recognise that the conclusion is a foregone one, I feel, in reference to the vote which I shall give on the question, that the same reasons which actuated me in voting as I did at Adelaide continue to exist still, and, if possible, have additional force. The question to my mind is narrowed down to two very narrow issues. The first is: can we have federation if we, the smaller colonies, join our voting power together in this Convention, and defeat the larger colonies on this subject? The second question is: assuming that we do deprive the senate of the power to amend particular money bills, can we, under our constitution, have good government in other respects in the future? With reference to the first question, that is, whether the force of opinion in the larger colonies on this question of money bills is such that if the smaller colonies defeat them on this issue, it will seriously retard or impede federation, I am of the same opinion now as I was at Adelaide. In view of all the circumstances, in view of the feeling amongst members of the Convention and the feeling in the smaller colonies, I am quite satisfied that if those colonies join their forces in the matter thirty to twenty against the larger colonies, and defeat them on this issue, we shall seriously impede federation. With regard to the question as to the support which the larger colonies received from certain delegates of the smaller colonies at Adelaide, I may state that it was then a question as to whether it would not be better to postpone any concessions until this meeting of the Convention. After reflection, I am forced to the conclusion that the vote on that occasion was a wise one, for I am quite satisfied-and I think every hon. member who takes what I regard as a reasonable view of the matter is satisfied that had the delegates from the larger colonies gone back to their several legislatures defeated on this issue by the small colonies, it would have caused so much bitterness, that the result would have been prejudicial to the cause of federation, which I believe most of us so earnestly desire. Reflecting on that vote, I am rejoiced to find that certain of my colleagues who were then opposed to me intend now to join with me in the vote which I intend to give. With regard to the question as to whether we are likely to have good government in the future that is the paramount question after all; and I am quite satisfied that, even with a senate deprived of power to amend money bills, the people of Australia may safely enter into federation with the confidence that we shall secure for federated Australia good government for the people. It has been suggested by a delegate from Tasmania that the people of Tasmania would probably reject the constitution bill when submitted to them that they would refuse to enter the federation in consequence of the senate being deprived of the power to amend money bills.
The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
Hear, hear!
The Hon. J. HENRY:
My hon. friend and colleague says "hear, hear." It happens that immediately on my return from Adelaide I called a public meeting in the chief centre of population on the north side of the island Launceston because I, in common with other delegates, had been much abused in consequence of the vote we gave. I submitted the whole question to the meeting, and I had the satisfaction of receiving a vote of approval of my conduct.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
That is only a section of the people!
The Hon. J. HENRY:
It was a very important section of the city of Launceston. The hon. member will admit that in that city there is a considerable amount of influence so far as expression of opinion is concerned. I may also state that my colleague, Mr. Lewis, who voted with me on that occasion, also called a meeting of the Australian Natives Association, and explained his vote and position, and he also was awarded a vote of confidence for his action. I have no doubt whatever as to the result of the vote whenever it is taken; and I shall be able to go back to the colony to which I have the honor to belong, and conscientiously recommend the acceptance of the Constitution Bill, provided that in other important respects the measure is made safe. I have in my mind principally the financial clauses. The financial question is the great stumbling block to Tasmania. We are only a small colony, and we must see our way safely; but, as regards the question of the constitution, I shall have no hesitation in recommending the acceptance of the bill. A great deal has been said about the difference between suggestion and amendment. It is idle to discuss the matter from my point of view. A great deal has also been said about the relative powers of the senate and house of representatives. I do not feel disposed to enter into the various arguments. It is sufficient for me that we cannot have federation if we defeat this proposal. But we are not going to defeat it. It appears to me there are two extreme parties, not only in the colony to which I have the honor to belong, but throughout Australia generally. I regard the extreme parties as those who, on the one hand, say "There shall be no federation unless we have equal representation," and those who, on the other hand, say "We will have no federation unless the senate has co-ordinate powers in money matters in the house of representatives."
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Very few say that, I think!
The Hon. J. HENRY:
There are people who say it.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
No one has said it in the Western Australian Parliament!
The Hon. J. HENRY:
If I understand the hon. gentleman a right, the argument is that the senate has the right to amend money bills.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I have not said what will happen if it does not!
The Hon. J. HENRY:
I am referring to the two classes of extremists in the colony. To my mind, it is a question as to whether there is a sufficient force of moderate opinion between those two extremists to justify us in hoping we shall have federation at this juncture. After these remarks, it is quite unnecessary for me to say how I shall vote. I shall merely follow the vote I gave in Adelaide.
Mr. JAMES (Western Australia)[4.28]:
At the Convention in Adelaide in April last I recorded my vote in favour of the bill as it left the Constitutional Committee. If the amendment is carried the measure will be placed back in the position in which it was left then. I said that if I thought that when the adjourned meeting was held, by voting in favour of the principle then embodied in the bill as it stood, I should retard federation, I should have no hesitation. whatever in reversing the vote I then gave. I think if there ever was a convenient opportunity to carry out that promise it is now. I cannot for one moment follow the position taken up by Mr. Hackett, who, thinking as I do, would rather vote against the amendment than injure federation, still thinks the time has not arrived to exercise that act of concession. It seems to me that as soon as we possibly can we should dispose of all the irritating points. And if we are going to adjourn these discussions if after fighting the matter out in Adelaide we are going to adjourn it again it seems to me we shall never have the question settled. I am not going to vote in favour of the bill as it stands because I think it is defensible, on principle. Believing as I do that the demand for equal representation is a right-recogising, however, as I do that there are members in this Convention who would generously give it to us as a concession-I cannot see that any limitation upon co-ordinate powers of the houses can be defensible. Nor do I vote in favour of this bill as it stands because I think it necessary that we should deviate from the application of what I believe to be a true principle for the purpose of securing a full and vigorous local responsible government. That, I think, is a plant which can take adequate and full care of itself, and no plan we can make will interfere with its full growth. I vote for this clause as it stands, being the compromise of 1891, because I desire to see federation take place, and because I do not want to shut my eyes to the fact that that compromise comes before this Convention approved and supported by men whose position in this movement is such that I am absolutely certain that they would not recommend the representatives of the small states to accept any compromise which would do injustice to the small states, or do wrong to the federation. For that reason, I will record my vote in favour of the compromise which comes supported by such high and honorable men.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[4.32]:

I cannot help thinking that this very interesting debate has wandered a little from the question before the Committee. The amendment before the Chair is to leave out the words "for imposing taxation and" and, as I understand it, the object of the right hon. member, Sir John Forrest, is to leave the senate in the position of being unable to exercise full power with regard to appropriation bills, but, at the same time, to give the senate power to interfere as it likes with the taxation bills, and that I understood to be the point of his objection. He wanted to concede as to appropriation bills for the purpose of working out responsible government. The right hon. member is willing to cut from the senate the power of interfering with appropriations, but he wishes to give the senate equal power as to the imposition of taxation?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

As to amending!

Mr. HIGGINS:

As to amending. The question before the Chair now is, not the question of suggesting amendments, although there is no doubt that it bears very much on this particular point. The only question before the Chair at present is this question is the senate to have equal powers as to laws imposing taxation?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

That is, in initiating!

Mr. HIGGINS:

Of course. The only words before the Chair are that the senate shall have equal power with the house of representatives in respect of all proposed laws, except laws imposing taxation.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I do not propose to give the power of initiation, for all that!
Mr. HIGGINS:

No, the power of initiation has been dealt with in the preceding clause; but, still, the object of the right hon. gentleman is that the senate shall have equal power with the house of representatives with regard to all laws imposing taxation, except as to origination.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Yes!

Mr. HIGGINS:

As to that, if we are to narrow the dispute down to that one point, I should like to: ask the right hon. member how he can separate the two classes of money bills, bills which impose taxation from bills which authorise expenditure? By refusing to impose taxation you can practically prevent expenditure The policy of a government with regard to expenditure must be controlled by their policy in regard to taxation. If you tell a government, "We will not allow you certain taxation," you practically tell that government also, "We will not allow you the power of expenditure in the direction in which you intimate you will expend."

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

You can expend what you have left!

Mr. HIGGINS:

Yes, but that is a very small thing. As a rule our experience in Australia is that the governments do not keep very much in hand. They have to look to the taxation for the year, or to borrowing perhaps, in some cases, for the expenditure of the year. Expenditure and taxation are linked together so that you cannot separate them.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Suppose they reject them?

Mr. HIGGINS:

I cannot follow that reasoning. The only question here is whether you are going to give equal powers in regard to taxation and expenditure. Having linked together the two kinds of money bills for getting money and spending money, I should like hon. members to consider just a little more fully what the Premier of New South Wales put. You are forgetting that the populations of Victoria and New South Wales are about four times as large as the populations of the other three colonies—2,600,000 persons as against 650,000 persons and that the taxation is contributed in the same proportion practically. New South Wales and Victoria contribute four times as much taxation as do all the other colonies combined.
Not individually!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I am not speaking of the state of exaltation as regards the finances which we have been reminded so frequently exists in Western Australia for the present. I trust that it will long continue; I have every hope that it will. Taken at a whole, the populations will contribute to the taxation in proportion to their numbers.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

No, they do not!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I am speaking of the future. The right hon. gentleman cannot forget that he is the Premier of a colony with the most lavish revenue that ever existed in Australia in proportion to numbers. Speaking of the future, I say that the amount contributed in taxation will be pretty much in proportion to population. The extraordinary proposition which is proposed for this Convention to adopt is that those colonies which contribute in the proportion of one to four to the taxation of the commonwealth are to have the voice of three to two in the senate, and that this senate is to have an equal power in dealing with all these matters of taxation.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

No, not an equal power!

Mr. HIGGINS:

"Equal power"-look at the words! The Hon. H. DOBSON: No!

Mr. HIGGINS:

If the hon. member were at all careful he would not only have let the cat out of the bag in regard to the object of having a strong senate but would also have looked at this clause, which says:

The senate shall have equal power with the house of representatives in respect of all proposed laws except laws imposing taxation.

The proposal now is to have equal power even in regard to laws imposing taxation.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

No; not to increase taxation!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I have carefully indicated the qualifications with which that must be taken. The object of the right hon. member, Sir John Forrest, is to give the senate with these qualifications equal power in regard to laws imposing taxation. I was very glad that the hon. member, Mr. Dobson, was so frank with his aristocratic and conservative prejudices as to state the object for which he requires a strong senate. I hope his words will be put in big flaring advertisements round all the different colonies, so that the people will know exactly what the object is. What struck me was, how my hon.
friends, who profess to be liberals in South Australia and elsewhere, like the statement of the hon. member, Mr. Dobson, that the object of having a strong senate is to check the will of the people.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
   Nonsense! I never said that!
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
   His vote is righ
Mr. HIGGINS:
   The vote is right, but the reasons are wrong. The reason for having a senate, from his point of view, is to check the will of the people. Am I doing the hon. member an injustice?
The Hon. H. DOBSON:
   To some extent that is right!
Mr. HIGGINS:
   The object, of a strong senate is to check the will of the people. That, I concede, to be the position of those conservatives, who are voting in favour of a strong-
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
   The hon. member knows that he is not quoting my hon. friend quite fairly!
Mr. HIGGINS:
   I do not know it, nor do I think anyone would accuse me of being unfair.
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
   Not intentionally!
Mr. HIGGINS:
   I am sure hon. members will acquit me of any intention of being unfair. I appealed to the hon. mem-
[P.525] starts here
ber as to whether the words which I quoted were not his words practically, and he said that they were, that they substantially represented his object.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
   The words were that a strong senate was required to control the democratic force!
Mr. HIGGINS:
   Quite so. The hon. member's avowed object in having a strong senate is to control the democratic force.
The Hon. H. DOBSON:
   Not to let it go too fast!
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Mr. HIGGINS:

My right hon. friend, the Premier of Western Australia, has administered the affairs of that colony by reason of the concealment of his power. He has been able to conceal the iron hoof with which he has ridden over the destinies of the colony. I am not referring to that hon. gentleman. I am referring to the hon. member, Mr. Dobson, who is a consistent conservative of Tasmania, following the lead of our venerable friend, Mr. Adye Douglas. The hon. member's object in having a strong senate is to control the democratic force. I, myself, have tried to make it as strong as I could by basing it on the will of the people, and for the purpose of carrying out the behests of the people-with a very different motive to that of the hon. gentleman. I say that we want a strong senate to carry out the people's will; but unless you base it in the manner I suggested last week you cannot have it. There is one significant fact that although members of the Convention by a huge majority last week murdered proportional representation they cannot get rid of its ghost. It is about them still. It is here, and will follow them. Hardly one member who has spoken on this question but has felt bound to refer to equal representation. I was led into a digression by the interjections of hon. gentlemen opposite. But what I wanted to emphasise was this that we are dealing at present only with the question whether the senate is to have equal powers with the house of representatives as to taxation.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Is it to have the power of amending a taxation bill by reducing the amount?

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is true that the clause prohibits any increase; but the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that you may interfere with the wish of the people by decreasing as well as by increasing taxation. The great tendency on the part of the popular houses of some of these colonies has been to increase taxation. Measures with that object have been popular. On the other hand, there has been a disposition on the part of the upper houses to decrease taxation. In those colonies, for instance, where a protectionist policy has been adopted, the tendency of the popular house has been to increase taxation, and if the hon. member means to say that the senate may not increase taxation I say, "Thank you for nothing." What I want to indicate is that you cannot give over equal powers as to taxing bills to a body which does not represent the people according to their population. I am glad to call attention to the fundamental error at the base of the argument of the hon. member, Sir John Downer, and those who, have spoken so strongly upon his side of the question. Here is the fundamental error which happened to come out in the course of the hon. gentleman's eloquent and vehement address: "Why," he said, "are we not all here to vote according to, the advantage of our constituents?" Surely it is the very opposite.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Has the hon. gentleman fairly stated what I said?

Mr. HIGGINS:
I took down the words at the time.

Mr. LYNE:
I also made a note of the words. They were: "Do our best for the states and for our own constituents!"

Mr. HIGGINS:
Exactly. I say that we are not here to do the best we can for our constituents, and I say that if anyone takes that view of our federal purpose here he takes altogether a wrong view of our mission. Our object here is to act, not in accordance with what we think at present are the interests of South Australia, Tasmania, and Victoria, but to do the best we can for the benefit of Australia as a whole without regard to boundaries. That reminds me of what the right hon. the Premier of Tasmania said. He said: "Let us in this matter of money bills obliterate boundaries. What have we to do with the population of New South Wales or Tasmania?" That is precisely what we have been endeavouring to do to obliterate boundaries. That is what we have been trying to do all the time for federal purposes. It is a nice position to take up to say, "We will obliterate boundaries when it comes to a question of who is to get the benefit of the money, but we will not do so when it comes to a question of who is to have power over the money." That position is untenable. So far as voting goes I think that from my observations hon. members will have formed an opinion as to how I intend to vote.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[4.48]:
I did not intend to speak at all upon this question, and I will now say only a few words. The hon. member who last spoke talked about obliterating boundaries, but we do not obliterate boundaries. The states as states are not obliterated. We do not intend that they should be, because that would mean unification. It would mean going back to the condition of things which obtained when I, myself, first arrived in Australia many years ago.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
Not for the states; but for the commonwealth!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
For federal purposes we nationalise ourselves. If we obliterated boundaries, it would be a very nice thing for Victoria, and all the colonies, because we should have the advantage of the £2,000,000 of land revenue in New South Wales forthwith. However, we did not expect that, and we are not at all likely to get it. It would be downright nonsense to ask for it. New South Wales is the strong colony, because of its £2,000,000 of land revenue, and she can do as she likes in regard to this taxation question. She can be lavish in her expenditure for the next fifty years, and still not be crippled in her finances. But in Victoria and in the other colonies we have to be careful with our finances. We have to be very careful in our expenditure. We find it difficult to get money from the taxpayer. We do not, therefore, intend to obliterate boundaries. We intend only to set up one nation. I cannot support the amendment of the right hon. member, Sir John Forrest, because we in Victoria would not be justified in asking the people of that colony to allow the senate, no matter upon what foundation it is erected, to amend money bills. We have not been bred in that way. Every man, woman, and child in Victoria is of a contrary opinion. I admit at once that I do not think there is any very great danger in it, because it can only operate in the direction of reducing taxation, and if you do not take the money out of the pockets of the people, the money is there. Still, I know it is no use to go to our colony and advocate that view, and I am sure it is the same in New South Wales. So that I hope the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest will not insist upon his proposal. We are grateful to those members from Tasmania who, at the Adelaide Convention, voted in the way which was so much desired, and thus saved us from actual collapse. I am glad that that view is gaining ground, and I hope that the division on this occasion will be even more emphatic than it was on the last occasion.

The Hon. W. Moore (Tasmania):

The hon. gentleman who has just sat down seemed to me not to draw a distinction between the functions of responsible government as applied to a unified government and the functions of responsible government as applied to a federal government, and that is a distinction which has not been observed throughout this debate. It is entirely different when you apply the functions of responsible government to a number of federated states joined together as we propose to be joined in this federation. No one has yet pointed out that the functions of responsible government are incompatible with federation. The United States and Switzerland afford the best types of federation of which we know at the present time. In the United States the principle of responsible government would be foreign to the working of the federal constitution. The federation of Switzerland has been framed on almost the same lines as those of the United States, and in the case of Switzerland also the principles of responsible government have not been applied. In the work upon which we are now engaged we are endeavouring to form a federation on a principle never known before. We are endeavouring to federate a number of colonies, and to apply to the working of the finance of that federation the principles of responsible government. This is entirely new, and we cannot look back through the vista of history for any evidence or proof to show how it will work. I have no doubt that in the end we shall be able to arrive at a satisfactory adjustment; but I cannot see how the system of federal government is to work properly or advantageously, unless some power is given to the senate. I think the senate in a federal parliament should have a great deal more power than a senate under a unified form of government.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
We are giving you more power!

The Hon. W. MOORE:
But hon. gentlemen are all the time arguing that the powers of the two houses are co-equal. Now, the powers proposed to be given to the senate and those proposed to be given to the house of representatives are dissimilar in every way. Attempts have been made to weaken, to emasculate, and to destroy every power which should legitimately belong to a senate, and we are asked to go on in that direction from step to step. An attempt is being made and no doubt it will succeed to prevent the senate from amending money bills. Now, in Tasmania, in the exercise of responsible government in our own way, the Legislative Council have exercised the power of amending money bills for the last forty years, and if you were to poll Tasmania tomorrow, I do not think you would find one man who would say that the system has not worked advantageously. At this moment I should be willing to give way even on this particular point if I thought the matter would rest there. But what is to be the next move? As soon as the senate is deprived of the power to amend money bills, the next movement will be to deprive it of the power of suggestion, and, when that has been done, the next attempt will be to completely extinguish the power of the senate by means of the referendum. That is the tendency that has been evident from time to time, and I do not think we ought to give way to it. No senate in the world was ever constituted on so wide and popular a basis as the senate we propose to establish. There is to be a representation of the whole of the state, and if each representative is to be elected by the whole of the state, surely the senate should be able to exercise some power in proportion to the way in which it is elected. We are now constituting a senate for which we have no precedent either in ancient or modern history.
For these reasons I think the senate should have the necessary power to deal with money bills to a certain extent. I do not claim that it should have the power of initiating money bills. It is here where a fog or mist has been thrown around the question, and where an attempt has been made to show that in the constitution we are about to form, the two houses are to have co-equal powers. What is the fact? The fact is that the senate is to have no power of initiation. That is the first step. The next step is that the house of representatives is to be governed by the principles of responsible government. What does that mean?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Referendum and dissolution!

The Hon. W. MOORE:
Exactly. I am so pleased at the action of the larger colonies in giving equal representation, that I think we ought to meet them as far as possible, and if we had any guarantee that this would satisfy them, we might consent to go so far. But we have no guarantee of the kind, and, I dare say, we shall have to fight the matter step by step until we deal with all the points. I do not think it is necessary that I should take up any further time. I intend to vote for the amendment of the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest for the reasons I have given. I voted for the same amendment in 1891, and again in Adelaide, and I shall do so now. I would not do so if I thought that concession on this point would bring a final settlement. But in the absence of any proof or desire to meet on common grounds, I shall feel it my duty to vote for the amendment. I am an ardent federationist, and am very desirous that these colonies should be federated; but I cannot understand the attempts that are made from time to time to weaken the powers of the senate. We are creating, a senate on the bed-rock of liberal representation, and on a principle never known before in history. Surely such a senate should have some little power. We do not give the senate any power of initiation, and it is to have no control over money bills beyond a mere veto. I hope, nevertheless, that we may come to a decision with regard to federation. I believe it will be for the good of all Australia, and for every one of us. As far as my own colony is concerned, it was never in a more prosperous condition, and we can look forward with hope to the future. We would like to work harmoniously with the other colonies for a common destiny for that great object we all came here to endeavour to accomplish.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[5.1]:
I intend to vote against this amendment, and to adhere in this clause to the provisions that were agreed to in 1891, and again agreed to in 1897 at Adelaide. The arrangement of these clauses come to in 1891 has been spoken of repeatedly as "the 1891 compromise." Well, except in the sense that you cannot make a federal government without compromise that a federal government is a compromise in itself, it is, perhaps, a misnomer to apply the term "compromise" to these clauses; but they were carried by a majority of five or six in the Convention of 1891. When I speak of these clauses as "the compromise of 1891," and urge their acceptance now, I must not for a moment be understood to say that because they were agreed to in 1891 they ought to be accepted now. It is my opinion that they should be accepted now, because they are a reasonable arrangement—not because a former convention adopted them for we should be forgetting the true purpose for which we were sent here if we were to say that because our predecessors, sitting six years ago, came to the opinion which is expressed by these clauses, therefore it is our duty to accept them now. That is a doctrine to which I am not to be accused of subscribing.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

We do not say that at all!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I do not say that anybody here has asserted it; but I think it was argued in Adelaide, when some of us voted as we shall now, that the compromise of 1891 should be adhered to, and we were afterwards accused in this colony of having supported that compromise simply because we slavishly followed the opinions of 1891. That is a false accusation, and I think that I should take the earliest opportunity of refuting it. The reason why these clauses were supported in the form in which they now stand which is essentially the form of 1891, was because it seemed to those who supported them that they embodied the best adjustment of the question of money powers that could be arrived at, having regard to the necessity of conserving the principles of federation on the one hand, and having on the other hand the necessity of conserving, as far as possible, the principles of responsible government. It has been urged by you, Sir, and with very great force, that either federation must kill responsible government or that responsible government must kill federation; but I do not think, after all, that the putting of an argument of that kind in so strong and direct a way should altogether deprive us of the hope that we can make such an adjustment between the federal idea and the spirit of responsible government as will enable a federation to continue without undue in-road on the rights and individualities of the states, and will also enable responsible government—that is, government responsible to one house of the legislature—to be continued with the force and life with which we know it. "The compromise of 1891," as it has been called—and as I say, perhaps wrongly called has been very well described by Sir Samuel Griffith, and I will quote from his opinion, expressed after the adoption of those clauses in 1891. He also calls it a "compromise" I take it, again, in the sense that the idea of compromise is inseparable from the idea of federation, that it must be a compromise between a system of national government and a system vital to federal government. He says:

I think it is a very reasonable compromise, and that all those in the Convention who really desire to see a federation of Australia brought about might fairly accept it or something like it.

It is of no use for hon. members to profess to want federation while they refuse to accept the means necessary to obtain it.

Then at the end of his speech, he adds:

I am perfectly satisfied that under this constitution there will be no unification, because state rights will be perfectly preserved.

That is, speaking of the constitution as a whole, containing clauses practically identical with these. That is the opinion of a very high authority I think an authority whose knowledge of this question and whose earnestness in its advocacy everyone of us admires, and I take it that Sir Samuel Griffith's opinion may be regarded with comfort by those hon. gentlemen, coming from the smaller colonies, who would rather expose themselves to attack. from these who have not sufficiently considered the question else where, than run the risk of causing this great movement to be abandoned simply because, of difference of opinion on this question. I was a little disappointed, because of my very great respect for him, to hear my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Dobson, talk of controlling the democratic force. It is true that the phrase has been explained by my right hon. friend, Sir Edward Braddon, as meaning "guide the democratic force." When I heard the phrase it seemed to me to imply something more than that kind of guidance which a representative of the people exercises with a full sense of his responsibility. We must have regard for opinion out of doors. Public opinion in favour of this scheme is only a translation of goodwill for this scheme, and it is upon the goodwill of the people of the various colonies giving up, in some instances, ideas which they have cherished, on finding a constitution which they can in the main adopt it is an the goodwill of the people of these colonies that we must rest this federal movement, otherwise it must utterly collapse. I should be the last to mention a word in the nature or the sense of a threat; but surely some regard, and strong regard, must be had for the position of those two colonies whose populations number between them some 2,500,000, or very nearly 2,500,000 out of the total population that is represented by the gentlemen assembled in this chamber. I say seriously—not in any sense of what is called "bluff," and I am sure I shall be acquitted of speaking in that sense—I say seriously that if you were to grant power to the senate to amend taxation bills, the result of your granting that power in this constitution would be a failure of your scheme. I do not say that in the least degree with the view of influencing any hon. member's vote, except thus: that I must appeal to his regard for this cause if he thinks it is a high one, and if he thinks it is his duty to the citizens of Australia to accomplish it. Those of us who represent those two colonies know that, with such a power inserted in this constitution, we may bid good-bye to the endeavour to induce our electors to accept the bill. Of that I am as confident as I know that I stand here.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
You must educate them up to that point!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
We have educated them up to a certain point. We have educated them so far as to understand that in a federal government there must be some adjustment between the rights of the states as separate entities and the individual rights of the units of the people. We have educated them, I think, so far as to understand that, and so as to see that an adjustment of those rights, of some sort or other, is an essential to a federation; but we have not, cannot, and shall not try to educate them to the thought that the adoption of a federation embodies the abandonment of that system of responsible government which we consider to be the natural outcome of true democratic feeling that feeling which, conservative as some of us may be considered in some places, it is our duty to conserve. That, we must think of; that, we must abide by; and that, at any rate, is an explanation of the action we shall take in supporting these clauses; but I am indeed glad to find that that feeling, and the knowledge of that position, actuate many of those hon. members who are not representing New South Wales and Victoria, and who see that unless that spirit, and the feeling and opinion of those great numbers of people are in some measure acceded to, resting as they do on the system of government which they have found just and good, the scheme is doomed to failure. I said at the very outset that I did not threaten. I leave expressions of that kind to gentlemen who are not unused to threats. But it is my duty to the Convention to explain, as far as I can, the position of the country which I represent, and I solemnly say that I believe I express the feelings of that country most truly. We cannot accept the amendment if to accept it is to put back federation. That is the one, the last, the convincing argument against the proposal, the argument which in the end must prevail. I believe that the people of this colony, and the people of Victoria, will accept the principle of the equal representation of states in the senate; but I believe that the principle will not be accepted if you give such powers to the senate as will make the system of responsible government, as we understand it, utterly unworkable. I think that that is the true adjustment of this position, and the adjustment which is really expressed by a combination of clause 9 with this and the preceding clause.
The Premier of South Australia tells me that, without safeguards of this kind to ensure the living force of responsible government, the constitution would not be accepted in South Australia. For that I cannot personally vouch, of course; but I accept the right hon. gentleman's statement as strengthening my contention.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The Premier of South Australia is the only member of the South Australian delegation who will vote against the amendment!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Well, he happens to be Premier, and has a majority in the legislature of South Australia.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Both houses of the South Australian legislature carried resolutions in favour of this proposal!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The right hon member, Mr. Kingston, happens to have majority in the Legislative Assembly.

Mr. SOLOMON:
Not on this point!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I am not speaking of this point. That has no effect, and does not turn me from my course at all. I am perfectly aware what resolutions were passed in the South Australian legislature. I simply intend to point out that we have added to the statements of the Premiers of New South Wales and Victoria, that of the Premier of South Australia, notwithstanding the fact that the South Australian legislature has suggested certain amendments in the bill. The right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, is still in power, in the only way in which a prime minister can remain in power, namely, with a majority behind him, and being in that position I take it that he is able to gauge public opinion in his colony. Therefore his statement adds weight to the opinions advanced by the representatives of New South Wales and Victoria. I should like further to revert to an observation of the hon. member, Mr. Dobson. He practically told us that we were wasting time in a discussion of this kind, because if we sat here with closed doors, making speeches of a minute's duration or a little more, we might quickly come to an agreement embodying a genuine scheme of federation which would be accepted by the people outside. I grant that if we sat with closed doors we could more quickly come to an arrangement on this subject than we can by the process of debating in public, because some of us would not then need to make such long speeches; but if we were to follow the process which the hon. member regards as so much superior to the present one, the difficulty would be that the constitution, which might be the most valuable one upon earth if once accepted, would be so much waste paper, because no population in any of these colonies would look at it, or approach it, except for the purpose of kicking it. How is it expected that the free people of this country are to have the adjustment of a constitution made behind their backs, and without knowing what debates had taken place in the framing of it? I grant that you can have select committees to set out formal propositions for the Convention: but it will be the duty of the Convention to debate these propositions. This debate must take place in the open light of day. If we did not debate the matter in this way, how absurd it would be for us, with our experience of public life, to think for a moment that we could induce any free people to accept our work. Now, if we are to have two houses, and intend to act on the principles of responsible government, and to conserve those principles, we ought not to put into the hands of the senate the power to utterly destroy the financial policy of a government. That is the position which would arise here. I grant you that destruction may be worked in some cases by veto; but the course of vetoing is undertaken upon a much greater responsibility than the course of amending; and a second chamber would consider ten times before it vetoed, though only once or twice before it amended.

An Hon. MEMBER:

No doubt about that!

The Hon. E. Barton:

Of course there is not. The difficulty which besets my hon. friend is that he proposes to put into the hands of such a body the right to adopt a course about which it will not feel so much responsibility; but by repetition of which it may work more destruction. That is the danger. Let us put the matter in this way. We are told that the amendment is only an amendment to give the senate power to alter tax bills.

