox on board, and it is possible that the Government there, in the emergency, might be run into an expenditure of thousands of pounds.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We will spend it all right.

Mr. BARTON. -
That is covered by the clause as amended.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I am speaking of the clause as it stands, and as the position would be after the first appropriation. Under the clause there undoubtedly would be excess expenditure from time to time to provide for such cases as that of quarantine. Such expenditure would be a breach of the law, and whether or not some words should be inserted in clause 83 to cover such contingencies is worth consideration. It might be provided that expenditure necessary in such emergencies might be incurred, provided that the approval of Parliament was obtained within a time specified. Although every excess is covered by an Excess Bill, still the expenditure is a breach of the Constitution, and the point I have suggested is worth consideration.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I doubt whether such a suggestion would be wise after Parliament is once constituted. You must then leave the Ministry responsible to Parliament, which has the power to indemnify the Ministry if any expenditure of the kind is incurred during recess. My only object is to prevent the expenditure I have mentioned being regarded as a breach of the Constitution. I have no objection to the insertion of the words Mr. Holder referred to as to the expenses of the first election of the House of Representatives. That might cover the other part of the ground.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Could the Treasurer be restrained from going to excess of expenditure by an injunction?

Mr. BARTON. -
I doubt it very much.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
That is a very strong proposal, you know.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I feel no doubt that the court would not grant an injunction.

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not think that in any such case an injunction would be granted. It could be granted, but I do not think the court would grant it.

Mr. ISAACS. -
In similar cases the courts have held that where it is a matter to a large extent of discretion as to what is necessary, they would not grant an injunction. Even in the case of a tax unless the tax were unconstitutional, the courts would not grant an injunction.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In New South Wales, about five years ago, when taxes brought down in the Budget and not sanctioned by law, were collected there was an attempt to bring a mandamus against the Collector of Customs—I think it was in the form of a mandamus—to compel him to admit some important articles free of duty under the Customs Act. The court said they must decline to exercise any such power at all, and that it was a matter in which they could not restrain an officer. That is a similar case.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

That is a similar case. I agree with Mr. Holder that it would be better to put in a provision for the first election. That is what I meant when I interjected in regard to the first Parliament. But while we ought to have a provision of this nature, we ought to make it as narrow as we possibly can, consistently with meeting the necessity of the case.

Mr. BARTON. -

Hear, hear; I quite agree with you.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think we might fairly ask Mr. Barton to omit the word "appropriation," and insert the words "first meeting of Parliament."

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Say, until a month after the first meeting of Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No; until the first meeting of Parliament. When Parliament meets it will be alive to the necessity of providing for the immediate demands of the state. From the moment Parliament exists and is ready for work the responsibility of the Ministry ought to commence.

Mr. BARTON. -

You must allow the Executive to pay salaries up to the expiration of the current month. I think Dr. Cockburn's suggestion would meet the case.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I have no objection, provided there is a limit. We must recollect that Parliament is powerless to pass an appropriation until the Ministry think fit to bring down a message from the Governor-General. Therefore, I think it is right, taking that into consideration additionally, we should say that until a month after the first week of the Parliament the Governor-General in Council may have that power. I think we ought to limit it in that way—

Mr. BARTON. -

I will accept that.
Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I quite agree with the last speaker. A large responsibility will rest on the formation of the first Executive. We will imagine the case of Parliament being called together, and the first Executive not having the confidence of the House. What is the usual mode in which the House expresses in the last resort its want of confidence in the Executive? It refuses Supply, and the very fact of its refusing to make an appropriation will establish the Government as more omnipotent than ever.

Mr. BARTON. -

I have accepted the amendment which Mr. Isaacs has suggested.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

If the honorable member had said so, I would not have risen.

Mr. BARTON. -

I said so, and I thought that the honorable member heard me.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I was only advancing this as a very cogent reason indeed for making the amendment, because otherwise the refusal of supply would place the Government in a better position than if an Appropriation Bill were passed.

Mr. BARTON. -

I beg to move-

That the amendment be amended by the omission of the words "the first appropriation of," with a view to the insertion in their place of the words"-the expiration of one month after the first meeting of the Parliament."

The amendment was amended accordingly.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I would suggest to the leader that the words "before the elections or" be inserted after the word "necessary."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I would rather have that later on, because the maintenance of this department is the first duty which the Government will have to do and then will come later on a provision for the elections. I beg to move-

That the amendment be amended by the addition of the words "and for the holding of the first elections of the Parliament."

The amendment was amended accordingly, and was then agreed to.

The new clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 85 (Transfer of officers),

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That clause 85 be omitted, with the view to the insertion in its place of another clause.

The redraft of this clause has been circulated. It has been redrafted in consonance with the suggestions which were made to the Drafting Committee during the debate on the clause, and also by inserting in substance the amendment which was carried, and the amendment of Western Australia which Sir John Forrest supported, and which was only formally negatived on the understanding that it should be in some shape inserted. The new clause provides that when a department becomes transferred to the Commonwealth—that will be in the care of Customs and Excise at once, and in the case of the other departments when transferred under proclamations—then all the officers of that department shall become subject to Commonwealth control, but when an officer is not retained in the service of the Commonwealth he shall be entitled to receive from the state any pension—that is the word inserted according to the feeling of the committee-gratuity, or compensation which would have been payable to him under the law of the state if his office had been abolished. That is to take effect unless he is appointed to some other office of equal emolument in the state to which he belongs. It also provides that any officer who is retained in the service of the Commonwealth shall not lose any of his existing rights or rights accruing, that is to say, that the transfer to the Commonwealth service shall not prejudice him, and that he shall be entitled to retire from office at the time he would have been entitled to retire under the law of his state, and on the same pension or retiring allowance which he would have got from his state, that is to say, in the same way that would take place if his services to the Commonwealth were simply a continuance of the state service. Then the Commonwealth is charged with the payment to him of that pension or retiring allowance, but the Commonwealth is entitled to charge the state, and to be paid by the state, the state's proper proportion thereof, and that is to be calculated on the proportion which his term of service with the state bears to his whole term of service at the time of his retirement; so that the state pays absolutely its proportion. And in this case—this is the Western Australian amendment—the salary on which the calculation is made shall be taken to be the salary he was receiving at the date of his transfer to the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Is it to the proportion payable by the state that the calculation applies?

Mr. BARTON. -

The Commonwealth pays the pension or retiring allowance, but it charges back to, and is paid by, the state a part thereof, to be calculated in the proportion I have named, and it is to that proportion payable by the state that this calculation applies. That carries out the amendment of my right honorable friend.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The whole pension is calculated on the whole s

Mr. BARTON. -

We ventured to make an addition to the clause which, I think, will meet with the approval of honorable members. There will be cases in which officers will be transferred to the Commonwealth, not with the department in which they have been serving; their departments may not be transferred at all, but they may be officers necessary to the service of the Commonwealth, and there may be the consent of the Governor in Council of the state obtained to their being transferred. In that case they should not be prejudiced either. I think honorable members will admit that if a case of that kind arises, and the Commonwealth wishes to have the services of an officer, and it is arranged with the state he is serving that he shall be transferred to the Commonwealth, that transfer should not be carried out without his rights being preserved.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If he belongs to no department?

Mr. BARTON. -

He must be an officer who at the establishment of the Commonwealth is serving in the public service of a state, but he may not belong to one of the departments transferred. There will be cases of officers of considerable ability whom the Commonwealth may wish to have in its service, and they may arrange with the state for their transfer to the Commonwealth. That is a case which is not provided for in the clause, and it appears to us to be a case of extreme hardship for an officer if his rights were not preserved to him. We have arranged to preserve them in this way: A person who, being at the establishment of the Commonwealth an officer in the public service of the state, when he is taken over with the consent of the Governor in Council of the state, shall have the same rights as if he was an officer of a department transferred to the Commonwealth, and had been retained in the service of the Commonwealth. I think that is manifestly just.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOX (Tasmania). -

I entirely approve of the major part of the amendment suggested here, inasmuch as it protects members of the civil service, but I think in the latter part of paragraph (3) there is some necessity for making a slight amendment. It says-and for the purpose of the calculation his salary shall be taken to be that paid to him by the state at the time of transfer.

That is to say, as a matter of account between the Commonwealth and the state, the Commonwealth shall charge the state with a pension based, for the purpose of calculation, on his salary at the time when his services were taken over. That might work out unjustly as regards the state.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
No.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
I think so. In the great majority of instances—I believe in every instance where a pension is granted—that pension is based not upon the salary drawn by an officer on his retirement or resignation, but on the average of his salary for a term of years.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It is three years with us.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
It is usually from three to five years.

Mr. BARTON. -
Is it worth while fighting for?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It is not worth bothering about.
The clause was omitted.

Mr. BARTON. -
I beg to move-
That the following stand clause 85:-

When any department of the public service of a state becomes transferred to the Commonwealth, all officers of the department shall become subject to the control of the Executive Government of the Commonwealth.

Any such officer who is not retained in the service of the Commonwealth shall, unless he is appointed to some other office of equal emolument in the public service of the state, be entitled to receive from the state any pension, gratuity, or other compensation payable under the law of the state on abolition of his office.

Any such officer who is retained in the service of the Commonwealth shall preserve all his existing and accruing rights, and shall be entitled to retire from office at the time and on the pension or retiring allowance which would be permitted by the law of the state if his service with the Commonwealth were a continuation of his service with the state. Such pension or retiring allowance shall be paid to him by the Commonwealth; but the Commonwealth shall charge to and be paid by the state a part thereof, to be calculated on the proportion which his term of service with the state bears to his whole term of service, and for the purpose of the calculation his salary shall be taken to be that paid to him by the state at the time of transfer.

Any person who, being at the establishment of the Commonwealth an officer in the public service of a state, is with the consent of the Governor in Council of the state transferred to the public service of the Commonwealth, shall have the same rights as if he were an officer of a department transferred to the Commonwealth, and had been retained in the service of the Commonwealth.

The new clause was agreed to.

Clause 86 (Transfer of land, buildings, vessels, &c.),

Mr. BARTON. -

I beg to move-

That clause 86 be omitted, with the view to the insertion of another clause in its place.

The clause was omitted.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the following stand clause 85A:-

When the control of any department or service of a state is transferred to the Commonwealth under this Constitution

I. All property of the state, of any kind, used exclusively in connexion with the department or service, shall become vested in the Commonwealth; but in the case of the departments controlling customs and excise and bounties for such time only as the Governor-General in Council may declare to be necessary.

II. The Commonwealth may acquire any property of the state, of any kind, used but not exclusively used in connexion with the department or service; the value thereof shall, if no agreement can be made, be ascertained in as nearly as may be the manner in which the value of land, or of an interest in land, taken by the state for public purposes is ascertained under the law of the state in force at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

III. The Commonwealth shall compensate the state for the value of any property passing to the Commonwealth under this section; and if no agreement can be made as to the manner of the compensation, it shall be determined under laws to be made by the Parliament.

IV. The Commonwealth shall, at the date of the transfer, assume the current obligations of the state in respect of the departments or services transferred.

It will be necessary to make some explanation of this clause, because it goes perhaps beyond mere drafting. It only goes beyond a mere change of draft of the clause, owing to those of the suggestions made in committee which we thought proper to accept. The original clause provided for the taking over of property necessarily appertaining to or used in connexion with any of the departments of the public service transferred to the Commonwealth either absolutely, or, in the case of the Customs and Excise departments, for such time as may be necessary. It was pointed out by several honorable members that there may be a property used partly for a department transferred to the Commonwealth and partly for state purposes which are not the subject of a transfer, that it would involve the passing over of a property not exclusively used, but partly used, for such a purpose, and that the Commonwealth would get what it wanted, but that the state had parted with more than it; was necessary to give to the Commonwealth, That we have dealt with in this new clause.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We wanted to have it done with the consent of the state.

Mr. BARTON. -

The feeling of the committee was this, that those things which were exclusively used for the department transferred should go over at once to the Commonwealth, while those that were not exclusively used might be left to an agreement between the Commonwealth and the state, that is to say, that there should be an option. We have provided for an option.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

How?

Mr. BARTON. -

It is also provided-and, I think, with the generally-expressed desire of honorable members-that, instead of the Commonwealth having to pay the "fair value," which might mean the value in cash, the matter may be arranged between the parties, and, in the failure of any agreement, according to the provisions of an Act passed by the Parliament. The substance of the new clause is that, when any department or service is transferred to the Commonwealth, either at once, as in the case of the Customs and Excise department, or as provided for under clause 69, if the property transferred is used exclusively for the service transferred it shall become vested in the Commonwealth but in the case of the departments controlling customs and excise and bounties, only for such time as the Governor-General in Council may declare to be necessary. That is the only way in which we thought that the matter could be provided for.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Will the provision in the clause enable the Governor-General to make a declaration at any time?

Mr. BARTON. -
I was coming to that. My right honorable friend will see that it will be necessary for the Commonwealth to pay the value of this property in some form or other, if not in cash, perhaps in stocks or bonds. The Governor-General must therefore, as a matter of practical necessity, declare for what tune the property is to be taken over by the Commonwealth in order that its value may be ascertained. As regards the property of a state used in connexion with the department or service which has been transferred to the Commonwealth, but not used exclusively by the Commonwealth, it is provided that its value shall be ascertained by agreement between the parties, if possible, but if no agreement can be come to, the value must be fixed according to the provisions of the Lands for Public Purposes Acquisition Acts, or corresponding Acts in force in the colon to which the property to be transferred belongs. We provide that the states shall be compensated by the Commonwealth for property which passes under the clause, but if no agreement can be come to as to the manner of compensation, it shall be determined by a law passed by the Commonwealth Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But the Commonwealth Parliament will be one of the parties to the purchase.

Mr. BARTON. -

No; the Executive Government will be a party to the purchase. There must be some authority to determine the mode of compensation. It is the second sub-section which provides for the ascertaining. of the value. A separate sub-section makes provision for the manner of the compensation, that is to say, whether the compensation shall be in cash or bonds, or in some other way. Clearly, the High Court could not determine a matter of that kind. It is a matter of political arrangement between the Commonwealth and the state.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Will it be optional with the state to say whether property shall or shall not be handed over?

Mr. BARTON. -

If my right honorable friend will look at sub-section (3) he will see that it is not the state but the Commonwealth which has this option. Of course, the Commonwealth, as a general rule, will not take over property except such as is to be exclusively used for a service that has been transferred to it.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The clause does not contain the words "with the consent of the state."
Mr. BARTON. -

That is so, but you cannot carry a sale into effect without knowing the price. The price is a condition to be determined before the sale is made.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I thought that where property was not to be used exclusively by the Commonwealth there was to be no absolute power in the Commonwealth to take it over.

Mr. BARTON. -

I understood that the feeling of the committee was that the Commonwealth should have the option of saying whether it would or would not take over any property, but that the state should be able to arrange with the Commonwealth as to the price to be paid for any property taken over. If the parties cannot agree, the price is to be determined according to the law of the state in regard to the acquisition of property for public purposes.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Is there any special reason for providing for two special modes of ascertaining the value of property?

Mr. BARTON. -

There is no attempt to provide for two different modes of ascertaining the value. The second sub-section provides for the ascertaining of the value, while the third sub-section provides only for the manner of the compensation. That was one of the most difficult clauses in the Bill to redraft, because of the very nature of its provisions. There are the three cases to be considered. There is the property exclusively used for a transferred service; that goes over to the Commonwealth absolutely, except in the case of departments controlling customs and excise and bounties, in which case it goes over to the Commonwealth only for a time to be declared by the Governor-General in Council. Then you come to the ascertaining of the price where property is used by the Commonwealth, but not exclusively used by it, in connexion with any transferred department or service. In this case the value is to be ascertained by agreement, or, failing that, by the ordinary law in force in the state for the ascertaining of the value of property acquired by the Government for public purposes.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The Commonwealth might take a quarter or half of a building.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think that is likely. There would probably be some arrangement made by which either the state or the Commonwealth would take over the whole building. Then we come to the manner of compensation, which is to be decided by agreement, if possible, but, if no agreement can be come to, by the provisions of an Act passed by the Parliament of the Commonwealth. I strongly object to any one being a judge in his own cause, but in this case you do not allow one of the parties to determine his own cause, because the Parliament of the Commonwealth will not be a party to the transaction, but a body in which all the states will be represented. The fourth sub-section deals with that part of clause 69 to which the honorable and learned member (Mr. Higgins) objected. At his instance, I consented to agree to the striking out of the last two words of that clause. The provision finds its proper place in this clause, where there is a distinction between the price and the liabilities taken over.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Do the words "any property passing to the Commonwealth," which occur in sub-section (3), include property dealt with in sub-section (2)?

Mr. BARTON. -

The third sub-section provides for the manner of compensation in regard to any property passing to the Commonwealth. The matter was the subject of a long debate here. Honorable members, the Right Hon. Sir George Turner amongst them-suggested that the value need not necessarily be paid in cash, but that there might be some provision for an arrangement between the parties as to the mode of paying it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Ought you not to put in the words "manner of the payment of compensation"?

Mr. BARTON. -

I think that the words "manner of compensation" are sufficient. The price will have been ascertained beforehand.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

May I ask the honorable and learned member a question in regard to a practical difficulty? A custom-house is not an easy property to sell or to value. Is there not, therefore, need of a provision defining the basis of valuation which is to be applied? I suppose a big building like the Custom-house in Sydney or Melbourne is not to be valued upon the basis of the receipts for the last few years?

Mr. BARTON. -

I suppose not, unless my honorable and learned friend is going to suggest an amendment to that effect.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The question is one of great practical difficulty. You can value the land easily enough, but not the buildings.
Mr. BARTON. -

The Acts dealing with the taking over of land in any state deal also with the taking over of buildings, so far as I know.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes, but the value of a building like a custom-house, a state school, or lands titles office, would depend very much upon the use to which it could be put.

Mr. BARTON. -

There will be no good will to take over. I suppose that any authority wishing to arrive at a valuation would ask the question-"What did this building cost to build?" or "For what could a building of this kind be built?"

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -

I was waiting for the presence in the chamber of the right honorable member (Sir George Turner), because I presume that the last few words of sub-section (1) will apply more to border custom-houses than to other property. After seven years, the Commonwealth will find many of these custom-houses unnecessary, and it is provided that they may then be thrown upon the hands of the states.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

This provision will apply only to border custom-houses.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Not only to border custom-houses. It will also apply to custom-houses at places like Hobart and Launceston.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Those custom-houses will always be wanted.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

The words to which I refer are these:-

But in the case of the departments controlling customs and excise and bounties, for such time only as the Governor-General in Council may declare to be necessary.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That provision is to enable the Commonwealth to give up such border custom-houses as they may not require after seven years.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

The Commonwealth might wish to move the Custom-house from Melbourne to some other place. Of course that may be a far-fetched assumption; but in the case of a town like Launceston, the Commonwealth might desire to give up the Custom-house, and to collect the customs duties at some other place upon the river. In such a case the building would be thrown upon the state, though it would be useless for any other purpose than that for which it has been designed.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The Federal Parliament will not be a body of foes.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Certainly not. No one has trusted more to the future in connexion with this matter than I have, and I desire to continue my confidence in the Federal Parliament. But I should like some explanation of this provision, or, at any rate, to call the attention of honorable members to some of the difficulties which it may create.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

Does not sub-section (4) involve the Commonwealth in the obligations of the states in regard to contracts entered into with officers of departments and services transferred? The first part of this clause contemplates the taking over of the officers chosen, but the concluding part of it seems to imply that the whole of the current obligations in regard to the departments are to be taken over. These obligations would include the contracts with the officers. An exception should be made of the obligations of the public servants, and that might be done by inserting after "state" the words "except as regards public officers."

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

it is necessary to have some clause of this kind in the Bill. When a department is taken over it will, no doubt, have some contracts.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Postal contracts, for example.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes, there will be a number of matters of that sort that it will be necessary to transfer. The obligations of the departments to their officers are dealt with differently. The proclamation of the Commonwealth will no doubt be arranged in such a way that there will be no difficulty in ascertaining what those obligations are. I do not think there is any need for the alteration the honorable member suggests.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

I do not think the honorable member has quite followed me. Part of the current obligations would be the contracts made by the state with its officers. It is not contemplated that the Commonwealth shall take over all the officers, but only such officers as it requires. If we stipulate that the Commonwealth shall take over every current obligation, would not that imply the taking over of the whole of the officers?
Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I understood the honorable member, but what is the contract between the Government and its officers? It is a contract that is terminable at any time at the will of the Government? The current obligations means only the obligations which exist at the time of taking over, and if there is any money due to a public servant at that time there is no reason why the Commonwealth should not pay it.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -
Right up to the moment of the establishment of the Commonwealth all these officers would be in the full employment of the state.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Yes; but there is no right to continued employment, and there is, therefore, no obligation taken over.

Mr. GORDON. -
It might not be an absolutely legal obligation, but no Government in the world would discharge its officers in that way without compensation.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Undoubtedly.

Mr. GORDON. -
Then the Commonwealth would either have to take over the whole of the officers or give compensation to those who were not required, or retain them until vacancies occurred which they could fill.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Clause 85 provides for all that.

Mr. GORDON. -
There is a contradiction between the two clauses. If the honorable member is quite satisfied that the matter is clear, I am not going to press the objection. But it seems to me that there is a possibility of an obligation resting on the Commonwealth that it ought not to be asked to assume.

The new clause was agreed to.

Clause 90. - Until the imposition of uniform duties of customs-
I. The Commonwealth shall credit to each state the revenues collected therein from the duties of customs and of excise, and in the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the state to the Commonwealth under this Constitution.

II. The Commonwealth shall debit to each state-
(a) the expenditure therein of the, Commonwealth in the collection of duties of customs and of excise, and in the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the state to the Commonwealth under this Constitution.
(b) the proportion of the state, according to the number of its people, in the expenditure of the Commonwealth incurred by reason of the original powers given to it by this Constitution.

But any expenditure of the Commonwealth originated by the requirements of the Commonwealth in respect of services or powers transferred and not incurred solely for the maintenance or continuance, in any state, of the services existing at the time of the transfer shall be taken to be incurred by reason of the original powers given to the Commonwealth by this Constitution.

III. The Commonwealth shall pay to each state, month by month, the balance (if any) in favour of the state.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That sub-section (1) be amended by the omission of all the words after "therein."

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

How will it read? I cannot understand the amendment. There must be a mistake.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

There is no mistake about it. If the honorable member will read the clause he will see that it begins "Until the imposition of uniform duties of customs." Then it says-"The Commonwealth shall credit to each state the revenues collected therein." That is on the one side, and then on the other it says-"shall debit to each state the expenditure therein of the Commonwealth" in the collection of duties of customs and of excise, and in the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the state to the Commonwealth under this Constitution."
The intention is to make a complete account on both sides. Under

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You simply say-"The Commonwealth shall credit to each state the revenue collected therein." That would mean the whole of the revenue of the state.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, you are dealing with the Commonwealth collections, and it is not necessary to say-"shall collect the revenues of the Commonwealth therein."
That is implied.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
It may be implied, but if you put "Commonwealth" before "revenues" it might save trouble.

Mr. HOLDER. -
The Commonwealth have nothing to do with any other revenues but their own.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
We are dealing with their revenues.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Until they impose Uniform duties of customs they are state revenues.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
With all respect to the honorable member, I say that they are revenues collected under the laws of the state, but collected by the Commonwealth in the state. A credit and a debit account is to be kept in the Treasury books of the Commonwealth. I do not see that there is any difficulty. The honorable member (Sir George Turner) will see that the reason for striking out these words is that they are really unnecessary, because the account must include the whole of the revenues of the state collected by the Commonwealth.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
There is a clerical error in the amendment, and what should be done is to strike out all the words after "therein."

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -
I should like to know whether, in the absence of any express words, it will be perfectly clear that the revenues intended are only the revenues collected on account of the Commonwealth? I should like to ask Mr. O'Connor if it is necessary to put that in? In Tasmania we have a special police rate which forms part of the revenue of the state, and I have no doubt in other colonies there are also special rates. I think some words expressly conveying our meaning as to the revenues intended should be put in so as to state that the revenues are to be those collected on account of the Commonwealth, otherwise there may be some little misunderstanding.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -
It appears to me we want some explanation why these words should be struck out. The language is so explicit as to the revenues we are dealing with that I should like Mr. O'Connor to explain why they should be struck out?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Because they are not necessary.

Mr. HENRY. -
The language in the clause seems so clear and explicit, as conveying the intention we all understood with regard to the clause, that I should like to hear some justification for striking out these words.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I would suggest to the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) that he should make the first sub-section harmonize with the second. In the second sub-section we have the words "the expenditure therein of the Commonwealth." Why not make the first read "The Commonwealth shall credit to each state the revenues collected therein of the Commonwealth"?

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I have no objection to that, and I am obliged to the honorable member for the suggestion. With regard to Mr. Henry's question, I quite agree with the honorable member that the words as they were in before were clear enough, but one of our objects is not only to have the form of the Bill clear, but also to have no unnecessary verbiage in it. Inasmuch as the words which we are dealing with must include the whole of the revenue of the state collected by the Commonwealth in the state, there is no necessity to distinguish the whole of the revenue of the state taken over, that is to say, Customs, Excise, and the transferred services. They are the only revenues of the state which will be collected by the Commonwealth. Therefore, there is no necessity to describe them. I think if the suggestion of Mr. Holder is carried out it puts the matter beyond all doubt. I beg to move-

That after the word "therein" the words "by the Commonwealth" be inserted.

The amendment was amended accordingly, and was then agreed to.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That, in sub-section 2 (a), after "Commonwealth," where it first occurs, omit remainder of sub-section, and insert "incurred solely for the maintenance or continuance, as at the time of transfer, of any department transferred from the state to the Commonwealth other than the departments of naval and military defence, lighthouses, lightships, beacons and buoys, and quarantine."

This is merely a drafting amendment as to the first part, and as to the second part it embodies a very important amendment suggested by Dr. Quick, that is to say, it makes from the beginning one of the original expenditures of the Commonwealth: Naval and military defence, lighthouses, lightships, beacons and buoys, and quarantine. These are services in respect of which no revenue is collected, and therefore they ought not to go into the accounts against the state. In addition to that, they are matters in which the whole Commonwealth are concerned from the very first. As there is no revenue coming from them-

Mr. ISAACS. -

Is it correctly printed after "Commonwealth" where it secondly occurs?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

This was a matter very carefully considered in the Finance Committee, and concerning which we arrived at a very definite conclusion. If necessary, I am quite prepared to make a long speech on this subject to show cause why we should not retrace our steps now. I beg to move-

That all the words in the amendment after the word "Commonwealth"-

"other than the departments of naval and military defence, lighthouses, lightships, beacons and buoys, and quarantine" be struck out.

If that does not accomplish my object, I should be glad if Mr. O'Connor would tell me so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I strongly oppose any amendment of this kind. I think the Bill ought to be left as it is. In 1891, in New South Wales, the system was adopted that the collections should be returned to the states, less a per capita charge for all the expenditure, and that is the strong point that was raised against that Bill. If we are to have a per capita system for expenditure I do not object, if you have a per capita system for the receipts as well; but I am certainly going to object as strongly as I can to any system by which we are going to divide the collection on a basis which means that you are going to charge a portion of the expenditure handed over on a per capita basis. This means an immense advantage, as was pointed out several times, to New South Wales.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

In what way?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Because your expenditure for defence is far more per capita than it is with us.

Mr. REID. -

May not the Commonwealth spend less?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The Commonwealth will not spend less, because we know that we have cut down our expenditure to the lowest point.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

According to this it is per capita.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
According to the amendment as put; that is what I object to. I am perfectly prepared that we shall follow out the Bill, which provides that whatever expenditure is incurred in the colonies with regard to the different matters handed over shall be charged against the colonies, and the balance of the receipts shall be handed over to them. But I do object to having a system under which you are going to have a portion charged on the actual expenditure, and another portion charged on another system altogether. This was one matter which I brought forward when this question was being discussed. I have always contended that the per capita method should start from the first, but a compromise was arrived at in the Finance Committee on the basis that, if we are not to have a per capita method from the start, we should not charge any portion of the expenditure on a per capita basis unless we charged the receipts on a per capita basis.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Better leave it as it is, or there will be a big fight over it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Certainly there will be a big fight over it, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -
I hope the committee will not leave the amendment as it is. It was clearly understood that we were to adopt the system of keeping separate collections of revenue for each state, and that accounts of the separate expenditure of each state should also be kept. In this matter of the defences alone, the expenditure on which is proposed to be made a charge per capita, there is a difference of from 4s. 10d. per head in New South Wales to 1s. 1d. in Tasmania. The expenditure on defences for New South Wales, according to the table published by Mr. Fenton, was in 1895-6, £205,000, or nearly £206,000, against Victoria's £163,000; and it was the recognition of the differences that existed in the expenditure of the several colonies that led us to accept the Financial Committee's scheme as submitted to and approved by this Convention.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We have not allowed for new expenditure on the defences.

Mr. HENRY. -
It is provided in the Bill that any new expenditure on naval or military defences of an exceptional character is to be borne per capita by the several colonies; but I am quite satisfied that a proposal that will lay on Tasmania the burden of an additional £16,000 to £20,000 per annum on naval expenditure, as its share of the naval expenditure of the whole of Australasia, is a thing that Tasmania could not bear.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That is not proposed.

Mr. HENRY. -

I merely say that that would be the result of this amendment. Under the existing arrangement, as adopted by the Convention, each colony pays its own way, and Tasmania would therefore have to pay about 1s. 1d. per head; but under this proposed amendment we would be called upon to share in the expenditure of New South Wales, which is about 4s. 10d. per head. That is so obviously opposed to the whole plan of the financial scheme that I am sure the Convention will not entertain it for a moment.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I think the arguments of Dr. Quick were absolutely unanswerable, but as we have settled down to the plan in the Bill, and as it would involve a considerable amount of reconstruction if we altered it, and further, as the whole matter is to be for five years only, and its alteration would cause a large amount of discussion, I think it would be better to leave the thing as it stands.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I wish to explain that this amendment was made by the Drafting Committee because of a suggestion of Dr. Quick, which appeared to us at the time to have the assent of a very large number of the members of the committee. We had no intention of altering in any radical way the basis of arrangement which had been made, but supposed that this amendment represented what was at the time the feeling of the committee generally. Of course, this being a matter of policy, and as the financial members of the Convention have expressed themselves very strongly against the amendment, I have no desire to press it. Personally, I think that the reason suggested by Mr. McMillan would be quite sufficient for allowing the matter to remain as it stands.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

As I read it the first part really hangs on the second.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, there is a sub-section which reads as follows:-

But any expenditure of the Commonwealth originated by the requirements of the Commonwealth in respect of services or powers transferred, and not incurred solely for the maintenance or continuance in any state of the services existing at the time of the transfer, shall be taken to be incurred by reason of the original powers given to the Commonwealth by this Constitution.

That was intended to provide for cases where the expenditure was not only for the up-keep of the services of departments transferred as they were handed over, but for some new services and new expenditure incurred necessarily by the Government of the Commonwealth, and for federal purposes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We agreed to that.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It was agreed that they should come under the head of original charges. The amendment will get rid of that difficulty.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It seems to me the clause carries out exactly what you want.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Instead of putting in the remaining words of sub-section (2) it is proposed to insert, after "Commonwealth," where it first occurs, the words-incurred solely for the maintenance or continuance, as at the time of the transfer, of any department transferred to the Commonwealth.

Then the next amendment is to leave out certain words from paragraph (b), so as to make it read in this way:-

The proportion of the state, according to the number of its people, in other expenditure.

It is necessary, in order to preserve this system or method of dealing with the question, to amend the clause as I have indicated; but I am quite willing to strike out the words which Mr. Holder objects to.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Is there any virtue in the word "department" as distinguished from "services" in the proposed amendment? Are there not transferred services that do not appertain to a department?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No; in all these cases departments are transferred under clause 69.

Mr. Holder's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I would like to ask Mr. O'Connor whether he would like to have inserted after the word "department" the words "of the service"?

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

There is no necessity for that, because clause 69 expressly charges the Commonwealth with the control of departments. What we want to deal with is those departments as transferred. A department may be enlarged or a service may be performed in another way.

Mr. BARTON. -

The word "services" was used in another part of the Bill as referring only to property used in the performance of the services.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
What we want to bring into the account is the expenditure on the departments, and that is what is provided for. All through we have maintained the same wording to indicate, not the general services only, but the departments in working order at the time when they are transferred to the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

This is a very important matter. There is no provision in clause 69 that the department of Customs and Excise shall be transferred, but it provides that "the control" of that department shall be transferred at a certain time.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

"The control and the functions."

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think we should use the same words here. I am afraid there is some difficulty about it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Put in the word "control," so as to say "the control of which is transferred from the state to the Commonwealth."

Mr. BARTON. -

That is a mere drafting amendment. I will see if it is necessary. I will make a note of it.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That, in paragraph (b) of sub-section (2) the word "other" be inserted before the word "expenditure," and that all the words of the sub-section after the word "expenditure" be struck out.

This is a consequential amendment.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

May I ask how the provision will read after this amendment is carried?

The CHAIRMAN. -

It will read as follows:-

(b) The proportion of the state, according to the number of its people in the other expenditure.

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to-

Clause 93B. - Notwithstanding the provisions as to free trade and intercourse between the states, the customs duties in the state of Western Australia as existing at the time of the imposition of uniform duties upon goods not originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth may, if the state thinks fit, continue to be collected for five years with a deduction of 20 per centum per annum (that is to say), with a deduction of 20 per centum for the second year, 40 per centum for the third year, 60 per centum for the fourth year, 80 per centum for the fifth year. At the end of the fifth year, customs duties on all such goods shall cease and determine.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

This clause has been redrafted by the Drafting Committee to make more clear what we think is the intention of this committee, but no material alteration has been made in it. Honourable members will see for themselves how the clause reads now. We propose to put it into a little clearer form, which I think will meet with the view of Sir John Forrest. I beg to move-

That all the words after the word "Notwithstanding" (line 1) be struck out, and that the following words be substituted:-

anything in this Constitution, the Parliament of the state of Western Australia may, during the first five years after the imposition of uniform duties, impose duties of customs on goods entering that state and not originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth; and such duties (if any) shall be collected by the Commonwealth. But any duty so imposed on any article shall not exceed during the first of such years the duty chargeable on the article under the law of Western Australia in force at the imposition of uniform duties, and shall not exceed during the second, third, fourth, and fifth of such years respectively, four-fifths, three-fifths, two-fifths, and one-fifth respectively of such latter duty, and all such duties shall cease at the expiration of the fifth year after the imposition of uniform duties.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I would invite the attention of Mr. Barton to the last sentence-"all such duties shall cease at the expiration of the fifth year after the imposition of uniform duties." Does the honourable member think that that is restricted to goods as they pass from one state to another?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The word "goods" is only used before as to goods entering a state, and not going beyond the limits of the Commonwealth—that is to say, the intercolonial passage of goods, the duty on which is to cease at the end of five years. That is the object of the clause.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Other goods will be subject to the uniform Tariff.

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales).
I beg to move -
That in clause 101 (line 1), after the word "state," there be inserted the words "on a subject within the legislative powers of the Parliament."

This is an amendment suggested by the right honorable member (Mr. Reid). The original reading of the clause was:-

When a law of a state is inconsistent with a law of the Commonwealth, the latter shall prevail, and the former shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be invalid.

And it is now proposed to insert words which will make the clause read:-

When a law of a state on a subject within the legislative powers of the Parliament is inconsistent with a law of the Commonwealth, the latter shall prevail, and the former shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be invalid.

It may be a mere matter of drafting, but my recollection of Mr. Reid's suggestion was that the words should come in after the word "Commonwealth." They have been printed, rightly or not, after the word "state," and I think that must be a misprint. Even without the insertion of these words, the clause would be interpreted to mean what the words convey. As, however, there seemed to be at the time rather a desire to insert the words, and as they do not mar the Bill, I propose to insert them.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

This struck me as a matter of very great importance. If my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) will look at clause 7 and also at clause 101, as they stand in the Bill, he will see that difficulty may arise. A law passed by the Commonwealth on a subject within its legislative powers might, in its operation, conflict with a law passed by a state on a subject on which the state retained exclusive powers-a subject over which the sovereignty of the state was left unimpaired. Now, a very grave situation is raised, because clause 7 provides that the laws of the Commonwealth shall be binding on every state and every subject of the state. Clause 101 follows this up, and provides that when the law of a state is inconsistent with the law of the Commonwealth-it does not say what kind of law, but includes every law-the law of the state shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be invalid. I do not think we propose the Constitution should be so framed that a state law passed on a subject left entirely to the state should "go down" before a law of the Commonwealth on some other subject without any rhyme or reason, and without any reference to any consequence which may follow. This is a very difficult matter, and I admit that the more convenient arrangement would be to let it alone.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That would be the safest way.

Mr. REID. -

But it would I am afraid, practically deny the sovereignty of the states over matters left entirely to the states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The Federal Parliament will not have power to legislate on matters left entirely to the state. How, then, could the laws be inconsistent?

Mr. REID. -

My honorable friend will see that although the subjects might be different they might affect the same thing.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Give us an example.

Mr. REID. -

Any number of examples could be given. In the United States Constitution similar words are found, and I propose to follow this amendment up by a proposal giving the Federal High Court jurisdiction to deal with any subject of conflict between a Commonwealth law on a Commonwealth subject, and a state law on a state subject.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If there is any inconsistency between the Acts, you are going to let it remain.

Mr. REID. -

I propose that the High Court, if there should be a matter involving wrong or loss to an individual or a state, should have jurisdiction to deal with the conflicting interests.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And which law is to prevail?

Mr. REID. -

If we said which law was to prevail, we would foreclose the judgment of the court, which would have nothing left to decide at all. No matter how wrong the action of the Commonwealth might be as to state interests, it would have to go without adjudication, unless the question be referred to the High Court.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

But is it not a question of policy which law ought to prevail? That ought not to be left to the High Court.

Mr. REID. -

There seems to me a question of right under this. Surely the giving of sovereignty to a state on a subject is a mockery, if, when a law passed by that state is found to be inconsistent or in conflict with the operation of a Commonwealth law on a Commonwealth subject, all the interest involved in the state and all the interest under the state law must go to the wall. The Commonwealth legislating on a subject within its jurisdiction might legislate with perfect propriety. A state dealing with a subject entirely within its power, over which subject the Commonwealth had no jurisdiction whatever, might also legislate with perfect propriety. But in the operation of these two pieces of legislation conflict might arise, causing injury to individuals. As the Constitution at present stands, however right and valid the exercise of the state jurisdiction was, the interests of the state would have to go down before the Commonwealth law. The High Court, under the present Bill, would have to say to the state-"Well, we are very sorry for you; this is a hard case; you are subject to a great deal of injury, but the Commonwealth Constitution provides that where there is any inconsistency or variance the Commonwealth law must prevail." The state would "go down" without the merits of the question being gone into at all. These are circumstances which must give rise to a great deal of hardship and dissatisfaction. I would prefer if my honorable friend would not propose the amendment just now. I have given notice of an amendment dealing with this subject, and it would be more convenient if there were a postponement.

Mr. Barton (New South Wales). -

I shall certainly consent to a postponement, because it was Mr. Reid who suggested the amendment in the first instance. I do not so far see that the clause would have the effect Mr. Reid thinks it would have, or that the addition of the words "on a subject within the legislative powers of Parliament" does anything but make it clearer. A law passed by the Commonwealth Parliament would be a law passed within the legislative power of that Parliament, which has no other power. The words do not make the clause any more cogent, although they might be deemed to make it clearer. I have no objection to the insertion of the words, and if my friend would like to move an equivalent amendment, I will withdraw the present amendment.

Mr. Reid (New South Wales). -

I admit that this amendment, when understood, will raise a very serious question, and it is quite possible that my honorable friend may conceive it to be his duty to take a view opposite to mine on this question. I admit that it is a matter which may involve very serious consideration, but I deem it my duty to bring the matter before the Convention, so that it can never be said hereafter that it was not decided.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. Barton (New South Wales). -
The Drafting Committee has prepared and circulated amendments redrafting the railway clauses. I have had the advantage of a conversation with my friend (Mr. Isaacs) on the subject, and he agrees with me that they correctly represent the sense of the committee on the subject. The difficulty which has arisen about them is that, by a clerical error, we took power to recommit clauses 95B, 95C, and 95D, instead of clauses 95A, 95B, and 95C, and, as by following the present procedure we should have to leave in the Bill something which is already redrafted by the suggested amendments, I propose to reserve them for the second recommittal.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
They want a lot of altering.

Mr. BARTON. -
No doubt they do. I think that what has been prepared will carry out the sense of the committee as expressed at the time. Whether the committee remains of the same opinion is another question. I think it would be a very good thing if, after we get through these amendments, honorable members could have a fair print of the Bill placed in their hands on Monday morning. If honorable members would like to do that they can secure it by not going into any very debatable matter this afternoon. I could get an order to reprint before we separate, and the reprint would be in the hands of honorable members on Monday morning.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Let us get on with a few more clauses.

Mr. BARTON. -
I have to report the Bill now, and all I wish to do after reporting it now is not to go into committee again for the short space at our disposal this afternoon, but to get an order for reprinting. I am informed that I can get a reprint without a formal order if we report the Bill this afternoon, and no doubt we can get the matter into the hands of the printer.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
There were put into the Bill the night before last, 140 amendments of the Drafting Committee which are not likely to come directly under our notice. Would it be possible for us within the next hour to run through these amendments, so that the leader of the Convention could indicate their nature? I have no doubt that we should be able to accept them all without debate, but I do not think it is one of those matters we should take absolutely on trust without having our attention called to each amendment which was made on that occasion. I do not know how otherwise they can come before us, because they are already in the Bill.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think it would take longer than an hour to do it. I think an hour spent by my honorable friend with the Bill as amended in Sydney on one side, and the Bill as reprinted on the other side, as we have it now, would obviate the necessity for taking that course. Honorable members will see, I think, when they go through the amendments, that, unless in cases where the sense of the committee has been clearly expressed without an absolute amendment, no liberties have been taken with the work of the committee. But the amendments which have been made are merely questions of drafting, except where a clause has been allowed to pass as it stood with the intention that the amendment suggested in committee should be incorporated in the drafting. In those cases we have taken the liberty of putting them in, as practically acting under the instructions of the committee.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It is difficult to see what words have been put in, as the amendments are not shown in different type.

Mr. BARTON. -

A difficulty which has been raised is that these amendments are not put in block type. The reason that that was done was a very plain one. Honorable members desired to get a print of the Bill, I think it was yesterday morning. In order to do that it was only possible to print the Bill in the way we have done it, that is to say, the Bill as it left Sydney on the one side, and the Bill as theretofore amended up to Tuesday on the other side; but if the printer had got instructions to show the amendments by erased lines and block type, it would not have been possible to get the Bill ready till this morning-24 hours later. As honorable members were in a great hurry to have the Bill in their hands, we had to give instructions to have it done in that way.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Can it be done by Monday?

Mr. BARTON. -

We can get a reprint of the Bill on Monday, but if the other labour is to be cast on the printer of doing it in this form, there is a technical difficulty in the Printing office, because that kind of printing is most difficult and involves more care and labour in its execution than any other work you can impose on the printer.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It would be of very great assistance to honorable members if it were done.

Mr. BARTON. -
It might be of great assistance to honorable members.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Run lines underneath, or show the amendments within inverted commas.

Mr. BARTON. -

We would not get it by Monday then, I am told at the table. There is one thing we can do before we have the adjournment for two or three days for the purpose of finally getting the amendments into consistency. We might give directions then to have the Bill, as we get the sheets done, reprinted in that way. We can think over that. That might be an assistance to honorable members, but to try and get this done now would only prevent the reprint from being in their hands on Monday morning. After all, it only involves the very slightest labour in the world. If an honorable member who is not quite accustomed to legal phraseology will simply take a clause on one side, and compare it with the corresponding clause on the other side, he will see at a glance what the amendments are. Not one of these amendments alters the sense, except where the Convention has practically directed it to be done.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

There is one thing which I hope will not be overlooked, and that is the suggestion which was made by Sir John Forrest yesterday in connexion with the recommittals, and on the strength of which notices of recommittal given by all members except the Drafting Committee were withdrawn, with the view of having the proceedings we have about concluded carried out, and then with the view of having these recommittals take place. The suggestion was that the notices of these recommittals, with the specific amendments intended to be moved, should be handed in, so that honorable members should have them in their possession, and be able to see whether they would assent to any particular recommittal or not. There might be minor recommittals of clauses, which the majority of the Convention might not desire to have brought back again to the committee. We should be quite unable, if they were enumerated as they were yesterday, to determine at the moment whether or not there should be any objection to a recommittal. There might not be, and there might be. What I suggest is: That all those which were notified yesterday might, before we come to have them considered, be put in a list in the order in which the clauses appear in the Bill. That, at any rate, would effect a great saving of time.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

There is such a list on the table.

Mr. SYMON. -
Has it been circulated?

Mr. BARTON. -
I understand that that can be done.

The CHAIRMAN. -
If honorable members will hand in the amendments which they wish to propose, they will all be printed on Monday morning in their sequence.

Mr. SYMON. -
That will be a great convenience, no doubt.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
Can we deal with an amendment to a clause which has not been recommitted?

The CHAIRMAN. -
No.

Mr. BARTON. -
You can move to recommit the clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We were dealing with clause 74 this morning, and a most important alteration, which goes to the root of the whole Constitution, in my mind, has been made by the Drafting Committee by inserting the words "of the Inter-State Commission." That is allowing an appeal to the High Court from the decision of the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. BARTON. -
That was because it appeared to be the sense of the committee to have that amendment inserted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I am not blaming the Drafting Committee. When we adjourned for luncheon this clause was Under consideration, and I got back about one second after the bells had ceased to ring, having been detained on a departmental matter, and found that the committee had got to clause 77.

Mr. BARTON. -
You can move to recommit the clause again.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
But the honorable member may object when I ask the Convention to recommit the clause.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I mentioned at the time-I think my right honorable friend was not in the chamber-that Sir Joseph Abbott had not lost any right he has to get a clause recommitted. This matter about appeals to the Privy Council I regard as all important one.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It is not appeals to the Privy Council.

Mr. BARTON. -

In accordance with the intention of honorable gentlemen who wish to modify the question of appeals to the Privy Council, clause 74 would have to be amended to carry out their views. That question is so important that I certainly should not oppose a recommittal of the clause.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Have we not to give notice of the clauses we intend to ask the Convention to recommit?

The CHAIRMAN. -

No. If the notices of recommittals have been handed in they will be printed, and honorable members can move the motions when the proper time arrives. If any honorable member has not already handed in the motion he wishes to move for the recommittal of a clause, he can do it now.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I would point out to the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) that I was in charge of the Bill at two o'clock, and it was because I understood that there would be a recommittal that I did not wait for him to come in.

The Bill was reported with amendments.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the Bill, as reported, be considered on Monday.

I take it that the Bill will be printed between now and Monday, without any formal order.

The PRESIDENT. -

Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

What opportunity shall we have for moving the recommittal of the Bill for certain purposes?

Mr. BARTON. -

You can do that on Monday.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We shall be able to go on with its reconsideration at once, then?

Mr. REID. -

Yes.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It would be very convenient if we could get a list of the proposed amendments beforehand.
Mr. BARTON. -

I dare say that if notices of proposed amendments are sent in to-night they can be printed and distributed at honorable members' addresses to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT. -

It will be competent for honorable members upon Monday next to move the recommittal of the Bill or of any part of it.

The Convention adjourned at three minutes past four o'clock p.m., until Monday, 7th March.
Monday, 7th March, 1898.

Petitions: Appeals to the Privy Council-Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

PETITIONS.

Appeals to the Privy Council.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I have the honour to present a petition from the council of the Geelong and Western District Agricultural and Horticultural Society against the proposal of the Bill regarding the right of appeal to the Privy Council. The petition is printed, but I understand that, according to the standing orders of the South Australian Parliament, under which this Convention is working, printed petitions are allowed, although they are not allowed under the standing orders of the Victorian Legislative Assembly. I beg to move-

That the petition he received. The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of reconsidering clauses 56B, 95A, 95B, 95C, and 101.

I may mention that I am only moving for the recommittal of those clauses which were, at the first recommittal stage, deemed to be matters of great substance, such as to the clause relating to dead-locks, and the rearrangement of the railway clauses. I would also like to point out to honorable members that this stage seems to be the one that was the subject of an understanding to the effect that there was to be a second recommittal, in which honorable members, if they chose, could recommit other clauses of which notice has been given by them. I would like to say that it would scarcely do for me to read off the number of notices that have been given and move a motion for recommittal incorporating them, because some of them should not, I think, be subject to recommittal, although I do not intend to offer any active opposition to that being done. Therefore, I think every honorable member should be left to take charge of his own recommittal motion. It would be out of place were I to do so. I should also like to say that I think we might now make an effort to conclude the substantial business of this Convention during the present week. I propose to sit to-night and to-morrow night, and, if necessary, on the other nights of the present week, in order that the business maybe concluded. I think it will be some temptation to those honorable members who thought of leaving earlier that this effort will be made to conclude the business. I shall ask honorable members to conclude the business, with the exception of the drafting adjournment, by Thursday night.
Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
    I beg to move-
    That clause 41 be recommitted for the purpose of inserting the words "in Council" after the words "Governor-General."
Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
    I beg to move-
    That clause 45 be recommitted.
Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -
    I beg to move-
    That clause 90 be recommitted.
Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -
    I beg to move-
    That clause 117A be recommitted.
Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
    I beg to move-
    That clause 74 be recommitted.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
    I beg to move-
    That clause 75 be recommitted.
Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
    Is it necessary that these motions for recommittal should be moved now or as we come to the clauses in question? Most of the motions are in print.
The PRESIDENT. -
    It will be necessary, if there is to be a recommittal, either for the whole Bill to be recommitted or the clauses specified. Certain clauses have been moved for recommittal by the leader of the Convention, and the recommittal of other clauses has been moved by other honorable members.
    If other honorable members desire that further clauses should be recommitted, it will be necessary for them to move accordingly.
Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
    I beg to move-
    That clause 46, sub-section (4) of clause 54, and clauses 73 and 79 be recommitted.
Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
    May I ask, before I move for the recommittal of any clause, if notice has been given with regard to clause 56B, and whether, if any other honorable member has an alteration to make in that clause in place of the one which has been suggested by the leader of the Convention, he will be entitled to move it?

The PRESIDENT. -

I understand that the motion which has been moved by the leader of the Convention is for the recommittal of the four clauses he has mentioned for the purpose specified. Under these circumstances I take it that the discussion will be confined to the matters for which the clauses were recommitted.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I beg to move-

That clauses 56B, 80, 86, and 95B be recommitted.

The PRESIDENT. -

The motion of the leader of the Convention embraces the recommittal of clause 95B. Of course, it is quite possible for any honorable member to move for the recommittal of a clause without specifying the object of the recommittal.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I also desire to mention that I have a new clause, which I shall move to insert after clause 93.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I beg to move-

That clauses 13, 55, 68, 70, 92, and 110B be recommitted.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I wish to have recommitted those clauses of which notice has been given in the names of Sir George Turner and myself. I therefore beg to move-

That clauses 9, 55, 56, 89, 95A, 96, 98, and 121 be recommitted.

I understand that Sir Richard Baker has already intimated from the chair that when a clause is recommitted it is in the hands of the committee to deal with it altogether, so that, therefore, there is no danger that honorable members will not be able to propose any amendments they desire on recommitted clauses.

Mr. BARTON. -

I have not limited the recommittal of the railway clauses.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

I beg to move-

That clause 52 be recommitted for the purpose of inserting a new sub-section (23A) to follow sub-section (23).
I beg to move-
That sub-section (8) of clause 52 be recommitted for the purpose of adding another sub-section (8A), and that clause 45 be recommitted for the purpose of striking out sub-section (3).

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I beg to move-
That sub-section (1) of clause 52 and clauses 93 and 93C be recommitted.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
Before the motions for recommittal are put, I just want to mention a matter to the Convention. It has been suggested to me that the debates on some of these recommittals may be really taken twice over eventually unless the Convention guards itself against that. One honorable member has made a suggestion that these motions for recommittal might, by some suspension of the standing orders, be taken one by one, and without debate. I know that that is repugnant to the feelings of some honorable members, but as the suggestion was made to me I think it only fair to mention it, and leave it in the hands of the Convention, as it may be that a majority of honorable members are in favour of either the one course or the other. I do not wish to suggest that course; but the matter is in the hands of the Convention, and the Convention may take that course if they wish to do so. I hope I may be pardoned for mentioning the matter, as an evidence of the anxiety of some honorable members to avoid double discussions at this stage.

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -
I suggest, sir, that the course alluded to by the leader of the Convention be not adopted, but that we at once pass on to recommit the clauses which honorable members desire to have recommitted. Otherwise, we shall have all the debates twice over. I do not see any middle course; we must either divide at once on each proposal, or pass them all as a matter of course.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
In that case I think the right course for a body such as this Convention is to assent at once to all these recommittals. I cannot help thinking that to deal with them summarily without debate would scarcely be fair.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
Would it not be possible to come to some arrangement to hear one speech on either side? That might be arranged.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
You arrange it, and we will agree to the arrangement.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Very well, and the honorable member shall speak first.

Mr. BARTON. -
Who is to arrange it?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It can very easily be arranged.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
You had better select the men who are to speak.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
Sir John Forrest will select them.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I am quite positive that honorable members will not be able to say anything fresh in regard to these questions, so that if they speak again on the same subjects, they will have to repeat what has been said before. Remembering the number of times some honorable members have spoken on all these subjects, is it likely that they will be able to throw new light on them now?

An HONORABLE MEMBER. - Time!

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I won't belong. I feel sure that if honorable members enter into long discussions on these various subjects, we will have decisions from the Convention when it is limited in number, through some of us having had to return home, and then questions which have previously been decided by a full Convention will be finally decided by a Convention depleted of half of its members.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is not the fault of those who remain.

Mr. BARTON. -
No, it will certainly not be our fault.

The PRESIDENT. -
The question is that the clauses mentioned in the various motions which honorable members have moved be recommitted.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
If I am not out of order at this juncture, may I ask the leader of the Convention if he has considered the question that was raised about uniform taxation? There is a decision on the question that I would like to put into his hands, and I think it would be a wise step if Mr. Barton would take the recommittal of sub-section (2) of clause 52 now, on the understanding that it will not be proceeded with if, on further looking into the matter, be finds that it need not be reconsidered. Some very strong objections have been raised with regard to the difficulties in connexion with the imposition of taxation on property when there is to be uniform taxation. Some of us are rather afraid that, unless the provision in question be amended, there will be no power to impose graduated taxation.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am so anxious to make this the last substantive debate that I shall accept my learned friend's suggestion. With your permission, Mr. President, I will add to my motion the reconsideration of sub-section (2) of clause 52.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If you think it is unnecessary to go on with it you need not do so.

Mr. BARTON. -

Exactly.

Mr. Barton's motion was amended accordingly.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I beg to intimate that I desire to move, in committee, a new clause, to follow clause 92.

The PRESIDENT. -

The question is that the clauses mentioned by honorable members be recommitted, with the limitations stated in the motion.

The motions of honorable members for the recommittal of the clauses therein stated were agreed to.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the reconsideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Clause 3. - It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honorable Privy Council, to declare by proclamation, on and after a day therein appointed, not being later than one year after the passing of this Act, the people of [here name the colonies which have adopted the Constitution] shall be united in a Federal Commonwealth under the name of "The Commonwealth of Australia."

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I beg to move-

That the words "Commonwealth of" be omitted from clause 3.

I do not wish to re-open the matter at this stage. I merely desire to state the reason why I venture to ask the Convention to reconsider the amendment which I propose, and which is submitted with a view to the insertion of the simple name "Australia" instead of "The Commonwealth of Australia" in this clause. The reason which causes me to submit this for the consideration of the Convention is twofold; first, that some honorable members, who were not present during the very short discussion which took place when the matter was considered and voted on before, were under the impression that it was intended in some way to obliterate or remove the name of the Commonwealth, and the second branch of the reason is that I find the Drafting Committee have inserted an amendment which removes the difficulty which previously existed, and which seems to me to render it necessary that the Substitution I now suggest should be made. As to the first reason, I have no objection, and never had, to the use of the word "Commonwealth." As I pointed out the other day, "Commonwealth" is used as a name for the political union we are establishing under the Constitution, in the preamble, and all the succeeding clauses, and will be continued, just as before, throughout all the other clauses of the Bill as indicating the political union. All I seek to do is to declare that the name of the Commonwealth shall be the simple name to which we are accustomed—the grandest name which we can attach to it—that of Australia. As to the second branch of the reason, my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) tried at Adelaide to have an alteration made in order to redeem clause 3 as it then stood from what appeared to be somewhat of an absurdity. In that clause it is set out that the people of these colonies shall be united in a Federal Constitution under the name of the Commonwealth. Mr. Isaacs pointed out that that seemed to be an absurdity, that no such thing was ever heard of as uniting people in a Federal Constitution. He suggested that it should read "by a Constitution "or" united in a Federal Commonwealth." That suggestion was not entertained at the moment, but I observe that the Drafting Committee have, on reconsideration, adopted it. They have inserted in clause 3 the words "shall be united in a Federal Commonwealth under the name of-repeating the word 'Commonwealth'-the Commonwealth of Australia." What I want to do is to say:"shall be united in a Federal Commonwealth under the name of Australia." That is the amendment which I propose. Every honorable member knows that whether you add this double-barrelled expression to it or not the people of Australia will always call it Australia. Let us then put the name which will commend the Constitution to the people of Australia, and by which they will know it, in our Bill. Let us put it in the very fore-front of the Constitution. I should not be ashamed to have the name of Australia in the Bill. Every honorable member is actuated by the same pride of name as myself, and I hope that I may call on them to record their pride by putting the name in the foremost clause of the measure.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am not, I believe, wanting in the pride to which the honorable member alludes. I am as proud of being an Australian as most men are, and I see no reason for this alteration. The matter has been discussed on several occasions, and twice decided. I would suggest to the honorable member that if there had been any particular value in any alteration it would have been in shortening the name by which the Constitution is to be cited, so that instead of saying in the first clause-'This Act may be cited as the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, we should say-'This Act may be cited as the Australian Constitution Act.' That would have been less of a mouthful and would, perhaps, have been more convenient. I should have had no objection to such an alteration, but when it was suggested in Adelaide it was not adopted. I do not see why we should take out the name "The Commonwealth of Australia" and substitute for it the one word "Australia." We shall not be Australia without Queensland, although we shall be the only Commonwealth of Australia. We are entitled to take the name of the Commonwealth of Australia, but we are not entitled to take the name of Australia to ourselves any more than New South Wales was on a certain memorable occasion.

Question-That the words "Commonwealth of" proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause-put.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the following words be added to clause 3:-"The Queen may at any time after the issue of such proclamation appoint a Governor-General, who may, before the Commonwealth is established, choose and summon members of the Federal Executive Council, and, with their advice, appoint such other officers as he may deem necessary, the salaries of such other officers (if any) to be such as Parliament may determine."

It appears that on the issue of a proclamation by Her Majesty a date must be named, within a year after the date of the proclamation, as the date on which the union takes place, and it has occurred to me-and this may be of great consequence-that it would be well that Her Majesty should have power to appoint the Governor-General before the date of the establishment of the union, because otherwise a great deal of confusion might arise. On that very day several important departments of the public service will become vested in the Commonwealth. Time will be extremely valuable, and we wish the Executive to get to work so that Parliament may meet as soon as possible after the union is established. I have, therefore, proposed this amendment. Of course, it does not compel the exercise of the power, but it enables the Governor-General to be appointed, and enables certain preliminary work to be done which can harm no one, and which may be a subject of review afterwards. I am not at all particular as to the words of the amendment, and if the Drafting Committee have any suggestion to make I shall be willing to withdraw it in order that they may deal with it, or to take any other course they may propose.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Perhaps my right honorable friend's amendment may go a little too far. I have no objection, personally, to some proviso being inserted in the clause, but I think it would be better to insert it as a proviso to clause 4.
We are not proposing to reconsider that clause.

Mr. BARTON. -

I know that, but the right honorable gentleman has made a suggestion to the Drafting Committee. I think that the amendment may go a little too far. Of course, it is only by virtue of the proclamation which brings the Constitution into force on a day named that there can, under the Bill as it stands at present, be a Federal Executive Council. There can be no Executive Council until the Commonwealth is in being. Any appointments of this kind cannot be operative in any executive or administrative sense until there is a Commonwealth. There is nothing for them to operate upon until the Queen's proclamation takes effect, and the Commonwealth is called into being. Any appointment therefore made before the Commonwealth is in existence by virtue of the proclamation can only be made with the view of matters being ready upon the day named. I take it that it will be sufficient for that purpose if the Queen has power to appoint a Governor-General before the day named. If my honorable friend will limit the proposal in that way, I suggest that it should take this form: -

The Queen may at any time after the making of the proclamation appoint a Governor-General for the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID. -

That will do; I will accept that suggestion.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think that as a matter of drafting it should be made a proviso to the first provision it clause 4.