The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest:
To reduce them!
The Hon. E. BARTON:

Yes, to alter them by way of reduction. Of course we are confidently left to suppose that as the power to amend appropriation bills is not to be conceded to the senate, therefore their power is confined to the amendment of tax bills. But what is the result of amending a tax bill? Take the position of an administration which has to raise the funds necessary for the government of a colony. Its requirements are so many thousand or million pounds; but if the raising of £300,000 or £400,000 of this amount is embodied in its taxation proposals, and these proposals are cut down by the senate to one-half, what becomes of the appropriation bill? Can any one say that the appropriation will not have to be reduced to the same extent? That amount of money cannot be spent, unless hon. members think it wise to involve the federation in a course of deficit at the start. If you give power to amend tax bills, to that extent you give indirect power to cut down the expenditure. A government cannot live within its means if, when you cut down the taxation it proposes to levy and which has been agreed to by the other chamber, it does not in a corresponding way reduce its estimate of expenditure. Therefore, the power to reduce tax bills is virtually a power to reduce estimates. This cannot be got away from. If you put into the hands of the senate the power to amend tax bills, to the extent to which they cut down proposed taxation once agreed to by the other house, they do cut down expenditure authorised or to be authorised by the estimates and appropriation bill. To give power to do the one is to give power to do the other. Anyone who knows the way in which the government of these colonies is carried on must see that with a general policy that surpluses are to be avoided prevailing—and I wish that the policy were equally to avoid deficits—with a policy which says that it is the right thing for a treasurer to avoid surpluses, the general course is to equalise revenue and expenditure as far as possible. When the course of allowing the second chamber to amend a tax bill is once agreed to, the result must be that the power of enforcing that amendment will also be the power of reducing the expenditure as well. So that to nominally withhold the power in the constitution will have no effect. If you give the responsibility to the lower house, you cannot grant this power to the upper house. If you are going to constitute a system of responsible government in which the responsibility of the ministry will be shared between the two chambers, in which the ministry will have one leg in the grave and the other out of it—if you are going to do that sort of thing then you will probably put the ministry in the position of that gentleman-of course not in one of these colonies—who had two wives, an old and a young one. The gentleman, like some, of us, had hair slightly streaked with grey. The old wife used to busy herself in pulling out all his black hairs; his young wife used to busy herself in pulling out all his grey hairs. The result was that the unfortunate husband was rapidly made bald. That would be, metaphorically speaking, the position of a government which endeavoured to carry on responsible government with responsibility to two houses instead of to one. If then you are to have responsibility to one house, and to one house alone, you cannot give the senate this power. If you do so you will put the government in the position of the elderly gentleman of whom I have spoken. I do not want to detain the Convention at great length, but I should like to say something about the fewer of suggestion. The power of suggestion which we propose to grant, and not the power of amendment, differs from the power of amendment very seriously in this respect, that it places the responsibility upon the right shoulders, and the whole of this question is a question of responsibility. The question of amending taxing bills is a question whether you will have the government responsible to two chambers or to one. I may be forgiven for the sake of shortness for quoting some words which I used in Adelaide, which I think are pertinent on the present occasion. I then said:

We are told this is a question of a mere choice of words, that is to say, that the power of amending taxation is practically the same as the power to make suggestions. The question of responsibility arises again. If the second chamber makes suggestions such as are enabled to be made in this colony (South Australia) under the compact of 1857, which is not a matter of law but a matter of agreement; if the second chamber makes suggestions under an agreement of that sort, and if the suggestions are not adopted, that house must face the responsibility of deciding whether it will veto the bill or not. If the procedure is to be by way of amendment, and the amendments are disagreed with by the house of representatives, and are still insisted upon by the second chamber, then it is upon the house of representatives that the responsibility must rest of destroying its own measure. The responsibility for the loss of the measure under the first set of circumstances must attach to the second chamber. But, in the second case, suppose it is forced upon the very chamber which has affirmed the measure. Can there be a greater difference between the two positions than that? In the first case the responsibility rests where it should, with those who wish to negative the policy of finance upon which the entire government of the country hangs; because without money you cannot govern. If the policy of the ministry according to their desires in the main is not carried out there must be another ministry, and those who lead to the formation of that ministry should take the responsibility. If the procedure is by way of suggestion, which is insisted upon, the senate must take the responsibility of the veto. If it is by way of amendment, and that amendment is disagreed with, it is the lower house that must take the responsibility of the destruction of its own work. There cannot be a greater difference than there is between the two positions. This is not a mere "choice of words." It embodies in it a grave situation, which may arise from time to time. I have been always willing that this power of suggestion should be given a power which will enable one house to express itself in a perfectly dignified way for it would not belittle any chamber to take this course any more than it does in this colony, where the Legislative Council, which is a strong body, has the power of making suggestions which it exercises. I am perfectly willing that that course should be taken by leave of law, not because I do not believe it is an effective course—because it has a power in it—but because, if wrongly taken, the displacement of the financial policy of the country by those who oppose it can be placed at the doors of those who make themselves responsible.

So I say there is a difference between the power of suggestion which we propose to give and the power of amendment. The difference in the position is that if a power of suggestion is exercised the responsibility will rest on the right shoulders. That is to say, if the senate takes upon itself the responsibility of making a suggestion, and, if that is not agreed to, of vetoing a measure, it will have to take the full responsibility of its action. Whereas if you give the power of amendment, if that amendment is disagreed with by the lower house, and is insisted upon by the house which originated it, the government have no alternative but to lay the measure aside. They have to take the immense responsibility of negating the very policy which they have put before the country. To put that responsibility upon them is not true constitutional government.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

Will not the government throw the responsibility on the amending house in that case?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

They cannot do so entirely. The people may turn round and say: "You brought it in this measure; you knew that we wanted this policy; the house of representatives supported you in passing it; if you did not get all you wanted, why did you not take all you could get? We wanted this system of direct taxation in substitution for protection (or it may be to get rid of direct taxation by establishing protection). We empowered you to do this thing. You brought in a bill to do it, and when the bill was amended, instead of getting all you could, you threw the bill under the table." Does not that put upon the ministry, and the house that supports them, a responsibility which, under no system of fair play, ought to be placed on their shoulders? I submit that is so. I do not wish to weary hon. members, and I would not have spoken at such length if I did not think it my duty to address myself to clauses so important as these; but I do impress upon this Convention that they should pursue the same course as was taken in Adelaide. I believe that the system proposed in this bill is one which, notwithstanding objections in some quarters, can, with proper safeguards be assented to. It may be as some hon. members have urged, that there should be put into it some provision to deal with deadlocks; but with proper safeguards I think the provisions of this bill can be accepted in each colony. There is a line of demarcation where, notwithstanding objections, the great advantages to be gained by federation will be deemed a sufficient reason for overlooking those objections. Let us adopt this course. Let us stand by this clause as it is, and by doing so we shall have made the longest step yet taken in the direction of gaining the great and noble end we are here to attain.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[5.27]:

As I was one of the South Australian members who, at the last sitting of the Convention, helped to shape this part of the bill as it now stands, and as that course was not indorsed by either of the houses of Parliament in South Australia, and knowing that you, sir, who occupy a deservedly high position as an authority on federation, have endeavoured to point out the danger of taking away this power of amendment from the senate, I trust I may be excused for detaining the House for a few moments in explaining my reasons for standing by the vote I then gave. Besides, if there is anything which should induce an hon. member to offer his opinions on this occasion, it is that this is probably the last meeting of the Convention. We are now engaged upon a most serious task; we are moulding the destinies of a nation. Although we may have before us the promise of a future which will fulfil our noblest aspirations, we must be careful that we do not leave impressions on the public mind as to the effect of a particular line of policy which may wreck the chances of that future. We have heard from the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest a very strong speech from the point of view which he has taken. I was exceedingly sorry to hear the hon. member say that the evident object of the representatives of the large states was to curtail and cut down the powers of the senate, and eventually practically to propose the sweeping away of that body. We had an opinion of the same kind.
reiterated by one of my colleagues, Sir John Downer, because he told us that the more we gave—the more we weakened the senate—the more was asked from us. Then we had the Hon. Mr. Moore, of Tasmania, stating that be feared the larger states, and that it was incumbent upon him to fight step by step rather than give way upon the question of conferring this power of amendment upon the senate. A conclusive answer to the statements of these hon. gentlemen is the fact that the compromise with regard to equal representation in the senate was made with the aid of the votes of the representatives of the largest colonies; and the Victorian Assembly, notwithstanding it was said that the concession had been made prematurely, affirmed the principle of equal representation in the senate. Their action upon that point was indorsed by societies through Victoria, formed principally with the object of achieving federation. I believe the vote given in this Convention during the last day or two by several of the Victorian delegates on the principle of equal representation was indorsed by the Victorian branch of the Australian National League; so that the allegation that if we give way now we are paving the way to ask for further concessions, does not stand the test of experience. Again, we have had from Sir John Downer - and it shows how mistaken historical analogies usually are - a repetition of an argument from analogy which, though of force as regards equal representation, is utterly inapplicable to the question of granting the upper house power to amend money bills. He pointed to the case of the confederated states. Those states undoubtedly kept up the power of amending money bills, but they went further. They gave the power of vetoing appropriations to their presidents. The constitution of the confederated states went even further than that. It took away from Congress the power of imposing protective duties - and the reason was the same in all cases - because they knew that up to that point the popular house had abused its powers of taxation. They sought for a check upon it. They thought they had found it in continuing the power of amendment of money bills to the upper house, and in imposing the additional checks of vetoing money bills, and in tying the hands of the Congress as to the power of imposing protective duties. The analogy does not apply, therefore, at all, and is utterly inadequate. Again, what do we find in America? The right hon. member, Mr. Reid, properly said that we cannot point to a single case of a consolidation constitution of the British type, in which the power of amending money bills is given to the upper house. But if we go to America what do we find? We find in many of the state constitutions, as well as in the Constitution of the United States itself, the power of amending money bills exists, and that power has been granted since 1864 in all cases where recasts of the constitutions have taken place. One of the reasons was to impose a check on the abuse of taxation by the lower house—a check, by the way, which the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, has shown to be utterly useless, owing to the way in which the Senate has fallen in with all the abuses of taxation during the last two years by the House of Representatives in America. But another reason exists, and it is one of great significance. In America they have not the principle of responsible government. The power of amendment was given to the Senate, because there was no ministry in parliament responsible for the estimates or for taxation power. Consequently they endeavoured to make up for this deficiency by giving a sort of checking power to the Senate. I am sustained upon that point by Mr. Bryce. Mr. Bryce, in his work on the American Constitution, states that where the estimates are in the popular house cut down, they always rely on the Senate replacing items which ought to be kept in. Under the British Constitution we know the ministry responsible for the estimates has to shift in such a case but there is no possibility of setting things right in America unless the senate has the power of amendment, or of replacing in the estimates items which have been struck out. Mr Bryce, explaining how it was that the power of amendment was given to the Upper House in America, said:

If the House cut down the estimates, they return it to the Senate, and beg it to restore the omitted items. If the Senate fail them, the only resource left is a deficiency bill next session.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
That really was because at the time the American Constitution was formed the exclusive right of the House of Commons in financial matters had not been thoroughly established!

Mr. GLYNN:
It is at all events a justification. Mr. Bryce goes further than saying it is merely a justification; he says it was one of the reasons for this power being granted in all state constitutions. Therefore, my allegation on that point was correct. But Bryce goes on to the point out that you cannot possibly have co-ordinate powers wherever there is responsibility to either one or two houses. We know that that applies to the British Constitution. We have at times the responsibility of the two houses, and we know this responsibility has led to continuous changes of ministries. He says:

The United States is the only great country in the world in which the two houses are really equal and co-ordinate. Such a system could hardly work, and, therefore, could not last if the executive were the creature of either or both, nor unless both were in touch with the sovereign people.
I go a step further, and I say that we cannot justify, as a matter of expediency, the denial of the power of amendment to the upper house. Why is it that the state should have this power? Is it not for giving expression in matters of taxation to their federal ideas. Is not the assumption that they have state interest separate from the consolidation interest, which must be expressed by giving this extraordinary power? There are, really, in matters of taxation no state interests at all. Taxation is really a consolidation matter. If a taxing bill were introduced into Parliament, the separation of the states would not be between large and small states, but the combination might include—for instance, under a protective tariff—South Australia and Victoria. Therefore, I fail to see where there is any necessity for the protection of state interests by giving this power of amendment. I believe that if this concession is not granted, we shall very largely endanger the prospects of federation, and for that reason I shall stick to the vote I gave in the Adelaide Convention.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[5.38]:

I am exceedingly anxious to get on with business, and I deplore the tendency to make long speeches. I do not think that I have taken up five minutes of the time of the Convention, for the very reason that I want to see business proceed. I do not say that I have anything to complain of those who have felt it absolutely necessary to enter into very long disquisitions of their views, but I protest that hon. gentlemen like Mr. Higgins, who discourses as much as anybody in the Convention, and possibly more, should taunt into speech those who, like myself, want to come to a vote as quickly as possible. The hon. member said he could not understand looking most pointedly at me how a liberal from South Australia could possibly vote with such conservative members as some of those who are going to be on the same side of the division as myself. I should like to know how he, who is always running a tilt against the Legislative Council in Victoria, can justify the vote he is presently going to give alongside the embodiment and chief champion of that house, Sir William Zeal. Let him explain his inconsistency, and then I think he will have a right to ask me to explain mine. I only desire to say one or two words. I have no reason to explain my vote at length, because I am going to vote the same way this time as I voted in 1891, the same way as I voted in 1897, and the same way as I shall always vote—in the interests of liberalism; because I regard the maintenance of the state entity as the safeguard of democracy. The hon. member talks about the senate as if it were going to be a rigidly conservative house. How can a house that is elected by manhood votes be a conservative house? The thing is too preposterous, and the hon. member must know it. There was an interjection from another hon. member from Victoria that because the number of votes of some of the states in the senate was to be larger than that of others, therefore it could not be representative of the popular will. I would ask how that would apply to the case of the Legislative Assembly in Victoria, where I understand the number of votes in some districts varies from 4,000 to over 20,000.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Not the votes, but the number of residents!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
The senate will be just as democratic a body as the house of representatives, and will be the special safeguard of democracy, because it will be the house which will be specially elected for the protection of autonomy, home rule, and the government of the people in the affairs they understand best.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The hon. member is going to vote in the same way as Mr. Dobson!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
The hon. member is tempting me to make a speech, but I will disappoint him. I am not going to speak on that subject. I only say that I will give the same vote in the interests of democracy as I have given on so many occasions. I believe in the government of the people by the people; but I think those on the spot best understand the conditions which suit their requirements, and the senate will be a house, a democratic house, elected to protect the opinions of those on the spot best understanding their requirements, and believing in local government, home rule, and autonomy, I will vote again as I did before.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales:
Sub-clause I, lines 3 and 4. Omit "the necessary supplies for the ordinary annual services of the Government;" insert "any part of the public revenues or moneys."

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH (Tasmania)[5.47]:
I think, sir, there is a further amendment suggested by the Tasmanian Assembly, but after the vote which has been taken I certainly shall not press that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN:
This is the amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
That is practically the same thing!
Amendment negatived.

The CHAIRMAN:
It is further proposed by the Legislative Council of South Australia to amend the paragraph by striking out the words but the senate may not amend any proposed law in such a manner as to increase any proposed charge or burden on the people.
   Amendment negatived.
   Sub-clause I agreed to.
   The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[5.47]:
   There may be some further discussion on this clause, but we cannot take it, as we are not going to sit after tea tonight.
   Progress reported.
   Motion (by Mr. BARTON) proposed:
   That leave be given to sit again tomorrow.
   The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[5.48]:
   I wish to ask the leader of the Convention if he will state plainly when he proposes to take two very important matters-clause 52 and the clause relating to the powers of the executive?
   The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[5.49]:
   I am perfectly willing to consult the feeling of the majority of the Convention as to the order in which we take important subjects. It is suggested that, tomorrow, the various suggestions which have been made to deal with conflicts between the two houses should be taken. That may take us some time tomorrow-possibly it may take us all day but, as we shall sit tomorrow night, we may reach some of the matters which the hon. member speaks of. I take it that by the end of tomorrow we shall probably have dealt with the constitution of each house, the powers in regard to money bills, and the provisions as to conflicts between the two houses; and we might well then take the legislative powers of the two houses and consider after that whether we shall go straight on with the bill in the ordinary way, or take the clauses relating to the executive.
   The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
   When shall we have the Finance Committee's report?
   The Hon. E. BARTON:
   I am not aware what the Finance Committee are doing, and, therefore, I can give no answer to my friend's question. But if the right hon. the Premier of Victoria is likely to leave on Saturday, I would suggest to the Finance Committee-and I think I can rely upon the right hon. gentleman's influence, under the circumstances, as a member of the committee-that they should take some means of accelerating their meetings in some such way that we shall have the financial clauses discussed before my right hon. friend leaves.
   The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER (South Australia)[5.51]:
   I would point out to the leader of the Convention that the preferable course would be to finish the constitutional questions. For instance the relations of the executive to the two houses is a most important question, and I should like to have an opportunity to address the Convention upon that question. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman, therefore, that we should finish the constitutional questions first before proceeding to consider the legislative powers of the houses.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[5.52]:

Really, I am not particularly conceited whether we take the executive clauses or the legislative clauses first. If my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, would be content to see the clauses taken in the order now suggested, I should be quite satisfied.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

I merely wished to know the order in which the clauses would come on!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

That being so I should be content to let the provisions as to the executive of the federation come on immediately after the question of deadlocks has been dealt with. I may mention to hon. gentlemen that, as was stated some days ago, it is proposed to sit tomorrow night, as well as in the daytime, and that a similar course will be taken on Friday.

Motion agreed to.

Convention adjourned at 5.53 p.m.
Wednesday 15 September, 1897

Petition-Notice of Motion-Finance Committee-Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITION.

The Hon. E. BARTON presented a petition from the Australasian National League, praying that when considering the clauses of the bill in detail, the Convention would make such amendments as would provide for the recognition of the Deity; for a system of effective voting in the election of the senate; for the limitation of the taxing powers of the federal parliament so that direct taxation may only be imposed in the event of war; and for the retention of the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

Petition received.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Mr. MCMILLAN gave notice that tomorrow he would move:

That the minutes of the proceedings of the Finance Committee appointed at Adelaide be printed.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE (South Australia):

Seeing that this Convention appointed a committee to deal with the financial problem, I should like to ask the Right Hon. G.H. Reid whether that committee has met; or, if not, when it intends to meet, to deal with this important subject?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales):

In answer to that question, I ask when the Convention will give us time to meet?

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee (consideration resumed from 14th September, vide page 539):

Clause 55. Appropriation and tax bills (vide page 481).

Paragraphs 2 and 3 agreed to.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and Assembly of Tasmania:

That the following new sub-clause follow paragraph 3:-"The law which appropriates the supplies for the ordinary annual services of the government shall deal only with the appropriation of such supplies."

Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[10.34]:

In supporting this suggested amendment, I would like to point out that it seems to have been accidentally omitted from the 1891 bill, and the importance of it is rendered obvious when one notices that in more than half of the constitutions of the states of America this clause has been inserted as a constitutional amendment, owing to the grave and increasing difficulties arising from the practice of tacking to appropriation bills measures not appropriate to such bills. In a few sentences if I may refer to a very valuable collection of comments on the American constitutions, published by the Johns Hopkins University-I may make my meaning clear. At page 29 of that article it is pointed that from 1867 forward the practice of legislating on appropriation bills became more and more common, mainly as a matter of convenience. The number of bills introduced into Congress is so large sometimes reaching 8,000 or 10,000— that it is almost impossible to obtain a hearing for any measure. But the appropriation bills must be passed, and it has become very common to place on them provisions enacting necessary laws which otherwise could not be reached on the calendar. Judge Reagan, of Texas, said in the House of Representatives that, between 1862 and 1875, 387 measures of general legislation had been passed as provisions upon appropriation bills. Ten years ago, the practice had become so objectionable that General Grant, in his message, December 1, 1873, advised an amendment of the Constitution which would prevent it, and this recommendation was recently renewed by President Arthur in his message of December 5, 1882. The House of Representatives also recognised the faulty nature of the practice and amended its rules so as to forbid legislation on appropriation bills except when it is germane to the subject of the bill and in the interest of economy.

President Hayes, in his message in 1879, also deals with this matter. He says:

The practice of tacking to appropriation bills measures not pertinent to such bills did not prevail until more than forty years after the adoption of the constitution. It has become a common practice. All parties when in power have adopted it. Many abuses and great waste of public money have in this way crept into appropriation bills. The public opinion of the country is against it. The states which have recently adopted constitutions have generally provided a remedy for the evil by enacting that no law shall contain more than one subject, which shall be plainly expressed in its title. The constitutions of more than half the states contain substantially this provision.

It seems to me that those words, written with authority—not only the authority of thinkers, but also the authority of practical statesmen, who have filled the highest posts in America—ought to convince us that we should take measures to guard against a danger which might become very serious.

Suggested new paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph 4 agreed to.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[10.37]:

I desire to ask the leader of the Convention if the intention of this sub-clause is that the senate shall have power to reject or amend a proposed law of this kind?

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.38]:

Not a law providing for the ordinary annual expenses.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Expenses other than the ordinary annual services?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The intention of this sub-clause, I take it, is this: The senate is not deprived of the power of amending appropriations, except in respect to the ordinary annual services of the Government. In order that it may have that power in full efficiency, it is intended by this subclause to confine the annual appropriation act to such matters as relate to the ordinary annual services of the government, so that appropriations apart from that may be dealt with in the ordinary way.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Loan bills, for instance?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It may be so.

Paragraph 5 agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 56 (Recommendation of money votes).

The CHAIRMAN:

Several amendments have been suggested on clause 56; but the question arises whether they are not inconsistent with clause 54, which we have passed. Under clause 54 it will be necessary that messages should be sent to the senate from the governor-general in some cases, because of the addition to the clause which we have made at the suggestion of Tasmania. It seems to me that we cannot now amend the clause as suggested, and therefore, unless otherwise desired, I shall not put the suggested amendments.

Clause agreed to.
The CHAIRMAN:
I understand that it is the wish of the Committee to now deal with the new clauses which make provision for the avoiding of deadlocks. I really do not know which of the suggestions that have been made to this end I should put to the Committee first.

The Hon. N.J. BROWN:
May I suggest that, if an amendment has been suggested which would bring the definite question whether any provision for the meeting of deadlocks is, in the opinion of a majority of this Committee desirable, it should be put first. There are some members of the Convention, adopt whom I am one, who desire to oppose in every way any suggestion in the shape of a referendum other than that, if any provision at all is necessary, which has been suggested by the Parliament of Tasmania.

The CHAIRMAN:
I was about to say that I have come to the conclusion that it would perhaps be advisable to put first the new clause suggested by the colony of New South Wales. Upon the first paragraph of the suggested new clause 57 a test vote may be taken as to whether there should or should not be a referendum. That paragraph commits us to nothing, because, as will be seen, it does not bring into operation any particular scheme.

Dr. QUICK:
Do I understand you to say, sir, that a division upon this question should be regarded as a test vote upon the referendum, or in regard to making provision against deadlocks? I think the first suggestion would be a rather restricted mode of debating the clause. This paragraph may be applicable either to a provision for a referendum or for a dissolution of the senate. Therefore I suggest that a division should be accepted as a test vote upon the general question whether there should or should not be a provision against deadlocks. Then the Convention can at a subsequent stage work out the problem as to what is the best mode of giving effect to their wishes.

The CHAIRMAN:
The hon. member is quite right. I ought to have said deadlock instead of referendum. This paragraph is consistent with almost any scheme suggested.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales:
Insert new clause to follow clause 56:-57.(a.) If either house of parliament shall, in two consecutive sessions of the same parliament, with an interval of at least six weeks between, pass and transmit to the other house for its concurrence therein any proposed law which such other house fails to pass without amendment, within thirty days after receiving the same, in the second session, or within such period passes, with any amendment not agreed to by the house transmitting the proposed law, the provisions of the following sections of this part shall apply.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[10.45]:

I do not intend to detain the Convention at any great length in support of this proposal, because I take it that our time is rather limited, and we desire in as short a space of time as possible to come to some final determination upon what may probably turn out to be the crux of the whole constitution. I have always from the moment that I contested a seat in this Convention placed above all other questions with regard to the constitution that which provides some means for getting an ultimate expression of the will of the majority of the people. Although I have opposed equal representation in the senate, I have always admitted that I would oppose it until the constitution provided some safety-valve. I say now that if a safety-valve is provided at this stage there will be found no stronger supporter of the bill, though it provides for equal state representation, than myself. But I have always hesitated to give my support to the principle of equal state rights before seeing in cold type in the bill itself a proposal which would deal effectually with the deadlocks which are bound to occur when you place power in the hands of two bodies elected upon a totally distinct basis. I take it that there will be no objection to my referring incidentally to the various proposals which have been made with this object, in order that I may justify my advocacy of one proposal rather than of another. Therefore, in the course of my remarks I intend to refer incidentally to the proposal for a dissolution, and to compare the efficacy of a provision of that character with the proposal which has emanated from the Assembly of New South Wales, and with the proposal which has emanated from the Victorian Parliament.

Mr. WISE:

I wish to take your ruling, sir, as to whether it would not be a more convenient course to debate, as you suggested from the chair just now, the question whether means should be provided for preventing deadlocks, without discussing the various methods which have been suggested to that end. I understand that your object inputting the amendment paragraph by paragraph was, that a vote should be taken on the first paragraph, which is common to every scheme suggested, which would enable the sense of the Committee to be ascertained as to whether it is necessary to provide any means for avoiding deadlocks. Otherwise, it seems to me, we shall have great confusion, and, perhaps, waste of time. I ask you, therefore, to rule whether hon. members will be in order in discussing the various means which have been proposed for avoiding deadlocks. Perhaps an expression of opinion from you would guide the Committee as to which would be the most convenient course.

Mr. SYMON:
I hope the discussion will not be limited in the way suggested by my hon.
and learned friend. It is true that upon this paragraph you cannot take any definite vote as to whether we should have a dissolution of the senate provided for under certain conditions, whether we should have that alone, or in conjunction with a subsequent referendum, or whether we should have the referendum alone without a previous dissolution; but we might be here a month if each of these matters were the subject of a separate debate.
It would be better to leave it open to us to express our views freely upon the possible methods of avoiding deadlocks between the chambers, and then the precise method to be chosen need not be debated again. With great defence to the views of the hon. and learned member, I think it would be better if we were to debate the whole question now as fully and as fairly as we can, dealing as briefly as possible with each of the methods proposed, before we decide whether they shall be taken concurrently or separately.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I agree with the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, that the wiser course would be to have a general discussion upon the whole matter, because there may be some members of the Convention who are now opposed to any means of preventing deadlocks, but who, after a full discussion, may see that some modification of the schemes which are proposed would be acceptable. I feel that if we are to be limited in this discussion we shall be somewhat in the dark; but if we have an all round discussion now it will be for the advantage of all of us.

The CHAIRMAN:
The procedure adopted in this Convention has been to take some clause, or some words in a clause, as a test concerning the largest and most important questions in the bill. I do not think I would be doing right to depart from that practice, and, therefore, I shall permit a general discussion upon this question of deadlocks and referendum upon this paragraph.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
I take it, therefore, that I will be quite in order in referring to the various proposals which have been submitted, especially if I refer to them incidentally. The burden of my speech will not have reference either to authorities or precedents, but rather to contemporaneous history. I think it will be far better if we come down to arguments which will commend themselves to the people of this country by reason of their practical experience, and the sentiments which they hold. I take it that the feeling is a growing one; that there is a consensus of feeling that in the constitution as framed there is bound to be conflict between the two houses.

Mr. SYMON:

No, we do not admit that!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

I take it that that opinion is one that is strongly growing, and we see evidence that there is no doubt about it. It is a contingency that a wise man would provide for so as to frame a constitution which will bend and not break. It would be a terrible state of affairs in future if we provided a constitution so rigid, that unconstitutional means would have to be adopted, by the people to give expression to their wishes. Surely wise men entrusted with the task of framing a constitution, to endure for all time for these great Australian colonies, would provide some constitutional means by which, in the face of inevitable conflict which is all the more inevitable here than elsewhere, on account of the amount of freedom which our people possess-legislative deadlocks may be ended, and the people themselves may give expression to their opinions. I have heard an opinion expressed that there is not so much fear with regard to the actual occurrence of deadlocks as there is a fear arising from the feeling of the people, who we that the constitution if; so framed as to take from themselves the power of expressing their will. A grievance will be created. We know that if we create a grievance, even an imaginary one, it is apt to rankle in the minds of the people. It is apt to promote agitation, to promote discontent, and generally to prevent that happiness which comes from a satisfied people. There is no doubt that the agitation, which is at the bottom of these recommendations, is one that is well grounded; that a grievance is being already felt. That grievance will be intensified if this Convention refuses, by any reasonable course, at grievance, or to attempt to remedy it.

I am one of those who have been extremely hopeful of the prospects of federation in this colony. The hon. member, Mr. Wise, expressed an opinion here that I am one of those who are giving way to the prejudices of this colony. I am always hopeful that New South Wales will in the voting lead in favour of federation; but whilst I have that hope, and being largely actuated by the desire to see that end accomplished I have always had this one fear that federation could be destroyed, and might be destroyed only by the Convention itself, and not by the people. As long as federation proceeds on the lines of trusting the people it is safe with the people, but the moment that federation is based on mistrust of the people then federation is in danger. I have never so distrusted this Convention as to fear that it would give the deathblow to the aspirations of the people we represent. I feel quite satisfied that if we make a fair, adequate, reasonable provision that will be sufficient. I emphasise the words "reasonable provision," because I want nothing that would tend to excite the fear of any reasonable men; but if reasonable provision is made, allowing the will of the people to effectually find expression, and to exercise its voice and power, the constitution will be one that will be acceptable to the people of this colony. If no provision of that character is made, then the people of this colony will express themselves as being content to wait until some reasonable provision is made for such a thing in the constitution. I fear that the opposition to this proposal largely comes from a conservative feeling. I use that expression knowing the full meaning of the term, with no desire to reflect on the different views held by a large proportion of members of this Convention; but I fear there will be a conservative opposition to any proposal for providing against deadlocks. I should like to point out to those who may have any conservative views, that we are always told that the senate is the body whose powers are being curtailed. We are always being told that these concessions and claims are all attacks upon the senate. I do not regard them as attacks upon the senate; but I regard the senate to be elected under this constitution, as being possibly and probably the more democratic of the two houses. I do not regard the senate as the bulwark of the constitution against the encroachments of democracy, and the advance of the tide of liberalism. I regard it as more than possible that the democratic house of the federation will be the senate, for this reason: that, if there is any wave of popular feeling, any sentiment arising from a conflict which largely moves the masses of the people in which house will the wave exercise the greatest influence? Surely, in a house elected by the people of the whole colony, rather than in the house elected by various constituencies where local feelings, requirements and desires, and local likes and dislikes will have full sway. I undertake to say that if during the maritime strike of 1890 we had this constitution in force, and the two houses were elected by the people, one of those houses would have been captured by the wave of feeling which passed all over Australia, and that it would not have been the house of representatives. It would have been the senate. With election by the whole colony as a constituency, and with one man one vote, that election is likely to go in one way. Waves of popular excitement will have fuller force, and will be given fuller effect to in the senate. The localism which will come into play in the election of members of the house of representatives will do much to break down the unanimity of the expression of popular opinion, but it will not have full play in the election of members of the senate. Therefore, I feel that those who may have some lingering ideas that it is necessary to hedge in the senate with restrictions, and that it will be a conservative institution, may disabuse their minds. The qualification of one man one vote, with single constituencies, will have the effect of making the senate the radical house of the two. I do not base my desire to have the referendum, or other provisions for a deadlock, on any plea or pretext of governing one house more than another. I contend that the house of representatives is just as likely as the senate at times to attempt to thwart the popular will it is just as likely to be in the wrong as the other, and the people will take up the side of the house which happens to be voicing their opinions. I do not care which house it may be which is standing against the tide or current of public opinion, that house should not have the power ultimately to mould the destinies of the commonwealth. I am aware that a large number of people favour a dissolution as a remedy. I am one of those who believe that the power to dissolve both houses may be very effectual as a means of preventing deadlocks, not of ending them; that this dissolution, threateningly held over one house or the other, may have the effect of preventing a deadlock, of prevent-committed to their charge. Therefore, the result of an appeal in a case of that kind will be that, instead of the deadlock being ended, we will have the deadlock continued, each side fortified by what it will take to be a ratification of its conduct, a ratification of its vote, each side encouraged to persist in the attitude which has led up to the deadlock, and the commonwealth will have to endure for years to come, until there is another dissolution, or until there is a change of popular opinion, and state opinion—we will have to endure the continuance of that evil which a dissolution is proposed to end. As a means of influencing the legislative bodies to prevent deadlocks from occurring, a dissolution may be a very valuable thing; but as a means of ending them, I attach no importance whatever to it. The proposal of the Victorian legislature is practically a referendum, in which again the states are recognised, and the bodies whose representatives have entered into conflict, an appeal is made by referendum, not to the great mass of the people of the commonwealth, but to the people representing the states again.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is not a referendum at all!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
Exactly. We will have no ending of the deadlock by a referendum of that character. We may have a vast majority of the people of the commonwealth voting for the proposed law, and yet that majority must give way to a minority who happen to represent a majority in the various states, that is a majority in a majority of the states. And we may see, as a result of the referendum, that a majority of the people will have to put up with their verdict being set aside by a vote of a minority of the people. Better to have no referendum at all than that, because that will only intensify the feeling in the minds of the people that the constitution is one which inflicts upon them a wrong, and that they have to endure a grievance. If the people are asking for bread do not offer them a stone. Better to make no provision rather than to make inadequate provision. Better to let time, with the growth of popular opinion, cause the experience which will institute the remedy rather than to offer an inadequate remedy at the present moment. The proposal made by the New South Wales legislature is broadly one in which there are safeguards.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The South Australian proposal!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
I do not want to go through all of them.
An H It is the alternative one!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

The Tasmanian proposal is one which commends itself very much to my mind. I was astonished to find a proposal of that liberal character coming from that colony, not that I feel that no liberal proposal will come from that colony, but it is one in which the evidence is given of a desire on the part of that colony to have some provision in the constitution which will end these deadlocks, and not a provision which, necessarily, would favour that colony. I think it will be universally admitted that the proposal of the Tasmanian Parliament cannot, by any means, be characterised as one likely to favour Tasmania more than any other colony; it is one which is more likely to sacrifice the interest of the state of Tasmania than otherwise. Therefore, it should be a matter for congratulation that a proposal of that kind has emanated from that colony. The New South Wales proposal is one which is safeguarded by many provisions showing the reasonable character of it. First of all a proposed law must be passed or dealt with in two sessions of the same parliament, that is two sessions not merely with an interval of a day between them, not merely sessions rushed forward by a government in order to carry out its purpose, but two sessions with a reasonable interval between them; and opportunities are provided for due deliberation and a conference between the two houses until at last the matter is remitted to the electors of the commonwealth, and if a verdict is given against the proposed law, it cannot be reconsidered for a period of three years. Having regard to the broad question of the referendum, I hold that the people are more to be trusted by an appeal of this character than they are by an appeal which takes the form of a general election. At a general election the issues will always be clouded. Party conflicts occur, and in many cases men, not measures, are considered. In our local contests, and I dare say the delegates from all the colonies will concur in what I say in this respect, men are returned, not so much on account of the measures they support, as on account of their personal popularity. We have men, belonging to the same party, who on great questions hold divergent views. Yet we cannot say that the views held by a majority of their constituents are divergent. With the referendum, we have the possibility of a clear-cut issue being submitted to the people, not with an election going on, not with any of that agitation which, perhaps, at a general election, causes men's reasons to be overclouded; but after full discussion has taken place in the legislature, after a discussion, not of a sudden or short nature, but extending over a protracted period. When the press and the statesmen of the colonies have had full opportunity to shed light on the question to the people, when the fairest and fullest discussion and utmost deliberation have taken place, then the people themselves will have the opportunity to express their opinion on that one question without the distracting influences of party politics or of personalities. Experience in other countries where the system is in operation in fact the experience which comes to us in our own colony where we have had some operation of this system in various matters goes to show that the quiet reasoning and thought of the people finds expression on an appeal by means of the referendum. I have no fear in my own mind that the referendum will ever be used as an engine for violent or revolutionary measures. I believe the voice of a nation is largely framed by the firesides of the homes of the people, and not by the clamour of those whom we may call noisy agitators.
It is not always noise and sound that expresses the will of the people. Experience shows that in Switzerland the referendum has been always rather against the agitation which was supposed to be the popular political agitation. It has always been the reasonable, calm judgement of the people, who in their own methodical manner, in their own homes, and by discussion amongst their neighbours, have formed their opinions and expressed them calmly and reasonably. A referendum of this character is proposed by the legislature of New South Wales. It will allow the expression of the will of the majority of the people only after reasonable efforts have been made to arrive at a conclusion between the legislative bodies, without any undue haste or exciting influence, and we shall have nothing to fear from its results. I say, in conclusion, that if we cannot trust the people as the final arbiters of the destiny of the commonwealth, then the time is nor ripe for federation. It is useless for us to attempt to federate a people whom we are not prepared to trust with the ultimate shaping of their own destinies, and it would be better for us to wait until that time comes than attempt to temper federation by any mistrust of the people. As Gladstone once said, all true reforms spring from the people. The people are generally truer exponents of the march and trend of civilisation than are politicians. Surely in cases of conflict, when the people have to endure the wrong of unwise and bad laws, the people may be trusted to have a voice in the shaping of those laws when their representatives fail to agree. I hope the result of our deliberations will ingraft upon the constitution some proposal which will satisfy the people that there is safety in it—that there is no attempt in any way to form a constitution so rigid that it must break against the will of the people. I am satisfied the reasonable voice of the Convention will result in some satisfactory solution, and if that solution is arrived at there will be found no heartier and more enthusiastic advocate of the bill than myself; and on every, occasion, both in the Parliament of New South Wales and before the people, I shall be found advocating the adoption of the bill as it leaves the Convention.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales)[11.13]:

I feel that we have reached a very important stage of our proceedings, although I, personally, would not have been one to have brought up this question of deadlocks in any shape whatever. It seems to me, however, that the advantage of this preliminary debate is to thoroughly study the conditions surrounding the bill as we have it at the present stage, and the principles which must underlie any proposal of deadlocks whatever. I hold that the bill as constructed has, to a certain extent, gone as far as any bill possibly can go to obviate the possibility of deadlocks. On the other hand, I am not so foolish as to say that deadlocks are not possible that differences between two houses will not occur, and will not go to an extreme point of tension. At the same time, we must recollect that all responsible government, all constitutional government as understood by British people, is based upon the same principle and the same feelings which have actuated the members of this Convention—mutual conciliation, mutual compromise and patriotism on the part of all; and we must be very careful when we have got a constitution framed, which has a number of checks, which deals fairly with all the rights and privileges of states and populations—we must be very careful when we have got a nicely adjusted and well-balanced constitution that we do nothing that is not absolutely necessary to introduce into it those mechanical arrangements which may be used, not when the necessity arises, but to create that very necessity. There is such a thing as manufacturing a deadlock; and we must be careful, too, that we do not destroy those checks upon government—those checks which every people, if it is wise, will have upon any popular legislature, which may under a certain set of circumstances be as tyrannical as any Czar of Russia. We must recollect, as I said, that we are dealing with a constitution based essentially on the British Constitution, and the British Constitution, as we have it now, has practically in its essential working, only one veto. That is to say, the Crown has practically given up its power of veto, and the only checks you have upon unwise legislation, upon the sudden passion of any particular house, is the check of another house under a system of bicameral government.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

And the principle is that they must give way at a certain point!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I am coming to that. When I had the honor of attending the Convention of 1891, and also when I was speaking in Adelaide, I referred very incidentally to the character of the senate as a second revising chamber, and I found that met with very little consideration at the hands of some hon. gentlemen; but I was glad to see that my hon. friend, Mr. Deakin, in his speech, laid great stress upon that view of the senate as a second revising chamber. In the United States of America every law has to run the gauntlet of three forces: It has to go through the House of Representatives, it has to go through the senate, and it has finally to run the gauntlet of the President. I am quite aware that there is a machinery there to prevent any absolute deadlock between the President and the houses of parliament, but there is nothing to prevent a deadlock between the two houses of parliament. Therefore, as we have no supreme, almighty president, such as they have in America, but the representative of the constitutional sovereign the only check we have on hasty legislation, the only check which the people of the country have upon the tyranny of the house of representatives, is the check of another chamber; and we must be very careful that, while allowing for those extreme cases, we do not do anything to weaken that great necessary check on our government.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Who is to say whether it is or is not tyranny in a number of instances?

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
The ministry of the day!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
We have in this constitution of ours I think wisely—but in contradistinction from that of the United States of America increased the term of the house of representatives to three years. Hon. members are aware that in the United States of America the term is only two years; they are practically reduced to two sessions extending over about fifteen months. Now you might have such a state of affairs as that a house at the end of two years—we have had a case of that kind in our colony might so change from a variety of circumstances, whether corrupt or not I will not say—that the result might be that, having one year yet to run, it might absolutely misrepresent the public opinion of the country. We must be very careful that, even if the two houses come to a deadlock you have some provision at any rate that is one of the first principles I want to see introduced—for a dissolution of the lower house before anything is done to deal with such a state of affairs.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
And the upper house, too!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I will come to that afterwards. In the proposal of the New South Wales legislature we have this: that you can have a bill passed through one session of Parliament, the same bill may be passed through another session, and before there is a dissolution it has to go to the referendum.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
   It does not necessarily go to the referendum at all!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
   Not if the two houses ultimately agree. It is the last resort.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
   It is not automatic!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
   I understand that you come to your final resort before the ordinary means of dissolution.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
   You may come to it!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
   The hon. member says that he would rather trust the people with the referendum than have an ordinary dissolution. Now, we hear a great deal about this trusting of the people. I trust the people as well as does the most extreme democrat here or elsewhere; but I find that the most difficult thing in the world is to get at the opinion of the people. We know that even in the election for this Convention it was very difficult, and had it not been for certain circumstances to which I shall not refer, we should probably not have had one half the number of votes recorded which were recorded in this colony. I would much rather trust to the lapse of time, to the friction of public opinion, and the introduction of new life blood into the chamber after a dissolution, for arriving at some reasonable compromise in the matter in dispute, than resort to this hard-and-fast principle of the referendum, sending to the people, perhaps, a complex piece of legislation which not one person in a thousand understands. We must recollect this and it cannot be too clearly understood that with the exception of some remote state in the United States of America, which the erudition and research of the hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, has discovered, this principle of referendum has not been the means of arbitration between the two houses of parliament. I am referring to the ordinary individual, who has not ransacked all history on the question; I am speaking of the man in the street, and I say that in all the cases we have before us dealing with the referendum as a principle the principle underlying it is this: not that the people should come in to arbitrate between the two houses, which are supposed to agree between themselves, and to be able to compromise, but that the people are to have the final veto, if so desired, in all legislation, whether agreed to by the two houses or not. I want us to be perfectly certain of what we are doing in this matter. I hold that it is a reasonable attitude for those who think that this bill might go to the country without any solution of this deadlock difficulty, to stand in the position of saying, "We cannot conceive, at the present moment, of anything which would contravene the principles of constitutional government as we understand them, and we leave it to those who desire some rigid mode of dealing with this question to solve the difficulty for us." As far as I am personally concerned, I am quite willing to give my adhesion to anything that would be an ultimate safety-valve, so long as it cannot be used as a scourge by one house against the other; but there are certain principles which must be adhered to in any scheme which is proposed. Now, what are the general conditions surrounding deadlocks? In the first place, there is some question on which there has been a large amount of debate, and perhaps of conference, in which there is some underlying principle upon which one house thinks it cannot compromise any more, and you have this question to be decided ultimately by public opinion. Now, if you want the question decided by public opinion, if it be such a difficult question that level-headed men in the two houses cannot come to some compromise upon it, it is essentially such a knotty question that it will require time to elucidate and unravel it. In dealing with questions between the senate and the house of representatives, we are too much inclined to imagine that we have before us the House of Lords, or the Legislative Council of one of these colonies. I say that there is no analogy between the two cases. If you were going to deal with the British Constitution, and if you were going to sustain the House of Lords, you would not give it any veto at all; it represents only a class. We must have all the elements of delay. Therefore, it does seem to me that, as a matter of delay in getting at public opinion, and before going to any extreme step outside the ordinary constitutional methods in this system of dealing with deadlocks, we should first have it assured, before it is put into operation, that the lower house shall be dissolved. It is said, "Is this not a clumsy way of dealing with the matter? Is it not hard to dissolve a house of assembly which is doing good work simply because it is at issue with the upper chamber upon one particular point?" I revert back to my original principle, that you must take it for granted that legislation will proceed upon ordinary lines that the members of both houses will do their duty, and that this device is only to meet extreme cases, and, as a rule, it will be some innovation in regard to which it will be better either to hold the matter over for a general dissolution, even though you put the country to a trifling expense, than to bring into operation the drastic elements connected with a deadlock cure. Now, I do not think I have any more to say on the principle of the matter—the only matter which it will be very difficult to decide in dealing with the question from a federal point of view—and I have only dealt with it up to the present from the point of view of a second chamber, as a check upon legislation. But it will be a difficult question to decide from a federal point of view, because the question is, how are you going to test public opinion? Are you going to test it by the opinions of the states as states, or are you going to reduce it to a popular vote? If you reduce it to a block popular vote, what do you do in effect? It maybe justifiable under the circumstances. You may say that you must have some safety-valve in this constitution, but that safety-valve is only used by destroying the principles of federation. You simply say, "This federation is a beautiful scheme; but it is essentially artificial, and being so artificial there is a possibility of danger arising in this direction. and if we are going to leave a safety-valve by which to escape from this danger sooner than have a revolution because that is the way I look at it; I look at it that there is a certain stage at which we may arrive, under some possible circumstances in which we must either, according to these gentlemen, appeal to the popular vote, or we must have a dissolution of the federal union—if you come to that point, then it depends to a great extent upon the grouping of these entities and their particular characteristics. You might have this position: that after a while there might be more population in one state than in all of the rest put together that is a possibility and the popular vote might be simply the vote of one colony. That is a thing you have most carefully to consider.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Do you ever find the population of one colony all of one way of thinking?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Then you must recollect this, that the possibility of danger, which is foreseen by many, is the danger of a conflict essentially on a matter of what is called state right. You must be very careful in dealing with that danger, because if you manufacture a system of deadlock, which will absolutely kill the principle of federation, the very putting into force of that deadlock might lead to revolution. Therefore all I want to guard against, all I want to impress upon this Convention—and it comes from one who does not pretend to a very deep philosophical study of the question all I want to impress upon those who have sufficient originality to propose a scheme, which I have not, is that it must be so framed as to include delay, so framed that it will not abandon the checks on government which we are creating in the main part of this bill, so framed that it will be able, when you get the vote, to get at the real opinion of the country, and in every way surrounded by prudent and wise restrictions, so that it will be felt by the states as entities that you are only doing this as a last resort, and as one of the necessities inherent in an artificial federation.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria)[11.35]:

The observations of the hon. member who has just sat down are of a most valuable character, and are no doubt entitled to the greatest weight. He himself admits the great necessity for some provision for settling deadlocks, because he suggests that some safety-valve ought to be provided in this constitution, and then, instead of endeavouring to solve the question, he went on to raise difficulties, and sat down without proposing any solution at all. It reminds one of the hon. gentleman's treatment of the financial difficulty, which he pronounced as an insoluble problem. Now he pronounces this question of deadlocks almost an insoluble problem.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Oh, no, I do not—that is not fair!

Dr. QUICK:

I think the Convention is entitled, from a gentleman of his ability and experience, and a gentleman who assumes to lead the Convention, to more than that.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I would remind my hon. friend that I did not give any concrete view of my opinions; but I am inclined to accept a double proposal that has been made-first, the proposal of my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Wise, by which you will get a dissolution of the senate-and that is going a long way from my principles—a dissolution of the senate in case of a deadlock, followed ultimately, if the result left you exactly where you were, by a national referendum.

Dr. QUICK:

I am very glad indeed that I have elicited from the hon. member that very instant expression of opinion. I have always attached great weight to the views of the hon. gentleman, and I think we were entitled to an explicit statement of his opinion, and not merely a criticism of the opinions of others. With reference to myself, I have, unfortunately, been accused of being an ardent federationist, and, indeed, a federationist at almost any price. Well, I beg to deny that accusation. There are three great conditions upon which I have been for some time past advocating federation, and upon which I have been prepared to advocate it here and support it in the country. The first condition is that the parliament of this federation should be elected upon a popular basis, and I should not be willing to accept any federal legislature which was not created upon the vote of the people. The second condition is that the senate of this federal parliament should not have the power of amending money bills, and the third is that there should be provision in this constitution for the settlement of disputes and deadlocks between the two houses. I draw attention to this fact: that this constitution which we have now created, or almost created, has resulted in the formulation of an upper house or senate, or second chamber, which will be based upon the popular support, which will be founded upon a franchise equal to the franchise of the so-called popular chamber.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

More than equal!

Dr. QUICK:

It cannot be more than equal, because the senate is now to be elected on the same basis as the house of representatives.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

No!

Practically the same. I say that by so doing we have done quite right. I know of no method by which we ought to create a senate or an upper house, except by providing that it shall be duly elected by the people. For my part I do not believe in a nominee house, and I do not believe in an upper house elected on a partial suffrage. But, unfortunately, the necessity for yielding to that important principle inevitably brings into existence two houses which are practically co-ordinate, with the exception of equal control over money bills, and that leads to this result, that having called into existence two strong houses, and especially a senate the like of which will not be found in any constitution that is in existence, or has ever been in existence in the world, we ought to make provision for great, important, probably historical, occasions when those co-ordinate houses may be brought into serious conflict. I do not suggest that such a conflict would arise on trivial occasions. No doubt on matters of minor importance those two co-ordinate or equal houses would be able, and ought to be able, to settle their differences without resort to any novel machinery in the constitution; but, still, we must contemplate the possibility on great occasions of grave and important disputes arising between the two houses. Now, in an ordinary constitution, where we have an upper house not elected by the people, or not elected on the same basis as the lower house, that second chamber would be disposed to yield to the pressure of the lower chamber elected upon a popular basis; but here, where we are creating a senate which will feel the sap of popular election in its veins, that senate will probably feel stronger than a senate or upper chamber which is elected only on a partial franchise, and, consequently, we ought to make provision for the adjustment of disputes in great emergencies. I may be said that this is a novel expedient—a novel experiment—that we are now proposing what does not exist in any previous constitution. Should that prevent us from resorting to any machinery or to the adoption of any provision to meet the great emergencies of the constitution which we are creating? Surely we are here as reasonable constitution-builders, and we ought not to be appalled by the fact that no previous constitution contains an exact equivalent, although I am not at all sure that such a provision does not exist, because I believe that something of the kind does exist in the Constitution of South Australia, in a modified form.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Dissolution?

Dr. QUICK:

A modified dissolution. I am not discussing the details of the various methods, but some method—some principle. Therefore, I say that we ought to approach this question unembarrassed by the reflection or the suggestion that we are now asking to introduce novel expedients and new experiments, because I say that this constitution is without parallel in the history of federal government at any rate, without parallel in the constitution of a senate. We are creating, as I said before, a popular senate a senate which will, probably, be stronger than the Senate of the United States stronger not, perhaps, in its actual powers, or in its actual functions, but stronger in its creation, stronger in its origin, and in its title to the exercise of power—and, consequently, it might feel even more disposed to resist the house of representatives on a great occasion than would the Senate of the United States, which is nominated by the legislature. Any body, any legislative chamber elected by the people will necessarily feel stronger than a body or a senate which is not elected by the people, and that fully justifies resort, in this constitution, to, some special provision. Consequently, I strongly support the view put forward by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, that some provision of a reasonable character ought to be made in this constitution for those great occasions which we are considering; and in this I confess that I am not actuated by my own views alone. Probably, if I had a strong view in this direction, unsupported by the public outside, and unsupported by the various Australian legislatures, I would be disposed to waive that view; but whatever view I have had throughout this federal contest, or throughout this federal movement, it has been fortified and strengthened ten fold by the expressions of public opinion which have taken place in four of the Australian colonies since the adjournment of the Convention. Any suggestion that was made at the Adelaide Convention in favour of the settlement of deadlocks has been fortified, I say, by the Australian legislatures, and we cannot ignore the almost unanimous concurrence of those legislatures. We do not have to rely on the opinion of the parliament of New South Wales, or of Victoria, or even of South Australia, because the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania has gone to the extent of admitting that some provision ought to be made in this constitution for the settlement of deadlocks.

The Hon. N.J. BROWN:
No

Dr. QUICK:
I say emphatically, yes.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
Only if amendment is needed!

Dr. QUICK:
I need scarcely draw attention to the amendment that appears on this paper, suggested by the legislature of Tasmania a very important suggestion. I am not minimising it, but am mentioning it as evidence that the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania thought that some such provision ought to be made.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
That if there is to be such a provision, then this should be the one!

Dr. QUICK:
I do not regard that "if" is very important. It is quite plain that the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania saw, and a very careful perusal of the debates has driven me to the conclusion that the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania felt absolutely convinced, that some provision would have to be made in this constitution for the settlement of deadlocks, and they have submitted a proposal which they thought would be accompanied or surrounded by the least difficulties or dangers. I am not trying to minimise the suggestion, but am mentioning it as evidence of the overwhelming development of public opinion in favour of some such provision being made in this constitution.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Where is the overwhelming development?

Dr. QUICK: I must say that I have been strongly influenced by the opinion expressed, especially in the legislatures of New South Wales, South Australia, and Victoria.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL: Not Victoria!

Dr. QUICK:
Most decidedly, Victoria.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
The Legislative Council of Victoria were against it!

Dr. QUICK:
The legislature of Victoria, representing the people of Victoria, has submitted two important suggestions.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
Not the Legislative Council!

Dr. QUICK:
No, the Legislative Assembly. Of course I would not expect any suggestion of the kind to come from the Legislative Council of Victoria, because it has always resisted any settlement of deadlocks. But I do not wish to be drawn into a discussion with my hon. friend.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
But the hon. gentleman said the legislature of Victoria!

Dr. QUICK:
I think that I have said enough to suggest to the Convention that something ought to be done. I do not advocate it merely on theoretical grounds. I will be willing to waive any opinion that I have formed on the subject on theoretical grounds, because in helping to build this constitution we have to deal with real political forces outside this Convention.

Mr. SOLOMON:
Why should the hon. member try to manufacture any public opinion outside?

Dr. QUICK:
I have done nothing of the kind. At the Adelaide Convention I did not say a single word about deadlocks, because, whilst willing to vote for any reasonable provision that could be brought forward, I was waiting for the development of public opinion. I did not do anything to create public opinion; but I am bound to confess that a strong body of public opinion has been created in these colonies, especially in Victoria and New South Wales, which leads me to despair of being able to carry this constitution unless it contains some machinery of a reasonable character which will enable us to settle deadlocks. For my part, I am not wedded to any particular scheme. I am willing to accept any reasonable proposal that will enable an adjustment of difficulties and disputes between the two houses to be made.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It was very kind of the hon. member to ask me for a scheme!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The hon. member, Mr. McMillan, might retort, and ask the hon. member, Dr. Quick, for his scheme!

Dr. QUICK:
Well, I will tell the hon. member, I have been very much impressed by the scheme put forward by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, and I have been willing to accept that.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Well, then, I will not ask the hon. member to state his!

Dr. QUICK:
I will vote for the scheme proposed by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, and also that suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
Vote for all of them!

Dr. QUICK:
And I will also be willing, to vote for a double dissolution, as suggested by those two legislatures.

Mr. SYMON:
Will the hon. gentleman accept a double dissolution as final?

Dr. QUICK:
I am willing to accept a double dissolution as final, if that is all I can get; but, undoubtedly, I shall vote for the referendum in the various forms in which it has been recommended by the legislatures of New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia; and, if I cannot get the referendum, I shall be willing to accept a double dissolution.

The Hon. N.J. BROWN (Tasmania)[11.50]:
Having done some violence to my opinions with regard to one important matter in connection with the powers of the senate, the power to amend money bills, I am one of those who are not disposed to still further whittle down the powers of a body which may be viewed as a most necessary part of the constitution. Had the power to amend money bills been given to the senate as originally proposed, I think it is extremely probable that I should be found voting with those who think it necessary that some measure should be adopted to prevent disagreement between the two houses. But the power to amend money bills having been taken from the senate, it appears to me that there can be no reasonable cause assigned for still further interfering with that body as proposed.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The senate will have power to reject a money bill!

The Hon. N.J. BROWN:

Yes; and that suggests to me a point to which I will refer presently. The hon. member, Mr. Carrouthers, surprised me very much by referring to the two bodies which we are creating as resting upon a totally different basis. I think those were the words he used. Now, surely, it is recognised upon all hands that it has never yet been proposed in any constitution, in any part of the world, that there should be two houses resting more definitely and decidedly upon the same basis.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The hon. member will have eight votes in the senate as against our one!

The Hon. N.J. BROWN:

I think the hon. member had better not raise that question again. He might rest satisfied with his defeat upon the point, and accept the fact that there is at all events a preponderance of opinion in the Convention in favour of what is absolutely right and fair in the matter. I will just say, however, that supposing under any circumstances which may be imagined five men, two large men and three small men, found themselves upon an island, and they wanted to come to an agreement to settle everything as to which there might be a difference of opinion between them by argument and reason, the three small men would be justified in desiring that it should be laid down as a preliminary principle that they should at all events be allowed to live, the two big men being powerful enough to pitch the three small men, and three or four other small men into the sea if they choose to do so. That is my reply to the hon. member's interjection. I wish now to refer to a statement made by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, as to the feeling which has prompted this demand for a provision against deadlocks resting upon the experience of the people of this colony, and he referred specially to the people of this colony. He alluded, of course, to the differences which have occurred from time to time between the Legislative Council of New South Wales, and the more representative house of assembly. Similar disputes, as we know, have occurred in all the colonies from time to time; but I have wondered from the very, commencement of these discussions that the popular delusion, that the senate which we are about to create will be similar to any of the legislative councils now in existence in these colonies, has been not only not denied by those who know better, but has been fostered and promoted by public speakers and by writers in the public press. The people who have not the time to investigate these matters so fully as others who have studied these constitutional questions, have been absolutely misled and misinformed, and, if I may use the word without offence, to some extent gullied into the belief that the senate will be, like some hostile foreign body, engaged from day to day in Plotting against the liberties and the rights of the people. But what is there more absurd than to suppose that a senate such as we are about to create, elected by the free votes of the people of the whole of the Australian colonies, would be composed of men who would act in that way?

The Hon. S. Fraser: They would not dare to act in that way!

The Hon. N.J. Brown: It would seem as though a few hon. members of the Convention, and many people outside, expect that the senate will be composed of madmen, or lunatics, or tyrants, instead of being composed, as we may fairly expect, it to be, of reasonable men. This being so, seeing that the demand for some provision against deadlocks is based so largely upon misunderstanding and delusion as to the position which the senate will probably take up, and seeing that it is based upon a misunderstanding of the constitutional position of the two houses of legislature, I hope that instead of fostering and encouraging the feeling that a provision of this kind is necessary, steps will be taken to remove it, so that the bill will recommend itself to the people of the colonies generally without any such provision. The hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, pointed out that the senate would in its nature be democratic that he believes that if at the time of the unfortunate maritime strike it had been necessary or desirable to dissolve it, the great wave of violent feeling which then made itself felt all over Australia, would have found expression in the return of men favouring the views of the more violent amongst us. Seeing then that according to the hon. member's own admission the senate will be so amenable to public opinion, surely we might rest content with the provision that makes it necessary for half of the members of the senate to go before the country every three years, because in that way public opinion upon any important matter will make itself felt in the senate. I also deprecate very much the idea which is favoured in some quarters that, supposing it is necessary to appeal to the people on any question in dispute between the two houses, a time when the people are inflamed by passion and prejudice should be the time at which that appeal should be made. If anything of the kind is decided by a majority of the Convention to be necessary I hope that ample provision will be made for time to intervene, so that it will not be the hastily formed and unreliable public opinion, so called, which will find expression, but the matured judgment and common-sense of the people generally. There is no doubt that the demand for mechanical means for settling disputes between the two houses must have the effect of removing the responsibility for legislation from the shoulders of the representatives to the people themselves, and to that extent it would be mischievous in destroying the sense of responsibility in the representatives of the people, I should like to correct the hon. and learned member, Dr. Quick, in regard to his statement about the amendment suggested by the Tasmanian Parliament. I voted against that amendment. I was not sorry it was carried. It wa

Dr. QUICK:
I have read the debates in Hansard!

The Hon. N.J. BROWN:
I think I speak with more authority than does the hon. member on that point, because I had several conversations with Mr. Inglis Clark on the subject. He has more than once assured me, on the grounds that I have endeavoured to lay before the Convention and I admit that he would have stated them more clearly, and with more force, than I can that he does not think any remedy against deadlocks is required. But if such a remedy is decided to be necessary, if a majority of the Convention thinks that the suggestion should be submitted, for my part I will have very much pleasure in supporting it. I was very glad, indeed, to find that all that is desired is to have the electors of the various states consulted on matters of dispute. I am very glad to find that the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, has expressed approval of that suggestion. If a majority of the Convention decide, and I hope they will not decide, that anything of the kind is necessary, I shall be compelled to support the suggestion which has come from the Tasmanian legislature.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[12.21]
I listened with much instruction to a speech made by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, and that made by the hon. member, Mr. McMillan. Whilst listening to the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, I have always recognised the difficulty of defining what is a tory and what is a radical. I always thought that hon. gentleman was called a radical. Some people occasionally say I am a conservative in my tendencies.

An Hon. MEMBER:
So say all of us!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I am pleased to hear the hon. member say so.
The Hon. S. FRASER:

There are six species in Australia!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Now I find, after listening to the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, that the danger of the present constitution is that the result will be to establish a senate more radical than the house of representatives.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

That is quite possible!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

That is what he said. The hon. gentleman, Mr. Carruthers, developing the tory instincts which are always latent in your radical, who becomes a tyrant the moment he gets an opportunity, immediately shifts his ground, and shows what our true relative positions are, and I find that I am the radical and that he is the conservative. I am not a bit anxious myself about this senate being too radical under the provisions of this bill. I am not at all satisfied that the public opinion which gets inflamed, but generally locally inflamed it is generally a fire confined to a town or two, and the blaze does not extend to the whole state I am not afraid that this blaze, however fatal and destructive in its local operation, will extend throughout the whole commonwealth. I am satisfied that the better and calmer atmosphere which you get by spreading the area of selection, will produce results, not so destructive as, from a radical point of view, my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, seemed to think. Again, I was delighted with the speech of the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, because he supplied us with every argument necessary to show the absolute needlessness of any of these provisions. He did more than that; he came to a conclusion diametrically opposed to his arguments, and after showing us, with conclusive logical reasoning that delighted every man in this Convention, that this provision went to the very root of the federal principle, and, whilst preventing inconvenience, caused the destruction of the constitution, he concluded by saying, at last, that he would support a general referendum to the whole people. Do not hon. members see that here we have a fair instance of the way in which the larger populations might, under certain circumstances, treat the smaller ones? Here we have a man of the highest character showing us that we are clearly in the right, showing with a force of reasoning not to be surpassed in Australia, that the position we have maintained throughout is the logical and true position, but then saying, "You had better give in, and you must give in, and I am going to vote for the very thing which I have shown you logically you ought never to agree to."
An Hon. MEMBER:-

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
He finished up after all this by telling us that, although we are right, still we have to give in. Why? Because the larger colonies want it.

An Hon. MEMBER:
They do not!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I do not say that everybody is unreasonable. Now, let us consider the basic principle of all this. The federation is to represent the states, and to represent the people. You have to get an agreement of both before you arrive at a conclusion. On that lies the foundation of federation. Alter that, and you have something or other, but it is not federation. Now, what is proposed here is to create deadlocks for the purpose of destroying the constitution. That is the substantial proposition before us, because, depend upon it, that when you give an invitation of that kind you will have it accepted. The states are to remain in their entirety. They are not to be interfered with, they are to have their sovereign rights, and to speak as states; and the people are to speak as the people. Therefore, if the true principle underlying federation is carried out, the rights of no one are infringed upon.