Mr. REID. -

I am willing to substitute that amendment for my Amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It will not be necessary to withdraw the amendment, as it has not been stated from the Chair.

Mr. BARTON. -

I move-

That the clause be amended by the addition of the following words: - "But the Queen may at any time after the making of the proclamation appoint a Governor-General for the Commonwealth."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON. -

This amendment will be transferred afterwards to its proper place by the Drafting Committee.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 9. - The Senate shall be composed of senators for each state, directly chosen by the people of the state, voting, until the Parliament otherwise determines, as one electorate. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, there shall be six senators for each original state. The Parliament may, from time to time, increase or diminish the number of senators for each state, but so that equal representation of the several original states shall be maintained, and that no original state shall have less than six senators. The senators shall be chosen for a term of six years, and the names of the senators chosen for each state shall be certified by the Governor to the Governor-General.

The qualification of electors of senators shall be in each state that which is prescribed by this Constitution or by the Parliament as the qualification for electors of members of the House of Representatives, but in the choosing of senators each elector shall vote only once.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I move-

That the words "determines, as one electorate" be omitted, with the view to the insertion in their place of the following words:-"provides, in as many electorates as the Parliament of the state shall determine. Until division each state shall be one electorate."

The first sentence of the clause, if my amendment is agreed to, will then read in this form:-

The Senate shall be composed of senators for each state, directly chosen by the people of the state, voting, until the Parliament otherwise provides, in as many electorates as the Parliament of the state shall determine. Until division each state shall be one electorate.

Mr. SYMON. -

You simply reverse what is in the Bill by saying that there shall be as many electorates as the states may decide till Parliament otherwise determines.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It does not reverse it. The Bill at present says that until division there shall be one electorate. We say the same, but the Bill says the only power competent to provide shall be the Parliament. We say that the state should have the power to define in the first place, and then the Parliament has power to override it if it chooses.

Mr. SYMON. -

It comes to the same thing.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Will there be any provision about having an equal number of electors in each district? Would the state Parliament have the right to divide the state as it likes?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I should say that it would have the right to divide the state as it pleases. I should imagine that the course to be adopted would in any case be what Sir John Forrest suggests, viz., that there would be three divisions; became by that means only would the state get the whole of its people to speak after the first section of senators, but that is a matter for the state to determine. Not only does the amendment, give to a state some power which it has not now, but it also does not leave the election of senators exposed to the overpowering of the country districts by the towns, and, therefore, I think it ought to be accepted.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I do not rise to debate the matter. I simply rise to gather exactly the effect of the amendment, with which, as I understand it, I am disposed to agree. My earned friend wishes to leave to the Federal Parliament the ultimate determination of whether the state shall vote as one electorate or as several electorates, but, in the meantime, instead of prescribing in the Constitution that the state shall vote as one electorate, he prescribes that it shall vote in as many electorates as the state Parliament shall determine.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And in the absence of their determining that question, as one electorate.

Mr. SYMON. -

Just so; but the ultimate control and determination of the number of electorates is to rest with the Federal Parliament under the amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have been one of those who have always regretted that the majority thought fit, in their wisdom, to insert the words "until the Parliament otherwise determines," with respect to this portion of the Bill. I have always been of the opinion that the state should vote as one electorate. However, in its wisdom the Convention decided at a previous session to insert the words "until the Parliament otherwise determines." I would suggest that that amendment takes the matter far enough. To my thinking, it is an invaluable thing that the Constitution should, as far as possible, provide that the state should be represented as one corporate entity in the Senate. In the same way that local interests may be adequately represented in one National House, so I think it is right that the state should be represented free from any idea of locality narrower than the limits of the state in the Senate also. The federal object of the matter I have always understood to be this: That there should be one Chamber in which state interests should be represented as a whole. It is inconsistent, it seems to me, to suppose that the collective interests of the state can be rightly represented by dividing the state into so many electorates, which will necessarily import the idea of the local interests of districts instead of the collective interests of a state.

Mr. HOLDER. -
No senator will be able to speak for the whole of a state.

Mr. BARTON. -
Exactly. The contingent of a state to the Senate should be able to speak for that state as a whole, representing its citizens as a collective body, without their idea of the good of that state being warped by any local consideration whatever. So the matter will remain in the Bill as it stands unless the Parliament should choose to make other provision; but under my learned friend's amendment there will be two authorities. The Parliament of the state may divide the state into electorates, and then afterwards the Parliament of the Commonwealth may make other provision, so that there will be two dividing authorities. The Parliament of the state may divide the state into electorates, and then afterwards the Parliament of the Commonwealth may make other provision, so that there will be two dividing authorities instead of one. I take it that it is quite sufficient if you allow one dividing authority to deal with the question.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It will produce much friction if you have two dividing authorities.

Mr. BARTON. -
Of course, every time you admit of the action of two independent authorities, one overriding the other, to the extent you do that you introduce the element of friction. It is one of the inevitable drawbacks of a Federation, but it is one of the elements which we should endeavour to minimize as much as possible in our Constitution. If my learned friend carries his amendment the result would be, that first the Parliaments of the states would provide for the manner in which those states should be divided, if divided at all; consequently, with five or six states, we might find one or two still remaining a collective electorate, another state divided into six electorates, another state divided into three electorates, and another state divided into two electorates. So that there would be actually a raggedness, if I may use the term with all respect, in the method of representation of those states, which would go a long way to destroy the collective force of the Senate as a representative of state interests; and the more uneven you make that representation the less force you give to the collective representation established by the Senate as one whole body. If you provide so as to lead to a state of things the result of which will be that the states will be represented some as one electorate, some as six electorates, some as three electorates, some as two electorates—I am supposing that there are six senators to each state; and even that number may be limited, be it understood—then you will have a state of things which will be so uneven, that it will be hard to determine in what respect that Senate is acting for the general interests of the state. I do not think that is a good thing. Within the limits of this Constitution, I must admit that I desire that the representation of state interests should be effective. I have always taken it that so far as you can reconcile the representation of state interests, under a Federal Constitution, with the elements of responsible government, which we consider indispensable, you should leave the representation of those state interests fairly strong, and it is with that object that I feel myself compelled to dissent from the amendment. If the Bill is left as it stands, and after two or three elections there is shown to be a necessity for a change, then will be the proper time to make that change, and to make a division. It will be possible then for the division to be made in such a way as to give uniformity with regard to each state, so that each state may be represented in three electorates, or two electorates, or six electorates, as the case may be. That would be a fat better thing than having a ragged kind of representation, using the term again with all respect.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There would be a ragged representation in the House of Representatives, yet the same thing is proposed there.

Mr. BARTON. -

I beg my learned friend's pardon. It is not the same there, because it is an essential of the ordinary principles of general national representation under our idea of government by majorities, unless we adopt some such scheme as the Hare scheme, that there should be local representation. It seems to me to be an essential of the whole system of representation in the Sena

Mr. ISAACS. -

I was only objecting to the word ragged.

Mr. BARTON. -

I know, but my friend's objection takes him to that length, and takes me to that length, too. I do submit that it would be an unwise thing altogether if we introduce another dividing authority with respect to the representation in the Senate, and in so doing lead to an inconvenience which will lessen the weight of the representation of each state in the Senate. I, for one, at any rate, cannot help thinking that the amendment should be opposed, and that the determination of the Convention in the past has been one which takes the matter far enough.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I do not rise to combat the arguments put forward by the leader of the Convention, because he simply expressed the logical federal view of the situation. He defended the only course which enables the Constitution to be perfectly symmetrical, by affording the opportunity to the states to be represented as units, while the other Chamber represents the electors. At the same time, there is a practical difficulty to which my honorable and learned friend did not allude, and which will weigh with a very large number of the electors in many of the colonies. The practical difficulty is that, unless there be embodied in this measure some requirement that the elections for the Senate shall be conducted under either the Hare system or a modification of it, the effect will be to place the whole representation of the Senate in each state in the hands of the majority of the voters going to the poll on any particular day.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is it not possible to have the Hare system, or some system like it, introduced under clause 10?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

If I had seen my way to embody a requirement for the representation of minorities in the Bill, I should have framed and moved it, but I have felt myself unable to do so. If my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Higgins) is more successful, I shall be happy to follow him.

Mr. BARTON. -

It would be better to leave that for the future.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think that clause 10 will give the Federal Parliament power to provide for the Hare system, or some modification of it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Under the Constitution as it stands the Federal Parliament has power to adopt what, for the sake of convenience, we may speak of as the Hare system, though it is generally admitted that there are modifications which render that system more easily worked. The experience of Tasmania is that the method which has been referred to as the single transferable vote, has provided a practical means of solving what was hitherto regarded as an insoluble difficulty. We cannot to-day avoid the fact that, although the Constitution allows the Commonwealth Parliament to adopt the Hare system, and, also allows each state in providing for the election of senators to adopt, if it pleases, some means which will give some representation to minorities, the electors have no guarantee that any System of this kind will be adopted. Unless we give them some such guarantee, it will very seriously militate against the fate of this measure in the colony of Victoria. Here, as in most of the other colonies, the population of the metropolis bears a very large proportion to the population of the whole colony. In the metropolis the voting is invariably heavier than is the voting in the country districts. Of course, in constituencies centred in a country town the voting is often as high as, or even higher than, the voting in the metropolis, but in purely farming districts the voting, owing to the difficulty of reaching the poll, is almost invariably lower than in the country towns or in the metropolis. The farmers, already rendered anxious by the possibilities of federal action, will be still more alarmed if they foresee, as the result of the election for the Federal Senate, the transference to what has been termed "the mass vote of the population" of the whole of the representation of the state in that very important body—the Senate. Although I have not myself attempted the task, if the members of the Drafting Committee were to receive an instruction from the Convention to draft such an amendment as would indicate that it was the intention of the framers of this measure that the states and the Commonwealth should provide for the representation of minorities in the election of members of the Senate, I should be glad to support the principle. Otherwise, I shall be compelled to support the amendment of the Attorney-General, with which, as a matter of principle, I am not in accord. After all, his proposal is only contingent. His amendment leaves it at the option of the states and of the Commonwealth Parliament to legislate in regard to the method of electing the senators. It offers a concession to the stater, which it would be in their power to refuse. No state would be obliged to adopt this method of division. Any state that desired its senators to be elected by the whole colony voting as one electorate could continue the single-electorate system, and the Federal Parliament would still have the power in any case to require a uniform method of election throughout the Commonwealth. I think, however, that it would allay the apprehensions which have been awakened by this proposal for a single electorate which has been laid before us in its naked form, that is, without any requirement for the representation of minorities, if the skilful members of the Drafting Committee could propose an amendment requiring that, while the senators should be elected by each state as one electorate, some provision should be made for the representation of minorities. What we desire is the representation, not merely of the metropolis and of the country towns of each state, but of the agricultural and pastoral interests, which are the backbone of Australia. They provide the largest amount of our exports, and are composed of that part of the population which undertakes the hardest task of production—the development of the land—which it is the duty of the State to encourage to the utmost of its ability. Instead of leaving it to the option of the states and of the Commonwealth to provide for the representation of minorities, we should place in the Constitution a direction to the effect that some method for the better representation of all the electors should be provided for.

Would not that involve the insertion of something like a body of legislation in the Constitution?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Certainly, if you were going to prescribe the system to be adopted.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Do not let us look in that direction now.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I am not arguing that you should do that, but we might go so far as to require that some method should be adopted, leaving it to each state to adopt what method it thinks best.

Mr. WALKER. -

Clause 10 gives this power.

Mr. BARTON. -

I would not say "a method for the representation of minorities"—I think that the Hare system is a system for securing the proper representation of the people.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is generally spoken of as a system for securing the representation of minorities, but it is more properly described as a system for securing proportionate representation. It aims at giving every considerable section of the population its just representation, and practical experience in Tasmania and elsewhere has proved that it can accomplish that end. I am in favour of the position taken up by the leader of the Convention and trust that he will yet see his way to propose, not any precise method of proportionate representation, but some direction on the part of the framers of the Constitution to the states and Commonwealth Parliament, that some method providing for proportionate representation shall be adopted.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I should like to point out, in addition to what has been said by the leader of the Convention, that the amendment of the Attorney-General of Victoria makes a very serious difference in the edict of the clause from the point of view of those who believe that each state should elect its senators as one electorate, so that the senators may be able to speak with the voice of their whole colony behind them. Under the clause as it stands, the principle of single electorates is affirmed, but under the amendment there is a declaration, that the states shall make a division.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The amendment says "may."

Mr. GLYNN. -

At the start there is a suggestion to the states Parliaments to divide, but if they neglect to divide there is a saving provision to the effect that, in that case, the single-electorate system will apply. But the direction of policy given by the amendment is undoubtedly to divide. If the states next upon the principle of dividing, and subsequently the Commonwealth Parliament enforces the single-electorate system, there will be a regular hub-bub, because we know that one of the most difficult matters to arrange, in any Parliament the, system of representation, I think it better to stick to the clause as it stands.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I voted against the principle in the Bill during the Adelaide session, and I hope to have an opportunity to vote against it again now. The idea seems be prevalent in the minds of honorable members that if each state votes as one electorate, every voter will be actuate by high, noble, and patriotic motives; but in practice it will not be so. We know very well that voters are human beings like ourselves, and are actuated by their sense of their own interests. If they happen to have their interests in a coal-mining centre they will vote to benefit what they consider to be the interests of coal mining. If they are living in a mining community they will be free-traders, and will vote in the interests of mining. If they are living in farming districts they will vote for the agricultural interest, and so on. Therefore, if you have each state voting as one electorate, the result will be that the large centres of population will have a preponderating influence in the return of members of the Senate. No doubt honorable members are very mach influenced in the views they take on this matter by the result of the election which returned the members of this Convention. I think I said, in Adelaide-we have here, cannot but be a good one. Honorable members applying that to themselves will say—"The system which placed me at the head of the poll with 100,000 or 80,000 votes must be a good one." But will it continue to have that effect in the future? I do not think that it will. It seems to me that this is a matter which we should leave to the states. Surely they are wise and patriotic enough to be able to form a plan for the election of those whom they think will best represent them. They will be able to say, much better than we can, whether the colonies should be divided, and if so, how they should be divided. For that reason I shall vote for the amendment.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I think that the proposal is too complicated. It provides, in the first place, for one electorate. This arrangement can be altered by the state Parliaments, but their arrangement can be finally overridden by the Federal Parliament. I think that the proposal is too complicated, and therefore I shall vote against it.

The clause was agreed to.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
I move-
That in clause 13, the words "by lot" be omitted.
The amendment I suggest need not occupy more than a moment or two in discussion. It is a blot on the face of a measure of this kind to require that the division of the senators into two classes after the first election shall be made by lot. I could understand that device being adopted in the absence of any other means of determining which senators should have the longer period. But the poll itself ought to afford, or be taken to afford, a reasonable indication of the wishes of the electors in this respect, and it is a probable injustice, as well as a mistake, to fall back on the antique method of settling questions of the kind. I move, therefore, the omission of the words "by lot," which will leave it absolutely at the discretion of the Senate itself to determine, after it meets, on what method the division shall take place. If the Drafting Committee think fit, they can adopt the method of providing that the three highest on the poll should have the six years' tenure. If that be the sense of the Convention, I will now simply submit my motion.

Mr. HOLDER. -
What should be done in the case of an uncontested election?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
With six senators to be elected I can scarcely conceive an uncontested election possible. However, I submit the motion in order to avoid the adoption of a system in favour of which nothing but its antiquity can be urged.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I think a great deal can be said in favour of the view the Hon. Mr. Deakin has placed before the Convention. In a constitutional matter of this kind we ought not to resort to deciding a question by lot unless there are no other means of determining the matter. If the Convention are willing to agree to the amendment, it might be left to the Drafting Committee to decide whether any provision for the division of the Senate should take place, or whether the matter should be left to the senators themselves.

Mr. FRASER. -
Take alphabetical order.

Mr. REID. -
That arrangement would not suit "R" nor "Z" either.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
It would be very desirable to strike out this provision if some other means, could be found of putting in the Constitution itself the principle of division. That might be done as a drafting amendment.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
In Western Australia this matter is decided by the number of votes a member gets. That seems to be a fair way, and one which would exactly meet this case.

Mr. LYNE. -
How do you do where there is no contest?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Then we take alphabetical order.
The amendment was agreed to.
The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
I move-
That in clause 41, after the words "Governor-General," the words "in Council" be inserted.
I think the omission of these words must be an oversight. It could never have been contemplated that the Governor-General should have the power provided in this clause without the advice of the Council.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I think the clause had better remain as it is; for the first election there would be no Council.

Mr. REID. -
Oh, yes, there would be.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
It is a question whether these words would apply to the first election. I do not think it is a matter of very much moment, but, as a matter of course, the Governor-General is only the hand that issues the writ.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
The clause does not say so.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
The Governor-General could not arrogate to himself the power of making appointments.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

But the clause gives the power to him.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It must be exercised by the advice of the Council.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

There can be no doubt there would be a Council of the Governor-General before the first election, and that even if there words be not put in, the Governor-General would not act in such a matter without the advice of his Council.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

We do not know that.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If we put the words "in Council in one place and leave them out in others, the Constitution may be so construed as to intend the Governor-General to act without his Council in some instances where the words are not inserted, and to restrict the principle of responsible government only to those cases where the words are put in.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Look at clause 62.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

The clause is right as it is. We have to be very careful to put the words "in Council." in the right place, and I do not think this is the right place. It is the Queen who summons Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Mr. Holder is quite right; clause 62 is enough.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not see how there are to be councillors for the first election. This is not a case in which the Queen nominally acts in Council, though in reality she always acts in Council. I can see great constitutional difficulty and objection to altering the clause.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

At the Sydney Convention I objected to the words "in Council" being used, on the ground that the less often we used the term the better. "Governor-General" is a well-understood constitutional term, and there is no need for the addition " in Council." "Governor-General " means Governor-General with the advice of the Executive Council. For this reason, I hope the words proposed will not be inserted in the clause, as they would only create confusion. The Governor-General can only act without advice in one case, and that is in the case of the appointment of his Executive Council.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

The honorable member (Sir John Forrest) is under a misapprehension. If he looks at clause 68 he will find another special provision in which the Governor General alone is named, and it does not appear at present that in that clause the Governor-General in Council is intended. In other cases the honorable member will find that the Governor-General in Council is named. Two clauses I have named for reconsideration later both have reference to this particular issue. The clause referred to by Mr. Holder does not throw light on the question. Clause 70 provides-

In respect of matters which, under this Constitution, pass to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, all powers and functions which at the establishment of the Commonwealth are vested in the Governor of a colony, or in the Governor of a colony with the advice of his Executive Council, or in any authority of a colony, shall vest in the Governor-General, or in the Governor-General in Council, or in the authority exercising similar powers under the Commonwealth, as the case requires.

Mr. REID. -

That refers to things taken over.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

In different colonies there are slightly different procedures, and the Commonwealth practice ought surely not to be varied according to the varying practice of the departments so taken over. The Commonwealth must lay down a reasonable rule for itself. The proposition of Dr. Cockburn has more force lent to it owing to the fact that in clause 68 the Governor-General is alone alluded to, while the Governor-General in Council is repeatedly alluded to. The clear implication appears to be that unless the words "in Council" are added it is always intended to convey some personal power. We should make up our minds what, it is we intend, and adopt some general form of words to imply that where the word "Governor-General" is found in the Constitution, it shall, unless the context distinctly otherwise implies, be taken to mean the Governor-General in Council.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

If Sir John Forrest looks at clause 62 he will find he is mistaken.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I am not mistaken as to the Constitution.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

The honorable member says that "Governor-General" means "Governor-General in Council." Now, clause 62 expressly forbids such an interpretation. It says that when the Governor-General in Council is mentioned it means he acts with the advice of the Federal Executive Council. That places the matter beyond all doubt. It is clear that when the Governor-General alone is mentioned he acts on his own responsibility. I do not think there can be much difference of opinion on that point.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I really think that under the structure of this Bill it is absolutely necessary to put in the words "in Council," if we mean that writs for general elections are to be countersigned by a minister.

Mr. BRUNKER (New South Wales). -
I would suggest to the Convention that we ought to make this question perfectly clear. I point this out for the reason that at the present time in New South Wales under an Act of Parliament which prescribes that the Governor shall take action, there is considerable c

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -
I draw attention to the fact that there is

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
No.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Then let us say so. If honorable members refer to clause 63 they will see that the Governor-General and the Governor-General in Council are terms used in absolute contradistinction. There we find that the Governor-General may from time to time appoint officers to administer certain departments, but immediately afterwards it says that the Governor-General in Council may from time to time establish the departments which those officers are to administer. There, with regard to the appointment of Ministers, the Governor-General exercises his power without consulting the Executive Council, but with regard to any action in connexion with establishing the departments he is to act on the advice of the Executive. Therefore, the distinction is made in the Bill itself. The question we have to ask ourselves is-Do we intend that the Governor-General shall act with or without the advice of the Executive? It is intolerable to suggest the appointment of returning officers by the Governor without the advice of the Executive.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
The honorable member does not understand. No one objects to that, but we say that it is not necessary to put in the words.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Before putting the question, I may be permitted to point out that in clauses 37 and 40, which are not under consideration, the same words occur-"The Governor-General shall issue writs-and may dissolve the House of Representatives."

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

Does not clause 41 refer to the issuing of writs and the sending of them to the returning officers?

The CHAIRMAN. -

I do not wish to argue the question.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

Without wishing to argue with the Chairman, I would point out that clause 40 refers to the dissolution of the House of Representatives by the Governor-General. That is a prerogative, and in such a case he is not always guided by his Executive as to whether he will grant a dissolution or not. What we are now dealing with is not a prerogative matter-it includes the appointment of returning officers.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Could the Governor appoint without the advice of his Ministers?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Distinctly so, if the English language has any meaning.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

He could do so, but he never would do so. The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 45. - Any person who-

I. Is under any acknowledgment of allegiance, obedience, or adherence to a foreign power, or is a subject or a citizen or entitled to the rights or privileges of a subject or a citizen of a foreign power: or

II. Is attainted of treason, or has been convicted and is under sentence or subject to be sentenced for any offence punishable under the law of the Commonwealth or of a state by imprisonment for three years or longer: or

III. Is an undischarged bankrupt or insolvent: or

IV. Holds any office of profit under the Crown, or any pension payable during the pleasure of the Crown out of any of the revenues of the Commonwealth; but this sub-section does not apply to the office of any of the Queen's Ministers of State for the Commonwealth, or to the receipt of pay, half-pay, or a pension by any person as an officer or member of the Queen's navy or army, or to the receipt of pay as an officer or member of the naval or military forces of the Commonwealth by any person whose services are not wholly employed by the Commonwealth: or
v. Has any direct or indirect pecuniary interest in any agreement with the public service of the Commonwealth, otherwise than as a member and in common with the other members of an incorporated company consisting of more than 25 persons: shall be incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a senator or a member of the House of Representatives.
Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That sub-section (3) be omitted.

This clause was very shortly debated on the last evening of our sitting in Sydney. I did not then press the matter to a division, because so many deleagates were absent, but I indicated that I would take an opportunity of having a division in this session. The object of my amendment is that public men shall not be penalized unduly by a provision which will disqualify them, perhaps for all time, from holding a position in public life by reason of monetary misfortune. Clause 46, which follows, I do not intend to amend. It provides that the seat shall be vacated by any member who becomes bankrupt or insolvent, and then, the seat being vacated, the member will have to go to his constituents for re-election. That is practically the law in New South Wales, although I believe it is not the law in Victoria. I think it is a sufficient penalty for a public man that be should resign his seat and go before his electors when he takes advantage of the law relating to insolvent debtors. It is going too far to say that because a man by misfortune, and owing to circumstances over which perhaps he has no control, is compelled to seek the protection of the court, he should resign all public offices and practically retire from public life. What would have happened in New South Wales if we had had such a provision in the law? We have seen, not on one occasion, but on many occasions, not in regard to one individual, but in regard to many individuals, men occupying positions as Premiers, whose usefulness has not been questioned, who have been compelled to have recourse to the protection of the Insolvency Court.
These men have resigned their position in Parliament, as they were compelled to do by the Constitution Act; they have gone to their constituents, and they have been elected or rejected by the electors, who can judge them in the light of the knowledge they have relating to their insolvency. They have not had their political careers closed. If there had been such a law as this in operation, we should have had some of the wisest and best men who ever guided public affairs in New South Wales shut out from public life. We should have had Ministries destroyed, and men who through misfortune, which, perhaps, was largely attributable to the fact of their holding positions in public life, would have had their careers of usefulness closed for ever. I invite honorable members to pay attention to this aspect of the case. If you penalize politicians above all other men, what will happen? Suppose there is one public man and nine or ten others who become guarantee for a very large sum of money in connexion with some enterprise. We know that public men are often led into becoming guarantors as directors of companies, and they become guarantors on account of advances made perhaps for the purpose of pushing forward some enterprise which is practically for the development of some of the resources of the colony. Such a provision as this would mean that because there is one man out of ten who has to do something more than pay the debt, who has to stand the risk of losing his position as a public man, that man is put in a position to be black-mailed. You put him in a position where he alone can be pushed to an extremity, and a clause of this character would be used by creditors, who might have the opportunity of looking to half-a-dozen other men who have jointly become security on mortgages, bonds, or guarantees, who will press that man alone, because they know that he is the only one against whom such a lever of destruction can be used as to deprive him of his position in public life. Honorable members having been associated for many years with public life will know the bitterness which sometimes attaches to political warfare. Is not this provision the means of putting a powerful instrument in the hands of unscrupulous opponents? Such a thing would have been done in New South Wales over and over again if such a provision as this had existed in the law. The career of some of the brightest and best intellects of the public life of that colony would have been closed. It will be a misfortune to the Commonwealth if you brand with the stigma of permanent displacement men who, by reason of their services to the country, have neglected to serve their own interests. It has been one of the highest testimonies to the honesty of public men in Australia that they have been poor men. It has, perhaps, been one of the greatest sacrifices that public life has ever entailed in these colonies, where men of intellect, following their professions closely, or developing the resources of the country, may easily make fortunes, that public men should have thrown aside all these opportunities of advancing their own interests, and have devoted themselves to the interests of the country, thereby very often bringing ruin upon themselves and their families. That is a story that could be related over and over again with regard to the public men of Australia. After having faithfully served their country for many years, most of them, perhaps, have to see in their declining years poverty coming upon themselves and their families. Now, here it is proposed to place an additional penalty upon our public men who, perhaps, have to seek the protection of the court through no fault of their own in nine cases out of ten. Having given up his professional pursuits, and having attached himself for years or for a lifetime to political affairs, a provision of this kind will place it in the hands of any creditor—a political opponent or otherwise—to absolutely close the door against that man's future public career by forcing him into the Insolvency Court. The electors of the country have a right to make their choice, and if they choose to be represented by a man who is compelled by the necessities of his life to become bankrupt or insolvent, surely it is not our business to take away that choice from them. A man may be guilty of a misdemeanour, he may have served a sentence of two years for a misdemeanour, he may have been guilty of some disgraceful offence, yet, under this Bill, that man can be elected. Yet it is proposed to stigmatize a man who may have to seek the protection of the Bankruptcy Court through being a director of a mining company, or through being connected with some financial institution which in boom time has flourished, and has then gone down, dragging others with it. You penalize such a man more than a man who may have been guilty of a crime. This Bill will allow any drunkard or vagabond in the community to be elected to Parliament; but you penalize beyond all these men a man who has served his country too well and who has not served himself sufficiently well, neglecting his own affairs, and thus allowed monetary embarrassment to fall upon him. I trust the Convention will strike out this sub-section.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia).—
I hope the Convention will not. There are certain sturdy principles implanted in the bosom of the nation we have been in the habit of calling English, and one of the things you will often hear from the class that is not highest in the community is the boast that they pay their way and owe no man anything. If it be necessary to provide that members of the Federal Parliament shall be irresponsible for their debts, let us know what we are doing, and have a special provision for that purpose in the Bill. But, meanwhile, I think it is a little hard that the creditor shall lose,

[P.1934] starts here
and that the person who, by reason of superior ability, or of the position which superior ability gives him, has a credit which is artificial, and is enabled to trade upon it—

Mr. ISAACS.—
If he is poor through misfortune he can get his discharge.

Sir JOHN DOWNER.—
Exactly. The honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) objects to an undischarged bankrupt being ineligible for election. Why is a bankrupt undischarged? He is undischarged because he has behaved badly. He is undischarged because he is a criminal to some extent.

Mr. SYMON. -
Because he is on his trial.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Once in a way it may be, as Mr. Carruthers says, that it is the bankrupt's misfortune in that the time for obtaining his discharge has not

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
He cannot be discharged under 30 days.

Mr. SYMON. -
Surely he could wait 30 days.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I should think that for 30 days after a man becoming bankrupt the disgrace of it would be enough for him without anything else; and it will be a bad day for Australia, as it would be for any country, if bankruptcy is considered merely a venial matter, and not one that involves great disgrace.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Hear, hear. It is too much so now.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
We are becoming thinner and thinner in regard to our commercial morality, and our morality in other directions is also becoming thinner. It is intensely to be regretted if our commercial morality become go thin that a man is not considered much the worse as a man because he does not meet his obligations with his creditors. It is a good condition to start with that a man shall have to pay his way if he is to be a member of the Federal Parliament. It will involve, in many instances, great self-sacrifice on his part, and a very good thing for the man if it does.

Mr. REID. -
A much better thing for him if it does not.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
In the case of a man who had been subject to the bankruptcy laws, and has not obtained his discharge, it would almost invariably be because he had done something disgraceful; and should he not therefore be incapacitated from any high office in the Commonwealth? To say that it should not be so would be putting a stamp of great inferiority on the moral opinions of the Commonwealth at the start. I hope the clause will be retained.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I applaud the high moral principles of my honorable friend who has just sat down, and admire the sturdy honesty which he has commended, but we must not forget that the greatest criminal under heaven is eligible, at the end of his sentence, to be a member of the Federal Legislature, whilst, according to this provision, a man who through some misfortune has become bankrupt and has not obtained his certificate will not be eligible. If his bankruptcy occurs just before a general election and it may be so contrived in regard to a man of great eminence, whose disappearance from politics is of great concern to a party—it could be easily managed that his case should not come into court until just after the election, and he would then become incompetent to be elected. I consider that a man who falls into financial trouble—and many do, not from dishonesty, but from sheer misfortune—perhaps the roguery of others—should be able to submit himself to his constituency for their judgment, to be re-elected. We sufficiently vindicate the cause of honesty if we leave him in their hands. If his conduct has been disgraceful, we can expect that the constituency will deal with him. But why should he be debarred from a career of public usefulness, when perhaps his financial troubles have been simply caused through misfortune? If we allow a tainted criminal, who perhaps has served a sentence of ten years for the greatest crime under heaven, to go to election, why should we stretch the cord so tightly in what may possibly be a case of absolute misfortune, absolutely free from crime?

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I think that the remarks of the right honorable gentleman who has just sat down do not touch the kernel of this matter at all. I hold that a constituency is not a proper jury to try a case of bankruptcy. If a man fail to pay his obligations—and I should be sorry to say anything against any man failing, as we have seen some of the best men in these colonies during the last few years obliged to take that course—there is a prima facie charge against him which must be removed before he can rear his head as an absolutely honest man. And I say that if I were in a position like that, my own pride would prevent me from ever taking a seat in the councils of the colony until I had cleared myself before the court before which I had to appear. I agree with Sir John Downer that we are paring away matters in regard to honesty too much in these colonies.

Mr. REID. -

Still a man may be the most honest man in the world and be insolvent through the roguery of others.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

No doubt a man might have his house burnt down, and through not being insured might be ruined. But why should we adjudicate upon this thing at all? Why is it a matter for the courts? Is it not because it is a matter of public protection? And if it is a matter for the courts, then the courts alone should adjudicate upon it, and say whether a man is worthy of his certificate or not. I think the clause should be passed as it stands, because, as Mr. Isaacs says, in any case where a man fails through misfortune there will be no obstruction put by the courts in the way of his obtaining his certificate.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I think every one of us will agree that money ought not to be a passport to a position in public life, and that the misfortunes that any of us may incur at any period of our lives, in regard to monetary matters, ought not to be considered in any respect a cause of incapacity for rendering services to our country. But, at the same time, I feel that this provision now sought to be struck out is absolutely salutary, and without any of those disadvantages of a serious sort which have been so magnified, if I may so express it, by Mr. Carruthers. Mr. Reid has convinced me more than ever that the provision is a right one. Mr. Reid asks -Is it not a fact that the greatest criminal under the sun, after he has served his sentence, is a free man, and is eligible for election?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No; he is not in Victoria, nor in Western Australia either.

Mr. REID. -

Under this Constitution he is.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

But he is not now.

Mr. SYMON. -

We make this great difference in regard to bankruptcy and insolvency; we declare that the disability is not to attach to a man who has had the pecuniary misfortune to be obliged to, have recourse to the Insolvency Court, but we say that while in many other respects a criminal after serving his sentence is considered, in a sense, a man with a free pardon, yet in the case of bankruptcy a man to be eligible must have obtained his certificate of discharge from the courts established by this Constitution.

Mr. REID. -

But-while a man who has committed a crime is eligible for election to the Commonwealth Parliament, a bankrupt may be in such a position that he cannot obtain his certificate before a general election takes place.

Mr. SYMON. -

But the criminal must have served his sentence. No criminal would be eligible for election to Parliament.

Mr. REID. -
Yes he is; he must have been sentenced to be ineligible.

Mr. SYMON. -

Then the distinction shows the care that has been taken. In the one case, in regard to criminals, the criminal is not eligible; but in regard to a bankrupt, he is eligible the moment he receives his certificate, which he will receive if his conduct is free from serious blame. The position is this: A man is adjudicated insolvent, his affairs are investigated, and, if he is innocent of any serious offence, he can obtain his certificate without much trouble.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

But his seat is gone.

Mr. SYMON. -

But does my honorable friend mean to say that in every case, except that of a politician, the Insolvency Court is to be the tribunal to examine into his conduct, but that in the case of a politician it is some constituency that is to inquire into it? That is really what my honorable friend contends—that in the case of a politician his constituency shall be the tribunal, and that they may re-elect him if they like. It amounts to this: It is an intimation that the constituency cannot get as their representative a man who has not the badge of bankruptcy upon him.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Suppose the bankrupt were elected, and then the judgment of the court were given against him?

Mr. SYMON. -

More than that, look at the handicap it gives to a man who has been adjudicated insolvent against a competitor in the same constituency. We know how appeals may be made to constituents on the ground of sympathy. We know how soft hearted we all are, and how easy it is to work upon our feelings. We have known that sort of thing before. A man goes before his constituents, and an appeal is made to them, and they say—"We will send him in because he will get his salary straight away." Let us keep these matters as free as we can. It is not the bankruptcy that is made the disability; he is only subject to the disability during the period when he has not obtained his discharge from the tribunal appointed under the Constitution to try him.

Mr. REID. -

He may have to go before the court just before a general election.

Mr. SYMON. -

It may be that in the bitterness of political strife an effort may be made by some wealthy organization to have a man made insolvent, but I should like to know where instances of that kind have occurred.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
   It has been done.

Mr. REID. -
   In more than one colony.

Mr. GLYNN. -
   It has been done in South Australia.

Mr. SYMON. -
   At any rate, that would be an action of a very objectionable nature; but, at the same time, you have established a court for the purpose of investigating cases of bankruptcy, and it is to that court to which all matters should be referred for adjudication, and not to an electorate, which is not a competent tribunal, and which is not in a position to determine the issues as to whether or not the person is an honest debtor or not.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
   Most of the speakers have been on one side of this question, but I take the unpopular side, and desire to say a word for the poor and unfortunate as against the rich and successful. It has been said here that financial failure necessarily involves great disgrace.

Mr. SYMON. -
   Nonsense; who said that?

Mr. REID. -
   The argument means nothing else.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
   The words were used. I think that the retention of the words of paragraph (3) of clause 4 would be a mistake, if for no other reason than this: That they involve the possibility of the processes of the courts being used for political purposes. It has been said that an insolvent can get his certificate within 30 days.

Mr. LYNE. -
   He cannot do that.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
   No an insolvent cannot get his certificate within 30 days or within anything like that time. And do not the words in question lay the court open to the charge of inducing delays, with a view of making it impossible for an unfortunate insolvent to regain his seat in Parliament, or to become a candidate if an election is pending? It is all very well to discuss this matter theoretically, but coming down to it practically in its actual bearings, I can call to mind a case in the mother colony of Australia, and a case in New Zealand, where two men of the highest probity, and of the greatest value
Mr. LYNE. -
I could give you another case in our own colony.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
Supposing most of the electors were insolvents, would they not be certain to return their fellow insolvent?
Dr. COCKBURN. -
If most of the electors were insolvent, then the country would go to the wall.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
But I mean in that particular insolvent's constituency.
Dr. COCKBURN. -
That is not likely at all; and on the broad question of whether a man in misfortune has been culpable and dishonest, I think his own constituents are competent to give as good a verdict as anybody else. I have always been in favour of giving the largest choice to constituencies in selecting their representatives. I think these words would place an insolvent in an unfair position as compared with a criminal, because an adjudication of insolvency does not necessarily imply crime. No crime is proved until a verdict of guilty has been returned in a criminal court, and in the meantime an insolvent should have as much right as an alleged criminal has. Taking all the circumstances into account, if honorable members will look to their own experience in their own colonies, I think that most of them will agree with me that these words ought to come out. This provision does not exist in all the colonies.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It exists in our colony.
Dr. COCKBURN. -
It does not exist in New South Wales.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It is law in your own colony, I believe.
Dr. COCKBURN. -
No, it is not; and I am informed that it is not law in New Zealand. The absence of this provision in those colonies has been fraught with the happiest results.
Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -
This, to my mind, is a very important matter. The honorable member who moves the excision of the words in question from the clause is only carrying out what is the law of New South Wales at the present time. Dr.
Cockburn says that the same law exists in New Zealand, and I believe also in Queensland. Certainly that is the law in South Australia. In the majority of the colonies, therefore, the law stands as the mover of the amendment is proposing that this law shall stand. I heard Sir John Forrest, on a previous clause, speak about taking things practically as we find them, and not looking too much to sentiment. I can tell the right honorable gentleman that the two last Prime Ministers of our colony would have been driven from office, and both of their Ministries would have been destroyed, had this provision been law in New South Wales. Schemes were laid to bring about the destruction of those Ministers and their Ministries, and those schemes would have succeeded if this provision had been the law of the land. It was only because under our law they could be re-elected that these schemes were not put into force. Under this provision you give power to monetary institutions to destroy any Minister or Member of Parliament who may happen to be in financial difficulties.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We are not all bankrupt in Australia, are we?

Mr. LYNE. -
Most men owe money, and some are in circumstances in which they are not able to pay their debts at once, although they are perfectly solvent if time be allowed them. They are in much the same condition as the banks in these colonies were a short time ago. Those banks were perfectly solvent, but they had not the power to liquidate their assets immediately, and they were therefore thrown into the Insolvency Court. In the same way any man may be subject to the same misadventure. I believe that in Victoria—perhaps Mr. Deakin can tell me if I am not correct—an insolvent cannot get his certificate, or does not, until he has paid 7s. in the £1.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
That is the rule. There are exceptions, but that rule is being applied under the new Insolvency Act.

Mr. LYNE. -
That is another objection to passing a provision of this kind. Although it is unfortunate that Prime Ministers and other Ministers of the Crown, as well as Members of Parliament, are not in affluent circumstances, in nine cases out of ten in which they become insolvent, that condition of affairs is brought about by their attention to public matters, to the neglect of their private interests.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The Commonwealth Parliament will have the power to frame its own bankruptcy law.
Mr. LYNE. -

No doubt. Under any conditions, if there is a Federal Parliament, and any of us here are members of that Parliament, I sincerely hope we will not be parties to the framing of a law which would in any way interfere with the rights of Ministers or Members of Parliament to re-election if they were unfortunate enough to have to go through the Insolvency Court.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What about those who are not unfortunate insolvents, but who are fraudulent insolvents?

Mr. LYNE. -

Then they will be convicted under the criminal law.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

But perhaps not for a long time; not until after their re-election.

Mr. LYNE. -

Then they will very soon be turned out of Parliament.

Mr. SYMON. -

The provision as to criminals only applies to persons sentenced to imprisonment for three years or longer. Most of the sentences passed on fraudulent bankrupts in our colony are for two years' imprisonment.

Mr. LYNE. -

Whether an insolvent has been guilty of fraud or not cannot be decided until his examination takes place. If in the course of his examination he is proved to be fraudulent, then let him be proceeded against under the criminal law.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

An insolvent's certificate may be suspended. What will you do then?

Mr. LYNE. -

The certificate of an insolvent who has not been fraudulent may be suspended, but if an insolvent is proved to have been guilty of fraud something more would be done than merely suspending his certificate. In New South Wales, as I have already said, deep schemes were laid against the two last Prime Ministers, and, if this provision had been law in that colony those schemes would have been carried out, with the result that the Premiers and their Ministries would have been destroyed. In Victoria, we have been told, an insolvent cannot get his certificate until he has paid 7s. in the £1. Now, a man might not be able to pay 7s. in the £1 through circumstances for which he was not in any way to blame, and then, under this provision, he would be debarred for all his life from becoming a member of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I wish to put a few considerations which, it appears to me, are necessary to be dealt with. I think it would be a very bad way of settling this question if we were to take the hard cases that have been put, and determine it upon those cases alone. Surely we are not going to implant in this Constitution the principle that politicians are to be dealt with in a different way from other men in the community! What is the reason of making bankruptcy a disqualification? Because, prima facie, the affairs of a man who has starts here to go through the Insolvency Court are in such a state and of such a nature that be is not allowed to manage them himself. The court inquires into them, and takes charge of his estate.

Mr. LYNE. -

But the constituents have to decide whether he is fit to be returned to Parliament or not.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I am coming to that. It is said-"Why not leave this question to the constituents of the insolvent?" Well, we all know what the operation of that would be. We know that steps would be taken to prevent the affairs of a bankrupt being brought under consideration before the election took place. Therefore he would submit himself to his constituents before they knew what his conduct had been. It is the easiest thing in the world to defer the examination of a bankrupt Member of Parliament until after his re-election. That is frequently done, so that often you have this position of things: A Member of Parliament becomes bankrupt, very few people know why; there is no examination for the period during which the writ is current; he is elected to Parliament, and afterwards an inquiry discloses a condition of things which would have induced his constituents, had they known the real state of affairs, to refuse to re-elect him. Although that condition of things may not lay him open to a charge of criminal insolvency, it may certainly stamp him as a person unfit to be a Member of Parliament.

Mr. REID. -

Should that not apply to the man who is charged with the committal of an offence, if it is to apply to an insolvent who has not been proved guilty of fraud?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No; that is an entirely different case.

Mr. REID. -

It is a worse case.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

A man who is under committal for an alleged offence is assumed to be innocent until it is proved that he is guilty.

Mr. REID. -
So is a bankrupt or an insolvent.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

But the insolvent's affairs are in charge of the court. The insolvent has an adjudication of the court against him, and the court maintains its control over his affairs until it is shown that he has been guilty of no dishonesty. What can any man suffer from, if the law remains as it is, providing he has been a victim of misfortune such as has been referred to? The court is the very best possible tribunal to decide whether that is the case or not. If it is a case of misfortune, a discharge is granted to the insolvent. If it is not a case of misfortune, a discharge is not granted to him. Instead of considering this question from the point of view of politicians and hard cases, we must consider the public and the constituents concerned. This is a thing which should not be decided on hard cases, but on some general principles which we consider it right and fit to implant in this Constitution. I hope that the clause will be allowed to remain as it is.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I think that there is an aspect of this question that has not been discussed, and that is the effect of this provision upon the general honesty of the people. It is notorious that insolvency has become daily more frequent, and that less disgrace is daily being attached to it. It is notorious also that cases of insolvency always entail hardship upon the community, whether the person who is insolvent is unfortunate or fraudulent. But Mr. Carruthers seemed to me to urge the strongest reasons against striking out the words in question, when he said that public men are often called upon to take appointments on directorates that will lead them into positions of this kind. Why are public men called upon to take positions on directorates? Because they are assumed to be men of integrity, and public confidence is inspired by their names being attached to the management of those companies. Therefore, they should be given to understand that if they take this responsibility, which is alluring to the public, they must be especially vigilant, and give the public not only the guarantee of their names, but also their honest earliest vigilance in the management of those institutions to which they attach their names. I confess, at once, that my mind has been very seriously exercised about attaching this penalty to insolvency. I felt very strongly what was urged on the other side. I have been very carefully weighing the matter in the balance, and my view is that, although it may, and possibly will, work hardship in one or some individual cases, the general tendency of it will be for the benefit of the community, and for the elevation of the public honesty of the people. I have deplored, and most thoughtful men have deplored, the prevalence of insolvency. We know how frequently, and with how little consideration, men go into insolvency and take advantage of the privileges of the Insolvency Court. In many instances they are enabled to hold their heads up as if the they had always paid their way. I do think, therefore, that this will be a salutary provision on public grounds. We ought not simply to consider its influence on the individual.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

I desire to reply to some objections urged to the proposal made by me. I will take the objections coming from the Hon. Mr. O'Connor, the Hon. Mr. Symon, and Sir John Downer, which have carried great weight in the Convention. They ask why we should place politicians on a different plane from other members of the community in regard to insolvency? Why should there be another tribunal to decide their cases? Was ever a weaker argument used? We know that whenever any member of the legal professions barrister or a solicitor-becomes insolvent, he call go on practising his profession. It is only when in the courts of insolvency he is found guilty of something amounting to a crime that the court will take away from him the right to pursue his occupation. Take the case also of a tradesman. If be becomes insolvent be can carry on his business the next day. He has not to wait until he gets his certificate of discharge. With reference to the public servants in all the colonies, although bankruptcy may cause a suspension, their offices are kept vacant for them until they have had an opportunity of getting a certificate of discharge. There is no other class in the community, looking at this argument and taking the reverse of it which is penalized as members of Parliament are sought to be penalized under this Constitution. Let us look at the matter now from the opposite standpoint. I will undertake to say that the clause as proposed will do more to undermine the honesty of public life than would the amendment which I have suggested. We have always heard it said that the poverty of public men was a great testimony to their honesty. Why was that? It was because these men in public life knew that they would not be branded as criminals if they did not seek the protection of the laws designed for the poor man. But supposing that you provide that a man shall absolutely sacrifice his public position if he becomes insolvent there will be a great temptation to public men who are poor not to have recourse to the protection of the Insolvency and the Bankruptcy Courts. You at once create a temptation which has never before existed in the public life of most of the colonies. Men who fear that they are being pursued, not with the ordinary force of the law, but with an exceptional rigour, will have a temptation presented to them, if they are weak, to adopt questionable means to save themselves from expulsion from public life. We would not be elevating public life by inserting in the Bill a provision of this character. I should go with Sir John Downer and Mr. Symon if they proposed that a man who had been refused his certificate of discharge should be disqualified from holding his seat in Parliament, because the moment a certificate of discharge is refused a stamp of dishonesty is placed upon the insolvent's business transactions, and that should be a disqualification. But here there is no provision of that character, and the clause says that a man is to be deemed guilty before he is tried. You cannot within the 30 days, if any political opponent chooses to set the wheels in motion, get a certificate of discharge.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

If he is a good man, would not he be returned to Parliament again?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

He would; but the Ministry might be dissolved, and the whole state of affairs politically might be thrown into confusion. Are we to be told that three years afterwards an error, such as I have described, maybe remedied by the man being re-elected to Parliament? That is too big a price to pay in such a matter as this. I do hope, therefore, that the Convention will carry this proposal. If Sir John Downer and others who are wavering think that some protection is necessary, let it be provided in another sub-section that where a man is refused a certificate of discharge he shall be disqualified from holding his seat.

The amendment was negatived.

[The Chairman left the chair at eight minutes to one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at ten minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Clause 45. Any person who-

IV. Holds any office of profit under the Crown, or any pension payable during the pleasure of the Crown out of any of the revenues of the Commonwealth; but this sub-section does not apply to the office of any of the Queen's Ministers of State for the Commonwealth or to the receipt of pay, half-pay, or a pension by any person as an officer or member of the Queen's navy or army, or to the receipt of pay as an officer or member of the naval or military forces of the Commonwealth by any person whose services are not wholly employed by the Commonwealth shall be incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a senator or a member of the House of Representatives.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I beg to move-

That the words "or of any of the Queen's Ministers in a state" be inserted after the words Ministers of State for the Commonwealth in sub-section
My object in moving for the insertion of these words is that the clause shall not apply to Ministers of the Crown in the various states. There was a provision in the Bill, in Adelaide I think it was, that a member of a state Parliament should not be eligible to be a member of the Federal Parliament. That provision was contained in the Bill of 1891, but it has been excised, and therefore in the Constitution there is nothing to prohibit a member of a state Parliament from being a member of the Federal Parliament. Unless the words I move to be inserted are inserted, a member of a state Government will not be eligible to be a member of the Federal Parliament. I can well understand that this arrangement may be inconvenient, and I should not oppose the introduction of a provision that one person should not be a member of a state Executive as well as a member of the Federal Executive. But we are confronted with a difficulty, especially in the beginning of the operation of the Federal Constitution. By-and-by, no doubt, as time goes on, the difficulty which we experience at the present time will not continue. The states will settle down, and the Federal Government will settle down, and it will be found that one man will not be eligible in the view of the electors to fill the two offices. But, at the beginning of the operation of the Constitution, we are confronted with this difficulty—that, unless these words are inserted, there is not one Premier, not one Minister of the Crown in the colonies, who will be able to nominate himself to be chosen as a member of the first Federal Parliament. To ask those who are in office at the present time, to ask those who are Premiers of colonies, to say, before they are eligible to be chosen even as a member of the Federal Parliament, they must resign all the offices they hold is, I think, absurd and not reasonable. I ask honorable members to insert these words, so that the clause shall not apply to any Minister of the Commonwealth or to any of the Queen's Ministers in the states. I think I need not say any more in regard to the matter. The thing seems to me clear enough. Unless honorable members wish to exclude all the Queen's Ministers at the present time in all the states they must vote for the insertion of these words.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

No doubt there are some inconveniences in adopting this proposal; but, on the other hand, there are greater inconveniences in not adopting it. I think the right honorable member has shown very good ground for carrying his amendment. The principal argument which appealed to my mind is that in this scheme of federation, particularly in the finance scheme which we have adopted, it is very necessary that the states should keep a sharp lookout on the management of the finances of the Commonwealth, and it is highly desirable that the leading public men in the states should be in the Federal Parliament, particularly those leading public men in the states who can speak with the authority of office regarding the position of the finances of the states. Of course, under certain circumstances, it might be inconvenient, and, as the right honorable member pointed out, it would be very inconvenient to have a person occupying the dual position of a Minister in the Commonwealth and a Minister in the state. It is highly probable that the state Parliament will look after that. It is a matter we may very well leave the state Parliament to deal with. The amendment is an improvement on the clause, especially in aiding the Commonwealth at the beginning of its existence, and I think it ought to be carried.

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 46. - If a senator or member of the House of Representatives-
I. Becomes subject to any of the disabilities mentioned in the last preceding section: or

II. Takes the benefit, whether by assignment, composition, or otherwise, of any law relating to bankrupt or insolvent debtors: or

III. Directly or indirectly accepts or receives any fee or honorarium for work done or services rendered by him for or on behalf of the Commonwealth while sitting as such member:

his place shall thereupon become vacant.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

This clause has been recast by the Drafting Committee, and, as I gather, is intended to incorporate the provisions of clauses 46, 47, and 48 in the Bill as amended in Sydney. Very good work has been done by the committee in the attainment of brevity, but it seems to me that there is some little danger in connexion with this clause, and there are several points to which I should like to direct the attention of the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor). The clause provides that-

I. Becomes subject to any of the disabilities mentioned in the last preceding section his place shall thereupon become vacant.

Sub-section (4) of clause 45 provides that any person who holds an office of profit under the Crown, not being the office of any of the Queen's Ministers of State for the Commonwealth, is to be the subject of a disability. Therefore, acceptance of the office of a Queen's Minister of State for the Commonwealth does not vacate the seat of a senator or member of the House of Representatives. Is it intended, or is it right, to make that a cast iron provision of the Constitution? I do not think that the clauses of the old Bill made this provision.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The clauses which have been remodelled were exactly to the same effect. That would have worked out in the same way.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I have no recollection of the committee coming to such a determination. In any case I should like to direct the attention of honorable members to the position that it is not left to the Commonwealth Parliament or to the people hereafter to determine whether a senator or member of the House of Representatives accepting the position of Minister of State for the Commonwealth is or is not to vacate his seat. But it seems to me that the matter ought to be left to the Federal Parliament. The next point to which I will direct attention is more serious. Sub-section (2) of clause 46 provides that the seat of a senator or member of the House of Representatives is to become vacant if he-

- takes the benefit . . . of any law relating to bankrupt or insolvent debtors.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Does not a bankrupt take the benefit if he is given it?

Mr. ISAACS. -

A distinction has been drawn very clearly in many Acts, and is drawn in clause 46 of the old Bill. Sub-section (2) of the old clause 46 provides that the seat of a member is to become vacant if he-

- is adjudged bankrupt or insolvent, or takes the benefit of any law relating to bankrupt or insolvent debtors.

Thus a distinction is drawn between taking the benefit of the law, and being forced to take advantage of it. Some years ago a decision was given by Mr. Justice Fellows, which went very far in the direction of drawing a strong distinction between the case of a public servant who became insolvent, and one who was made insolvent, the becoming insolvent being thought a voluntary act. The result of the provision in the Bill is that, while a member taking the benefit of a

The difficulty is got over by Sub-section (3) of the previous clause. A man's seat becomes vacant if he is the subject of any of the disabilities mentioned in clause 45, included among which are the disabilities mentioned in sub-section (3) of clause 45.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What is the meaning of sub-section (2) of clause 46?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That sub-section refers to a voluntary act on the part of the bankrupt.
Mr. HIGGINS. -

Ought you not to have the same phrase in sub-section (2) as you have in sub-section (3) of clause 45?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes. That would get over the difficulty. If in sub-section (2) of clause 46 you put an express reference to a certain class of insolvency, that must exclude by inference any other class of insolvency. There is another point, and this is also a very serious one, to which the Premier of Victoria drew my attention before lunch. Sub-section (3) of clause 46 provides that the seat of a senator or member of the House of Representatives is to become vacant if he-

- directly or indirectly accepts or receives any fee or honorarium for work done or service rendered by him for and on behalf of the Commonwealth while sitting as such member.

No exception is made to meet the case of a Minister of the Crown. There is provision made elsewhere in the Constitution for the payment of salary to Ministers for services rendered to the Commonwealth, which might include his services as a senator. Clause 48A provides that-

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, each senator, and each member of the House of Representatives, shall receive for his services an allowance of £400 a year, to be reckoned from the day on which he takes his seat.

The allowance spoken of there might be regarded as an honorarium, or as a fee, but it is an allowance for "services," which is the word used in sub-section (3) of clause 46.

Mr. LYNE. -

What would be the position of a barrister or solicitor voting in connexion with a case in which he was interested outside?

Mr. ISAACS. -

The clause does not deal with that matter, though no doubt it is one of very great importance. Although most excellent work has been done by the Drafting Committee in recasting three clauses of the Bill, I think it is necessary that I should draw attention to these matters. I think that a very slight alteration would get rid of the difficulties to which I have referred.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

The last point which the honorable and learned member has raised no doubt requires attention, but I think the difficulty would be got over by the insertion of some words like these:

- directly or indirectly accepts or receives, otherwise than as is provided by this Constitution.
The matter is one to which the Drafting Committee will pay attention. With regard to the other matter of which he has spoken, I think that upon consideration he will find that no amendment is necessary. A member subject to any of the disabilities mentioned in clause 45 loses his seat under the provisions of clause 46. Amongst the disabilities in clause 45 is that mentioned in sub-section (3), which says that-

Any person who is an undischarged bankrupt or insolvent-shall be incapable of sitting as a senator or member of the House of Representatives. So that directly a man became bankrupt or insolvent, and until his discharge, he is under one of the disabilities in sub-sections (3), (4), and (5). As soon as he comes under these disabilities his place becomes vacant. That deals with cases of compulsory sequestration, and leaves only those cases in which a man may voluntarily seek the assistance of the Bankruptcy Court. It is to deal with the latter cases that sub-section (2) is introduced. There are cases in which a man may make an arrangement with some of his creditors without insolvency, and yet this arrangement comes under the direction of the court, which has to give a certain legal effect to it. There are some cases in which a person may take the benefit of the insolvency laws by assignment or composition made under the direction of the court, and have a certain legal effect given to that arrangement by the court without actually becoming bankrupt or insolvent. It is to provide for cases of that kind that sub-section (2) was introduced.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If you drop out sub-section (2) would it not answer your purpose?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not think it would. The Bill would not then deal with cases of assignment or composition which take place under the guidance or protection of the court, and have legal effect given to them.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I suggest that the words "otherwise than is provided by this Constitution" would meet the case.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is it intended that a member, on taking office, is to vacate his seat and be re-elected? If it is not, I think the clause would work out all right.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is not intended to impose that disability. The Constitutional Committee, during their work in 1891, did not provide for the vacating of seats by Ministers on the acceptance of office. It has been considered that the Statute of Anne really applies to a condition of things existing in that day which the progress of representative government has rendered a non-existing condition now. There is no longer the necessity for imposing that disability on Ministers. The object of the Statute of Anne, in aiming at placemen, is no longer an object which applies to the office of Ministers of the Crown.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You have the law in New South Wales.

Mr. BARTON. -

We have it in New South Wales and in Victoria, but not in South Australia, I believe. It is regarded now as an unnecessary burden. I agree with Mr. Higgins that, if the provision referred to be not made, the clause will work out all right. I think the Convention might very well adopt an amendment, which I now beg to move-

That in the first line of sub-section (2), after the word "services," the words "otherwise than is provided by this Constitution" be inserted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Does that let the Judges in?

Mr. BARTON. -

No, I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does this proposal come before the amendment of Mr. Reid?

Mr. REID. -

Yes.

Mr. BARTON. -

I will take those words, if they are inserted, to be a direction to the Drafting Committee to provide adequately for the contingency.

Mr. LEWIS (Tasmania). -

Is that not going too far? Does it not include the Judges?

Mr. ISAACS. -

This refers only to vacating seats on taking office.

Mr. BARTON. -

This provision is only to make seats vacant. A Judge would have first to get there, which he cannot.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That in clause 46, after the word "Commonwealth," in the last line of the clause but one, insert "or for work done or services rendered in Parliament for or on behalf of any other person."

If this provision had been in the Constitution of the United States there would have been an opportunity of stopping a number of abuses in connexion with legislative measures. I do not suppose it happens in the colonies at any rate, I know of no such case but it has been stated that Members of Parliament, even in the colonies, have accepted payment for putting Bills through the Houses. As I have said, I have never known of a case of the sort, but it is quite possible such things have happened. We do not wish such a condition of affairs to arise. If we disqualify a man for performing service for the Commonwealth for payment, it is equally important that he should be disqualified for accepting fees for work done in the legislative body. Under the latter circumstances the member works under false pretences. He appears to work in the public interest, when really he is accepting payment for putting measures through the Legislature. The words I have moved refer to quite a different class of cases to those we have just dealt with. My object is to prohibit Members of Parliament using their position for payment for advocating Bills and so forth.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What do you mean by "work done or services rendered"?

Mr. REID. -

You had better ask the Drafting Committee; I am using their words.

Mr. BARTON. -

These are the words inserted at the instance of Mr. Carruthers at Adelaide.

Mr. REID. -

This amendment refers only to the first line of the clause-"If a senator or member of the House of Representatives. The sub-section will now read:-

Directly or indirectly accepts or receives any fee or honorarium for work done or services rendered by him, for or on behalf of the Commonwealth, or for work done or services rendered in Parliament, for or on behalf of any other person.

This is a class of industry we want to suppress.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

In the standing orders of the House of Commons it is laid down that members, either by themselves or by others, are prohibited from receiving fees for work done in the House of Commons. That is a standing rule I tried to introduce in Tasmania, and I think that Mr. Reid should go a little further, and insert the words-"either by themselves or any other person."

Mr. REID. -

I think that my amendment will cover every member.