The identity of every state is preserved. But if you tell the house dominant in numbers that they have at the back of them the power to make numbers the only criterion, and to reduce the smaller states to absolute dependence upon their will, where is your federation, and where is your safeguard that this will never be resorted to? Hon. gentlemen may say, "We will surround it with many safeguards."

Mr. SYMON:
If it is never to be resorted to, why put it in?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
If it is a piece of humbug, why put it in?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
You do not want a man to commit murder, but you make a law providing that he shall be hanged if he does!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Some people will be hanged, anyhow. I will take the various proposals which have been made. Suppose this wore the proposal, in the event of a disagreement and not being able to come together, dissolve both houses, and when they meet again, in the event of there being an absolute majority of the representatives, or a certain proportion as has been proposed, and a refusal by a majority or a certain proportion of the senate, then have a referendum. I admit that you surround yourselves by these methods with considerable safeguards, that is to say, you make the power of the referendum to the people ultimately exceedingly difficult. Still you have got it there. If you are to have under this constitution a government such as is known to us under the term of a constitutional government, I admit that they may take immense risk in taking that course, and they will never take that course unless they know that they have a majority of the people at the back of them. But supposing you have your responsible government with the populations of the larger colonies entirely agreed and enthusiastic, what will they trouble about the intermediate difficulties when they know that in the long run they can have their own way, and reduce the federation practically to a consolidated body? In fact, they will be bound to have it if there is a strong view held by the majority of the people of the larger colonies in favour of it. Suppose that New South Wales and Victoria feel very strongly on some subject which the rest of Australasia feel equally strongly against, and suppose that you put all these provisions in antecedent to having an actual referendum, I admit that it means a lot of trouble, time, and expense; but would your responsible government which, after all, will be in the end responsible only to the majority of the people of Australia under the constitution as proposed bother about that? They would say, "Oh bother the expense; don't let these smaller populations dominate you; do all that is necessary." And I submit that, with all these precautions, they would land us truly in much delay and trouble in legislation and much expense in carrying out the views of the commonwealth; but protection of the smaller states in the end would not come from it at all. Sir, the very essence of a federation, as nobody pointed out so well as my hon. friend, Mr. McMillan, is this very condition which is now sought to be interfered with. A good deal has been altered even up to the present time. The position is getting weaker and weaker, and the anxieties of the smaller colonies are being more and more increased.

Dr. QUICK:

You got an important amendment made this morning in your favour!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

If we now have to tell the colonies that, although they have got the appearance of being able to act as states as well as being able to act as populations, in substance that power has been taken from them, and the population can dominate them at any moment when the executive chooses to so resolve.
I am afraid that we are making a new constitution which may work well, but which will not be federation, and which will not be at all the bill we were sent here to consider and pass. It is painful for me to look forward to the possibilities of conflict between the two houses. I believe that to anticipate them will be to create them. I believe that to make cumbersome provisions for the purpose of dealing with them will be to make provisions which will cause that which we wish to prevent. Whilst if we leave the constitution to its own legitimate working, representing the people as people representing the states as states, and requiring the concurrence of the people and of the states, there will come into the administration of public affairs a mutual thankfulness and conciliation which, so far from creating unpleasantness, will produce affection and this deadlock bogey, which is only raised for the purpose of making the stronger bodies dominate, will never have occasion to be called into existence, will never have birth. I sincerely hope that none of these provisions will be accepted. I think that by legislation of this means we will create the very thing we wish to avoid, and if we are to begin with trusting each other the trust must be founded first of all on a fair and reasonable basis between the colonies in which the position of every state is to have all due respect, and there must be nothing within the four corners of the constitution which might make this conjunction, for certain purposes, of independent states a wiping out of the smaller and a merging of them in the larger.

I am very glad that we have on this occasion plenty of time to discuss this important question. I Adelaide it was brought up at a some what late stage of our proceedings, and there was practically no time for discussion. We had three or four votes, and the voting was not such as it would have been had there been time for that full debate which the question deserves. On that occasion I voted with the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, who tabled a proposition which I thought then, and which I have thought since, was well calculated to meet the difficulties which it was intended to provide against. I am glad that we are discussing this matter at length now, because I can conceive that there is no more important question which can or has come before us. We are creating a huge machine to provide for the government of over 3,000,000 of people today, and no one knows how many millions of people as time goes by, and it seems to me absolutely important, not only that we should consider the construction of that machine, that is only a small part of it but also that we should consider with even more care the way in which it will work after it is constructed. He would be mad, indeed, who spent much time in designing an engine who left out of his consideration a safety-valve which would provide for that machine doing its work, and continuing to exist once it was made. It seems to me that on this occasion what we are dealing with to-day is just that provision for a safety-valve, without which all our care in the construction of the legislative machine may be absolutely thrown away, and after we have taken the utmost care to construct it some crisis may arise, when the whole thing will be destroyed. It has been said by some that a deadlock is a mere bogey. If it were a bogey it might be disregarded, but the possibility before us is a danger which is not imaginary, but real. Have we not all seen in our different states from time to time deadlocks arising, sometimes over most important matters, at other times over less important matters, between the two houses of the legislature? And if they can arise there as I think was put by the hon. member, Dr. Quick, just now—where one house represents only a portion of the people, whilst the other represents all the people, how much more are they likely to when not only one, but both houses rest "broad-based upon the people's will." It seems to me that the powerful senate we have striven to constitute is much more likely to be involved in conflicts with the other branch of the legislature than such an upper house has been, as we have seen, in the various colonies in the past. If the danger be real, if it be imminent, as I believe it to be, how important that we should provide some way out of this difficulty which public opinion does not create, but which the facts of the case absolutely necessitate! The question of state rights was raised. Whilst I am an advocate of state rights, I must confess that I was very much interested in Adelaide, and have been since, by a speech made early in the debates there by the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, when he drew a distinction which seemed at the time to be somewhat subtle, but which has grown in my thoughts since a distinction between state rights and state interests. I want for a moment or two to dwell upon that distinction to show that whilst deadlocks may arise on questions of state interests they can hardly arise on matters of state rights. We provide for state rights by the equal representation in the senate of all the colonies. We provide for the protection of state rights by the express provision that only certain powers shall be handed over to the federation, and that the residue of the powers shall be in the hands of the separate states. We provide for state rights in this manner; but when we come to matters of state interest to take the highest possible question upon which a dispute between the two houses may arise we come to matters on a very much lower plane. But disputes, I think, will more frequently arise on a lower plane than this they will more frequently arise on some matter of mere temporary and passing importance, or on questions not involving state but national interests. Take, for instance, one which it appears to me might arise at an early date. Supposing the first elections to the senate were carried out as they almost certainly will be on the ticket principle that the whole of the senators returned by New South Wales represented free-trade, and that in the other colonies, too, a proportion, more or less, of free-traders were returned. Is it not conceivable that very early in the existence of the commonwealth, not even on a question of state interests, but on another matter, in which separate states were not concerned at all, but sections of all the states, there might be a serious dispute between the two houses. If the one house the house of representatives passed a tariff to a large extent based on protectionist principles, and the majority in the senate threw the tariff out, that would absolutely dislocate the whole of the affairs of the commonwealth, and would throw into confusion the government for the time being.

The Hon. S. Fraser:
If the protectionists returned a majority in the one house would they not return a majority in the other?

The Hon. F.W. Holder:
Does the hon. member not see that in such a matter as that to which I have referred the grouping of the electors would be of great importance? On most questions the mere grouping is a matter of minor importance, but on such a question as that I can conceive that the difference in grouping would make all the difference in the policy of the two houses.

The Hon. H. Dobson:
Does the hon. member contend that the question of protection is not a state right question? Half the bill depends upon it!

The Hon. F.W. Holder:
I can conceive that there might be a difference in a tariff-protective or otherwise-which might affect state rights. I may mention one, because it occurs to my mind, not as the most important, but as suiting the interjection of the hon. member. Supposing it were proposed to place salt on the free list. It will be understood that as that is a large industry there, the inclusion of salt in the free list might seriously prejudice South Australia. It may be supposed that the inclusion of that line in the free list would be of no advantage to us; but still only in that way could state interests come in. On the broader question of free-trade and protection, without reference to particular items, it seems to me that state interests, much less state rights, could not come into consideration in any way. But supposing such a question as that were one upon which a dispute arose between the two houses—is it not of extreme importance that we should provide against such a contingency; that we should provide that the whole legislative machine should not be thrown out of gear; that the whole action of the government should not be paralysed by a dispute on a matter concerning which state rights could not, as far as I can see, come up at all? If the question of free-trade and protection were a cause of dispute, the only possible way to settle it, I think, would be by the referendum. It seems to me that that would be a perfectly fair question to submit and if the people of the commonwealth decided to adopt the principles of free-trade, so it ought to be. If, on the other hand, the majority of the commonwealth preferred the principles of protection, certainly the will of the majority also in that case should prevail.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

Would that majority pass the tariff?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

If a dispute occurred between the two houses the only court of arbitration to which it could be referred for settlement would be the people of the commonwealth. I cannot conceive that there is any other body which ought to arbitrate, or which ought to be set up to determine, such questions. Still further dwelling on the point which was suggested by some one, that the provision of ways to overcome deadlocks provokes deadlocks, I want to call special attention to an act of Parliament passed in South Australia in 1882. Before that time we had had several deadlocks. On various public questions, not always of first importance, there have been disputes between the two houses, and in 1882 an act was passed which provided for the settlement of these differences. That act provided chiefly as follows:

Whenever any bill or any act shall have been passed by the House of Assembly during any session of Parliament, and the same bill, or a similar bill with substantially the same objects and having the same title, shall have been passed by the House of Assembly during the next ensuing Parliament, a general election of the House of Assembly having taken place between two such parliaments, the second and third reading having been passed in the second instance by an absolute majority of the whole number of members of the said House of Assembly, and both such bills shall have been rejected by, or fail to become law in consequence of any amendments made therein by the Legislative Council—it shall be lawful for the Governor to do either of two things: He may either dissolve both houses—the lower and the upper house—and send them to their constituents, and let the constituents determine the whole question, or he may and this is the alternative simply issue writs for an additional one-third number of the members of the Legislative Council. There being twenty-four members in that body, he may issue writs for an additional eight members. I suppose the idea was to parallel, as nearly as possible, what would be done in the House of Lords when a difficulty arose which could be cured by the addition of certain members to that body, or what would have been done in New South Wales where, if a difficulty arose, it might be cured by the addition to the nominee council of certain additional nominee members.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
To a certain extent what is done in Canada!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
And was done in New Zealand!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
To a certain extent that has been done in Canada, and what, my hon. friend, Mr. Deakin, reminds me, was done in New Zealand. That was the idea, I suppose, which suggested this addition of one-third to the number of members of the Legislative Council. Of course, this one-third would be got rid of by no vacancies which might occur being filled till the normal condition was restored. I have shown that in 1882 provision was made against deadlocks. On the theory suggested by some hon. members since 1882, we ought to have deadlocks almost without number at least one a session. What are the facts? The facts are that since 1882 we have not had a single deadlock. On one or two occasions there have been some symptoms of trouble, but the symptoms have rapidly disappeared and the trouble has never come. Now, does that not absolutely dispose of the suggestion that in attempting to provide against deadlocks you create deadlocks? Does it not prove that the safety-valve on the engine does not create a disaster but rather provides against the possibility of such an occurrence even when danger arises?

The Hon. S. FRASER:
It depends on the provision!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I imagine that this Convention will make such provision as will not provoke but prevent such difficulties as we are accustomed to call deadlocks. I will pass on to consider the methods by which we might overcome disputes between the two houses. It has been said that the difficulty might be overcome by a dissolution. I quite agree with the remarks of one hon. gentleman who said that the possibility of a dissolution might often prevent but could not cure deadlocks. I agree with that observation. But I go further. I would remind hon. members of the conditions under which they are elected to parliament. I need only remind parliamentarians of those conditions. I need not argue a point so self-evident. A dissolution of the assembly takes place. A new house is returned. I ask, "Is it possible to say what are the views of the electors?" Is it not always impossible to say what they are? Do we not know that personal considerations, past services, local questions, a new bridge, a town hall, a railway line that all these things come in? Is there ever an election taking place upon one single issue? Are not all elections complicated by the introduction of several issues? Besides, members are elected for three years, or for some other term; but is it not known by the voters when they vote for the members so returned that besides the main question that maybe before the public at the time, there is the parliamentary policy during three or four years to be considered? All these matters come into consideration, in addition to personal and local matters, in deciding for whom electors will vote. It is, therefore, in my view, absolutely impossible to ascertain the will of the people on any particular question by any election of members of parliament. If it be provided, as I hope it will be, that a dissolution of both houses will be possible, even that may not deal with the matter. Let there be a double dissolution. Suppose that the question of free-trade and protection is the rock upon which the legislative machinery has come to grief. A dissolution takes place, and members come back again. It is quite possible that they may come back in nearly the same, if not in quite the same, proportions, as before the dissolution. How much further on are you? Do you not see that all the difficulties are accentuated from public agitation, from the speeches which are made, from the feeling which is evolved, from the antagonism between the two branches of the legislature? All these things constitute a more serious menace to the state than there was at the beginning, and the whole federation is in greater, not less, danger. In a large number of cases it may be in greater danger as the result of a double dissolution. Thus it is necessary, to my mind, that you should provide for something further than a double dissolution. I, personally, am in favour of the referendum upon other questions besides the settlement of deadlocks, and it will not be surprising, therefore, that since I am in favour of the referendum for the settlement of other matters that in so serious a case as that under consideration, in this very serious difficulty, I should also be in favour of it. It seems to me that the people whom we more or less faithfully represent, of whom the two houses of parliament are more or less a faithful reflection, are those to whom the appeal should be made in any difficulty, to ascertain whether or not parliament does truly reflect their view. And the view of the people can be obtained intelligently only through a referendum. I am not afraid that the referendum will be too largely availed of. In the first place, there is the cost to be considered. We have had some experience in connection with the election of this body of what an election over the whole of Australia will cost. I have not looked at the figures recently; but, speaking from my memory of them, I do not think it is likely that the cost of a referendum would be less than £50,000. Now, is it at all likely, putting down the cost at anything like that sum, that any government, or either house of the legislature, would thoughtlessly or heedlessly force a referendum? I think not. It would be a step taken only from extreme necessity, taken under the pressure of a serious danger to the existence of the state itself.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Or threatening the existence of the government!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Practically, the only thing which would justify the referendum would be a crisis threatening the existence of the commonwealth itself; when it might be the only alternative to a civil war. And, even if we could be certain of such a crisis arising only once in a century - if we could be sure that no such crisis would arise within the next hundred years, still, it would be a wise thing to put into the constitution a provision to guard against so serious a danger, so terrible a contingency. I come now to the final point with which I have to deal - that is, the questions upon which the referendum will take place. It seems to me that a broad distinction must be drawn between matters affecting the constitution - that is, any change of it - and matters well within the four corners of the constitution. I regard the constitution which we are now framing as a deed of partnership between the colonies which come in - the compact upon which we agree to federate, in consideration of the terms of which the various states makes a certain surrender of the powers they at present possess. I would not consent, under any circumstances, to agree that any change in the constitution should take place without a referendum requiring a majority not only of the people but of the states. It seems to me that it is essential to the very existence of federation that a distinction should be drawn between these two things. If, for instance, we provide for a majority of the people only, without reference to whether a majority of the states concur, such an alteration of the constitution might be made as might upset the whole federation. The equal representation of the states in the senate might be upset, and the whole basis of the federation might be entirely changed. The whole conditions might be seriously disturbed by such a decision. But if we provide, as I certainly hope that a large majority of hon.
members will provide, that any proposal for an alteration of the constitution shall require before it can take effect that it should be assented to by a majority of the people and by a majority of the states also, we shall safeguard all those matters within the definition of the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, of "state rights"-all those matters within the description of being constitutional, and having to do with the compact under which we federate. But as to the other matters, such questions as disputes between the two houses which involve no rights or interests of the states, which do not carry with them any menace to any state, no matter how small or large, in these matters we should be prepared to let the great federal idea which has brought us together here, and which we are striving to perfect, prevail, and I would be content to accept in a settlement of such a dispute between the two houses the vote of a majority of the electors within the commonwealth.

Mr. SYMON:
That destroys the federal idea altogether!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I am glad my hon. friend has made that suggestion, because it gives me an excuse for taking two or three moments more which I should not have occupied without good excuse, because I feel that I have already trespassed for some time upon the attention of the Convention. But the interjection of the hon. and learned member demands an answer, and I am prepared to give one. He says that to do what I have just suggested would endanger the very existence of the federal parliament as such. My answer is that the state rights, of which I am an advocate, are guarded within the terms of the constitution itself, and the preservation of that constitution I have already stated my determination to insure. The state rights are preserved first, as I have already put it, by the reservation to the various states of all powers not expressly handed over to the federation, are preserved next by the absolute maintenance, except by the consent of the majority of the states themselves, of the constitution in its present form in the form under which we federate and that in these matters which are within the four corners of the constitution, which in no way threaten its existence or impair its efficiency in these matters simply of dispute between the two houses, it seems to me that we do not endanger the federation.

Mr. SYMON:
The federal idea, I said!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Nor do we impair the perfectness of the federal idea by consenting to such an arbitrament in the case of dispute between the two houses as that of reference to the whole people. At any rate, that is the view I hold, and while I very much dislike the threats of which we have heard too much on both sides, while I very much deprecate statements which sometimes we hear from one side of the house and sometimes from the other, sometimes from the larger colonies and sometimes from the smaller, that if we do not get this there can be no federation while I very much deprecate that kind of thing, still I recognise that the smaller states have obtained what is not a concession, but a right-equal representation in the senate and as we have obtained other things for which we have fought, and fought strenuously, while we have given in several instances to the larger states matters which they could not have got without us and I want to be clear about that point; I want to point out that in this Convention, if the smaller states desired to do it, if they were imbued with the spirit with which sometimes they are said to be imbued the spirit or determination to thwart the larger states whenever they had the power if we had so desired we might have thwarted the larger states. We are thirty out of fifty here, and if we had been imbued with the spirit attributed to us we could have said at the be-

[P.565]ginning, and adhered to it right through, "We will do this and do no other, and you shall submit to our behest all along the line "-I say we could have done that, for we had the power, and we had the numbers too. We have not done it. We, the smaller states, have striven to be fair and reasonable throughout.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Have not the larger states done the same?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
They have. I am simply speaking in deprecation of the contention on one side or the other that this must be done or there will be no federation. I am saying that the concessions which have been made again and again by the majority to meet the larger colonies have in every case been made by the hearty concurrence, and more than than that, by the very votes of the representatives of the smaller colonies; and that being so, I think we might fairly lay aside these jealousies and contentions as to the larger and smaller colonies and look at these matters, which are purely disputes upon questions which will sometimes be questions of etiquette only, and on other occasions will not trench upon state rights or state interests-I think we might leave these matters to the arbitrament of the whole body of the electors, no matter where they live, and be content to accept the verdict of the majority, whether that majority live on this side of the continent or on the other, no matter wherever they may be.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria):[12.44]:
I listened with great attention to the remarks of the Treasurer of South Australia, and I was very sorry to find that in some respects he agrees, and, I think, without reservation, to a referendum, and that be referred to the matter in the way of a concession. Surely, we are not going to have a referendum on questions of tariff and matters of that kind? If we are going to apply the referendum to such subjects there may be endless strife. Are we going to ask the whole of the people of the commonwealth of Australia to crush out what might be considered by the people of South Australia as a state right? Surely that is not intended? I do not believe in mechanical means for doing away with deadlocks. I do not think there is any necessity for it. I have been in the Parliament of Victoria for a great many years. I was a member of the Assembly for many years, and have now been in the Council for many years, and the only deadlock we ever had in our Parliament was the Darling grant deadlock. I do not call it a deadlock when the Upper House, as at present constituted in Victoria, rejects an Export of Products Bill.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   Or a Factories Bill!
The Hon. S. FRASER:
   Or a Factories Bill.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   You get your own way!
The Hon. S. FRASER:
   We do not get our own way. I hope we are just as reasonable as an equal number of members in the other house. I do not say that we are better; but, at any rate, we are older, as a matter of fact, and we ought to have more experience. I do not call disputes on ordinary matters of legislation deadlocks. I call a deadlock a dispute such as that which arose over the Darling grant in Victoria. On that occasion I supported the popular view of the case. The proposal was to make a grant to the then governors nice, courteous gentleman, willing to do what was right in every respect, who had under him a remarkably powerful government, of which the late George Higinbotham was Attorney-General, and the late Sir James McCulloch, then Mr. McCulloch, Chief Secretary. The popular view was to grant the Governor £20,000—a monstrous proposal.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   The hon. gentleman supported it!
The Hon. S. FRASER:
   I did, and I have regretted it ever since.
An Hon. MEMBER:
Was it carried?

Another Hon. MEMBER:
It was passed by the Assembly of Victoria!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
The Imperial Government would not allow the Governor to accept the grant. I cannot remember now the exact nature of the correspondence, but the Imperial Government put their veto on the proposal forthwith, and very properly so. We need have no hesitation in calling a spade a spade, and in my opinion that proposed grant was nothing more nor less than a bribe to the then Governor, coerced, I think I may use the word, by a powerful executive government.

The CHAIRMAN:
Does the hon. member think he is in order in discussing the Darling grant in connection with this question, except by way of illustration?

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I only refer to it by way of illustration, and I was saying that the rejection of an ordinary measure by an upper house or senate should not be regarded as a deadlock. At that time the Government confessed judgment, and in that way paid the public creditor. To submit a tariff or any such matter to a referendum of the people is, in my opinion, utterly destructive of responsible government. Under this Federal Bill which I hold in my hand, as passed by the Adelaide Convention, we have constituted a senate to be elected for a term of six years to be voted for by the whole people of the states the whole people, nothing more nor less and I agree with the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, that it is quite on the cards that the senate may be more democratic than the house of representatives, and for the simple reason that the house of representatives are to be elected by sections of the people, and being elected by sections of the people, they will naturally, of necessity, represent the true opinions of the sections.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Very few democrats will contest the senate election; they will not have the means to do it!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
My colleagues from Victoria profess to be democrats. I think that the Attorney-General is a democrat of democrats. I believe in the sincerity of the hon. and learned gentleman, of course; but I say that it is quite on the cards that the senate may be more democratic than the house of representatives, and it may possibly be the means of a remedy in certain cases. I do not say that I would object to a double dissolution, perhaps it depends on how the discussion may end; it may go in the direction of some modification of the proposal of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, or a still greater modification of the views of the Tasmanian Parliament.
But I would point out that this senate is to be elected for a term of six years, half of the members of the senate going to their constituents every tree years, of necessity, to the whole people. We are dealing now with the whole people. We are not dealing with the house of lords, who represent only a section of the people, and who may, from want of knowledge and other reasons, vote against the true interests of the people for a time; and when we have a senate resting on the bedrock of manhood suffrage the senate representing the whole manhood, and in some colonies the whole womanhood also, of the country—I cannot conceive a case where there would be a necessity for mechanical means to get rid of deadlocks. I cannot conceive of such a case, because the natural referendum comes round every three years at the furthest, and supposing that a deadlock occurs, as I said at Adelaide, after the expiration of one or two years of the term of the existing parliament supposing that it arises during the currency of the three years of the term of the senate—the executive of the day bits only to wait a year or two, years or thereabouts to settle the deadlock by the natural constitutional means of this act. We have not given the senate

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. S. FRASER:

Yes, I voted for that; but I do not know that I would have voted for it if I had been certain that we were going to have the referendum. I did not think that we would do anything so dangerous. I voted for that because our people would not accept the bill were we to go back to our colony with a provision in the bill giving the senate power to amend taxation bills. But I say. again that we have not given the senate powers enough to do any harm. Their powers are, for good, their powers are for the further consideration of bills, and therefore I fail to see why there is any necessity to coerce the senate and to bring them under a referendum such as is now desired. The referendum that is in practice in Switzerland is an entirely different thing; it is a conservative device. Only after both houses have dealt with a matter can it be referred to the people; and frequently they have decided against it. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, has produced a statement showing the matters that have been dealt with in America on the referendum. Are they not trumpery? Are we to trouble the people with trumpery matters such as a constitutional amendment increasing the sessional days, and various trifles like that?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The Hon. S. FRASER:

That is only in a state!

Mr. SYMON:

A unified government!

The Hon. S. FRASER:

Yes, a unified government. Are we going to unify this federation of ours? As sure as we give the referendum to the federal government, so surely shall we make it a unified government. The hon. member, Mr. Douglas, referred yesterday to the fact of a member of the House of Lords being returned to the Legislative Council of New South Wales in the olden days to express disapprobation of the then existing state of things. It is not possible to go back. The people of the Australian colonies would rise up as one man if we were to unify them again. There is no doubt about that, and we must consider the true federal principles. I maintain that the proper way of settling deadlocks is a conference between the two houses the same in the future as in the past. We have only had one deadlock in Victoria, as I said before. We have passed through that ordeal. No trouble has arisen, or is likely to arise in the future. There is much less likelihood of trouble arising in the future with a senate erected on the bedrock elected by the whole people and with a house of representatives elected by the voice of the people. You would have only a short time to wait; then why provide any mechanical means which would destroy the federation we are about to create? I will oppose any kind of a referendum. I do not say that in the last resort I might not agree to a double dissolution, because I think that, in that case, the house of representatives would take very good care that they were on very safe ground before they said that it should be resorted to. I do not know that I need say any more, except that the argument that Tasmania would have eight votes to each one of the other colonies does not apply to all in a national sense. Take a hundred men in Tasmania-the first hundred you could find in the streets—and a thousand men in Victoria—the first thousand you could meet—and I would almost venture to say that the opinion of the majority of the thousand in the city of Melbourne, and the opinion of the majority of the hundred in Launceston—or you might say in Brisbane or Adelaide—would be the same. The opinions of the people are as truly expressed in the voice of a small average number as in the voice of a large average number of them, and it is the opinions of the people you want to find out. There is no especial magic in numbers, and in the one case you get the true opinions of the people just as much as in the other. Therefore, I hope the Committee will rise to the occasion, and will decide, as we must have something, to accept the Tasmanian suggestion, or some modification of the proposal made by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, at Adelaide, and discussed by us there.

[The Chairman left the chair at 1.2 p.m. The Committee resumed at 2 p.m.]

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales)[2]:

I am one of those who sincerely and truly believe that deadlocks of themselves are no evil to the countries where they occur. I think that deadlocks, as a rule, that is, such deadlocks as we have had under the British Constitution, have the effect of creating good public opinion, and that while those which have occurred—though we have not had very much experience of what might be called deadlocks in any of the Australian colonies, except Victoria—may have been inconvenient to the administration of the day, they gave no inconvenience to the people of the colony in which they occurred. Notwithstanding this opinion, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that out of doors there is a very strong public sentiment that the possibility of deadlocks occurring in the future under a constitution so rigid as this will be—because it is likely to be more rigid than the British Constitution—should be prevented, and in deference to that opinion I am prepared to vote for some method which will enable a direct expression of the will of the people to be obtained. I am not in a position at the present time to say what system I would favour, whether the referendum or the dissolution of the senate, though I am more inclined to favour the latter. I want to see it made almost impossible for there to be any interference with the senate by the ministry of the day. I suppose that, under any circumstances, the ministry of the day must, to a certain extent, control these dissolutions; but if it were possible to bring about a dissolution, and to send the senate to the country without the interference of the ministry of the day, I would have no hesitation in voting for a provision which would have that effect. I do not want to allow the senate to be dominated by the ministry of the day; but I want to see that body dominated by the people of the country. The difficulty which suggests itself to me is that the ministry of the day may attempt to dominate the senate. That, I think, is very undesirable. If the people desire to dominate the senate, they should have the right and the power to do so; but how can it best be provided that they should have that power? Can it be done best by the referendum, or by a dissolution of the senate? I am inclined to think that the principle which has apparently worked so well in South Australia, would be likely to work equally well under this constitution.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

There is no equal representation of states there!

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

There is not!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

That is the whole difficulty!

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

Suppose the house of representatives is sent to the country, and it comes back and reaffirms the principle upon which it was sent to the country, would the senate dare, in the face of the fact that its members would know that they would have to go to the country if they rejected the measure, refuse to pass it? What has been our experience even with regard to the House of Lords-and I suppose that, under no circumstances, could we create such a conservative body as that? Have they ever failed to give way to public opinion when that public opinion was clearly expressed? The very last time they had a conflict with the House of Commons-I think so far back as 1866-

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Commons passed their resolution in 1860!

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

That was the last time that the House of Lords had a real conflict with the House of Commons.

Mr. SYMON:

There was a dispute in connection with the Home Rule Bill, and the House of Lords was victorious. The country supported them!
An Hon. MEMBER:
That was not a financial question!

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

Well, I will take the last budget introduced in the House of Commons—that including the death duties. Such duties were never before imposed upon the wealthier classes in England; but the House of Lords recognised their true position. They recognised the fact that, inasmuch as the Commons had determined to vote for the imposition of these duties, it was their place to give legislative effect to them. About thirteen or fourteen peers spoke upon the question, and with the exception of Lord Herschell, not one lord ventured to defend these duties. But they recognised that the House of Commons must be dominant upon such a question, and when we establish a senate such as we propose to establish under the bill, is it not to be supposed that it will ultimately recognise its duty to the country at large? Although I am one of those who believe that the deadlocks which we have had have not been injurious to the country, that they have created public opinion, and have made the people alive to their interests and their duties, I am quite prepared to place a safety-valve in the constitution which will have the effect of making the senate answerable to public opinion. But I will not give any vote which in my opinion will allow the ministry of the day to dominate the senate.

Mr. LYNE:
Will not the hon. member be doing that if he gives the ministry the power of dissolution?

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

To some extent that may be so; but you first of all get public opinion by dissolving the house of representatives. Having done that, I do not think you dominate the senate if the senate refuses to accede to what is the expressed opinion of the country. In a general election, I think, there is no domination of the senate if they are told that they also must go to the country and obtain the opinion of the people.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Does the hon. member mean the public opinion of the bulk of the population?

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

Certainly. Any other opinion would not be worth having.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The hon. member holds that the senate must yield to that?

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I do. I hold that the senate must yield to the determination of the house of representatives sooner or later. If it is necessary to send the senate to the country, it ought to be sent to the country; but not until the house of representatives has gone to the country.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Suppose the smaller states send back a majority to the Senate in opposition to the house of representatives? There would still be a deadlock?

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
How do you solve a deadlock when it occurs under a referendum?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
That settles it!

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Not at all. I can see no difference. There may continue to be a deadlock, if you call it a deadlocks when the ministry of the day do not got their will, If that is a deadlock, you may have deadlocks under a referendum as well as under a provision for a double dissolution.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Not under the system proposed by the hon. member, Mr. Holder!

An Hon. MEMBER:
You settle the deadlock by giving one party to the dispute a determining voice!