[P.1946] starts here

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

But the member very frequently is in partnership with others, and he receives money indirectly through his office. This is a very common practice in regard to private Bills, and it should be prohibited. It would be well to adopt the words of the standing order of the House of Commons.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The amendment of my right honorable friend deals to a large extent with the mischief provided for by the House of Commons in dealing with bribes. There is a passage in the tenth edition of May, page 81, which may be useful as dealing with the subject:-

So also the acceptance of a bribe by a member has ever, by the law of Parliament, been a grave offence, which has been visited by the severest punishments. In 1677 Mr. John Ashburnham was expelled for receiving £500 from the French merchants for business done in the House. In 1694 Sir John Trevour was declared guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour, in having, while Speaker of the House, received a gratuity of 1,000 guineas from the City of London after the passing of the Orphans.

It will be recollected that the powers, privileges, and immunities of the House of Commons will extend to the Federal Parliament under the Bill as it stands. May goes on:-

In 1695 Mr. Guy, for taking a bribe of 200 guineas, was committed to the Tower, and Mr. Hungerford was expelled for receiving 20 guineas for his services as chairman of the committees on the Orphans Bill.

I think that that is the kind of service to which my right honorable friend alluded.

Mr. REID. -

Yes.

Mr. BARTON. -

We read further in May-

Nor has the law of Parliament been confined to the repression of direct pecuniary corruption. To guard against indirect influence, it has further restrained the acceptance of fees by its members for professional services connected with any proceeding or measure in Parliament. A member is, accordingly, incapable of practising as counsel before the House, or on any committee. By resolution, 26th February, 1830, members of the House of Commons are prohibited from engaging, either by themselves or by a partner, in the management of private Bills before this or the other House of Parliament for pecuniary reward.

It is worthy of consideration whether a resolution of that kind is not merely declaratory of the rights of the House. May goes on-

Nor is it consistent with parliamentary or professional usage for a member to advise as counsel upon any private Bill, or other proceeding in Parliament.
There is a note referring to a resolution of June, 1858. That note says—

By resolution 22nd June, 1858, 113 C.J., 247, the Commons declared that it is derogatory to the dignity of the House that any of its members should bring forward, promote, or advocate in this House any proceeding or measure in which he may have acted or been concerned, for or in consideration of any pecuniary fee or reward.

The ruling of the Speaker regarding the scope of the resolution was reported, but to that report I have not had time to refer. This is a matter the House of Commons has always dealt with as within the scope of its powers and privileges, which powers and privileges will belong to the Federal Parliament under a preceding clause—I think clause 8—of the Constitution dealing with the matter. Under the circumstances, I ask my honorable friend to say whether it would not be advisable to leave the matter as it stands provided for by the Constitution. He may be quite sure that there will be a Parliament which will be no less prone to deal with matters of this kind than any Parliament we have any knowledge of. I confess I am a little doubtful about loading the Constitution with provisions of this kind, which, although when in the Constitution, are, in one sense, matters of legislation, are really regulations of Parliament on matters which are within its own particular province, and which Parliament may be well expected to deal with. There never has been any hesitation in a community with English representative institutions in dealing with matters of this kind. We have seen how these matters have been dealt with by the House of Commons, and we have given the privileges of the House of Commons to the Federal Parliament. I do not think any one of us will anticipate that the Federal Parliament will be slow to avail itself of its privileges. Is it any more necessary to make provision for a matter of this kind than for a great many other matters which we may be quite sure Parliament will have under its cognisance, and which, when they are infringements of proper conduct as illustrated by the history of Parliament, will be dealt with in the way in which the British Parliament has always dealt with them. I am quite at one with Mr. Reid in his object, but I am rather inclined to think that the object would be served by leaving the matter to the operation of the Constitution as it is drawn.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I must confess that, after listening to Mr. Barton, it is infinitely better this matter should be settled on the face of the Constitution than that it should come to pass some particular member should be arraigned before the House for having accepted some such reward as I have referred to. I had in my own mind the history of the working of the Constitution of the United
I wish to see put plainly on the face of this Constitution a rule which all members will have to abide by. If they did not abide by it there would be no plea of not knowing the law, or anything of that sort. I suggest, in the interests of the working of our parliamentary institutions, that this principle should be put in if only as a guide to honorable members who might perhaps not think it improper to receive payment for labour done, say, in connexion with private Bills.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If my honorable friend is going to do that, would it not be better to add the words "or corporation"?

Mr. REID. -

I will agree to that, and ask leave to amend the amendment so that it shall read "any person or corporation."

The amendment was amended by leave.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I would suggest that we should probably carry out what we desire if instead of specifying on whose behalf anything might be done, we should simply say that any member of the Senate or House of Representatives who directly or indirectly received payment for labour done or for services other than those for which an honorarium was provided by the Constitution should be liable to this penalty.

Mr. BARTON. -

We have inserted words to that effect.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It would make it just as complete and more effectual if we struck out all the attempted specification of the persons on whose behalf the work might be done. We should simply impose the penalty if he did work as a senator or member of the House of Representatives, and took any remuneration which is not provided by the Constitution.

Mr. BARTON. -

I will take a note of that matter.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 52-The Parliament shall, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, have full power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to-

(1) The regulation of trade and commerce with other countries and among the several states.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I beg to move-

For the purposes of this sub-section, waters shall be deemed navigable for trade and commerce which, either by themselves or in connexion with other waters, are in fact navigated permanently or intermittently for trade and commerce with other nations, or among the several states.

I gave notice of this amendment after the printed list of amendments was issued. I have given notice of it with some hesitation, and it was only after I saw that the Right Hon. Mr. Reid proposed to add another sub-section that I did so. My desire is simply to leave the various colonies in the position in which they were when the Constitution was drafted. I am not going to argue at length the policy of this matter. Honorable members will have it in their minds that a definition was introduced to give certainty as to what could be done, that is, as to the application of the principle of many of the American decisions to the river systems of Australia. It is not the application of the principle of the American decisions to the Darling only, but to the Murray, because there are many months in the year when the Murray, from Albury down to the mouth, is a navigable river.

Mr. LYNE. -

Are you sure that this will not extend to everything?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I will explain to the honorable member that it does not extend to everything. My amendment is to cover the case of a river which may be navigable six or eight months in the year, and which is not navigable during the rest of the year. That will leave out all the rivers which do not form part of the great chain of communication which the Darling and the Murray do among the various states. The proposal is to add to sub-section (1), for the purposes of this sub-section, that waters shall be deemed navigable for trade and commerce which, either by themselves or in connexion with other waters, are navigated permanently or intermittently for trade and commerce with other nations or among the several states.

Mr. REID. -

You provide that they shall be deemed navigable for trade and commerce during the particular time when they are not navigable.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The section does not state that they shall be navigable at all times.

Mr. REID. -

You say that they shall be deemed navigable even at the time when they are intermittent.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The right honorable gentleman will see that they are deemed to be navigable only for a certain purpose under sub-section (1), that is, for the purpose of the Federal Parliament having jurisdiction to legislate in relation to them. That will take away from what might otherwise be the absurdity of declaring that a river is what it is not. I only want the definition for a specific purpose, the purpose of giving the Federal Parliament power to legislate over the several rivers. I would remind honorable members of what Mr. Isaacs said, in his clear and able speech on the rivers question, that the Judiciary has no power under the trade and commerce clause in America until the Parliament legislates. That, I understand, is the principle which is so clearly expounded by the honorable member.

Mr. REID. -
I will accept the honorable member's amendment if he will accept mine.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I should like to oblige the honorable gentleman, but the best way is to get my amendment in first, and then see what it looks like. I should like to shorten debate by not moving my amendment if Mr. Reid will consent to strike his out. However much I would regret the non-passing of my amendment, I am willing to sit down on these conditions. I wish to make one or two references to the speeches which were made on this subject after this clause had been put in with the general assent of the committee, because there was no division on the question, but it was subsequently struck out on an understanding-if not of all honorable members, at all events an understanding on the part of most honorable members-that if the definition were struck out nothing further would be done to interfere with the trade and commerce clause, and that there would be no attempt either by Victoria or New South Wales to introduce anything that would not leave the colonies in the position in which they are at the present time, except so far as the trade and commerce clause would, under the Constitution, affect their relative positions.

Mr. LYNE. -
Why not mention South Australia, as well as Victoria and New South Wales?

Mr. GLYNN. -
Because the surrender of this clause was made by South Australia. Some honorable members, whose votes would have carried the clause, expressed a great desire to do so, but, like Sir John Downer, they stated that they would rather have the clause struck out, upon an understanding that nothing else would be done. They did that in order to stop debate, which, we were afraid, would run into another fortnight; otherwise they would have voted for the retention of this definition. I am sure from the speeches of some other honorable members that there was a general understanding that if this definition were struck out, nothing further would be done.

Mr. Reid. -
I announced my intention if possible to allow that to be the case, but I have made most diligent inquiry since then, and I find it is impossible.

Mr. Glynn. -
I understand that to be the case. Although the understanding was not general, I will show by quotations from Hansard that a great many honorable members did vote

I am prepared to take the risk of these general words so far as I am concerned, because I am quite in favour of any federal control over anything used for intercolonial purposes.

That is somewhat in the spirit in which I moved this amendment to give some control over rivers that are really to be used for federal purposes. Then Mr. Isaacs spoke, and, though he desired that something further should be subsequently added, still he did not object to the insertion of this definition.

Mr. Isaacs. -
Oh, yes.

Mr. Glynn. -
The honorable member's assent to its introduction was qualified by the expression of an inclination that something further should be added afterwards for irrigation and conservation.

Mr. Isaacs. -
I stated then, and I think now, that the word "navigation" is not sufficient. It should be "navigable."

Mr. Glynn. -
The honorable member used these words:-

I shall, however, support the insertion of these words, but I hope that hereafter we shall have some provision made with regard to conservation and irrigation.

Then, later on, Sir John Downer, at page 583 of the debates, expressed his belief that, as a matter of principle, the definition ought to be introduced, but that, in order to stop further discussion, he would vote against the definition, on a sort of general understanding that nothing further would be done. Sir John Downer said-

That amendment took into consideration all the views upon the subject. It dealt exhaustively with every question. The same reason which made me support the amendment of Mr. Isaacs makes me oppose that of Mr. Reid. If it becomes necessary, or will assist in any friendly understanding, to strike out Mr. Glynn's clause, I would, although I should think it a mistake to do so, agree to that, rather than part with a misunderstanding.

There is an expressed condition that he gave his vote, on the understanding that nothing further would be done if this definition were struck out. There were several other honorable members who expressed themselves in a similar way. Sir John Forrest, for example, who was particularly strong on this being done as a sort of compromise, said, at page 605-

I rise for two purposes. First of all, I wish to express the hope that the very reasonable suggestion—and I think the best suggestion that could be made—of the leader of the Convention (Mr. Barton) will be generally accepted by honorable members. It seems to me that we shall never be likely to get any proposal which will probably secure more general approval.

The proposal of Mr. Barton was to strike out the definition, and he said if that was done he would not vote for the introduction of Mr. Reid's or any other amendment to a similar effect. That shows that we have support given on that understanding by Sir John Forrest. Then Sir Edward Braddon spoke on the subject.

Mr. REID. -

It is not necessary to go into detail after you have stated the general effect of the speeches.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I think it better to refer to these expressions of opinion.

Mr. REID. -

We shall get into a very long discussion.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I will not go into the merits of the definition, but I think it is necessary to prove these facts. Sir Edward Braddon said-

I think we might have come to a decision, and a satisfactory decision, on these matters, within five minutes or so, if the pronouncement of my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) had been more definite in its terms—if he had given an unqualified engagement to withdraw his amendment.

It will, therefore, be seen that the question was asked, but no answer was given; but there is the intention of Sir Edward Braddon clearly stated that he would vote to strike out the definition as a compromise.

Mr. REID. -

Was it the same definition as this?

Mr. GLYNN. -
Practically the same definition, although I am not quite sure whether the word "navigable" was in it before. I put the word in now because it will strengthen, as some members suggested, the position of New South Wales in regard to the matter.

Mr. REID. -

If trade and commerce are carried along any river among the several states, surely that would come within the general words without the definition, because wherever intercolonial trade and commerce go, there the power to regulate it goes.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I take the position to be this: There have been state decisions in America on the question of intermittency, but the matter has not yet received judgment from the High Court, so far as I can find out, in America. I want the question of intermittency to be settled, because it is well that enterprise should not be stopped until, in the first place, the Federal Parliament has passed an Act, and then a judicial decision has been given as to the meaning of it. Because honorable members must bear in mind that this does not give the Judiciary control under the trade and commerce clause until an Act of the Federal Parliament is passed, and before anything can be done to interfere with the so-called rights of New South Wales that Act will have to run the gauntlet of the two Houses of the Federal Legislature. It may be rejected. The amendment was rejected by the casting vote of the Chairman, given, as you, sir, said, in the interests of the federal cause, not necessarily that you did not believe in the retention of the definition. Subsequently, Sir George Turner proposed an amendment which, in fact, was almost identical with the one of which Mr. Reid and Mr. Carruthers have now given notice. What was the result of that? As my definition has been struck out, apparently on a general understanding, the Convention expressed its disinclination to do anything by rejecting Sir George Turner's amendment by 35 votes to 8—a pretty conclusive expression of the view of the committee that the tacit understanding on which my amendment was struck out should not be broken. Is it fair that Mr. Reid should bring forward a proposal to limits the rights of South Australia, now that the definition, which was a federal one, has been struck out? I ask the committee to say that either the whole of the amendments shall be rejected, or that mine shall be put in as well as the others. If Mr. Reid's and Mr. Carruthers' proposals are carried, South Australia would certainly be in a worse position than she is in now. At present we can go into the courts of New South Wales and take action in regard to any breach of riparian rights which may have been taken away; but we are setting up in the Constitution a ban upon doing that. At present, we can take action in a court of the offending state, but under this Constitution we abrogate that right. That is not fair, and will result in considerable opposition to the adoption of the Constitution in South Australia. I ask the Convention to adhere to the understanding arrived at when my definition was struck out, and insert none of these proposals, or to insert mine; and, in order to be on the safe side, I move the insertion of this definition, and hope that it will be put in.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
What is the meaning of your words "navigated permanently or intermittently"? If one single boat goes up and down a river once in ten years the river would be intermittently navigated.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Yes, because the power of navigation would exist. But the Judiciary will have to look into the facts of the case before it gives a decision as to whether a river is navigable or not.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Do you intend to say by your definition of "navigable" that if there is one boat in ten years upon a river that river is "in fact navigated permanently or intermittently"?

Mr. GLYNN. -
A river would not be likely to be considered by the court to be a navigable river because there was a chance of going up or down it in a boat once in eight or ten years.

Mr. REID. -
Is there power to limit the application to rivers intermittently navigable?

Mr. GLYNN. -
There is not under the Constitution, but there is a decision in America as to whether a river is navigable when it can only be used for purposes of navigation for a few months in a year. In America the decisions upon the question of intermittency have had reference to rivers that are frozen in certain periods of the year. But the trouble here is that there is no water in the rivers for a certain period of the year. That is a different matter altogether; and when you come to apply American definitions to a river like the Darling, that perhaps has no flow for eighteen months at a time, it is a matter of doubt as to whether the trade and commerce clause will have any application. I wish to make the matter sure, and it is for that purpose that I move this amendment; but if Mr. Reid withdraws his, I will withdraw mine. I ask, however, in fairness to South Australia, that mine may be inserted if Mr. Reid's is inserted, although mine was previously rejected on the understanding that nothing would be done.
Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I would like to suggest to my honorable friends from South Australia for their serious consideration, whether this definition would not result in limiting instead of enlarging the operation of the general words? I take it that this power of regulating trade and commerce among the several states—given in these particular general words will follow such trade and commerce everywhere.

Mr. BARTON. -

It will follow trade wherever it goes.

Mr. REID. -

Yes, wherever it goes, whether over a macadamized road, or over a bridge, or over railways, or on the waters of rivers, so long as trade and commerce is carried there.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Or into warehouses?

Mr. REID. -

If a warehouse is used for the purpose of intercolonial trade and commerce, and if any differential rate is imposed which has the effect of limiting trade and commerce, then the provision could extend to that warehouse I submit, because it would be antagonistic to the spirit of this provision if any such establishment were allowed by its rates to affect equality of commercial intercourse. Therefore, the attempt to say whether a river shall be deemed to be navigable is out of place and unnecessary. Suppose during the time the Darling is navigable intercolonial commerce is being carried on it, surely the power of the Commonwealth would be sufficient to say that that river, quite irrespective of whether it was used permanently for the purpose of trade and commerce or not, was in fact used at all for that purpose. The power of the Commonwealth would apply to it just as that power could be applied to a road which was unpassable for the period of a year. Would it not be absurd to say that a road that was not passable through any cause for the period of a year was not to be deemed a road at all? Knowing as we do that the court would administer this provision free from quibbles, and would not allow a river which was used for trade and commerce to be interfered with in a way which would prevent trade and commerce flowing upon it, what need is there for inserting this definition? If we define rivers we should define roads. But that is unnecessary, and, therefore, I submit that the power of the Commonwealth under the provision in the Bill is sufficient to extend over all rivers that are used for trade and commerce, whether permanently or intermittently navigable. But I say it is a perfect excrescence to put that particular provision in this clause, and, further, that my honorable friend has asked for something that he has already got in the Bill.
Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I think we do want something in this Bill in the way of a definition of "navigable" rivers, by reason of the differences between the definition of navigable rivers in America and English decisions with regard to navigable rivers. I have said before on m

Mr. REID. -

How can that bear on any thing under the inter-state trade an commerce clauses?
Mr. ISAACS. -

There is no definition of a navigable river in this Bill at present, and one is certainly wanted. But this is one of those things in which I quite despair of doing anything in the direction I desire, because of the tremendous expressions of opinion the other way. Still, there is a very grave danger, as Mr. Reid has said, that the insertion of Mr. Glynn's definition may tend to limit the clause. What the honorable member wants to do is to say that navigable waters shall include rivers which are in fact navigable permanently or intermittently for trade and commerce with other nations, or among the several states. But when he turns his proposal the other way and says that, for the purposes of sub-section (1) of clause 52, waters shall be deemed navigable for trade and commerce which, either by themselves or in connexion with other waters, are in fact navigated permanently or intermittently for trade and commerce with other nations, or among the several states, he introduces a limitation.
Mr. GLYNN. -

Will you support my amendment if I change it as you suggest?
Mr. ISAACS. -

I should certainly prefer that the amendment should say that rivers are deemed to be navigable, if they are in fact navigable for trade and commerce between the several states or with foreign countries.
Mr. REID. -

No one objects to that.
Mr. ISAACS. -

That would take us out of the doubt as to whether the American or the English decisions are to be followed here. The amendment may operate as a limitation of sub-section (1) of the clause, if it is inserted there-I do not think that that is a proper place to put it in. I should say that if it is to be put in at all it should be added to sub-section (8), where we deal with navigation and shipping. If the amendment is altered to this form-"Rivers shall be deemed to be navigable if they are in fact navigable for trade and commerce among the states and to foreign countries," there would be no risk of limiting the first sub-section. But after the terrific expression of opinion we have had on this matter one cannot but despair of doing anything satisfactory in regard to it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am in very grave doubts as to whether Mr. Glynn will gain anything by inserting this definition in the Bill. I am inclined to agree with both Mr. Reid and Mr. Isaacs that, as submitted, it amounts to a limitation. And, even if it is altered in the way Mr. Isaacs has suggested, I do not think it would really work any good thing for the benefit of the object which Mr. Glynn has in view. If we are to attach any value to what has gone before in the interpretation of such a clause as the trade and commerce clause, it strikes me that the commerce that goes on among the states, or between any part of the Commonwealth and a foreign country, is under the regulation of the Commonwealth, and it does not seem to me to matter where the commerce is found. A river may be practically a road which is for the time being impracticable. Commerce may be impracticable on a river which for a time is too shallow, if not dry. But whether the commerce arises and takes place from one state to another, no matter how many states may intervene, then, whether that commerce be carried by road, river, or rail, it seems to me to be interstate commerce, and subject to the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth authority. If that is so-and it seems to me a quite sound view-there is no necessity for any definition. I speak with some feeling on this subject, because from the beginning to the end I have been prepared to take the risks of the trade and commerce clause, whether as regards the use of water or the regulation of traffic, and I have consistently opposed any limitation or definition which might in any way control the power of the Commonwealth to deal, as to it seems just, within the limits of the Constitution, with any trade or commerce between the states. That is the position I hold now, and I think, therefore, that Mr. Glynn's amendment is unnecessary. I do not think it can take any effect in extending the power of the Commonwealth to deal with inter-state trade and commerce wherever it finds that trade and commerce; and I am perfectly willing that that power should be properly maintained by the Commonwealth.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

I have felt very keenly on this subject, as honorable members know, and I am rather inclined to ask Mr. Glynn not to press his amendment. While I think that a definition of this kind is exceedingly desirable, I agree with Mr. Isaacs that it is more than difficult to insert a definition in this Bill.
Moreover, I cannot conceive of the High Court holding that the River
Darling, which is the crux of this question, is not a highway of commerce, whatever the English decisions under the common law have been.

Mr. BARTON. -

The High Court will not have to decide whether the river is navigable, but whether there is an infringement of the power of the Inter-State Commission to regulate commerce on that river.

Mr. GORDON. -

I am aware that it is a contradiction in terms, but I think a river may be a permanent highway for commerce even if navigation on that river is not continuous. It is a permanent highway for commerce, with certain interruptions during the year. But I cannot imagine the High Court deciding that the Darling is anything but a navigable river.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is it a permanent highway for boats or buggies?

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

It is sometimes a mistake to vary one's amendments in deference to the wishes of honorable members. When I first introduced my amendment, "navigable" was the word I used, but, in deference to representatives of New South Wales, I changed it to "navigated." Then the very honorable members who induced me to make that change attacked the amendment. It is a dangerous thing to bow to the prejudices of your opponents in any way. In order that the amendment may be submitted as I originally drafted it, I now ask leave to amend it by substituting the word "navigable" for the word "navigated."

The amendment was, by leave amended accordingly.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I doubt very much the expediency of pressing this amendment or whether it will carry the matter any further than we have had it before. The amendment is a very laudable effort by Mr. Glynn to settle a very difficult question. But I voted against it before for two reasons-one, because it was unnecessary, and possibly a limitation; the other because I thought it would lead to the clearing away of another amendment proposed by Mr. Reid, and in order that everything might then be left to the operation of the general trade and commerce clauses. As Mr. Glynn said, we are now face to face with other amendments which raise the whole question again, and he was placed in the position of being practically compelled to move his amendment. Still, I would point out to him that whilst the object of the amendment is to prevent the possibility of doubt as to the application of American authorities with regard to what is meant by a "navigable river," it is not exhaustive, because the American courts, in dealing with this matter of navigation, took into consideration the question of irrigation. Their conditions are very largely the same as ours, and this is just one of those cases in which the courts of these colonies, like the courts of America, must be influenced by local conditions and local enterprise in the application of the law. That is what we look for, and that is what we hope for. If an amendment of this sort were introduced, it would be necessary, in order to make it thoroughly exhaustive, to add some such words as these-

"And in applying this definition regard shall be had to the necessities of water conservation and of irrigation" It would be impossible to do justice by practically giving a direction to the Federal Court to hold a river navigable without taking into consideration the necessities of irrigation in the different localities. I would ask the honorable member to reconsider the position from that point of view.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I would also ask the honorable member not to press his amendment, and I would, at the same time, ask the Right Hon. Mr. Reid and the Hon. Mr. Carruthers not to press the amendments of which they have given notice. They all deal with practically the same question, and I think we may be content with the general words "regulation of trade and commerce." In the evolution of the Constitution it may be found that those words have no necessary application to navigation. Commerce may, under certain conditions, be better served by irrigation than by navigation. Navigation is the test in some countries, simply because they have no other criterion: but, as was pointed out by Mr. Isaacs in the great speech he delivered on the subject, circumstances have made a different test applicable in certain parts of America. Mr. Glynn wants to put something in to preserve the rights of navigation. Mr. Reid wants to put something in to preserve the rights of irrigation. In my opinion neither is necessary, and the clause had much better be left alone. With all sympathy for Mr. Glynn, I shall vote against his amendment, just as I shall vote against the amendment to be proposed by Mr. Reid. I understood that an agreement was come to.

Mr. REID. -

Do not say that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

It was uncommonly like an agreement on the part of the right honorable member.

Mr. REID. -

That is unfair. I distinctly reserved to myself the right to move an amendment.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
Could not Mr. Glynn's amendment be postponed until after Mr. Reid's amendment was dealt with?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
It would be more convenient to consider Mr. Reid's amendment first, and with that object in view, I beg to move:-

That the consideration of sub-section (1) and sub-section (2) be postponed until after the consideration of sub-section (8).

The CHAIRMAN. -
I would ask the Right Hon. Mr. Reid whether he intends to move the proposition that stands in his name, because he did not get leave from the Convention to do so?

Mr. REID. -
I thought I did.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I have the President's memorandum here.

Mr. REID. -
I thought I had leave. The Hon. Mr. Carruthers' amendment will, however, raise the same question.

The motion for the postponement of sub-sections (1) and (2) was agreed to.

Clause 52, sub-section (8). - Navigation and shipping.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-

That the following words be added to sub-section (8):-"But so that as regards rivers, the utilization of the waters thereof for navigation shall be subordinate to the conservation of the said waters by and within any state to meet the requirements of such state and its people."

There is no doubt whatever-and I say this on the authority of the leader of the Convention, and of the paper by Mr. Inglis Clark, which has been printed by order of the Convention-that under the Bill as it stands the right of a state to conserve water, and to utilize water for irrigation purposes, is made subordinate to the right of the Commonwealth to use that water for navigation, and for the purposes of the subsection relating to trade and commerce. No one will gainsay that position. Looking at the matter in that broad light, it amounts to this: That navigation is to be the paramount consideration in connexion with all the streams of Australia, whether it is carried on intermittently or permanently, and that neither the states nor the people of the states are to have the right to use the water for the development of their own territory without any danger of hindrance on the part of the Federal Government. That position may be eminently satisfactory to the colonies of Western Australia still until the Federal Parliament chose to legislate. We are asked now to give up rights which we believe to be essential to the progress and development of a large portion of Australia, and to trust to the sense of justice of some body which will act in the dim distant future. I say that, so far as the colony of New South Wales is concerned, the interests involved are too gigantic to be relegated to any arena in which uncertainty and risk may hold supremacy. When it was under discussion before, a large proportion of the members of the delegation thought that if we left the matter stay in the position in which it rested in Adelaide, or if we struck out all references to rivers, that matters would be satisfactorily ended. But I think most honorable members now see that instead of a satisfactory solution of the difficulty the difficulty is only intensified. So far as Victoria is concerned, I am credibly informed by the gentleman who presides over the Melbourne Water Supply that even the water that is used to supply to the city of Melbourne is created by a diversion of waters which otherwise would flow into the Murray River; that the Yan Yean water supply to this great city is one which may be held illegal under the provisions of this Constitution, unless there is an exception made in regard to it. Surely honorable members will never hesitate to say that to divert water continually, year after year in greater quantities, from its natural channel, to give a supply to one of the largest cities of Australia is not, to some considerable extent, interfering with the volume of water which would otherwise flow into the bed of the Murray. At any rate, it places in this one respect it is a very pointed instance the actual requirements and needs of the population of one locality for its daily purposes at the mercy of a majority for the time being legislating in the Federal Parliament. The majority may have trade or other interests which will impel it to do a wrong. I do not say it will do a wrong, but it may do a wrong. More than that, we have the risk that these works, in whose construction a large capital has been embarked, may at any moment be declared illegal. The risk is too great; the uncertainty is one which ought not to be created. No uncertainty has existed in the past, and there is no reason to create any uncertainty. If we take the rivers which will be most largely benefited by this—the Darling and the Murrumbidgee—I find there that this is a fair sample of the expenditure which has been incurred—an expenditure which will necessarily have to be incurred for similar works—on two runs abutting on the Darling River in New South Wales. There has already been an expenditure of £25,000 in erecting dams and making cuttings in order to give a supply to those two runs, Albermarle and Terrawheena. That expenditure has been undertaken simply because the persons whose money was put into the enterprise felt that there was some security of title which they would get to those works. What has been the result of that expenditure? The result of the expenditure so far as the profitable occupation of the land is concerned, has been that one lake-

The CHAIRMAN. -

I must ask honorable members not to hold conversations in the chamber.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I am sure that honorable members who are not paying any attention to my remarks, will be very ready to vote irrespective of the facts which are adduced, and which I say are of vital concern.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We have heard them before.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I have no doubt that those who are not intimately concerned in this subject can hardly realize the intensity of the feeling which has been provoked by the proposition of the Convention to interfere with those rights. I was saying, sir, when you interposed that the expenditure on those two runs has resulted in the filling of a lake, 17,000 acres in extent, to a depth of 17 feet at the inlet, and feeding from that lake into creeks running from it to a distance of from 17 miles to 25 miles back. Suppose it were held that the works were illegal, that they diverted an enormous quantity of water, as they do, from the Darling, and it was held to be necessary to cut the main dam which holds the water back, what would be the result so far as benefiting the navigation is concerned? It would take from six to seven months for that water to flow back into the Darling. The flow back would be so slow as not to appreciably influence the waters for the purpose of navigation at all. It is only in times of flood, when the banks of the Darling overflow, that these lakes and their tributary system can be replenished with water. If that water supply were allowed to flow back to the Darling, and the works were held to be illegal, the flow would be so slow as not to appreciably influence the supply of water for navigation. But what did these works effect? Albermarle run is 1,000,000 acres in extent; Terrawheena run is 850,000 acres in extent; and there are two other runs also abutting on the works. Over 4,000,000 acres, by this joint expenditure of the proprietors, is rendered fit for profitable pastoral occupation. Take away from these men the security to their works, and you at once destroy the value of all their properties; you diminish the occupation right to the land; you diminish the productiveness of that large area. Here is another very potent fact worth taking into consideration—that these very works in the interior of our colony have not merely increased the water supply on the soil, but have improved the climatic conditions, that whilst these lakes are filled more showers of rain fall, and that the rainfall gets to within a distance of 25 miles of the lakes and the creeks which are filled. So that we have this double gain: The climate itself is improved, and the country itself is rendered more profitable for occupation. That is one work which is undertaken along the river at an expenditure of £25,000. Other similar works could be undertaken along the whole course of that river, but who would undertake them when he would have no security of tenure whatever; when at any moment the Federal Parliament chooses to legislate antagonistic to the interests of these men their titles are swept away, their expenditure goes for naught, and they have nothing to show for their enterprise or for their work? Honorable members must know that it is the state of uncertainty which is created as to matters of this kind which at all times will prevent the application of enterprise and the expenditure of capital. And it is proposed, if this Bill is left as it stands, to leave matters in such a state of uncertainty that no sane man in New South Wales would expend one penny piece on any waterworks in any part of that dry interior, and the Government itself would not be justified in expending one shilling piece of the revenue of the people of New South Wales on any system of water conservation or irrigation in regard to the waters which flow into those rivers which are the subject of controversy and conflict. The immediate result will be, until the Federal Parliament has legislated, the stoppage of all those necessary works which are required if our territory is to be developed and profitably and permanently occupied. I said before that so far as the Darling is concerned, and I say so far as the Murrumbidgee is concerned, Australia would be the gainer if every drop of the water were taken out of those rivers for irrigation and conservation, and the river beds were dry. I say it again, that it would pay New South Wales, it would pay the Commonwealth, to largely compensate the colonies which are injured by the loss of navigation rather than that there should be any impediment to the full and free development of our territory by the best use of its waters, and I have no fear whatever of the use which may be made of the argument. If the day is to come when the Darling and the Murrumbidgee are to be drained dry for irrigation purposes, Australia will be all the happier and all the better for that day having arrived. It is only a blind policy which, for the sake of keeping things as they are, will prevent us from using things better than they have been used in the past. The day is not far distant when railway carriage will be made so cheap as to compete absolutely and profitably with water carriage. The prices are coming nearer and nearer every day. If the day ever comes when the navigation of these rivers has to be destroyed to secure water conservation and irrigation the volume of traffic will be so great as to profitably employ lines of railways on each side of the river at very low rates. But we shall never have any large volume of traffic if, whenever the suggestion is made to divide the water for conservation and irrigation, the threat of the power of the Federal Government is held over the enterprise. I do not think it wise to detain honorable members at any great length in regard to this matter, because it has already been so fully debated. I think that the vote arrived at upon a previous occasion was arrived at under a grave misconception of the results which will follow from it. Honorable members voted for the amendment of the Attorney-General of Victoria because they thought that irrigation and water conservation would not be threatened; but under the Bill as it stands water conservation and irrigation are made subservient to the whim and will of the Federal Parliament and of those who get a majority there.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

The Attorney-General of Victoria voted with you.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I know that, but subsequently the proposal was made that where the rights of water conservation and of navigation came into conflict, the rights of water conservation should be subservient to those of navigation. On that proposal we who represent New South Wales were in a minority, and we were in a minority largely owing to the fact that a great many honorable members did not realize that, as the Bill stands, the enterprise of Australia in the direction of using water in accordance with modern science, to make land more productive, is absolutely fettered. No scheme for taking water out of any of our rivers can be entered upon without the permission of the Federal Parliament. Private capital is a timid thing at the best, and, under these conditions, will never be invested in waterworks, while public capital will be invested only at great risk. Consequently, a great impediment has been put in the way of the reasonable and progressive development of our territory. For that reason I ask honorable members to place the matter beyond all controversy and doubt by clearly enacting, in accordance with modern science and engineering, and in the cause of the progress of Australia, that navigation must take a subordinate place to water conservation and irrigation.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

From the beginning, I have been in favour of making irrigation and conservation the first charge, so to speak, upon the waters of our navigable rivers. I have always endeavoured to put it to the Convention, that by leaving the trade and commerce clause to operate without any qualification whatever we are running a very serious risk. If the American decisions are to be followed, the absolute certainty is that navigation will be regarded as the dominant purpose in regard to these rivers. I intend to support the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers), but I wish to propose an amendment in it which will carry it a little further. As it stands, it does not relate to irrigation, but merely to conservation. I do not think my honorable friend will have any objection if I make it refer also to irrigation. I therefore beg to move—

That the amendment be amended by the insertion, after the word "conservation," of the words "and to the use for irrigation purposes."

The proposed clause will require some qualification, but I understand that attention is paid to the verbiage of these provisions when the sense of the committee in regard to them has been obtained. If the committee is going to accept the modification of the trade and commerce clause with regard to conservation, I apprehend that there will be no objection to including irrigation. I do not intend to speak at any great length upon this subject. I wish, however, to state once again that it is of intense importance to Victoria that all her powers of irrigation shall not be curtailed in the way in which they may be curtailed if the amendment which has been proposed is not carried. I would like to refer, in a very few words, to the latest decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in regard to this matter, and it carries the question to the very verge. In 1896 the court gave a decision in this case-strange to say this decision was unanimous, a most remarkable thing for that court—placing the claims of navigation beyond all other claims. The decision was given in the case of Gibson v. The United States, 166 United States Reports, 269. The heading runs thus:-

Riparian ownership of navigable rivers subject to the

Mr. BARTON. -

How did the case arise?

Mr. ISAACS. -

In regard to an Act of Congress permitting of the construction of a dyke by the United States in a certain island of the Ohio River, whereby damage was done to Mr. Gibson. Chief Justice Fuller places the matter beyond all possibility of controversy. He says—

All navigable waters are under the control of the United States for the purpose of regulating and improving navigation, and although the title to the shore and submerged soil is in the various states, and individual owners under them, it is always subject to the servitude in respect of navigation created in favour of the Federal Government by the Constitution.

That was a statement, in as terse and vigorous language as it is possible to conceive, that everything must yield to navigation. The position is too important for Victoria and New South Wales to overlook. Therefore, I ask honorable members to reverse the decision which was come to upon a former occasion. I see no useful purpose to be served by reiterating the arguments which I used then, and which must be fresh in the minds of honorable members. I simply content myself with moving my amendment.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I would have been very glad indeed if we could have avoided raising this most difficult and troublesome matter again. I congratulate my honorable friends who preceded me on dealing with the question in a brief way, and I hope that I and others who follow will do the same. I have taken a great deal of trouble over this matter, in the hope that I might be able to see some way out of the difficulty without asking the Convention to reconsider the interests of water conservation. I have had the officers connected with the New South Wales system of rivers and water supplymen of vast experience, who have been in the public service of that colony for many years-in consultation with me frequently. All I can say is that, after having had the benefit of their advice, I find it absolutely impossible to leave this matter in the position in which it is left in the Bill. If the states rights of legislation in connexion with the improvement of their resources by the use of water were on a par with the power of the Commonwealth, I might be prepared to let the matter stand at that, but as this Constitution is framed the Commonwealth power of navigation is absolutely supreme and binding on all the states and on all the subjects, without the slightest opportunity of appeal or revision. Clause 7 makes the Commonwealth laws binding on the states and on their inhabitants, and another clause confirms the supremacy of the Commonwealth laws. The fact—the bald naked fact—remains that if this Constitution is passed as it stands, whilst the Commonwealth will be invested with the duty and the paramount power of carrying out that duty for water conservation and improving the interests of navigation, it will not own, in the slightest, duty of any kind to the states with reference to the power of water conservation. It would be infinitely better to hand over the power and duty of water conservation to the Commonwealth than to leave matters in their present condition. Then the Commonwealth would have an equal duty, an equal trust, and an equal power in dealing with the vital requirements of the states in connexion with the development of their resources. But, unfortunately, as matters stand, the enormous interests involved in the development of the resources of the colonies are entirely "out of sight in connexion with the administration of the powers of the Commonwealth as to navigation. We may be told that, notwithstanding this, those powers will be used in such a way as to protect the interests of the colonies in reference to water conservation. That statement is not a sufficient satisfaction. In the nature of the case if works involving large expenditures of money are constructed there must be some better guarantee than that which a state can give to any water conservation trust. Under the Commonwealth laws no state giving a water concession could give the slightest guarantee that that water concession would be observed. The supreme power may at any moment, for a good object we admit, destroy the utility of a work of conservation dependent on the waters of the rivers of the interior. While matters are left in that state every business man in the Convention must admit the condition is one which would be deplorable in the interests of Australian growth and development. These are large facts. What is the particular obstacle in the way of this obviously benign and true law of progress and development? What mysterious forces are arrayed against those large national interests? I deny that commerce is arrayed against them in any legitimate sense. Commerce is far more involved, and the interests and development of commerce are far more involved, in the interests of water conservation in connexion with those rivers than any section of the Commonwealth. But that is looking at commerce in a broad light; I regret to say very much that during this debate some of those who represent trading interests on the rivers of New South Wales have absolutely failed to think of anything else. They have absolutely failed to consider the vital duties and obligations of persons who occupy and administer the Government of that colony. Every remark I make is absolutely applicable to the sister colony of Victoria; indeed, my remarks apply with tenfold force to Victoria. From a list of works which I have before me I find Victoria has sunk enormous sums of money in costly works depending on those waters. We in New South Wales hope to do the same. Large and beneficent schemes are now approved by the highest scientific authority. On what basis can these enterprises be conducted if there is an external supreme power which, either by its officers or by a board of navigation, or by its own policy, may put the whole of those vested interests into a state of uncertainty and confusion? The learned Attorney-General of Victoria has cited a case which, if we did not know it, would show exactly the same sort of decision which must arise from the facts I have stated. If the Supreme Court of the Federal Commonwealth had to decide on the Bill as it stands, it would absolutely have no course open to it but to follow the law laid down in the case cited by Mr. Isaacs. The Commonwealth law must override the state law against the mightiest interests that might be at stake, and would override those interests without rhyme or reason. Just to show the peculiar state of those rivers in New South Wales, and how they differ almost from any other river we have any knowledge of, I have had a return prepared showing from the year 1883 down to 1887 the period in which those rivers were unnavigable. I will first take the River Murray. I find that at Albury during those fifteen years the river was unnavigable in each of those years for a period ranging from 18 to 44 weeks, the average period during which the river was unnavigable being 31 weeks in each year.

Mr. GORDON. -
Is that throughout the entire length of the river?

Mr. REID. -
No. I am taking different stations, beginning at Albury, where the river was unnavigable for 31 weeks out of every 52.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
For what draught of boats?

Mr. FRASER. -
There is only one class of boat.

Mr. REID. -
A sort of barge. There are no large steamers go up the river, which may be said to have been unnavigable for any kind of vessel.

Mr. FRASER. -
They are flat-bottomed boats.

Mr. REID. -
I will now take the river at Moama, which is a long way down from Albury. During the fifteen years the river there was unnavigable for certain periods ranging from four to twenty-five weeks, and the average was fourteen weeks in every year. At Euston, which is a very much greater distance down than Albury, the river during this period was unnavigable for a period of eleven weeks in each of the fifteen years. I should mention that, in the years 1887, 1890, 1891, 1894, and 1895, the river was navigable all the year round.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
At what particular point?

Mr. REID. -
At Euston.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
There are places lower down where there is a smaller depth and navigation is stopped, when there is plenty of water, at Euston.
Mr. REID. -

That is understood; the river varies along the entire length. I am taking recognised points, and saying that at Euston the river for five years was navigable all the year round. Now, take the Murrumbidgee at Hay, which is a long way down, a point at which navigation is now common. I think it is the chief port of the Murrumbidgee. The return is for a period, not of fifteen years but of thirteen years, from 1885 to 1897. During those thirteen years the river was unnavigable on an average 22 weeks in each year. That is without a single work of water conservation on its banks; and so far as the Murray is concerned, without a single work in New South Wales of water conservation. Now, I come to the Darling River at Walgett. During the same thirteen years the average is eighteen weeks in each of those years when the river was not navigable. Then at Bourke the average was 23 weeks during which the river was unnavigable in each year. At Wentworth, hundreds of miles down, at the junction, out of a whole period of fifteen years, between 1883 and 1897, there was an average of thirteen weeks in each of those fifteen years during which the river, even at Wentworth, was unnavigable. In some of these years, I should mention again, the river was navigable without interruption. Now, dealing with these rivers, upon which large works of water conservation have not yet been started, I think honorable members, as men of business, throwing aside particular colonies, must see that in the case of rivers of such enormous length, whose facts are these facts, the question of water conservation, if it is to assume any importance, must interfere with navigation. It must do so; even without any of these works navigation stops for weeks and weeks in every year. Now, with the precarious supply of water for navigation, how infinitely more precarious is the supply for water conservation, if there is a superior power which has only to do with navigation, and has no duty no trust to observe with reference to irrigation! I do not want to follow this matter further, because honorable members have discussed the matter fully, and they have heard it discussed over and over again. But what I should like to say is this, that respecting water conservation, and showing some regard for it, and putting it upon some basis of security, will in no sense impair the legitimate interests of commerce. For instance, take the Murrumbidgee. During the busy part of the year they never have any trouble with the water. The water comes down from somewhere about the end of June up to about the end of November. Every year there is plenty of water during the busy commercial season. Every clip on the Murrumbidgee is shorn then, and long before then.

Mr. FRASER. -

At the end of October.
Mr. REID. -

So that practically the great system of commerce along the Murrumbidgee is secured by nature, by the fact that during the time it is wanted for commercial purposes there is plenty of water. Nature has provided for navigation at the right time of the year. Why should not this Convention pay some sort of regard to the vital interests at stake if this country is ever to become a great nation? What possible way of making Australia a great nation is to be found unless these vast fertile dry plains of its interior are allied with the energies which water produces? This is the great duty and destiny of Australia, and navigation is practically safe, because, let me say that navigation is just as great an interest to the persons and a greater interest to the persons in each colony who live along the banks of the rivers than it possibly can be to anybody else. Who can have a stronger interest in the river being improved for navigation than the persons whose property and whose stores have to be conveyed by that navigation? So that navigation has friends all along the line. But the business consideration comes in, and our answer to those who say that water conservation is safe is this: That whilst we hope this is a thing that will be regarded by the Commonwealth legitimately and intelligently, people will not sink millions of money on that security; people will not engage in large schemes of water conservation if they know that any day in the year somebody superior to them and beyond their control can destroy the fruits of their industry. Few people will invest large sums upon that security, and it is because we want some sort of security for these future schemes, which must take place, that I ask this Convention in some way or other to recognise the necessity of protecting these great developments of the future in connexion with these extraordinary rivers. My honorable friend (Mr. Carruthers) has put his proposition in a form which I shall be glad to see carried. I will vote for it; but if the Convention will not support that proposition—in plain terms, making the interests of water conservation superior to navigation, which I believe—I will make another attempt to introduce my words in the place of those of Mr. Carruthers. They do not go quite so far as his do, and if his amendment is not carried I will certainly move mine.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I am not going, like some speakers, to repeat the arguments used before, because I think we ought to arrive at finality, and not make the same speech twice, at all events, in the same Convention. As far as this question is concerned, I say I thought we had arrived at an agreement—at a simple method of submission; not the agreement we wanted, not the contention we have been striving for so long, but that by simply trusting the trade and commerce clause, and hoping that they would evolve, through judicial decisions, something that is fair and right, we trusted ourselves to the Federal Constitution of Australia. As far as our own colony is concerned, we undoubtedly have been the subjects of much animadversion. We have been considered to have thrown away, to a large extent, natural rights in order to produce some friendly agreement with respect to federation, but we have been in no way complimented in any direction for the conclusion that some of us assisted in obtaining.

Mr. ISAACS. -
How did you possibly give up anything?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I say that when I, as one of the South Australian delegates who has taken a great interest for many years in this question, who has studied it from an international stand-point, and, I hope, from a colonial stand-point as well-

Mr. HIGGINS. -
From an Australian stand-point?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I mean Australian, and when I say colonial I do not refer to one colony. When I voted as I did it was in the belief that the trade and commerce clause would probably be sufficient to give to everybody all that was required, and to give my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) all that he requires. It appeared to me that under the trade and commerce provision, before it would be competent for the Federal High Court to interfere with any use by New South Wales of any of the waters of the rivers running through her territory, it would have to be shown that it was injurious to trade and commerce. That might be by the destruction of navigation or of other causes. Injury to trade and commerce might be done by protecting navigation when trade and commerce would be better assisted by other methods of government. It appeared to me that the American decisions for the most part, and nearly the whole of the European treaties, have practically no bearing on the question at all. As far as the European treaties were concerned, they arose in regard to streams which were navigable, and could not be rendered unnavigable, in countries that had no end of water for irrigation purposes, and where the whole question was the question of navigability.

Mr. FRASER. -
But irrigation is not so important there as here.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
That is what I am endeavouring to point out. In the countries from which the precedents had been gathered—and referring first to the European countries—the treaties there made were only founded on what is fair and right, that it was not a friendly act to use the water of a stream in such a way as to injure the freedom of your neighbour to the legitimate use of the stream in the same way. But there was no question of irrigation there. They had any amount of water for that purpose; they only dealt with what was a friendly and a reasonable thing as between persons having an equal right to use the gifts of God. They decided these matters according to their own local surroundings and local requirements. And so with the great rivers in America the same course was followed in deciding what navigability was. They said that a river had to be kept navigable, and that it was an unfriendly act between states, as it would be between individuals in a state, to use the rivers in such a way as to injure the enjoyment of them by others. But when they came to remote parts, where irrigation became of superior importance to navigation, then the rule that was acted upon was the same—that what was a friendly thing to do was that you should not injure your neighbour; but that rule was applied in an absolutely different way. That was why I voted for allowing the general words, which I thought every one agreed upon until I heard the remark by the leader of the Opposition in New South Wales (Mr. Lyne), and which I thought the Premier of New South Wales (Mr. Reid) fairly agreed to.

Mr. Reid. -

It is too bad to say that, when, as a matter of fact, I said distinctly that I could not be definitely sure whether I could agree to them.

Sir John Downer. -

I have heard the right honorable gentleman say different things on the subject.

Mr. Reid. -

It is a notorious fact, and I think my statement to that effect might be accepted by the pattern of chivalry in this chamber.

Sir John Downer. -

I do not profess to be a pattern of chivalry.

Mr. Reid. -

You do not act like one sometimes.

Sir John Downer. -

There are times when one has to say what one thinks about matters, and one has to speak the truth always.

Mr. Reid. -

Then speak the truth now, and do me justice.

Sir John Downer. -
Then I must say that I have heard the right honorable gentleman say that he was willing to take the clause as it stood.

Mr. REID. -

I distinctly said that I could not definitely state whether I could accept the provision as it stood, but I said I would make inquiries, and if I could possibly fall in with the suggestion I would; but I reserved to myself the right to re-open the subject if I found that I could not accept the arrangement. When Sir Edward Braddon said that the matter could be settled in five minutes if I would give an undertaking, I replied that I could not do so.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

We had a committee—a special committee of the Convention—to consider this question, and unquestionably I understood the right honorable gentleman, and did not misunderstand him, as saying that he was willing to take things as they stood.

Mr. REID. -

It is not so. These things are not in Hansard. I appeal to you, sir, if you did not hear me make the statements I have just referred to in this chamber?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

But we had a special committee, which was a committee appointed by the Convention.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I rise to a point of order. I submit that it is altogether unimportant as bearing upon this question what Mr. Reid said, and that Sir John Downer is not in order in discussing that matter. The question is what is a wise thing for us to do under the circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It would be far better if the honorable member in possession of the Chair were to confine himself to the amendment under discussion.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I shall accept your suggestion, sir. I was going to refer to what took place in the course of the proceedings of the committee to which I have alluded, and which was a quasi-public body, although we had no reporters there. When we come to the words used publicly in the Convention by the way of interjection, we have had statements by the Premier of New South Wales that he was not prepared to accept this settlement. In fact, the whole fight had been over whether South Australia would be satisfied with accepting this. The question had not been whether New South Wales would be satisfied or whether Victoria would be satisfied; the whole question was whether South Australia would be satisfied. South Australia complained about and wanted some rights over the Darling, but those claims were abandoned. South Australia wanted the preservation of the navigability of the rivers throughout the Commonwealth. That claim was abandoned. The whole substantial conflict between our colony and New South Wales upon this subject throughout the discussion-leaving out occasional interjections, which are, however, comfortable things to be able to fall back upon-was whether there should be some special provision inserted giving South Australia a right over the Darling. That was the substantial power. But leaving that, and dealing with the matter with which there has been no discussion at all, the right honorable gentleman asks, in the speech he has just made, is navigation so important? I say that if navigation is not so important, then the Parliament of the Commonwealth will be able to deal with it; and if it is for the benefit of the nation, and in the interests of equality of trade between the states, the court will support it. Navigation is most important, says my right honorable friend, to the people along the river, and most important to persons holding property in New South Wales. That may or may not be so. It may be that it will be more convenient and that is the whole test—for many people to use the waters of the Murray so as to destroy its practical use to South Australia for purposes of navigation. I expect that if New South Wales did so she would do it for the best possible motive—for assisting herself, and not bothering about any one else. I attribute great business ability and utter selfishness to New South Wales—no more and no less. I know enough of the people of New South Wales to convince me that they would never attempt to do a thing merely to annoy their neighbours. I have a higher opinion of the people of New South Wales than some of their own representatives have. My opinion of them is that they have a high federal sense of what is right and just. They have been the leaders in the movement for federation, and I refuse to believe that they would, from motives of selfishness, assist to destroy the movement which for years they have been trying to build up.

Mr. FRASER. -

We are all selfish, then.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

It is well that we should be to a large extent selfish, because if we do not look after ourselves we shall find great difficulty in getting somebody else to do it for us.

Mr. LYNE. -

South Australians have got a pretty good share of it, too.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
We have only asked, here and in Adelaide, that, as the river that is now in question is undoubtedly a navigable stream, you should give us the same rights as are always conceded by treaty between hostile nations. It is not an unfair thing for us to say to New South Wales, in respect of this common property-"If you want to continue friends and brothers, as you are now, at events, do not be more unfriendly to us than a foreign nation at our door would be." If there was a provision inserted in this Bill preserving the navigability of the navigable rivers of Australia, my difficulties would have been over; but New South Wales pointed out that the trade and commerce clauses were all that America had to preserve their rivers, and yielding partly to superior force-

Mr. REID. -
Yielding because you could not help it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
And partly, I admit, to the consideration that I did not think it made very much difference, assented to the course the New South Wales representatives desired the Convention to take. The right honorable member will see that I am perfectly frank, as he accused me of being the other day; in fact, I am always the same. Now, they have been fighting and saying they want this amendment, which we would not concede to them.
Having previously got what they said they wanted, they did what they always do-as far as my experience of them throughout this Convention goes-they asked for something else.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
They are regular Oliver Twists-they ask for more.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Yes, they do ask for something more. They ask to have conceded to them by an Imperial Act of Parliament what the whole qua

Mr. REID. -
Nothing of the kind; the courts are open to both states after this Bill becomes law.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
After you have put in the Commonwealth Bill a provision to the effect that you can do what you like with the river.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Yes; and what is the use of our going to the courts if we have not got any rights left?

Mr. REID. -
We do not seek to take away any of your rights.

Mr. FRASER. -
South Australia has no rights, so that after all she will only be in the same position then as she is now.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Then the object of this Constitution is to keep up a war between two states.

Mr. REID. -

No, there has never been any war; we have snagged the river for your benefit at our own expense.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

The right honorable gentleman said that they had never interfered with our rights, but I replied that they had threatened to do so, and they now say that they want the right to do so if they please.

Mr. REID. -

No, we only want the right to our own waters.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

They want to secure the position they take up by means of a provision in this Bill which is to establish federation, and that is a monstrous thing. Why should Mr. Reid distrust the Federation which he seeks to establish?

Mr. FRASER. -

Why should you put the cart before the horse?

Mr. REID. -

Hear, hear; that settles you.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

If Mr. Fraser will explain what he means to me privately, I will devote an hour or two to trying to understand it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Where is the horse and where is the cart?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

No doubt Mr. Fraser's interjection is all right, because Mr. Reid applauded it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Mr. Fraser voted with you before.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Then it must have been a mistake.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

As I cannot follow Mr. Fraser's interjections just now, I will go on with my remarks in my own way. We first decided this question on the ground of international rights. Those rights we have practically abandoned. We then wanted specific provisions as to navigation over certain limited portions of rivers. That was opposed, and we were defeated, and we had in the end nothing left but the bare words "trade and commerce," and nothing to hope for from those words except that the High Court would follow the analogy of the American decisions, and come to conclusions similar to those of the American courts. Was ever such perfect absolute trust and confidence displayed before? Was there ever such an abandonment of international rights on specific matters that might fairly have been specified in a Federal Constitution, that was to prevent appeals to American or other courts, and so to begin a great nation with a good and sound mutual understanding? Mr. Reid and other members from New South Wales have told us from time to time that there is nothing in all this, that it is all child's play, that it makes not the slightest difference whether this amendment is in the Constitution or not. They say they will never interfere with the navigability of the rivers, and yet they have been fighting about this matter as if they meant to interfere with the navigability of rivers. They have told us they will never want any more water from those rivers than is necessary for the purposes of irrigation, but we must look at the past. They admit they have bounced us a bit.

Mr. REID. -

Never a little bit.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

But they say that, after all, their bouncing is harmless. They certainly did bounce us in their own colony, and they treated us discourteously in ours.

Mr. REID. -

Not so; we never took any notice of you.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Is not that discourtesy?

Mr. REID. -

It is best never to take any notice of naughty little boys.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

That is just the attitude of the honorable member in this Convention. He treats other honorable members who differ from him as naughty little boys; but let me assure him that he will never get an understanding with such a place as Victoria on this question, much less with New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -

You cannot divide New South Wales and Victoria on this question.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I am not going to attempt to create division of any kind. The honorable member tried to attract Victoria by appealing to the selfishness of this colony, but I do not think he was very successful. I think the representatives of Victoria understood what it all meant, and that he left them pretty well as they were. But without going into the intentions of Mr.
Reid, let me point out that after we spent three or four days over this important question, and every argument that could be used had been used, and a practical assent—in spite of Mr. Reid's disclaimer, a practical agreement—had been come to on the part of the senior colony that if this were done they would be satisfied, Mr. Reid protested, on behalf of New South Wales, that this ought not to be done, and finally carried his own way by a majority. I ask the Convention is it too much to re-open the question now and insert in the Bill a provision which will obviate a continuance of the old troubles and difficulties—troubles and difficulties which the gentlemen who oppose this amendment say never can happen, or which will never come to anything? I can only say that I hope and believe that the Convention will adhere to the position it has taken now, believing that if they cannot put a well-defined federal scheme into this Bill dealing with rivers whose course extends through more than one state they will, at all events, not insert a provision that will affirm the right of any colony to destroy every Inter-State right as between colonies in rivers which are navigable, and which run through more than one state, and expect this Constitution to be accepted on a basis that would not be endured even between nations that were not friends. I heard what my right honorable friend said as to the statistics he has worked up, and as to the dates.

Mr. REID. -
I did not work them up; they were worked up by my officers.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I am sure the right honorable gentleman did not do it. I refer to the statistics which have been obtained, and which show that the rivers are not always navigable. They are often non-navigable, but still they are distinctly navigable in the view of international jurists. They are navigable for a sufficient length of time to come within the rules they have laid down, and I simply now—in the face of my own colony condemning the South Australian delegates for having departed from their original determination to have an express declaration and provision in the Bill to preserve their right to the reasonable use of the waters of the Murray, and for having been satisfied to trust to the trade and commerce clause-appeal to the Convention not to further derogate, on the motion of New South Wales, from that which New South Wales has all along been contending for, and which, having obtained, she now wishes to supplement.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
As a personal explanation, I again say, and I hope the honorable member will accept my assurance, that the honorable member's statement as to my having expressed my readiness to accept the trade and commerce clause as a satisfactory solution of the question is absolutely incorrect, as every member of the committee knows, with the exception of himself. It is also absolutely incorrect that in this Convention I ever made any statements of the kind to which the honorable member has referred. I distinctly said, and I think it is in the records, that I reserved to myself the right to re-open this important question if, after inquiry, I found it necessary to do so.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

While giving every weight to the explanation the Right Hon. Mr. Reid has made, I certainly understood from the right honorable gentleman, and from the whole of the delegation from New South Wales, that they would accept the provision in the trade and commerce clause governing navigation as a satisfactory solution of this question. I will quote what Mr. Reid said himself, as reported on page 83 of our Hansard. He stated-

That is the interpretation of the Hon. Mr. Barton as to the effect of the trade and commerce clause.

a much greater power over us in respect to some of these rivers than perhaps some of us thought. But I say in regard to the federal power-the fair and honest power which lies at the heart of federation-I do not care what its consequences are, I accept them.

Mr. REID. -

Hear, hear; that is, the regulation of commerce over all our rivers.

Mr. GORDON. -

The honorable gentleman also said-

Therefore I cannot be accused-neither I nor my honorable friends from New South Wales-of disputing this proposition: That for every inch of water navigable in New South Wales, and capable of being used for intercolonial trade, we give up any pretence to exclusive control.

Mr. REID. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. GORDON. -

What does that mean?

Mr. REID. -

The control of navigation.

Mr. GORDON. -

Why did the right honorable gentleman give the measure of the water? If the English language means anything-and there is no better judge of the English language than the right honorable gentleman-that sentence implies that the right honorable gentleman, for himself and his friends, is willing to give the Federal Parliament the right to control all these waters for navigation.

Mr. REID. -
And give no water conservation altogether. That is nonsense.

Mr. GORDON. -
Certainly. The right honorable gentleman knew what he was talking about. He was answering the argument that there should be some control over the water for irrigation and navigation, and he said:"For irrigation I object; for navigation, to every inch of the waters in New South Wales that is navigable, New South Wales has no exclusive right."

Mr. REID. -
You are quite right. I said for irrigation I object; for commerce assent.

Mr. GORDON. -
Now my right honorable friend seeks to make irrigation superior to navigation, and he is executing a complete right-about-face on this subject.

Mr. REID. -
No, two different things.

Mr. GORDON. -
I think I understand the simple words of the English language and the right honorable gentleman said:"We object to any control over irrigation, but we give the Federal Parliament, whatever the consequences, control over every inch of the water in these rivers which is capable of being used for navigation."

Mr. REID. -
I would do that now.

Mr. GORDON. -
Then I do not understand the right honorable member, because he says that if the water is required for irrigation, navigation must go by the board. Of course, it would be unfair to pin any member of the Convention to the opinion he expressed at any one period of the discussion. I suppose we have all varied a little, and if the honorable member would admit that he had executed a right-about-face everybody would agree that he had simply exercised the right to change his opinion.

Mr. REID. -
It is a wonder you attacked me so bitterly if I gave you all you wanted.

Mr. GORDON. -
The right honorable gentleman knows I would not attack him. I am only putting in simple language the two different positions he has taken up in the matter. But to come right to the heart of Mr. Carruthers' proposition, when I opened the debate on the rivers question I hinted that possibly there should be a dominance of irrigation over navigation. That was more than hinted, it was expressed, and if the Convention after hearing the arguments on the question has to concede that point—and many honorable members are apparently prepared to concede it—it must not be put in the form suggested by Mr. Carruthers. The honorable member's proposition would mean that any one colony could pump a river dry to the detriment of those below.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It must be irrigation for Australia.