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Although I strongly believe that we have had no deadlocks in these colonies which have been disastrous to the interests of the people, although, on the contrary, I think that many of these deadlocks have been very beneficial, I should like to mention an instance which occurred in the New South Wales Parliament within my own time. I remember when the Legislative Council was condemned for rejecting a bill which was passed almost unanimously by the Legislative Assembly. That was not five years ago, and yet a few weeks ago the Assembly rejected the very same bill. I think that these delays, instead of being disastrous to the country, are beneficial.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[2.9]:
I should like to place before hon. members in plain terms the consequences which I believe would flow from the proposition put with so much ability by the hon. member, Mr. Holder-a proposition so absolutely destructive of the whole federal idea that, coming from one of the hon. member's ability and influence, I view it with very great alarm. Let us examine it, and in a, very few words put it in plain terms. Of course the whole power of legislation is distributed between the federal parliament on the one hand and the federal states upon the other. These two embrace the whole area of legislation; but the hon. member divides that portion of legislation which belongs to the lot of the federal parliament into two classes. First of all, in the one class he puts all questions which are constitutional, and he designates as such those affecting state rights; and in the second class he puts questions which affect state interests. With regard to questions which are state rights, that is to say questions of the constitution, what member from the smaller colonies ever dreamt of referring them to a referendum?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

The New South Wales Parliament did!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

The New South Wales Parliament suggested a great many things that they never expected the other colonies would concede—they would never dream of a federation on such lines. What would be the result if the larger colonies, by their overwhelming mass vote could out vote every other colony? Three months after the federal parliament met we should have proportional representation or, perhaps, no representation at all. The whole scheme might be subverted, might be turned topsy-turvy, and we should be at the mercy of the larger states. Any hon. member who looks at the matter in a reasonably fair way could never expect the smaller states to come under such a constitution.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Until a constitutional question arises the federal high court is the defender of the constitution. The hon. member need not elaborate that. We never dreamt of entering a federation in which constitutional questions were to be referred to a mass referendum.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

He never said that!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

No; the hon. member made that distinction; but the inference from his argument was that because we are protected on the one side we might give way on the other. I would point out, however, that there is no advantage gained from looking at the question from that point of view, because constitutional questions were never seriously conceived by any member of the Convention to be allowed to be referred to a mass referendum. The hon. member says with regard to all other questions he is prepared to take a mass vote. What does that mean? Simply unification upon the whole of the subjects of legislation which are delegated to the federal parliament—that and nothing else. What are those powers? The raising of money by taxation—the regulation of trade and commerce, defence—in fact nearly all the questions which are of major importance to the people. Nearly all questions of universal and vital importance to the people of this continent, are referred to the federal parliament. As to the whole of this immense area of legislative power, my hon. friend says he is willing to refer it to the will of the majority. I ask where is the federal idea in that case? It is simply unification with regard to all these powers.

An Hon. MEMBER:
No doubt!
The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
The hon. member agrees with me, although coming from one of the larger colonies, and he takes a very fair view of the question. The hon. member, Mr. Holder, although explaining the matter with his usual masterly lucidity has not fully considered the bearing of his contention. If so, he writes himself down an absolute adherent of unification with regard to all these powers. The hon. member suggests, although he puts the proposition baldly, that we should put in some initial difficulties, some preliminary stages of caution and check, between the occurrence of the dispute and the reference to the people; but they do not really matter. They can be brushed aside like cobwebs. If in the end the will of the people is to prevail, what is the use of the Senate raising any question at all? Why have a dissolution, or any other check? If when the question is referred to the people, the will of the people is to prevail, where is the voice of the states?
Mr. SYMON:
Smothered!
The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
I admit some scheme must be evolved to meet the difficulty of deadlocks; but now I am only criticisms the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Holder. I ask hon. members to put the thing into plain terms. Stripped of all the eloquence with which the hon. member adorns his utterances it means nothing more nor less than unification almost pure and simple with regard to all the powers delegated to the federal parliament.
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Only as an alternative to revolution!
The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
Exactly and, if it comes to that, the two larger colonies now have power to say to the smaller colonies, "We will annex you as territories," and bar the power of England we should have to submit. At present we are simply arranging the terms of federation by consent on both sides, and the arbitrament of war is not to be considered at all. If we look at the proposition plainly and simply, can any hon. member dispute the proposition that it means nothing more nor less, in the last analysis, than unification with regard to all those powers which are delegated to the federal parliament?

An HON MEMBER: With regard to everything?

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
We have a little autonomy left with regard to some matters.

Mr. SYMON: Where?

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
In the matters not delegated to the federal parliament; but I admit they are very small mainly municipal powers. The whole of the questions which vitally affect the lives, liberties, and well being of the people of this continent are delegated to the federal parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Certainly not!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
Certainly yes. There are very few powers indeed, outside the powers in clause 52, which are of great importance.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
That is a strong reason for not having a deadlock!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
Yes; but a still stronger reason for not having unification when entering upon federation. This will be no federation. I concede what my hon. friend did not state, that between the point of dispute between the two houses and the reference to the people he intends to propose some precautionary checks, some delays. Of what value are they if in the last reference, which is not very far off, the will of the majority is to prevail? The senate may as well come down at once, just as the coon in the tree says, "Don't shoot, I will come down." If death is inevitable he has to come down.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Not altogether; only half of him comes down

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
If I divided the hon. member into two parts, and especially if I took the upper part of him, of what value is the hon. member? The hon. member is so logical and straightforward in all his reasonings that I put it to him, if the mass referendum is to decide these matters, whether the effect is not unification?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

What is the opposite of that?

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

A reasonable scheme such as that proposed as a stroke of genius by the hon. member's colleague, the Hon. I.A. Isaacs. I believe I was the only member from the smaller colonies who supported him when he proposed a scheme of a double referendum, one to the people and one to the states.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

I am sorry the hon. member so far departed from his original attitude with regard to state rights. The double referendum is a statesmanlike and reasonable suggestion. I will even give way to the hon. member to this extent. If there are only six colonies voting in states and they are three to three the law should pass. That, I think, would be a fair concession.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

The hon. member, with all his charm of personality, is rather an extremist. I am trying to arrive at a reasonable compromise which may be accepted. I put it with all the strength of which I am capable, that the proposition of the hon. member, Mr. Holder—which for a moment, I confess, under the spell of his eloquence, took my fancy, because I actually went to him and made a suggestion that would improve his proposal—is fatal to a federal constitution. You may as well say at once, "Take the whole; trust to the larger colonies," if a mass referendum in the last event is to control the situation. But the outlet, the cure for this, is the suggestion of the Attorney-General of Victoria—the double referendum. I am willing, when there may be three colonies voting on each side, to agree that the law should pass.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The majority of the people in that case to prevail!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Yes, I think that would be fair. That, I believe, is the only reasonable and feasible suggestion which has been made. It is one which embraces the desire of representatives on both sides, of both the larger and the smaller colonies.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
And to have a dissolution of the house of representatives!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
A dissolution of the house of representatives contemporaneous with the dissolution of the senate, if necessary.

Mr. SYMON:
Then a majority of the states and a majority of the people!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
Exactly. I am willing to agree that where there are three states voting on each side the law should pass.

Mr. SYMON:
That is giving it all away again!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
I do not think it is. I think it would be a fair concession. I think no one wishes to blind his eyes to the difficulty which is presented to hon. members. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the smaller colonies, with their comparatively sparse populations, may be in the position of putting the iron hand on the larger colonies. I think i

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)[2.22]:

There is no portion of this constitution in regard to which my mind has been so much exercised as the question we are now considering. I held for a long time very strongly the opinion that there was no more reason why we should have a deadlock insoluble by the ordinary processes which take place in unified states under this constitution than under the ordinary constitutions under which we live in the several colonies. But reflection and consideration of this matter convinced me that the analogy of the settlement of disputes between two houses of legislature in a unified form of constitution is altogether misleading in the constitution with which we have to deal. My hon. friend, Sir Joseph Abbott, made some very strong observations from his point of view as to the position which had always been taken up by the House of Lords with regard to the House of Commons. I do not think we can draw any analogy from the settlement of disputes between those two bodies. In the first place, the powers of the House of Lords are powers which it is well recognised existed always as supporting the powers of the people expressed in the House of Commons; and the process of the growth of the Constitution has been a continual assertion of real power by the Commons, and a continual bowing to that authority on the part of the Lords. But, altogether apart from that, which is a consideration arising out of the constitution of the House itself, there is a difference which, it seems to me, is unexplainable, between the manner in which deadlocks are solved in unified governments and the manner in which they would be solved under a constitution of this sort. What is it that solves a deadlock in the case of a difficulty between the two houses, say, in New South Wales and Victoria? It is this: That the question at issue between the Upper House and the Lower House is a question in which the whole community has an interest.
The Upper House or the Assembly may represent the views of some particular section of the community, but it is a section of the same community, and it is to the interest of the whole community that the question should be settled. The settlement of that question is a matter for the whole community and so public opinion which is the solvent of all these difficulties in a unified state gradually comes to the aid of the party which has reason on its side, in accordance with the view of the majority of the people, and gradually the party standing out feels the pressure of that public opinion and gives way; and it in only because of the pressure of that public opinion in the unified state that the party holding out does give way.
If the section which was supporting it disappears, there is no backing left for the opposition, and that disappears also. But in the case of a federation you are brought face to face with a totally different condition of things.
The whole position is brought out by an interjection which my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, made just now. He asks: Suppose you do have a dissolution of the senate will not the same members be sent back to the senate? I think there can be no question that if the difference of opinion between the states is of such a serious character as to render necessary a dissolution, the probabilities are that the same public opinion which has backed up the states in the attitude they have taken will send back the same members who have taken that attitude. It will only be in cases of very extreme difference of opinion depending upon the interests of particular states, that you will have the senate standing up in such a way as to make it impossible to agree with the house of representatives, and, in these very cases, the members of the senate who have taken up that attitude will be backed up, on a dissolution, by the public opinion of the states whose interests they particularly represent. It appears to me that there is that essential difference between the two cases. What do you mean by the settlement of deadlocks? You mean that the deadlocks will be solved by the process of public opinion, which always enforces, in a self-governing community, that the will of the majority shall prevail.
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
And if necessary by a penal dissolution!

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR:

Yes. But in the case we are dealing with now, you have two sets of public opinion. You have the public opinion which upholds the house of representatives solid and inflexible; you have the public opinion of the state, which supports the senate equally solid and equally inflexible. If you come to a condition of that kind, then you are face to face with a very dangerous position of things. Although I am strongly opposed to any of these mechanical processes of bringing to a conclusion that which should only be concluded by discussion and the arbitrament of reason, at the same time I say that you may be brought face to face with a position in which these solvents will not be applicable. What is the position then? The position is one of danger, not only to what has been called here the federal principle, but to the union itself. You are face to face then with that position which brought about the terrible appeal to arms which took place in America. I do not suppose for one moment that any resort of that kind could be possible in this community of Australia. But if there was a public opinion totally adverse on some matter of great state interest between the nation and the states which constituted it, you would be face to face with a position the outcome of which I do not see very clearly, unless we adopt some process by which deadlocks may be solved. An appeal is often made to the example of America, where undoubtedly you have a senate with larger powers than our senate possesses, and in other ways no doubt a more powerful body, because it has executive functions as well. There is no doubt that somehow or other questions of difference between the two houses do settle themselves; but I think it is well worthy of reflection whether the settlement of those questions arises from the nature of the constitution itself, or from that immense machinery of party government under which the American system is worked. All who know anything of American politics know that the system of parties which was brought into existence, not for the purpose of legislative work, but for the purpose of the election of the president, and which is now in existence for the purpose of the election of president every four years, and which is maintained by the interests which thousands of office-holders have every year in the perpetuation of the system-I say that system dominates every other consideration in the United States; it dominates not only considerations of policy but considerations of state interest right through the states. The party machine dominates, governs, and uses the Constitution in such a way as to have become really a more important part of the working of American institutions than the Constitution itself almost. The existence of that strong party organisation no doubt has brought about a settlement of this question—that is to say, that a dispute between the two houses is not allowed by the two great parties to turn upon any question of local interest. Party organisation and party strength over shadows that, and the only questions which arise between them are the questions of party; and as the base of these parties is not the state, but the whole union, questions are solve in the same way as any other questions between two houses in a unified state are solved. Therefore, the example of the United States, which is so often cited, appears to me to be altogether without analogy in this matter, because of the considerations I have pointed out, Is there any analogy in the case of any other community? It appears to me that there is not. It appears to me that the fact that responsible government does not exist in any of those communities, and that there is not an appeal to the people in other communities as there would be under this constitution, makes an essential difference in the solution of difficulties between the two houses. Thus we are really brought face to face with an entirely new position; and I think it is just as well, when we are dealing with questions of this kind, that we should recognise that there may be a danger in following an historical analogy too closely. Although we may very well draw lessons from history, and may very well be warned by what has taken place in other countries, we should be very careful to remember that we are here embarked upon an experiment which is absolutely novel. I say that the experiment is absolutely novel for these reasons: I quite agree with what the hon. member, Dr. Quick, said to-day, that this is beyond question the most democratic, and, therefore, the strongest second chamber which exists in any constitution that we know of. And it is that very circumstance which some hon. members rely upon, as making the probability of conflict with the other chamber less likely, which seems to me to point not only to its being more likely, but to the conflicts being of a more difficult and insoluble character; because to the statement of the house of representatives, "We represent the people of the nation, elected on the broadest possible basis," the senate will probably answer, "We represent exactly the same voters; we represent exactly the same electorates; if you have a right to hold to your opinion, we have equally a right to hold to ours." Therefore, there is no position such as the House of Commons may take up in regard to the House of Lords, or the assembly may take up in regard to an upper house in any of the colonies, which comes to our aid in the settlement of this matter. The question we have to consider is this: is it better for us to recognise that these difficulties may arise, that a position of insoluble political complication may arise, and to make some provision for it, or to take a leap into the dark, with this new constitution, with these great forces which we bring into operation, and to trust to reason and to compromise and to those other forces which bring disputes to an end in ordinary cases in unified communities. I say that a trust of that kind, under all the circumstances which we have before us, would not only be dangerous, but would be an altogether reckless disregard of our duty in providing for the future. We are bound to look at the probabilities in the working of this constitution, and if we see that there are chances of imminent danger, if we provide for no process for the getting over of these difficulties, then I say that we are bound to make such provision. Recommendations have been made for getting over this difficulty, and I say at once that I am altogether opposed as a general rule to the process of the referendum. I am altogether opposed to it certainly in the case of a unified state, and I am opposed to it in the case of this constitution if there were any other way out of the difficulty. I am opposed to it for this reason—I state my grounds of opposition now, in order to emphasise my approval of the suggestion which I will make hereafter: that it relieves the representatives of the people from that responsibility of the discussion and the comparison of views, and the give and take of compromise, which are necessary in all legislation. I say that in all legislation it is for the benefit of the community that there should be difficulties placed in the way of a hasty decision. It is in the interests of the people themselves, and of all legislation, that strong views should be taken on both sides of a question in order that the consideration may be put from every point of view, and that the people in the end may get the benefit of the united views which they may get from that conflict. But to say that the process of this referendum is to take away all responsibility of bringing about that result from representatives is wrong, and for this reason: If there is a difference of opinion between the two houses, and hon. members of one house know that they will have to face their constituents—if there is a dispute with the other house the country will have to decide between the upper house and lower house as to which view is the view which will be supported by them. Then there is a responsibility placed upon the members of the house which will be dissolved to take care that every consideration is put, that every point is yielded by them which they can possibly yield, consistently with taking the right course, and nothing is left undone which may bring about a settlement. But where there is no responsibility of that kind, and where the whole question can, without very much discussion, be left to the arbitrament of the people themselves, then, I say, we make easy this process of handing over the responsibility of decision to the people themselves, and take it from the shoulders of their representatives, who ought to discharge that duty. It is for that reason that I should be altogether opposed to the immediate application of this process of the referendum. Now, I was very much struck by the suggestion, at the beginning of this debate, of Mr. McMillan, which seems to me to contain the germs of a settlement of this matter—at all events, so far as my view is concerned. I have said that I am strongly opposed to the referendum for the reasons I have pointed out, if any other mode of settlement can be adopted. I do not see that any other mode can be adopted but an application of the referendum. But I think means should be taken to insure, before its application, a certain amount of discussion under that sense of responsibility which a dissolution entails, and which is necessary before the settlement of any question upon a proper basis. Therefore, I say that if you provide that, before the referendum takes place, there should be a dissolution—if you like, of both houses at the same time; that being, I think, Mr. Holder’s view—that there should be a dissolution of the two houses, whether at the same time or at different periods, it would insure that before the referendum was applied there would be the fullest and freest discussion in the community. Every means would be taken to ascertain whether the opinion of the community could be ascertained without taking a referendum; and when these measures have been adopted and have been found ineffectual, then, and then only, would you resort to this final means.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
What becomes of the individuality of the states in that case?

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR:
The effect of a dissolution before the referendum would be this: in the first place, as my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Wise, reminds me, there would be an education of the people upon the particular question at issue, and upon the views held by the senate and by the house of representatives, and that would meet one of the dangers and one of the difficulties of the referendum itself. One of the difficulties of the referendum is that not only is it a difficult matter for the people to decide a question; but that often they have not before them the means of deciding it. In the case of a general election it is necessary that candidates should go about the country in their own interests, in the interests of their own candidature, explaining fully the views they hold upon the particular question at issue. In the case of the referendum it may be the interest of the government who are supporting or proposing a particular view; it may be the interest of some few members who are opposing that particular view, to represent the opposite case to the people; but there is no interest in any one to give the same explanation, or to provoke the same discussion upon the question at issue in the case of a referendum, as there is in the case of a dissolution; so that you would have, first of all, in the dissolution the question thoroughly explained, and beyond all that, you might be quite certain that the dissolution either of the senate or of the house of representatives would not take place until every available means of arriving at a settlement had been tried and had failed.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
It would be a dissolution of state rights!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
The hon. member need not be afraid of my shirking the question. He says that there would be a dissolution of state rights. That is putting in another form the proposition he stated concisely before—that, as regards any matter within the scope of the federation, the application of the proposed relief means unification. I say that, in the last resort, it does mean unification, as far as the settlement of the particular question is concerned.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
Sensible men do not struggle when the last resort is assured!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Although the hon. member put the case concisely in that way, he will pardon me if I say that he put the proposition somewhat extravagantly, and for this reason: Supposing you are brought to the position of things that I have indicated, in which there is an absolute impossibility of coming to a decision upon some question of vital importance—there being an absolute impossibility of appeal to any authority which can settle the question—

An Hon. MEMBER:
Let it wait!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Supposing, it will not wait? There are of ten questions which will not wait. Suppose that is the case, you would then be put in this position: that a population representing, perhaps, the voters and taxpayers of three-fourths of the commonwealth, would have to wait until it suited the views of the remaining quarter of the voters and taxpayers to come round to a particular decision. I say that if you are brought face to face with that position there must be some decision, or the union cannot possibly remain. It cannot be that in a question of the most vital importance to the whole of these communities three-fourths of the voters or taxpayers of Australia will stand quietly by to be dominated by the votes and opinions of one-fourth. I admit frankly to my hon. friend, that in the last resort the proposal does mean, if a vote has to be taken, unification; but I would point out this to him—that in any case of the application of any of the powers of the constitution you might be brought to an extraordinary state of things if they were used unduly, unreasonably, and improperly. It is in the power of the upper house of any of our colonies to refuse bill after bill sent up to it by the Assembly. It is absolutely within the power of the governor to refuse to assent to measure after measure as passed by both houses of parliament. There is nothing to compel him to give the assent. What is it, in the face of these theoretical powers, which keeps the constitution working? What is it that enables constitutional government to be carried on? It is that it is worked by persons capable of self-government, who have before them one interest, the interest of the whole community, who have continually upon them the pressure of public opinion of the whole community, upon whose will, and subject to whose judgment, the whole business of administration and government is carried on in a free community. I say to the hon. member, therefore, that although in case of this ultimate remedy having to be applied, there might be unification, it never would be applied so long as by a process of reason and compromise, and the exercise of that aptitude for self-government which would exist in this commonwealth as in all similar communities, a settlement could be arrived at—until every other means had been tried and had failed, It would not be until then that this ultimate remedy in the constitution would be resorted to.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

And federation extinguished!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

When the hon. member remembers that, in the ordinary working of the constitution, the senate, representing the states, has equality of representation; when he remembers what the powers of the senate are; when he remembers that the process by which the house of representatives is to be elected secures that there shall be always a certain proportion between the number of the senate and the number of the house of representatives, I say, that for the ordinary working of the constitution, with the power in the hands of the states as exercised in the senate, that is quite sufficient, under all circumstances, to preserve in every possible way the rights of the states. If you are brought face to face with the condition of things I have described, then it means either that you must adopt the principle of unification, or you must run a very great risk of the union being dissolved. Although I have a strong objection to any such process as the referendum, which I have always opposed in its application to a unified state, it is because I wish to see a successful federation, it is because I wish to see federation carried, it is because I wish to see this constitution launched in a way which will not only be complete on paper, but which will work in consideration of all the forces brought to bear upon it, and which it must develop in itself—it is for these reasons that I have come to the conclusion that we must adopt some such method as I have suggested, and which, while not interfering with the strength and the individuality of the states under ordinary circumstances, will place somewhere in the constitution a power, and the only power, which will prevent ultimate disunion instead of union.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[2.52]:

I understood we came here for the purpose of framing a federal constitution, and not a constitution which provided for the unification of the Australian nation, at the sweet will and pleasure of either of the contracting parties. We have been told now that such is not the case. The draft constitution has been before us time after time, and now, at the last moment, we are told deliberately, by a representative of New South Wales, Mr. O'Connor, that he thinks it essential to the establishment of a scheme of this sort that the deliberately expressed opinion of the states, through their representatives, should be set at nought at the desire of the house of representatives and those whom it represents.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

Wiped out!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

Wiped out entirely. All I can say is, and I think, in a matter of this sort, we ought to speak plainly, that I am against that. I am against that in every shape and form. I shall not only be found recording my vote against it here; but I take, at this moment, the responsibility of saying—and I am bound to do it in fairness to those whom I represent—that, if that scheme is carried, I will take the responsibility of stumping the country in South Australia—throughout the length and breadth of the land—to secure its rejection.

Mr. HIGGINS:

There can be stumping on both sides!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I have no doubt whatever what the result will be in the colony from which I come. It may be considered a matter of minor importance, but I take upon myself to say that I have done all I could in this Convention for the purpose of securing a scheme acceptable not only to the colony from which I come, but to Australia generally, and I ask that there may be something in the shape of reciprocity towards the state which I have the peculiar privilege of representing here to-day. I do not think there is a great probability of deadlock. So far as we have gone we have framed a constitution of which we have very good reason to be proud—the most democratic federal constitution that has ever been presented to the acceptance of a free and enlightened country. Now, the question arises: have we left it in this state that it is necessary to make some such artificial provision for deadlock as is now suggested, to give, as it seems to me, to one party to the federation, the nation, the right of over riding the deliberately expressed will of the states in a matter in which they have a right to speak? Something has been said by my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, in regard to the propriety of giving this right to the nation in matters in which state interests are not concerned. I do not know how you can possibly draw the line of demarcation between the two things. If I did, I should only be too delighted to provide that where state interests were not concerned the state should not have a right to obstruct the will of the nation. But I cannot do it. The most we can do is this: to confide to the care of the federation those matters which can be best managed by the federation in the interests of the nation, and of the states combined, and to leave other matters to the states themselves. Federation means practically government and legislation by agreement between the representatives of the nation and of the states, sitting of course in different chambers. Is it likely that there will be a clashing between the states and the nation? I do not think so. I think it is highly improbable, when we recollect that the states and the nation will be practically the same, that the franchise will be the same, and that the houses in which these two bodies are represented differ only in this, that they vote in different groups.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Why equal representation, if that argument is right?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

Have we not discussed and settled that over and over again? Is it necessary to raise the question here? I think, if I recollect rightly, my hon. friend, Mr. Isaacs, only a day or two ago was found voting in favour of equal representation. No doubt he justified his action in his own mind when he gave that vote, and I have heard nothing since to lead me to the conclusion that he had any doubt whatever. The constituents of both chambers are practically the same, but there is a possibility that the representatives in one or other of these two chambers may not faithfully represent the wishes of their constituents. This seems to me the sole source from which there is any fear of a deadlock. I am quite prepared to make every provision with regard to that. I think it is intolerable that the house of representatives, representative I the entire nation, should be subjected to a control by their constituents from which the senate is absolutely free. Why should this be so? Under those circumstances, I am prepared to vote for a double dissolution, for a provision that will enable the senators to be sent to their constituents at the same time that the members of the house of representatives are sent to their constituents, in order that the doubt as to whether the house of representatives are faithfully representing their constituents, or the senators are faithfully representing theirs, may be solved by the vote of the people themselves. As to the present provision, in which the power of dissolution is given simply in the case of the house of representatives, I think it altogether objectionable, and I trust that the senators will be made equally amenable to the control of the constituencies by the extension of the power of dissolution to the senate. Why, I ask, should the senate be free from the control of their constituents? They have a right to speak, and they have only a right to speak, in the interests and as the mouthpiece of their constituents, and if the question arises as to which house is representing the voice of the people, surely it is a right and proper thing to send the senators to their constituents equally with the house of representatives. Therefore I shall welcome any proposition of the character which I suggest. I would go further. If that is not enough, I am prepared to vote for a provision securing a referendum to the constituencies of both houses on the precise question at issue. We know full well that elections are often clouded by a variety of c dissolution will have a most wholesome effect on those who give their votes in connection with the matter. The result of the dissolution will probably solve any doubts on the subject. If you want anything more you can get it in the shape of the reference I suggest.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

But that might not solve the difficulty after all!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I am prepared to go to the length to which I refer. What more do you want in a federal form of government? I can quite understand what you want in a unified form of government, but we want no unified form of government. We are here under distinct statutory authority to frame a federal constitution, and I will be no party to departing from what seems to me to be the first principle of a federal form of government—that there shall be representation and agreement in all interests of federal concern, but that neither one shall be able to over ride the other. If, it is said, by those means you cannot get agreement, or that you cannot get a majority in favour of the proposed bill, what are you to do? Whilst I am not in favour of delay, I deprecate anything in the shape of undue haste, and it seems to me that, much as you may desire to have a complete solution of the question at issue, if you find, after the dissolution and after the referendum, that the states and the people are still at issue, and that a majority in both cannot be obtained for the suggested legislation, your best course is to wait. I have no doubt whatever that in due time those parties-they are not divided in the natural order of things by any strong antagonistic lines; they are the same people inhabiting the same Australia, although living in different states-will be able to work out their own salvation in these matters in the future as they have in the past. I do ask those who have been so untiring in their efforts to frame a constitution worthy of a federated Australia to think what is the full effect of the remarks of our hon. and learned friend, Mr. O'Connor, and then they must see that if we go back to constitutional lines such as be suggested we go back to a constitution which is altogether different from that which it was intended we should frame, and which Australia generally will have nothing whatever to do with.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria)[3.4]:

It would be impossible to disregard either the arguments or the attitude of the right hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat; and those who have followed his path in connection with the discussion of this measure must be free to admit that he has proved himself, on every occasion free from any merely narrow or partisan view of any question submitted for consideration. I know of no position taken up by any hon. member at the Adelaide Convention more distinguished than that which the right hon. gentleman occupied during the memorable debates at that sitting of the Convention when the issue of state rights against national principle was submitted. Consequently, the right hon. member speaks to us to-day with added force and without the necessity of any adventitious addition to his remarks in the way of indication of possible attitude hereafter. I take it that although the right hon. member speaks positively, and with perfect sincerity, he would not have us suppose that his mind is closed against argument, or that if a reasonable scheme, conserving all those rights for which he is so jealous an advocate, be submitted to him, he will yet be precluded from reconsidering some parts, at all events, of the argument which he, has laid before us. I am inclined, for my own part, to agree with him, and to disagree in a very slight measure from my hon. and learned friend, Mr. O'Connor, and the hon. member, Mr. Holder, in the assumption that conflicts between the two houses are likely to be more frequent under the proposed constitution than they have been in our state legislatures.

[P.582] starts here
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

I did not say, or intend to say, that they would be more frequent—I did not offer any opinion at all upon that point. What I did say was that they would be less soluble.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Exactly. I am, therefore, happy to be, as I am generally, in agreement with the hon. and learned member, instead of differing from him even on so minor a point. It appears to me that, based as they are on the same franchise, the possibility of grave differences occurring between the two houses is very much diminished. There is far less likelihood of serious conflict between the two chambers of the federal legislature than between the two chambers of our states legislatures, which are always far more separated in the matter of franchise than these two chambers will be. Receiving their mandate, deriving their authority from the same franchise, although not exactly in the same numerical proportion, the two chambers, it appears to me, must necessarily, on all major questions, be brought into line in a shorter period of time than we can expect our houses of legislature in the different colonies to be brought into line. While this may well relieve our anxiety when we regard the proposals for the various means of settling difficulties, when they do arise, if ever they do, it need not lead us to the conclusion that, because it appears extremely unlikely that grave difficulties will ever or oft arise, we are therefore relieved from the necessity of making such a provision. As the hon. and learned member. Mr. O'Connor, pointed out, we must take into account the different quality of these two houses, and the enormously greater power of resistance we are giving to the second chamber in this federal constitution, far greater than any second chamber possesses in our several colonies. It is on the broadest franchise. Representing the people in every sense of the term, that chamber will be a far more formidable opponent of the chamber of representatives than any legislative council could possibly be. Under this constitution we are creating on the one side a senate and on the other side a house of representatives with its executive—and the executive is the important element in most of these considerations. We are creating in these two chambers, under our form of government, what you may term an irresistible force on the one side, and what may prove to be an immovable object on the other side, and the problem of what might happen if these two were brought into contact-

Mr. MCMILLAN:

How could they?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

The hon. gentleman sees the point. The problem of what might happen if those two forces were brought into conflict is one that I will leave to some gentleman from his sagacious country to solve. It is therefore not because of the possibility of frequent deadlocks that I attach importance to this provision-on the contrary, the possibility of deadlocks appears to me to be very remote-but it is on account of their gravity when they do occur, and the impossibility of solving them, that renders it imperative that we should seek to devise some means by which their severity may be mitigated and a constitutional agreement arrived at. Let us look for one moment at the various solutions which have been submitted to us and look at them first from the important standpoint of their sufficiency. The right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, in what must be to him an unfamiliar tone, and following an unfamiliar path, was led to express the opinion that a little delay was at times a very useful factor in political settlements, and even to at last-ask the question, "Why, if there be a difficulty, should not the difficulty remain? Why should we be compelled to find a solution for it in this constitution?"

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I said that the people should be allowed to work out their own salvation!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Yes; but they may do it at the expense of the salvation of the great interests of the country, and that the right hon. member will agree with me is not desirable. What we seek to attain in this Convention-and if we cannot attain it absolutely we desire to secure the nearest approach to it-is finality. This, as the right hon. member knows, is absolutely essential under any constitution. If one could imagine the possibility-and one can scarcely conceive it-no one could contentedly survey the prospect of two houses in perpetual conflict upon serious questions of public policy. The position, as the right hon. member knows, would be intolerable. Some solution of their disputes is to be sought, and the right hon. member will admit that the nearer it approaches to a final and satisfactory solution the better. The great, and practically the overwhelming, argument of finality is in favour of the application of the referendum on the lines suggested by the hon. member, Mr. Holder-with whose utterances I am fortunate enough to find myself in agreement, and doubly happy in recognising the federal spirit in South Australia, which, when it deprives us of one valuable auxiliary in the person of its Premier, gives us another almost fit to take his place—the contention of the hon. member, Mr. Holder, when he submitted that, at all events, his proposal for a referendum provides us with absolute finality, was surely unanswerable. It would settle the question in accordance with the will of the majority, and upon constitutional lines.
The Hon. J.H. Howe:
But with the death of the states!
The Hon. A. Deakin:
That it gives finality is its most conspicuous merit, a merit which surely none of us would pass by lightly, because it is one not to be disregarded; it is a claim which being granted as it should be, must weigh greatly with all of us. Let hon. members take every other proposition which has been submitted to us, and I think it will be granted that not one of them provides, either in the same manner or degree, for absolute finality. Take your double dissolution. It may settle the difficulty and it may not. Take the referendum, counting both by states and by numbers, which the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, is prepared to accept as a last resort.

The Right Hon. C.C. Kingston:
The double majority of the states and of the nation!
The Hon. A. Deakin:
Quite so. That, as the right hon. member sees, does not provide for finality under all conditions. It might leave you with the vote of the states on the one side and of the people on the other. In this connection I welcome as a truly federal suggestion the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, that if the numbers of the states should chance to be equal, the numerical majority of the people might have sway. That is a, proposal which, I trust, will receive the attention of his hon. colleague, the Premier of South Australia. But these proposals for meeting deadlocks, while they would meet and dispose of most deadlocks, do not and cannot be alleged to dispose of all possibility of what I might term a permanent deadlocks. They do not provide that certainty of finality which the national referendum secures. Consequently, if for any reason we are compelled to accept one of these less perfect proposals, the right hon. member will admit that at the very outset we are embodying a safeguard in the measure which, under some circumstances, must fail to have effect. I do not say that this is an unanswerable objection; but it is an objection which should be taken into consideration. Where the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, and the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, approach this subject from a standpoint which commits them to many mistakes is in adopting that continual assumption which I am almost ashamed again to combat, that difficulties will often arise in the federal parliament between the states as states. I would once more submit, putting forward the argument again with apologies, that the contentions in the senate or out of it, and especially any contention between the two houses, will not and cannot arise upon questions in regard to which states will be ranked against states. As was pointed out by the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, in the United States, and also in Switzerland, and in Canada, as here, the whole of the states will be divided into two parties. Contests between the two houses will only arise when one party is in possession of a majority in the one chamber, and the other in the possession of a majority in the other chamber. We have had it submitted to us that probably the senate will be the more radical house of the two. I am willing to accept that suggestion for the purposes of my argument, though the argument is equally good either way. The house of representatives would then be the more conservative body, and it is possible that a more conservative party in the house of representatives would be confronted by a more radical party in the senate. In both cases the result after a dissolution would be the same. The men returned as radicals would vote as radicals; the men returned as conservatives would vote as conservatives. The contest will not be, never has been, and cannot be, between states and states. It must be and will be between the representatives of the states according to the different political principles upon which they are returned. In the United States of Ame

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
Because the whole machine is held in check by party government!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Yes; and that supports my argument. This machine will be held in check by party government.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
We do not desire party government as it exists in America!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I cannot say what the hon. member desires; but unless he embodies his desires in this bill, they will have no effect upon the constitution. Whether he desires it or not, it is certain that once this constitution is framed, it will be followed by the creation of two great national parties. Every state, every district, and every municipality, will sooner or later be divided on the great ground of principle, when principles emerge.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
It is not principle which is the line of demarcation in America!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Of course the hon. member is free to his opinion; but there are broad lines of demarcation between the Democratic and Republican parties in America, and the numerous quotations of American precedents which have been made prove it. The hon. member has himself adopted the doctrine as to state rights of one party in American politics, and many of us have adopted the doctrine of the other party; which disproves his contention that there are no principles in American politics. There are principles in American politics, and they are a governing force, though I am willing to admit that, owing to their party machinery, these principles have a less certain application than under our form of government. The hon. member's objection was that party government would not exist in the future federated Australia.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
Not as it exists in America!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Not as it exists in America; but it will exist in the commonwealth, as it exists to-day in New South Wales, in Victoria, in Tasmania, in South Australia, and in the mother country. Our system, even more that the American system, implies government by party. It is an important fact that we propose to adopt in this federal constitution the same form of responsible government that we employ in these colonies. That in itself is a guarantee that party government must be introduced here. It makes party government, if it be only the parties of the "ins" and the "outs," an absolute necessity in federated Australia. I apologise for elaborating this part of my subject to such an extent, but it is my main contention, the key of the whole. If what I contend be true, and I believe most firmly it is true, this conception of the larger states combining against the smaller states in the senate, or of the smaller states being coerced under a referendum by the larger states, is a mistaken apprehension. It is not in the least degree a question as to where the population is. It is a question how the population will be politically divided. We can set aside entirely the dread about the effect of the referendum being the voting down of the small states. Such a prospect is absolutely inconceivable. Is the whole of the Victorian delegation on these benches, on this question or any other, except one or two leading issues, anything like solid?

Mr. SYMON:
It is just the same with the smaller states!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Quite so. Mr. SYMON: Then there is no need for a referendum!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I will deal with that afterwards. The Victorian delegation, and, I believe, the New South Wales delegation, were practically elected on what is known as a ticket. In spite of that circumstance, note the great differences of opinion between the members of those delegations. As for supposing that the Victorian population will vote as a whole on any of the party questions that can be submitted to them, it is such a halcyon condition of affairs that it cannot be dreamed of by anybody who has lived in Victoria. The whole community is so divided that party spirit sometimes runs to an extreme, and one party and another will even endanger great public objects to gain their own ends. I make no exceptions. I believe party spirit is just as keen in other colonies. The division of our electors into liberals and conservatives exists, as the hon. member, Mr. Symon, says, in every small colony. What does it prove? It certainly does not prove that under the referendum the large populations would overwhelm the small populations. It proves that this can never be the case on any issue submitted. The question remitted to the referendum will divide the votes in every state, and the side which will win will be that side which has the greater number of adherents in the group.

The Hon. N.J. BROWN:
Will not that affect the elections in the same way?
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Exactly. I have been endeavouring to contend so.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Then you do not want the referendum!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
If the argument is good it must apply both ways. I am now dealing with the case put by the hon. members, Mr. Symon and Mr. Gordon. They say that the small states will be voted down by the referendum. I am showing that it is inconceivable, and that the party which will win is the party which will have most voters in the federation in favour of a particular view of the question submitted. It will not be a state question in any sense of the word, and it cannot be. All the states will be divided according to the opinions of their citizens without regard to the size of the states. The Right Hon. C.C. Kingston very fairly said that he recognised the weakness of his own proposal in one respect, because he admitted that there were certain questions likely to become matters of dispute between the two houses which were not state questions.

Mr. SYMON:
No!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I will put it in a more modified form: He said there were certain questions which might possibly become questions of dispute between the two chambers, which would be national questions, and should be settled on national lines, but which he thought it necessary to insist should be settled not on national lines, but on state lines, because be saw no way of dividing those issues one from the other. Now I turn to the clause which gives the commonwealth its powers, and I find included among them: census, statistics, currency, banking, insurance, weights and measures, bills of exchange, bankruptcy, copyrights and patents, naturalisation, foreign corporations, marriage and divorce. I ask myself what possible ground can there be for contending that these involve state rights.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

The hon. member is omitting the power of taxation!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I take the subjects as they come. I do not say that there are not others which may hold a dual position. But I take these powers as they follow.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Those are comparatively innocuous. Take some others!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

If the hon. member admits that, he supports my case, because those are typical of the great bulk of the subjects.

An Hon. MEMBER:

No!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I say the great bulk of them are of that character, and am open to refutation if I am wrong, I should say that the whole of the thirty-seven subjects, but, indisputably, the great bulk of them, are subjects on which no question of state rights and state interests could arise except by the merest accident. It is, as the right hon. gentleman admitted, a grave defect in our constitution if we permit these questions to be left for all time to be determined in a purely states house, or by a state referendum, when those questions are not state questions—when they ought to be decided, not on state lines, but on national lines, and by a national referendum.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

The hon. member assumes that the senate would disregard its clear duty and deal with those questions on state lines!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I am taking the argument of the right hon. gentleman as a good argument. I think it is. I look at the thirty-seven powers proposed to be conferred on the future federal parliament. My challenge is that those who hold a contrary opinion, and who believe that any of those thirty-seven powers are likely to involve state rights and state interests, should prove that, such is the case. It will take them all their time to do so.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Take No. 31!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

That is the control and navigation of the river Murray, one of those special questions on which a particular state right is involved. I am not discussing them now; but I, for one, would not have the slightest objection to exclude No. 31 from the operation of the national referendum. But the hon. member will find that, with the exception of some two or three subjects out of the whole thirty-seven allotted to the federal parliament, there is no possibility of conflict between the state and the nation. Yet, in order to maintain these, he will sacrifice what he confesses should be granted, that is, the national control over thirty-three or thirty-four questions.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

I make no such exception!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

That was the contention of the right hon. the Premier of South Australia.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

No!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I agree so cordially with a great many of the remarks of the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, with reference to the conditions under which the reference to the popular vote should be safeguarded that I do not propose to detain the Convention by repeating them. The referendum is always a last resort. I do, however, say that with regard to the precedents which are being cited, not only with respect to the United States, but with respect to Switzerland, and other federations, we have always to remember not only that party lines will be the governing lines of our politics, but that the existence of an executive dependent on the will of parliament, and not holding office for a fixed term, reverses the significance of many of the precedents taken from the United States. It was asked to-day what takes place when a difficulty arises between the two houses in the United States, and the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, having asked this question, answered it. He pointed out that those questions settled themselves. Why are they allowed to settle themselves in the United States on terms on which we cannot hope to settle them here? Because in the United States the executive is removed from the conflict of the two chambers. It is absolutely indifferent as an executive to the result of the conflict. A deadlock between the two houses in the United States can be allowed to settle itself, because there is no government responsible to parliament. But a deadlock under responsible government as we have it in Australia is an entirely different problem.
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
That is against you!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Do not let the hon. member attach too much weight to that until I have finished. What I am pointing out in the first instance marks an immense distinction, which cannot be lost sight of. A deadlock in the United States can be safely left to burn itself out.

An Hon. MEMBER:
You may make the American Constitution prove anything you choose!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I am endeavouring to show that it will not prove what some of the hon. member's friends are attempting to prove.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Why not?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
In America the ministry sits apart. It is appointed for a fixed term, and disputes between the two houses in the United States have no effect on the executive government.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
What is the hon. and learned member citing the case of America for then?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Because those who agree with my hon. friend have been citing it, and I disagree with their interpretations. I find that there is no analogy between any Australian government and the Government of the United States.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
What government are you offering us?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I understand that my hon. friend as President of the Legislative Council of Tasmania rules both houses of parliament in that colony under an absolute but benevolent despotism. I have no desire to interfere with it as long as he enjoys it. It seems to me that the difference between responsible government as we know it and the United States Government tells altogether in favour of the necessity of our insisting upon some solution of deadlocks. If the executive government of the day is, as it is with us, a party to a deadlock, and it must be a party taking the side of the chamber in which it has a majority, its own fortunes are staked on the issue, and instead of standing aside, as in America, it throws into the scale the whole of its force and energy. It stakes its life carrying the struggle to a successful
Then you prove that that is not the proper government for the commonwealth!

The hon. member may follow that line if he likes, but that is the kind of government we are shaping and will have to deal with.

Bryce strongly supports what the hon. member is saying now!

I believe he does, although I have forgotten the passage. A deadlock is a very much more serious struggle, is very much more embittered, and carries with it far greater consequences under our form of government than under their form of government.

How does that help you?

That helps my argument that if deadlocks with us are so much more serious than they can be in the United States or Switzerland, we have need for a special provision which clearly is not necessary in either the United States or Switzerland. In Canada of course the different mode of constituting the senate renders the circumstances very different. Neither of these three federations affords us any clue as to the necessity in our constitution of a cure for deadlocks. Finally, I recur to the main point of the pithy address of my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Gordon, and of the very powerful statement of the right hon. gentleman who presides over the Government of South Australia. That is, to say, that to grant this proposal for the ultimate solution of deadlocks by means of a national vote has to be rejected because it is not federal, and because it means unification.

Because it extinguishes state rights!

Because it extinguishes state rights. I take leave to waive aside the use of the word "federal." Each man in this Convention, and most people out of it, call federal what they prefer in the way of federation, and they instantly denounce as anti-federal that which does not fall in with their own scheme. As far as I understand the federations of this world, they have been drawn on different lines, and with different principles embodied in them.
We improve as we go on!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I hope so. The real point is whether there can be no unification in a federation. I submit that there can, and that there ought to be. Even our antagonists practically admit that there can and that there ought to be. They admit that in the powers conferred on the federal government, there are a host of questions, like the question of patents, and other questions, which have no relevancy as state questions, which are purely national questions, which are included in this bill because they are national issues, which ought to be dealt with only on national lines. That is to say, we are unifying on those questions in this measure because unification is the proper step to take, and because the natural and necessary corollary of that unification is that they should be decided, as far as possible, as all questions of unification should be decided, on national lines-by the rule of the majority.

I take it that the burden rests upon my hon. friend to show that you cannot have Unification of our patent law without injury to federation. I submit that the very object of federation, so far as the patent law is concerned, is to have unification, I might weary hon. members by citing power after power in clause 52 upon which unification is essential.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

The hon. member means uniformity!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Uniformity of legislation means legislative unification.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

It means unification of the states!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

What I say is, that while there may be questions, and a few questions, on which the safeguard to the states that the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, desires, can fairly be accorded, as regards the remainder of the powers the word "federation" has no meaning, unless it carries with it unification.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I do not agree with the hon. member!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

If my hon. and learned friend follows out the principle, which I heard him no later than yesterday enunciate to this Convention, to what appears to me to be its natural, I dare not say, its logical, conclusion, I think he will find that it points most inescapably to the admission of the fact that on most of the questions on which we federate, what we want is unification. We only succeed so far as we obtain it. My hon. friend, Mr. Gordon, is also one of the trust the parliament members, who have manifested their federal spirit. What is it that he fears in the vote of the more populous colonies on a whole host of these issues? The hon. member is a distinguished representative of the liberal party of South Australia, and on questions which are included in the powers of the commonwealth, when they are dealt with on liberal lines, the hon. member will have behind him the votes of the liberals of New South Wales, Victoria, and every part of Australia. The only antagonism he will have to face will be the antagonism of the conservative character which he has in his own colony. What has he to fear on these subjects on which unification is sought and obtained in this bill, even from the national referendum which he terms the mass vote of the whole of the electors? He knows the politics of the other colonies, if not as well as his own, sufficiently well to know that they move much on the same lines as his own. Will he not then apply his own argument of trust the people on this particular issue? Why will he not trust the people of the larger colonies on these party questions to vote in accordance with their principles as they always do in local politics? Why should they vote as liberals in local politics and suddenly become conservatives in federal politics? It seems to me that if the hon. member will follow out his argument to its conclusion, he will see that there is no state risk in this matter, and that the rule of the majority can be applied without injustice to any of the smaller states or any part of their population. If this leads to unification at all, it will only give us that unification which is essential to the proper fulfilment of the federal principle.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[3.30]:

It has been said that there is a time to build up and a time to pull down. We have been engaged in the very great task, and a task to which we have devoted a great deal of wisdom and prudence, of building up. We have now reached a point at which, it seems to me, we are asked to pull down a very considerable portion of the splendid edifice we have been rearing. My hon. friend who has just sat down says that what he wants to secure by the referendum is absolute finality. He will secure absolute finality. He will absolutely finish the smaller states of this continent and destroy their identity in the constitution. The answer to the contention which he has urged with so much force in favour of the referendum, or some form of referendum, is that given by my hon. friend, Mr. O'Connor, that it means, in the ultimate resort, unification. If we are to have unification in the ultimate resort, or at any period of this so-called federal system, we may just as well have it first as last. That is what the whole of the argument comes to. We are diverging from the path which we have been asked to follow in connection with the framing of this Commonwealth Bill; we are at the parting of the ways; we are in the position now of having had an instalment of what, on paper looks like federation; and we are asked to give all that up in order to accept in the ultimate resort that is the qualification unification. All I can say is that if the members of this Convention are prepared to accept unification at any stage the sooner we do it the better. If we are prepared to accept unification, then, I say, we had better not pack up our portmanteaus but-

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

An Hon. MEMBER:

Mr. SYMON:

I have received so many suggestions that there is an embarrassment of riches; and I scarcely know how to put in words the amalgam to the Convention. If the motive of the amendment in favour of the referendum is, as candidly and frankly confessed by Mr. O'Connor, then I say we are here under false pretences. Our enabling act says we are here to establish federation. If we are going to have recourse either directly or indirectly, either primarily or as a last resort, to unification, then we ought to dissolve this Convention and ask our parliaments to frame another act to bring us together. If the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, felt a degree of alarm in consequence of the spell which might be exercised by what he called the eloquence of our esteemed colleague, Mr. Holder, how much more alarmed should be feel from the combined eloquence of my hon. friends, Mr. Holder and Mr. Deakin? When my hon. friend, Mr. Deakin, was addressing us, I was reminded of the lines:

For he, by spells of glamour bright,
Could make a lady seem a knight,
And cobwebs on a dungeon wall
Seem tapestry in lordly hall,
And youth seem age, and age seem youth
But...........
And this is the consolation-
All was delusion-naught was truth.
I commend these lines to my hon. friend, Mr. Gordon.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

It is of no use; he is a teetotaller!

Mr. SYMON:
I am delighted with that suggestion, and for that reason I give him the stimulus the innocuous stimulus of the lines which have been called to my memory. But that is by the way only. I regret that my hon. friend, Mr. Gordon, was not proof, as strongly proof as he ought to have been, against the blandishments of the hon. member, Mr. Holder. He yielded, I think, locks occurring; and I sometimes think that this mania, for a referendum arises either from great timidity or from a strong desire of domination. It seems to me either the one or the other. That there may be as undoubtedly there will, between all legislative bodies differences and disputes, we all admit. None of us can doubt for a moment that these differences and disputes will arise; but a deadlock is, to my mind, a totally different thing. Of course a deadlock requiring to be controlled by some artificial means is a mischievous thing. I cannot remember anything in the nature of a deadlock that is, such a situation between the two houses as practically amounts to, I might almost say, a condition of civil war. I did not speak earlier in this debate, because I waited in the hope that someone would give us instances. Is there any instance of a deadlock such as we have in mind under any system of responsible government?

An Hon. MEMBER:
No!
Mr. SYMON:
Is there any instance under the American Constitution?
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
That is not responsible government!
Mr. SYMON:
Of course my hon. friend will give me credit for knowing that the American system is not a system of responsible government. I ask, is there under responsible governments system which we hope to establish, and in order to secure which I would like to see everything introduced into this constitution which can properly and fairly bring it about any instance of real deadlock? Is there any instance under the federal system of what has been held up to us as a deadlock that is, not merely a difference of opinion, or a dispute between two houses, but something which practically, stops the civil government of the country? I am not aware of any. Therefore, I accept the position put with so much power by the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, that it is unlikely, that it is improbable, that anything of the sort will occur; and I say, why insert in the federal constitution a provision at variance with and destructive of the federal idea, when there is no possible or conceivable likelihood of its ever being called into force? It seems to me to be opposed to the ordinary dictates of common-sense to introduce so debatable, so questionable a contrivance a contrivance with which we as British subjects are not familiar in order simply to gratify it may be a passing whim. I think we had much better free ourselves from the domination of this word "deadlock," and merely look upon it as a matter of difference and dispute between the two houses to which, in the ordinary course of things as has happened over and over again time, consideration, moderation, intelligence, in addition to the ordinary force of public opinion, will offer a solution. My hon. friend said a minute ago that the American Constitution was different, that in America a dispute burnt itself out. I firmly believe that any dispute between the two great houses we are going to establish on the finest basis ever imagined will burn itself out.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It will fizzle out!

Mr. SYMON:

It will fizzle out. I will give one reason in addition to these already urged. If you have a dissolution of the senate upon any question as to which there is a dispute between the two houses, you will give time, or, to use the expressive phrase of my hon. friend, you will permit it to fizzle out, a state of things we should all so much desire to see. To introduce into the constitution needlessly, as it seems to me, a coercive power, will tend to make the men to whom you, in the course of events, commit the executive power of the country, overbearing and unreasonable. It will undoubtedly have that tendency. I do not mind, as I have said, something to secure that both houses shall be in constant contact with their own constituents and I desire to say a word or two with regard to the scheme which applies in our own colony. I do not follow my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, when he says that the method adopted in our colony shows the desirableness in a federation of something further. It has quite the opposite effect. We have had now in our colony since 1882 a scheme under which, surrounded with the necessary safeguards in the event of a difference between the two houses, the upper house may be dissolved. So effective has that mechanism been, that it has not been called into operation in the fifteen years during which the act has been upon our statute book. If that be the case in our unified system in the state, why should it not have exactly the same effect under a federation? If we want more than that, it lies with the advocates of those who say there should be something beyond to give us a very conclusive reason for it. Now the dissolution of the senate is a proposal which, at any rate, will command the consent of people of ordinary common-sense. To dissolve the senate, under whatever conditions you establish it, is to send it back to its own constituents. That is a principle of dissolution we may understand; but, if you superadd to that the referendum, you are overawing the constituents of the senate by another body, another constituency, to which as state representatives they owe no allegiance. That is the position I take up. I say that the senator would be a man of no self-respect who would occupy a position of that kind. You would fetter and gag him in his representation of the state he comes from. You would tell him: "It is true you may consider this matter vital to the interests of your particular colony; you may support it by all the power you command; you may be prepared to face a dissolution of the senate and to go to your own constituency on the subject. It does not matter two straws what you do. If, after that, you do not fall into line with the senators from the larger states, or with those whose decisions are in harmony with those of the executive government of the day, we will bring the referendum into operation, and we will smother your independence by a block vote of the larger states of the commonwealth."

Mr. TRENWITH:

Either smother the independence of the senate or the independence of the people!

Mr. SYMON:

Not at all. My hon. friend is no greater friend of the power of the people than I am. I desire that the people should exercise their just influence in every respect, and I say that it is the duty of the representatives of the people in the senate and in the house of representatives to how to the will of the people. But there are two peoples. There is the democracy of my state, and there is the democracy of the commonwealth; and does my hon. friend tell me that the democracy of the commonwealth the combined force of two big states or the single force of one is to coerce or tyrannise over the democracy I represent? I decline to accept that position for a moment. I feel that this question raises state interests as they have never been raised before, because equal representation in the senate was felt to be a necessity of federation. If you establish a referendum, you rob equal representation of all its strength and of all its virtue.

Mr. HIGGINS:

You rob it of its poison!

Mr. SYMON:

My hon. friend, who is always poisoning something or other, says that you poison it. It is an excellent expression. To put equal representation into the scales on one side and the referendum into the other side is to absolutely outweigh equal representation and to prevent its having any weight or effect whatever in the federal system we are seeking to create.
think it was my hon, friends, Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Holder, who spoke of difficulties being put in the way that is to say, that before the referendum is to be brought into operation you are to have a great many stiles over which the democracy is to be called upon to jump. Now, that does not lessen the mischief of the referendum; but if you are going to introduce into this constitution a machine which is to be made, so to speak, unworkable, or which is to be so surrounded by conditions and obstacles so that it will not be brought into operation, why on earth are you going to put it there at all? Is it not simply deluding the people of the country? It is said that there ought to be no fear, because the thing will not be brought into operation, as it will cost, one hon. member suggested, £50,000 each time it is applied. "It will cost," he said, £50,000 to have a referendum. Do you think that any government would lightly, or, it maybe at all, call that expensive instrument into operation. Therefore, accept it." I say, "No"; let us put into this constitution things which can, if needed, be brought into operation. Let us not tell the people of this country, those of them who honestly believe and I admit there are many that you ought to have some referendum because they believe in the domination of the big populations, that they are getting what they ask when you believe it to be a sham. If the people say, "We want this referendum, because we believe in the ultimate domination of the majority of the people," then you are simply deluding them, when you attach to what you offer them conditions which you say are going to prevent it being brought into actual working. How is it to be commended to us? If it is surrounded in that way, if it is to have these walls erected in front of it, so that the jump cannot be taken, then I say "keep it out."

An Hon. MEMBER:

You are to have a dissolution as well!

Mr. SYMON:

And you are to have a dissolution as well. You are to pile up expense on expense; you are to harass the people in a way which I do not believe they would tolerate, if they understood it. I do not believe the people of this country, who most desire a referendum, would accept it if they thought it was to be first one dissolution, and then another dissolution first a dissolution of the people's house, then a dissolution of the states house, then a referendum to the people, or a double referendum, or something of that kind, I say I do not believe they would stand it.

An Hon. MEMBER:
And then an extra dissolution!

Mr. SYMON:

Yes, and so we might go on for ever. Why, we are men of common-sense! The people of this country are of English blood. They are reasonable beings; they are not like people of the continent of Europe amongst whom, it has been sought to transplant the English form of government. We know how these things, many things, we cannot think out, work themselves out, and I say this will work itself out. But we are going back again to first principles. To introduce the referendum is to introduce a principle alien to the federal system, which we are creating. Another reason given and I only deal with it because it struck me the moment it was put as one that might lead to some confusion—is this, that not only was it not likely to be brought into force, but that it would not be brought into operation unless there was some great conflict. We all know that if disputes between houses of parliament reached a stage, after successive dissolutions, when something of this kind was likely to have any operation, we should be in a very parlous plight indeed, We must also remember that men would be in a condition of inflamed mind—their political passions would be excited—and there would be a struggle amongst them for control and domination. Now, is that a time to put a weapon of this kind, a sword of this sort, into the hands of people in such a condition of mind and such a condition of passion?

The sight of means to do ill deeds makes ill deeds done.

You have only to put this weapon into the hands of a powerful government, a government that considers itself as resting, not upon the just principles of equality between states, but resting upon what they believe to be the clamour of a particular and more popular section of the community, and what might they not do? I am not very familiar with the ways and methods of politicians and statesmen in power who are driven to bay; but I know this: that any man who is driven to

Mr. TRENWITH:

A successful revolution would mean the revolt of a majority against the power of a minority!

Mr. SYMON:

The majorities my hon. friend has in view had better revolt now, and have done with it. Let us get it over. I object to come under a system of government in which I am always going to have this sword of revolution hanging over my head. I do not think it is going to be. The omens for this union are much happier than that. At any rate, I appeal to my hon. friends, whether they agree with me or not—I offer no reproaches of any kind, there is a broad foundation upon which this contention may rest, as I have admitted, the domination of the large populations, and I appeal to my hon. friends whether it is not true that if we were face to face with revolution, an attempt to refer the question to the people of the larger states, would not intensify that revolutionary feeling on the part of the smaller ones.

Mr. TRENWITH:
It is proposed to refer it to the people of all the states!

Mr. SYMON:
I know; but what does it mean? It means that the smaller populations, to whom you conceded I use the word so as to be as moderate as possible equal representation in the senate, are not to have equal representation when it comes to be voted as a matter of referendum.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Why should the division be by states?

Mr. SYMON:
We have made that division.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Why should the questions, which may arise to bring about deadlocks, be only between states and states?

Mr. SYMON:
My hon. friend means why should the question be one between the states. I hope there will be no such questions. I hope that the differences will be, if at all, as they are now, in the harmless, though sometimes irritating, disputes that take place between the two houses, and upon similar subjects to those which have been alluded to with so much interesting detail by my hon. friend, Mr. Deakin. But if the questions are not likely to divide states from states, why do you want the referendum to coerce the smaller states?

Mr. TRENWITH:
Not to coerce the states, but to settle the question!

Mr. SYMON:
If the question in dispute is not one that is to divide the states, surely if you send the senators back to their own states, and they are brought in touch with the people of their states, you get all you want? If I could see that this was to be limited to questions of mere social legislation, or many other matters that my hon. friend will remember much better than I could suggest them to him, that would afford a conclusive argument for ceasing the discussion of the referendum. You do not want it. It is only where the cleavage of states comes in that there is any necessity for overpowering the less populous centres by the more populous centres.
The Hon. S. FRASER:

Mr. SYMON:

With great deference to my hon. friend's very large and wide experience upon all these matters, if the bill in dispute is not one that divides the states from one another, I can see, even from his point of view, no hope whatever in the referendum. If it is not a question that divides the states, but is some mere matter of what I might call, if I may so express it, municipal politics, then there is not likely to be any difference between the pressure which the states will bring upon their senators who are against a question of that kind than the pressure that would be exercised if you submitted the question to a referendum of the entire people as one body. I have referred to a point which has been made in regard to the referendum and-responsible government. I say that the referendum is entirely inconsistent with responsible government. I could understand the referendum being adopted in America and possibly it might be a solution of many of the difficulties and troubles which afflict the process of government in the United States. I could understand the referendum being adopted there, because what happens there is this: You have a president an irresponsible president elected by the people, through their conventions, for a term of four years. He may be in a position of utter discord with both houses of Congress for the whole four years. Subject to the majority power, with which I need not trouble hon. members, he may veto their measures, he may hamper their legislation, he may hamper the administration they desire; but there is no means whatever of bringing the President into touch with the people, or of bringing the influence of the people to bear on the President directly.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Would not the referendum there equally apply to state rights as it would in Australia?

Mr. SYMON:

Undoubtedly it would. I am dealing with the matter of responsible government, and I say that there is no place for the referendum under the system of responsible government. Subject to the matter with which I have already dealt, and to which I do not wish to go back, there might be a place for it in a federal system like that of America, where some crucial measure is supported by both houses of Congress, and where the President maintains an obstinate opposition to it.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

They have their remedy!

Mr. SYMON:

They have a remedy, of course; but I am not dealing with their remedy, which is a two-thirds vote. I say that the referendum would not be inconsistent with a system like that, in order to bring the president into touch with the people. On the other hand, the President maybe in absolute harmony with the people, and the two houses of Congress may be in opposition to the will of the people. Some question may suddenly arise, and then could understand having the referendum to bring the two houses of congress into harmony with the people, and to prevent them from using their two-thirds vote in order to secure the passing of a law to which the president, backed up by the people, is opposed. But those are speculative questions with which I do not propose to deal. All I suggest for the consideration of hon. members is this: So far as I am aware, the referendum cannot in principle co-exist with any system of responsible government, and if you give the referendum you weaken responsible government, and you destroy what lies at the very foundation of it the responsibility of the ministry to the popular chamber; and this in itself, as we intend to have it under this constitution, is a magnificent safeguard. I say that is a long stretch towards the referendum which my hon. friends advocate, because the ministry are responsible to the house of representatives. We have taken pains in regard to the money portions of this bill to secure, as far as possible, that shall be the case, and having the ministry of the day in the people's house, we have made a long stride; we have made a vast concession in putting them in that position for the purposes of the federal government. More than that, I venture to say that the referendum is neither required, nor is it consistent with the position in which we now stand. The only other remark I would make about the American Constitution is this: Of course we are not called upon to imitate that or any other constitution, but we must remember this put so forcibly, I think, by my hon. friend, Mr. McMillan, this morning that the senate, under the American system, is a check on the president. Here we have adopted responsible government. Under this system it is the house of representatives that really will govern the nation which we are about to create. It is the house of representatives that will be the president, in point of fact, of this united community; and if we are to have a bi-cameral system at all, we want some sort of check on them not an ultimate check. I do not think that hon. members pretend it is, or offer it as, an ultimate check on general legislation. I think that it would be the bounden duty of the senate to offer resistance to the death to anything like interference with state rights, but on general legislation they would not do so. They would be a body of reasonable men, but their function would be none the less to exercise that check when called upon to do it.
Mr. TRENWITH:
There is a difference between a check and an insuperable barrier!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Check and checkmate!