Mr. GORDON. -
Exactly; and when Mr. Reid, in the rhetoric which we all admire, talks about Australian development, and the evolution of the destinies of Australia, that surely does not mean the development of New South Wales to the detriment of the other colonies. If we are to concede the dominance of irrigation over navigation, let it be subject to this qualification, that the water shall be justly used by those colonies through which the rivers or their continuations run. It cannot be disputed that if Mr. Carruthers' amendment is carried in the form in which it is proposed, New South Wales can pump the rivers above Victoria dry, and Victoria in its turn can take every drop of water which comes to it, and leave South Australia, through which the river, if allowed to flow, would run to the sea absolutely without a drop of water. Would such a provision as that carry out the destinies of Australia?

Mr. REID. -
They are not all interested in your wool barges.

Mr. GORDON. -
No, but there is such a thing as justice. This is a phrase which the right honorable gentleman himself used—"To secure to all the colonies as fair and equal a use of our natural opportunities as we have ourselves." That is all we are asking. Would we have a fair and equal use of the natural opportunities afforded by our great rivers if New South Wales cut a ditch and turned the whole of the waters of the rivers above Victoria for three months of the year into one of the dry lakes of New South Wales, which is quite possible. Would it be a fair and natural use of our opportunities if Victoria did the same thing as to such of the waters which come down to her? That would be a most unjust and unequal appropriation of these natural opportunities. I will vote against the amendment of Mr. Carruthers, on the understanding which I certainly had with many other honorable members that we were going to rely on the trade and commerce clause. But if we are going to turn the Federal Parliament into an irrigation trust, because that is what it means—
Mr. HIGGINS. -
No, the Federal Parliament will have no control.

Mr. GORDON. -
If the amendment is carried it will have some control over irrigation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
No; only for the purpose of New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -
No. It is general in its application. It is not applied only to New South Wales.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Read the words.

Mr. REID. -
It does not mention New South Wales.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It says-"To meet the requirements of such state and its people."

Mr. REID. -
Any state.

Mr. GORDON. -
My right honorable friend will not dispute that it leaves to New South Wales the right to take every drop of water out of these rivers within her own boundaries. Can my right honorable friend say that that is not the meaning of this clause?

Mr. TRENWITH. -
And never let it go any further.

Mr. GORDON. -
And never let it go any further. That may possibly appeal to the selfishness of people in the various colonies; but will it appeal to common sense, to natural justice? It is a reversal of that natural justice which underlies the apportionment of waters under the provisions of the common law. Surely the honorable gentleman cannot seriously contend that they should embody in the Constitution a proposition which is a reversal of all the dicta of that natural justice which governs communities and really keeps the world sweet. It cannot be that they wish to embody in the Constitution a proposal of that kind. Therefore, if we are going to formally concede the predominance of irrigation over navigation, and if we are going to carry any proposition to that effect, it must have this qualification— and I am now using the words, as nearly as I can remember them, of an amendment which Mr. Isaacs formerly introduced-"on a basis of distribution of such waters just to the several states through which the rivers by themselves or by their continuations run."

Mr. ISAACS. -
Who is to determine the justice?

Mr. GORDON. -

Only somebody sitting as a jury. We cannot absolutely define what is going to happen under all the provisions of the Constitution. We must leave something to the sanction of justice which will animate the Federal Parliament and the subsidiary bodies it will appoint to consider these matters. I see the difficulties, of course, but the difficulty of arriving at an idea of what this will lead to is nothing as compared with the difficulty of conceiving what will happen, if the clause is carried without any qualification. There then we will embody in the Constitution the possibility of an absolute injustice, and crystallize a selfishness unknown to any civilized nation. I think it will be a disgrace and a blot to the whole Constitution if that proposition is carried without amendment, and, therefore, I move, although I shall vote against the clause even if it is amended-

That the clause be amended by the addition of the following words:-"upon a basis of distribution of such waters just to the several states through which the rivers by themselves or by their continuations run."

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I do not propose to enter into the question whether individual members have altered the view they have taken on this question during the progress of our debates, but certainly trust that there has been on this, as on many other questions, a gradual awakening to the seriousness of the issue with which we are dealing, and the insufficiency of the proposals which were, in the first instance, in all good faith, submitted and agreed to in the endeavour to meet the emergency. When the question as to the control of rivers was first mooted, the various interests which the different colonies had in the use of these waters were but vaguely appreciated and ill-defined. One of the many educational results of the debates has been that a clearer view has gradually dawned on the Convention of the real magnitude of the interests with which they are dealing, than which, from a material sense or from the point of view of the producer, none is greater. It involves a question of inestimable importance to the whole of the interior of Australia, of which the rivers are veritably the life-blood. As that life-blood is dealt with so will be the future possibilities of its development limited or extended. Under these circumstances, sir, though careful to avoid any repetition of the remarks already made, I do not scruple to ask the attention of the committee for a few moments, in the endeavour to reply to one or two arguments which have been urged, notably by Sir John Downer, whom I regret not to see present. He is so courteous and conciliatory, and at the same time unyielding, that, while be is difficult to answer, his charming demeanour makes it painful to disagree with him and yet disagree with him one must, if one considers even the basis which he himself offers for the opinion he enjoys. He says he claims no more than that there should be embodied in the Constitution a proviso that the united colonies of Australia shall in the future in this connexion deal with each other on the same basis as hostile nations have agreed to deal with each other in Europe and elsewhere, on a fair and friendly footing. Now, as a matter of fact, he will be unable to produce for the consideration of the Convention a single illustration from the Continent of Europe where a river used for the purposes of irrigation has ever formed the subject of international questions. The only irrigating rivers in Europe are those of France, Italy, and Spain, which flow wholly within the territory of the states concerned, and have as yet afforded no opportunity for any difference of opinion on this point. The rivers in regard to which international agreements have been made, and of which the River Danube is an excellent example, are not rivers used for the purposes of irrigation, even to an infinitesimal extent.
As a matter of fact, the only river, so far as we know, in which different states are interested, and in which this question has assumed any importance, is the River Rio Grande, dividing Mexico from the United States of America, and there the Mexican Republic, so far as I know, has never been able to obtain any official recognition of its claims from the United States Government, although that river, in many portions, has been almost entirely deprived of its water at certain seasons of the year. When the honorable and learned member, therefore, points us to these old-world precedents, and even to new-world precedents, he will find himself unable to discover a single fact which tells in his favour.

Consequently, while admitting with him that the fair and friendly spirit is the only spirit in which a Federal Union should regard such problems, it is to be noted that in no case has the extraordinary interest which the use of irrigation attaches to the water of any particular stream raised the question between nations. Cordially supporting the amendment of the Attorney-General of Victoria, I feel able to regard the question from the Victorian point of view somewhat less anxiously than he does, for the Victorian works are existing works-and the rights of existing works at all events ought to be preserved under any federal compact. Even if those rights be not preserved, the fact remains that the only river in Victoria from which we draw any quantity of water, and which is ever available for navigation, is the Goulburn River, which practically has never been used, and is never likely to be used, for navigation purposes. Under these circumstances, we,
in Victoria, though we may form a decided opinion on the principle involved, can afford to regard this question comparatively free from the claims of self-interest. Repeating in a single sentence the remarks as to physical conditions which I have previously made, and upon which this solution of the problem entirely depends, I will say a word or two on the general merits of this question. It is quite possible that further researches and a combination of the researches already begun will enable the Federal Government to deal with the Murray and its tributaries in a way which will prove that the present conflict between navigation and irrigation is unreal, and that all the navigation which it is possible for these rivers to afford may continue to be afforded, together with the greatest possible use of their waters for the purposes of irrigation. During a previous sitting I gave reasons for the belief that this is a very probable solution of the difficulty. Under these circumstances it may be said that we are fighting a shadow. But that is not so, inasmuch as the Constitution, as it stands, governs the future of Federal Australia, not only by its express statements, but also by its implications. This Constitution expressly states that the regulation of trade and commerce is to be referred to the Government of the Commonwealth, and the case of Gibson v. The United States, which was quoted by the Attorney-General of Victoria, places it beyond question that the trade and commerce provisions, without the addition of a single word, give the Commonwealth the most complete control of all the streams that may be navigable, and even give the power to improve them for the purposes of navigation, to a degree which might be wholly destructive of the irrigation interests of the country. Taking into account the implication, which we are necessarily obliged to weigh, from that case and from other cases cited by Chief Justice Fuller in giving his decision, we have to consider the matter not only as a question affecting New South Wales and South Australia. Nevertheless it tends to assume that aspect. While the representatives of South Australia can afford to appear here as the advocates of unrestricted navigation, if they obtained the water of these inland rivers under that plea, they would, of course, be able to use them for both navigation and irrigation. South Australia is in this regard fortunately situated on the lower part of the Murray. She will be able to use the waters of these inland streams for irrigation, the use of which for that very purpose may have been denied to the people of Victoria and New South Wales, on the plea of the necessities of navigation.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Cannot the people higher up object if the rivers there are made unnavigable by the use of the water lower down?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The rivers cannot be made unnavigable by the use of the water lower down. What South Australia is struggling, for in this connexion is the water. She desires to get this water, not merely for purposes of navigation, but also for purposes of irrigation. This makes, from another aspect, the strength of her case. As has been excellently stated by a Lombard writer, to sacrifice irrigation to navigation is to spend four sovereigns for the purpose of seeing a halfpenny float. I have already guarded myself against any exaggerated anticipations of the particular use of these waters in the interior. I have used the word "irrigation" in its widest sense. In my opinion, these streams in the interior of New South Wales will be used to provide water for men, women, and children, and for the tens of thousands of cattle and the millions of sheep that the land will sustain. I include this use under the term "irrigation." Irrigation in the largest sense includes the use of water for domestic and stock purposes. Without the right to use the water for irrigation, the whole of the interior, of which the Murray is the chief artery, would be deprived of its chief value. Even those who contend most eagerly for the rights of navigation, or for the preservation of the opportunity to navigate, must realize that navigation is not an interest to be measured for a moment against the use of water for domestic and stock purposes, or against that irrigation which so enormously increases the production of land and multiplies the population which it is able to bear. If this be so, is it not possible for us, realizing the situation, to insert a provision in the Constitution, not in the words, perhaps, proposed by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Gordon), but in similar words, which will be advantageous to all parties concerned? I trust that I am not behind other honorable members in the confidence with which I am looking forward to the decisions of the Federal Parliament. The Federal Parliament will take a broad view, and will endeavour to consider all interests to the best of its ability; but it will be tramelled by the fact that this Convention has chosen to pass a Constitution in which the words "irrigation" or "domestic and stock supple," do not occur. If you go past the Federal Parliament to that exalted judicial body which will interpret its legislation; and whose decision will be binding upon the whole community, you will see that it must attach supreme importance to the fact that, while every care is taken to protect navigation and trade and commerce, so far as they can be served by transit upon the waters of these rivers, not a single mention is made of conservation or irrigation, which ought to be the supreme interest of the Convention as custodian of the rights of Australia.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Would you have any objection to the substitution of the word "improvement" for "utilization" in the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers)? That might get over the American decisions.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

On the spur of the moment I will not say more than that might be so. Probably the representatives of New South Wales might be satisfied with language that would not go so far as the language employed by either the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) or by the Premier of that colony.

[P.1973] starts here

It seems to me that at the present time the Constitution is open to the grave and serious objections which they have raised against it because it ignores these interests.

Mr. HOLDER. -

They are state matters. We leave them to the states.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

How can we leave them to the states when we have deprived the states of all their power by making navigation the chief interest, and making its claims paramount?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is a mistake. The claims of navigation are not made paramount.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The claims of trade and commerce are made paramount, and an additional clause conveys power over navigation and shipping. The provision in regard to navigation, unless restricted as it is not now restricted, would include the navigation of the rivers of the interior, as well as navigation upon the sea-board. Putting these clauses together, it seems to me that the Constitution makes navigation, as contrasted with irrigation, stock, and domestic supplies, of supreme and paramount importance. But even if I am incorrect in this belief, the Constitution allows foot-hold for such an opinion, and creates a doubt such as we should not allow to exist. Let us determine clearly what all these and other provisions mean. If we mean that the interests of the whole of the interior in these waters are to be confined to the interests of the people in having their goods carried on barges on the rivers, let us say so; but no more outrageous statement-no statement more out of harmony with the facts and needs of the situation-could possibly be made. If, on the other hand, we mean, what the Hon. Mr. Carruthers means, to give the states absolute control in this matter of the diversion of the water, and the Commonwealth no control, so that any state might divert the whole of the water in its territory without considering its neighbours-if we mean that which is an anti-federal proposal-let us say that we mean it. If we mean neither of those things—if we mean that the Federal Government is to take fairly into its consideration the questions of stock and domestic supply and of irrigation, and consider these side by side with the question of navigation, and decide for that interest which is of the greatest importance to Australia regarded as a whole, and having done so, is to leave all the states the freest possible hand in the development of their resources of land or water, let us say so. The remarks of the Hon. Mr. Gordon and the interjection of the Hon. Mr. Glynn induce me to hope that the representatives of South Australia have the latter object in view, and that it may be possible to frame words which may be acceptable all round the Convention on this vexed question. It is a vexed question, and is certain to remain one. I know nothing which will furnish to the opponents of federation more weapons than the implications from American decisions under the present terms of our Federal Constitution, having in view our deliberate refusal to place qualifying words in the Constitution. It might even be contended that the water supply of Melbourne, which is partly drawn from a tributary of the Goulburn across the Plenty Ranges, ought to be cut off, in order that this unknown and insignificant tributary should be allowed to flow intact, because it might be wished to sail a boat once a year from the Murray a few miles up into the interior. Push the doctrine to its absurd and extravagant length, and that might be urged. It is in cases of this absurd kind that the opponents of federation will find most of their weapons.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That would not be a substantial interference with navigation.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I do not think it would. But I expect arguments of that sort from the platform so long as we neglect to put in the forefront in plain English what we mean. That we have not done.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Why not put in plain English that the Federal Parliament may adjust rights?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Personally, that is a proposal I am prepared to consider.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That was proposed a few weeks ago.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I am not at present affected by whether that was proposed or not. The Convention has reached another stage. I believe in the evolution of the Convention and our gradual education on these issues; on no issue is it more necessary than on this. It is an issue of the first importance, which we cannot afford to pass by or ignore. Our only safety lies in facing it frankly and fully, and putting in the Constitution in plain words what are the respective rights of the states and of the Commonwealth in regard to the rivers of Australia. Having regard to the fact that I have already addressed the Convention on this issue at an earlier stage, I have sufficiently discharged my responsibility in the matter, and support the amendment of my colleague (the Attorney-General for Victoria), and even the proposal which has been made by Mr. Carruthers and Mr. Reid, as preferable to the Constitution as it at present exists. At the same time, I frankly admit that if any further amendment is moved which shall define the rights of the states and of the Federal Government in this matter on lines of equity and justice,
I shall support that in preference to either.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Would you support Mr. Gordon's amendment?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I do not think Mr. Gordon's amendment is sufficient. It goes too far, and is not sufficiently explicit, an it ought not to be tacked on to that of Mr.
Carruthers. Had I drawn the amendment myself it would have been framed in altogether different language from that adopted.

Mr. GORDON. -
I expressly said I did not pin myself to the words, so long as-the idea was there.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I understand that. The, attitude of my friend (Mr. Holder) is distinctly encouraging. I have made it plain that what I desire is a clear definition in the matter of the respective rights of the state and the Commonwealth. If it be not possible to express them all in a definition, I, for one, would be perfectly content to rely on the equity and justice of the future Federal Parliament.

[The Chairman left the chair at six minutes past five o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at half-past seven o'clock p.m.]

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -
It seems to me that the amendment proposed by the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) is so distinctly anti-federal that this Convention ought not to adopt it. The amendment would give the power to any state to absolutely stop the flow of a river within its territory, and to use the whole of the water for its purposes or the purposes of its people. Clearly that would be giving away a right that states now have, or a power to dispute the power of states to, use rivers that flow into their country. It cannot be expected that people of a state who may be prejudicially influenced in this way would vote for a Federal Constitution which contained such a provision. I respectfully submit that to adopt this amendment, if there was nothing else objectionable in the Constitution, would be fatal in at least one of the colonies to its adoption by the people. The more we discuss this matter, the more I am convinced that it is impossible to define, and that it is unwise to try to define, absolutely what shall be done in connexion with the rivers of the Commonwealth by this Convention. All that we ought to aim at is to provide that the most perfect tribunal shall have control of the Commonwealth rivers, because, if we pass this clause instead of framing a Constitution, we shall be legislating with reference to the use of the waters. Now, clearly, that is not one of our functions. It is no part of our duty to say definitely and for all time what interests shall be superior or what interests subservient in connexion with the water-ways and the water-rights of this continent. We have a right to assume that a Parliament elected by the people of the Commonwealth will know best from time to time what should be done with the people's property in its rivers, and we should aim, as it seems to me, at adopting some clause in this connexion that will leave the hands of the Federal Parliament free to legislate as circumstances arise in the interests, not of a state, but of the entire Commonwealth. It is sought here to declare in the Constitution that irrigation is of more importance than navigation. Now, I respectfully submit that irrigation to us is entirely new. We think and believe - and probably rightly believe - that there are immense possibilities for these colonies in connexion with the proper and scientific application of water to land; but, so far, all that we know of it is theoretical. We have had little or no practical experience, except so far as we have experimented, and then our experience would lead us rather to conclude that there is not the benefit in irrigation that some people think. But if we were perfectly assured from our experience that for our time, and under circumstances with which we are acquainted, irrigation was immensely more important than navigation, still it seems to me we should have no right to put such a provision in the Constitution. On the other hand, we have no right to assume that navigation is more important than irrigation. The amendments that have been moved and rejected go very much nearer in meeting the justice and the interests of the case than this proposal of Mr. Carruthers. The clause, as it originally stood - as we adopted it in Adelaide, so far as my memory serves me - provided that the Federal Parliament should have control of the rivers for the purposes of navigation, "and the use of the waters thereof."

Mr. SYMON. -
The River Murray, "where it forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales, to the sea."

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Unfortunately so. I think if that limitation were removed, the word; of that clause would meet the case better than anything that has been suggested. The danger which has been anticipated by the people of New South Wales was, it seems to me, an unwarranted fear. The Federal Parliament, it is urged, if it had control of the whole of the rivers of the Commonwealth, might so legislate as to prevent the colony in which they mainly were from using them to the best advantage for its people. Now, all our experience is contrary to such a supposition. All our experience leads to the conclusion that Governments usually look to the whole interests of the area over which they have control, and Governments are more likely (judging from past experience) to err on the side of giving undue consideration to vested interests, and interests that have had existence, than to err on the side of insufficiently considering them. The Hon. Mr. Carruthers and the Right Hon. Mr. Reid have urged very strongly that the interests of New South Wales would be prejudiced, because, if irrigation works or conservation works were entered on, they might be rendered absolutely worthless by the action of the Federal Parliament. Now, I am not able, from my experience, to think of a single instance in any of these colonies, at any rate, or in any British community, where a Parliament has passed legislative measures which have injured vested interests without adequately compensating those who possessed those vested interests. Therefore we have no right to assume that the Federal Parliament will at any time act in a way to prejudice the interests of people who have expended money under authority, or without hindrance, without not merely compensating, but more than compensating, them for the loss they have sustained by such legislative action. Further, I think that the argument has an extremely shadowy basis. Now, I remember that Mr. Isaacs, the Attorney-General of Victoria, moved the following clause:—

The navigability of rivers which, by them-selves or in connexion with other rivers, are in fact permanently or intermittently navigable for trade and commerce with other countries or among the several states. But so that no state shall be prevented from using any of the waters of such rivers for the purposes of conservation and irrigation to such extent as in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission is not unjust or unreasonable, having regard to the needs and requirements of any other state for such purposes.

I respectfully submit that if this proposal were altered by substituting the Federal Parliament for the Inter-State Commission, it would meet all the requirements of the case. It would not say, in effect, which was the more important interest, but that both these interests-navigation and irrigation—should be under the control of the Federal Parliament. Now, I remember it was urged against that clause, when it was moved, that persons would not know when they could undertake expenditure in connexion with irrigation or conservation works, but it seems to me that that is not so. If this power were given to the Federal Parliament there would be no difficulty, whenever it was contemplated to undertake extensive works in connexion with the waters of the Commonwealth, in appealing to the Federal Parliament for the passing of a Bill authorizing the construction of such works. This is the plan that is now adopted within the respective states. If any section or any district of a state desires to undertake irrigation or conservation works, it obtains authority from Parliament to do so. Having obtained that authority, there is no hesitancy whatever in the mind of any person as to how far they can go. They obtain their authority under an Act of Parliament in distinct terms, defining their powers, and defining to what extent they are limited in the exercise of those powers. Surely that authority might easily be vested in the Federal Parliament. Of course, it might be urged that this would lead to delay and loss of time; but I would respectfully submit that in the event of a state desiring to divert any waters within its limits for irrigation or for conservation purposes, if there were no national objections or no Commonwealth objections, a Bill submitted by the state so desiring would pass through the Federal Parliament, just as a similar Bill is passed through our states Parliaments, when presented by the localities interested in the undertaking authorized by the Bill, almost without discussion, very often in a single night, and sometimes within a few minutes. It does not seem to me that there is any danger in giving to the Federal Parliament a power to control and not to administer. It is urged that the Federal Parliament could not administer irrigation works in the various states. Without agreeing to that contention, I say unhesitatingly that there is no necessity that it should. It is quite possible for it to have control without in any way having administration. It would simply have to say aye or nay to any proposal for the erection of waterworks. Then there would be perfect security to South Australia, to Victoria, or to New South Wales that they would not be unfairly restricted in the use of the waters within their own territories. It has been urged that Victoria is in the same boat in this connexion as New South Wales that it has rivers which are tributaries of the Murray that would come under the control of the Federal Parliament, and that, therefore, the representatives of Victoria should vote for the motion submitted by Mr. Carruthers. As a representative of Victoria, I do not wish to retain for Victoria any power to act unfairly in this or any other connexion.

Mr. REID. -

Who is acting unfairly?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I am not urging that anybody has acted unfairly, I am dealing with the argument that the representatives of Victoria should vote for this proposal because it would give them some advantage. I respectfully submit that it would give them an unfair advantage that they do not require. I can easily suppose a case that has been brought very near to our minds during the last two or three months. We have been suffering from an unprecedented drought, and many small watercourses that have not been dry for a number of years are absolutely dry to-day. There may come a time when the principal water-course of all Australia may be so reduced by drought that if New South Wales were to use all the water it might think to be necessary in the interests of its people, Victoria and South Australia would not get any water at all. In such a contingency it would be advisable to so distribute the water as to maintain the lives of the inhabitants and of the stock in all the states. If, however, this motion was carried the Federal Parliament would have no power in the matter. Clearly the Federal Parliament should have such power in order to preserve the Commonwealth from rain. If I am in order, I should like to move the omission from Mr. Carruthers' amendment of all the words after "But," with the view of submitting the amendment previously proposed by Mr. Isaacs, with the exception that I would substitute the Federal Parliament for the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I stated at the time that I was perfectly willing to accept that.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Was that moved before?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

No; the Inter-State Commission was moved before.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Practically it was moved.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is exactly the position it would be in if you left yourself to sub-section (1) of clause 52.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

You can only operate by legislation under sub-section (1).
Mr. TRENWITH. -

At any rate, this seems to me to be a position in which it would be wise to leave the Commonwealth no power to prevent any state from preparing a Bill giving such powers as it desired to have, and having it submitted to the Federal Parliament, and, I believe, carried if there was no objection to it in a very few hours. Then, instead of proceeding with any uncertainty, the parties' desirous of undertaking the work would know exactly what they were entitled to do, and they would have the authority of the Federal Parliament for doing it. I see Mr. Reid laughs and shakes his head at the suggestion.

Mr. REID. -

No; I was laughing at your remark that the Bill would pass if there was no objection to it. I suppose it would pass.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

If there was any reasonable objection to it I have no hesitation in saying that no state should be empowered to act in a way which was unjust to other states. In New South Wales, I assume-I know it is so here - if persons want to undertake a work on State property they have to ask for and obtain an Act of Parliament authorizing them to undertake much work. I remember that some years ago not an irrigation work, but a railway work, was undertaken in Riverina by some Victorian capitalists. They desired to obtain the right to make a railway on New South Wales territory, and they asked for and obtained from the Parliament of New South Wales the right to make that railway - I think it was from Moama to Deniliquin. In the same way, if any state desire to give to any of its people the advantage of water conservation or irrigation, there is not a doubt that the state Parliament would readily give that permission, unless there was a real menace in the proposal to some other state. And if that was so, who will say, when we are talking about federation-when we are providing a Constitution under which the Commonwealth shall be federally governed for certain purposes-it is a correct thing to leave to a single state the power to act in connexion with matters which are inter-state properties, as rivers are, in such a way as to prejudice the interests of a neighbouring colony? If I am in order, sir, I would like to move that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment of Mr. Isaacs to insert some words after "conservation" is now before the Chair, and unless it is withdrawn the honorable member cannot move his amendment.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

For the purpose of allowing my honorable friend to move that amendment, I shall be only too willing to withdraw temporarily my amendment, with the consent of the committee.

The amendment of Mr. Isaacs was withdrawn.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I move -

That the amendment be amended by the insertion after "but" addition of the following words: "The navigability of the rivers which, by themselves or in connexion with other rivers, are in fact permanently or intermittently navigable for trade and commerce with other countries or among the several states. But so that no state shall be prevented from using any of the waters of such rivers for the purposes of conservation or irrigation, to such an extent as, in the opinion of the Parliament, is not unjust or unreasonable, having regard to the needs and requirements of any state for such purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. -

It will not read sense.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

It is very difficult, if not impossible, to draft an amendment on the spur of the moment, but when the committee arrives at a resolution on the subject the Drafting Committee is always very willing to draft an amendment to carry out that resolution.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

It was quite refreshing to hear the last speech. I think the speaker caught the true federal spirit, whatever may be the effect of the amendment. I find, upon looking up the debates, that the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) was negatived by 35 votes to 8 votes. My name figures among the 35 who voted in the negative, and, so far as I can see, there is no reason for reversing that vote now. The matter has been again carefully debated, and, without being disrespectful, I may say that all the former arguments have been gone over, but nothing new has been adduced to cause us to change our minds. There are two points I want to put to honorable members. One of them is this: That the declaration that conservation and irrigation are to be superior and paramount to navigation should not be inserted in the Constitution. I think that we are very apt to forget what we are here for. We are here to provide machinery to enable-laws to be made, not to make laws ourselves.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

We are not irrigation experts.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

We are here to give, the people of Australia a free hand in legislation, so that they may be able to, say to what use these waters are to be put. We are not here to stereotype in the Constitution a declaration as to, what we, in the year of grace 1898, believe to be of paramount importance in the matter. At the present time no one will deny—at least I have not heard it denied—that water conservation is a more important purpose than navigation. But are we able to say that this will be the case 50 or 100 years hence? Schemes have been mooted—some of them wild-cat schemes, and some which appear to be practicable—and suggestions have been made for the saving and conservation of water which, I think, will meet with more attention as the years go by. The water is given liberally enough from the skies, taking one year with another, and in the course of time it may be utterly unnecessary for the people who occupy the lands of the interior to divert water from the Darling or any other stream. That, of course, is not possible at the present time, and it will not be possible for years to come.

My second point is that Mr. Carruthers' proposal is provincial and retrogressive. Mr. Carruthers says—"That, as regards rivers, the utilization of the waters thereof for navigation shall be subordinate to the conservation of the said waters by and within any state to meet the requirements of such state and its people." Look at these last words—"to meet the requirements of such state and its people." It is not the conservation of waters for the purposes of Australia, but the conservation of waters for the purposes of the particular state through which the water happens to be passing. There is more than one state which may want waters for irrigation. There is no right on the part of any one state to drink up, as it were, all the waters passing through it. There is an old custom in Holland, when two old friends meet, of taking two pipes and one pot of beer, and they pass the beer turn about to one another for each to have a pull. But the man with the pot in his hand does not drink up the whole lot. That is the very position here. The man whose turn it is drinks down to a horizontal line around the pot. Two or three friendly nations—may I call them nations?—should make some joint arrangement, so that each may have the use of the long beer pot. A reference has been made to the existing words of the clause. It is said, in loose phraseology, that the existing words put navigation above irrigation and conservation. They do nothing of the sort. These words are, I say with respect, loosely used and wrongly applied. The very utmost the words say is not that navigation is put over irrigation, but that the Federal Parliament is allowed, if it think fit, to interfere with certain schemes of conservation and irrigation. Are we to trust the Federal Parliament or not? Is it reasonable to think, in the present state of things, that that Parliament, constituted as we propose to constitute it, would ever think of interfering with the reasonable use of the waters of the rivers for conservation purposes? Surely that is a matter in which we may trust the Federal Parliament. It will not be a Parliament of fools, but one of reasonable men. If that Parliament sees that conservation for state purposes is essential, it will be sure to give full rein to the state for the purpose of effecting conservation. But the position becomes absurd. According to Mr. Carruthers' amendment, he wants to leave Queensland the power to dam up and use for conservation purposes all the tributaries in Queensland. He wants to leave Victoria with full power to dam up and use in Victoria all the waters of the Goulburn, Campaspe, and other tributaries; and wants to leave, of course, New South Wales similar powers. But the River Murray cannot be separated from its tributaries in that way. They are one joint stock; nature has made them a joint stock. I propose that we should leave to the Federal Parliament in plain language the adjustment of riparian rights as between states, leaving it absolutely to the Federal Parliament to say how the waters should be used.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The adjustment of the riparian rights?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The adjustment of the riparian rights would mean declaring the rights as between states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Would the Federal Parliament be able to create rights which do not exist?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Certainly.

Mr. REID. -

I see. That is what you mean?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I do not suppose I shall agree with the Premier of New South Wales in the matter. I put it straight and fair before him that I cannot in the least agree in the attitude he has taken up in this matter. I may be wrong, though I hope I am right, but I think that the right honorable gentlemen has shown this afternoon that real earnestness, which I, for one, certainly appreciate very highly. He showed an earnest desire to get a Constitution that he could recommend to his people. He is treating federation as a subject within the pale of practical politics. I have always discredited the statement that I have heard from time to time, that the right honorable member is not in earnest in regard to federation. I firmly believe that he is in earnest in regard to federation, and it is that earnestness which induced him to speak with such gravity upon the issue just now before us. But, then, there is this to be considered. In America they have been suffering for years for the want of some federal control over irrigation purposes. Mr. Gordon read passages from the American books showing how strongly they desire to have a provision made for irrigation and conservation, which is so essential for the western states, so that it may be brought within federal control. In order to obtain relief they want to approach the Federal Congress and get a general law to regulate the subject. One attempt has been made to bring in the interests of Victoria. I am glad that Mr. Trenwith has disclaimed voting in this matter merely in the interests of his state. I do not think the people of Victoria are likely to regard him as less attached to Victoria because he has determined to treat this as an Australian subject. But the argument used is that if you do not make conservation superior they will be able to stop the Melbourne Water Supply from diverting some of the other streams upon the other side of the Dividing Range for the purpose of supplying the conduit pipe for the Yan Yean supply. I have seen that creek as it was and as it is. There is no doubt that if Jack's Creek were not diverted it would flow into the Goulburn, and thence to the Murray; but they have turned Jack's Creek into a channel, and it now helps the Melbourne Water Supply. I ask, is it possible that the Federal Parliament would interfere with anything of that sort? In the first place, the effect of diverting Jack's Creek would be infinitesimal on the Murray. All that Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor claim for clause 52, sub-section (1), is that the Federal Parliament will be able, by its rules in regard to navigation, to lay down principles which will avoid all substantial interference with the waters for the purposes of irrigation and conservation or water supply. It means this: That so long as the diversion of water is slight, or is reasonable for the purposes of the area which the waters are meant to serve, there will be no interference by the Federal Parliament. As I understand Mr. O'Connor's view of the law, it is that under clause 52, sub-section (1), there is absolute power for the Federal Parliament to intervene, if it thinks fit, and to say that you must not interfere with the navigation of the Murray or the Darling beyond certain limits. How could anyone say that the Federal Parliament would be justified under that in interfering with a diversion of a single creek? With regard to the amendment of Mr. Trenwith, which is based on the amendment of Mr. Isaacs, I think that, in principle, it is perfectly correct, but what I want to know is this: How does it add to the interpretation of clause 52, sub-section (1)? In what way does it add to the powers of the Federal Parliament? As I understand it, we might serve our purpose by leaving the whole thing to the Federal Parliament. At least, under clause 52, sub-section (1), we shall be able to leave to the Federal Parliament the power to make an overriding law for the purposes of navigation, but it will not make any overriding law for the purposes of navigation which seriously interferes with the use of the water for irrigation purposes. We have had a long debate on this subject. We have divided upon it before, and there has been an over-powering majority against the proposal of Mr. Reid. I think he was only supported by five Victorians and two other New South Wales members, and there were 35 against him, and unless there has been some new ground which is to change the position I do not see any reason why we should not soon come to a division.

I will support the amendment of Mr. Carruthers, for the reason that I am satisfied that the states should have the right to use the waters within their own territory. If they have not that right you will give the right to the Inter-State Commission or to the Federal Parliament. We know perfectly well that the Federal Parliament will be composed of members from Western Australia, Tasmania, and other places, and I do not think they would take the same interest in the question as the other states directly concerned. This is a matter for the state Parliaments, and not for the Federal Parliament. It is said that a state might drain every drop of water in the rivers, but that could not happen for centuries to come. The rivers Edwards, Murray, Murrumbidgee, and the Darling, at certain times of the year— that is, in June, July, August, September, and sometimes October, or even in November—are in high flood. It is not possible to conceive that navigation could be practically interfered with during those months. If, therefore, we insist that we shall place this power in the hands of the Commonwealth Parliament or all Inter-State Commission, we shall deprive the states Parliaments of control over those waters. How would any sane man, as was said to-day, undertake to spend large sums of money upon irrigation and conservation when he would have before him the possibility of the Commonwealth Parliament dealing with that expenditure? It would be absurd. You would paralyze all expenditure on improvements. What is wanted is that millions of human beings shall be facilitated in every possible way in spending money to make the best use of the land. The Commonwealth Parliament is not the proper authority to do that. The state Parliament is the best authority to deal with such matters. It is absurd to say that those who are situated at the top of the rivers will take all the water. There is water falling in each one of the states, and the states which are situated on the upper portions of the rivers cannot take that water away. There are streams running into the Murray, the Darling, and the other rivers from Victoria,
New South Wales, South Australia, and Queensland. The streams running from these colonies will keep the rivers running within each colony even if the water above is partially taken away. But it would be impossible to take away the water. Such a thing might happen when we have 100,000,000 human beings in these colonies, but we need not bother our heads about that contingency. If we insist upon putting the rivers under the control of the Commonwealth Parliament or an Inter-State Commission, subject to all sorts of uncertainties, we shall do a very unwise thing, which will paralyze the expenditure of money on the lands and upon conservation and irrigation. With regard to conservation, as I said when I first spoke on the matter, any one who has travelled on the Darling River, the Edwards River, and other rivers, knows that there are large numbers of places where water is naturally conserved. With very slight assistance by the holder of the adjacent land, the water enters into large lagoons and lakes, and with a little damming up you can conserve water that will serve for months of the year. If you give this control to the Inter-State Commission they would really have to take this power away from the states, and the whole thing would be paralyzed. Let us do what we can do. The states at present have the power to take the water. Leave the matter as it stands. If you do that, you leave it as it has worked for years past. But if you change the system the people of New South Wales, or some parts of Victoria and of Queensland, were that colony to come into the Federation, would be naturally and properly alarmed. They would say-"The control of our waters is taken away from us and given to the Inter-State Commission, who will not understand the question, and may do what will be very injurious to our interests." It is not a proper thing to do that. It is far preferable to leave the matter as it stands, and to adopt either the amendment which has been moved by Mr. Carruthers or that of Mr. Reid. A lot has been said as to the Federal Parliament taking the control. It is a dangerous thing to give the Federal Parliament that power, because the Parliament will not be conversant with the subject. The authority conversant with the subject is the local Parliament. Even were they asked to deal with the question, the Federal Parliament might not be thoroughly alive to the vast interests concerned. The watering of the land is altogether more important than navigation. As I have said before, 99 parts to 1 of the traffic of the Australian colonies is now carried by the railway systems. The traffic carried on the rivers is an infinitesimal portion of the whole, and as trade and intercourse, and as the quantity of produce, increases, and as settlement takes place on the land, more produce still will be taken by the railways. Therefore, the railways will be able to carry at a cheaper rate-in fact, they are cheapening their rates year by year. When the mass of produce which will be produced in these colonies ten or twenty years hence is taken by railway, the Railway department will be able to carry it at a cheaper rate than at present. And the rate of insurance on our rivers is really very high, and goes a long way towards paying for the extra freight on the railway systems. Even on the Edwards River, a run of a few miles, there is an insurance rate of from 10s. to 15s. per ton per mile on produce. The railways are capable of carrying the whole produce without detriment to the producer. Therefore, it would be an unwise thing, in my opinion, to put this matter under the control of the Federal Parliament. As I said before, these rivers are always navigable at the time of the year when there is ample water to spare for those who choose to navigate as well as for purposes of irrigation and therefore it would be far safer for us to leave the matter as at present, letting the states having control of the rivers within their territory. Therefore, I think it would be wise to adopt the proposals of Mr. Reid and Mr. Carruthers.

Mr. BRIGGS (Western Australia). -

This debate has lasted a long time, and I hope I shall not be considered obtrusive in addressing myself to the subject, because I shall speak with an unprejudiced mind, knowing very little about the matter, except what I have learned from what has fallen within my hearing during the several weeks the topic has been more or less under debate. Many honorable members of this Convention have spoken as advocates of their colonies. The New South Wales representatives have spoken with great fervour; so have the Victorians. Such has been the fervour shown on both sides that I should be almost afraid of the chances of the truth coming out, except that I remember that in the English courts of law it is said that the truth is most often discovered by means of the opposing intellects of keen and active men on each side. And, though we may have debated the question very keenly on each side in this Convention, I hope that when it comes to be considered subsequently, honorable members will rise from the position of advocates, and look at matters calmly as judges. We have a right to expect this from many of the gentlemen of the long robe who have taken part in this debate, who are qualifying themselves for high judicial positions, which they have a right some day to expect, and that form the summit to which every lawyer of eminence hopes to attain. I hope that on this question we shall be able to drop partisan feeling and look upon ourselves not so much as members for the various colonies, but as Australians, doing our best for the benefit of the nation as a whole. I know nothing whatever of the minor points in connexion with this question, but from what I have heard in the course of this debate, I was led at first to believe that the matter is one which would best be left to the operation of sub-section (1) of clause 52. But I have been much impressed with the arguments of the New South Wales representatives that the powers of conservation and irrigation should be left in the hands of the states as at present. The states have done much in this direction already, and I am of opinion that we should leave as much as possible in their hands. And so I think that navigation being subsidiary will be more fitly dealt with by the Federal Parliament. I shall have much pleasure in voting for the amendment proposed by Mr. Isaacs, and amended by Mr. Trenwith, that the general question shall be left in the hands of the Federal Parliament. It has been mentioned that the conservation in some way implies a waste of water. Several honorable members have spoken in that sense. But I would impress upon them that the conservation of water means the preservation of water. I believe that, if water were wisely conserved, both irrigation on a large scale and navigation also could be carried on, and the flow of waters in these rivers would be increased and not wasted in its flow to the sea. I have much pleasure in supporting the proposal that the states shall have control of the conservation of the water and of irrigation, though I really think it would be better for the Convention to leave the matter to be dealt with under sub-section (1) of clause 52.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not desire that this question should go to a vote without expressing my disinclination to support the amendment of my honorable friend (Mr. Carruthers). Now, I have been challenged a good deal upon a declaration that I made in favour of the sub-section relating to trade and commerce, and I should like to say something definite with regard to that, because I think it is only fair that, in the altered condition of things which has taken place since I made that declaration, I should restate my position. It is true that, in the debate on the 7th of February last, I stated that I considered that the trade and commerce provision was a sufficient one for the purpose of dealing with this matter and I said-quoting from a former speech—that I held there should be no provision beyond sub-section (1), and that that sub-section would best serve all our interests. I also used these words in the same speech:-

Still, I think, although this matter has been very fully debated, that there might be an adjournment, as we might find from the multitude of propositions that have been submitted that some arrangement could be come to that would satisfy the Convention generally. For myself I am not very hopeful of that. I am more hopeful that the decision come to will be that sub-section (1) is sufficient for all of us.

I was then of opinion that we might well rely, and I think now we might well have relied, on the provision relating to trade and commerce among the several states and with other countries, going no further in that respect than the Constitution of the United States has gone. I find, however, even among those who are very anxious, and I think not unnaturally anxious, to pin me down to the statements I then made, that there are a good many who are themselves not satisfied with the trade and commerce provision, and who sought to define or limit the meaning of that sub-section by various proposals with regard to rivers. I find also, in regard to railways, that instead of my view that the provision in regard to trade and commerce might be regarded as sufficient, no fewer than four different proposals have been laid before us, and embodied in this Constitution, one at the instance of Sir George Turner-two, in fact, at his instance-one at the instance of Mr. Reid, and one at the instance of Mr. Grant. I do not think there is any one among us-I am not now speaking on the merits of these railway proposals-who will not admit that these proposals considerably affect the trade and commerce provision as applied to railways. I only wish to say that, while I adhere to my position so far that I cannot support the proposition that the powers with regard to trade and commerce, in respect of navigation, should be subordinated-using simply the words of Mr. Carruthers-to the conservation of the waters by and with any states, or, as it has been proposed, to the conservation and use of those waters for irrigation-while I wish to say that I adhere so far to my former position that I shall not support any proposal that the powers, as to the utilization of waters for navigation, shall be in express terms subordinated to the use of waters for irrigation, I also say that I wish it to be clearly understood that I do not lay down any further proposition on that question, except that I cannot go so far as to say that the one should be subordinated to the other. I should like to be permitted to say also-I say permitted to say, because the debate has been a tolerably long one for a recommittal debate-that I am no more able than I was at the beginning to follow the proposal of Mr. Isaacs. I am not able to say that I can assent, as a member of this Convention, to the proposal that the navigability of rivers, which should be a matter of evidence to be determined by the High Court, should be submitted to any other tribunal, unless it can be shown that to leave that matter to be dealt with by the High Court itself would be inconsistent with the provisions made in this Bill as to the Inter-State Commission. If it can be shown that there is a contradiction or a contrariety there, I might go so far as to say that the Inter-State Commission might deal with this question of the navigability of rivers; but unless there is some inconsistency there, I believe, as I have believed all along, that a question of that kind is most fit for the determination of the High Court, and much more fit for its determination, and even for the determination of the Inter-state Commission, than for the determination of Parliament. As to these other decisions of questions of rights existing at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth, however much those rights may grow pending legislation, and as they do exist at that time, and as any growth of them will only be in accordance with the legal position in which they crop up, I am of opinion that a well-constituted legal tribunal—not the Federal Parliament—is the best authority to deal with these questions. It will be asked—"Why not trust the Federal Parliament?" Well, I am not evincing distrust to the Federal Parliament; but if I did I should be in a very large company. What I say is that the Federal Parliament ought to deal with the making of laws within the powers intrusted to it, and ought not to deal with legal rights existing at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth, under which rights, naturally, interests consonant with those rights will grow up. Therefore, the rational decision in that regard is to leave a competent tribunal to decide legal rights which ought to be within the determination not of the Federal Parliament, but of the tribunal we constitute for the purpose of deciding legal questions. Surely we are here, for the purpose of distributing the powers of legislation and adjudication to the proper authorities, and when we find matters are existing at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth, although the interests under them may expand, still those matters are matters to be ultimately determined, as it is not to the Parliament, but to a consistently impartial tribunal, that we ought to resort for their determination. The legislation is for the Parliament; but the adjudication of rights should be left to the courts. Having held that position from the beginning, I hold it now in regard to Mr. Isaacs' amendment, and therefore I find myself unable to support that amendment. And I cannot support the amendment of Mr. Carruthers, because I do not see why we should determine that any one set of these rights—those of trade and commerce—in which we include navigation, and those of irrigation, should be subordinated the one to the other. It is far better that they should find their proper places under the growth of a Constitution, with such elasticity of position as the necessary circumstances of the Commonwealth will bring about.

Mr. FRASER. -

Navigation is under the control of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -
No doubt; but that does not of itself give the Federal Parliament the determination of legal rights so far as they exist at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth; and all I ask for is this, that so far as legal rights exist, no matter how large the interests that naturally grow up under those rights may be, they should be determined according to the maxims and principles which determine legal rights, and not according to the other method. Mr. McMillan has suggested an addendum to the navigation and shipping clause, as follows:-

Subject to the rights of each state in the use of waters solely within its own boundaries for the purpose of conservation and irrigation.

Well, so far as the words "Subject to" mean that navigation and shipping are to be subordinated to other rights, I am disinclined to agree with that, because I think it is only consistent with the position I have maintained from the beginning that I should not approve of a position of that kind. If some such words as these "with due regard to" or "with due consideration to the rights of each state to the use of such water with its own boundaries" were substituted, then if we are to depart from the plain meaning of the trade and commerce clause, I should be more inclined to support a proposition of that kind than any other that has been put before us. I do not wish to prolong the debate, but I thought it only fair that I should make this statement.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

The Hon. Mr. Barton has referred to the amendment which I placed before the committee some time ago, and which has now been revived by my honorable friend (Mr. Trenwith). I do not hesitate to say that if that amendment had been accepted we should have arrived at a fair and equitable decision with regard to navigation on the one hand, and irrigation and water conservation on the other. Mr. Barton says he could not support the amendment, because he thinks the Federal Parliament is not the proper body to determine the rights of the states, and that this duty should be left to the Supreme Court. The fallacy of that argument lies in this consideration: -day, in the persons of its Premier and its Minister of Lands, and says, as we have said before, that irrigation and water conservation are the primary needs of this continent, and that navigation, important as it is, holds but a secondary place. They also say that the American decisions show distinctly that, in America, everything else in relation to these navigable rivers is in a position of servitude to navigation. That should not be the case in Australia. The only point of difference between New South Wales and ourselves is this: That while we agree with New South Wales that irrigation and water conservation should not be blocked under

[P.1986] starts here
any possible circumstances in favour of navigation, we part with them at this point, that we say that New South Wales should not take the whole of the waters of the Darling and of its other rivers for its own purposes, and deprive other colonies of the use of the rivers which, by their very existence and course, are the common property of Australia.

Mr. Reid. -
Such a thing would never happen.

Mr. Isaacs. -
If it would never happen, there can be no harm in accepting the amendment. The only fair way out of the difficulty is to say that no state should be permitted to take every drop of water in utter disregard of the needs of other states. To prevent that, there must be some impartial tribunal, and we have only to consider what tribunal it should be. Is it to be the Supreme Court? I say "No," for the reasons I have given?

Mr. Reid. -
Is not that an impartial tribunal?

Mr. Isaacs. -
I should say that it is impartial, but its jurisdiction ought to be confined to legal questions, and should not extend to questions such as are necessarily involved in the matter we are now considering. We should not bring the Supreme Court into political discussions under any consideration. We have then to ask ourselves whether it should be the Federal Parliament, or some body created by the Federal Parliament. I think that an Inter-State Commission, or some other body created by the Federal Parliament, might be the best, but I should be perfectly willing to accept the Federal Parliament as the arbiter. That would be fair to the whole of the three colonies immediately concerned, and, therefore, I do support again the amendment that I proposed the other day, and that has now been brought forward by Mr. Trenwith.

Mr. McMillan (New South Wales). -
We are brought again to the point at which we started before. We are trying to do the impossible. We cannot define, and we must either leave this matter to the sub-sections of clause 52, or absolutely define the rights of the states. I myself should not have cared to re-open the discussion. The strong point of the argument in New South Wales and elsewhere is this, that you can give no certainty to contracts unless you have these rights clearly defined.

Mr. Trenwith. -
Can you not give certainty by Act of Parliament?

Mr. McMillan. -
You can so far as the Act goes, but you can give no certainty in the meantime that contracts may not be upset by that Act. Once you give the power to the Federal Parliament you lose all control yourself.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Mr. Carruthers' amendment gives no certainty.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I should have been glad to have left the whole thing as it was, but since that time I have had an opportunity of visiting my own colony. I, with the Right Hon. Mr. Reid and others, am anxious that the Bill should be acceptable to our colony. There is no doubt that this has become one of the most burning questions in connexion with federation in New South Wales. I am reluctantly compelled to come to this conclusion that if we touch the thing at all, we must put it beyond all doubt. Any such proposal as that of the Hon. Mr. Barton, to use the expression "with due regard," or "with due consideration to the rights of each state," would simply leave the whole matter in the same position as it is now. I confess that the weight of argument, with a view to the consummation of this federation, is entirely in favour of absolutely fixing the rights of the states to waters which flow entirely within their own boundaries. There was a proper course taken before with regard to the River Murray alone, which flows through different colonies, but in the case of the rivers which are entirely within the boundaries of one colony, it seems to me that we must give security to contracts, especially as those contracts must be undertaken, as we all admit, by the state itself, and as irrigation and water conservation are entirely a state question, and not a question for the Federation.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I want to point out that Mr. Trenwith's amendment only throws the matter into greater confusion. After vesting the control of water conservation in the Federal Parliament, it makes the state powers subject to some Bill that is to be passed by the Federal Parliament. What conceivable Bill could cover every conceivable legitimate work of water conservation? It might take years to get a Bill passed, but in the meantime the enterprise and industry of a colony are to be left in the lobbies of the Federal Parliament, waiting month after month, while infinitely more important matters are engaging the attention of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. FRASER. -

What about the expense of getting the Bill?

Mr. REID. -

That is a trifling matter. I want to point out to the honorable member that his amendment makes confusion worse confounded. There would be some sense in proposing that the Federal Parliament should take the whole duty over, because, then, owing a duty to water conservation, we may expect it to perform that duty. I am very glad to say that my colleague (Mr. Carruthers) has consented to withdraw his amendment. Of course it cannot be withdrawn so as to prevent Mr. Trenwith from taking a vote on his amendment, but I am authorized by my colleague to say that he is prepared not to press his amendment. I have had the assistance of my friend (Mr. O'Connor) in so remodelling my amendment as, I think, to put the matter before the committee not in so extreme a form as that presented by Mr. Carruthers. I intend to propose words which will in no sense assert the superiority of water conservation over navigation. It will simply leave the rights of the one and the rights of the other untouched, and then, if any question arises, it will be for the proper tribunal to decide that in accordance with justice. If honorable members will allow me to read this amendment, it, perhaps, may commend itself to them as a settlement of this matter. I propose, if the amendments are negatived or withdrawn to move that sub-section (8) be amended by the addition of these words:-

The powers contained in this sub-section, and those relating to trade and commerce in this Constitution, shall not abridge the rights of a state or its citizens to the use of the water of rivers within its boundaries for water conservation and irrigation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is all New South Wales.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is the same thing.

Mr. REID. -

What is this talk of taking every drop? It is the most hysterical nonsense in the world.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is perpetuating your sole right.

Mr. REID. -

I am very anxious to protect the rights of every one. It only happens that we, by some misfortune of nature, have more rights than other people because we have more water and longer rivers. It is a great misfortune, but we could not help it, I can assure honorable members. It has been the subject of great vexation to our friends for years past. I am prepared to add any words to remove difficulties. I am prepared to leave out the words "within its boundaries." I will adopt any possible amendment to make it of general application.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Do you object to "reasonable use"?
Mr. REID. -

I do not know that I would, in the interests of a settlement of this vexed question. I will take a moment to consider the effect of inserting those words, and when I move my amendment I will probably be found to have inserted them.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Who is to be the arbiter?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

The High Court.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

That is impossible.

Mr. REID. -

That really is an objection to putting in these words. It sounds so reasonable to put such words in, but the unfortunate part is that putting such words in destroys the effect of the whole affair, because it does not make it a question of right. It makes it a question of accident what any particular person or authority will consider a reasonable use. I never heard of a tribunal that ever sat on a water question that did not consider the question of reasonable use. I do not think the words need be in, because surely any right possessed by any one is subject to reason.

Mr. BARTON. -

Put them in.

Mr. REID. -

I would put them in, except that I am afraid that it throws away the slightest ground for the protection of those waters.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It was settled six weeks ago.

Mr. REID. -

I am afraid that it unsettles the whole settlement. So far as there is some protection for the legitimate use of the waters not of one state, but of all the states, I am prepared to accept an amendment, but it must not take such a form that it is a matter of mere arbitrary judgment and discretion as to what is reasonable use. For instance, if a man were asked to build a house subject to the power of another man to knock it down if he thought fit, what re-assurance to the former would it be to say-"Oh, but the man who has that power is a most reasonable man; he will never do you an injustice, he is a man of the highest integrity"? The man will not build on such a condition, because the man of the highest integrity, especially if he had a contrary duty and the house was in the road, might somehow knock the house down, and there is no compensation hanging to it. The inherent difficulty with us is that we want to place these business enterprises on a sound business footing, and this Bill does not do it, and no rights words short of preserving rights will do it so far as I can see. If during the next few minutes any one can suggest to me words which will preserve rights I will adopt them.

Mr. DOUGLAS. - What right have you now?

Mr. REID. - It has never been questioned yet, and that is a good right to have.

Mr. DOUGLAS. - You want to get a right, but you have no right.

Mr. REID. - What country are you talking about?

Mr. DOUGLAS. - The right of New South Wales to claim all the water.

Mr. REID. - What country is my venerable friend alluding to? I happened to be talking, not of one colony, but of all the colonies, and of all

Mr. DOUGLAS. - It does not appear so by the motion you put before the House.

Mr. REID. - My words are in general terms; I was not referring to any particular state. I am willing to remove any words which seem to point to any particular state.

Mr. HIGGINS. - It is not a question of words. There is a fundamental difference of principle.

Mr. REID. - No doubt there is a fundamental difference of principle. There are some gentlemen in this Convention who are prepared to leave vast business undertakings on an insufficient basis. We who are responsible for these enterprises, and for the development of a very large extent of country, cannot do that. We cannot consent to put the destinies of our country on that basis. That is the trouble. I would be glad to do so if I could.

Mr. HOWE. - Put it on a reasonable basis, that would be all right.

Mr. REID. - If my honorable friend were the arbiter of what was reasonable I would be satisfied.

Mr. Trenwith's amendment was negatived.
Mr. Carruthers' amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-
That the following words be added to the sub-section:-"The powers contained in this sub-section, and those relating to trade and commerce under this Constitution, shall not abridge the rights of a state or its citizens to the use of the waters of rivers for conservation and irrigation.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
You have not put in the word "reasonable."

Mr. REID. -
I will leave that until the millennium. I have also left out the words "within its boundaries," as they may seem to apply only to one colony. The words I have used are of general application, and will include the right of any state in waters which come from another colony.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -
It seems to me that this amendment carries us further than the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers).

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Further back.

Mr. GORDON. -
Yes. If it makes us move at all, it is with a retrogressive movement. Nobody has ever disputed the dry legal right of New South Wales to use the whole of the waters of her rivers if she pleases. At the present time, New South Wales exercises that right subject to such supervision as the Imperial authorities might exercise upon the representation of the other colonies. If, however, this amendment is embodied in the Constitution, the power of the Imperial authorities will be negatived, and we shall be worse off than we are now.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I should like to be shown in what way the amendment of the Premier of New South Wales is less just than that of the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers). It seemed to me that I could not vote for the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers); but I shall have much less difficulty, so far as the amendment of the Premier of New South Wales is concerned, having regard to the position I have maintained from the beginning, and to the events which have occurred since. It seems to me that the amendment now before the committee is better calculated to preserve the rights of the various states than was the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers), which subordinated the rights of navigation to those of irrigation. This amendment simply provides that the existing rights of irrigation shall not be abridged.

Mr. GORDON. -

What we want is a mutual surrender.

Mr. BARTON. -

I should like to hear why the one amendment is worse than the other. My impression is that the amendment now before the committee is fairer than the amendment which has been withdrawn.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

The amendment is a crystallization of the dry legal position against which we are contending. If federation means anything, it means the surrender of a portion of our rights all round in the interests of everyone. To crystallize this dry legal position in the body of the Constitution will make all the other colonies absolutely helpless by exhibiting their consent to it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I beg to move-

That the amendment be amended by the insertion before the word "use" of the word "reasonable."

The word "reasonable" seemed at first to rather attract the Premier of New South Wales, but later on he said that he would postpone its insertion until the millennium. I do not see why we should postpone its insertion until then.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

To show my honorable friend that I am willing to meet him so far as I can, I will agree to the insertion of the word "reasonable" before the word "right"; but not to its insertion in any other place.

Mr. ISAACS. -

All rights are reasonable.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I should like to draw the attention of the committee to the cases which the Attorney-General of Victoria cited some time ago. If I am not mistaken, in his reference to the subordination of the principles of the English common law to the necessities of irrigation in some of the states of America, he pointed out that the words "reasonable use" came into the decisions. I cannot find these cases now; but I remember perfectly well that the rights granted for the purposes of irrigation in abrogation of the general principle of English common law of riparian ownership provided for the "reasonable use" of the water. In regard to this principle of federal control,
I should like to draw the attention of honorable members to what has been done in Germany. In this connexion I should like to read the following passage from the German Constitution:-

Rafting and navigation upon those water-ways which are common to several states, and the condition of such waters; also the river and other water dues.

It is this principle that we wish to affirm in the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I am afraid that wherever the word "reasonable" is placed, whether before the word "rights" or before the word "use," it will not have the effect desired by the honorable member (Sir John Downer).

Mr. REID. -

At any rate, it would be a very good finger-post.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No. The insertion of the word "reasonable" before the word "rights" would, I think, have no meaning at all. If it were inserted before the word "use" it would restrain New South Wales, for example, from making an unreasonable use of the waters of its rivers for conservation and irrigation. But, I would ask, what is to be the standard of reasonableness? It would be reasonableness as between the necessities of irrigation and conservation, and the necessities of navigation. The question would not be asked as to the reasonableness of the use as affecting the rights of two states. When you give the power to control navigation to the Federal Parliament, and you say that nothing in that power shall prevent a state from making a reasonable use of its waters for irrigation and conservation, the reasonableness is to be judged as between the necessities of water conservation and irrigation and the necessities of navigation, and not as between the rights of two states.

Sir John Downer's amendment was agreed to.

Sub-section (8), as amended, was agreed to, as was also sub-section (1) which had been postponed.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

A rather important point has been raised with regard to sub-section (2), in regard to the question of uniformity of taxation. While there has been no express decision by the American courts as to the meaning of the words "uniform throughout the Commonwealth," there are expressions in one of the cases which render it necessary for us to use caution. I therefore ask for a little more time in which to consider this matter.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

To allow graduations and exemptions, is it?

Mr. BARTON. -
My own desire is that the Federal Parliament should be unfettered in the exercise of its taxing power, if it has to use any direct taxation at all. Whatever my own opinions may be as to the way in which that power should be exercised, it is necessary that the authority to which it is confided should have the power in full force. That being so, I wish to see that this authority is properly conserved. For that reason, I think it advisable to postpone the matter, and I therefore move that it should be postponed until after clause 80 has been considered. It would then come on immediately before the provision relating to finance and trade, to which it is so nearly related.

The motion was agreed to, and the clause postponed.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

I beg to move the following new sub-section, to follow sub-section (23):—

XXIIIA. Invalid and old-age pensions.

I would not have brought this under the notice of the Convention again if I had not been encouraged to do so by those who, without due consideration, recorded their votes against me on the last occasion. It will be unnecessary for me to open up the whole discussion. The different points which I consider it advisable to bring before the Convention were of a general nature. It would be impossible for any one here to advocate a particular system of assistance for the aged poor. That is for the Federal Parliament to debate when the Government of that Parliament think it advisable to act upon public opinion. This is not the nebulous matter some members of the Convention think it is. It is a real live matter, and something tangible. It has been embodied in some of the platforms of the most powerful organizations in Australia. Not only that, it is advocated with enthusiasm by the leading philanthropists and greatest statesmen of the old country. But at this stage I will not unnecessarily occupy time by going into details. I will, however, as a justification for my action, read a few opinions which I have culled from the written and spoken words of the most eminent men. These extracts I shall submit to the Convention more for publication than anything else. It has been contended that state assistance to the aged poor would undermine thrift in the people. It is said that the people of the province or state, if they knew that, without any individual effort on their part, the state would provide for them when they arrived at a certain age, would be regardless, and that, consequently, the virtue of thrift would not be practised as it should be. One of the ablest writers of the day has stated this:

I know, sir, some people speaking and writing on this subject hold the view that the State pensions will endanger individual thrift. These people can, in my humble opinion, know but little of the inner life of the people. I venture to believe that these pensions will greatly assist thrift—the people will take a more hopeful view of life, and will practise the economic virtues more thoroughly and effectively.

These were words spoken by one of the greatest statesmen of Great Britain. Then Mr. Charles Booth, who has made a life-long study of the question, than whom there is no greater authority—

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Let us

Mr. HOWE. -

I am quite willing, but I do not think I have occupied the attention of the Convention unnecessarily. This is one of the most important measures, in my opinion, which could be brought before any Parliament, Senate, or Convention that every sat. It is a question of the alleviation of the distress existing among the deserving poor. Mr. Booth says—

With the poorest class, most of whose old people are in the workhouse or are receiving some parochial assistance outside, the proposal would be popular. These classes count up to more than half the population.

Old-age pauperism is very serious. Indoor relief lacks humanity, and outdoor encourages improvidence. We are therefore justified in seeking some better plan.

Now, Mr. Chamberlain, according to a report in the Times on 7th December, said, when speaking at Birmingham:—

Of all men belonging to the working classes, one in two is compelled, under our present system, if he lives to 65, to have recourse to parish relief. I say that this inadequate provision for old age of our working people is not only a disgrace, but is a danger to social order. I say that it is injurious to the individuals and to the nation.

Mr. Bartley, M.P., of the British Parliament, who has spoken and written a great deal on the question, says—

It ought to be impossible for any man who had spent his life honorably to be compelled to seek relief in his old age in the workhouse.

The opinions of Mr. John Morley are well worth quoting, and what he says is something which should animate whoever is Premier of the Federal Parliament to try and accomplish that which would no doubt redound credit to his Administration. Mr. Morley, speaking recently at Stoneleigh Park, said—

That he thought the man or the party who solved the question of preventing a man who had worked hard all his life, maintained his family, had been a good citizen, from going in his old age to the workhouse would deserve more glory than by winning great battles in the field.

Is it to be the Premier of New South Wales or Mr. Barton who is going to introduce a measure for old-age pensions when he has the power to do so by the Constitution we give to the Federal Parliament?. I do not think it is necessary for me to say any more. The words I have quoted are better than any I could speak. My only desire is to give power to the Federal Parliament to achieve a scheme for old-age pensions if it be practicable, and if the people require it. No power would be taken away from the states.
The sub-section would not interfere with the right of any state to act in the meantime until the Federal Parliament took the matter in hand. I do not believe in provincialism so far as old-age pauperism is concerned. In these colonies men are born in one state, spend their manhood and best days in another, and then return, broken down and unfortunate, to the land of their birth, which owes them nothing. Is it to be contended that under such circumstances the state of the unfortunate man's birth should be compelled to support him? Surely the support of the aged poor could be better accomplished by a Federated Australia. Wherever a man may roam within the boundaries of Federation, he should know that in his old age be need never fear the pauper's lot. I would compel every able bodied man, in the heyday of youth, when he has the means, to make a compulsory contribution towards a fund out of which provision would be made for his old age. That is another reason why the federal authority should take it instead of the state, because within the bounds of Federated Australia a law can be enacted compelling that individual who is to receive the benefit to contribute to the fund in which he is to participate in old age. I have much pleasure in bringing forward this motion again, because I am assured that those who reluctantly voted against me before will vote with me on this occasion.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I cannot allow the question to be put without saying that I have not changed the opinion I expressed before. The honorable member may or may not have made out a good case for providing invalid and old-age pensions, but unquestionably what he has not proved is that this is a federal and not a provincial concern. That is the whole question we have to decide, because what we are more particularly concerned in in framing this Constitution is to distribute the powers and functions with which we are dealing, so that things which are properly federal will go to the Commonwealth, and those which are provincial will go to the provinces. I have not found that the honorable member has confined himself to the question of fact-it is more than a question of fact, it is a question of right-as to whether the Commonwealth should be burdened with this subject, or whether it should continue to be, as it is now, a matter for the states to decide for themselves. I am not going to argue whether or not the state should provide for invalid or old-age pensions, because that is not the question we have to deal with. The question is divided into two parts, first with regard to pensions for invalids. If we are to pension invalids we may as well take over the treatment of the sick poor generally. The treatment of the sick poor is in all the provinces, and it has been always, not only a particularly provincial matter, but an intensely local matter. Throughout, the dealing with the sick poor has been left to those who furnish the funds, sometimes assisted by the state. All that class of relief or assistance has been distributed in hospitals or otherwise in the districts concerned. Now it is proposed to make a great jump and to take it from the districts and place it in the hands of the Commonwealth. I do not see that a case has been made out for that. The matter should either remain as it is now, a subject to be dealt with by the districts concerned, or if you go further, it should be proved that this is a federal matter. With regard to old-age pensions, I think the same consideration prevails, except that there is a large agitation on foot for old-age pensions to be distributed by various States that we know of. We know an agitation has existed in Germany. We know how far it has gone in England. We know that there is a great agitation in some of the colonies, but until I came to this Convention I never heard it argued by any who were in favour of that system that it was a federal matter.

Mr. Howe. -

It is a federal matter in Germany, and 12,000,000 of people are under law.

Mr. Barton. -

That may be the case in Germany, but I have yet to learn that any one here has thought fit to take the distribution of functions and powers in Germany as an exemplar for an Australian Federation. Nor will I consent to be bound by the action of Germany as a precedent, when I consider under what circumstances the German Federation was brought about. If it was not made at the sword's point it was made at a distance uncommonly near it. In regard to old-age pensions, one would have thought that we would have some argument to show that the persons who become old, who would principally be of the working classes, should be dealt with by the federal authority as a matter of reason. Precedents from Germany will not affect the question. I do not think there is any precedent in any English-speaking country on the subject. What is the question or reason? Why should there be old-age pensions in the Commonwealth, which does not deal with the territorial rights of the states, of the development of their lands, their railways, and their industrial occupation in any way except so far as it has power to frame a Tariff? It has not to do with any of these matters. Therefore, it seems to me that, inasmuch as the persons who are unable to assist themselves when they arrive at old age, and who, therefore, may be said to have some claim for assistance from the Government, have a much better claim if the matter is to be considered as a claim against the Government under whose regulations of industry their old age has come upon them, without provision being made for it. When one considers that the occupations of the people are more or less inseparably associated with the land which remains in the control of the state, and is regulated by that state, we must come to the conclusion that the conditions which lead to the pauperism of the old are conditions created by the state itself, if really the pauperism of the old is created by any conditions for which they are not responsible. If any conditions created pauperism in old age it must be those conditions which arise necessarily from the matters which are purely within the sphere of state control. If that is true—and I believe it is, with every respect for those who hold contrary opinions—I think those responsible for such conditions should take upon themselves the burden of ameliorating them, and those are not the federal power, but the power of the states. For these reasons I confess that my opinion has not been changed.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria).—

I intend to change my vote. I voted against this proposal when it first came on, but I intend to vote for it now. I think it due, however, to the members of the Convention to explain briefly my reasons. I vote now with much misgiving and after a great deal of thought. I am not at all surprised at the opposition which the proposal has met with from the leader of the Convention. I do not agree with what Mr. Holder said on the first occasion when it came before us that any one who would vote against this proposal was not a sincere supporter of old-age pensions. Many of us were a good deal hurt by that statement. I will tell the honorable member that I voted against old-age pensions in the Federal Constitution, because I wanted to see an experiment in old-age pensions made by the states. It seems to me that these Australian colonies are a grand field for experiments in such matters. I was hoping sincerely that we should have experiments here and there, and that we should learn by our mistakes, one colony from the other. I admit there is this argument to be urged: That is, I cannot conceive how you can apply a good old-age pension law to a migratory population like that we have in Australia. What are you to do with a man who spends one-third of his time in Queensland, another third in Victoria, and the remaining third in Western Australia, as a miner? The difficulty is immense when you come to look into details. I am glad I voted against the matter in the first instance, because it has helped to give further time for thought. None of us should be too proud to alter a vote if he thinks he is wrong. With regard to the objection of the leader of the Convention, it was an argument that affected my mind a great deal in another form when the proposal was first put before the Convention. He says that your charities are under state laws, and how are you then to draw the line and say that old-age pensions are to be under the federal law? But when it comes to that, I would point out that our old civil servants with pensions, and the old soldiers in England with pensions, still have to go to the district hospital, and there is no clashing about it. I have, therefore, to say in brief—because I admit I have not the right to make a long speech upon this subject—that although I did feel that this attempt to put in the Federal Constitution the power to legislate upon old-age pensions was the outcome of an effort of certain of our Governments to shunt the obligations of dealing with these matters—there are two or three of our Governments which have come face to face with the necessity of dealing with old-age pensions, and I thought they were rather anxious to shunt the matter and say that it could be best dealt with by the Federal Parliament—I see now that I did them an injustice in having that opinion, and I do not think now that there was any such feeling in the minds of honorable members who supported Mr. Howe's motion. Therefore, I withdraw any such imputation as that. I realize that there are practical difficulties in a country so remote as Australia is, with a population so migratory as we have, in carrying out a scheme of old-age pensions in any state, and I feel justified in changing my vote upon the question upon the present occasion.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I voted with my honorable friend (Mr. Howe) on the last occasion when this matter was under discussion, and like my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) I see no reason to change my mind. I cannot agree with my honorable friend when he says that those who are responsible for the condition of affairs should bear the burden. It has been said by several honorable members that the people of Australia are migratory, and that they go from one colony to another. How then can it be said that the man who has spent most of his life in one colony or in several colonies, and who migrates to another colony in his old age, and becomes a burden on the state, has a right to consider that that state is responsible for him? We should remember, I think, that we are trying to build up a federation of these colonies, and that the term "migratory" will scarcely apply, because whether we live in one part of Australia or another, we hope that we may always consider ourselves at home in our own country. It seems to me, sir, that under these conditions the state will be unable to deal with this question, seeing that people are constantly coming and going-living in one state when they are young, going to other states as they grow up, and perhaps returning to the former state when they grow old. How could a state deal with a matter like old-age pensions in as satisfactory a manner as the Commonwealth under circumstances of that kind? Of course, I do not wish any remarks I have made either on this or the former occasion to lead to the belief that I wish to encourage pauperism or to induce people to think that they can lead reckless valueless lives and become dependent on the state in their old age. That is not my object at all.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Nor, I feel, is it the object of my honorable friend (Mr. Howe). But I feel that this is a matter that should be within the discretion of the Federal Parliament to deal with. We are not asking for any hard-and-fast line to be laid down upon this matter, but simply that the Federal Parliament shall have power to deal with the question. Surely there should be no objection, considering the many powers we are giving to the Federal Parliament, to including amongst these powers the power to deal with this matter of old-age pensions. We hope that the barriers which now exist between us will, if not removed altogether, at least be to some extent removed; and, therefore, I cannot understand those who wish to restrict this great question to management by the states, when every one surely must see that the Federal Parliament, having control of the whole of the people of the colonies, will be in a far better position to deal with this difficult question than the states. At any rate, viewing the matter from this stand-point, I must support, to the utmost of my power, the proposal put forward by my honorable friend (Mr. Howe).

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -
This subject is one to which I have given a great deal of thought, and one which I believe to be of very grave importance. I think it is imperatively necessary that the Governments of the various civilized countries of the world shall in the near future make some provision for the evening of the lives of those who have worn themselves out in the service of their country. Because, I hold that it is utterly unimportant where a man works, he is still working for his country. He may be a soldier prepared to fight for his country, he may be a civil servant working in one of the departments of the state, or he may be a navvy assisting to build a railway which is to develop the country in which he lives—he may be anything, but, so long as he is working in the country, he is serving the rest of the people of that country. When this question was before the Convention previously, I voted against Mr. Howe's proposal to give the Federal Parliament at the beginning the power to deal with old-age pensions. I believed then, and believe now, that giving this power to the Federal Parliament will have the effect of retarding rather than advancing this movement. I have, however, since the matter was last before the Convention, consulted a large number of persons whose opinion I value very highly, and I have arrived at the view that the inclusion of this provision amongst the powers of the Parliament will very materially add to the passage of the Bill when presented to the people for their vote. Having that thought in mind, I have resolved on this occasion to vote for the inclusion of the provision in the Constitution at this stage. It will be remembered that I urged and held then that ultimately, before the matter could be effectively dealt with, it would require to be handed over to the Federal Parliament. My view was that the states which undertook to legislate upon this subject would find that, with a population so migratory as ours, the difficulty is too great, and would have to ask the Federal Parliament to take the question up. I felt then, and I feel now, that the fact of the states dealing with the question, and seeing its difficulty in actual operation, and calling upon the Federal Parliament to deal with it, would conduce to the old-age pensions subject being legislated upon by the Federal Parliament at a much earlier stage than would otherwise be the case. But in view of the widespread feeling amongst the working classes that this question is so important, and can be so much more effectively dealt with collectively than separately as regards the states, I have resolved to vote for the amendment, and hope it will be included in the Constitution, for the reason that it will be one other inducement to a large number of persons to accept the Federal Constitution when it is submitted. I hope that my fears—which I still hold—that the inclusion of the proposals now may possibly temporarily retard the adoption by the states of this principle will be more than compensated for by the effectiveness of it when it is dealt with by the Federal Parliament.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I will put it that this proposed new sub-section be sub-section (24A) in clause 52, instead of sub-section (23), because I think that divorce ought to come after marriage.

Question-That the proposed new sub-section be inserted in the Bill-put.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
Clause 45, sub-section (4). - In the case of a proposed law which the Senate may not amend, the Senate may at any stage return it to the House of Representatives with a message requesting the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein. And the House of Representatives may, if it thinks fit, make such omissions or amendments, or any of them, with or without modifications.
Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I have not given notice of motion for the recommittal of this sub-section, but may I ask one question about it? It has been suggested to me that there is not anything to hinder the Senate, if its suggestions have not been accepted, from making other suggestions. I wish to ask the Drafting Committee, because it will become a very important matter, are they clear that, if a suggestion has been made by the Senate and it has not been accepted, the Senate is bound down to the duty of simply accepting or rejecting the whole Bill?

Mr. BROWN. -

What is the meaning of the words "at any stage"?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Quite so; of course that question might become very important. The leader of the Convention will see that it is an important matter whether there is to be only one suggestion or several.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

As I understand it, the proposal is that the Senate may, at any stage of the passage of a proposed law through the Senate, return the Bill to the House of Representatives with a message requesting the amendment or omission of any items or provisions therefrom.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

As long as the Senate has possession of the Bill?

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, as long as the Bill is in the hands of the Senate. That means, I take it, a power not solely to send a Bill down at a stage at which the measure has, at the moment, arrived at, but that if it arrives at a further stage in the Senate, there being in the meantime some settlement or no settlement with regard to the suggestion made, that the Senate would have power to make other suggestions. Whether it would have power to repeat the same suggestion is a matter I have not considered, but it seems to me that there is nothing in this clause to restrict the Senate, after making a suggestion at one stage of the Bill, from making another suggestion at another stage of the measure, as long as the Bill is in the course of its passage through the Senate.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -

I offer the suggestion that in this, as in many other matters, if we try to define too closely and too accurately we shall be doing mischief instead of good. In this particular case I presume it would be a matter of arrangement in the standing orders of the two Houses as to how a Bill should be dealt with under the general powers given in the clause. It would be quite impossible and very unwise for us to attempt to do what can be better done by the standing orders of the two Houses.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I should like to ask the Hon. Mr. Barton whether the last sentence of this paragraph does not require some qualification to make the amendments after a certain date subject to the standing orders? I think there is a stage in the passing of a Bill at which you cannot make any further amendments, and this might leave it open to the House of Representatives to deal with a Bill at a stage at which the amendment could not be made.

Mr. BARTON. -

The Senate must have the Bill in its hands, otherwise it could not return it to the House of Representatives.

Mr. GLYNN. -

It says at any stage. The Bill might be returned at a stage at which it could not be amended. I merely mention the point.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think the point mentioned by the honorable member can very well be met by standing orders. In clause 51 there is power to make standing orders for the maintenance of the privileges and immunities of both Houses and for the conduct of the business, and I take it that within the powers given by statute any standing order by which these things could be done would be valid.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

The reading given to sub-section (4) by our leader has come upon me as a surprise. The matter is really of very great importance. The understanding was that the Senate, being restricted in its powers as to Money Bills, is simply to have the right to make one suggestion.

Mr. BARTON. -

I never heard that said.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It has been said by a number of honorable members.

Mr. SYMON. -

Nobody ever said that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I should like to test the question, and I beg to move-

That the words "at any stage" be omitted, with a view to the substitution of the word "once."

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I do not want to raise any long discussion upon the matter. It is a matter that has been thought over and debated for years. I simply desire to finally test the opinion of the Convention on the sub-section. From my point of view, as one of the members of the Convention who wish to maintain the rights of the House of Representatives over Money Bills, Bills imposing taxation, and Bills appropriating money for the annual service of the Commonwealth, upon lines similar to those observed in the old country in connexion with the House of Commons, I beg to move-

That sub-section

I confess I cannot see any difference between allowing the Senate to amend Money Bills by altering them, and requesting the concurrence of the Lower House in the alteration, and not altering the Bill, but sending down a suggestion that a Bill should be altered in the other House in a similar form.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

There is a great difference.

Mr. REID. -

I defer very much to the right honorable member on many points, but on this point I have an authority of greater weight, that of Sir Samuel Griffith, who was one of the chief authors of this Draft Bill as it stood in 1891. I notice that he, in his Notes on the Draft Federal Constitution, framed at Adelaide in 1897, makes these observations:-

Whether the mode in which the Senate should express its desire for an alteration in Money Bills is by an amendment in which they request the concurrence of the House of Representatives as in other cases, or by a suggestion that the desired amendment should be made by the Lower House, as of its own motion, seems to be a matter of minor importance. A strong Senate will compel attention to its suggestions; a weak one would not insist on its amendments.

Mr. DOBSON. -

That is why we have accepted the compromise which you are now trying to undo.

Mr. REID. -

What compromise?

Mr. DOBSON. -

That the Senate should have the power to suggest, and not the power to amend.

Mr. REID. -

That is what I am objecting to, and I thought I had made myself clear.

Mr. DOBSON. -

That is the compromise that was arrived at after hours of discussion.

Mr. REID. -

Exactly. And now I have the effrontery to ask the Convention finally to reconsider the matter, because I regard it as of very great importance. At the same time, I believe there is a large majority of the Convention against me, and that I shall not be able to convince them. I wish simply to discharge my conscience in the matter by bringing it under the notice of the Convention. I know that the Convention has among its ranks two or three antiquated tories, who cannot possibly be converted to anything in the shape of radical legislation such as that which prevails in the House of Commons.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

The House of Lords is not an elective body.

Mr. REID. -

I believe that is true; still I do not think it bears much on sub-section (4) of clause 54. I have always felt that any contention about the respective powers of the two Houses would be a positive calamity. It may-I hope it will not-yield disastrous results. The effect of the sub-section will be this: We give the Senate the right to go over each item in an Appropriation Bill, a Taxation Bill, or a Tariff Bill, and to suggest to us out of their wisdom and reflection alterations to be made in those Bills. If that is not inviting the other Chamber to exercise an equal judgment in financial matters, I do not know what is-and that would be a calamity. I believe the system which prevails in the mother country is the best for imitation by us. There should be only one financial House, and any attempt to create two would lead to disaster. Strong as my opinion is, I pay the utmost deference to the fact that the delegates have thought this matter out over again and again, and I simply express my views. If I find that I do not get sufficient encouragement on the voices, I certainly do not propose to call for a division.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I think, if I may say so with due respect, the right honorable member should be satisfied with what he has got. He knows very well that he has inserted in the Constitution a provision which does not find any place in the Constitution of any Australian colony except Victoria, that is, an express provision that the Senate shall not amend a Money Bill. We know very well that no such provision exists in any Australian Constitution except that of Victoria, in which I believe it got by chance, nor does it find a place in the great British Constitution, which the right honorable member so much admires. He knows very well that, although constitutional government exists, in two colonies the provision as to amendments is insisted upon where it finds no place in the Constitution Act. In Tasmania the Legislative Council amends Money Bills as it chooses without any battles being fought.

Mr. REID. -

That accounts for a good deal that I never could understand.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

In South Australia they have a compact by which the power of suggestion which is embodied in this Bill is used by the Legislative Council, although there is no provision to that effect in the Constitution Act. Here in this Bill we have an express provision that the Senate shall not amend not only an Appropriation Bill, but also any Taxation Bill. The right honorable member quoted Sir Samuel Griffith to show that there was very little difference between the power of suggestion and the power of amendment. I, with the greatest respect to that authority, think that there is a very great difference between the two powers. In the one case the Upper House merely sends back the Bill asking the Lower House if it will be good enough to amend the Bill, but the Lower House says "No, we cannot do anything of the sort," so that the responsibility of throwing out the Bill rests with the Upper House. In the other case, the Upper House sends the Bill amended down to the Lower House, and the responsibility of throwing out the Bill rests with the Lower House. I think there is a very marked difference between the two cases, because in one case the responsibility rests with the Upper House, and in the other with the Lower House. I think that this is the least that these honorable members who have urged so strongly-

Mr. SYMON. -

Antiquated tories, Mr. Reid says.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I do not care for that. I think he is a bigger tory than we are, and I do not know that he is any the worse for that. Seeing that we were defeated on two occasions in our endeavour to insure that the Senate should have absolutely equal power with the House of Representatives, and that we have not sought to renew the conflict, I think the right honorable member should be satisfied with the compromise arrived at, not altogether to our liking, but still the best we could obtain. I think we have all come to this conclusion that the clause as it stands is the best compromise we can get between those who wish the two Houses to have equal powers, and those who wish the House of Representatives to be paramount in regard to financial legislation. That being so, I hope the right honorable member will withdraw his amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to. Progress was reported.

The Convention adjourned at two minutes past ten p.m.
Return: Appeals to the Privy Council-Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at thirty-three minutes past ten o'clock a.m.

APPEALS TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
I desire to lay on the table a Return of Appeals to the Privy Council against decisions of the Supreme Court of Queensland, from 1888 to 1898. It has been prepared under the sanction of the Chief Justice of Queensland. I beg to move that the return be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.
Clause 55. - (1) Laws imposing taxation shall deal only with the imposition of taxation.
(2) Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of customs or of excise, shall deal with one subject of taxation only; but laws imposing duties of customs shall deal with duties of customs only, and laws imposing duties of excise shall deal with duties of excise only.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I should like to draw the serious attention of the committee to this clause. I am aware that the form in which it now exists was deliberately decided upon in Adelaide for a particular purpose; but I would call the careful attention of the committee to the consequences of that form, and ask honorable members whether we are not incurring, for the sake of a fancied security in one direction, very great danger in another direction? In clause 54 we have provided what the powers of the Houses in regard to Money Bills are respectively to be, and we are seeking to provide in clause 55 for further protection for the Senate. Now, in providing that further protection for the Senate, we have gone, it seems to me, a great deal too far, in the interests of both the Senate and the House of Representatives, and in the interests of the small states as well as of the large states. I suppose no one... here wants to take any step which would have the effect of throwing the whole of the Commonwealth into confusion; but that is what clause 55, in its present form, may very easily do. What I am perfectly willing to accede to, in view of what has been decided upon in other directions, is this: That the Senate shall have the full power under the Constitution to decline to consider any measure, and shall have the warrant of the very words of the Constitution in declining to consider measures that do not comply with the provisions of the Constitution. But what I do strongly object to is this: That when the Senate has, with its eyes open, voluntarily agreed to deal with a measure, or when the House of Representatives has, with its eyes open, voluntarily agreed to deal with a measure in a certain way, and in each case a measure within the jurisdiction of the Parliament, it shall still be within the power of an individual in a state, after the measure has been passed, to bring the matter up before the Supreme Court, and have the deliberate will of both Houses of Parliament set aside. But that is what might easily happen, and what probably would happen, as the clause is now framed, if any mistake were to occur in an Appropriation or a Tax Bill. Honorable members will see throughout clause 54 the expression "proposed laws imposing taxation," and "proposed laws appropriating revenue," and so on. Well, it was pointed out very strongly and clearly that where that expression was used it is a political question that is involved, and the Houses of Parliament may, if they choose-it may be a question of emergency or it may not-deal with that matter as a political question. But when, in clause 55, we depart from that language of "proposed" laws, and use the phrases "laws imposing taxation shall deal only with the imposition of taxation," and "laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of customs or of excise, shall deal with one subject of taxation only," and also that "a law which appropriates revenue or moneys for the ordinary annual services of the Government shall deal only with such appropriation," it becomes a matter of constitutional law, which may be insisted on by the Supreme Court; and if any Act is proved, by some ingenious technical argument, to depart from the provisions of that clause; as, for instance, if it were held by the court that an Act which imposed taxation happened to repeal some other tax, or possibly if it contained machinery, the Act might be construed by the court as going beyond the clause, or, if being a law which appropriated the ordinary annual services, it contained an item or two beyond the ordinary annual services of the Government in regard to appropriation, it might be held that the law, not complying with this clause, was invalid. And it might be set aside at a time when Parliament was not sitting, and thus the whole machinery of government might be brought to a stand-still. Now, that is a position which it is horrible to contemplate, and what I am prepared to do—and I think it is quite sufficient for the purpose—is to say that wherever we have got the word "laws" in clause 55, we should insert "proposed laws." Then if the House of Representatives ventured to attempt to break through the Constitution by sending up a Bill containing two subjects of taxation, the Senate would have those express words, and not merely an implication, to rely on in dealing with the Bill. There would be no question raised as to whether the relative positions of the two Houses of the Federal Parliament here were the same as the relative positions of the House of Lords and the House of Commons in England. The Senate, in such a case, would have express authority for saying that the Bill should deal with only one subject of taxation, and the whole of the people of the Commonwealth would support the Senate in refusing to assent to a breach of the Constitution by passing a Bill which contained two subjects of taxation. As the clause stands, a very doubtful question would arise, as may be easily understood, not simply a question of daylight on the one side and midnight darkness on the other, but a question in the region of legal twilight, where lawyers could hardly distinguish the one from the other. And suppose both Houses of the Federal Parliament, in perfectly good faith, accepted a Tax Bill as complying with the Constitution, and after Parliament rose from its session, some individual proposed to be taxed went to the Supreme Court and complained that the law imposing such taxation was unconstitutional, the Supreme Court, after all the struggles over the question in Parliament, and after the matters in dispute had been settled by the Legislature, might find it to be its solemn though reluctant duty to decide that the law in question was unconstitutional, therefore, not legal, and thus the whole scheme of taxation which that measure contained would fall to the ground. Again, if an Appropriation Bill purporting to appropriate the ordinary annual services of the Government happened, through an oversight in the hurry of drafting and passing the Bill, to contain one item which was not a part of the ordinary annual services, although there had been no attempt on the part of one House to override the Constitution, and no belief in the other House that there was any such attempt, so that the rights of both Houses were absolutely conserved as far as intention was concerned, yet that Bill, containing that one item, not complying with this clause, would have to be declared invalid. Surely it is not too much to ask for an amendment of this clause which will prevent such a thing as that?

Mr. DOBSON. -

The Supreme Court would never decide—that an Appropriation Bill was invalid because of such an over-sight, because the intention of Parliament would be manifest to the court.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is not a question of intention, but a question of effect. The honorable member knows that in America there is a provision that Bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

If the word "Bills" were inserted in clause 55 instead of "laws," would not that cure the defect you complain of?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes; or if you used the term "proposed laws," as in clause 54.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Many of us strongly supported that as a drafting amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If the word "Bills" or the term "proposed laws" were used in this clause 55 there would be no objection. In answer to Mr. Dobson's statement, that the court would not take the view that an Appropriation Act was invalid because of a technical illegality, the result of an over-sight, I may point out that the same difficulty has been seen elsewhere. I was not aware, when I first raised this question in Adelaide, that the matter had been so strongly insisted on by the eminent Dr. Burgess, who points out on page 196, vol. I., of his Sovereignty and Liberty, that-

The House of Representatives itself has not the power, either by separate resolution, or by joining with the Senate and the President in a law to that effect, to permit the Senate, or any other branch of the Government, to originate a Bill for the raising of revenue; and I think it is at least a question whether, should the Senate or the President undertake to assume this power, and the House acquiesce in the usurpation, the individual may not defend himself in the courts of the United States against the collection from him of any tax so levied, on the ground of its unconstitutionality. It does not seem to me that the judicial power could excuse itself from taking jurisdiction under the plea that this is a political question. As a general principle, the distribution of powers by the Constitution between the different departments of the Government is a political question; but in this particular instance private property would be distinctly involved, and the United States courts have never declined jurisdiction where private property was immediately affected, on the ground that the question was political.

Mr. DOBSON. -

There is a difference between a political question and an omission caused by an error or an oversight.
Mr. ISAACS. -

The court would not consider whether it was an oversight or not. They would take the law and ask whether it complied with the Constitution. If it did not, they would say that it was invalid. They would not go into the question of what was in the minds of the Members of Parliament when the law was passed. That would be a political question which it would be impossible for the court to determine. We make this great distinction, but the same distinction is not preserved on behalf of the House of Representatives. We say that the great power of the purse—the power to originate Appropriation Bills—shall rest with the House of Representatives. And when we come to the question of the Senate's rights and privileges, we allow the validity of laws to be determined by the Supreme Court. In doing so we are making not only a mistake, but drawing a most unfair distinction between the two Houses.

Mr. HOLDER. -

A measure would be valid while it was a Bill, and invalid when it became a law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is a very terse and correct way of putting it, and it proves the absurdity of the provision. We are, in my opinion, making the Senate too strong a body. To allow these matters to be carried into the Supreme Court is to say that the Senate cannot protect itself, and that the states cannot protect themselves. Surely that is not to be thought of for a moment. We want a people's Constitution, not a lawyers' Constitution. We shall be making the Supreme Court, not the master, but the tyrant of the Constitution, by inserting a clause of this kind. I do strongly appeal to my honorable friends to alter the clause in some way. My view is that we should put in the word "proposed." At all events, we should do something in this direction, and we should at least make a distinct provision that if a Bill does not comply with this clause, the invalidity should go no further than the additional matter. That could be worked out no doubt in an Appropriation Bill, but

Mr. BARTON. -

Are not the annual services the annual expenditure proper to the public service?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Supposing that some compensation were being paid to a discharged public servant. That would not come within the ordinary annual services. It would not be proper to the public service of the Commonwealth. It would not be a payment for services rendered in the future, but for services in the past. We all know that in connexion with the ordinary annual Appropriation Bills questions arise that make it very difficult to say what is and what is not an ordinary annual service. The affairs of Government, especially in money matters, are so complicated that I absolutely dread a proposal of this kind, which would offer an invitation to people who did not like a Taxation Bill, and could raise some objection to it, to take it into the Supreme Court, and, if necessary, to carry it to the Privy Council. What a fearful state of confusion we would be in if a trouble of that kind arose! This leads me to say—and I would ask the Drafting Committee to bear the point in mind—that we ought to have some provision in the Bill rendering it possible for a case to be stated and questions to be put to the Supreme Court in regard to matters of doubt as to the legality or constitutionality of a Bill.

Mr. Barton. - Could not that be provided for by an alteration in sub-section (37) of clause 52?

Mr. Isaacs. - I should be satisfied on that point if that is so.

Mr. Higgins. - Would it not be better to say "any infringement of the provisions in this section shall not affect the validity of the law if passed"?

Mr. Isaacs. - Some words to that effect were proposed by the Right Hon. Mr. Reid, in Adelaide. They would do, but still, I think, the words proposed ought to go in.

Mr. Higgins. - I admit that; but we might insert the other words to make assurance doubly sure.

Mr. Isaacs. - Yes, it would be a desirable addition in any event, but we should have to put the same words in certain other clauses, and we ought to have the words proposed in. We should otherwise be saying that laws which do not comply with this provision shall be invalid, and that they shall not be invalid. I beg to move-

That the word "proposed" be inserted before the word "laws."

Mr. Glynn (South Australia). - I am opposed to the insertion of the word "proposed," because I think that such an amendment would be nothing more than a whittling down of the protection given by the clause to the Senate. This is not a matter of procedure. The question was discussed in Adelaide from two points of view—the protection of the states through the Senate, and the procedure between the two Houses. We have determined that this is not a matter of procedure, but a protection to the electorates the Senate represents. We can imagine a case in which the Senate, through carelessness, or because of there being a majority in sympathy with the House of Representatives, would allow a law in breach of these provisions to go through. What protection would then be left to the states? Absolutely none.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That assumes that the senators may neglect their duty.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Of course it does; but it also assumes that there may be a majority in sympathy with the House of Representatives in the Senate, which has power to stop this class of legislation. The German Constitution goes to extraordinary lengths in the protection of minorities in the Senate. Fourteen out of 58 members can stop the hand of pressure. That indicates a determination that minorities shall not be paralyzed by chance majorities in the Senate.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

In Germany they would not treat a law as invalid because of an irregularity.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I think they would, because it is fixed in the Constitution. There is no special court, but the general courts would undoubtedly protect the states. What Mr. Isaacs seeks to do is to prevent the question of ultra vires arising after a law has been passed.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No. If it is ultra vires of the Constitution it would, of course, be invalid.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The honorable member says that, unless we put in the word "proposed," it would be open to any citizen to challenge the law on the ground that it incorporated two classes of laws, which the Constitution says shall not be done.

Mr. HOLDER. -

You would give the courts power to upset all the Parliament has done.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Are we not protecting the Senate by saying that no law shall be passed contrary to the Constitution. If you allow the mere chance of a law going through-

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The mere chance of a law going through! What a comment on the Senate.
Mr. GLYNN. -

It might go through owing to carelessness or because there was a majority. We know that majorities are sometimes the result of understandings in reference to matters of policy, and there might be a majority in the Senate in favour of the policy of the House of Representatives. Our principle is to protect the rights of the states—not of all the states only, but of each individual state—as against a majority in the House of Representatives or even in the Senate itself. Dr. Burgess does not urge a change of policy. This question has never cropped up in the United States, but he puts a supposititious case, and says that if there was an agreement between the House of Representatives and the Senate to allow an Appropriation Bill to be brought in by the Senate that agreement would not destroy the constitutional right of a subject to test the question of whether the law was ultra vires. Dr. Burgess does not state that the fact that a law can be subsequently tested is an injustice, and it is somewhat significant that he deals with this question under the heading of the special protection granted to individuals as against the encroachment of the parliamentary power.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

There is no doubt that it is of the very highest importance that we should strengthen the Senate, and keep it strong and powerful, in the interests of all the states in the Federation, and particularly in the interests of what are called the smaller states. I am inclined to agree with Mr. Isaacs in regard to this provision, and to take the view that it really is a provision inserted for the purpose of strengthening the Senate, so far as regards its procedure, against the House of Representatives, and not for the purpose of constituting a base from which an attack may afterwards be made on laws which the Senate, either by a majority or through carelessness, may have elected to pass, although not pursuing the procedure laid down in the clause. It appears to me, resolute as I am in my desire to strengthen the Senate, that this provision is inserted to enable the Senate to say to the House of Representatives—"If you make a tack to a Taxation Bill, we shall decline to entertain it, and will send it back to you."

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No one objects to that.

Mr. SYMON. -

Precisely; and that is the limit to which this protection ought to go. The principle is not to secure the invalidity of the law, simply because this procedure has been infringed, but to place an instrument of defence in the hands of the Senate against the encroachment of the House of Representatives. To that extent I think it is ample. If a Bill were sent up to the Senate encroaching upon this procedure, they would at once say to the House of Representatives-"This is a violation of what has been laid down in the Constitution as to the procedure to be followed, and we will not listen to you for a moment." I believe that the members of the Senate from the other states besides the small states would join in vindicating their position in that fashion. It is a very different thing to say that if the Senate willingly allow an irregularity of that kind to pass, the whole taxation system of the country shall be set at nought or thrown into disorder. There may be great difficulty in carrying out the idea. We ought to take care that the system is made perfectly safe and perfectly secure so that there shall be no violation of it. There is difficulty in doing that, and at the same time avoiding what is not intended to be secured, namely, the protection of the Senate against its own wilful and its own negligent acts. So long as you strengthen the Senate by giving the power, that is all the provisions are intended to do. Ordinarily, I suppose, these powers would be embodied in the rules or standing orders as between the two Houses. We have put them as part of the compromise we have entered into, and, therefore, they appear in the Constitution. But, I think, something ought to be done to guard against the mischief which Mr. Isaacs points out, whilst at the same time preserving to its fullest extent the protection to the Senate which is given here.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I sincerely hope the amendment will not be carried. This is not a matter of form, but one of vital substance to the Constitution. Parliament is given an opportunity from time to time by a resolution of both Houses, or without any resolution at all, to deprive the states and the Senate of the greatest of all protection; that is, that no Bill shall deal with more than one subject-matter.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Are they not capable of protecting themselves and saying-"We will not consider it"?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I am not so dull as not to have followed the honorable member. The Constitution is not superior to the Senate or the House of Representatives, but can be altered. But it is not to be frittered away by a too facile Senate.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Or a temporary wave of popular fervour.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Or a temporary wave of popular fervour in the House of Representatives.
We are not merely legislating for the Senate that happens to be in esse, but for all time until the Constitution shall be properly altered.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is not the object of the clause to secure to the Senate its full power of amendment in regard to Bills, except certain limited Bills?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

To prevent "tacking"; that is practically what the clause is for.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is to secure both bodies from the effects of popular passion.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

It was agreed, after discussion, that the Senate should not be allowed to alter Money Bills, at any rate, so far as the ordinary Appropriation Bill is concerned. The object of this was to prevent the House of Representatives by indirect means tacking onto Money Bills, which the Senate could not alter, other provisions to which the Senate might be much opposed. That method, after a great deal of thought and much discussion, was adopted. That did not interfere-and very rightly and properly did not interfere-with the procedure in Parliament. But in effect it was said that if the procedure resulted in a law dealing with more than one subject-matter that law would be invalid, and the court would be the vindicator of the Constitution.

friend (Mr. Isaacs) considers that his motion is only a matter of form. Does he think it a matter of much substance?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do. I think it is a matter of great importance to the people that they should not be thrown into great confusion financially.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

And would the people be thrown into great confusion financially by the House of Representatives taking care to obey the Constitution? So long as the Constitution is obeyed, and more than one subject-matter is not dealt with in a Bill, it will be all right.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

So long as the Senate does not pass it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not understand my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin)-"So long as the Senate does not pass it."

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes; you are putting all the blame on the House of Representatives, ignoring the fact that both Houses must equally accept the measure.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Granting the Senate is incapable, what is the good of the Constitution?
Why not say that the whole law of the land shall be administered-

Mr. TRENWITH. -

The object of the clause is to protect the Senate; if it does not want protection, why interfere subsequently?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think the operation of the clause would be to weaken the Senate. The object is to increase the power of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Clause 55?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

The amendment the honorable member has moved is distinctly for the purpose of weakening the Senate.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, no.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

If the honorable member does not mean that he is doing worse than he intended, because the inevitable result would be the weakening of the Senate. I thought from the speech of Mr. Isaacs that that was what he did mean. That I take to be his meaning from his interjections from time to time, because he has said the finances would be disorganized.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It seems that the Constitution is, made for the Senate, and not for the people.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Not even for the Senate.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Now it is coming out. The Constitution is made for the people and the states on terms that are just to both.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is made for the lawyers under this clause.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not think so. If you say "Trust the Parliament," no Constitution is required at all; it can simply be provided that a certain number of gentlemen shall be elected, and meet together, and, without limitation, do what they like. Victoria would not agree to that. But there is a desire to draw the very life-blood of the Constitution, so far as the states are concerned, by this insidious amendment, which would give the Houses authority from time to time to put different constructions on this most important part of the Constitution. I hope we will do as we have done in many instances before, in matters that have been much debated-adhere to the decision we have already arrived at.
In the earlier stages of the history of the Convention we heard the doctrine propounded of "Trust the Federal Parliament." It seems that doctrine has been exploded, and that we are approaching another doctrine-"Do not trust the Senate." Here is a privilege supposed to be put in the Constitution especially to protect the Senate, and to increase its power, influence, and independence. Now it is assumed that the Senate cannot be trusted—that the Chamber for whose special benefit, honour, and dignity this power is to be inserted cannot be trusted. You cannot trust it or its President, or its majority, to avail itself of its own privileges; you want to place a power in this Constitution in another body outside the Senate to protect the privileges of the Senate. I, for one, have a higher opinion of the authority, influence, and independence of the Senate than those who now want to hedge about the Senate with this judicial protection. In the first place, it is not necessary to hedge the Senate about with this judicial protection. The Senate should be quite capable of protecting and defending itself against any invasion of its privileges from another Chamber. There are two methods in which the privileges of the Senate can be defended; first, there is the President, whose absolute duty it would be to rule out of order any Bill from the House of Representatives infringing or violating those privileges. It would be the prerogative of the President to do this, absolutely regardless of the opinion of the Senate itself. The President has not merely to act upon a point taken by a member of the Senate, but is placed in his position to act of his own motion, without waiting to have his attention directed to any particular clause infringing the Constitution. It would be the duty of a President to say that the Bill was out of order, and it would then be sent back to the House of Representatives with an intimation to that effect. I venture to question whether even a majority of the Senate would dare to attempt to override a decision of the President. We are asked to assume, firstly, that the President would not do his duty; then we are asked to go further, and assume that the majority would either wink at infringements of the Constitution or fail to do its duty. Secondly, we are asked to create a judicial body outside Parliament, with power to declare that after the Bill has been passed, it is ultra vires, not on the ground of substance, or that it deals with a matter with which it has no substantial jurisdiction to deal—one could understand that—but that a Bill is ultra vires on the ground that there has been some mistake in procedure in the progress of the Bill through Parliament. It would be, in my opinion, an absolute degradation of the Federal Parliament to allow such power to be exercised even by a judicial body, not only on account of the inconvenience which might result, as pointed out by Mr. Isaacs, but also on account of the absolute indignity it would inflict on the Federal Parliament. The Supreme Court would have undoubted and righteous jurisdiction on a point of substance. But it is another matter to say that the Supreme Court should have power to interfere in a technical question of procedure in reference to a Bill passed by the two Federal Houses, and declare a Bill on that ground to be ultra vires. We ought to fairly trust that that House which is clothed with privilege to exercise that privilege will preserve it, and we ought not to assume that that House will not do its constitutional duty.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

It is worth while considering the stages that a proposed law has to go through, and the opportunity afforded to a member of either House or a member of the Executive to call attention to any infraction or infringement of the Constitution. It does not require a majority of the members of the House of Representatives to insist that the Constitution shall be obeyed in the matter of procedure; it only requires one solitary member to rise to a point of order, and the Speaker has to give a legal interpretation of the rules of procedure. It only requires one member of the Senate to call the attention of the President to the fact that a Bill is introduced contrary to the Constitution for that proposed law to be ruled out of order. It does not require a majority of the states to insist that the Constitution shall be obeyed, because a majority of the states cannot by resolution infringe the Constitution. Neither House could pass the standing order which would give the majority power to dissent from the Speaker's or President's ruling. The standing orders only confer certain explicit power. They give no power to either House to pass an order which would enable its members to amend the Constitution.

Therefore, the protection is absolutely effective, when one member of either House can by raising a point of order arrest the passage of a proposed law which infringes the rules regulating procedure. Then, after the law has been passed by both Houses, it is presented to the Governor for his assent. Under constitutional usage we know that the Governor always insists upon the Law officer of the Crown giving him a certificate that everything necessary to be complied with by law has been complied with. The Attorney-General for the time being has to give a certificate to the Governor, and we may be sure that that practice will be followed under the Federation. That is sufficient protection. Then there is the other ground, that this is a proposal to protect the rights of the people against the encroachments of the Legislature. I take the reverse proposition—that this is a proposal which will tend to inflict vast damage upon the people. Let us imagine that a Bill has passed Parliament imposing federal taxation. It has been in operation for five years. At the end of that time some skilled lawyer discovers a small flaw in the law. He discovers that in its operation the law has revealed that it includes some other subject besides the imposition of taxation. By this time the public finance has been built upon that law; the state finance, which depends on federal finance, has been also built up and administered on that law. Then the law is declared to be unconstitutional by the Federal High Court. Protection for the public! It maybe that some man who wishes to evade taxation is protected, but the general interests of the community are thrown into absolute chaos and confusion. The financial position of the states is wrecked. A return of the money collected has to be made for, perhaps, five years back, revenue has to be raised by some new contrivance; the states themselves, which by our Constitution have to depend for their finance upon the certainty and security of the federal finance, have their affairs also thrown into confusion. The idea of this protecting the public against the encroachments of the Legislature can be easily brushed aside when we see the danger that will attach to the whole of the community if we allow laws which have received the assent of the Legislature to be upset on a mere technicality. The finances of the state will never depend upon anything safer than the security of the public finance. Public finance rests on legislation imposing taxation. We have never yet heard in these colonies or in England, under the Constitution which we know, of cases where, after a Parliament had passed Acts imposing taxation (which measures are always very keenly criticised, and with difficulty borne by the people who have to pay the taxation), those Acts have been assailed as to their validity. We have heard of them being assailed as to their administration, but never as to their validity once the Royal assent has been given to them. We shall be creating a great danger to the Constitution if we allow the federal and state finance to depend upon a construction which may be placed upon laws affecting the validity of these laws at the date of their passage. I shall cordially support the amendment of Mr. Isaacs.

In this discussion we should consider what is the object that the clause we are now discussing is designed to achieve. We have decided that there shall be government by two Houses, and that in all general questions they shall have coordinate powers. But we have decided in connexion with finance that the people's House, in accordance with an axiom of the British Constitution, shall have control of the purse. In order to secure that we provide that the Second Chamber or Senate cannot amend a proposal which provides for the raising or expending of public money. It has been shown by experience that unless we make some provision against it, the House of Representatives may tack some extraneous matter on to a Money Bill, and thereby force it through the Senate. In order to prevent that, we have provided in the procedure that the Senate may object to deal with a Bill in connexion with which there is a tack. Why is that provision inserted? Not to protect the people at all, except to insure strength to resist on the part of the Senate. If the Senate feels no disposition to resist, if the Senate sees no tack or any extraneous matter in the Bill, there is no protection to the people in saying that the law shall be ultra vires, if it happens to be passed contrary to the procedure which we have provided. I impress this on honorable members, that all we are seeking to do in this clause is to protect the Senate from being coerced, but if we do not insert such an amendment as Mr. Isaacs has proposed, we shall render it possible for a law to be passed with the unanimous consent of both Houses, under the impression that it is in accordance with the prescribed procedure, and having in it no point that either of the Houses objects to. Yet an ingenious lawyer may at some time discover that there has been, inadvertently on the part of both Houses, a slight overlapping of forms of legislation, and that there is in a Money Bill some extraneous matter, and therefore the law is ultra vires. There are a large number of people who fear that this federation, when adopted, may lead to an extensive crop of litigation. I submit that no portion of the Bill is more likely to lead to ingenious searching for the purpose of instituting litigation than this procedure which is now proposed. If there is some slight infraction of the procedure it may be decreed that a law passed by both Houses, and assented to by the Crown, is ultra vires, not on the ground that it has dealt with anything that both Houses might not have approved of, not that it has dealt with anything outside the Constitution, but that it has dealt with some constitutional question perfectly within its rights, in a manner not prescribed and somewhat irregular. Surely an Act of Parliament ought not to be declared ultra vires by a court outside the Parliament which represents the people simply because there has been some slight mistake in the procedure—a mistake that was not known to any member of either House at the time the law was made, and a mistake that was only discovered subsequently by some extremely ingenious man, who exercised all his faculties in order to show that there had been some slight departure from the procedure laid down, and the law would then have to be declared ultra vires. I hope honorable members will not perpetrate such an outrage upon the people as to leave all their financial arrangements liable to be upset on such a ground. Honorable members should recollect the cause for which this procedure was adopted. There would be no harm to the people if 100 different subjects of legislation of which the people approved, and which were in the interests of the people, were passed in one Act. There can be no objection if all those laws are constitutional and are all desirable, and if they have the approval of both Houses. The only objection that could be raised would be that there might be a conflict between the Senate and the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives might desire to jamb down the throat of the Senate something that it did not want. This procedure will protect the Senate if we provide that it shall only apply to proposed laws, but if we say that this shall apply to all laws, and that subsequent to the laws being passed by both Houses, and assented to by the Crown, they may be declared ultra vires on account of a lapse which nobody noticed at the time, it will be utterly absurd, it will serve no useful purpose, and I believe it will lead to extreme inconvenience and disorganization.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I quite agree with Mr. Trenwith that the object of the provision is to protect the Senate from being coerced by the House which has the power of the purse primarily. But the question between us is not whether you should take away that protection, but whether you should allow the Senate itself to give up, whether by accident or design, on any particular occasion, the protection which the Constitution has implanted there for its benefit. The protection of this Constitution is given, not for the Senate for the time being, but for the people of the states whom the Senate represents. The question really is whether, for the purposes for which this provision is designed, that is to say, the protection of the people of the states, as states, it is necessary that this provision should stand which makes a Bill illegal if these provisions are not complied with, or whether it should be made merely a matter of parliamentary order between the two Houses? I think we have all had some experience in the different colonies of making this simply a matter of parliamentary order. In all the colonies, I think, certain powers are given to the Assembly by the Constitution, and certain powers are given to the Upper House. But we know, in most of the colonies at all events, these powers are construed in one way in one House and in another way in the other House. I will take New South Wales, for example. There is, as all lawyers agree, and as I think all constitutional lawyers agree, distinct power in the Upper House to amend Money Bills. But that power has never been exercised, for this reason, that although the Upper House has constantly asserted its right of amendment, and has amended Money Bills, the other House has just as constantly refused to recognise that right, and has put the Bills under the table. The result has been that in regard to all questions of that kind, although the law exists giving that power to the Upper House, it has never been exercised, and for this reason: The House that has the power of the purse, by reason of the popular voice behind it, has always been able to put an alternative before the Upper House, and to say to it: "You must either fall in with our views, and not amend, or you must be a party to bring about confusion and chaos in the public accounts." This pressure can be brought to bear on the Senate so long as your provisions remain provisions which can be waived by it if it thinks fit. If the power given for the Senate's protection may or may not be held to upon any occasion as the Senate thinks fit, the question we have to consider is whether the people of the states are sufficiently protected. Is it not necessary to fix this provision in the Constitution in such a way as to make it above the Senate and above the House of Representatives, above majorities, and above even popular feeling and clamour?

Mr. TRENWITCH. -
Are you not forgetting, in comparing your local Parliament with the proposed Commonwealth Parliament, that the Commonwealth Parliament will have a High Court to appeal to?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I am quite aware of that, and I am much obliged to the honorable member for his interruption, because it enables me to point out that, under the proposal of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs), the power of the High Court cannot be brought to bear upon this point. Under the Bill as it stands the power of the High Court can be brought to bear on the question; and I wish to see these questions decided, not by a majority in the House of Representatives, or even by a majority in the Senate - which majority may be produced by all sorts of circumstances and occasions - but by that tribunal which we are setting up for the decision of all these questions.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If the House of Representatives and the Senate were both unanimous, and the law were passed, would you still allow the Supreme Court to set it aside?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
If it were illegal.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It is all a matter of procedure.
Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is begging the question. Even under the circumstances mentioned by the honorable and learned gentleman, if the rights we are giving under this Constitution to the House which represents the states are to be of any value at all, we should not put it into the power of a majority in the House of Representatives or in the Senate to bargain them away, or to give them away at their will. The only argument which it appears to me has any force whatever against these provisions as they stand is the argument that they may prove inconvenient in working. I quite agree that it would be an inconvenient thing to have a law which had been passed in accordance with the wishes of a majority of the states and the people declared invalid after it had been in force for some time because of some technical flaw. My answer to that objection is this: That if you make it so important a matter that the provisions of the Constitution shall be observed, the Government which introduces a Bill, and the Houses which have to consider it, will take very good care, under the spur of this obligation, to see that everything is done in order and without illegality. This is not a new question. There are in clause 52 a vast number of powers which are handed over to the Federal Parliament. If the Federal Parliament exceeds its right of legislation in regard to these powers the Supreme Court can set its errors right, and I am astonished to hear the honorable member (Mr. Trenwith), who has always had such a clear appreciation of the principles of this Constitution, speaking of it being a degradation to have Acts of Parliament or the will of Parliament overriden by a court. We have established this court because we anticipate that it will be impossible, even with the utmost good-will upon the part of the Federal Parliament, to keep always within the limits of the Constitution.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

What we are providing here is that a perfectly constitutional thing may be declared illegal because of a slight irregularity in procedure.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

With all respect to the honorable member, he appears to me to be begging the question. If it were a perfectly constitutional thing, it would not be illegal. The question we have to determine is whether we should not make it a sine qua non that certain provisions of the Constitution shall be complied with. There is no difference between the position in which an Act would stand under the provisions of clause 52 and the position in which it would stand under the provisions of the clause we are now considering. In any case a heavy obligation is put upon the Government and upon both Houses to take care that laws which are passed are within the four corners of the Constitution. If the Constitution is to be of any value at all, we must put the Federal Government and Parliament under the strongest obligation to see that its provisions are followed. There is not one of these provisions in regard to which any question can be raised. I quite admit that it follows, from what I have said, that we should make the Constitution absolutely clear, and that there should be no mistake about the lines of limitation which are laid down in it. It would be a disastrous thing to have a doubtful form of expression, making it difficult for the Parliament, with the utmost good-will, to keep within the limits of the Constitution. But that is merely a reason for making the wording of the Constitution absolutely clear. In my opinion, there can be no doubt about the wording of subsection (1) or (2).
It might be desirable to amend sub-section (1) in the direction suggested by the Attorney-General of Victoria so as to make it clear that the collection of taxation, as well as its imposition, was intended. There can be no doubt, however, in regard to sub-section (2). A Government introducing measures dealing with either of the matters referred to in the sub-section could not have any difficulty in determining what came within these provisions and what did not. It is a matter to be considered whether the provisions of sub-section (3), in regard to the ordinary annual services of government, are sufficiently clear. One cannot but be impressed with illustrations of the kind put forward by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs). A Government might have to make some payment, such as a gratuity, which might properly come within its annual services, but which is not one of the ordinary services of the Government. There might be other matters to which it would be perfectly proper for a Government to give its attention, and it would be disastrous if by reason of any provision in the Constitution it were prevented from doing so. But these difficulties can be overcome by the proper consideration of the terms of the Constitution. I submit that the question raised here is a very much more important one than it seems to be thought by some honorable members. I think it is the very essence of the Constitution that we should preserve the form which has been adopted here, and that we should make the necessity of its adoption imperative upon the Government and the Parliament, subject to the liability of their acts being declared invalid by the Supreme Court in the event of the directions of the Constitution not being followed.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I must frankly confess my astonishment that the most invaluable point which has been brought before the Convention is not immediately recognised by every member of this Chamber. I confess that I did not notice the point at first, but now that it has been brought under my attention
I think that it is one of the most vital importance. My honorable friend's argument becomes a singularly weak one, when we observe that the same care which has been taken in connexion with the rights of the Senate has not been taken in connexion with the rights of the House of Representatives. According to my honorable and learned friend, there should be a High Court to watch over the two Houses in regard to matters of procedure, and to see that they strictly observe their own rules; but this High Court is to take cognisance of the doings of only one House, not of both. If the House of Representatives, under the previous clause, shut its eyes and allowed the Senate to originate a Taxation Bill, and that Bill was passed, no power upon earth could come in and vindicate the rights of the people.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. - How could the Senate originate a Taxation Bill?

Mr. REID. - My answer is, how could the House of Representatives put more than one subject of taxation into a proposed law? If it will be possible for the House of Representatives to put two subjects of taxation into a proposed law, in spite of the clear words of the Constitution, it will be equally possible for a Taxation Bill to be originated in the Senate without any one t outrage upon its rights and privileges and upon the rights of the Constitution? The supposition is preposterous. Therefore, we come down to a single point, that by accident, in some trivial unimportant respect, which even no member of the Senate admits to be of consequence, the whole system of finance may be upset and the policy of the Government thrown into wreck. Surely we do not propose to build the Constitution upon sand. The use of the words "proposed law" in the previous clause condemns the change in the next clause. The rights of procedure in both Houses must be absolutely respected, and we can leave it to each House to respect them, and to see that they are respected. It is not likely, for instance, that the House of Representatives would ever allow the Senate to initiate a Taxation Bill, or that the Senate would ever allow the House of Representatives to put two subjects of taxation in one Bill. The thing is incredible. But it is also incredible that if some unimportant slip occurs, the whole structure of the Constitution is to be dislocated. It is incredible that we, as reasonable men, will allow a thing of that sort to be done, now that our eyes have been opened. I confess that up till now my eyes were not opened to this danger.

Mr. LEWIS. -
You proposed it yourself in Adelaide.

Mr. REID. -

But I never saw the force of this point.

Mr. LEWIS. -

I understand that you proposed it yourself.

Mr. REID. -

I suppose it is getting unfashionable in this Convention for honorable members to accept an assurance made by another honorable member, but I am sure that Mr. Lewis is not a member of that sort.

Mr. LEWIS. -

Oh, I accept your assurance, but I understood that you proposed it.

Mr. REID. -

That may be; but this point, I am ashamed to say, never struck my attention. Because, as a matter of business—not merely as a matter of the rights of the two Houses—what two men would go into partnership for the purpose of transacting most important business with a deed of partnership so drawn up that some outside person could come in and upset everything they did? What sort of deed are we trying to draw up? Are we drawing up a deed of partnership that will be at the mercy of every unemployed lawyer in the community? Are we going to allow any person in the street to throw the whole affairs of the Commonwealth into confusion because he has nothing else to do, and has discovered some technical flaw in what has been done?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Why did you not discover this difficulty before?

Mr. REID. -

I say that it is wonderful that it was not seen before, and I tender my grateful thanks to those who have discovered it and brought the matter up; and I wish that, in fairness, Mr. O'Connor would apply the same condition to the clause referring to the House of Representatives as we have applied to the Senate. If the Senate is to be protected against itself by some one in the street, let the House of Representatives be protected against itself by some one in the street, too. I think that that one point is fatal. Either the word "proposed" must be struck out of the previous clause, or it must go into this clause; because there is no reason why one House should be allowed to outrage public rights because of a word in the Constitution whilst the other House has no such right. But I hope, speaking apart from political considerations altogether, that we shall take care not to allow any individual or court to enter the domain of Parliament, and investigate the procedure in reference to an act of legislation. The thing is unknown in any English community, and I think we ought not to introduce it here.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I wish to make a few observations with regard to the objection, not, I hope, in any captious spirit. I quite see the stand-point from which Mr. Isaacs and others have addressed themselves to the question. But it seems to me that the argument which has been raised by Mr. Isaacs as to this last sub-section of clause 55, is really an argument for greater clearness in the Constitution; because it seems to be admitted that if the words of the Constitution are placed beyond dispute, then the confusion to which my honorable and learned friend alludes cannot arise. Consequently, the real meaning of the argument is this—"I could not say what I have said if your Constitution were absolutely clear." This is an objection to the form in which the provision stands, and an objection to form only, and not to substance, because it is admitted that these matters can only arise by way of confusion, and consequently it must be admitted that they can only arise where there is room for confusion in the Constitution. If, therefore, sub-section (3) is made clear, or if it be clear already, as I think it is, then it seems to me that the objection fails. But there is a further objection. That is, that there should be a perfect consonance between the two Houses, by which a law which may offend against the provisions laid down in clause 55, but may be, nevertheless, passed and assented to, may then come before a judicial tribunal and be pronounced invalid. That is quite true but, at the same time, the answer to the position is this (and it has been well put by Sir John Downer): That if there is a danger of that kind, one can scarcely conceive of the House of Representatives sending up a Bill in a form exposed to that danger. If that be so, the argument is not a practical one; it is merely fanciful. Because if the danger of a Bill—of a law-being declared invalid by reason of its including things which this clause says shall not be included is a real and practical danger, then, in proportion to its realness, it is apparent that the greatest care will be imposed upon the House of Representatives not to send up Bills in such a form as may frustrate their own ends. It seems to me, then, that with a little practical common sense and caution, which we must attribute to every body which will have the carrying out of any arm of this Constitution, the danger becomes less than practical. Then, it is said again, and urged by Mr. Reid very strongly, that clause 55 will protect the Senate, but that the House of Representatives derives its only protection from clause 54; and that, if we protect the Senate by making those laws invalid which offend against the measures taken for its protection, we should extend the same provision to laws in which the Senate may offend against the rights of the House of Representatives. At first sight that looks like a very good argument, and I must say that when I first heard it in Adelaide it impressed me considerably. But I pointed out (also in Adelaide) what the answer to it was. And the answer is clear.
Clause 54 does not deal with the state in which a law that has been assented to finds itself. Clause 54 is a provision relating to procedure only, but clause 55 relates to the validity of laws.
Mr. ISAACS. -
That is what we complain of.
Mr. REID. -
That is our objection.
Mr. BARTON. -
I have no objection to that being your objection.
Mr. TRENWITH. -
Have you any objection to remediying the objection?
Mr. BARTON. -
But when we are considering the weight of argument based upon that distinction we must remember that it is no part of the functions of the court to examine into questions of procedure, and, therefore, it is no part of the court's function to inquire what steps have been taken in Parliament in the making of a law. Nor would it be a wise thing to provide in the Constitution that the court should have power to examine into the procedure adopted in Parliament for the passing of any law. But the difference really is, that we cannot trace on the face of the law which has been passed when clause 54 has been infringed or what the extent of the infringement is, if any; you cannot see upon the face of the law where it originated, or in what House it was amended, if it was amended at all. But with regard to clause 55, the matter is clear, because you can see upon the face of the law whether, when it purports to impose taxation, it goes beyond that purpose, or whether the law deals with one subject of taxation only; you can see upon the face of the law whether an annual Appropriation Act deals with matters beyond the annual appropriation.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Can you?
Mr. BARTON. -
There is thus upon the face of the law the important material which is appropriated for the decision of the court-the very transgression beyond legal provision, the very matter which the court can take in hand, and with regard to which it may say-"This must stop, it is illegal." But if the Senate were to originate a Tax Bill, or to amend an Appropriation Act or Tax Bill, and that Bill were to be passed into an Act; if the Senate were to pass a Bill imposing a burden on the people, and that Bill were to be passed-in either of these cases it would be impossible for any legal tribunal to say, upon the face of the law, whether any such infringement of the Constitution had taken place.