Mr. SYMON:
Exactly. You have taken all the powers from the senate which put it in the position of being able to checkmate, and I am sure that my hon. friend opposite, who is as reasonable and as open to conviction as any man I ever met, will see that, at any rate, it is worthy of consideration whether it is at all likely that on a subject of general legislation, as to which alone it is contended the referendum may be applied, there would be the slightest likelihood of a body of men such as those who will hold a position in the senate on the same franchise as the other house imposing an insuperable barrier against the requirements of civil government and of advancing progress. I myself do not think they would. There is only one other word that I should like to say. My hon. and learned friend, Mr. O'Connor, said that if the difference between states is of such a serious character, the same public opinion that is in the states will send back the same people, and my hon. and learned friend added and that establishes the difference between his position and the one which the hon. member, Sir Graham Berry, has so clearly put to me in the course of the remarks I have been making, my hon. and learned friend contemplates that the only case in which the referendum would apply, would be where the conflict is between states.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I did not say that it would apply, but that it would be absolutely necessary!

Mr. SYMON:
If my hon. friend concedes that it is only when it would be absolutely necessary that it would apply, that conclusively shows that these are certainly the cases in which it ought not to be applied. My hon. and learned friend admitted that it was unification.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
As to these questions!

Mr. SYMON:
It is unification of state interests, which are the only interests to which it must necessarily be applied. If it is unification of state interests at that stage it is worse than proportional representation, because it is destructive of the interests which it is our bounden duty to conserve at all hazards. As I am reminded, if it is unification on those great occasions, it must equally be unification in principle as to everything which can be the subject of the referendum. I put it to my hon. friend, plagiarising for a moment an expression of which the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, has almost the monopoly, if that is not the logical conclusion of his argument? These, I think, are the main points which are involved in this very serious question, because to us it is serious in the last degree. You have heard a declaration, Mr. Chairman, as to the course that will be taken by one hon. member, and I think I may say, speaking in sorrow and not in any spirit of threat or menace, it is the course which may have to be taken by each one of us. You have given us a concession, if you prefer to call it a concession, we are willing to accept it on your own phrase, although we claim it as an absolute right and having given it to us in that spirit we say to you, do not take it away from us in any indirect fashion. Do not "keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope," for that will be the result of introducing this amendment with regard to the referendum. The federal system, as my hon. friend, Mr. McMillan, pointed out this morning, is no doubt, an artificial system; but artificial though it may be, it is the product of a highly cultivated political intelligence. If we adopt the referendum we are absolutely reactionary. We are going back to something which may have had application and efficacy in those archaic times to which the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, alluded with so much effect in the Adelaide session of the Convention; but it is absolutely inapplicable to the present condition of things. It is wholly destructive of the equality of representation which we are to hold to in the fabric of our constitution. I ask all hon. members at this stage not to insist upon an amendment which will make the whole business a hideous unreality. You may succeed I do not know that you will not in carrying the amendment; but it will be the most serious blow to federation yet struck. "Shall it be love or hate, John?" wrote Russell Lowell. "It's you that's to decide." It is you the large colonies who must decide, shall it or shall it not be federation? If you carry the amendment if you embody in the constitution the principle of the referendum. I do not envy you your retrospect in the days to come. I do not envy your triumph one atom. I prefer, myself, the glory and the honor, as I claim it to be, of having resisted it to the very utmost of my power.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[4.26]:

I want to add a few words to the remarks which we have just heard. Not that I feel called upon to want, however, to add a few propositions, which are rather mathematical in their character, and which will show the absolute monstrosity of the proposal now before us. In our internal concerns we consider that a parliament elected under manhood suffrage is not enough, and on this every colony agrees. No colony would have the least idea of giving up its own government to the vote of the bare majority. This is evidenced even in the districts which represent the more popular house. Locality there is recognised to have an importance superior to mere numbers. We are establishing now a government superior to that of any local government. We are giving it an authority far greater, and we are depriving the local authority of its control over its most fertile source of revenue, that is, the customs. We are giving the central body power to levy direct taxation, and it is proposed to establish it upon a basis which no colony would agree to in relation to its own concerns, though they are less important. True, the two houses of the federal legislature are to be elected on the same popular basis; but the analogy should, nevertheless, be preserved, and is preserved in the bill as it stands. It is true that there is no property qualification; but there is a state qualification which really takes its place. The senate represents the property and the people of each state; the house of representatives represents the people of the whole commonwealth.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[4.28]:

After the solemn warning which we received a few minutes since from the hon. member, Mr. Symon, as to what the effect of carrying the proposition under discussion would be, I think that every member of the convention must and will weigh well the vote which he proposes to give. There is no desire, I take it, on the part of any member of the Convention to place a stumbling block in the path of federation. The hon. member, Mr. Symon, says that if the amendment is carried it means goodbye to federation, at any rate for the present. I direct attention to this remark because on a previous occasion when the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, and a few more of us took a certain view upon another question, we heard from other hon. members that if our view was taken it would be good-bye to federation. I would direct attention to the very strong, brave, and ardent fight which the representatives of the smaller states are making for their position in the federal parliament. That fight commenced from the earliest inception of this question in Adelaide. Whenever the question of state rights is considered and that is the question we are dealing with now we have the same legal duel on the part of the individuals favourable to the predominance of the smaller states. One thing I cannot conceive is that the members of the Convention who voted against proportional representation will now vote to take away the power of the senate by means of the referendum. The words that have fallen from hon. members, especially from the hon. member. Mr. Gordon, have sunk deeply into my mind. Those were: that, if this proposition were carried, you would destroy absolutely the power of the senate to thwart the representatives of the people.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
I did not say that!

Mr. LYNE:
Not, perhaps, in the same words; but he said, in effect, if you take away the power of the senate to thwart, at any rate, the house of representatives, to successfully oppose the house of representatives; and that must be to successfully thwart the whole of the people.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The senate represents the whole of the people

Mr. LYNE:
No; it only represents a number of proportions of the people, and not the whole. As I was saying, the representatives in this Convention who have continuously contended against equal representation in the senate are now prepared, at least some of them, by one vote, to take away all that was underlying equal representation in the senate. That was the power of the senate to thwart the members of the house of representatives. I must acknowledge that, when I first stood for election to this Convention, my ideas of federation were not so advanced as they are at the present time.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
There is still room for improvement!

Mr. LYNE:
Improvement so far as the hon. gentleman is concerned. I admit the breach between him and myself is getting wider. I then scouted the idea of anything approaching unifications, but as the debates proceeded in Adelaide, as I had time to think what the result of federation on the lines of equal state representation would be, my ideas have converged very much in the direction of some sort of unification. As the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, said in his concluding remarks upon this question, the referendum in the manner in which be proposed it simply means in the end unification.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
So it does!

Mr. LYNE:
And in the end it does mean unification. It means that in any particular matter that may be brought up upon which a dispute between the two houses may take place, you are filtering that, you are squeezing that, according to the present proposals, through a number of sieves with very small meshes I acknowledge, but in a very cumbersome way you are squeezing that through the meshes until you come to the last proposal, if you cannot get a provision in any other way to prevent deadlocks to refer the dispute in a uniform manner to a mass referendum of the people. That being so I am sure that those who know my views pretty well on this question, will well understand that, as far as I am personally concerned, I intend to vote for the mass referendum. If that is carried and I should like to see it carried not with the filtration that is proposed from one stage to another, but I should like to see it almost direct to the people if necessary, I do believe that this great colony may accept the federation bill as it will leave this Convention. But unless some such proposition is carried, I do not think it will be acceptable to the people of this state, although it may be acceptable to the representatives and the people of the smaller states. There are several methods proposed to get rid of deadlocks. As I pass along, let me say that I discard at once the arguments that have been used by a number of speakers, especially by the hon. member, Sir John Downer, when he said it was scarcely possible in the future under this bill to imagine that there would be a deadlock between both chambers. I do not think we have yet arrived at the millennium as far as politics are concerned, and as far as human nature is concerned in this particular respect. I think that the present is the time when we should lay the foundation in our constitution, not for what may take place today, but for what may take place hereafter in the political conflicts that may and will arise between the two houses. I think it is altogether wrong to suppose that by the absence of the referendum, or any other provision to prevent deadlocks, we shall prevent, as the hon. member, Sir John Downer said, the possibility of the two chambers ever thinking of allowing a deadlock to take place. I think quite differently. I think if you create machinery that will prevent a deadlock you are much more likely to prevent any of these questions ever being sent to a referendum than you will be if you have no such machinery and a state of things where one house can by its majority, but by its numerical minority, override the wishes of the other chamber, I think, therefore, we can cast that on one side, and we can look at this from a straight forward point of view, and arrange our houses not for the present time but for forty years, fifty years, one hundred years, or in centuries afterwards when the passions of the people arise, when we shall have a large proportion of the population thwarted by a small proportion of the population united under equal state representation. If anything could possibly bring about a revolution, it would be so brought about. I think it was stated by the hon. member, Mr. Symon, that it was the domineering power of the majority which brought about a revolution on the part of a minority. I think it was well interjected by the hon. member, Mr. Trenwith, that a revolution was brought about as a rule by the minority thwarting the will of the majority. That is what we will allow to be brought about if we carry what is now proposed by some hon. members.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

The hon. member was describing a successful revolution!

Mr. LYNE:

I think I may say that we do not want to see in future generations either a successful or an unsuccessful revolution. We want in this democratic country to lay the foundation of a constitution on which ultimately the voice of the people must be heard and must predominate. If you frame any other constitution you may depend upon it you are laying the foundation of trouble that we little know of or heed at the present time. Whilst listening to the debates in Adelaide and here I have felt very keenly the depreciatory remarks made on more than one occasion, and which were applied principally to my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, in consequence of his determined action, supported only by two or three, to avoid, if possible, the passing of equal state representation. I would ten times, nay a hundred times, rather that we had proportional representation in the Senate, than that we should have the referendum in the way proposed, and that we should have equal representation in the senate, and come, in fact, to the only resource open to us of trying to apply the referendum, to get rid of any trouble that may arise on account of equal representation in the senate. The hon. member who proposed this question had in his mind, as I had in mine, and as was clearly proved, that the hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, had in his mind, judging from his speech, a desire to obtain some solution of a deadlock in any crisis that might arise between the two houses in this federation. He said, I think, as other hon. members have said, if this were not carried it would alter his vote. I think the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, said more than once, that he would not have given his vote in favour of equal representation of the states in the senate had it not been that he hoped to obtain some safety valve to which the people of the community might have access in case of the senate thwarting their representatives in the lower chamber. When the question of equal state rights was under consideration was the time to have decided whether or not you were going to have any safety-valve between the two houses, and not the present time when the proposal is put forward by nearly every speaker opposed to the referendum, and it is acknowledged by those, every one of whom is in favour of the referendum, that it must and will absolutely destroy the people's state representation and the power of the senate. I could almost imagine myself voting against a proposal of this kind, coming as it does-

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

Mr. LYNE:

I could almost imagine myself voting against a proposition of this kind, coming, as it does, when I have no other means to try to prevent equal representation, as I could imagine my hon. friend, Mr. Douglas, voting against equal state rights. We all know that he did not vote against equal state rights, that he has stood up in his stalwart strength and fought for his colony with his colours flying. I cannot say the same for all the "pure merinos" he brought from the other colony.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

The hon. member does not belong to there!

Mr. LYNE:

I am happy to say that, being a native of the colony which my hon. friend represents, I have every kindly feeling towards that colony as I have towards himself.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

To belittle it!

Mr. LYNE:

Not to belittle the colony in any way; but as the hon. and learned member, Sir John Downer, said yesterday, he is here, like every other representative, not only to represent the whole of Australia, but also to see that his own particular state is not unfairly dealt with. He is fighting for that purpose now. Every representative should be here to fight for that purpose. I honor the hon. member, Mr. Douglas, for the course he is taking, and that is why, if I did not take the course I have taken up now, I think the people of New South Wales should disown me. I feel strongly that of all the colonies, which perhaps in the future will become states, New South Wales is granting greater concessions than any of the others. She is the largest, the most populous, and the wealthiest of the group at present, whatever she maybe in the future. She has the most diversified minerals and wealth of all kinds; she has probably the largest tract of good land, extending right through her territory, and I unhesitatingly say that the key she holds now places her in a position—and I believe she is prepared to do it to some extent under any federation which will be acceptable to the other states, to give more than all the other states put together. Although I am, perhaps, standing almost alone, as regards my co-representatives, on many questions, it is with a considerable amount of delight that I find them, according to the speeches which have been made so far, in accord with me on this particular point, and in accord with me in this way: that though they are prepared to give some intermediate filtering process through which all matters in dispute will pass, they will ultimately come down to the true bed-rock, to the true foundation which should underlie our constitution, and that is, an appeal to the mass will of the people. To find that my colleagues are in accord with me affords me very great pleasure, because I have, unfortunately, been almost isolated from them in my votes up to the present time.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

Mr. LYNE:

Quite so. The hon. member will admit, as other hon. members will admit, that we have come to the crucial position, to the crucial test of everything to the point on which the whole debate on equal state rights was centered. The greatest question, and the only question, I have taken up is one on which I feel I should not give away anything, whatever else may be given away by this colony. Although other matters have been boomed as important issues in connection with federation, I have felt, and I feel now, that they all sink into the greatest insignificance when compared with the question of equal state representation, or with the question of the referendum. Take your financial problem which was found so difficult to deal with I quite admit that it can be overcome. It may be overcome with some loss to one state or another, but it can be overcome. It will be overcome in a few years; whatever the loss may be for the first few years it will assimilate itself, and the low will disappear. Whatever arrangements you may make at the present time, whether you leave the problem to the federal parliament, or whether you solve the problem yourself, that question on which we had so much debate, and to which some hon. members attached great importance, the power of the senate to amend money bills, I look upon as an insignificant question compared with the question we are now discussing. Whether that power is or is not given to the senate will not be any greater disaster to the states, when you have some other power which will override any inequality or any injustice which may be done. When you come to the proposed inter-state commission to deal with railways and rivers I admit that I am opposed to some matters connected with that proposal the difficulty will be overcome; time will assimilate everything. But when you come to the position we are in now, which arises with equal state rights, I unhesitatingly say that you have got to the bed, on which must rest the constitution you are going to build. When we come to go to the country and I for one do not desire to make any threats as to what this or that colony will do, not even to say so much as the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, said just now when he issued those words of warning as to what would happen if there is not some very strong, stringent proposal made, under which there can be a dissolution of the senate and a dissolution of the assembly, I do not think this of very great value. It is only one of those little steps down to a referendum; because, when you give the power to dissolve the senate, to whom do you give that power? You give that power to the ministry of the day. If you give that power, to whom do you send them back again? You send them back to the states; and if they truly represented the states when they gave their first vote, they will be returned again with a quadruple power to carry out the course of action which was objected to, and which caused them to be sent to ask for a further vote.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is why the hon. member rejects these proposals!

Mr. LYNE:
No; I reject them as an absolute conclusion; because that is worse than giving no dissolution at all as regards the senate. It makes the senate still more powerful.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is what we want!

Mr. LYNE:
I know it is. The hon. member is straight. There is nothing crooked about what he says. He strikes out from the shoulder every time. I say that under those circumstances you would be making the senate still more powerful than it would be without a dissolution. As has been mid by some representatives, time might be allowed to heal these matters, as it does in most cases heal any question of deadlock which may arise between the houses of the local parliaments as now constituted. If there were no dissolution of the senate that might take place; but if there is an appeal to a section and a small section only—and they send back men who thwarted the representative chamber, then you have the deadlock not only as it was before, but intensified to a great extent; and although it is the proposal of some representatives that that should come in first, and the referendum afterwards, I should much prefer to have the referendum. That is why I say I should like to see proportional representation of the states instead of the referendum. I think proportional representation of the states would be better for the smaller states than the referendum. Still, I say I am prepared to accept the referendum after it filters through these various channels. There is one subject upon which I wish to say a few words. There are some here who have had the temerity to my that, because, I took a certain stand on the question of equal state rights although I have taken no antagonistic stand to this Convention or to the federation of the colonies, except on that one principle I am an opponent of federation. Let me say that I do not think there is one in this Chamber at the present time who more, heartily and earnestly desires to am a union of the Australian colonies than I do. But I feel that I am sent to the Convention not to accept federation at any price. I am here for the purpose of seeing, as far as I. think I am justified, that the colony of New South Wales is not placed in an improper position in this federal compact. No matter what may be said here, I know what the people outside will say. My actions will be properly construed by theme outside the Chamber; if not by those inside. If we can once get rid of the difficulty which has cropped up now if this motion is carried you will find no one more strongly taking the bill in hand, and in going through the country and supporting it at every possible point, than myself.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria)[4.55]:

The question we are now considering has, I think, justly been described as of extreme importance. It seems to me that no question from the start to the finish of the bill is so important both in itself; and in connection with its, influence upon the prospects of the acceptance or otherwise of federation. It is meet, therefore, that it should be carefully and fully considered by the Convention. The points which have been urged against the adoption of some means of settling disputes between the two houses are, first of all, that there is no necessity for it, that the disputes between the two houses have shown a capacity for settling themselves as far as the history of the colonies is concerned; but, further, that it is anti-federal, that it gives the larger states the power of dominating the smaller states. This seems to me to bring us to the consideration not so much of what is or is not federation, because this is a point upon which men may differ very materially; but it brings us to the question of what we require, and what are our necessities. That consideration, it seems to me, necessitates a brief review of the position of these colonies. In the early stage, this continent was governed under a system of unification from Sydney. The outlying parts found this form of government irksome, because of the distance they were from the seat of government, and the impossibility of knowing at the seat of government adequately the requirements of the outlying parts. Consequently, separation took place, and the colonies developed, under this system of separate independent government, a degree of considerable importance; and, as they increased in importance, they discovered there were questions, important to them as colonies, that they could not satisfactorily settle singly. Therefore, there arose the necessity for common action, not with reference to all the forces of government, but with reference to important governmental questions. What does that involve? It seems to me to involve for these purposes—the purposes that the states cannot themselves singly settle united action; not a united action from which anyone or any number of the states can withdraw when it seems to them desirable; but, once having admitted that certain points can be better dealt with by the whole than by part, it seems to imply for these purposes unification. It seems to me that whether we call it federation or not, we require for national purposes a strong unified form of government. Our early experience taught us that unification for all the purposes of government was not desirable, and thus there is in our midst, and in all the colonies, a strong determined feeling that while we have federation we must still maintain the sovereignty of the states. There are some who urge that the sovereignty of the states for state purposes necessarily implies the sovereignty of the states in larger national questions. I have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that state rights can only be preserved, the sovereignty of the states can only be preserved, by handing matters over to the federal parliament which cannot be dealt with by the states themselves by making the federal objections as few as possible, but having decided what is federal, leaving the federal power sovereign with reference to that. Thus we create two distinct governmental entities. We leave sovereign states with power to deal altogether apart from federal interference with such questions as they refuse to hand over. Then we create a federal power sovereign within its own realm, competent to deal without the interference of the states as states with questions that are handed over to it. Any other form of government will not give us what we require as shown by a review of the history of our colonies. Having in view the influence of this proposal upon the possible success of this federal movement, I should like briefly to review the attitude of the people of Australia with reference to their rights and powers as citizens. In each of the Australian colonies we began with a comparatively restricted franchise, and we developed a system of plural voting. In several of the colonies the franchise has been made complete, unrestricted, and plural voting has been abolished; thus we see the tendency is to demand in the states equal rights as citizens. There can be no disputing that that tendency is growing. It has been recognised that that tendency is growing, so that the principle of manhood suffrage, and the possibility of adult suffrage have been placed in this bill. Now, let us look at what we are doing. We are creating a dual citizenship, a citizenship which makes a man a citizen of his state and a citizen of the commonwealth. Experience has shown us that the citizens in the state will not brook unequal citizenship-they will not brook one voter having more power than another voter. We have acknowledged that to be so by creating, with reference to the election of senators and members of the house of representatives equal powers to the states within their states. Now, have we any right to assume that when we create another form of citizenship the commonwealth citizenship the same man who would not brook unequal citizenship in the state will submit to unequal citizenship in the commonwealth?

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

It is a dual concern!

Mr. TRENWITH:

I am dealing with the true form of citizenship. From the inception of the commonwealth, if we are successful in establishing one and it depends largely upon whether we deal wisely or unwisely with this proposal whether we shall be successful when we have established the commonwealth, every man inside the commonwealth, in addition to being a, citizen of a state, is a citizen of the nation that is created out of this effort.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

You want the citizen of the state to be merged into the citizen of the nation!

Mr. TRENWITH:

I want him to retain his dual position; but, in relation to it, to maintain a proper principle of equality with each other citizen. As a citizen of the state equal with any other citizen of the state, and the citizen of the commonwealth equal with any other citizen of the colony.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

But is he to merge or not?

Mr. TRENWITH:

He is not to merge. The hon. member will see that I am speaking under difficulties. It is only the great importance of the question that impels me to express thoughts that seem to me. to be weighty and worthy of consideration, and I will ask the hon. member not to interrupt me. The hon. member asks again is he to merge. I say no. The citizen of no other state can influence him in any way within his state. If proper provisions are made, he can have within the commonwealth equal power with any other citizen in any other part of the colony; but unless some other provision as has been indicated is made, a citizen in one part of the commonwealth will exercise eight or nine times as much influence as a citizen in another part of the commonwealth; and I respectfully submit that, in view of the growing democracy, the growing democratic feeling, the people of Australia will not submit to a form of government that perpetuates plural voting in that way. The people who have been engaged in fighting plural voting, in wiping it out stage by stage until at last in some states they have completely obliterated it, will not subscribe to a constitution that reinstitutes it in an extremely objectionable form. And I submit that it is plural voting to give to one vote eight times as much power as another, just as much plural voting as to give to one man eight or nine votes to the one vote of some other man. I am sorry that the representatives of South Australia are not present in the chamber to any extent? There is one representative of that colony here, but I am afraid that he is one of those who are opposed to manhood suffrage unadulterated, and to female suffrage unadulterated, therefore my argument does not appeal to him with such force as it seems to me it ought to appeal to those who claim to be liberals in the South Australian Parliament. They there have demanded equal powers for every adult citizen, and they are by their action here demanding more than equal power, greater power, for some citizens in the commonwealth than for other citizens. With reference to the question whether the means of obviating deadlocks is necessary or not, it seems to me not necessary to demonstrate that there is a danger of deadlock so much as to demonstrate that the people are afraid of deadlocks; because, after all, suppose the fear is only vague and shadowy, that it has no substance, that the thing is not at all likely to occur, that is altogether unimportant if the people be afraid that a deadlock will occur. The history of these colonies has shown, times out of number, that legislative action which the people have desired to take has been frustrated by the action of the second chamber, and with this knowledge before them of the effect and action of the second chamber, the people think there is a necessity for some mechanical device to settle disputes when they occur. My hon. friend, Mr. Symon, said that disputes of this character fizzled out. Now, I am at a loss to understand, exactly, what he meant. It is true that they cease to be acute, but they may have succeeded in frustrating the will of the people, if legislation has been proposed in accord with the will of the people; and if by the action of either party, or both, effect has not been given to that will, it is of no consequence that there will have ceased to be an acute dispute. The consequence to the people, is that their will has not been made law; and that seems to me an extremely important consideration. Altogether unimportant is the fact that the attitude of fight between the two houses has fizzled out; but extremely important is the fact that the people's will has not been embodied in the statute book of the land. If the hon. member asks for instances of that sort there must be many of them within his own recollection. In our colony, at any rate, I know there is a strong feeling on the subject a feeling so strong that the people there will not vote for a federal constitution which does not provide some means of settling disputes between the two houses. I agree with hon. members that it highly improbable that they would occur frequently, but it is possible that they may occur some times, and whenever they do occur they injure the people whom both houses claim to represent. If a dispute occurred between agents and, surely both houses are agents of the people they represent what is the common-sense course taken but to refer the dispute which the agents had been unable to settle to the principals? That is what is sought to be achieved by the proposed referendum. I regret that my hon. friend, Mr. Symon, was not here when I was urging the importance of equal citizenship, and I will take the liberty to somewhat briefly urge it again. In South Australia my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, particularly, has been fighting for the equalisation of the franchise, the extension of it to every citizen, and the removal from it of preponderating influences on the part of any citizens. Now, in this federal compact we are creating a national citizenship as distinct from a state citizenship, and while the people have demanded equal citizenship in the state is it democratic, is it reasonable, to ask that there should be an equal citizenship in the nation? The proposal of equal representation in the senate does give eight or ten times more power on a national question than the vote of a citizen in one part of the nation or another. Then my hon. friend says, "What is the use of having this equal representation" call it a concession if you will "if you propose in the ultimate resort to nullify its effect?" I respectfully submit that it is impossible to nullify its effect. The only reason for which it can be justly claimed is that it is a shield against aggression without due consideration.

Mr. SYMON:
You take the shield away and expose us to the sword!

Mr. TRENWITH:
We make the shield effective for the reasonable purposes for which it is designed. The second chamber is, and ought to be, a house of review, of reasonable delay. It ought to have power to stand in the way and say, "No, not so fast-not so far; there are reasons we can show why the action you are taking is unjust, and we demand time to make those reasons apparent to the people of the commonwealth." But having had that time, having had the opportunity to make apparent the evils of the course which it is proposed to take, they have no right further to stand in the way of the wishes of the people if it becomes manifest that the wishes of the people, without regard to where they are located, are opposed to the action they have recommended. Then, in the ultimate resort, when a dispute has become chronic, or when it has become acute, when all reasonable means has been taken to settle it by argument and by concession, and when the dispute has to be referred to some other tribunal, that other tribunal ought not to be the people of the various colonies collected in groups, voting with equal power in each group without regard to the magnitude of the group; but, as the question is a national question, it should be referred to the nation in the person of all its units of citizenship. That, my hon. friend tells me, is subversive of responsible government. Will he pardon me for suggesting that that very principle exists in the Constitution of Great Britain. When a dispute arises between sections of the one house, the principle of the referendum is resorted to, and it is the base of responsible government. When the party entrusted with the government of the country find themselves out of accord with other sections of the house of which they are members, the constitution demands practically that they shall appeal from themselves, the agents, to the people, the principals, by means of a dissolution. Thus we have in the British Constitution the principle of a referendum, not for the settlement of disputes between the two houses, but for the settlement of disputes between sections of one house. But we have in the British Constitution a safety-valve of another character. There rests in the Crown power, at any time, to increase the House of Lords in order to bring it, if need be, into accord with the people's will as represented in the House of Commons. My hon. and learned friend said, "Why introduce a provision which you say, when you urge its adoption, will never be used; if it is not going to be used, do not let us have it? " How can the hon. and learned gentleman say this, with his knowledge of the splendid working of the British Constitution, with that power to which I have referred always in existence and never used?

Mr. SYMON:

It is never visible!
Mr. TRENWITH:

Always visible, and at least once in the history of England completely effective. Surely, there can be no stronger argument for having a weapon, sheathed if you will, so visible that its mere presence will prevent the necessity of a resort to it. That seems to me to be a strong argument in opposition to my hon. and learned friend's view. I am not fit to discuss this question further. It is a very important one, and it is one on which I feel very warmly. It is one which contains within it the kernel of federation or no federation. My hon. and learned friend was right when, in his choice and eloquent diction, and in words of fervent warning, he impressed upon the House the importance of acting on this question with deliberation, with thought, and apart from personal feeling; and I say to him, and to those who think with him, "Take care; consider now whether it is to be federation or no federation, whether it is to be peace or war" to use the language of the hon. and learned gentleman, himself, as nearly as I can remember.

Mr. SYMON:

We are not going to war!

Mr. TRENWITH:

There may be a war on this question without a resort to personal violence. I am one of those who believe that it is nearly, if not absolutely, impossible for the people of this continent ever to go to war in the sense of physical violence. But we have often spoken figuratively of wars of tariffs, of wars of conflicting legislation on matters of common interests, and I say, having in view that limited and restricted meaning, we have to consider now whether it is to be peace or war; whether the small states, and I regret that we should refer to small or large states, and I venture to say that all the references of that kind were initiated by the large states—whether the small states will say now, "We are so determined to haggle, to bargain, to make good terms for our colonies, without regard to the federal spirit.

Mr. SYMON:

We want our rights!

Mr. TRENWITH:

That unless we get equal power in the government of the colony, whether we have twenty people or 1,000,000, we will not federate. Then I say the millions of people will be forced, in self-defence, in defence of their rights, not with the object of making a good bargain, but as trustees for posterity because they dare not, if they are honorable men, band over a heritage of slavery to their descendants.
Oh!

Mr. TRENWITH:
It is easy to laugh and to say it is the other way about, but in South Australia, as my hon. friend, Dr. Cockburn, has said, it was slavery to give one man two votes and another man only one vote. That hon. gentleman has fought under the standard of democracy until he, and those who struggled with him, have succeeded in wiping out that form of slavery in his state.

Mr. SYMON:
They did not wipe it out, it was wiped out long before then!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
One man one vote is founded on liberty!

Mr. SYMON:
We are the one country of freemen on the continent!