Mr. REID. -

So that confusion that can be covered up need not be provided against?

Mr. BARTON. -

That is not so at all. I do not see the slightest relevancy in that remark, or any approach to relevancy. So that it becomes perfectly clear that one matter is a matter of procedure and that to give a legal tribunal the power of interfering with regard to that which is inherently a matter of procedure would be an unwarrantable power of interference with Parliament to give to any court. I am astonished at it being claimed that anything should be done which would give the court power to instigate an investigation of mere parliamentary procedure. But those matters which happen under clause 55 do not turn on questions of procedure, inasmuch as if an infraction of the Constitution occurs, it is apparent upon the face of the Bill which makes the infraction, and the material is there for judicial determination. That is the difference between the two clauses, and it is of no use trying to mix up matters of procedure with matters of actual inviolability apparent on the face of the laws, and to say that you are to apply the same conditions to one as to the other.

Mr. REID. -

It may be mainly a matter of inviolability of procedure.

Mr. BARTON. -

But the test whether a matter is one of procedure or not is this: Matters of procedure do not appear upon the face of the laws, but matters of illegality in regard to the provisions of the Constitution are such as are apparent upon the face of the laws which infringe upon the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. REID. -

If two subjects of taxation are put in a Bill, and the Bill is passed, surely you would see upon the face of that Act the wrongfulness of the procedure?

Mr. BARTON. -

The argument does not apply at all, for this reason: If you put two subjects of taxation in one Bill, the two subjects are apparent upon the face of the measure, and it is apparent that there has been a wrong procedure. But that is not the question. The question is not that, but whether there is illegality apparent upon the face of the measure, because, whether it is under clause 54 or clause 55, we are not here for the purpose of giving power to a judicial tribunal to investigate mere matters of parliamentary procedure. But in matters of procedure which are so important as to become matters of substance, affecting the very viscera of an Act of Parliament, where you can see that those matters of substance offend against the provisions of an Act of Parliament, then it is proper to give power for the matter to be investigated by a judicial tribunal. Clause 54 is therefore quite coe-where, in fact, it is a tack as well as an Appropriation Bill—that will be apparent on the face of the law, and is therefore within the functions of the judicial tribunal, because the court is enabled to deal with what appears upon the face of such laws when they emerge (if they ever do emerge) from Parliament. As to the mere matter of procedure, I quite grant that there are matters of procedure involved in clause 55 the same as they are involved in clause 54, but the point is this: Whether, as between clause 54 and clause 55, it is not a fact that in infractions of clause 54 material for judicial determination is on the face of the Act, while in infractions of clause 55 there is no such material to be found at all?

Mr. TRENWITH. - They both deal with procedure.

Mr. BARTON. - Of course they both deal with procedure, and a man and a goat are both animals, but it does not follow that they are the same thing. I am astonished that my honorable friend does not see that while matters of procedure may be common to both subjects involved in clause 54 and clause 55, there is something beyond mere procedure in the questions involved in clause 55, something which stands out on the face of the law when passed, and with regard to clause 54 there is absolutely nothing of the kind for a court to take hold of. Besides, one would consider that the strongest defender of popular liberty would admit that where questions simply involve the relations of two Houses inter se in the shape of conducting business, however important and substantial they may be, it is not a part of the province of us, who are making a Constitution, to set a tribunal to watch over the manner in which they conduct their procedure alone; but where there is a question of right involved, where there is a question which brings on to the face of a law an infraction of right, then the fact that there is also procedure involved should be no stoppage to the action of a judicial tribunal, because what it inquires into is not the procedure, but the infraction of express terms in the Constitution apparent on the face of the law. I think that is the real difference between the two clauses. It is not a fact that clause 54 is a clause solely for the protection of the House of Representatives. It confers corresponding rights. The argument fails there, because as to clause 54 there are rights given to the Senate with reference to certain classes of Bills appropriating or imposing fines, or demanding or appropriating licence-fees or fees for service.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They are only exceptions, though.

Mr. BARTON. -

They import a right. My honorable friend cannot get out of it in that way. He cannot say, because it reads as an exception it does not also confer a right. The test of that is this: Let the Senate originate a law which contains a provision for imposing or appropriating fines or penalties, or which enables a demand or appropriation of fees for licences or fees for services, and that law is valid within the Constitution. The Senate has a right to originate the law, and therefore this provision conveys a right. Now, there is a further provision there. While the Senate is prohibited from amending laws imposing a tax or appropriating money for the annual services of the Government, sub-section (4) gives the Senate the right to make suggestions, so that while there are rights given here to the House of Representatives to originate Tax and annual Appropriation Bills, while the Senate may not amend those two classes of Bills, there are certain other classes of Bills which it can originate, there are certain other classes of Bills which it can amend, and besides that, under sub-section (5):

Except as provided in this section the Senate shall have equal power with the House of Representatives in respect of all proposed laws.

It has, moreover, the power of suggestion in Money Bills. Then there are correlative rights given by clause 54. Any one who argues that the right of the House of Representatives under that clause is not protected is exposed to this answer: Neither are the rights of the Senate under that clause protected by any reference to the High Court? The fact is that they are mere matters of procedure, and do not go beyond procedure, however much they may involve substantive rights in their relation to the people. While they only appear as matters of procedure the result of it is this: That as each House has rights under that clause so each House may claim equal protection, but those who are arguing that clause 55 should be maintained are met with the objection that under clause 54 the House of Representatives has not correlative protection. The answer to that is that under clause 54 the Senate has not correlative protection.

Mr. REID. -
The rejoinder to that is that in clause 55 all the Senate's rights are enumerated, but none of the other House's are enumerated, so that they do get a protection.

I was coming to that. The sum of my honorable friend's argument in regard to clause 54, when he says that the rights there conferred, being rights of the House of Representatives, are not protected by a reference to the High Court, falls to the ground, because there are correlative rights under that very clause given to the Senate, and it is not sought to make these rights protected by the court either. Why? Because they are not those subjects which you can trace on an Act of Parliament. When you come to clause 55, my honorable friend is right in saying in one sense they are protections to the Senate. Let us examine the matter a little. Is it right that there should be tacking? There is not an honorable member in the Convention who will not say that it is wrong. This clause in itself is a clause to prevent tacking, therefore, it is a clause to do right-for whom?-for the people themselves. What is the good of our arguing this question on the basis of the rights, inter se, of the two Chambers, when the whole life of both these Chambers is that they are servants of the public? For whom are these protections in clause 55 introduced? Is it for the Senate they are introduced? No, it is for the public. It is to prevent one House of Parliament from making a tack, and by that tack obtaining the passage of a law or its rejection at the price of a popular conflict. So that if there is to be no popular conflict, a wrongful law is to be passed; and if right is to be done, there is to be a popular conflict. That is the very state of things which has existed in these colonies, and which it is the object of that clause to prevent. But what is the use of saying that is a clause for the protection of the Senate when it is in its very essence a clause for the protection of the people? That is the answer to the argument. It is not because some of these matters are in form a prohibition to the House of Representatives, they are protections to the Senate and injuries to the House of Representatives. Let us then consider the position of these Houses one with another. One would imagine if the clause operates, as they call it, as a protection to the Senate, therefore something is taken away from the House of Representatives. If there is a sum total, and you give a certain amount to the Senate instead of leaving it all with the House of Representatives, then by so much as you give the Senate the argument is that you take away from the House of Representatives. If that is so, let somebody tell me what right is taken away from the House of Representatives and given to the Senate. What right is there in any House of Representatives so to confuse the constitutional functions of two Chambers as to import into a measure of legislation, and obtain for it the assent of the highest authority, which measure of legislation amounts in itself to a cutting down of constitutional rights, not provided for the sake of the members of the Chamber, but provided for the protection of the people? That is the answer I have to all this. It seems to me that constitutional rights given to the Senate, or constitutional rights given to the House of Representatives, under this Constitution cannot for a moment be dealt with or thought of or spoken of as rights given to this Chamber or to that Chamber. They are rights given to the people in the two different aspects in which the people stand under a Federal Constitution—one set of rights given to the people as a constitutional whole at large in proportion to numbers, the other set given to the persons who form the whole entity of a state, and who elect a contingent to the Senate. So that there is no question of taking away rights from the House of Representatives and conferring rights upon the Senate. We are not here to deal with the particular rights of particular Chambers; we are here to deal with popular rights, and to see that those popular rights find expression in adequate language. When we have done that, we have done all we are commissioned to do with reference to the relations between each other of the two Houses, and the validity of laws passed by both of them. To sum up then, I submit that the argument of my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs), in favour of his proposal to insert the word "proposed" amounts really to an argument that the law is not sufficiently clear. If he does not think so, I should be glad to know in what way it is suggested that it should carry out the same objects, and yet be made clearer. I think that "the ordinary annual services of the Government" are words which are well understood, and which no court can mistake. It may be that they may make it necessary for the Appropriation Bill to be rather rigidly guarded when it is brought before Parliament, but that is one of the inconveniences necessary to the doing of right.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Suppose you had in the Appropriation Bill, a grant of £500 payable to John Brown, and it was not one of the ordinary annual services of the Government: could not the court, under this sub section, set the whole law aside?

Mr. BARTON. -

There is no doubt that I might be tempted to return the same answer to that question which a speaker on a memorable occasion returned.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is a very good reason for not having the clause in the Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -
It is no reason for not having the clause in the Bill. If my learned friend thinks that the words as they stand are liable to confusion, if he thinks that the ordinary annual services of the Government do not sufficiently define the ordinary annual Appropriation Bill—an Act which the Government must pass to carry on its own existence—let him suggest some better form of words. Let him make the clause clearer, and by so much as he makes it clearer he loses the whole point and effect of his own argument. If the court were to decide that this grant of money to John Brown is part of the ordinary annual services of the Government, let it be so; but if it is not to decide the question we will soon find that out, and it can be rectified in six hours.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
But in the meantime the whole Bill goes.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The whole law goes.

Mr. BARTON. -
In the meantime the whole Bill need not go. We know very well that the whole Bill does not go under these circumstances, and I am astonished that some of my honorable friends have not sufficient recollection of Victorian history not to tell us that.

Mr. ISAACS. -
We have too vivid a recollection of Victorian history to allow this to pass.

Mr. BARTON. -
Well, summing up, if the argument is that the sub-section should be made clearer, let us have suggestions for the clearing of the sub-section, and, in proportion as those suggestions are good, the necessity for my learned friend's amendment diminishes; but I submit that where a law bears on its face the evidence of an infraction of the Constitution, we should be entitled not to allow the process of that law to be regulated by mere methods of procedure, but to submit them to the determination of the court, because of the evil which appears on their faces. Then, as regards the objections taken to clause 54, I submit that under that clause the rights of the Senate and the House of Representatives are correlative rights, but that we are not here to confer rights on Chambers, except by way of making them instruments of the rights of the people—that so far as we assume to do that we do that sufficiently under clause 54, a clause relating to procedure, without invoking a judicial tribunal to interfere with mere matters of procedure; but that where the matters are not only procedure, but go beyond procedure, so as to be matters which carry on their
Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I agree with those honorable members who desire to see a strong Senate established under this Constitution; but, at the same time, I am not one of those who will make a mere fetish of this Senate, who will on every possible occasion drag in the question of state rights, as if somehow or other through the magic of the High Court, and not the Parliament established by the people, the state rights were to override the people's rights, and the rights of the people were to be forgotten altogether. Those who have been taking that position, which many have taken against the amendment too, have not been arguing for a strong Senate. They have really been arguing for a High Court-a High Court to be brought in on every possible pretext; a High Court which is to override the Senate and the House of Representatives, and everything else; a High Court which is to so dominate this Constitution as to make it not a Constitution which we would desire to endow a free people with, but a Constitution which we well might shrink from coming under. Now, the arguments which have been used against Mr. Isaacs' amendment, following out first those that have been used last, are that there is no effort here to give a special protection to the Senate that is not given to the House of Representatives. We have been asked by Mr. Barton whether it is not an important matter to prevent tacks? Now, I ask any responsible politician whether it is not just as important to secure that all appropriations of public revenue shall originate in the Lower House as it is important to prevent tacks? The first is surely as important as the other. And yet we are told that the prevention of tacks must be carried to the extent of going to the High Court; but that in the other case we must leave the matter to the determination of parliamentary procedure through the various stages of the Bill. Now, if, for argument's sake, we believe the special support of the High Court is to be given under clause 55, certainly that same special support ought to be given under clause 54. I believe, however, that we shall have a Senate so strong in itself that it will not require to be spoon-fed by the High Court. I believe the Senate will be strong in its reputation with the whole body of the people of the Commonwealth, and I refuse to believe that the Senate requires to be put in a sort of subsidiary position to the High Court lest it might not be able to protect itself, and thus to make the High Court do for the Senate what it cannot do for itself. Our honorable leader says that matters under clause 54 are purely matters of procedure, and, therefore, as matters of procedure they would not appear on the face of the measure. Now, I dispute both those arguments. I dispute first that matters under clause 54 are matters of procedure, concerning which no definite evidence can be brought before the High Court. I would point out to my honorable friend that the journals of the Houses of Parliament would show the separate stages of the measure in question, and would clearly exhibit whether the procedure prescribed by clause 54 had been observed. Therefore, the High Court could be put in a position to decide the matters under clause 55, particularly questions touching an Appropriation Act. I dispute the statement that all that concerns an Appropriation Act is limited by this clause to what appears on the face of the measure itself. In an Appropriation Act we should have so many hundred thousand pounds for this, and so many hundred thousand pounds for that, and other items; but we should have no detail whatever. In no Appropriation Act passed by any Parliament is there given small details of the amounts appropriated. An Appropriation Act would often include amounts of £10,000, £15,000, £20,000, and larger sums, the details of which would be lost altogether in the mass of votes included in the Act. Therefore, it is quite impossible for any court to tell from the mere construction of an Appropriation Act whether the items do comprise moneys required for the ordinary annual services of the Government, even if that phrase "ordinary annual services of the Government" were beyond dispute. Personally, I do not know what the phrase means, and I do not suppose it is possible for anybody definitely to say what it means.

Mr. REID. - With a new Government it will be a very difficult matter to know what are "ordinary annual services."

Mr. HOLDER. - Yes; but every item must be an annual expenditure, not one which comes on specially. Now, we all know that all sorts of special emergencies arise in every country, and that special provision has to be made for every such emergency.

Mr. ISAACS. - Would £50,000 for contingencies be regarded by the court as money appropriated for the ordinary annual services of the Government?

Mr. REID. - That would be a nice question for the High Court to determine.

Mr. HOLDER. - Extraordinary amounts would have to be voted specially under this provision. But I want to urge another reason why I decline to accept the first of the arguments brought against Mr. Isaacs' amendment. Mr. O'Connor said it was not right that a majority of the Senate at any one time, or a majority of the House of Representatives, should have it in their power. to waive any material point in this Constitution. Now, I desire to say, in reply to that argument, that it is not a question of a majority of either or both Houses of Parliament. Given a measure which has passed both Houses of Parliament—a measure which was originated in the House of Representatives, and read a first, second, and third time; then going on to the other branch of the Legislature, and there read a first, second, and third time—it should be competent, not for a majority of either House of Parliament, but for any single member of either House of the Legislature, to raise a point as to the form of the Bill, and to have the Bill ruled out of order by the President of the Senate or the Speaker in the House of Representatives, and thrown under the table. Surely that is a sufficient protection. As the President of the Convention reminds me, it would be the absolute duty of the Speaker, in the House of Representatives, and of the President, in the Senate, to look into the matter, each on his own account, without waiting for the question to be raised. Now, I ask honorable members which is the more important body to deal with this question—the High Court, the members of which may or may not have had any experience of parliamentary procedure, and who, therefore, would deal with the question according to legal procedure as a matter of dry law, or the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who will be practised Members of Parliament, gentlemen who have had many years' experience of parliamentary procedure? If we want a tribunal before whom this matter should come for final decision, the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives would each be a better tribunal than even the High Court, of which we have heard so much. I think we are far safer in leaving our rights in the hands of the President and Speaker than in the hands of any one else. But I want to put a little more stress on the fact I just mentioned, namely, that one dissentient member could prevent the passage of an informal Bill if Mr. Isaacs' amendment be carried. It has been said that states might be bought over, that the representatives of different states might be won to support a particular measure or a particular Government, because of some promises of expenditure in their states. Now, is it likely that the whole of the representatives of one state would lend themselves to that kind of thing, even if one or two would do so—and I am not going to believe even that? Surely there would be at least one representative out of the whole Senate and one member of the House of Representatives, who would have individuality enough, and strength enough, to get up and challenge the order of any particular measure which might be disorderly under this clause of the Constitution.
Mr. ISAACS. -

They would not all sit on the same side of the House.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I should think not. They would not all be Ministerialists, or all members of the Opposition, or all members of any particular party; and I cannot believe that any Bill which contained anything objectionable at all could pass through both Houses of the Federal Legislature without finding some one member of either of the two Houses who would rise to a point of order, and have such a Bill laid aside of necessity as being out of order under this provision. A further point which I would like to press upon the attention of honorable members is: That this clause as it stands practically leaves open many paths leading to a precipice. The limitation by which a decision of the High Court might upset the whole Commonwealth law involves that those pathways are all left open. Now, our custom is to believe that prevention is better than cure-that it is better to place an obstacle on a path leading to a difficulty rather than to leave the people to walk along that path until they are on the very verge of the precipice. Clause 55 uses the term "laws," and not "Bills" or "proposed laws," so that honorable members will see that, under clause 55 as it stands, a Bill containing half-a-dozen subjects of taxation-a measure which may be an Appropriation Act with a tack or with anything else objectionable in it-may be introduced perfectly legally, and whilst it is only a Bill no objection could be taken to it. No member could rise in his place and object to the Bill as being disorderly, and no President of the Senate and no Speaker of the House of Representatives could rule the measure out of order.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Surely that cannot be so. Would not the Speaker be justified in guarding the rights of the House of Representatives, even though no honorable member raised a point of order?

Mr. REID. -

Would not the President of the Senate be justified in guarding the rights of the Senate?

Mr. HOLDER. -

What I was going to point out is: That while under clause 54 a Bill is illegal under certain conditions, under clause 55 there is no word of condemnation of any Bill. A Bill may be not merely a measure which includes different methods of taxation, but may be an Appropriation Bill with a tack, and yet, while it is only a Bill, it is all right under clause 55. No member can call attention to the fact that it proposes to violate the Constitution, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or the President of the Senate, cannot rule that the Bill is out of order, so that, not until you are on the very verge of the precipice, in fact, until you have taken your fatal step, and have your foot just over the chasm and cannot recover yourself, is the measure to be pronounced illegal.

Mr. BARTON. -

Is that so? Would not the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives be bound, as Presidents and Speakers are now, to point out to their respective Houses that the law proposed to be adopted was illegal?

Mr. REID. -

And are not the President and Speaker better guardians of our rights than the High Court in this case?

Mr. HOLDER. -

If I was a member of the Federal Parliament, and such a measure was submitted, I should ask the Speaker-"Is this Bill out of order?" And, if Mr. Isaacs' amendment is not passed, the Speaker would certainly have to say "No."

Mr. BARTON. -

I think he would have to say "Yes." He would have to say that any Bill which was unconstitutional was out of order.

Mr. HOLDER. -

But under clause 55 the Bill would not be unconstitutional until it became an Act.

Mr. BARTON. -

Oh, yes, it would.

Mr. HOLDER. -

As far as the speech of our leader indicates, he is bound to substitute for the word "laws," in clause 55, the word "Bills" or the term "proposed laws," so as to make such measures illegal from the start.

Mr. BARTON. -

Not necessarily. Before you could demonstrate that, you would have to maintain this position: That the Speaker or President cannot say a Bill is out of order which proposes to abrogate the Constitution.

Mr. HOLDER. -

But the Bill is not out of order, under clause 55, until it becomes an Act.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And it may be amended and brought into perfect legality before it is passed.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Yes, it could be altered to make it constitutional, but as long as it is a Bill it is to be legal, whatever it contains, and it ca
Mr. DOBSON. -
  You have acted as Attorney-General to some purpose.
Mr. HOLDER. -
  It does not require a legal member to point out this defect. It is obvious to the lay mind.
Mr. DOBSON. -
  It is a legal quibble.
Mr. HOLDER. -
  I am sure that the honorable member will not say that when he sees the absolute distinction that is drawn between "proposed laws" and "laws" in clauses 54 and 55. It is no legal quibble to distinguish between "proposed laws" and "laws," or, as we are more accustomed to call them, between "Bills" and "Acts." They are different things, so that the distinction cannot be overlooked. Therefore, there is no legal quibble in the matter at all. If we are going to say that these laws are to be illegal at their end, we had better say they are to be illegal at the start. To say that Bills shall be legal up to the point at which they become Acts, and illegal afterwards, is to say what is absolutely absurd, and what will land us in an awkward situation, from which there is no escape. I hope that the Convention will adopt Mr Isaacs' amendment. I rejoice to find that, a little while ago, support was given to that amendment by Mr. Symon, because, in speaking on an amendment I proposed a few days ago, he was anxious the High Court should be over everything, and that the people should not prevail.
Mr. SYMON. -
  I did not say that. I never said that.
Mr. HOLDER. -
  I took the other side on the occasion I refer to, and the honorable member was found on the opposite side of the hedge to me. To-day I am glad to have his assistance, and I am pleased to find that he is not anxious to exalt the High Court, but prefers to trust the Federal Parliament, which will represent the people as states and as a nation. Make it illegal for the Parliament to do this thing if you like, but do not allow the High Court to come in after the Parliament has, not only by a majority only, but by every individual member of both Houses, assented to a certain course. There is one remark I want to make. It is said that tacks ought to be dealt with differently from procedure because they are for the protection of one House against another. Is there any matter in which tacks are for the protection of one House against another more than in the matters referred to in clause 54? If we are to have "proposed laws" in clause 54, we must have it in clause 55. I do not regard this as a degradation of the Senate. I want to save the Senate from its unwise friends, who think that it will be of no use unless at every turn it has the power to drag in the High Court. I ask those who believe that the Senate will protect the states to give the Senate the right it ought to have, and to insert the word "proposed" before "laws" right through these clauses.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I have sat quiet and amazed at the obstinacy with which this perfectly innocent amendment has been opposed. I confess that the money clauses of the Bill have been my despair. I, to say the least of it, feel very grave doubt as to whether they are workable, and particularly in connexion with a responsible Government. The committee have been carried into the regions of the abstract, and I want to put before them certain concrete cases applying to the amendment that has been proposed by the Hon. Mr. Isaacs. What I want to say is, that unless that amendment is carried the powers of the Senate will be curtailed. If a Bill is introduced for the imposition of a tax upon land, and the Senate wish to make a suggestion that the same amount of money may be raised by virtue of a tax upon sports, they cannot make that suggestion, simply because the Bill would then contain two subjects of taxation.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Where is the harm of that?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Clause 55 says that such a law would be invalid. I am speaking from some little experience in our local Parliament. A Charities Bill was introduced, and it was proposed to raise the money for the charities by means of a sports tax, and additional rates upon ordinary lands and buildings. Supposing that money was required, and the House of Representatives said that it should be raised by a tax upon lands, the Senate might then say-"Oh, no, we can raise the same amount of money by means of a tax on sports and lands." That suggestion could not be made, because if it were adopted there would be two subjects of taxation in the Bill and the law would be invalid. I will take another instance: It is provided that laws imposing taxation shall deal only with the imposition of taxes. Under that provision the Senate can make no condition to a law imposing taxation, and it will have to accept the taxation as it stands, or not at all. The law will otherwise be treated as invalid, and the taxpayers could then re-fuse to pay anything. Then sub-section (3) says-"A law which appropriates revenue or moneys for the ordinary annual services of the Government shall deal only with such appropriation."

Mr. REID. -

Every Appropriation Bill will go before the High Court.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Exactly. Every honorable member who has had any experience of Parliament will see the difficulty of ascertaining the limits of the ordinary annual services of the Government.

Mr. DOBSON. -

That difficulty ought not to be so very great.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think that the honorable member has had experience as Treasurer as well as Premier, and I would ask him whether he can say what is meant by the ordinary annual services of the Government?

Mr. DOBSON. -

I have never been Treasurer.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Sir Philip Fysh is a Treasurer of large experience, and he knows the difficulty. I am, however, dealing with the point that you are curtailing the powers of the Senate by refusing to accept Mr. Isaacs' amendment.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Safeguarding them.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Supposing that an Appropriation Bill is brought up from the House of Representatives providing for the ordinary annual services, and providing, amongst other things, for the payment of light-house keepers, the Senate might think that this provision for the payment of the light-house keepers should not be carried unless a provision was also inserted dealing with the light-house keepers who had been dispensed with.

Mr. DOBSON. -

We should put them in a separate Bill.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes, but the Senate would be deprived of the right of making the suggestion. I want honorable members, who have been wakened up by the state rights' drum being beaten, to frankly face the position. This is not an attack upon state rights at all. It is simply a question of the practical working of the Constitution. I feel that any advocacy I can use will be treated with suspicion by certain honorable members, and I should have preferred to remain silent under the circumstances. I think, however, that certain honorable members are misconceiving the object with which Mr. Isaacs has moved his amendment. I tell them frankly that there is no attack, or idea of an attack, on the privileges of the Senate. I want to put it as plainly as I can that, by opposing the amendment, they are depriving the Senate of a certain elasticity in the exercise of its powers. The position, to me, is simply ridiculous. As soon as the word "Senate" is uttered there is a sudden wakening up of dry bones. Honorable members are at once on the alert to defend the Senate. Some of us hardly care to mention the Senate at all. We are like a man walking along a street in which there is a hen; the hen sees the man coming, and, thinking it is being chased, runs in front of him instead of going to one side. Surely we are able to deal with the merits of the proposal without regard to the quarter from which it emanates. It is quite true that some of us have not the same strong notions about the constitution of the Senate as others. But, speaking for myself, I have no intention at all of weakening the Senate. I want both Houses to be strong; but if they are strong they must be liberal. It was Roderick Dhu who used to use the whistle when Fitz-James blew the horn. The leader of the Convention has used the whistle, and he has called all his bold clansmen around the standard of state rights. There is no desire to make any attack on the Senate, or upon so-called state rights. If this proposal had been put forward by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, it would have been carried almost without a dissentient.

Mr. SYMON. -
You ought not to say that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
What I have said is not disrespectful to Sir John Forrest.

Mr. SYMON. -
We are dealing with all these things on their merits.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I am sure the honorable member has seen through it, although he is as bigoted a state rights man as any here.

Mr. SYMON. -
Not bigoted.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
What have I done?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You have done admirably. I have no more to say excepting that I hope the matter will be dealt with on its merits.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -
I have listened attentively to one of the ablest debates that has yet taken place in the Convention, conducted entirely by legal members. One of the difficulties here is that we are mixing up two absolutely different things. I am quite willing to allow that the Hon. Mr. Isaacs' amendment ought to be made in sub-section (3), because it is absolutely impossible, in a matter of that kind, to define what the ordinary annual services of the year are. I would like honorable members to look at the wording of these different sub-sections. The first sub-sections are absolutely plain, and they embed in the Constitution a right that can always be watched and vigilantly safe guarded. "Laws imposing taxation shall deal with the imposition of taxation only." Surely this is very clear language, upon which points of order and questions in relation to the forms of the House will not arise.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If you were to bring in a Bill to impose one tax, would it include a power to repeal another on the same subject?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Undoubtedly.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Mr. Barton has given an opinion that it would not.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

We have the ablest lawyers divided on this question, and what is the layman to do?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Would it include machinery clauses for collection?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I should think not. One of the objects of these sub-sections is so to provide for the management of our business that the faults and errors of the past shall not be repeated. Quarrels have often been caused between the two Houses owing to the slovenliness and the unfairness which has dominated the local Parliaments. These quarrels should never have occurred, and we want to prevent them. We are putting the House of Representatives and the Senate in an entirely different position from that of the local Legislatures. Now, I go right on just in the same way. The sub-section reads-"Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of customs and excise-"There you have the exception of a thing which it is difficult to deal with in the same form, and it is very properly excepted. Then we read-"shall deal with one subject of taxation only." Where is the difficulty about keeping that in view? Is not that a fair -"Laws imposing duties of customs shall deal with duties of customs only." Where is the difficulty about that?

Mr. REID. -

There is no difficulty before you try. But you get a long Customs Tariff, and you may find a few words in the Bill that will raise a point of law.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I do not know that. The whole thing will go through such a strict supervision that it would be almost impossible when you get to the end of a Customs Tariff to find anything out of the parliamentary rules and procedure. But when we come to sub-section (3), I say that the amendment of the honorable member ought to go in. There is no analogy between the two Houses. I do not go into the question as to whether the previous clause, which has not been recommitted, ought or ought not to have been recommitted. I deal entirely with this clause. I do not deal in the refined manner of some honorable members in regard to the effect on the Senate or on the House of Representatives. Some honorable members who are entitled to be heard have said that the amendment of Mr. Isaacs weakens the Senate. Another honorable member of very high legal ability has said that not to put the amendment in would weaken the Senate. What are we to do?

Mr. TRENWITH. -
And yet this clause is throwing legislation into the hands of those people who cannot agree.

Mr. REID. -
The lawyers.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
The lawyers?
Mr. TRENWITH. -
Yes, thrusting it on them.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
That is one of those commonplaces which are always used. There is no clause or sub-clause of any Bill in the world, even if it were framed by an angel from Heaven, that would not be the subject of litigation.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
The disagreement is not legal, but constitutional.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
You do not get lawyers from Heaven.

Mr. ISAACS. -
No, lawyers are sent there; they are not drawn from there.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Looking at the clause from a common-sense point of view, are the provisions a vital condition of the Constitution? Was it worth our while to spend days and weeks thrashing out these matters as a compromise to the financial scheme? We are dealing now with one of the great compromises of our financial scheme. Is that compromise, of vital importance in the financial scheme, to be made a matter of simple procedure in the House, liable to the judgment of a Speaker or a President? Or is it, like hundreds of other things, embedded in the Constitution, so that, if at any time there be an infringement, the law passed would be invalid, and the High Court would protect the people of the country? Apart from all legal quibbles, that seems to be the plain English of the fact. Speaking as an ex-Treasurer, I say that it is impossible to safeguard you in the third section. I would be quite willing to put in the word "proposition," or "Bill," or anything of the kind. All the arguments used to-day are valid against the third sub-clause. But, as against the other sub-clauses, looking at it as a matter of English, and as clearly defining the rights in the Constitution, it seems to me that they ought not to be disturbed.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I trust that honorable members will be loyal to the financial clauses, which were fixed up after such an amount of speaking and thinking. The arguments which honorable members have used in favour of Mr. Isaacs' amendment tell, to my mind, most decidedly against it. As Mr. Isaacs commenced by saying that the Senate was hedged round with too many protections, I think we may discard the suggestion of Mr. Higgins that the amendment would not weaken the Senate. It would not weaken the Senate if the House of Representatives were determined to do everything fairly and squarely, and consider every proposal on its merits. But the moment the House of Representatives commenced any tricks whatever, the clause would be a protection to the Senate. I regard it far more as a protection to the people. If Mr. Chamberlain is right, and I think he is, the classes of every community are divided into those that have, and those that have not. This is a protection to those that have; you cannot take anything from the mail who has no property, or has not anything in his pocket. All these money clauses have been fixed up as a compromise. This clause is to protect people who will have to bear the brunt of taxation, who keep up the credit of the community, and who, in point of fact, have something to tax. The argument I have not heard answered is that of Mr. O'Connor, who says that if the clause be left as it stands, there is the court to declare that any law which infringes the Constitution is illegal. If you put in the word "proposed," as Mr. Isaacs suggests, no matter how illegal the law may be, the people would have no protection-the High Court is robbed of the opportunity of being the interpreter in the most important matter of taxation. Look a moment at the practical arguments suggested by Mr. Carruthers, who has told us how a Bill becomes law. Compare these arguments with those of Mr. Reid, who imagines that the man in the street will find a flaw in some Act which has passed through its various stages. A Premier in the Cabinet instructs the draftsman or Attorney-General to prepare a Bill, and if the Minister and the Attorney-General cannot see the flaw, they must have very little common sense or they are corrupt. The measure then goes to the House of Representatives, the members of which, or their Speaker, or any one of their members, must have taken leave of their senses if they cannot see that the proposed law deals with more matters than one of taxation. The Bill goes to the Senate, and the President and every member there must either be corrupt, or have taken leave of their senses, or they would see any flaw there may be. Mr. Reid points out that somebody may find a flaw when the Bill has passed through all these stages under the eyes of the very men whose duty it is to see the plain language of the Constitution carried out. The right honorable gentleman has supposed an absurdity.

Mr. REID. -

Therefore you do not need this particular safeguard.

Mr. DOBSON. -

You need the safeguard in case the House of Representatives be overcome by the tumult of the people who want something done which, though not quite illegal, is not fair. Then the safeguard is a protection to the people and it does help the Senate, not so much as a Senate, but as the Second Chamber in the bi-cameral system we have adopted. What is the use of our adopting this system and then honorable members trying to knock it down the next moment, as suggested by Mr. Higgins? We want to keep the system.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I want to keep it, too.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I hope I have as great respect for the people as any honorable member opposite. The only difference is that those honorable members want the people's voice determined by one kind of machinery and I want it determined by another. The clause as it stands is the best machinery I have yet heard suggested in order to provide that the House of Representatives are not enabled, by possibly having a President of the Senate in touch with them, to do anything that is illegal. I heard an honorable member say that any member of the Federal Parliament could prevent an infringement of the Constitution. Suppose the Lower House do let a Bill go through which contains more than one item of taxation, or that an Appropriation Act contains something which is not for the annual service of the year, and that Bill goes through to the Senate. If that President were in touch with a very radical or liberal Government in the Lower House, all he has to do is to say that, as the Bill has passed the Lower Chamber, he does not take the responsibility of ruling it illegal. That determines the matter.

Mr. REID. -

No, it does not.

Mr. DOBSON. -

My honorable friend is wrong in saying that any one member can stop that illegality. Mr. Holder says that if a proposed law deals with half-a-dozen systems of taxation the Speaker of the Lower House would not rule it out of order. That honorable member has had the privilege of being Attorney-General of South Australia for a few weeks. I have never had the opportunity of holding that office, and, I am sorry to say, I cannot pretend to the law attainments of the honorable member. But I cannot conceive that a President or a Speaker would not rule out of order a Bill which infringed the very A B C of the Constitution. Mr. Isaacs spoke of the annual Appropriation Bill containing an item of £500 to John Smith as a gratuity.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I said simply "John Smith, £500."

Mr. DOBSON. -

Well, I suppose that John Smith is an old servant, or somebody who is entitled to compensation, and there is no difficulty whatever in paying John Smith his gratuity, or paying a gratuity of £100 to Postmistress Jones, in any Appropriation Bill or by a separate Bill. Where is all the trouble? Mr. Higgins has spoken as if the financial clauses were full of doubts and difficulties, and no one could understand them. I have come to an utterly opposite conclusion. I come to the conclusion that they are a thoroughly plain and admirable set of clauses. I do not see that after weeks and weeks of discussion they should be altered at the last moment for the express purpose, as Mr. Isaacs has admitted, of taking away some of the strength of the Senate.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I did not say that.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I wish to trespass for a moment in order to brush away a fallacy which was put forward by Mr. Barton, and which has just now been repeated. What is the basis, so far as the public are concerned, of a Taxation Bill or an Appropriation Bill? The agreement of the two Houses expressed in the Bill, which receives the Royal assent. All the argument which bears on injury to the public as flowing from both Houses agreeing falls to the ground. The basis of the right to tax the people is fulfilled when the two Houses agree that the people shall be taxed. The only basis of parliamentary working as it affects the people is that the two Houses shall pass either one or two Bills, or 50 Bills. The question whether Parliament expresses its agreement in one or two Bills is, so far as the people outside are concerned, a matter of absolute indifference. It is a matter of procedure entirely between the two Houses, and in no sense affects the public. What matters it to the public outside whether you tax them by Acts A, B, and C, or by Act A? The basis of taxation is that both Houses have come to the conclusion that a law shall be passed imposing taxation.

Mr. FRASER. -
Supposing there is a "tack," and the people are against it.

Mr. REID. -
Let us take that. In a Constitution which has no express provision against "tacking" there has never been a successful attempt—there has never been passed in Victoria an Appropriation Bill with a "tack." Victoria was thrown into confusion year after year—

Mr. FRASER. -
And that is what we want to prevent.

Mr. REID. -
I tell you that in the Constitution—

The CHAIRMAN. -
Will the right honorable member kindly address the Chair?

Mr. REID. -
I should like, Sir Richard Baker, to appeal to you to protect me from those violent attacks on the part of my friend (Mr. Fraser). The very name "tack" is enough to send him into a red heat. There has never been a "tack" in the history of Victoria. And why? Because there are a number of gentlemen in the Legislative Council who could see the thing was wrong, and would not tolerate it.

Mr. FRASER. -
It was wrong.

Mr. REID. -
High-minded patriots who felt it was

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Are you not putting Parliament over the Constitution logically by your arguments?

Mr. REID. -
Upon my word, it is a great amusement to me to hear those interruptions. Am I not "putting Parliament over the people"? Is not Parliament put over the people in order to devise measures of taxation?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I did not say "people"; I said "Constitution."

Mr. REID. -

I beg your pardon. Has not the Constitution created Parliament to impose taxes on the people? So far as the Constitution is concerned, the basic principle of taxation is that the two Houses are of one mind. The moment the Houses are of one mind as to any proposed tax, the basis of that tax is complete, and the question whether it is on one sheet of foolscap or on two, is a matter affecting procedure. It is a mistake in procedure if you put the two taxes on one sheet of paper in stead of two; but if the Houses are agreed upon the tax, irrespective of that bit of paper on which you put them, the moral basis of taxation is complete. The only question that remains is the question, therefore, of procedure. And now I come to this point. If this were a matter affecting substance in any sense, there would be a good deal in this contention. But we can leave both Houses to see that substantially their rights slid privileges are not infringed. Is it not most unlikely, first of all, that the House of Representatives will deliberately infringe a provision of the Constitution by putting in things that are unconstitutional?

[The Chairman left the chair at two minutes past one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. REID. -

I was anxious to point out that Mr. Barton, whilst his answer was complete in form, did not give an answer that was complete in substance, because he did not touch the case of an Act which might, in some trivial respect, be exposed to the decision of the High Court, and might be ruled out owing to that trivial technical defect. But I will deal with the matter of substance under that—the case of an attempt to interfere seriously with the privileges laid down in the Constitution with reference to these Bills. I submit that, if there is one subject on which the House can be safely left to look after its own interests it is as to the assertion of its constitutional rights, especially when they are expressed in the plain words of the Federal Constitution. It transcends belief that any Senate worthy of the name would be a party to the surrender of rights and privileges which are part of the statute law. It is impossible to conceive. Therefore, we have in the Senate a sufficient protection of the Senate and the Constitution, even if we could conceive of the almost incredible thing that a deliberate attempt would be made in the Upper Chamber to bring up a Bill that would be open to the objection that it is illegal and contrary to the rights of the Senate. What Government would be so foolish, having any interest in the passing of a measure, as to bring forward that measure in a form offensive to the Constitution? We know, as practical men, that with the greatest skill in the world little errors and small infringements of rights creep in which are not much regarded by sensible men, which have no bearing on the public interests, and we do not desire that on such grounds the deliberate intention of the Legislature should be frustrated, because the moral sanction for any taxation or appropriation of money is the assent of the two Houses of Parliament. If we could conceive it possible that the House of Representatives would deliberately, on a matter of substance, break the law of the Constitution by bringing in a Bill at variance with its provisions, it is positively incredible that we will ever have a Senate in Australia which would surrender its own rights and privileges and allow such a Bill to pass. The first is incredible, and the second is even more so. Therefore, why should we throw our most serious measures open to the risk, on the ground of a mere technicality, of being upset, and our affairs thrown into confusion? So far as the public are concerned, if the two Houses assent to a proposition, if their minds agree upon a series of propositions, so far as the public outside are concerned it is immaterial whether these propositions find their place in one Act or three. Now, I come to the object of this provision, that a Bill imposing taxation should only propose one form of taxation, leaving the customs out. What was the intention of that? To protect the public? Nothing of the kind; because if both Houses were agreed upon the two parts which might appear in one Bill it would not matter, because their representatives in both Houses were ready to pass the tax; and it would be immaterial, if both Houses agree to pass the two subjects of taxation, whether it is expressed in one Act or two. Therefore, we come to the fact that the expression of these subjects in separate Acts was to protect the Senate, to enable the Senate to exercise its judgment freely, and to deal with large measures of taxation on their merits; so that if it approved of one subject of taxation, it should have the liberty of approving of it without being compelled to approve of another form of taxation which it disliked. So that the object of this provision was entirely in the interests of the Senate, to enable the Senate to exercise its wisdom and discretion unfettered by any difficulty. That being so, surely we will leave the Senate to be the guardian of its rights in this respect. I strongly feel it would be a disaster if this clause were left in its present form. It is now admitted on all sides that it will not do to leave sub-section (3) in that form. Now, the principle is exactly the same with regard to the other.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

No. The difference is this: You can define the first, but you cannot define the third.
Mr. REID. -

Surely my honorable friend knows that that definition will be subject, not to the skilled persons in the two Houses as well as their President and Speaker, but to certain persons sitting on the Supreme Court Bench, possibly ignorant of parliamentary procedure, and the necessity you impose on that bench is this: That, no matter what the terrible consequences may be, if a Bill only technically invades these words, that Bill must be destroyed by the bench. Is that the position in which we should place serious acts of legislation—that a court sitting in judgment would have to tell the people from the bench that the law was substantially in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution; that on all broad and serious grounds such as business men would regard there was absolutely not one word to be said impeaching the validity of the Bill; but, unfortunately, in line 51 there was a certain expression used which the court must hold, being compelled to decide according to statute law, did not impose taxation, but went beyond that, and therefore the Act must be annulled. It seems to me that position is so preposterous that we should not have had to speak on the subject. It should have recommended itself to the common sense of all of us. Just picture the position of law, and especially of financial law, in Great Britain if such a thing were possible as the reviewing of an Act of Parliament imposing taxation because of some technical flaw in the procedure of its passing.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

They have no Constitution in England except custom.

Mr. REID. -

They have the best in the world.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Hear, hear. The nearer we get to it the better it will be for us.

Mr. REID. -

There is one good thing about it—and I think my honorable friend, as the President of a Legislative Council, will agree with me here—it never allows Judges to undo acts of legislation because some clever lawyer has found some small flaw in them. If the clause is passed as it stands, it will create a new form of industry. What prospects of notoriety it will give to ambitious sucking lawyers, who, by scanning Acts of the Federal Legislature, might be able to discover flaws upon which to raise points before the High Court. What a preposterous position it will be if, because of the infringement by a hair's breadth of line 3 of sub-section (4) of section something else, an Act of the Federal Parliament is set aside.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Then you had better not have a written Constitution, because such a possibility is inseparable from a written Constitution.

Mr. REID. -

These provisions are intended to secure the independence of the Senate, but surely honorable members have not such a craven view of the Senate, which they have taken such pains to create, as to believe that it would allow any substantial outrage of the provisions securing its independence and integrity! The assumption is the most degrading one that has been expressed in regard to the Senate. It will be a poor corrupt inept body if it allows an outrage upon its substantial rights without a word of complaint or notice. If that is the sort of Senate that our friends are looking forward to, it should be wiped out of the Constitution altogether. How can we put rights in the guardianship of a body of that kind if it cannot be trusted to preserve its own rights? This idea of buttressing the states' Senate by the Federal High Court involves a want of confidence in the integrity of the Senate. Its independence is absolutely guaranteed even if the amendment is passed. All that it would have to do would be to see that its independence was not violated, and in all substantial respects it would see that it was not. But occasionally, even in the wisest bodies, there is a lapsus, a slip, not of principle, not affecting seriously the rights of the House. It would be absurd to allow a wretched little accident of this kind to be afterwards made the basis of a solemn application to quash an Act of Parliament. Such a thing has never been heard of in connexion with any legislative body in the world. In the United States such a thing is impossible.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

What about the income tax appeal there?

Mr. REID. -

The Income Tax Act there was upset upon a question of substance. An Income Tax Act was passed by Congress, but the High Court held that under a certain provision of the Constitution such a tax was unconstitutional and illegal, because it could not be equally apportioned between the several states. That was a question of substance, and a proper ground upon which to annul the law. There was there a violation of a cardinal principle of the Constitution. But how could there be a violation of a cardinal principle of the Constitution if some words slipped into a particular measure which had no consequence at all, but created merely a technical flaw. The Senate will look after matters of substance, but it is proposed that matters of a purely technical character should be left to lawyers and the High Court to look after. If the validity of our laws is to rest upon such a precarious position as this, there is rather a gloomy outlook for the Commonwealth. I will point out one provision in clause 54, by the violation of which the public might be substantially affected. It is provided in sub-section (3) of clause 54 that the Senate may not amend any proposed law in such a manner as to increase any proposed charge or burden upon the people. If the Senate increased a proposed charge upon the people that would be a violation of a cardinal principle of the Constitution. But is there any provision which says that if the Senate doubles the burdens of the people any one can go to the High Court and protest against this unconstitutional outrage? No, not a word. A Bill might be sent up to the Senate proposing the expenditure of £3,000,000, but the Senate might double the expenditure and make it £6,000,000, and a corrupt weak blind House of Representatives might accept the amendment and pass the Bill. Would not that be a flagrant outrage of the Constitution, substantially affecting the people who had to find the money? But no remedy is provided for such a state of things. No one could go to the High Court and seek protection against such action upon the part of the Senate. Why? Because the provision only affects the House of Representatives. The heavenly Senate would not be affected by such action. A provision of this kind only gives that sublime body more latitude, more scope, for the doing of grand and noble things. This is a rotten position to take up, and I hope that honorable members will see that, when we give certain rights to each House we can safely leave each House to secure respect for these rights. If a House is so low, weak, and corrupt, as not to be willing to maintain its own rights, all the courts in the world cannot make it straight and honest, and a source of respect to the people. If a solemnly-considered measure of legislation, under which a multitude of things had for years been done, was taken by a young lawyer into the High Court, and upset upon a trivial point, what a farce it would be. What a position in which to place the law-making pow

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

The right honorable member has been very slow to see the point himself. Mr. REID. -

If I have been, surely my right honorable friend will give me credit for seeing it now that I do see it. But I find that I have done myself an injustice. Since the adjournment for lunch, my attention has been directed to a speech which I delivered in Adelaide, and in which I put the very views that I am now expressing. I had, however, forgotten that I had spoken upon the subject in Adelaide. If you want to buttress the Senate, to protect its rights as defined by the Constitution, do so; but do not allow some other authority to annul solemn acts of legislation upon trivial points. Do not let our legislation be the sport of technical lawyers upon the assumption that the Senate will not look after its own rights. There is nothing more absurd in the world than to suppose that the Senate would pass a Bill which would outrage the provisions of clause 54.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Then the right honorable member need not object to it.

Mr. REID. -

My honorable friend is the most successful man I know in not seeing what occurs. You talk and reason before him, and after you have appeared to have explained everything he makes a remark that might as well have been made at the other end of the world. I feel strongly about this matter, and I will tell honorable members why. I would protest against a provision allowing a Bill passed by the House of Representatives to be taken before the High Court upon a technicality. Upon precisely the same grounds I would object to a measure representing the matured determination of both Houses being put in that position. I hope that the amendment will be carried. The whole ground has been given up by the consent of honorable members to the amendment of sub-section (3). But I base my remarks upon the broad principle that the concession is worth nothing unless it recognises that matters of procedure should be settled in the Houses themselves; that they are matters which pre-eminently must be safeguarded and watched by the Houses themselves. The principle applies to both Houses equally. I hope that the majority of honorable members will decide this matter upon its merits, and that they will remember that it is the work of the Senate as well as the work of the House of Representatives that will be played with upon technical points if the amendment is carried.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I agree with the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) that matters of procedure should be settled by the Houses themselves. We have listened to speeches which, whether they happen to be right in substance or not, carry conviction from the force with which they are delivered. But during the time my right honorable friend was speaking I have been trying to think in between the lines. I can see clearly enough that what is sought to be done is practically to reduce the relative position of the House of Representatives and the Senate to the relative position of the House of Commons and the House of Lords—a position that was well enough defined in its origin, when the powers of the two bodies were nearly co-ordinate; but now the undoubted powers of one body have infringed upon the powers of the other, until it has become a mere vetoing body, with no power of origination, and able to apply the veto only at its peril. Now, let us see what the right honorable gentleman means to do. He asks-"Why impose these limitations? You can have three Bills dealing with these special matters. They have to be dealt with separately now; but suppose the two Houses agreed that they should be dealt with collectively, what invasion of the Constitution would there be?"

Mr. REID. -

No one said that there would be no invasion of the Constitution; but no wrong would be done to the people.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

My right honorable friend argues thus: He asks, if you can agree in singulis, why cannot you agree in globo?

Mr. REID. -

My honorable friend misunderstands me.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think not. If you can agree to things one at a time, why cannot you agree to them half-a-dozen at a time?

Mr. REID. -

I said that the law would prevent such a thing being done, and that the Senate would see that it was not done.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

My right honorable friend, in the warmth of his declamation, did not put it in that way. He put it in the way that I am putting it, both before lunch and after lunch.

Mr. REID. -

Will my honorable friend allow me to explain? I said that, so far as the people were concerned, if the two Houses agreed to measures of taxation, it was immaterial whether they dealt with one, two, or three subjects; that if both Houses agreed to such a measure, it would not be a wrong upon the people. But I went on to say that such a thing would never happen, because the Senate would see that no such infringement of the Constitution took place.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not think that I have misunderstood or misrepresented my right honorable friend in the smallest degree, though I tried to put the substance of what he said without the elaboration with which he sought to disguise his thoughts. "If," he says, "the two Houses agreed that they might deal with several subjects of taxation in the one Bill, as well as in several Bills, there would be no wrong done to the people, because these Houses represent the people." And here comes the subtle little attack on the Constitution. "If the Senate chooses to agree with it, where is the danger?" So that although we are establishing a Constitution having no analogy to the English Constitution, in which the Commonwealth is to be supreme in some ways, and the states are to be supreme in others, there being an agreement that we require a protector of the settlement, as it were, my honorable friend says:"Do away with that protector altogether; do not endure for a moment that interference of the Supreme Court that you establish for the purpose of preserving your Constitution, and preventing it being destroyed by the brute force of the majority, and leave the protection of the Constitution, not in the hands of a body in which you have confidence, but leave it to be interpreted, from time to time, by the Houses of Parliament, according to the varying views the Members of Parliament may have."

Mr. REID. -

Give us a protector under clause 54 as well as under clause, 55.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Will my right honorable friend allow me deal with one subject at a time? I rarely interject myself, and it is just as well for a man who thinks he has a thought worth explaining that he should be allowed to make his explanation without unnecessary interruption. Following out my thought, I ask the representatives of the smaller states to consider the matter, because, as my right honorable friend explained in the magnificent speech we have just listened to, it goes to the very root of the cardinal principles of federation. It is said we have sought to establish a Constitution by analogy to the House of Lords and the House of Commons in England. But we know that there is no analogy, or, if there were an analogy, we should have to consider what would be a very solemn and serious question-whether we should have federation or a general amalgamation.

Mr. MOORE. -

Unification.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I hate the word "unification," and will not use it. I have said before that there is much to be said for amalgamation. I can understand that there might be an immense amount of money saved by amalgamation in the way of carrying on the government of the country, and there might be an immense amount of force from the head of the Commonwealth which you cannot get from the partial disintegration which is involved even in federation. But it is not our mission to establish an amalgamation of these colonies. We are here under Bills passed by our various colonies, and there is a claim for federation, and not a claim for merging the colonies in one common concern. That being so, my right honorable friend's speech is like the amendment which the Attorney-General of Victoria has moved-the speech and the amendment are in the same direction, to take away the very safeguards which will prevent this federation becoming an amalgamation. Let us work this argument out a bit. My right honorable friend says-"If the two Houses can agree to a subject in a Bill singly, why should not they agree to a Bill dealing with half-a-dozen different subject-matters of a similar kind?" There you get the whole doctrine of tacking introduced without a moment's hesitation or delay. Who is to be the judge? Who is to say whether there is an agreement or not? The House of Representatives begins with the power of which they and the Senate are the sole judges—not the Senate for all time, but the Senate for the time being—as to whether more than one subject-matter shall be introduced into one Bill. We all know how much the colour of things alters in the process of passing through a House. Opinions at the initiation of a Bill are not at all the same as the opinions at the conclusion. We ourselves have altered our opinions from time to time, and I should have a low opinion of any one of us, if after meeting with the men we have here, we could still say that all our opinions were the same as they were at the beginning. Debate is for the purpose of informing our minds, and enabling us to form a better considered judgment, and most of us have at times, in consequence of debate, varied our opinions or entirely changed them. This proposal will give a power for the House of Representatives to mix any number of subjects in one Bill, and, if the other House will agree to that, it is to be all right. That is the proposal. But will you allow me to suggest—suppose the other House does not agree to it? Shall we not have the whole mischief "in one act"? The House of Representatives says-"Well, gentlemen, we represent the people, and we are going to put into this Bill one or two little taxation matters."

Mr. KINGSTON. -

What do you think the Speaker will say to that?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Will my right honorable friend leave the Speaker alone for a moment, because I disagree altogether with my right honorable friend upon this question? The House of Representatives will say-"We will introduce one or two little things which are necessary, and without which it will be difficult for the business of the Commonwealth to be carried on; at the same time we shall introduce a few little things which you do not like, and then when we send up the whole altogether if you say that you do not like some of the things which we include in the Bill, we will respectfully ask you to consider the whole in one." Is not that tacking? Is not that the very thing that this Bill has been carefully framed to prevent? Is it not the House of Representatives setting the Senate at defiance, and saying-"You dare to stop the work of the Commonwealth in spite of the fact that we have included in our measure something which you are indisposed to agree to!"

Of course we should have the Senate, by the most ordinary evolution and without any trouble, gradually ceasing to be a States House altogether, losing all its independence, all the protection that the Constitution intended to give to it, and becoming in the position of the House of Lords, with not even a vetoing power, but with practically a revisory power-without any capacity at all to exercise a veto on matters of finance. Is that what we want? I know that there are some who think that we might just as well let the majority of the people of Australia rule, and not bother about the states at all. For those views I entertain the profoundest respect. On this question of unification or amalgamation I am very open myself; but I only say that is not our mission here at all.

Mr. DEAKIN. - Open to what?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - Open to conviction.

Mr. DEAKIN. - I have not noticed it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - My honorable friend, who, I observe, thinks that I am hard to convince, as he said on a former occasion, is of opinion that I must be always the same way. I think my experience of my honorable friend is that he often gives the most excellent reasons for arriving at different conclusions, and, while admiring the marvellous ability of my honorable friend, I regret that it has not forced him to the inevitable result.

Mr. ISAACS. - If the result be inevitable be would have to arrive at it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - It is, unfortunately, not always so. We have listened to a great speech from Mr. Reid, which must have made a great impression upon everybody.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Have you not smashed it up?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - My honorable friend thinks I have not, therefore it is not a fair thing for him—who, I understand, takes the same view as myself on this subject, though probably from loyalty to his colony he has slightly diverged from his original opinion—to interject in a sardonic spirit, when he knows that I have not done what he suggests at all. However, I am sure that, like myself, the honorable member is trying to do the best he can. But I do venture respectfully—not to warn this committee, because that would be presumptuous, but to ask the assistance of the committee to show me if I am wrong in saying that this amendment, which has been introduced and explained from various and inconsistent points of view by the Attorney-General of Victoria, does not, as has been demonstrated with most absolute clearness by the Premier of New South Wales, go to the very root of the matter we have been fighting for from beginning to end, of whether the Senate is to be dominated by the House of Representatives. Thus we are forced—after, forsooth, the 1891 Convention and the three sessions of this Convention—back to the elementary consideration of whether this body is to be analogous to the position of the House of Lords in England, and we have the English Constitution brought in, and an appeal made through our patriotism, and "God save the Queen," and all that sort of thing. That is not the question which we have to deal with. We have to do our best to arrange a Constitution which has very little analogy to the English Constitution, but, at the same time, from the circumstances of our birth and the love of country, we have to adhere to the English Constitution as nearly as is consistent with the altered condition of things. I again say that I hope that this amendment will not be agreed to. As the debate has developed, it has shown that the proposal goes to the very root of the principles that underly all Federations—the principles that underly the American, the Swiss, and the Canadian Constitutions. The amendment is, in fact, a distinct attempt, in a most clever and wonderfully insidious way, whilst denying that the doctrine of tacking ought to exist, to preserve it at the same time. Just one word to the Attorney-General of Victoria. I am not at all certain that, even if he carried his proposals according to the way he has variously explained his intentions, he would produce quite the result that he wants. It might be possible that he might find himself in the hands of the Supreme Court at an early stage, and at a later stage as well. If no Bill can be introduced containing more than one taxation proposal, then the guardian of the Constitution would say—"You must not introduce it," and a mandamus might be issued.

Mr. ISAACS. -
   A mandamus against Parliament?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
   What a shocking thing!

Mr. ISAACS. -
   Did you ever hear of such a thing?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
   Then is Parliament to do what it likes?
Mr. HIGGINS. -
You never heard of a mandamus being obtained against Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If that is the sort of Constitution you want you had better let us know it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I know that, with the liberal views of my honorable friend, he wishes the Supreme Court to do nothing.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is a mere nisi prius advocate's way of putting it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
No; the nisi prius advocacy is on the other side. I think it is rather a strange way of wishing to protect the Constitution; but is the honorable and learned member quite sure that if he gets this he gets anything? If under the Constitution it is to be "proposed laws" instead of "laws," does not he think that if the Constitution is valid in the beginning, because it ends in its fruition in an Act of Parliament, the Act of Parliament may not be the subject of consideration by the High Court? It is worthy of his consideration.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Is an Act of Parliament a proposed law?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
The High Court is the protector of the Constitution. What we provide is that "the law" shall not be so-and-so. My honorable friend wants to provide that "the proposed law" shall not be so-and-so. Does he mean to say that the High Court would have no power there? We are to take care that the Constitution is preserved, and that the relative rights of the two Houses are not violated. In the end I suppose it will work out as it has in America, in peace, order, and good government, and in thorough good feeling, and these lawyers' quibbles that my friend Mr. Reid—who I forgot for a moment is a lawyer-introduced, will be as naught compared to the great heart of the people, that will take care that the Constitution is worked out properly. I do not want to detain the committee any longer. I sincerely hope that the speech we have listened to from the Premier of New South Wales will not alter what I believe to be the opinion of the majority of the committee, that this power, which has been very carefully considered in every Convention—

Mr. ISAACS. -
It was not in 1891; it was not in the 1891 Bill.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Yes, it was.
Mr. ISAACS. -
Will you find it?
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
It was carefully considered before the Senate was so much crippled. It was carefully considered at every stage, debated at every stage, most thoughtfully thought out at every stage.
Mr. ISAACS. -
Perhaps I am wrong.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Shall we, on a magnificent speech, alter the very basis of federation, and establish a Constitution which, in the result, will be found in a very little while to make the states of Australia become one State, and subject to the arbitrary will of the numerical majority of the people as a whole?
Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -
It is always interesting to hear the Treasurer of New South Wales giving his views and his reasons, because we are taken very much by his mode of addressing the Convention. There is one part of his speech which I think is not altogether applicable to the Senate. If the Senate does not agree with his views at once, then he says they are deficient in common sense, they are deficient in reason, and they know nothing about government. What was the object of bringing forward this motion if it was not to place some restriction on one of the powers of the Senate? Let us look at the conduct of the honorable member on a previous occasion on the same subject. We must recollect that sub-section (4) of clause 52 gives power to the Senate to send suggestions down to the House of Representatives. Now, only fancy a case such as that put by the Treasurer of New South Wales. He not only asserts that it has a right to put in an Appropriation Bill anything which the House of Representatives thinks proper, but says he would prevent a message from being sent down, supposing such a thing was done, from the Senate to the House of Representatives, finding fault with such a proceeding as that. Then he goes further, and he says, what is the use of a Senate? I would prefer to see only a House of Representatives rather than have a Senate that has no power. What is the object of the Senate? What do you want with a sort of curb upon the House of Representatives? It is well known that it is only through the continued pressure of the House of Commons against the House of Lords that the House of Commons has assumed all the power. Is not the object of our Constitution just to prevent that? Is not the object of our Constitution to prevent the corruption which gradually arises from the superior power? Who are the persons who carry out the encroachments? The Senate cannot carry out any encroachments; the House of Representatives can, and the Senate is just as much a portion of this Constitution as is the House of Representatives. Then, in order that the Constitution may be carried into effect, you appoint a Federal Court.
Now, don't have a Federal Court, strike out those clauses which give power to create a Federal Court, and we will know our position. The honorable member, when I interjected about the Constitution of England, said:"Oh, that is the best form of Constitution; let us commence the custom at once;
start with two Houses, and see which will prevail." We know that the possession of power always tempts a House to increase that power. The House of Representatives has full power under the Bill to deal with all monetary matters. The Senate cannot deal with these matters except by way of suggestion, and that would have been denied if the honorable member could have had his own way. Yet he says we are such ignoramuses that we do not understand anything which is produced here.
Cannot we see the object of this insidious proposal on the part of the Attorney-General of Victoria? We could not see it at the time, but as he went on explaining we saw at once

what the object of it is, and it is to pre-vent the Senate as formed under this Constitution from carrying it out. If there is one member on this point who is more inconsistent in his mode of reasoning than any other it is the Treasurer of New South Wales. He talks and talks, and he is very glib in his mode of talking, but where is the substance of his logic? There is no logic in it at all, it is most inconsistent, and if we only watch the progress of his speech we will find out how very weak the sum and substance of it all is. It ends in a shadow, and all we have to do is to throw it on one side and go on our own common sense, I suppose because we are more matured than he is. As regards the clause as it now stands, what does it do? It says that every particular measure shall be confined to its own particular subject. The honorable member says:"Oh, but what does it matter? If we mix up three or four things together, and we pass them through the two Houses, it ought to be the law of the land." We know that many men will vote in this way: One man is willing to vote on one line of argument and another is willing to vote on another line of argument, but in order to save what he is anxious for he votes contrary to his opinion on one subject, whereas if he wants to carry out a thing he votes for another, and the result is that you do not get a fair vote. The honorable member says:"You should not confine the Appropriation Bill to a strict appropriation. We know what has been done in the various colonies by the Legislative Assembly in respect of that subject. It is well known that they have been able to carry out, from time to time, things which ought not to have been carried out, but, in order not to interfere unnecessarily with the appropriations, Bills have been passed very much contrary to the opinion of the Legislative Council of the particular colony. In New South Wales there is a fight about to come on between the Council and the Assembly, and, therefore, the honorable member is merely paving the way, in order, as it were, to strengthen his position in that respect in his own colony. We have had quite enough of New South Wales and its powers in this Convention, and the sooner we express our own views and opinions on these subjects the better it will be. I trust the Convention will stick to that portion of the clause as it stands. As regards the next section, it is of very little importance as regards the dealing with those particular measures, such as the Appropriation Bill, which is entirely in the House of Representatives, subject only at the present time to the advice of the Senate, but which the House of Representatives need pay no attention to. But now, under this clause, the Senate will be perfectly justified in refusing to pass a Bill where it contained anything which was not clearly and distinctly within an appropriation clause. I trust that the committee will stick to the clause.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I shall support the amendment of my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs), and I hope I shall be able to discuss the matter without any reference to unification or state rights, both of which matters appear to me to have been introduced in this discussion altogether unnecessarily. It seems to me that those who resist this amendment are forced to this position: They cannot trust the Senate, they fear that the Senate will be either corrupt, or ignorant, or careless of its rights, and that, although it is made by the Constitution the guardian of certain parliamentary rights, it will weakly surrender them unless a watchful eye is kept over it by the High Court. Observe the contrast drawn between the Senate and the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives is honest, alert, capable, and no such security, is wanted. Why, sir, it is a distinction which all advocates of a powerful Senate ought to resent in every possible way. I draw no such distinction between the two Houses of Parliament. I believe that both Houses will be honest, will be capable, will be deeply sensible of their rights, and acute and alert to maintain them. What has been our experience in the past in connexion with our provincial Constitutions? Have we found that one has been allowed to encroach with impunity on the privileges of another? Nothing of the sort.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Most certainly.

Mr. REID. -

If it has it was always the Upper House.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
I think not. Each knowing its rights has been careful to maintain them.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
One has tried to destroy the rights of the other.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
When you resist an amendment of this sort you suggest not only failure on the part of the Senate to appreciate what its constitutional rights are, but also corruption, it seems to me, or incapacity in the highest places as regards the presiding officers of both Houses. What is the effect of this provision as it stands? It would undoubtedly cast upon the Speaker of the House of Representatives equally with the President of the Senate the duty of scrutinizing every measure which was introduced, and ruling it on his own motion, without objection being taken, as irregular and not proper to be entertained if it in any way contravened the provisions of the Constitution. I believe thoroughly in the honesty of the Parliament that is to be. I make no distinction between the two Houses. I am sure that the result will be that no Bill will pass either House which can be fairly said, taking a broad constitutional view of the case, to contravene these plain provisions.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Then the High Court will never interfere.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
But, at the same time, there is this possibility, that in minor matters in which opinions may differ, the opinions of skilled experts, such as the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, backed up by practically the unanimous view of those two bodies, are liable to be overruled by an expression of the High Court of Australia, constituted possibly of people who have little or no knowledge of constitutional practice.

Mr. ISAACS. -
A majority of the court.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I say, in a matter of that sort, I would infinitely prefer to take the opinion of the presiding officers of both branches of the Federal Parliament than the opinion of any High Court, seeing that the President and Speaker would be assisted in the interpretation of the Act by the views of honorable members who surround them. We might have it overruled in a matter of this sort by the High Court. Here is a provision that laws imposing taxation shall deal only with the imposition of taxation. I think a question was put by Mr. Reid or Mr. Isaacs to Mr. McMillan when he was saying how plain it would be to construe a matter of that sort:"Would that justify the inclusion of a repealing clause in an Act of Parliament imposing taxation?"
I question very much whether it would. I am inclined to doubt, for example, whether, in an Act proposing to substitute an income tax for a land tax, a measure repealing the existing land tax and providing an income tax would not be altogether beyond these provisions; and, although most properly assented to, and ruled, from the constitutional aspect, to be in order, I doubt whether it would not be liable, at the instance of an acute lawyer, appealing to those who will be comparatively ignorant of constitutional practice, to be declared null and void. I am inclined to think you would require to have your land tax repealed first, or two Bills running concurrently, one to repeal the land tax and the other to substitute the income tax; and I am sure a majority of honorable members here know what inconvenience that would cause.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And, as Sir Samuel Griffith suggests, you might have to submit another Bill containing the machinery for the collection of your income tax.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I was going to point that out also. Clause 55 provides that laws imposing taxation shall deal only with the imposition of taxation, and I am inclined to doubt whether it authorizes the insertion in a Taxation Bill of the machinery necessary for the collection of the tax.

Mr. REID. -

No, it does not.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I do not think it does. I ask the Drafting Committee to consider this, and I would suggest that it is very often convenient, in a Taxing Bill, to provide the machinery for the collection of the tax. And yet, under this clause, the whole of a Customs Act might be invalidated by the incorporation of the usual machinery for the collection of the tax. Further-and I see that Mr. Deakin proposes to deal with this question—here is a provision that you shall not, in a Bill imposing duties of customs, impose duties of excise also. Now, honorable members know perfectly well that it is highly desirable to deal with the two things at the same time. They have an intimate mercantile connexion with each other, and to deal with the one and leave the other untouched would expose us to the gravest inconvenience. If we pass this clause, with the amendment Mr. Isaacs has proposed, we will undoubtedly have the two Houses of the Federal Parliament watchful of each other. Each of the pre-siding officers would be jealous lest, inadvertently, an unconstitutional provision should be accepted by his House, for which mistake he would, in some measure, be held responsible and to blame. Under these circumstances, I cannot contemplate the possibility of any objection to the clause if it be amended as proposed by Mr. Isaacs, at least any objection equal to the disadvantages which would unquestionably accrue if you allowed the decision of Parliament, and the rulings of the President of the Senate, or of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to be subject to the ruling of the High Court. Why, sir, in connexion with our meanest and smaller courts, we provide that if an appeal is to be exercised, it must be exercised within a certain time, or the right of appeal is gone; but in this measure we are asked to provide that the decision of the President of the Senate, or of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is to be open to challenge for all time; under the circumstances to which Mr. Reid has referred, and with the consequences depicted by other speakers. Look at the inconsistency with which the question is dealt with in the previous clause. One of the most vital questions, the taxing of the people, the spending of the public funds, properly confided to the popular House, is put in this way—that it shall only apply in connexion with "proposed laws." You might just as well suggest that the House of Representatives will be careless of its rights; that it will tacitly authorize and practically approve of a measure which emanates from the Senate, and which originates both taxation and expenditure, and under such circumstances as that, when the whole Constitution is practically turned topsy-turvy on one of the gravest financial questions, and there is no remedy whatever, once an Act is assented to; but, on the other hand, in connexion with these small matters, there is a proposal that the High Court is at all times to have the power of review, although it could not interfere in a grave question of the character to which I have referred. It seems to me that in a matter of this sort experience of the past should tell us that, when we have marked out, in precise language, the relative rights of the two Houses of Parliament, we are abundantly justified in confiding in them the duty of maintaining their respective rights, and we know perfectly well that under this Constitution they will be completely protected.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

The honorable and learned member for South Australia (Sir John Downer) paid me the distinguished compliment of referring to me as always appreciative of the arguments urged by my adversaries. On this occasion, and in connexion with this subject it is scarcely possible to return the compliment. For the honorable member deals with this question, not in the judicial manner with which we are familiar, but with much of the warmth and force of the forensic advocate. It makes one almost despair of political discussion, if honorable and learned members of his eminence and ability fail to distinguish between the several interests involved in propositions of the importance of the amendment recently submitted. A proposal affecting the financial powers of the Commonwealth will affect both Houses, and may therefore be made the platform of a discussion upon their rights, privileges, and powers. But the proposal submitted by the Attorney-General of Victoria did not necessarily involve any such consideration, and was expressly aimed at a difficulty of quite another kind. The whole discussion, so far as it has turned on the relative power of the two Houses, valuable and interesting as it may have been from other aspects, is beside the issue which my honorable and learned friend desires to raise.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. - It does affect the Senate.

Mr. DEAKIN. - I admit it; but on a proposal of this kind its possible effect, its relation to the whole constitutional system, and particularly to the relative power of the two Houses, is not really involved. We have a right, speaking in this Chamber where there are no party divisions, where we are not under the necessity of supporting a party standard as we are elsewhere, even while subject to conscientious doubts as to whether it is being raised at the right moment or in the right manner; but now when we are seeking to establish the basis of a Constitution which will affect the whole future of this country, we are expected to take the propositions submitted solely on their merits, and in the light of their purpose. We ought to distinguish the unforeseen and unintended operations which they may have in other directions, and not make them the chief feature of our debates. That is not desirable here.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - I do not think there is any unforeseen or unexpected operation here.

Mr. DEAKIN. - So far as I am informed there is. The position we are placed in is this: At this stage of the debate, I, for one, frankly accept the financial compromise arrived at in Adelaide, and to which a reiterated assent was given in Sydney. I will not at this stage be any party to attempting to interfere with that settlement in any particular or in any degree. It is not on that side that the amendment appeals to me at all. There is no desire to obtain a reconsideration of what we regard as the final settlement of the financial powers of the two Houses. What we say is, that quite apart from the financial powers of the two Houses, a practical issue of the greatest moment is involved. Honorable members urge that this clause, with others, was inserted as a compensation to the Senate. It was part of the adjustment made between the two Houses so as to protect the Senate against aggressive tacking by the House of Representatives. That was the origin of the clause and the object of its insertion. But from the manner of its insertion, and of its expression, an entirely unexpected result has followed. If it be necessary to add further safeguards to those already existing in the Constitution against aggression on the part of the House of Representatives, or in order to further fortify the Senate against attack, I, for one, would willingly assent to them. The arguments of the Hon. Mr. Carruthers appear to have fallen on deaf ears, but, as he pointed out, if there be embedded in the Constitution a direct enactment that no proposed laws for taxation including more than the one subject of taxation, and no proposed Appropriation Bill going outside the ordinary services of the year, can be legally dealt with, both the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate would not only be authorized, but would be imperatively required, in the discharge of their duty, to rule such a measure out of order at any stage of its existence.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Suppose they did not?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

If the honorable member can suggest any other addition by which, if necessary, even outside persons or bodies can be enabled to challenge a Bill during its discussion, or at any time prior to the Royal assent being given, I would say that such securities, however unnecessary they may appear to be, if they will satisfy honorable members opposite, should be given. I would concede to the honorable member any protection that his fertile ingenuity can suggest to enable all criticism to be focussed on any measure submitted to the Legislature during its passage or prior to the Royal assent being given, so that at no time should that province which has been marked off for the Senate be trespassed upon either wilfully or unintentionally by the House of Representatives. But it is after this that the considerations which weigh most with myself and with those who have preceded me arise. It is after the Governor's assent has been given, and after the law has been brought into operation, and has had its natural effect upon the pockets of the people, that we say that even if there has been an error of procedure it should then be too late to challenge the law. There is a period beyond which you cannot challenge the possession of real property, and that was law in days when such property was legally considered to be scarecely second in importance to life. In this Constitution no such limitation of time is to prevail; but after all the solemnities of legislative consideration and enactment have been fulfilled, after the consent of the Queen has been given, after a financial policy has been launched, and the whole finances of the Commonwealth have been affected by it, it is yet to be possible to have the Act declared invalid because of some technical defect in the procedure by which it was passed. Surely honorable members, without distinction—those who are the heartiest supporters of the rights of the Senate, and those who are more urgent for the claims of the House of Representatives—will agree that the consequences here are too serious, too enormous, too fatal, to be allowed to operate unchecked, as they certainly could do under the clause as it stands. The case submitted by my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid), and by many other speakers, including the Premier of South Australia, is unanswerable. The weight of it lies in the fact that this one malignant consequence is no necessary punishment such as ought to follow a departure from the principles of procedure. The punishment falls not on the guilty persons, not upon the members of the Senate upon whom really the burden of such a blunder should rest, but upon the pockets and the fortunes of the people of the whole Commonwealth. They are to be penalized for a mistaken reading of their legal responsibilities by their representatives. No laws have a more direct operation upon the public than those that declare the sums that each citizen shall pay towards the expenses of the Commonwealth year by year. The annual services of the year may include in the future the votes for the railways, and through the railways and customs may affect the whole of the industrial operations of the people. And yet, as the clause stands, if there is any trifling and insignificant error of procedure in the passing of an Appropriation Bill the whole public service of the Commonwealth may be paralyzed.

The thousands of people who are dependent upon it may be deprived of their salaries, and the tens of thousands of persons affected in their activities in one direction or another by the public expenditure may also suffer. I put these as extreme cases, but as cases against which it is possible to provide, and for which we ought to provide. I ask honorable members, deliberately whether it is not possible to secure all that they may desire in the way of protection to the Senate without risking these tremendous consequences to the people of the Commonwealth in the event of an innocent mistake being made by both Houses of Parliament?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Would not all payments made under a law that had not been declared to be invalid be valid?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I am not at all clear upon that point. Other honorable members have painted with force the consequences of any slip, however innocent, in mere procedure, and I need not deal further with the matter. I would ask honorable members again if we are so barren of invention as to be unable to distinguish between the two things? Is it impossible to give in this clause the amplest possible protection to those rights of the Senate which honorable members desire to guard jealously without requiring that in the event of any failure to comply with these requirements an Act for appropriation or taxation is to go by the board, with all the consequences that may flow from the declaration that it was unconstitutional?

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

What is your amendment?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

We have a Drafting Committee, and if we are clear in our line of policy, and the Convention united in accepting a principle, the Drafting Committee contains members who are far more capable than I of putting the provision into the Constitution, if it be the will of the Convention. But is it the will of the Convention? First, we are seeking to discover that. The issues are separable, and ought to be separate. On the one side, there can be ample safeguards for the Senate, and on the other side there can be protection against the High Court's declaring Acts ultra vires for mere failure in procedure.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

That is dealt with, is it not, in clause 54?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

So far as clause 55 is concerned, it contains expressions which may raise questions of procedure, either as to subjects that are included in a taxation measure, or the proposed expenditure that may be included in an Appropriation Bill. The last point I wish to make is that a mistake which could have been innocently made in the case of a Tax Bill or an Appropriation Bill must be very trifling and insignificant. In the case of the passage of a non-financial Act, which Act thereafter is pronounced ultra vires because it goes beyond the powers intrusted to the Parliament of the Commonwealth, the action of the High Court is justified, because the operation of that Act would otherwise continue indefinitely, and the Constitution, as a whole, would be rendered of no avail. But in all cases where a mistake could be made in procedure, either by the inclusion of some secondary taxable matter, or the inclusion in the appropriation of some item which ought not to be in the Appropriation Bill, the departure from the line of procedure, laid down by the Constitution must be so small that it has escaped notice altogether, or the majority of both Houses of Parliament have thought it too trifling to deserve attention. The Governor, as advised by the Attorney-General, must have thought it not worth while de-laying the measure for; and yet for some mistake, which must have been inconsiderable from the very nature of the case, the whole public service of the Commonwealth may be paralyzed, or its taxation policy upset.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I understood Mr. Barton says the word "law" in this section does not mean the whole Act, but this particular section.

Mr. BARTON. -
I am under the impression that the suggested adoption of "proposed law" and "law," instead of "Bill" and "Act," was for the purpose of enabling the enactments to be dealt with separately, each clause being an enactment.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It means that each clause is invalid if there is an infraction of the rule in the smallest detail.

Mr. BARTON. -
No; I think not.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Surely the word "law" means the whole law.

Mr. REID. -
You might have a law imposing two taxes, one of which had to be rejected.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Which one? I do not remember in 1891, when the word "law" was under discussion, that Sir Samuel Griffith used the reason now put forward by Mr. Barton.

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not think it has been urged in regard to this particular section. It may be that this clause was left out when it was previously discussed.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It was discussed very closely in Adelaide.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I venture to submit that this clause can be buttressed by any and every device which may be thought proper for the purpose of affording members of either House, or, if you like, the members of the general public, an opportunity of challenging any measure of taxation or appropriation before it is finally adopted and acted on. If the line be drawn at the passage of the measure, and the Convention be satisfied that an innocent or inconsiderable error is not to be followed by disarrangement of the public finances or of a taxation policy, then, if we have not surmounted a great difficulty, we have avoided one. We shall have put it beyond the power of critics to say that, in order to preserve the rights of the Senate, which could have been amply preserved by other provisions we went out of our way to attach to a failure to observe the course of procedure between the two Houses in these matters consequences so tremendous that, since the days of Charles Lamb's story, when a whole house was burnt down for the purpose of roasting a suckling, we have had no such undue sacrifice or possible sacrifice of public convenience and public advantage. Surely the Convention, which has now seen the two paths which lie before us, can protect the Senate in the ampest way, and yet relieve us from the danger by which we are beset under the terms in which, unintentionally, no doubt, this clause has been drawn.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

It is very curious to note the difference of tone of honorable members of this Convention, or some of them, between our sittings in Adelaide and the present time. When we disposed of this question in Adelaide there was no talk whatever of the Supreme Court depriving us of our privileges, overriding the Constitution, and all the rest of it. Mr. Reid, who now regards with horror and dismay the clause as it now stands, then thought so little of it as to say-"It is most discouraging to find we have spent three-quarters of an hour over a matter of absolutely no importance."

Mr. REID. -

There is a difference between you and me; I improve by time, and get more intelligence.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

The honorable member's intelligence is not generally so lax. His perception is acute enough I am sure, and perhaps too acute for many of us. It is impossible to believe that if he fulfilled his duty to the Convention and the colonies, and there were then these dangers and difficulties underlying the clause as it stood, he should have failed to notice them. We wasted very little more time over the clause after the honorable gentlemen reproached us. We have now been dealing with the subject for four hours, and I think all through we have been dealing with a bogy that none of us need apprehend any evil consequences from. Mr. Reid says, and possibly he believes, that the proposed amendment is for the protection of the Senate. On the other hand, the honorable and learned Attorney-General for Victoria let out plainly enough that it was for the limitation of the Senate's powers he desired to see this amendment carried. We heard from another honorable member something or other about the outraged people, and all that sort of thing, which is said on every occasion when the Senate's power comes to be the matter in question. We should bear in mind now, and at all times, that this Senate, which is attacked whenever opportunity presents itself, is to be just as much a popular body as the House of Representatives. We should remember that we have intrusted the Senate with power, because it represents the people just as fully as the House of Representatives. It represents the same people in sections as will return the members of the popular Chamber. I shall not waste any more time, as far as I am concerned, and will only express the hope that we shall retain sub-sections
(1) and (2) as in the Bill, and that we shall amend sub-section (3), which deals with the annual Appropriation Bill, so that the ambiguity which now hangs about it may be dispelled. We all know what is meant by the appropriations for the services of the year.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
"Ordinary annual services."

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
There is the difficulty which has to be got over. There are occasional expenditures, sometimes of very insignificant sums, which are incurred after the Estimates have been framed for the year, and which have to be met, and Parliament almost necessarily approves of the expenditure afterwards. If we could introduce into the third sub-section words which will provide for the annual services of the year, covering something more than the recurrent expenditure of the years as they go by, something which will meet unforeseen expenditure, I think we shall have done by this clause all that is required.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
I regret that at this recommittal stage we should take up nearly the whole day in discussing a matter which found no place in our discussions in Sydney or in Melbourne until we have ar

Mr. ISAACS. -
This point was most distinctly put in Adelaide.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I did not say anything about Adelaide, I was referring to Sydney and Melbourne. It is only when we have arrived at the final stage that this matter has gained great prominence. We have lost a whole day.

Mr. REID. -
Not lost it.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Well, we have had to use the whole day in discussing it. The principal argument used by those who desire that the clause shall be amended is that both Houses will not recognise fully their powers and duties. My opinion is that both Houses will soon learn to act in accordance with the Constitution. If they make mistakes at the beginning and do that which is contrary to the Constitution, they will soon be brought up and made to know exactly the limits to which they can go. All the fear seems to be that the two Houses will do something which they will have no right to do. If that happens, it seems to me there should be a power, and the sooner it is exercised the better, to keep them within the limits and bounds of the Constitution.

Mr. Reid. -

Even in matters of procedure?

Sir John Forrest. -

In passing laws, at any rate. This Constitution which we are establishing is not to spend its own money, it is to spend the money of the people in the states. The Parliament is given limited powers only under the Constitution, and every one on this continent has a right to expect that the Federal Parliament will use that power within the limits of the Constitution. If they do not, I feel quite certain that they will soon learn to do so. The difficulties that have been raised by my honorable friends from Victoria as to the great dangers and difficulties that will arise owing to some action being declared ultra vires by the High Court are not well founded, because if such a thing occurs once or twice it is not, likely to occur again. We shall soon learn what is our legal position under this Federal Constitution. All the difficulties we have had placed before us will disappear once and for all. I agree with Sir Edward Braddon and others as to what shall be considered ordinary annual expenditure. It is such a wide question in some respects and so narrow in others that difficulties may occur. However, I am sure our leader will be able to attend to that, and I see no reason why we should alter sub-sections (1) and (2), which are as clear as noonday. If the Federal Government do not choose to keep within the limits of these two sub-sections the sooner they are taught to do so the better it will be for them and the Commonwealth.

Mr. Leake (Western Australia). -

I desire to explain in a few words my reason for supporting this amendment. The question as it presents itself to my mind is this: Whether the validity of any measure should be questioned during its passage through the Parliament, or whether it should be questioned after it has received the Royal assent? Surely Parliament, as the guardian of the people's interests, is capable of protecting the people. Therefore it can well attend to the details of any measure which is passing through the hands of honorable members. Under clause 55, I take it that what is anticipated would be no more than a technical mistake. I agree with those honorable members who have urged that it would be a great pity to have to call in the assistance of the Supreme Court. We do not wish to see the Supreme Court made a branch of the Constitution in this way. If Parliament does that which it is supposed by some Honorable members it will do, we shall find Parliament disregarding a positive enactment of the Constitution. Surely the only reason which would impel Parliament to such an end would be the existence of absolute corruption. Not only mere corruption, but with its ramifications so extensive as to hold every-member of both Houses, including both the Speaker and the President. I, therefore, cannot, in these circumstances, throw over my trust in the Federal Parliament. I cannot see that, by the insertion of this amendment we, in any way further our rights, nor, indeed, are we derogating from that position of the Senate. As an illustration, I will assume that a Tariff Bill has been passed by the Federal Parliament, but owing to some technical mistake, the results to suspend the administration of the law until the aid of the Supreme Court has been invoked to determine the question of legality. Inasmuch as Tariff measures are generally retrospective, we can readily imagine the great inconvenience that this would cause. We know that where there is unanimity in regard to a measure, parliamentary criticism is blunted, and it is quite possible that under such circumstances a measure might be allowed to creep through Parliament to which some technical objection could be made. I venture to suggest that ample protection is afforded if you leave Parliament to attend to its constitutional duties. For these reasons I shall support the amendment.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

The proposition embraced in the amendment, and argued at such lengths and with so much eloquence, has for its object, it seems to me, the removing of a taxation law from attack upon the ground that it may contain some technical omission, or that in the course of its passage through Parliament some flaw in the procedure has occurred. But why remove a taxation law from attack upon that ground, and leave every other law open to attack? The proposition I made the other day would have removed all laws from attack.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Other laws go beyond the Constitution. This provision merely deals with an irregularity.

Mr. Gordon. -

The passing of a law in defiance of clause 55 would be, in fact, an infringement of the Constitution.

Mr. Higgins. -

In the one case there would be an irregularity only, but in the other the provisions of the law would go outside the Constitution.

Mr. Gordon. -

You can ticket these things as you please, but there would be an infringement of the Constitution. But, inasmuch as I am largely in sympathy with the opinion that no law which has been passed by both Houses of Parliament should be liable to attack, I am willing to go a long way to support the amendment. Still, why not express the object aimed at in so many words? Does not the provision look absurd as it stands? It says, in effect, that a proposed law shall not deal with two subjects of taxation, but that a law may.

Mr. Holder. -

A law cannot become a law until it has been a proposed law. One shuts off the other.

Mr. Gordon. -

There is a prohibition against a proposed law dealing with two subjects of taxation, but when a proposed law attains the solemnity of a law it may possibly deal with two subjects of taxation. In the inchoate stage a law cannot deal with two subjects of taxation. But why not say in so many words that no law imposing taxation shall be allowed to be questioned upon the ground that it includes more than one subject of taxation?

Mr. Isaacs. -

It means the same thing.

Mr. Gordon. -

Only a lawyer could make the decision necessary to an understanding of the clause, if the amendment were carried as it stands, whereas if the provision I suggest were inserted, everyone could understand it.

Mr. Isaacs. -

What would be the effect if the honorable members suggestion were followed?

Mr. Gordon. -

I have only worded it roughly, but the same object would be achieved as that which the honorable and learned gentleman now seeks to achieve. It would remove these laws from attacks upon the ground of a flaw in procedure, and that they were so removed would be patent to everybody. The provision as it stands throws upon the Senate the onus would be put upon the Senate. There would be no conflict between the Houses, and the matter would not have to be referred to the High Court. I intend to move my suggestion in the form of an amendment.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

As the discussion has proceeded it has struck me more and more, that while the question incidentally touches upon states rights, the struggle has been more or less between the upholders of what are known as Upper Houses and the upholders of what are known as Lower Houses. To my mind the arguments which were addressed to the question of state rights were absolutely beside the question. Let us look at the clause as it stands, as contrasted with the preceding clause. We have been told by our honoured leader that clause 55 is not a matter of procedure.

Mr. BARTON. -

I said that it was not a matter of procedure only.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We have also been told that clause 54 not only gives rights to the House of Representatives, but also gives rights to the Senate. Therefore, there is no inconsistency in allowing the Supreme Court to supervise the operation of clause 55, and at the same time to have nothing to do with the provisions of clause 54. Clause 54 gives no rights whatever to the Senate. It is a clause cutting down the rights of the Senate. Clause 1 of Chapter I. is the first provision giving powers to the Houses. It is there provided that the legislative powers of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Parliament consisting of the Queen, a Senate, and a House of Representatives, "hereinafter called the Parliament of the Commonwealth."

When clause 52 and other clauses confide to the Parliament certain powers, prima facie these powers are co-ordinate in both Houses. Then we have clause 54, which says that the powers of the Senate, which would otherwise be co-extensive with the powers of the House of Representatives, shall be so much less in respect of taxation and appropriation; and, therefore, clause 54 gives no right whatever to the Senate, but it gives rights to the House of Representatives which the Senate is not to have. Therefore, we were perfectly right when we contended that where, under clause 54, you create a distinction which is to preserve the power of the purse to the control of the people who contribute to that purse, a distinction was made in not allowing the Supreme Court to safeguard those interests. When we come to clause 55, is there anything in that but procedure? I maintain-nothing; and I will proceed to explain why. Neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives gains one single iota of jurisdiction under that clause. There is not a single word which gives power over any subject that is not given before. It only regulates the mode in which powers previously given are to be exercised. In other words, it is manner-not matter; and, in other words, it is pure procedure. Consequently, when we come to face the matter plainly, we are inevitably drawn to the position that we are asking the Supreme Court to supervise and protect the Senate in a matter of mere procedure.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Suppose the Senate introduced a Money Bill; would that be procedure only?

Mr. ISAACS. -

If the Senate introduced a Money Bill it would be mere procedure; but it would be procedure that the House of Representatives would not tolerate for a moment. The House of Representatives has to protect itself, and I agree with those who say that the Senate must be regarded as a pitiable thing if it is not strong enough to guard its own rights within its own walls. No power on earth can force the Senate to pass a Bill if it contravenes the provisions of the Constitution as we propose to make it. The whole people of the Commonwealth would rise against those who tried to force the Senate to pass such a Bill against the provisions of the Constitution. But when we have given to the people of the least populous states a Senate based on equal representation to protect their rights, and have conferred upon the Senate absolute equality with the House of Representatives, except as provided in clause 54, I think we have gone far enough to provide a body which ought to be, if it is not, strong enough to guard its own interests and the interests of the people it represents. Why do we want the Supreme Court to come and wet-nurse the Senate? Is there any reason for it?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Do you want a Senate at all?

Mr. ISAACS. -

What did the people of the smaller states say? They said-"We cannot trust the people of the more populous states to give us equal representation." But now they say-"We not only cannot trust the pe

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Told by whom?

Mr. ISAACS. -

We have heard it over and over again.
Where?
Mr. ISAACS. -
In this chamber, I am sorry to say, over and over again. If the Senate has the courage of its opinions, and if they are honestly maintained, as I feel sure they will be, why do they want the Supreme Court to back them up? Apart from their negligence—apart from a mistake which may be common to both parties—are we to accept this position: That the Senate is a body which does not understand its business?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It may be overwhelmed.

Mr. ISAACS. -
How could it be overwhelmed? Imagine my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) overwhelmed in the Senate!

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Or coerced.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Can any one imagine my right honorable friend or any of his Western Australian colleagues being coerced?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Leave the Senate alone.

Mr. GORDON. -
They would have to give way to the majority.

Mr. ISAACS. -
In their own House?

Mr. GORDON. -
Of course.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Of course, if they give way to the majority it shows that the majority are in favour of passing the proposed measure.

Mr. GORDON. -
For the time being, possibly.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If we are to understand that a minority is to govern this Commonwealth, that is a new position.

Mr. BARTON. -
No one has said that.

Mr. ISAACS. -
But that is what it comes to. If the Senate under this provision may find itself coerced, what does that mean? A measure is introduced into the House of Representatives, and strongly supported by a majority in the Senate, the Senate comes to the conclusion that it would be dangerous to resist it any longer, so the representatives of the smaller states in the Senate say-"There is such an overwhelming insistence upon this measure, which is plainly for the benefit of the Commonwealth, that it would be unsafe for us unsafe so far as our existence as a Senate is concerned-to resist it any further; we will throw the responsibility off our own shoulders, and pass the Bill, and then we will go to the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth, and make the Supreme Court take the responsibility of preventing the measure becoming law. We shall thus evade the responsibility of opposing the measure in Parliament. So that we shall have the final discussion upon the Bill removed from the House of Parliament, and it will be fought out by means of wigged and gowned advocates upon the floor of the Supreme Court instead of by representatives of the people. It is said that these words are plain. Let me put one or two cases, in order to show that they are not plain:-

   Laws imposing taxation shall deal only with the imposition of taxation.

   Now, Sir Samuel Griffith had pointed out that this provision does not include collection. It has also been pointed out today that it does not include machinery; and we do not know what other difficulties may arise. Now, take the next case:-

   Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of customs or of excise, shall deal with one subject of taxation only.

   What is a subject of taxation? It has been supposed that you can have an income tax imposed by means of one Act only. But if the income tax proposed to put a charge upon income derived from dividends it might be argued that that could not be put in the same Act as a tax upon incomes derived from rents, because a rent is a different "subject" of taxation from a dividend.

   Mr. SOLOMON. -

   They are both income.

   Mr. ISAACS. -

   Does my honorable friend mean to say that rents derived from houses are the same "subject" as revenue derived from dividends?

   Mr. SOLOMON. -

   Yes; they are both income.

   Mr. ISAACS. -

   I think there would at least be a good deal of argument upon the subject as to whether it would be possible to impose a tax on those two kinds of income; and I think that if my honorable friend were the Judge he would have to listen to a good deal of argument before he could decide the point, and would have some difficulty in deciding it.
Mr. SOLOMON. -
And should decide it in the same way.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I can conceive of no greater matter for debate as to what is a "subject" for taxation than this.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Then you could not apply an income tax under one Act at all, but you would have to have different Acts of Parliament?

Mr. ISAACS. -
So you would, under this.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
And have a dozen lawyers to fight out the question?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I am glad that my honorable friend sees the absurdity of it. I would venture to say that there would be a considerable amount of legal argument on the point as to whether income derived from rents was the same "subject" of taxation as income derived from dividends, or as, say, a tax upon a man's own salary.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
So that you say that an income tax upon various sources of income would be a tax upon different subjects of income, and could not be imposed by means of one Act under this Constitution?

Mr. ISAACS. -
Under this Constitution I think it would be doubtful.

Mr. HOLDER. -
There is income from personal exertion, and income from property.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Exactly.

Mr. BARTON. -
Is it income from exertion only that is a proper subject of an income tax?

Mr. ISAACS. -
We know that the point I am referring to is open to doubt.

Mr. REID. -
It may be a laughing matter in this Convention, but it would be a very solemn and serious matter in a court of law.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Suppose the point was raised as a mere-matter of order, would you not have to meet the difficulty in initiating the Bill?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I do not quite grasp the honorable member's point.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I mean a matter of order in Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then I should say that Parliament would do its best to obey this provision in the Constitution, and the ruling of the Speaker or the President would be given as he best understood it. If it had passed the House of Representatives and had gone to the Senate, and the President ruled that in his opinion it was a contravention of the Constitution, the House of Representatives would have to abide by that and alter it. If, on the other hand, the President, after giving the best consideration he could give to the matter, came to the conclusion that it was no infraction of the Constitution, and the Senate went on and passed the Bill, then I contend that the law should be valid, and I would not have it carried to the High Court to be decided afterwards.

Mr. GORDON. -

Do you want that same principle to apply to every law which is passed in the same way?

Mr. ISAACS. -

To make it perfectly logical, my honorable friend is right. We ought to carry this section into every law, and say the Senate should have the right to discuss every particular subject in clause 52 and clause 53 separately, under the penalty of invalidity. What I look at is this: You have a Senate which is composed on the principle of equal representation of the states, you have powers given to the Parliament, including the Senate, and except in the specific instances given in clause 54, the Senate has equal power by the very express words of the Constitution with the House of Representatives, and surely we can leave the matter there. Why leave the court to hold the rod of invalidity over its proceedings when you do not transgress the bounds of jurisdiction You have certain matters, and certain matters only, which are confided to the Federal Parliament, and as to all outside that the Parliament has no jurisdiction collectively or apart, and if the Parliament by its most solemn attempt tries to get beyond that limit, the High Court comes down and says you shall not go so far, and the states are protected; but within the sphere which is confided to the Parliament in mere matters of the manner of exercising their jurisdiction, what right has the High Court to obtrude? That is a mere matter of the political working out of the Constitution confided to Parliament. It does not guard state rights, it does not guard state interests. Under this provision it does seem ludicrous that if the Senate, after the best consideration it can give to a matter, thinks that there is no invasion of the clause, and the House of Representatives thinks the same, any individual in the community may come forward and have the whole thing upset. It was said by Sir Edward Braddon that the matter was not mentioned in Adelaide. It was mentioned by several honorable members. I called particular attention to it in common with other members, and at page 580 of the Adelaide Hansard there is this passage in a speech by myself:

I do think there is the strongest danger, and I ventured to draw attention to it yesterday, that the Federal Treasurer might, after having a Tax Bill passed or an Appropriation Bill passed by both Houses willingly and with their eyes open find himself in this position: That some individual might challenge the Act through a court of law, which would be compelled to declare it invalid.

The honorable member will therefore see that it was distinctly challenged.

Mr. BARTON. -

It was expressly challenged by Mr. Reid, who moved to insert the word "proposed" before the word "law."

Mr. REID. -

That is so.

Mr. ISAACS. -

My right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) was not present when I referred to him this morning as having indicated the point.

Mr. REID. -

I had forgotten all about it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

For these reasons it seems to me we are running a great deal of risk when honorable members say that everything is a matter for the High Court, that it is no less a matter for the High Court under this clause than it is under any other clause. I admit that, if you have the clause there; but we object to putting it there; we object to leaving the clause in that condition. I quite admit—and that is the ground of our objection if you leave the clause in its present state it will be the duty of the High Court to inquire into this matter. I could not quite follow my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) when he said that another distinction between clause 54 and clause 56 was that on a Bill under clause 54 you had on the face of it an invalidity, while you had not an invalidity on the face of a Bill under clause 55. I put one instance to him which was: Suppose a sum of money were granted to an individual without statuary what it was for, it would not on the face of it show whether it was or was not for the ordinary annual service, and if any individual wanted to challenge the whole Act, he could do so by proving that, in fact, that grant was for some other purpose than the ordinary annual service. It would not be on the face of the Act, yet it would be law if we had the word "law" inserted instead of the words "proposed law" in clause 54. There have been certain references to intentions. I intend to pass them by. I think we can all get credit for proper intentions. I think I have shown by my action in regard to this Bill as a whole that I have never attempted by any side-wind to weaken the Senate or to out down its rights or powers but I have always stood, and I always will stand, for, maintaining the powers of the House of Representatives and preventing its powers from being cut down. When we consider, after all, that the money to be dealt with in these Bills is contributed as to 2,500,000 of the people in an immense proportion, and by 700,000 persons in the other, is it too much to ask that the House of Representatives shall not be thrust into the position into which it is sought to thrust it, by such a clause as the present?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Surely those 700,000 persons have rights as well as the others.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Of course they have. I only want to leave the Senate in the same position as the House of Representatives in this regard. I do not want to show any difference between them, and clause 55 does show a difference between them. Clause 54 says the House shall have certain rights; if it chooses either not to know those rights for the time being or to waive them for the time being, it may do so, and there is an end of it.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
And it limits the rights of the Senate.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Certainly.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
What more do you want?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I want nothing more with clause 54; but when we come to clause 55, I say my honorable friends are not satisfied with the immensely strong position in which the Senate is entrenched. They are not satisfied with having the Senate composed on the principle of equal representation of the states to protect their state rights, with power to override the united will of the larger colonies as declared in the House of Representatives, and in the Senate too, but they want to have this possibility that, without accepting the responsibility of the situation, the Senate may choose to give way nominally at any particular point, and leave the Supreme Court to fight their battle for them afterwards. That is a position which I think is intolerable; and for other reasons which have been given much more forcibly, much more clearly, than perhaps I could hope to do, by several honorable gentlemen, notably by Mr. Reid, Dr. Quick, and Mr. Deakin, it would be invidious, perhaps, to mention them all, but all those who have spoken have spoken with a great deal of clearness, lucidity, and force—I do hope that we will not allow this Constitution to go into operation with such a clause inviting litigation, inviting a self-abnegation of political duty on the part of the Senate as this would invite, and causing most probably a dislocation of the financial affairs of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I should like to correct a misapprehension which I think my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) fell into at one time. I understand that when Mr. O'Connor was speaking some question arose as to whether a repeal of a Tax Act might be considered to be the imposition of taxation, and Mr. Isaacs quoted me as having expressed an opinion on that point. I should like to read the report of what took place then. It will not occupy more than a moment or two, but it will put the matter right for both my honorable friend and myself. While I was speaking at Adelaide, Mr. Isaacs asked me—

Would you consider the repeal of an Act to be imposing taxation?

Mr. BARTON. -

The repeal of a Taxation Act could not be for the imposition of taxation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I should think it would not be.

Mr. BARTON. -

Unless it was accompanied with alternative provisions for taxation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Suppose you repeal one land tax and put on another, are you clear that that is not dealing with the imposition of taxation?

Mr. BARTON. -

If you place in any subsequent Act of Parliament provisions which are irreconcilably at variance with the provisions of a prior Taxation Act, there will be an implied repeal. If this be so, then it is no violation of the provisions of the Constitution if you turn an implied repeal into an express repeal. If there is a replacement of prior taxation by a later Taxation Act, the mere addition of a repealing clause would certainly not be an infringement of constitutional provisions. What can be done by implication can always be done by express statement.

And to that extent, of course, I said a provision repealing prior taxation could be part of a law imposing taxation, as I undoubtedly think it could, because if you pass a law imposing taxation which follows and takes the place of another law imposing taxation, you thereby imply the repeal of the other law, and the repeal can certainly be made an express repeal, so that there is really no difference between us. I do not think we need be very much governed by Mr. Isaacs comment as to the question of one tax. In the case of the income tax, for example, I am inclined to think that the subject of taxation is income, and whether it be derived from rents or from any other source, it would still be income, and therefore liable to the tax.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You cannot be sure about that.

Mr. BARTON. -

We cannot be absolutely sure about anything. On that principle we ought not to try to make a Federal Constitution. I do not sympathize with that view. I say, we shall be as sure as we can be, and that is all we can do. I think Mr. Isaacs will be at one with me in that. I quite see with Mr. McMillan that the argument put forward rests to a certain extent on the contention that in sub-section (3) of this clause the word "ordinary" may be subject to misconception, though I do not know that it is. What is "ordinary" in the Appropriation Act, as understood, will not be a difficult question for the court to determine.

Mr. REID. -

Under the new Constitution it will be a difficult question for the court to determine.

Mr. BARTON. -

I can quite understand some honorable members who do not agree with me on this subject feeling doubt about the matter. It is very natural for them to feel hesitation about it; and if Mr. Isaacs and others, who object to what is considered the looseness of these words, had suggested an amendment by which that looseness would be corrected, and the matter in some degree more accurately defined, I could have understood their position. It appears to me that, to the extent of the accuracy of the definition, the strength of their argument would diminish. Mr. McMillan has suggested, with reference to the third sub-section, not the others, that the amendment to insert "proposed" might be adopted. Well, I am disinclined to the insertion of the amendment "proposed" there. I should be prepared to meet honorable members who have a hesitation about the clearness of the words used in the Bill if they will accept a suggestion which will help to clear up their own doubts. If they would do that, then I think they might consent to do without the word "proposed," because it is only because of their doubts that they want the word "proposed" inserted.
If their doubts are removed, I presume they do not want the word "proposed" inserted. No doubt it will be difficult to make the clause perfectly clear, but I do not know that it is impossible. We have had great difficulties to overcome in the course of our deliberations, and we have surmounted many of them.

Mr. REID. -

It will be a great misfortune if an Appropriation Bill goes before the court.

Mr. BARTON. -

I should feel disposed to vote as before, against the insertion of the word "proposed," for the reasons which I have already given. Some honorable members may think that words like the following would carry out their views more clearly. The words "or moneys" in sub-section (3) "The law which appropriates revenue or moneys for the ordinary annual services of the Government" and soon—may possibly be misunderstood, because they may go beyond a mere appropriation for annual services, and may possibly, by wine, be held to extend to loan moneys. My honorable friends may think well of some such form of words as these:-

The law which appropriates revenue for or in connexion with or in extension of public departments and services transferred to the Commonwealth or originated under this Constitution shall deal only with such appropriation.

That perhaps may meet the views of my honorable friends opposite.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is a great improvement.

Mr. BARTON. -

Of course, I do not know whether it would meet with their views or not. I think that perhaps it would be a little more precise than the words in the Bill, and also, besides being precise, I think it would have a somewhat larger signification, and might therefore help to take away part of their doubts. I think it is only right to those who oppose my view that I should say that the Appropriation Act should receive a liberal interpretation, and not be bound down altogether too rigidly, so that it could be held to be unconstitutional, because, in some particular, it crept beyond the bounds of this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Your suggested amendment would require some verbal amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -

It might wind up with the ordinary expression "shall deal with," or, if it suits honorable members better, "shall relate only to such ordinary appropriation." These matters might be dealt with in as open and liberal a way as possible, by substituting the words "relate only to" for the word "deal with," wherever those words occur. I am not saying that this suggestion clears up every difficulty that honorable members have, but it seems to me to have the merit of being a clear definition, and while I am not prepared at present to propose the amendment I now suggest, if honorable members who do not agree with me on the general subject consider that it carries out their views better than the words of the Bill, and think that these words are clearer, then, in deference to them, I may adopt these words, or even move them myself. I wish to deal in the most open fairness, with honorable members who are unable to take the same view as I do. In the first instance, I think it is necessary for us to oppose the insertion of the word "proposed." I do not want to go in for a repetition of statements and arguments already made, but I may briefly that the reasons which have been given have not shaken the arguments which seem to me to be dominant with regard to this question. If we reject the amendment to insert the word "proposed," and honorable members take the view I have expressed, and think that the words I have read will suit their purpose better, I shall no longer object to the amendment I have suggested, which will really perhaps be of use to the Convention in supplying something in place of the word "ordinary," which term has been objected to as capable of misinterpretation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That would leave the whole difficulty as to taxation as it stands in the Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, in other respects. I may say it is consistent with the view I have taken. The amendment is suggested on the grounds of an assumed confusion in the words. Any reason of that kind in favour of the insertion of the word "proposed" would diminish in its import in proportion as the words were made clear, according to what the majority of honorable members may deem to be clearness. That is the view I take, and it is only fair I should read out the form of words that I have pencilled down. If any other form of words can be suggested, I should have the greatest pleasure in co-operating with honorable members in trying to arrive at an agreement. Personally,

I do not think there is any serious difficulty in connexion with the words used in the Bill.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I earnestly hope that the leader of the Convention will consider again the state of confusion into which the Commonwealth may be thrown if its annual Appropriation Bills are to be subject after passage to objections as to this or that item. It is not so difficult when a system of government has been in existence for ten or twenty years to gather from the practice in connexion with Appropriation Bills what are the ordinary annual services. Here we are introducing an entirely new system of government, and I defy any one, if it comes to a point of legal accuracy, to define what is an ordinary annual service, and what is not. It might be possible to do that, although the question is full of points, under certain circumstances. But with a new system of government, and with a first Appropriation Bill, it would be one of the most difficult things in the world to decide whether every item in the Bill was within the definition. If 1,999 items were within the definition, and the 2,000th item was held by the court to be outside the definition, the whole Appropriation Bill would go. Surely we do not want to throw the whole public service of the Commonwealth into hopeless confusion by having that one Bill, which is essential to the maxim that the Queen's Government must be carried on, declared invalid. I entreat my honorable friend to consider the question as it bears on these Appropriation Bills, at any rate. The House of Representatives will be in this position: That they will never be able to have their own way, because if the Senate objects to one item out of 2,000, and in consequence of that objection refuse to pass the Bill, the House of Representatives will have no redress. They cannot invoke the aid of the High Court in deciding whether they are right and the Senate are wrong. They must always go down—that is, in the last resort. I have no doubt they would meet together and endeavour to arrive at a sensible and a fair conclusion. It could not come to a question of law at the instance of the House of Representatives, because a Bill can only become law when the Senate has approved of it. If the Senate agrees that the items in an Appropriation Bill are legally within the definition of the Constitution, and are satisfied to pass the Bill, it should not be open to any persons on any one item to throw the whole public service of the Commonwealth into confusion. I am very glad that Mr. McMillan, as a business man, has seen the force of that argument, and that he proposes, so far as sub-section (3) is concerned, to support the amendment.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
There is something to be said on this sub-section which is perhaps worthy of attention. An opinion has been quoted by my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) from Sir Samuel Griffith, that it is worth considering whether under the Constitution a law providing for the collection of taxation as well as the imposition would not be ultra vires.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If in the same Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -
If in the same Bill, I mean. I am inclined to think myself, on the well-known principle of law that when a power is given without that which it could not have been effectually exercised, that power is also given. The legislative power would also include machinery for collecting the taxation.
Mr. REID. -
The practice in some countries is to keep the machinery clauses away from the Taxation Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -
That has happened in New South Wales as well as in other countries. Bills providing purely for the amount and limit of the tax have been separated from measures which dealt with the assessment and collection, and in many cases very properly separated. It has been suggested, in the course of the debate, that after, the word "imposition" the words "and collect" might be inserted.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Would that cover valuation?

Mr. REID. -
Oh, yes, that would be an incident in the collection!

Mr. BARTON. -
Valuation is a condition precedent to the imposition of a tax. The law which provides for the imposition and collection of a tax must also include valuation, and I think the words "imposition and collection" would cover the whole ground. The matter is one of considerable importance, and I should like to have the assistance of my honorable colleagues in the Convention. I do not think the amendment I have suggested will be necessary in sub-section (2), because that sub-section is a limitation dealing with matters apart from the necessity of the tax. In order that the matter may be debated, and as I am advised at present that it would be an improvement, I move that after the word "imposition" in sub-section (1) there be inserted the words "and collection."

Mr. SYMON. -
I would like to ask my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) what he proposes to gain by the insertion of the words?

Mr. BARTON. -
I thought I had explained that, but there was a good deal of conversation going on at the time, and I am not surprised that my honorable friend did not catch what I said. I explained that there were doubts in various quarters whether the restriction as to dealing with the imposition of taxation might not be read so as to affect the ordinary machinery clauses dealing with the collection. If there is any doubt of that kind, it would be as well to clear it up by the insertion of the words "and collection," so that all matters of machinery, such as valuation and assessment, indirect taxation, and regulations which are necessary to the imposition of customs duties, might be embodied in the same Bill.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Would not the power of collection be embraced in the power to impose taxation?

Mr. BARTON. -

That would be ordinarily included in the power to impose taxation, but when there is a sub-section so strong as to only deal with the imposition of taxation it would be as well to clear up the doubt.

Mr. REID. -

Coupled with the practice of most Parliaments.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I think the words suggested by Mr. Barton would be an improvement. May I suggest, however, as a matter of drafting, that if we simply use the word "taxation," so as to make the clause read-"Laws imposing taxation shall deal only with taxation," there would be no question then as to going outside taxation. The whole difficulty arises from the word "imposition," which may be said to involve a certain number of things.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I should have explained before sitting down that the amendment which has been suggested to me, and which I have moved, might carry with it consequences which would have to be looked to. In clause 54, sub-section (2), it is provided that-"The Senate may not amend proposed laws imposing taxation." A law dealing with the imposition and collection of taxation would be a law imposing taxation.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Does not one carry the other without all this?

Mr. BARTON. -

What I want to point out is the difficulty that the Senate cannot amend proposed laws imposing taxation. The question is: Whether, under the circumstances, the Senate would have power to amend a Bill dealing with the imposition and collection of taxation?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not think the Senate would have power.

Mr. BARTON. -

If my amendment were carried it would be provided that a law would not be invalid if it dealt with the collection as well as with the imposition of taxation. The question is whether the Senate would thereby be deprived, as it might be deprived, of the power of amendment if the law provided for both the imposition and collection of taxation I It has occurred to me-and I should have stated it before-that, in order that the House of Representatives may not be unduly hampered in dealing with matters of this sort, the words
"deal only with" might well be replaced by "relate only to" as of somewhat wider signification.

(Victoria). - Whatever we do here ought to be done in the light of day. We should not do anything which would, so far as we can see, have the effect of depriving either House of any power without openly expressing our opinion. Strongly as I am of opinion that the sub-section ought to be altered, I feel bound to say that if the words "and collection" are put in it will still be a law imposing taxation.

I was afraid of this difficulty.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I feel no doubt the Senate would not have the right of amendment. If a Bill imposing taxation does anything else, it will still be a Bill imposing taxation, and the Senate would have no power to amend. That is why this clause has been put in. The whole clause is based upon that supposition, but at the same time it only emphasizes the incongruity of such a clause being present in the Constitution.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

There will be nothing to prevent the Government putting the machinery in one Bill and the tax in another.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The machinery very often affects the incidence of the tax, and, as Sir George Turner says, the machinery might be the most important.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The Government having power to put both in one Bill, sometimes puts them in two.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But if the tax is of such a nature that no one could discuss its operation fairly until they saw the machinery, the Government would put the proposals in one measure. That, however, would be impossible in this clause, without depriving the Senate of its right to amend particular provisions. I am glad the leader of the Convention has called attention to the matter, and I have given my view.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I think it is better to bring out clearly the bearing of this amendment on clause 54, sub-section (2), which is the governing clause. It says the Senate may not amend the proposed laws imposing taxation and so on. The effect of introducing the words "or collection" would be to render it almost necessary to amend sub-section (2) of clause 54, prohibiting the Senate from amending proposed laws for taxation or providing for their collection. I do not think that is contemplated, and it might possibly be placing a limitation on the powers of the Senate which we had better avoid. It would be better to leave the clause as it is, and leave it to the construction which would be fairly put upon it constitutionally, than to introduce words which may give rise to conclusions that we do not foresee.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

If necessary I will withdraw my amendment, in order to widen the clause by striking out the words "deal only with," and substituting for them "relate only to." There are provisions which might in one sense be desirable in the Bill, but they would be extraordinary if put in another Bill. They would find their place properly in a Bill of this kind, and where they relate to the imposition of the very tax proposed it seems to be difficult to leave them out.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It might give rise to some difficulty. I have no objection as that is pointed out.

Mr. BARTON. -

Well, I will not propose it.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -

I desire to offer a suggestion to the leader of the Convention, that is, whether it would not be better to introduce a new sub-section to the effect that laws imposing taxation may include provisions for collecting taxes? That would be better than putting words into this clause which might give rise to the confusion alluded to by Mr. Symon. I quite see the difficulty that may arise.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

The amendment now under consideration really does what Mr. Brown suggests. It says that a law imposing taxation may also provide for the collection thereof, it provides for the imposition and collection of taxes, and it says that very much more briefly than suggested by the honorable member, and it expresses the meaning quite as clearly and effectively. It is extremely desirable that there should be power to include machinery clauses in a Taxation Bill. The work of the Legislature will in all probability be sufficient to keep it going, and to multiply the Bills that must pass through, and to multiply the discussions that must ensue, would give to persons who are antagonistic to the measure a second opportunity of discussing the whole question on the machinery clauses. That would be extremely inexpedient and undesirable. It is suggested, and it is true, that sometimes when the Government have the option to include the machinery in a Taxation Bill they elect to send up separate Bills. It may be expedient to do so, but it seems to me that it will not generally happen, and the Taxation Bill will be discussed more satisfactorily, under a more full and complete understanding, if the machinery clauses are included. I hope the amendment will be carried.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I should like to ask the leader of the Convention whether he considers the introduction of these words will prevent the Senate from amending the machinery clauses?

Mr. BARTON. -

I think it may.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I hope it will. It occurs to me that to negative the power of amendment in the Senate with regard to the imposition of taxation, while giving them full power, if they so desire, of mutilating the machinery necessary for the collection of the taxation, would be to give them, by a side-wind, control over the policy of taxation of the Commonwealth, and that they ought not to possess.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I would point out that, when we come to deal with the clause as to disagreements, sometimes erroneously called dead-locks, we shall be weakening the Bill and putting in the hands of those who think there should be a provisions against such disagreements a very powerful weapon. It was pointed out in Adelaide by Mr. Barton that we had taken such great care to provide in the Bill against financial clauses which generally create dead-locks; that there was no necessity to go on to provide for dead-locks and disagreements in future. If you say that the Senate shall not amend in any way a complicated machinery Bill, you go a great way towards bringing about a dead-lock over simply the machinery clauses, which, however important in themselves, are really not a Taxing Bill. I gathered when I was in Adelaide that the word "taxation" only was to be used, and not the word "collection." It was intended to confine these Bills to taxation only, leaving the Senate power to improve and suggest alterations in the Bill simply framed as machinery for collecting taxation. I would call the attention of Mr. Barton to this question. I think we shall complicate the question of dead-locks if we put in the word "collection," because I think we ought to leave the Senate power to amend purely machinery Bills.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

It seems a pity that it is too late to adopt the suggestion thrown out in Adelaide-I think Mr. O'Connor first mentioned its and I subsequently drew attention to it, that is, that it would be better to confine this restriction upon the Senate as regards amending the clauses of a Bill imposing taxation. We are adopting rather a clumsy way of attaining that end. Originally all Bills were Money Bills. As time went on money clauses were mixed up with general clauses in one Bill. The restriction on the Upper House ought to be that it ought not to amend money clauses in a Bill which might be general. If we make the provision in clause 54, sub-section (2), so that it shall provide that the Senate may not amend provisions imposing taxation, in any proposed law, we will accomplish everything we want. This point was raised in South Australia on one occasion. The Upper House there, I believe, claimed the right to amend a Bill so far as clauses which did not interfere with money matters were concerned. Why should not the Upper House have that power? A Bill dealing with, say, the appointment of Railways Commissioners, might contain incidental provisions for the appropriation of money, but should the Upper House be stopped from amending a measure of that kind? In the beginning, all Bills provided for the granting of moneys, the Crown, as a condition of supplies, redressing grievances, that is, legislating; but we have now passed on to a condition of affairs when Bills incorporate other provisions. This being so, I think we should direct our attention only to the money clauses of Bills, and that the prohibition should be put upon the Upper House not to amend clauses which impose taxation. That would necessitate a change in the wording of clauses 54 and 55, but upon consideration I think it will be found that this is the best solution of the difficulty.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

No doubt the amendment now proposed will place in the hands of the House of Representatives the absolute power of fixing the taxation in every detail. I think it was intended that the fixing of the financial policy should be left entirely in the hands of the House of Representatives. It appears to me, however, that, if we did not adopt the amendment, the Senate would be given the power to fritter away the sole right of the House of Representatives to deal with taxation. We all know from experience that the machinery of taxation, which involves its incidence, the exceptions to be made, and a number of matters of that kind, may be so altered as to cut down the collectable value of a tax by one-half. It might be that a machinery Bill would be so altered as to make the tax which was sought to be imposed not worth collecting. If we want to hand over to the House of Representatives the sole power of dealing with the financial policy, as I think we do, we ought to see that they get it wholly, and that no one else is allowed to fritter it away.

Mr. BARTON. -
There should be no power equivalent to the power of amendment given to any other body.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes. Of course, as a matter of policy, a Government would very often prefer not to use the power it would have of depriving a Senate of the right to amend. It might be that it would be more to their interest to give the Senate power to express its opinion upon particular provisions, than to court rejection of the whole measure. But that can always be done. If, on the other hand, the Government thought it necessary to put their taxation proposals before Parliament as a whole, they ought to have the power to do so, and that power ought not to be cut down by any power of amendment in the Senate. If the amendment is not carried, it seems to me that, although it is not intended that the Senate shall have the power to directly interfere with the financial policy of a Government, it may be able to affect it very materially.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I confess that when I first proposed the amendment I did not see the extent to which it went. But, having appreciated the extent to which it goes, I still feel bound to adhere to it. The difficulty that would arise unless you allowed the House of Representatives to include in these Bills the ordinary powers of assessment and collection would be, as the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor) has pointed out, that, while you might have a certain tax imposed in the Bill fixing the amount of the tax, the machinery Bill might be subject to amendment by the Senate that the whole of the financial policy of the Government which introduced it, with a majority of the House of Representatives behind them, might be entirely subverted. That is a difficulty which, I think, none of us wish to create. Therefore, I am prepared to take the responsibility of adhering to the amendment. Holding the position I have always held, that the Senate should be a real body and not a mockery of state interests-while it should be a Second Chamber holding definite powers and rights as expressing the will of the people within the states which it represents-I have also held that we should only carry responsible government into effect by making it real and effective, and a power of amending a machinery Bill to the extent of making a tax not worth collecting would be equal to the power of amending a Bill imposing taxation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The machinery clauses of a Customs Bill, for example.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes; the machinery part of a Customs Bill, or, what is more important the machinery part of a measure imposing, say, a land and income tax. The amendment of a machinery Bill connected with the imposition of land and income taxes might utterly destroy the value of the companion measure imposing that taxation. We have ha

Mr. SYMON. -

You do not want the words "and collection."

Mr. BARTON. -

I think it is better to have these words to make the provision clearer. If you speak only of the imposition of taxation, you are saying a great deal more than you say in a declaration, for instance, that Taxation Bills shall originate only in one House. If you say the Bill shall deal only with a certain subject, it seems to me that you are using words which may exclude machinery provisions, and are driving the Chamber which originated the Bill to send up a second measure containing the machinery provisions. I am not going to argue that the practice under this Constitution should be correlative to that of the Lords and Commons, but it is just as well to reflect what that practice is. May, at page 542 of the tenth edition, after saying that, by practice and usage based upon the resolution of 1678, the Lords are excluded from the power of initiating and amending Bills dealing with expenditure and revenue, goes on to say-

It follows, accordingly, that the Lords may not amend the provisions in Bills which they receive from the Commons dealing with the above-mentioned subjects, so as to alter, whether by increase or reduction, the amount of a rate or charge, its duration, mode of assessment, levy, collection, appropriation, or management; or the persons who pay, receive, manage, or control it; or the limits within which it is leviable.

I am not contending that the division of powers between the two Houses should be entirely upon the analogy of the relative position of the Lords and Commons. But if we look beneath the surface of the resolution regarding the powers of the Lords, I think we can see plainly that, when the Senate is restricted from amending proposed laws imposing taxation, it should not be able to deal with any machinery Bill in such a way as to affect the amount of the tax to be levied. That the Senate shall not have the power to affect the amount and extent of the tax to be levied; that it shall have the power of suggestion; that it shall not have the power of amendment; and that it shall have the power of rejection, are principles which are laid down in the Constitution. The question, to my mind, is whether it is not in accordance with these principles that machinery Bills may be made part of Taxation Bills. I have come to the conclusion that they ought to be, and therefore I shall adhere to the amendment.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

The leader of the Convention has treated this matter with great candour. He has pointed out that the introduction of these words carries us further than he at first conceived. To my mind, there is no doubt that their introduction extends the area of the Bills which the House representing the people of the states is forbidden to amend. I think we should pause before we disturb the Constitution as it stands, seeing that these clauses were only arrived at after very prolonged debate, and a very fierce fight upon the whole question. I do ask honorable members to pause before they add words which admittedly will have the effect of widely extending the area of proposals which the House representing the people of the states is forbidden to amend. I would like to ask, although I intend to resist these encroachments, whether the word "collection would mean the appointment of all sorts of officers without the Senate having the right to have any voice in the matter?

Mr. BARTON. -

I have already pointed out that it will include the persons who receive, manage, or collect.

[The Chairman left the chair at five o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at thirty-five minutes past seven o'clock p.m.]

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

There can be no question that this is a very important and, to my mind, an absolutely necessary alteration, if we are to give to the House of Representatives what I believe we all desire to give to that House in connexion with Money Bills. If we are to be bound, as it would appear we would be bound under the clause as it is proposed, to divide a Taxation Bill into two Bills, having one merely to impose the take and the other to carry out the necessary machinery in connexion with the tax, it must be evident to any of us who have had experience in regard to Taxation Bills that the Senate, having the power to amend the machinery Bill, will be able to render to a very great extent nugatory the Taxation Bill, if it so desires. It might be that the Treasurer would wish to have a tax imposed so that he would be enabled during a financial year to receive a certain amount of money, and he might make the instalment payable, as we have done with regard to our income tax, annually on a certain day. The Senate would be quite within its rights, I take it, in dealing with the machinery Bill, to alter annually into half-yearly, and so leave the Treasurer with half the revenue he desired to collect in that financial year. Take also the case of a Customs Duties Bill. We all know the very intricate machinery you must have to properly carry out the Bill, and to provide for the various difficulties which would arise in administration. If we are to have that question absolutely open to be amended in any shape or form that the Senate may desire, we give them what, I think, will be too great a power of altering the Taxation Bill, because that undoubtedly will be the effect of it. I would suggest that we should so amend the first paragraph that it would read "laws imposing taxation shall relate only to taxation." I think the word "deal" is more limited than the word "relate," and I quite agree with our leader that it would be wise whatever alterations we may make, to alter the word "deal" into the word "relate." Then, I think, if we say, that the laws imposing taxation shall relate only to taxation, it will be quite open on that wording for the Government of the day to frame the Taxation Bill in two measures, if it is thought advisable to do so; or if it is absolutely necessary that the machinery for the collection of the tax should be in one Bill, as we have found it necessary in many of our Bills to incorporate both, it will be within the power of the Government and the House of Representatives to have full control over that measure. Under these circumstances, I do trust that whatever amendment we make in this clause we will take full power to see that, in addition to the imposition of taxation, the Bill will, at all events, relate to the collection of the tax. But I will be glad if our leader can adopt the words I suggest. They would be simple. I think they would be fair to both Houses, and that they would cover all that could be covered.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). - I hope that Mr. Barton will not press the amendment to insert the words "and collection." The more one considers it the more objectionable it seems to be. When the amendment was first proposed, it struck me that it was either unnecessary or that it was going a long way beyond the settlement we made at Adelaide. And I think it is rather a mistake, at the eleventh hour, to re-open the whole of this financial matter, which, in relation to the two Houses, we determined, after very exhaustive debates, at the Adelaide session of last year. Now, the effect of this amendment is really to re-open the whole of that settlement.

Mr. BARTON. - I do not think that that is so.

Mr. SYMON. - We have inserted in sub-section (2) of clause 54 the words-

Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of customs or of excise, shall deal with one subject of taxation only; but laws imposing duties of customs shall deal with duties of customs only, and laws imposing duties of excise shall deal with duties of excise only.
That was a limitation upon the powers of the Senate, to which, after a considerable fight, we all agreed.

Sir JOHN FORREST.

To which we had to agree.

Mr. SYMON.

Yes, it was Hobson's choice, pretty much. It was founded upon what was called the compromise of 1891. Those of us who deliberately fought for co-equal powers in the Senate with regard to the amendment of Money Bills were confronted with what was described as the compromise of 1891, and it is in the recollection of the Convention that upon that occasion some honorable members who might have entertained a different opinion felt that it was necessary in the interests of federation, and in order to adhere to what was arranged in 1891, that they should give way and support the arrangement by which the power of amendment was abandoned, and a mere power of suggestion was accepted instead. Now, that having been done, and language having been adopted, after grave consideration, to carry out the intention of honorable members, we are asked, at the close of the present session, when we see the end of our labours approaching and I hope it will be a satisfactory end, to revive a discussion which we thought was to be buried for ever, so far as regards this federal union. I asked the Hon. Mr. Barton when he was speaking before the adjournment whether he was not satisfied that the words covered what he contemplated. If the words "laws imposing taxation," and the subsequent words, "the imposition of taxation only," cover machinery— and I am not prepared to say that they do not, then the object is accomplished, and we must submit. I do not wish to move any limitation on these words. If, on the other hand, they do not cover machinery, I say that this is not the time to re-open the discussion and to take away from the Senate the power it would otherwise have of expressing an opinion as to the establishment of a new department in the Executive Government. That is an attack on the powers of the Senate. It is an effort to reduce further the powers of the Senate in dealing with Bills. The Hon. Mr. Isaacs' amendment would have been less of an infringement of the powers of the Senate than this amendment will be.

Mr. HOLDER.

No doubt it would be.

Mr. SYMON.

I agree with my friend to that extent. I think it would be mischievous; in fact, it was because I was satisfied from the debate which took place that the words, as they are, are not likely to produce any evil result in the first sub-section of section 55 that I did not vote in regard to the insertion of the word "proposed." I felt satisfied that the keenness of the members of the Senate, and the keenness and sense of duty of the President of the Senate, and the keenness of the House of Representatives, with the sense of duty of the Speaker, would be amply sufficient to prevent any possibility of harmful consequences from leaving the words as they are. But if you say that the words "laws imposing taxation" do not include Bills dealing with the machinery by which that taxation is to be enforced or exacted, then by introducing the amendment of my honorable friend you are still further paralyzing the powers of the Senate. If that is meant, why, of course, we will have to submit. But I ask honorable members to consider whether at this stage they are going to make a further onslaught on the powers of the Senate in relation to Money Bills than have already been embodied in the clause. We have already cut down the powers of the Senate to the bone in relation to Money Bills. Whether the Senate has to be a more democratic House, or a less democratic House, than the House of Representatives, we have shorn it of a great deal of its power, and we should be content with what we have already done. I call attention to the fact that at the Adelaide sitting we did depart from the compromise of 1891. Under that compromise the words were "laws for imposing taxation;" that is, laws with that intention. Now, the words are "all laws imposing taxation," no matter what the intention is. If a law imposes a burden by way of a tax then it comes within the class of Bill in regard to which the Senate is powerless as to amendment.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
There is an exception in regard to everything, but ordinary Taxation Hills.

Mr. SYMON. -
I know there are certain exceptions, but what do they amount to? It is whittled down to the lowest degree I am not complaining, and I never did complain. I strongly contend that the Senate ought to have as to Money Bills, except as to the Appropriation Bill, coequal powers with the House of Representatives.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Co-equal representation?

Mr. SYMON. -
I am content with what we have done, and I do not wish to re-open the matter. I beg honorable members, who have all the advantage of the concessions which they have exacted from us, to be content.

Mr. ISAACS. -
"Concessions," did you say?

Mr. SYMON. -

I asked Mr. Barton not to press this amendment, or, at any rate, at this stage, when we are practically putting the finishing touches to the work on which we have been engaged, not to press this matter, which would re-open a very debatable subject, on which there might be a very acrimonious and very troublesome debate.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Perhaps it might be possible to explain my position more clearly by one or two references. The Constitution provides against some matters which would be perhaps included within the rights of the House of Representatives in the absence of express provision. You, sir, have, in answer to a question I asked, referred me to a passage in May, and to that I shall come in a moment. I should like to premise that with a passage a page or two before in the same authority, in illustration of the matters with which we are dealing, saying, as I did in the afternoon, that it does not follow, because there is an analogy between the two Houses in this Constitution, and the two Houses in different Constitutions, that, therefore, the rights or powers of the two Houses should be regulated in the same way, when in one case the Constitution is that of a separate state, and in the other it is that of the Federal Commonwealth. There is a passage at page 550 of the tenth edition of May, which deals particularly with the very interesting controversy in regard to the repeal of the Paper Duties, in which Lord Palmerston took so important a part in 1860. It would be as well to call the attention of honorable members to that passage in illustration of the matters we are dealing with now. I wish to guard myself from being supposed that I place the Senate in the position of the House of Lords. I only wish to refer to the matter to this extent: That there is a point at which there might be a denial of responsible government, and I do not wish the powers of the Senate to extend to any point at which responsible government might be frustrated, or to take it up to that point. I desire the Senate to have all reasonable power, as I have always said. The following is the passage in May, at page 550, tenth edition, to which I refer:-

As the functions of the House of Lords in the grant or imposition of Supply and taxation are reduced to a simple assent or negative, it becomes necessary to examine how far the power of dissent may be exercised without invading the privileges of the Commons. The legal right of the Lords, as a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, to withhold their assent from any Bill whatever, to which their concurrence is desired, is unquestionable; and in former times their power of rejecting a Money Bill had been expressly acknowledged by the Commons; but, until the year 1860, although the Lords had rejected numerous Bills concerning questions of public policy, in which taxation was incidentally involved, they had respected Bills exclusively relating to matters of Supply and Ways and Means. In 1860 the Commons determined to balance the year's Ways and Means by an increase of the property tax and stamp duties, and the repeal of the duties on paper. The increased taxation had already received the assent of Parliament, when the Lords rejected the Paper Duties Repeal Bill, and thus overruled the financial arrangements voted by the Commons. That House was naturally sensitive to this encroachment upon privileges; but the Lords had exercised a legal right, and their vote was irrevocable during that session.

There a distinction seems to be drawn between privileges and legal rights to the extent that it is asserted by May inferentially that there may be an encroachment upon privileges, which is, nevertheless, the assertion of a legal right.

The Commons, therefore, to maintain their privileges, recorded upon their journal, 6th of July, resolutions affirming that the right of granting aids and supplies to the Crown is in the Commons alone; that the power of the Lords to reject Bills relating to taxation was justly regarded by this House with peculiar jealously, as affecting the right of the Commons to grant the Supplies, and to provide the Ways and Means for the service of the year, and that the guard, for the future, against an undue exercise of that power by the Lords, and to secure to the Commons their rightful control over Taxation and Supply, this House has it in its own hands the power so to impose and remit taxes, and to frame Bills of Supply, that the right of the Commons as to the matter, manner, measure, and time may be maintained inviolate.

In accordance with these resolutions, during the next session, the financial scheme of the year was presented to the Lords for acceptance or rejection as a whole.

So it will be seen that one Bill was brought in to deal with the whole subject.

The Commons again resolved that the Paper Duties should be repealed; but instead of seeking the concurrence of the Lords to a separate Bill for that purpose, they included in one Bill the repeal of those duties with the property tax, the tea and sugar duties, and other Ways and Means, for the service of the year; and this Bill the Lords were constrained to accept. The Budget of each year has since that occasion been comprised in a general or composite Act—a proceeding supported by precedent. In 1787 Mr. Pitts entire Budget was comprised in a single Bill; and during many subsequent years great varieties of taxes were imposed and continued in the same Acts. What I wish to point out with regard to that passage is that under this Constitution as it stands a controversy such as that which then arose would be impossible. Not that it would not be possible to include in one measure the repeal of Taxation Acts on a certain subject together with the imposition of other duties relating to that subject. That would be perfectly competent, I think, as I have already explained. But it would not be possible—or at least, it seems to me that it would not be possible—for one House to include in one measure the repeal of taxation upon a certain subject, and in the same manner to propose a substituted mode of taxation upon some other subject.

Mr. ISAACS. - Do you think that could not be done?

Mr. BARTON. - I think there would be great difficulty in doing it.

Mr. HIGGINS. - The honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor) thinks that it could be done.

Mr. BARTON. - In my opinion, the power exercised by the Commons upon that occasion probably would not, and could not, be exercised under this Constitution.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - It could be exercised under the wording which I suggested.

Mr. BARTON. - That may be; but I should require further time to consider the matter. Then comes the passage to which you, Mr. Chairman, so kindly referred me:-

REJECTION BY THE LORDS OF PROVISIONS CREATING A CHARGE

The right of the Lords to reject a Money Bill has been held to include a right to omit provisions creating charges upon the people, when such provisions form a separate subject in a Bill which the Lords are otherwise entitled to amend. The claim of privilege cannot, therefore, be raised by the Commons regarding amendments to such Bills, whereby a whole clause, or series of clauses, has been omitted by the Lords, which, though relating to a charge and not admitting of amendment, yet concerned a subject separable from the general objects of the Bill.

So that, where there has been a Bill upon a certain money subject—taxation or appropriation-containing clauses separable from its main object, the Lords have not only rejected such clauses, but they have been found to be acting within their rights in rejecting them, and their action has been accepted without any constitutional crisis. I will cite another passage by way of illustration:-

On the 30th July, 1867, it was very clearly put by Earl Grey and Viscount Eversley-

He, if I remember aright, was at one time Mr. Speaker Shaw Lefevre.

that the right of the Lords to omit a clause which they were unable to amend, relating to a separate subject, was equivalent to their right to reject a Bill which they could not amend without an infraction of the privileges of the Commons.

Here are two very instructive passages upon the subject which I felt bound to put before the Convention by way of illustration. I am alive to the danger and difficulties of dealing with this subject, as it stands in the Bill, and I propose to amend the Bill. But there are dangers and difficulties whatever way we deal with the subject. The question is, which is the right way to deal with it, which is the way that in its tendency is, on the one hand, calculated to maintain and further the principle of responsible government, and, upon the other hand, not calculated to take away any responsible independence from a Second Chamber situated as the Senate will be situated—a Chamber which will be, not merely an Upper House, but a body created for the purpose of maintaining the rights and interests of the states, and elected upon a suffrage precisely the same as that of the House of Representatives. Considering all these matters, there seems to be great difficulty. In the first place, by this Constitution the Senate is protected—that is to say, the people whom the Senate represents are protected, because that is the right way to put it—from the danger of any such action as took place in connexion with the repeal of the Paper Duties. On the other hand, if my amendment is accepted, there will be a danger, or a risk—and we have to count the risks and the cost in all these cases—of the Senate being enabled to amend, by way of the omission of clauses, matters which are separable from the general objects of a Bill, and therefore, have not been regarded as between the two Houses of the Imperial Parliament as an object of the assertion of privileges by the Commons when the Lords have exerted their power of rejection.

Mr. ISAACS. -

A Bill which the Lords were otherwise entitled to amend is the expression.

Mr. BARTON. -

The honorable and learned member is referring to the last passage I read. It is still to be remembered that any loss which the Senate might be held to suffer by the operation of the amendment which I have proposed must be read in relation to the passage—of course, only so far as it applies—which I have cited. And if it is read in that relation, then the operation of the amendment which I have proposed would not prevent the amendment, if the Bill has not these separable clauses in it, except to the extent that the Constitution, as it is proposed, in this first sub-section prevents any addition to a law imposing taxation at all—that is to say, a law which deals with the imposition of taxation only. If my amendment is adopted, it deals with taxation and machinery. If honorable members will refer to the last passage I cited from May they will see that whatever may happen under sub-section (1), and under the amendment I suggest, if it be carried, the case raised from page 551 of May is not really involved, because the passage relates to the inclusion in Money Bills of clauses which are separable from the general objects of those Money Bills, and which, if they were proposed, the House of Lords could not amend. That does not apply to machinery which is for the collection of taxation. That is not in the same category as is laid down in May, because the passage cited relates wholly to clauses which are separable, and are separable because they can be read independently of the general object of Money Bills. The I wish, if I may be permitted to do so, in order to make matters clearer as to what Mr. Symon has said, to refer to a passage in the Adelaide debates. I wish to make a short reference for the purpose of showing that in dealing with this question in Adelaide I treated the right to impose taxation as including the right to include in the Bill the necessary machinery for the imposition of a tax. On page 576 of the Adelaide debates, I am reported as follows:-

The question whether a law on the face of it exceeds the constitutional power as dealing with more than the imposition of taxation, dealing with more than the laying on of a tax and the machinery necessary for it, or whether it deals with two subjects of taxation at once, unless it is a customs law, that question, and also the question whether the annual Appropriation Act deals with more than the ordinary annual services of the year, seem to me to be deeply rooted in the Constitution and depend not merely upon the questions of relations of the Houses inter se, but on much larger considerations. For that reason the word used has been "laws," so that the Federal High Court may deal with them, and, if they infringe those principles, declare them unconstitutional. But where th

I might multiply quotations on this subject, but what I intended in Adelaide was what I intend to impress here, and that is, I understood this clause in Adelaide—and I am not sure that I was wrong as a matter of construction—to import, when it gave the power to impose taxation, the power to legislate for the machinery without which the taxation could not be effective. If it was not for the strong words in this sub-section which go on to say that the law shall deal with the imposition of taxation only I should be inclined to adhere to that opinion now; but I have always understood this matter to include the right to impose the taxation, and, so long as the matter dealt with taxation only, the right to give also the necessary machinery for the collection of the tax. That is all I desire to convey by my amendment. I am desirous to convey now that which I asserted and believed to be the meaning of the whole provision in Adelaide, and speaking as I did on that occasion in objection to amendments which seemed to me to be rather calculated to unnecessarily cut down the position of the Senate in the Constitution-speaking as I did, I think with the approval of a large number of those who desire that the Senate should not be an unconsidered factor in the Commonwealth, I do not find that the position which I took up then was objected to by any honorable member, from which I conclude that the amendment I propose now, which is merely an explanation of the position I took up then, which simply carries into force, if it is carried at all, the meaning that I attributed to the words then, is entirely in consonance with what those who seemed to approve of what I said then were ready to accept. I do not agree with my learned friend (Mr. Symon), whose opinion I very much value, that this is a reopening of matters. I do not wish to do anything which may mean the ripping up of that which I have always considered to be a reasonable understanding with relation to federation, with relation to the powers as to Money Bills. It stood in 1891; it stood in Adelaide; it was not disturbed in Sydney; and I mean, so far as my efforts will extend, that it shall stand now. All I am endeavouring to do is to attribute a meaning to words in this Constitution, which I believed in Adelaide-and I explained my belief as I have read-that they did convey, which I am inclined to believe now they do convey, without a special explanation; but as to which I am in serious doubt, because of the very strong express nature of the words "shall deal with the imposition of taxation only." It is in order to remove that doubt, and for that purpose only, that I wish these words to be inserted, and I really do believe that the insertion of the words will carry out the real spirit of the understanding of 1891.

Mr. Reid (New South Wales). -

I have been thinking over this matter, to see if I could not make a suggestion which probably would meet with the approval of all parties. I would like to read a proposal which I think would get us out of all these difficulties, in not only one or two, but three, of these sub sections. I would suggest, at the end of this clause, the insertion of the following proviso, whose wording no doubt the Drafting Committee will improve if it is passed:-

Provided that if any such law shall be found to violate this provision it shall not therefore be declared to have been illegally passed; but the part of the law found to be in fault as beyond the powers contained in the section may be declared to be null and void.

Mr. WISE. -

No laws are declared wholly invalid by the Supreme Court.

Mr. REID. -

I think my friends on the Drafting Committee will not take that view. The whole of the discussion has gone on the general assent that the effect would be to declare the whole law null and void.

Mr. ISAACS. -

How would you apply that to a case where two taxes were in the one Bill? Which tax would be preserved?

Mr. REID. -

That is the difficulty.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That is not the point we are discussing now.

Mr. REID. -

I have been out of the chamber, and perhaps some other point has arisen.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We are discussing the question of collecting the tax.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The point is whether the machinery and the tax should be put into one Bill.

Mr. REID. -

It is clear on these words that the machinery cannot go into a Taxation Bill.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The leader has moved an amendment to put in "imposition and collection."

Mr. REID. -

Then the Senate would have no power of amendment over the provisions of the Bill.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Not the machinery clauses.

Mr. REID. -

With all my views about the two Houses, I would never wish to put the Senate in that position. In New South Wales, as my friends will recollect, although I was supposed at the time to be on very strained terms with our Upper House, I put the taxes in short Bills, dealing only with the taxes, and put the machinery in a Bill which was open to amendment.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
How much of your tax did you lose by that?

Mr. REID. -
A great deal.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
20 to 30 per cent.

Mr. REID. -
No doubt, but it does not follow at all from that that we wish to take away anything we have given in this matter. I do not. I have clearly understood that the machinery of these matters should be open to the consideration of the two Houses. I have always read the Bill in that light, and I do not wish to alter that reading.

Mr. BARTON. -
I do.

Mr. REID. -
I am in sympathy with my honorable friend; I would like to see it altered, but I do not expect it to be altered.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
You are reversing the position.

Mr. REID. -
Don't fancy that I would not accept it with joy. There are plenty of things I would accept with joy which I have given up any hope of getting, therefore, I am not going to waste time over them. If we can get my honorable friend round with us, we will make grand assault on some of these fossilized notions in this Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -
The time is past for making a Christmas pudding for you and me.

Mr. REID. -
I am very sorry that I obtruded this proviso at the present moment, because I see we are on another point. When we have got rid of this point, I think it will be advisable to provide that there should not be annulling of the whole law because of any one point or another which is defective.

Mr. WISE. -
I do not think you will find it necessary.
Mr. REID. -

I know that the whole discussion has gone on the assumption that the whole law would be annulled. I shall be perfectly satisfied to leave it to the other consideration if any good authority can be given; but I am afraid that under these words the court would have to annul the law.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I do not propose to be a party to diminish the power of the Senate or to withdraw from its right of review and amendment any measure which at present it would have the right to review and amend. At the same time, I want to point out that the difficulty we are in is of our own creation. We have distinctly, by vote to-day, determined that rather than trust our fellow colonists, rather than trust the two Houses of the Parliament we propose to constitute, we shall fly in every dispute to the High Court. It is simply an intolerable position, to my mind, that on every trifling detail, on every technical flaw, we shall fly to the High Court.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I do not think the honorable member is in order in reflecting on a vote of the committee.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not want to reflect on a vote of the committee; but I simply want to point out what the consequences of the vote are, so that I may with more effectiveness make a suggestion which I think we must adopt to get over a difficulty I see. It seems to me we are willing rather to hand over the interests of our respective states to the High Court, with all its technicalities and all its legalities, than to hand over the determination of these questions to the Federal Parliament. I want to ask honorable members whether they want to go this far, to say, if the court may go and upset on technical issues any Acts which the two Houses have passed, and the Governor-General has assented to, that the right to upset these laws shall not be a right open for all time? I can fancy the Federal Treasurer being almost unable to sleep with this thing like a nightmare hanging over him.

Mr. BARTON. -

We do not want to pass a Constitution as a cure for insomnia.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We do not want to pass a Constitution which will take sleep away from any man, or create a perpetual nightmare. I have already said that, in the opinion of many persons outside, the High Court is already like a nightmare over all these things. From day to day, in matters which we can easily remove from its path and place under the Parliament, we are adding to the authority of the High Court. We are placing ourselves more entirely in its power. I wish to suggest to Mr. Barton that the least we should do is to add to the clause a proviso declaring that after a certain time-I should think, twelve months-an Act shall not be disputable on any of the grounds mentioned in this clause. Then though we should have twelve months' uncertainty-twelve months' possibility of all sorts of difficulties-still, at the end of that period there would be an end to the uncertainty. But, as the clause stands now, for ever and ever we shall have the possibility of laws which have been acted on upset. If we do nothing else we should, at least, insert some amendment which will put a limit to this possibility of upsetting all the financial and other arrangements of the Commonwealth in the way which is now possible.

Question-That the words "and collection" proposed to be inserted in subsection (1), clause 55, be so inserted-put.

Question so resolved in the negative. Sub-section (1) was agreed to.

Clause 55, sub-section (2). - Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of customs or of excise, shall deal with one subject of taxation only; but laws imposing duties of customs shall deal with duties of customs only, and laws imposing duties of excise shall deal with duties of excise only.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I do not know whether it is worth while, after the last division, moving the insertion of the word "proposed" before the word "laws" in this sub-section. However, I shall move it, but in view of the vote we have just taken I will be content to have it decided on the voices. Still, I will not pass it without notice. I therefore beg to move-

That the word "proposed" be inserted before the word "laws."

The CHAIRMAN. -

Is not that substantially the same question as we have already decided?

Mr. ISAACS. -

If that is your opinion, sir, I will accept your ruling.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I submit that it is not the same question, because it really amounts to this- I think that I ought to make this statement in fairness to Mr. Isaacs' contention-In the first amendment Mr. Isaacs proposed that Taxation Bills should deal with the imposition of taxation only. He now proposes that Tax Bills shall deal with one subject of taxation only. I think that is, a different question.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

The next amendment in this sub-section needs but one or two remarks, inasmuch as it has been clearly placed before the Convention at an early stage. The amendments I ask the Convention to make are intended to have the effect of removing the separability which is here required between laws dealing with customs and laws dealing with excise. It appears to me, for reasons already given, that questions of excise cannot be effectively dealt with except in connexion with duties of customs, when goods subject to duties of customs are the subjects of excise. And it seems to me, whether the Tariff be protectionist or free-trade, that the Parliament of the Federal Commonwealth should be able to embrace both excise and customs in the same Bill. That is the practice which has always been followed in Victoria; although it has not been invariably followed in other colonies. Duties of excise should be linked with duties of customs as inseparable parts of one policy. They could no more be properly dealt with apart than a bird could fly with one wing. It is absolutely necessary that they should be allied, and they can only be effectively imposed if they are included in the same measure. My amendment will provide that the Federal Treasurer, when proposing duties of customs, may also propose duties of excise.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Seeing that the question of excise on sugar is so complicated, would it not be better to deal with it separately?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

There would be nothing to prevent the Federal Treasurer dealing with excise separately if he chose, but what I ask the Convention to do is to remove the prohibition that rests on the Treasurer against dealing with any duty of excise in a measure imposing duties of customs. He could at any time introduce a separate measure, but he should not be absolutely prohibited from following what, as a matter of fact, is our rule of linking customs and excise together. As a rule, they cannot properly be dealt with apart. I think that the Convention is seised of the practical import of this amendment, and trust that it will be accepted, inasmuch as it will not deprive the Senate of any of its powers, whilst it will afford a guarantee to the Federal Treasurer that his policy will be either accepted or rejected as a whole, and not mutilated or distorted beyond all recognition.

Mr. DOBSON. -

What is your amendment?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is to omit, after "customs," in sub-section (2), the words "or of," and to insert the word "and"; to insert, after "customs," wherever it occurs, the words "and excise," and to omit line 6. The sub-section will then read as follows:-

Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of customs and excise, shall deal with one subject of taxation only; but laws imposing duties of customs, and excise shall deal with duties of customs and excise only.

The prohibition is retained that all laws imposing taxation shall deal with one subject of taxation only, but with this exception, that duties of customs and excise may be included in the same measure. I beg to move, first-

That the words "or of" be omitted, with a view to the substitution of "and."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

It is as well to refer to the 1891 Bill occasionally, so that we may know where we started. In that Bill this sub-section read: "Laws imposing duties of customs on imports shall deal with one subject of taxation only." In Adelaide, therefore, the proposal was that as many subjects of customs taxation as necessary might be included in the one Bill, but that whether the Bill was for excise or for any other purpose the specific subjects of taxation should each be confined to a separate Bill. It was seen that that proposal was cumbersome and inconvenient. Then we adopted this proposal: That all laws imposing taxation, unless they were Customs or Excise Bills, should deal with one subject of taxation only. Having excepted Customs and Excise Bills from the operation of the clause up to that point, it was further provided that Customs Bills should deal with customs duties only, and that Excise Bills should deal with excised duties only. That is the proposal as it stands now, and Mr. Deakin wishes to alter it so as to make it read that Taxation Bills, excepting laws imposing customs and excise duties, should deal with one subject of taxation only, and that Taxation Bills imposing duties of customs and excise should deal with customs and excise only. I think we should have to consider the matter a little before we assented to the amendment. There is some danger about it. I agree that the 1891 provision was cumbersome and inconvenient.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

This has been the Victorian practice ever since the foundation of the colony, and it has never created any difficulty.

Mr. BARTON. -

The honorable member mentioned that in Adelaide, when we made the amendment. I think the subsection, it stands now, sub-section (2), was the result of an amendment proposed by him, modified on the suggestion of others.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That is so.

Mr. BARTON. -

It represents the view the honorable member then held, modified to meet the suggestions that were then made.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That was as far as I could get in Adelaide.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think it would be rather difficult to limit the clause in the way the honorable member suggests. We are dealing now with the validity of laws. We have rejected the proposal to alter "laws" to "Bills" or "proposed laws." We are now simply dealing with the validity of laws, and by this amendment we should be making laws invalid if they dealt with more than one subject of taxation, unless they were laws imposing both duties of customs and excise.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That is not Mr. Deakin's intention, and the wording of the amendment would not do.

Mr. BARTON. -

I have a doubt whether he intended that, but I wanted to point out the misconception to which the amendment was exposed. If it were adopted, taxation laws would have to deal with one subject of taxation only, with the exception of laws which dealt with both customs and excise. If a law dealt with customs singly or excise singly, it would be bad.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Supposing you made it read in this way:-"shall deal with one subject of taxation only, but duties of customs and excise may be imposed by the same law."

Mr. BARTON. -

I think that would be a preferable amendment. In Adelaide we allowed any number of articles subject to customs duties to be dealt with in the one Bill, and any number of articles subject to excise duties to be dealt with in the one Bill; but we provided that these two classes of Bills should be kept separate. Reverting to the 1891 Bill, wherever you find excise mentioned, apart from the corresponding clause, you will find it was confined to articles subject to customs duties. So that the restriction imposed in that Bill in reference to excise does not occur in this Bill, because in Adelaide we came to the conclusion that the excise should not be limited to customs articles, inasmuch as a Parliament representing free men should impose an excise on anything it pleased, even if it had not imposed a customs duty. I only wish to recall the position in Adelaide. The difficulty that presents itself is this: There may be a meaning in my friend's amendment, not that he intends it, which will make it necessary to put duties of excise and customs into one Bill. We and he do not want that.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I have altered the amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -

Apart from that, are we sufficiently advised to depart from what we did in Adelaide? What we did there simply amounts to this: You may put all your customs duties in one Bill, and your excise duties in another. The argument proceeded that both Houses ought to be given an opportunity of dealing with the subject of customs and excise separately, for the reason that there might be men in both Houses who would agree with the customs and be against the excise, or be in favour of most of the customs and be against several of the excise duties. The question was really whether it might not be disastrous to the financial policy of the Government to put the measure into such a form as not to be capable of amendment, but must be rejected at a time when circumstances demanded an integral financial policy on the part of the Government. If my honorable friend's amendment is adopted we are in that danger again. If we are bound to put all these subjects or are at lib chance to the Government and the House in which the Bills first passed, to have such a proportion carried as would substantially represent the financial policy of the Government.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Is not that dictating the financial policy of the Government?

Mr. BARTON. -

It is not dictating the financial policy of the Government, but it is preventing-

Mr. SYMON. -

Its failure.

Mr. BARTON. -

The failure of the financial policy of the Government; but it might prevent an indirect or arrogant policy of that kind by the operation of one House alone.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Do you want to protect an arrogant Government against itself?

Mr. BARTON. -

I wish, my friend would ask me something easier than that. I certainly do not wish to protect an arrogant Government against anything, but there are times when an arrogant Government has to be protected against what was formerly its majority.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Mr. Deakin says you cannot impose an import duty on spirits unless you know what the excise is to be.

Mr. BARTON. -

Mr. Deakin says you are in the dark as to the import duties unless you know the corresponding excise duties.

Mr. REID. -

That cannot apply to the Senate, because they do not know what you put on by way of excise.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think it amounts to a very serious drawback, if I may use such a phrase in connexion with customs, because the financial policy of the Government is announced when the Budget is brought down.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

A Government does not always adhere to the Budget.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

If the Government stick to their work the House will know what is intended. Members will know, when they vote for a particular Bill, by what excise it is intended to balance the customs duties. What you have to take into account in all these matters is the net result. The net result, if you put the matter in such a position as to invite dissension-I ought not to say invite dissension, perhaps, because it is a strong term, but so as to make dissension between the Houses - is likely to be a disturbance of the finances of the Government, unless the more cumbrous method of an appeal to the people is resorted to. On the other hand, the net result is likely to be a substantial gain, if the separation we agreed to in Adelaide is adhered to. On the whole, inasmuch as the real object of the clause is to prevent dead-locks from improper association or improper tacking, it is the more important that we should take care that there shall not be that tacking of Appropriation Bills. So long as we give reasonable liberty to both Houses within the limits of the law, the more careful we are to separate these two subjects, the more likely we are to prevent dissensions between the Houses. We all know, and our Victorian friends especially know, how very dangerous it is to multiply any cause of prolonged deadlocks. We do not want them; we want to provide against them.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I do not know whether Mr. Barton will accept that amendment. If I regarded the amendment of Mr. Deakin as a limitation on the powers of the Ministry, I should take the view of Mr. Barton, and oppose it; but it appears to me to be an extension of the Ministerial authority, because it enables the Ministry to introduce their financial policy either as a whole or in parts, and they will know beforehand what reception their policy is likely to meet. If their policy is not received as a whole, the Ministry can withdraw it, and introduce the same proposals in two Bills, so that the dangers anticipated by Mr. Barton of the financial policy being upset by a part being rejected and another part being accepted, are dispelled. There is, however, a more important reason why the amendment ought to be supported, though I do not apprehend that this was the view of Mr. Deakin in proposing it. If the amendment is not introduced, then, to a certain extent, the financial policy of the Commonwealth is dictated by the Constitution. There are a few of us liberals who believe that the customs duties should be as few and as light as possible. We liberals also believe that there should be very few customs duties imposed without corresponding duties of excise.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am glad to hear you put it in that way—We liberals.

Mr. WISE. -

And, as liberals, we ask our friends in Victoria, who all represent one view in politics, to allow us the same opportunity of framing our financial policy in accordance with the doctrines of freedom. We believe that the policy of the Commonwealth should be to have very few customs duties, balanced by corresponding duties of excise, and I would only ask that my friend Mr. Deakin, who, I hope, will be the Federal Treasurer when he is converted from his conservative views on finance—

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I may be the Treasurer then, but not before.

Mr. WISE. -

I only ask that there may be an opportunity to deal with the financial policy as a whole. A Ministry would be seriously embarrassed by one part of a measure being accepted, and another being rejected. It might be an embarrassment quite as great, and in fact it might inflict far greater embarrassment on the Government, to have a portion of one Bill thrown out, which would give them the option of introducing the measure again in two separate Bills, than it would be to have one of the Bills carried and the other abandoned. I hope the amendment will be accepted as giving greater freedom to the Ministry and enabling the Ministry to introduce greater freedom into the Commonwealth.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I think it will, as I have altered it; but surely that is not the question at this stage.

Mr. SYMON. -

I was going to point out that the amendment, in order to carry out my honorable friends idea, would come in in the latter part of the clause. On the matter of substance, I do not take the same view as Mr. Wise. Whilst he puts it on the ground that it would give greater freedom to a Ministry in order to advance the liberal policy in which my honorable friend and myself so closely coincide, it would, at the same time, as he will see, greatly limit the power of the Senate to express any opinion whatever upon that policy. The object of this sub-section is to sever the two subjects of taxation, customs and excise, in order not to paralyze the Senate, but to give the Senate some voice, within the limits of the Constitution, on these two important subjects. If we alter that and say that both these very important matters of vital interest to the people and the Commonwealth may be compulsorily included by the Ministry at any time in one measure, you immediately withdraw from the Senate the consideration of either one or the other.

Mr. WISE. -

That argument does not weigh with me, because I hold that the Ministry ought to be able to dictate the policy.

Mr. SYMON. -

So it should, but, as Mr. Barton has pointed out, the Excise generally follows the Customs. You first deal with the Customs, and then the Excise follow upon the same lines. This might operate very grievously in the case of Queensland, where the sugar duty is of the highest importance. It might be a matter of the highest consequence that they should have in the Senate, where there is equal representation, an opportunity of dealing with that subject alone, rather than that it should be complicated and mixed up in the Tariff Bill. This is another thing which we settled in Adelaide, and we ought not to interfere with it now, because it re-opens the question of the relations between the two Houses.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I think Mr. Symon is not quite correct in his historic reference. I think what we felt in Adelaide was that we ought not to have any hard-and-fast rule by which these two Bills, Customs and Excise, should go together, but I think the alternative proposal of Mr. Deakin gives that permission, if the Ministry of the day consider it better to put them together, as, no doubt, there is a natural relationship between those two Bills, which, under ordinary circumstances, cannot be dissevered. On the other hand, in dealing with a very powerful body like the Senate, it might be politic on the part of the Ministry, in order not to estrange the Senate from its taxation proposals, to send up two Bills instead of one. All that we insisted upon in Adelaide was to give the fullest flexibility to the Ministry in dealing with the matter. I do not see any financial objection to it, and the permissive character of the proposal renders it acceptable.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I wish to ask leave to withdraw the amendment as first moved, with the object of moving it so as to make the clause read as follows:-

Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of customs or of excise, or of customs and excise, shall deal with one subject of taxation only; but laws imposing duties of customs or of excise, or of customs and excise, shall deal with duties of customs or of excise or of customs and excise only.
I have put it in this form so as to place the meaning beyond question.
Mr. Deakin's amendment was, by leave, withdrawn, with the view of being moved again in the amended form indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I will put Mr. Deakin's new amendment in this form—to insert after "excise," in the second line of the sub-section, the words "or of customs and excise."

The sub-section was agreed to.

Sub-section (3). - The law which appropriates revenue or moneys for the ordinary annual services of the Government shall deal only with such appropriation.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
This sub-section, I think, presents features differing from those of either of the preceding subsections. I therefore beg to move-

That the word "proposed" be inserted before the word "law."

I have no arguments to offer beyond those which I expressed at an earlier hour of the sitting.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I shall vote for the amendment unless some better proposal is brought forward. As I said before, I see an infinite difference between sub-sections (1) and (2) and sub-section (3). It seems to me, however, that the end sought to be achieved could be arrived at by striking out the word ordinary. That, I think, is very unfortunate word use. We all know that for the services of the year there are often extraordinary charges to be met. Calamities, such as the bush fires which have recently occurred in Tasmania and Victoria, take place, and the expenditure which they necessitate is of an extraordinary character. I cannot understand how any quibble could arise if we simply spoke of the annual services of the year. That would include every item of expenditure, except something so glaringly unjust as to appeal to the national conscience.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I should hope that the expenditure caused by a bush fire would not be part of an annual service.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Would it not into the Appropriation Bill?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes; but not as an annual service.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The annual services of the Government are those which we distinguish from special grants and from loan services. The difficulty is that we have got rid of the phraseology to which we are accustomed, and instead of the words Appropriation Bill, we are using the word law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

A difficulty arises in connexion with the honorable members proposal to place expenditure incurred for bush fires in the ordinary, it would not be annual, and it would not be a service.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Then I shall vote for the best proposal to avoid sending these matters to the High Court.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
The CHAIRMAN. -
The question now is that sub-section (3), as amended, stand part of the clause.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
It might have been expected by several honorable members who were with me in regard to the amendment I intended to propose, and which I mentioned at an earlier stage, that I should propose it now. But, inasmuch as the matter is left as a mere matter or procedure, I am not at all sure that I shall proceed with my amendment. The effect of it would be to make the sub-section read in this way:-

The law which appropriates revenue for or in connexion with the maintenance or extension under this Constitution of public departments or services of the Commonwealth shall deal only with such appropriation.

I thought that this would get rid of that indefiniteness in the clause which was relied upon by the supporters of the word proposed as an argument in favour of it. But I would like to intimate that, while I intended to propose this amendment if that of Mr. Isaacs had not been carried, I do not feel inclined to propose it now.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

Then, sir, I beg to propose the amendment. It seems to me to get rid of an unfortunate ambiguity which attaches to the phrase ordinary annual services of the Government," without introducing any new element of doubt. The ordinary expenditure of the year covers the expenditure of the various departments of the Commonwealth; but difficult questions may arise as to what is ordinary and what is annual expenditure.

Mr. REID. -

Would not this limit the Bill very much?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It may be taken as a limitation, but it undoubtedly expresses in plain terms the real nature of an ordinary appropriation of the year. I admit the limitation, but would consent to it in order to get rid of the unsatisfactory nature of the present phraseology.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

You are trying to define what you cannot define.

Mr. BARTON. -

"In connexion with" is a very large term.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is, but it appears to me to cover our ordinary appropriations. Of course, I see that if the word "ordinary" is left out, as suggested by Mr. McMillan, that removes one very ambiguous expression from the existing clause, but as a mere question of drafting these words appear to me infinitely superior to the words of the clause.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It is proposed-

That after the word "revenue," the words or moneys for the ordinary annual services of the Government" be omitted, and that the words "for or in connexion with the maintenance or extension under this Constitution of public departments or services of the Commonwealth" be substituted.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I will ask, sir, for the amendment to be put by way of insertion.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Very well.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

Under this provision we are trying to draw a very important distinction between matters affecting proposed laws and matters which shall affect laws that have been assented to by the Governor-General; and I would like to ask the attention of the leader of the Convention, and of the Drafting Committee in particular, as to whether we are, in effect, making that distinction clear? Under clause 54 matters may be cured by the Governor's assent, which in clause 55, where the words "proposed laws" are not introduced, will be fatal. I suggest that this contention rests altogether on too slender a foundation and too attenuated a distinction. I should think that if the Attorney-General has in the ordinary course been called upon to advise the Executive with reference to the Governor's assent, it will be impossible for him to advise that that assent shall be given to Bills which are then before him, and which will come under the definition of laws contravening the provisions of the clause. To suggest that the chief law officer of the Commonwealth, under such circumstances, will altogether disregard the plain provisions of the Constitution, and advise the Governor-General, notwithstanding non-compliance with the provisions referred to, to give the Royal assent, seems to me to be contending for a position which is very difficult indeed to maintain. I trust that, if we intend to draw this distinction, we shall draw it in the clearest possible terms, and I ask the leader of the Convention if he is satisfied that the words which are to be found in the Bill are sufficient for the purpose, and whether some further steps ought not to be taken for making what we intend perfectly clear within the four corners of the Bill?

Mr. BARTON. -

As to the meaning of "ordinary annual services"?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

No; I am speaking to the question whether the distinction is properly drawn between a "proposed law" and a law, and as to whether it would be competent for the Attorney-General of the day, when a Bill is placed before him which fails to comply with the conditions with reference to proposed laws, to advise the giving of the vice-regal assent? I do not think the Attorney-General would be acting in accordance with his duty in giving any such advice, and therefore the distinction we have attempted to draw would utterly fail. If the leader of the Convention desires that that distinction shall be maintained, a further distinction is necessary, and should be made accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The proposed insertion in this sub-section only refers to "proposed laws."

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

But we have not yet adopted the sub-section as amended, and I am suggesting to the leader of the Convention that he might consider what is the effect of inserting the word "proposed" Does it enable the vice-regal assent to be given to laws which do not comply with the provisions of the clause I have referred to?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I understand my right honorable friend to be in some doubt as to whether this language is not loaded.

Mr. ISAACCS. -
He does not think it will "go off."

Mr. BARTON. -
There is a good deal to lead one to assume that it may have some effect of that kind, and that the language used as to a proposed law might possibly be held to apply to a law when passed. I am not expressing an opinion myself, but the position was previously put by Sir John Downer. I must admit that even under the stimulus of a heavy fee I should not be able to give a very direct opinion upon the point at once.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Ought we not to make it clear?

Mr. BARTON. -
I think every legal member will share the difficulty I am in. I will undertake, as my honorable friend asks me, to consider the point. Of course there will be another stage at which the Drafting Committee will have to have its fling; but I must admit that I do not see, at the present moment, any easy way of curing the difficulty. I think there will be an ambiguity created. I suppose, under its decision, I am as a draftsman to take it that the Convention intended to deal simply with Bills as matters of procedure, and not to impose any restriction on the effect of Bills when carried into law?

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -
Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON. -
I shall endeavour, of course, loyally to interpret the determination of the Convention in that way.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -
In order to make myself perfectly clear, this is the question which I would ask the Convention to consider: We have adopted a provision as to certain requisites in case of proposed laws. Suppose these requisites are not complied with in the case of the Appropriation Bill, and it is passed by both Houses, and is presented for the vice-regal assent, the first question is: Would the Law officers of the Crown be justified, notwithstanding that noncompliance, in recommending the Bill for the vice-regal assent? Of course, if they were not so justified then the assent would not be given, and there would be an end of it, but, even assuming that they were justified, or that they gave the advice, and the assent was given, would the assent cure any defects which might otherwise prevail on account of the noncompliance with the provisions? Would the assent in such a case give validity by turning an unconstitutional Bill into a constitutional Act? I would suggest, in order to make it perfectly clear, that this proviso might be added:-

But the proposed law shall not be invalid by reason only of non-compliance with this subsection.

Mr. ISAACS. -
"But the law," not "the proposed law."

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
In view of the very important statement made by Mr. Barton, and its acceptance all round, I am prepared to ask leave to withdraw this amendment for the present. If be considers that the present amendment which he once favoured is necessary, he will naturally make it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I should like to be perfectly understood about that if my honorable friend will allow me to interpose. There has been a reconsideration of the Bill, and there have been two recommittals of the Bill, so that in a broad sense this is the third reconsideration. I should like to be understood as not desiring to ask the Convention to reconsider anything beyond the present stage if I can possibly avoid it. It would take a matter of the most extreme moment to urge me to ask the Convention to enter into; another stage of recommittal.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I would like to draw the attention of Mr. Barton to a distinction which is pointed out by Burgess, in his Studies on Constitutional Law, between the possibility of a law being ultra vires under the two preceding sub-sections and under this sub-section. He says that on the two preceding sub-sections it is open to question whether an Act would not be ultra vires owing to the junction of two classes of taxation which are prescribed by the terms of the clause. He does not say that it would be ultra vires at all, but that probably it would be ultra vires. He raises the point.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Have you the reference?

Mr. GLYNN. -
I cannot, unfortunately, find the passage.

Mr. BARTON. -
In what connexion is Mr. Burgess writing?
Mr. GLYNN. -
We have passed subsections (1) and (2). At page 196 of his work—it was quoted by Mr. Isaacs this morning—Burgess raises the point whether it is a political or legal matter, or whether the courts could take cognisance of the function of two matters contrary to the provisions of the section—whether, in fact, they would declare a law which joined two matters which the section says should not be joined ultra vires. He says he thinks the courts would be entitled to do that, because it would be a direct violation of the immunity of a citizen.

Mr. BARTON. -
Does not that depend largely upon whether a thing which is forbidden is a law or a Bill?

Mr. GLYNN. -
He does not draw that distinction. It is under the question of the personal immunity of citizens that he discusses the matter. He says, under subsections (1) or (2), there would be a violation of an immunity of a citizen from a certain class of taxation unless imposed in a regular manner, but under the question of appropriation he raises this distinction. He says he does not think the law would be ultra vires at all, because there would be such an infinitesimal injury done to a private citizen that the courts would not take any cognisance of any proceedings he might take. I refer to this matter so that it may be considered, because he says the law in America is that appropriations are not to be made for more than two years, and if the appropriations, in violation of that provision, extend to three years, they would not be for that reason ultra vires of the Constitution. It is an important matter. We may really be only fighting a shadow in this discussion as to whether the Appropriation Bill will be bad. Once the Bill is passed, who is to challenge it if a citizen cannot? Only the Executive Government. Surely they are not going to stop the working of the departments of State by challenging an Act which is essential to the proper working of those departments?

Mr. REID. -
Suppose a man under a taxation law has to pay £10,000 a year, would that be considered a trivial interest in the subject?

Mr. GLYNN. -
That would affect a Taxation Act, not an Appropriation Act.

Mr. REID. -
I thought you referred to sub-sections (1) and (2).

Mr. GLYNN. -
No. I say, as regards the case put by the right honorable member, the opinion of Burgess is that it would be ultra vires. He says it is a moot point, but probably it would be ultra vires. But he most distinctly states that the Appropriation Bill, notwithstanding its violation of the terms of the Constitution, would not be ultra vires, because the effect of the violation upon a particular citizen, one of 3,000,000, would be so small that the courts would not interfere; you could not really assess the damage to him. What position will we, therefore, be in? A citizen cannot interfere, and the Executive Government, which wants the Act to carry on the departments of State, will not interfere. Probably the passage of a Bill contrary to the provisions of the Constitution will not result in any stoppage of the working of the departments.

Mr. Isaacs. -

The difference is that the American Constitution speaks of the "Bill," and this clause refers to the "law."

Mr. Glynn. -

The appropriation law is a Bill.

Mr. Isaacs. -

No.

Mr. Glynn. -

What else is it?

Mr. Barton. -

When it is a law it is not a Bill.

Mr. Glynn. -

Does not a proposed law mean a Bill?

Mr. Barton. -

An intending purchaser is not a purchaser; a proposed law is not a law.

Mr. Glynn. -

A proposed law is a Bill, and, according to Burgess' dictum, a Bill under the amendment, as now carried, is equivalent to a proposed law. The matter is worth looking into by the leader of the Convention.

Mr. Higgins (Victoria). -

Professor Burgess' inference and Statements are very interesting, but they are not business. In making a Constitution we ought to be clear, and it is not a matter for us whether Professor Burgess, on the words used in the American Constitution, is right or wrong. I have no doubt that there are very strong reasons for his statement, but I think it is our duty, if we have a mind to express a thing, to express it thoroughly.

Dr. Cockburn. -

But we have so many minds.

Mr. Higgins. -
I think if there was one thing we understood in the last division it was that if the Appropriation Bill for the ordinary annual services of the Government happened to overstep the ordinary annual services it was not to be invalidated by the courts for that reason. I think that is what we voted for. I do not want to take an amendment out of the hands of anyone, but I have begged my honorable friends who have interested themselves in the matter to take it up, and I beg them still to do it.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Move it yourself.

Mr. BARTON. -
As time goes on I begin more and more to think that the prohibition here is one simply on a question of procedure, and that the law would still be good.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The law, if passed, will still be good. In making this Constitution we ought to be clear, and leave nothing to the court if we can possibly help it. I shall beg the President, who has taken an interest in this subject, to move an amendment if he will do so.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
No, you move it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I do not want to add one iota to what we have determined, but after the last division I want to put it into plain English, so that he who runs may read. The President's suggestion is that we should add to sub-section (3) the words-
But a law shall not be invalid by reason only of non-compliance with this sub-section.
That expresses our meaning. We do not want an Appropriation Bill to be treated as in all respects absolutely invalid, because in some particulars it goes beyond the limits of this Constitution.

Mr. REID. -
I am going to propose an amendment on similar lines, which will cover the whole clause; but I am waiting until Mr. Deakin's amendment is disposed of.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I understand that Mr. Reid intends to propose-
The prohibition contained in this section shall not extend to reader invalid any law-

The CHAIRMAN. -
Perhaps we had better
Mr. DEAKIN. -
No, not now.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
Then may I move the insertion of an amendment before Mr. Deakin's amendment is put?
The CHAIRMAN. -
Not unless Mr. Deakin withdraws his amendment.
Mr. BARTON. -
The amendment which Mr. Reid has framed and which Mr. Higgins now desires to read to the committee, will come at the end of clause 55-not at the end of this sub-section; but there is nothing to prevent Mr. Higgins from reading it.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
I should like to see Mr. Reid's amendment carried, but I am afraid it will not be. I am afraid that he is asking too much having regard to the temper of the Convention; and, therefore, it is all the more important for me to put forward the more, modest proposal submitted by Mr. Isaacs, and then by Mr. Kingston. I want to have some opportunity of having those words inserted in this clause, and I think they would come best before Mr. Deakin's amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. -
That amendment-
But a law shall not be invalid by reason only of non-compliance with this sub-section, will come at the end of the sub-section now under consideration.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
Then I shall bow to your ruling, and I shall move that those words be added to Mr. Deakin's amendment, in order to make it perfectly clear that our meaning is that the law in question is not to be declared invalid after both Houses have approved of it.

The CHAIRMAN.-I suggest that you should move that amendment afterwards. The present proposal is to insert, after the word "revenue," the words proposed by Mr. Deakin, with a view to striking out of the sub-section the words "or for the ordinary annual services of the Government."

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I hope that those words will not be inserted. They amount merely to a repetition of the words we have already got there, with many more, words added to them. If you strike out the words "ordinary annual" then you get the word "services," which expression seems to me to cover everything that is included in the amendment, and is less liable to misconstruction, because it is embodied in fewer words. If our difficulty is "ordinary annual" services, then it will be better to get something precisely directed towards that expression than to introduce the words "for the maintenance of the public departments or services."

Mr. BARTON. -

What will you do with regard to the words-"the law which appropriates"? It is evident that only one law is intended. Which of the laws is it? There might be 50 laws.

Mr. SYMON. -

The difficulty is as to what the appropriation is to be for, and that difficulty arises because we have used an expression there that is open to ambiguity, namely, the term "ordinary."

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Why, not leave it "annual services"?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Or "annual appropriations"?

Mr. SYMON. -

This amendment does not seem to me to improve the sub-section; it only puts in a larger number of words.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

These words open a very wide door. They would cover almost all the "tacks" we could possibly imagine, and yet this clause is expressly intended to prevent "tacks." From the mere point of a nucleus, you could expand a whole department, and practically make an alteration of policy, on which the House representing the people of the states would have no opportunity of expressing their views.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Oh, yes, they would.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

How?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

They could either make suggestions or throw out the Bill.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

They could either make suggestions or throw out the Bill, and paralyze the Government. Now, we do not want to attempt an impossible thing, or to put up with a manifest injustice. The words of the amendment are so wide that they give an unfortunate opportunity for carrying out large changes of policy without consultation with the House representing the people of the states.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I suggested the words in the amendment for the protection and maintenance of the rights of those who now object to it most violently. Under the circumstances, I shall feel compelled to vote against the amendment, as those honorable members prefer the words in the Bill rather than the words I suggested. But I warn honorable members that they are now opening a field of conflict of which nobody can foresee the results.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I beg to move-
That the following words be added to sub-section (3):-"But a law shall not be deemed invalid in any court by reason of noncompliance with this sub-section."

It will be clearly understood that I am not going one step beyond what the committee has already affirmed. I wish to confine the application of these words to sub-section (3).

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I think it would be more convenient if I were to move my amendment, which deals with the general prohibition.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I would point out that the committee have already decided that sub-sections (1) and (2) shall stand. We cannot negative anything to which we have agreed.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I understand you to rule that Mr. Reid's amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I have not seen it.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Does the honorable member mean his amendment to cover a deliberate and wilful infringement of the sub-section?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You may be quite sure that the Houses would not allow a deliberate and wilful infringement of the sub-section. The law is not to be deemed invalid in any court by reason only of noncompliance with the sub-section. The Houses may refuse to permit any violation of sub-section (3). The amendment is meant primarily to apply to an ordinary case of innocent infringement, but you could not draw a line between an innocent infringement and a deliberate infringement. What I want to do is to prevent an appeal to the court upon every trivial infringement of the rule that you must have in an Appropriation Bill only the ordinary annual appropriation.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -
I said some little time ago that I did not know what would be the effect of providing that any proposed laws should comply with certain requirements under clause 54. If Mr. Higgins' amendment is accepted, and we add to sub-section (3) a declaration that non-compliance with that provision with reference to proposed laws shall not invalidate laws, I have no doubt what its effect would be in connexion with clause 54. If you do not put in that safeguard, undoubtedly the laws will be invalid. If we are going to use the term "proposed laws," and protect laws after they have been assented to, we ought to do that in all cases.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I knew that there would have to be an incidental amendment in clause 54.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
It is better to call the attention of the Drafting Committee to the difficulty, and to ask them to deal with the whole question by a general provision.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
Do I understand that the Drafting Committee will undertake to put sub-section (3) into such a form that it will give effect to the view of the Convention?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
They have said that they will not undertake to do that.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I understood the Hon. Mr. Barton to say that he would.

Mr. REID. -
He said he would consider it, but he did not, say that he would do anything.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
He would not make any promise, because he thought the insertion of the word "proposed" would create great confusion.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -
The argument that has been submitted by the Hon. Mr. Isaacs and others has been that some item, say £500, to compensate John Brown, might creep into an annual Appropriation Bill, that this might be found out by a man in the street, and that the High Court might thereupon be asked to declare the Bill to be invalid. Mr. Higgins has now introduced an amendment, the object of which is to avoid any such disastrous consequences, but be admitted that it would apply not only to an innocent, but also to a wilful and deliberate non-compliance with the sub-section. He urges that it would be impossible to separate an innocent from a deliberate infringement. I think that he, with his ingenuity in drafting, might find words that would make the amendment apply only to an innocent mistake. If he will do that, I shall vote for the amendment, but not otherwise.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You would then have the High Court trying, the question of the bona fides of both Houses of Parliament.

Mr. DOBSON. -

If it was perfectly plain that a small majority was infringing the Constitution simply in order to coerce a minority, the law should be declared invalid.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

There is one fatal objection to the amendment, and it has been pointed out by the Right Hon. Mr. Kingston. It is that there might be some doubt as to whether the failure to comply with these matters of procedure in subsection (3) would or would not invalidate an Act which had been assented to. I am inclined to think myself that it would not, but if there is any doubt on that point it should be removed. Look at what the effect of the amendment would be with regard to the procedure under clause 54. That clause says that proposed laws appropriating any part of the public revenue or imposing taxation shall originate in the House of Representatives, and that the Senate may not amend proposed laws imposing taxation, or proposed laws appropriating revenue or moneys for the ordinary services of the Federal Government.