Mr. TRENWITH:
I thank my hon. and learned friend for that term. There is one colony of freemen on the continent. Why? Because every voter in South Australia has equal power with every other voter. We are now going to create another form of citizenship, and we must create it under conditions that will maintain freedom to the citizens of the nation, as South Australia has obtained freedom for the citizens of the state. Therefore, I am justified in saying that we have a right to consider the people of the larger states must and will consider whether we shall hand to posterity a heritage of slavery or of freedom. If we vote for equal power to every citizen, we shall be making free people of the future Australians; if we vote for greater power for one citizen than for another, we shall be putting chains upon the legs of the citizens in the larger states of this commonwealth.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[5.28]:
I am sure, speaking for myself, and for many others who think with me, nothing is further from our desire than that the hon. member who last spoke, or the colony he represents, should be subjected to any kind of slavery at our hands. There is no desire on the part of any one certainly not on my part to force any colony on the continent to enter into this federation scheme, but to leave it to do so with free choice and by the will of its people. For the hon. member to tell us that there is to be any slavery on the part of any one, is to paint a picture foreign to the mind of every one of us, and such as could exist only in the fertile brain of the hon. member himself. Now this proposal, which is so very important, or is considered so very important, to the larger colonies, did not occupy a very prominent place in the discussions in this hall in 1891.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

Nor i

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I was absent from the Convention when it was brought forward at Adelaide, and, consequently, do not know what took place. Certainly there was no great discussion upon it except to negative it, I think, in the Constitutional Committee. In 1891, I do not think the matter was discussed at all.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

You were only playing with federation then!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

There was no attempt in 1891 to introduce a system to prevent deadlocks, and only to a very small extent in the early part of this year.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It was well discussed in Adelaide. In 1891, the delegates were not elected by the people.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

The hon. member may make a good deal out of that statement; but I take it that the Convention of 1891 felt that there was cast upon them a responsibility, as representing the various colonies they came from, quite equal to the responsibility felt by us at the present time. I am willing to admit the argument used by some hon. members, or, at any rate, by one hon. member, that because this provision does not find a place in any of the constitutions existing in the world at the present time, that is no reason why we should not introduce it into this constitution if it is thought that it would be beneficial. But I take it that we who are against the proposal may fairly urge hon. members to consider that this provision does not find a place in the British Constitution or in any of the constitutions of the British colonies, neither does it find a place in the Constitution of the United States. Our contention is that this provision is not required. We believe that to provide a machinery for the settlement of deadlocks, which has not been found necessary in the past, will be to encourage differences which the ordinary procedure so well known to us all, so well known in the proceedings of the various parliaments of the British Empire, mutual good-will, conciliation, and common-sense will generally work out, and public opinion behind it will generally come to the rescue, and solve all the difficulties that are likely to arise. We have our own experience during the last thirty years on this continent, and with the exception of that struggle in regard to which even an actor in it, who is here today and whom I am glad to see here has told us that he regrets the part he took a struggle which we all admit now should never have arisen at any rate, that is the judgment of the present day, for it was an unreasonable proposition, an attempt to coerce with that exception, there have been no differences of great importance, and certainly none of recent date, which have not been solved by the two houses; and I think that under this constitution, although something has been said to the contrary, the chances of disagreement will be very much lessened. Although the members of the senate will represent the states, there will not be very many occasions when they will be called upon to vote on what may properly be said to be state interests. Of course, the members of the two houses will not always be in accord-no one desires they should be, but I think that the chances are that there will be fewer disagreements, and none which their own good sense and moderation, assisted by public opinion, will not be able to overcome. I cannot help thinking that there seems to be no end to the demands which have been made by some hon. members, certainly by the representatives of Victoria, or at any rate by those who are taking a prominent part in this debate. I will say that there seems to be no end to the demands which have been made on behalf of the larger states. We have given way time after time. Some hon.
members have now voted in a different way from that in which they voted at Adelaide a few months ago, not because they have changed their opinions, but in order, generally speaking as they have told me, that they might further the cause of federation, and make it easier for the larger colonies to place the matter in a favourable light before the electors. But we also have the same difficulty in regard to the electors of our various colonies as hon. members representing New South Wales and Victoria have. Speaking for the colony that I represent, I say that amongst the electors there is no great feeling in favour of federation. It will take a good deal of persuasion, and it will take all the powers of argument that we possess to commend it to the goodwill of the electors there; and unless we are prepared to show that we have framed a really good constitution, and that they will have their rights protected not that they are likely to be invaded, as I said yesterday; I have no fear myself, but that is not the feeling of the electors, who will want to see first of all that they are not going to lose by it, and who will also want to know whether their rights are protected, and whether they are in any danger of being over ridden by the peoples of the larger states. We shall have more difficulty in our colony, although it is small in population perhaps a great deal more difficulty than those representing the larger colonies, because the spirit of federation has not entered into the minds of the people there to the same extent as it has here, and I would ask hon. members, who represent the larger colonies, to recollect that the difficulties are not all on their side, but that the difficulties are quite as great on the part of the representatives of the colonies having smaller populations. I do not like to say this, but I think I must: that if there is a fear on the part of the representatives or the people of the two larger states that they are to be coerced or over ridden by the smaller states—a most unreasonable proposition I think they had better federate themselves and leave us alone. If there is not to be mutual confidence, if we are to enter into this federation each trying to get the upper hand, each trying to coerce the other, each thinking only of himself, then the best thing we can do is to let the two larger colonies federate themselves and let us think about it later on.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The right hon. gentleman does not mean that!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Well, it seems to me that if the arguments to which we have listened today and yesterday really express the sentiments of the people of New South Wales and Victoria, there is a great dealing what I say that they seem to be indifferent whether the smaller colonies do or do not enter into this federation. That is an impression that has been gaining upon me day by day that there seems to be a desire on the part of the representatives of the larger colonies to distrust the people of the smaller colonies, and there also seems to be a spirit of indifference gaining ground as to whether we do or do not take part in the federation.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Our people tell us we are giving you everything!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

We have provided in the money clauses of the bill, as far as possible, to do away with any chance of deadlocks; we have provided against what are commonly called "tacks;" we have provided against many subjects of taxation being introduced in one bill; we have provided that all expenditure, other than that of the ordinary annual services, shall be introduced in a separate bill; and we have done everything we could-

Mr. TRENWITH:

You have tied the lower house at every stage!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

We have done almost everything possible to prevent difference of opinion arising between the two houses. I venture the opinion it is merely an opinion to be taken for what it is worth—that when this constitution gets into working order, the dissolution of the house of representatives will be found to be almost impracticable. I believe that, in the working of this constitution, it will be found that the house of representatives when once elected will run its course, and that the appeals to the people of the whole continent will very seldom follow a premature dissolution of the house of representatives. I think that in the practical working of the constitution it will be found that we shall have to depend for an expression of the popular opinion at the ballot boxes largely upon the occasion of the periodical elections, and that the instances in which ministers will recommend the dissolution of the house of representatives will be few and far between. Ministers will not find it so convenient to appeal to the people of the whole continent as it is to appeal to the people within a circumscribed area in which public opinion is to a large extent, dominated by the newspapers published at the seat of government. When we have a federated Australia, it will not be the newspapers published at the seat of government which will influence the electors, it will be the press of the various colonies, and the result will be very different. I take it that all these precautions for preventing deadlocks are unnecessary, and may be found mischievous, because they will encourage differences rather than put an end to them. The people of the larger colonies have nothing whatever to fear from this federation. If there is any cause of fear it should exist on the part of the colonies which are situated far away from the seat of government, and from the influences which surround the meeting place of the parliament. Another idea has occurred to me. If you give the power to dissolve both houses the double dissolution as it has been called allowing the government of the day to appeal to the constituencies whenever a conflict of opinions occurs, it may, as time goes on, be used for a very different purpose from that for which, it is being advocated at the present time. I can imagine that a government, which felt itself somewhat weak, or which thought that an occasion was an opportune one for an appeal to the country, might encourage a conflict rather than try to avoid it, in order that in this way it might be able to recommend a dissolution of both houses, in the hope that that would strengthen their following, or, at any rate, give it more time. I do not say that that is what is likely to occur; but knowing as we do that the constitution of the United States of America has been used for purposes foreign to the intentions of its framers, you may depend upon it that as time goes on every possible device will be used to gain political influence and power by taking advantage of the form of the constitution. I did not intend to make any observations upon this subject, because the position has been so well put by the hon. member, Sir John Downer, and, to a certain extent, by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, though I do not altogether agree with what was said by him. I thought, however, that, coming as I do from one of the smaller colonies, and the colony which is furthest away, it was necessary for me to make these few observations, in order to place the views of Western Australia, in regard to this matter, before the Committee.

[The Chairman left the chair at 5.45 p.m. The Committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.]

The Hon. J.H. Howe (South Australia)[7.30]:

I make no apology for addressing the Convention at this stage. I am sure that those who are assembled here will admit that, in Adelaide, I was always willing to listen, and to record my vote in favour of what was just and right. I do not pretend to have the ability or the eloquence of the speakers who have preceded me; but occasion sometimes demands from a man that he shall not remain forever a dumb dog. After having this question of state rights fought out in a fair fight, I cannot understand that those who say that they have conceded certain rights to us, or that they have made certain sacrifices, should now try by an insidious amendment to take those rights from us. So far as I am individually concerned, I do not recognise that any concessions have been given, or that any sacrifices have been made by the larger states. I repudiate the idea altogether. I say that, if it were not that we believed that the principle of equal state rights would be conceded, the smaller colonies would not have come into the Convention. For many years we were told that there was a hon in the path of federation; but, now that we have been enabled by our united action to remove that animal from our path, what do the larger states invite us to do? They ask us to take part in the creation of a monster more desperate than the hon apparently was they ask us to destroy our state rights!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

A monster!

The Hon. J.H. Howe:

Yes, a monster, a Frankenstein. They ask us to destroy the rights which we prize so much, and which they say that they have, although reluctantly, conceded to us.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

What are they doing to you? What is the proposal?

The Hon. J.H. Howe:

I will come to that in due time. I do not profess to have the command of language with which the right hon. member is gifted; but I have a little judgment, which I tonight will in a manly way make use of. Of course, the lay members of the Convention have, as a rule, allowed the eminent men who have had a legal training to take the leading part and the pride of place in framing the constitution. That is only right and proper, because we recognise that it is a work for constitutional lawyers to perform. Consequently we have been content to be guided by their great wisdom and experience.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
If I had only the hon. member's height!

The Hon. J.H. Howe:
What the right hon. member wants in height he makes up in breadth, and I have no doubt that if the scale were brought to bear upon us both his would be the preponderating weight. That is the position he wants his colony to obtain in federated Australia. I have been an earnest federationist for many years, and, in my humble way, many years ago I addressed audiences upon the subject of federation, with all the force and vigour that I could command. Like all loyal Australians, I conceived that it was the destiny of the colonies to be united, and I have always been willing to give and to take as much as I possibly could in order to bring about a federation or a partnership which would be just to the whole of the people of Australia. Much as I desire federation, I cannot, on behalf of the colony I represent, accept a manifest injustice. I imagine that we have joined so far in what we may call a fair partnership, in which there will be no dominion and no undue coercion. On those lines, I am perfectly willing on behalf of those I represent, to give my voice for an equitable federation. But a national referendum in connection with a deadlock is simply giving away the rights of the smaller populated states. I am quite prepared to concede this: that there shall be some safety-valve, because without a safety-valve responsible government cannot exist. Although we think we have got equal representation, so far as we have gone, we have not got actual equal representation. No one knows that better than the Right Hon. G.H. Reid. To have equal representation we should have equal power in the house of representatives; but for the sake of federation what have we conceded? We have no right of initiation; we have abandoned that for which we fought so earnestly the right of amendment.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
You have the right of initiation!

The Hon. J.H. Howe:
Not in the case of money bills. The power of the purse is the golden key which rules everything and opens every door. We know that we have allowed these things to be frittered away, and for the sake of federation and for the sake of entering into a brotherhood we have actually departed from the first position which we took up. After we have done that, some hon. members want to bring in these insidious amendments, so that the states shall have no independent life. Since I joined this Convention in Adelaide, that fair city of the south, where the people are as free as their air is pure, and whose freedom I wish to maintain, I have undergone the difficult task of fighting an election. I have contested an election over an area of country twice as large as the whole area of New South Wales. I admit that the greater part of that district is almost unknown.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

I do not believe it has been surveyed!

The Hon. J.H. Howe:

A great deal of it has not been surveyed. But I just wish to point out the bearing of this question of equal representation which hon. members are trying to fritter away by all the means that the human intellect can devise. I have contested an election in a district twice the area of the whole of New South Wales, and containing great possibilities.

The Hon. J.N. Bruncker:

What population?

The Hon. J.H. Howe:

I do not know exactly the population, but I can tell the hon. member the number of those who are entitled to the franchise. It is an electorate with over 30,000 electors. Consequently, when I hear the representatives of the mother colony talking about concession and sacrifice, and I look at only a portion of my district, and the great possibilities which exist there, no wonder that I repudiate any sacrifice or any concession that the mother colony chooses to make us believe she has conceded to us.

An Hon. Member:

The senior colony!

The Hon. J.H. Howe:

I prefer to call her the mother colony. I recognise the greatness, the immense possibilities of your country. You have all within your territory to make it an independent and self-existing nation. You have immense coal measures; in fact you have all the mineral wealth that the people of any country could desire. But at the same time and this brings me to a point which I do not think has yet been touched upon—we pride ourselves upon our position, we pride ourselves upon our advancement; but, would it have been possible to have advanced as we have done within the last one hundred years if we had not been protected by that grand flag which is... supreme over every sea? Is it not a recognised fact that we are passing laws imposing restrictions upon great, and mighty, and populous nations? Do we not say to Japan and China, and other eastern nations, "You shall not do so and so." And what is their position today? They have to submit. Will that submission be for long? What is the old country doing? Why, sir, she is compelling, at her own sweet will and pleasure, these very people whose goods and people we wish to exclude to open their ports. Depend upon it, sir, those who watch passing events can see the dangers that will fall on this country if we remain divided. I care more about this federation for defence purposes than I do for any other purpose you can name. It is necessary for our national life, for our well-being, for our safety, that Australia should federate, even if it be only for defence purposes. We see Russia, that great populous country, with 80,000,000 of people, with a large army of soldiers who we know cannot be surpassed by any other nationality than our own, and we have evidence on every hand how the Russians have fought on every field; we see France and Russia embracing each other, marching hand in hand, who not long ago were in deadly strife, and covered many a hard fought battle-field with the corpses of tens of thousands of men; we see these mighty nations, for their own defence, marching hand in hand together, and jealous of the supremacy of England on the seas, and jealous of her commerce. It is not long ago since we had evidence of this. I think it was my right hon. friend, the Premier of New South Wales, who sent a cable to the British Government, when England was almost at bay amongst the nations of the earth, owing to a little international squabble; and it is these little international squabbles that often bring a mighty war in their wake. I was very pleased that the right hon. gentleman sent that telegram to the Prime Minister of England, offering assistance to England in that great emergency.

The CHAIRMAN:

Does the hon. member think this has anything to do with the referendum?

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

As you, Mr. Chairman, have put it to me, I think it has a great deal to do with the matter before the Committee, because it opens up the whole question of state rights; and I am trying to show that, although I am in favour of federation, I will not be a party to giving away the separate existence, as I may term it, of each state. I am trying to show that federation is justifiable, even for defence purposes alone; and I think I am fairly within my right in doing that. That telegram was acknowledged, as it should be, with parental pride. But here are we, in Australia, offering assistance to the mother country when really we are in a comparatively defenceless state ourselves. It was right and proper to do it; I do not object to it. It was a proper thing for the offshoots of that great country, when they thought the old motherland was in danger, to come to her assistance; but it seemed rather peculiar to me that we should offer lavishly offer, I may say-assistance, to a nation like England, when we were not in a position to defend ourselves. However, I say that pure, real defence, as far as Australia is concerned, can only be obtained by united action and by federation for that purpose. It is lamentable to me to see the different colonies trying to keep up an army of their own, under different heads, equipped with different weapons, and all as it were at sixes and sevens, whereas, if this country were federated, we would have one army. I do not believe in standing armies or in powerful navies, but whilst Europe is bristling with bayonets, whilst the eastern countries are rising and will become, by-and-by, aggressive, it is necessary that Australia, at all events, should look after that which it has fought so hard to win; and it is by this means that Australia can offer an effective resistance to any nation which may be inclined to invade our shores. Coming back to the referendum, coming back also to the existence of the states as states, and to the question of double dissolution, I admitted before, and I say it again, that I am not adverse to any system whereby the will of the people shall dominate, but I object to the means of taking from the states that separate national existence which rightly belongs to them. As regards the double dissolution, I consider, as far as I am able to judge of its application in our own colony, that it is all that is desirable. I think we have been magnifying the deadlock question too much altogether. We seem to forget that both these houses are to be based on the people's will, elected by the electors of the whole of Australia, and that they will be of short duration. What will be the life of any of these houses? The lower house will have to seek re-election every three years. The upper chamber, according to the present proposal, will have to send half of its members ever third year to the country, so that we have continually pouring in upon the senate men fresh from the people, imbued with the same ideas that the people have, and this in itself will, in a great measure, prevent any of those dreadful deadlocks from occurring that have been anticipated. I recognise that there is a remote possibility of a deadlock occurring. I recognise that it is necessary to have a safety-valve to deal with it, and I think that the double dissolution will be quite sufficient. But this does not seem to satisfy members of the Convention who hail from these more populous colonies. They say we must have the referendum, and they claim as a matter of equity that it shall be a national referendum. Now, what a position this will place the smaller colonies in! As I said before, I deny in toto, put it to any practical test you like, that the senate will rule. Although we lay the flattering unctious on to ourselves that we have equal rights with the larger colonies, we know full well that where the people are the people will dominate. And seeing the constitution of the lower house, our voices will be like weak voices crying in the wilderness; we shall scarcely have a voice in the legislation of the country. We shall be completely dominated in the lower house, and if we give away any more than we have already done, as far as state rights are concerned, we shall be simply handing our people over to bondage. I remember once reading about an Irish deputation which waited upon one of their representatives, and accused him of selling his country. Of course the incident that I am relating refers to the time when Castlereagh and English gold deprived Ireland of its parliament, and almost enslaved its people; and when the deputation waited on him, and accused him of having done a certain thing to the horror of, the deputation, he went down on his knees and thanked God that he had a country to sell. We who come from the other colonies are not imbued with that idea. We are here to give that which is memory to the vigorous life of a free people occupying the whole of Australia; but we are not in a position, and we do not intend to give you that which belongs purely to the state. I say that I would rather become a native of Japan, than remain the citizen of a small state that yielded the powers that this Convention is trying to force from it. What would national life be without freedom? We have done very well hitherto. Our colony is looked upon as a small colony that is, so far as population is concerned; but we have done great work with our population; we are a vigorous and a free people: we have undertaken works of great magnitude; we have the intelligence and common-sense to know when our rights are invaded, and we have the courage to try to maintain those rights. However much, from our geographical position, we may desire federation, it must not be a federation which will make us subservient to the larger colonies.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Say something amiable after that!

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

I do not often occupy the attention of the Convention. I do not like to stand up here and reiterate words and sentences which have been better spoken than I could possibly speak them; but ideas come to individuals is, to nations, and times when it is imperative upon them, to speak that which is within them. I have done so on the, present occasion. Of course, it would be easy for me or for anyone else to elaborate it; but I do not wish to occupy the Convention unduly. Hon. members have addressed words of caution amounting almost to threats; but unless you are prepared to treat us fairly, to take us into full partnership although I admit you, cannot do that, seeing that we have given way too much already if you are going to whittle down concessions again and again, the sooner this Convention comes to an end the better, and we can then leave those who take our places-our children to carry out the destiny which belongs to the people of this great continent.

Mr. LEAKE (Western Australia)[7.57]:

It has been said by several speakers today that, although they are federationists, they will not have federation at any price. To them I would rejoin that I would not accept federation with a halter round my neck. That is the position in which I find myself, when I am asked to accept federation with the referendum. In attempting to fit so-called safety-valves to the political machine, it will be well to take care that the machine is not all safety-valve - that is what it promises to become. I fear we shall find the whole of our federal constitution overshadowed by the system of referendum, if it be adopted in the form proposed by most of its supporters. I say at once that I am against the referendum as I have heard it explained; but I will not emphatically declare against any other possible method of preventing a deadlock, nor am I opposed to the suggestion that we should, in certain circumstances, peculiar and exceptional perhaps, have a dissolution of the senate. Whether that dissolution should be, at any moment, at the will of any particular person, or whether it should occur after the happening of certain events, after the application of certain tests, are matters to be ultimately decided when we come to discuss the question in detail. I was very much impressed, as I dare say other hon. members were, by the able speeches delivered by Mr. Gordon, Mr. Symon, and Sir John Downer, against the use of the referendum, and also by the equally able speeches delivered by Mr. O'Connor and Mr. McMillan; but with regard to the speeches of the two latter gentlemen, perhaps other hon. members were, with me, somewhat surprised at their conclusions, because, after speaking against the principle, after telling us that they objected to it, they adopted it. If we are supposed to be actuated by the principle of concession in framing our constitution, why should we not also adopt it in applying the constitution when we have it? If we have the referendum, there is no encouragement for the concessions which have been so ably advocated in the framing of the constitution in this Convention. The referendum is the ultimate method of settling all disputes. It is claimed that it is finality. But it is that very suggestion of finality that I fear; because, while aiming and striving after the finality which may be at a greater or less distance, there is the danger that an attempt may be made to take a short cut towards the attainment of the object, and if the referendum is the ultimate method of deciding, then all other intermediate stages, such, perhaps, as the dissolution of either house, will be given the go-by, and there will not be those pauses for the purpose of reflection by the way, but there will be an undue haste in attempting straight away from the very outset to arrive at the last stage of the journey, namely, the referendum. And what an opportunity does not that offer to a class of person who may ultimately arise the unscrupulous politician? Such a person, I assume, is not known at the present moment to exist in the Australian colonies, but in these days of evolution we know not what may happen, and with an unscrupulous politician at the head of affairs, knowing that he has in his hand a power in the shape of the referendum, will he hesitate to stoop to any course which will enable him to reach his object speedily and rapidly, and apply that very drastic remedy? And, when the remedy is applied when the referendum is put in operation, what shall we find? I speak now as representing what is for the moment regarded as a smaller state. We should be in the position of being overridden by a combination of, perhaps, two of the larger states. That is a position to which I do not feel disposed to submit. We have all along said, in discussing these questions, that we want no iron-bound constitution that elasticity is what we aim at. But, with the referendum before us, we have that very iron-bound element we wish to avoid. There is no leaving anything to chance, or to circumstances, or to conciliation. If the referendum is an active power in the state, we shall ultimately be forced to adopt it. And we shall adopt it not in those extraordinary circumstances in which we now say it shall only apply, but there will be a tendency to apply it in every particular instance, or, if not in every particular instance, when it becomes a matter of convenience or expediency. Take, for instance, one very serious aspect of this question and it was suggested, I think, in a speech by my hon. friend, Mr. Gordon. Let us assume that a question of amending the constitution arises. Perhaps it is taking an extreme view; but I shall suppose, for the sake of argument, as I have a perfect right to do, that we have that objectionable person, the unscrupulous politician, in power.

An Hon. MEMBER:
There are a good many of them!

Mr. LEAKE:
Yes, I believe there are. His object is to have an amendment of the constitution in some particular direction. It is forced onward by gentle stages. Perhaps the main object he has in view is veiled; but, ultimately he gets this question of the amendment of the constitution up to the referendum stage; then everything is disclosed, and we find out at the last moment what object he has in view. Then it is too late. The question will go to the people, and the people without the proper medium of parliament will declare in favour of the alteration of the constitution, and, perhaps, violate that for which we have battled and are battling the maintenance of equal state rights.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

An amendment of the constitution must be dealt with by special referendum, under clause 114!

Mr. LEAKE:

We are now discussing the question of whether we shall or shall not have a referendum, or any particular method of dealing with deadlocks, and if you get the thin end of the referendum wedge in, you will never get it out again. If you have the referendum in one instance, you admit its principle, and you cannot then successfully fight against it. Of course I am only expressing my own views. I do not suppose for a moment that anything I may say tonight will influence the vote of any hon. member; but I shall be contented if hon. gentlemen will listen to what I have to say, and criticism my remarks and tear them to pieces afterwards, if they like, to their hearts content. If the referendum obtains, it will, undoubtedly, give to the larger states a dominating influence, which has never been contemplated when discussing the principles of this new constitution. It is urged that it will only be used in the event of some vital disturbance for the settlement of some vital principle I would point out that if the dispute is so great as to require special legislation in this particular form— and it is special legislation we ought not to be asked to legislate in ignorance of the circumstances, and we cannot by any possibility or stretch of the imagination declare in what particular circumstances the application of this extraordinary remedy would be needful. So why should we, I repeat, be asked to specially legislate unless we know really what we have to legislate about? It has been asked, "What is it that keeps responsible government or any government in force what is it that forces good government on the administration?" I rather fancy that it is the fear of revolt. If, then, we are to have the question of revolt cropping up, it is better that we should have a revolution at an early stage rather than at a later one better that we should have it before the application of the referendum than after it. No one can say that the referendum will prove to be that political panacea for all evils. which it is hoped and intended it should be. But what seems to me to be one of the worst features of this proposal is that it is sought thus to ingraft an entirely new principle upon this constitution. As the hon. member, Mr. Symon, very ably put it this afternoon, we have up to the present time been engaged in building up a structure; but now, by the introduction of this new principle, we begin the ceremony of knocking down. It is a new controlling force, the limits of which cannot at the present moment be either defined or anticipated a new controlling force entirely. If at this late hour we are asked to consider this new controlling force, we ought to be careful how we adopt it, and not take too much for granted. These principles cannot be applied in practice, although they have been suggested by theorists. This referendum, this new controlling force, is an element in the constitution which, it seems to me, will prove to have been conceived by chance, nurtured in error and applied at maturity to conditions which, from our present standpoint, are quite unexpected if not absolutely abnormal. That is the risk we run by this attempt at experimental legislation. We have had no practical test of the referendum in any part of the British dominions; yet we are asked to accept it notwithstanding all the dangers which have been pointed out to us by many speakers. We have been given certain state rights with one hand, and it is now proposed that we should be deprived of those rights by the application of the referendum. It is of no use to tell us that these powers will never be exercised. If they are created by the constitution, though they may be dormant for a time, so sure as we exist, some politician will say in the future, "We will now do by means of this extreme remedy, this awful engine, this referendum, that which we have not hitherto been able to persuade parliament and the states to assent to." I feel very strongly upon this question, and I was heartily glad to hear the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, say that rather than accept the referendum he would stump his own colony in opposition to federation. I am perfectly certain that hon. members know that that statement was not uttered as a mere threat; but that it was the outcome and the expression of his deliberate opinion. We know that the right hon. gentleman represents one phase of democracy in Australia which has given rise to speculation and to discussion. In this connection it is very remarkable to see how extraordinary are the ramifications of democracy. We find the democracy of South Australia opposed to the democracy of Victoria, and yet the constitution which we are building up has been lauded, and, I think, properly so, as a democratic constitution. I believe that every Australian politician is a democrat in the sense that he desires to protect and maintain the right of the people. That is a democracy of intelligence and commonsense, not a democracy which recognises rule by clamour and agitation. We are all democrats if we are imbued with these ideas; and seeing that this is so, we must take care that this democratic engine, the referendum, does not blow up democracy. No doubt its aim and object is to prevent deadlocks; but whether it will succeed in its object, I am not in a position to say. I can merely speculate, and express it as an opinion that it will not attain that object. We shall always have this held over our heads in terrorem, we shall always know in parliament that there is behind this parliamentary power that other greater force which can be used in spite of parliament. That was ably put by the hon. member, Mr. Symon. Again, on this question of democracy, let us not lose sight of what the hon. member, Mr. Symon, pointed out, that there are two democracies, the democracy of the commonwealth and the democracy of the states. If you put those two elements into conflict of course trouble will arise, but you cannot apply the referendum without the aid of those two possibly conflicting bodies. Then I say that those who advocate the referendum as a possible deterrent for conflict and a possible cure for deadlock have altogether overshot the mark. They had far better adhere to that which they have hitherto contended for, the good sense, the commonsense of the people; and here I re-echo this sentiment and say, trust the people, trust our constitution as we know it. Admit of no fresh, new fangled notion to which no test can possibly be applied for years and years to come. Let us act under our constitution as we know it, and as we understand it; let us trust to our parliaments and to the good sense of the people. I am against the referendum.

I have waited some time before taking any part in this debate, and it was my inclination to wait a little longer; but I am afraid differences are developing themselves which, if we do not exercise the greatest caution, must bring great danger to this movement; and that danger, I am afraid, will be accentuated the more any among us resolve that at all hazards we will proceed to extremes in one direction or another. My own opinion has been made perfectly clear that I do not think there is an absolute necessity, in the working of the constitution, to make any artificial provision against what are called deadlocks. I expressed myself sufficiently clearly in Adelaide upon that point, and I go a long way with the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest in saying that most of those circumstances out of which deadlocks, as they are called, ordinarily arise, that is to say, deadlocks with reference to money bills have been provided against in this constitution as it stands. It is provided with perfect clearness that no bill dealing with money can originate in any other place than the house of representatives. That is to say, no tax or appropriation bill, with the mere exception of those cases in which provision is made for the imposition of fines, or the demand and recovery of fees for services arising under an act of parliament, and such like matters, as to which everyone, however democratic, is agreed that any strict reading of a constitution which would deprive a second chamber of the power of originating a useful measure merely incidentally dealing with them is an absurdity. We have gone further than that. We have prevented the senate from having co-ordinate powers to that extent; but we have provided also that it may not amend any tax bill, and that it may not amend the annual appropriation bill. We have provided, lest matters outside the taxation be improperly foisted into bills to be sent from one house to the other, that laws imposing taxation shall deal with the imposition of taxation only. We have provided that laws imposing taxation, except those imposing duties of customs on imports, or imposing excise duties, shall deal only with one subject of taxation. That is to avoid matters of taxation being so mixed in bills as to prevent a chamber from exercising its independent right of dealing with one subject of taxation, because there happens to be in a bill a subject of taxation with which it agrees, and another with which it disagrees. We have provided further that the expenditure for services, other than the ordinary annual services under what is generally known as the appropriation bill, shall be provided for by separate bills. By these houses, it is much more probable that the chamber which sends the bill up to the other has, if not right on its side, at any rate, some cause which will justify it in taking a stand. That is an occurrence which is not specifically provided for in the constitution. I admit that all the cases which are left for that operation are cases in which the second chamber will reject the bill will exercise what is called its power of veto, although that term is sometimes used in a way which is apt to confuse the power of the Crown in giving or withholding assent to a bill, with the power of a legislative chamber in giving or withholding its assent. "Veto" is the term properly applicable to the exercise of the power of the Crown, and "rejection" is the term properly applicable to the exercise of the rights of a legislative chamber. But recollect we lay down in the constitution all the time, by not taking away the right of rejection, that when a bill is rejected it is the exercise of a right. Now, only those cases of rejection will arise under this constitution, with respect to money bills, which do not arise from any of the causes provided against. While I am talking about deadlocks, I should like to inquire, what is the general acceptance of the meaning of that term amongst hon. members? To my mind, "deadlock" is not a term which is strictly applicable to any case except that in which the constitutional machine is prevented from properly working. I am in very grave doubt whether the term can be strictly applied to any case except a stoppage of the legislative machinery arising out of conflict upon the finances of the country.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Is it not a mistake to say that these provisions are simply for deadlocks?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I am only quoting the terms which have been generally used. It is a question whether provision should be made for deadlocks in that sense of the term alone. I am rather inclined to think that any provision which has to be made might rightly only be made for that class of deadlock that a stoppage which arises on any matter of ordinary legislation, because the two houses cannot come to an agreement at first, is not a thing which is properly designated by the term "deadlock," because the working of the constitution goes on the constitutional machine proceeds notwithstanding a disagreement. The machinery of government does not come to a stop, because it is only when the fuel of the machine of government is withheld that the machine comes to a stop; and that fuel is money. I am inclined, then, to think that we might well consider whether, if we make provision for deadlocks, we should not leave the relations of the houses to the ordinary operation of their powers of adjustment between themselves. While some of us may make some concession to popular opinion when there is a danger of a stoppage for even a short time of the fuel of the engine that is to say, a stoppage of the taxation or expenditure of the country, there may be then a necessity in the interest of the country to make some provision which will enable the machine to go on, still I cannot forget that there is very great weight in the argument that artificial provision may be positively harmful if it is carried too far. It may accentuate differences, and if it substitutes the control of one house for that process of evolution which ought ordinarily to prevail between two houses, it is likely to produce even more irritation in the body politic, than will the evolutionary process. There may, therefore be dangers in making artificial provision but, on the other hand, who can fail to recognise that there is a strong popular dread of allowing disputes to work themselves out, and that there seems to be a fear on the part of many of ourselves that there will be popular reluctance to adopt this measure unless there be some provision to terminate these difficulties. We cannot forget that; we cannot ignore that state of things. Whilst I believe our people in this colony are strong for federation, yet I believe those fears which I have indicated, and which I think are widely entertained, can under no circumstances be underrated by us. Therefore, it is our duty, I take it, even if there are some of us, like myself, who think, that this machine would work smoothly, who think as people who have studied constitutions and constitutional law, that this machine will work as smoothly if we leave it alone in its present state as if we added provisions to it, still we must recollect that our measure has to be submitted to the popular will, and that if the people entertain a fear, which we cannot characterise as altogether unreasonable, then our confidence in the safety of the machine which we put before them ought, perhaps, not to prevent us from surrounding it with additional securities, if it is their desire first that these securities should be provided, and if it is our feeling that unless they are provided we may endanger the adoption of the machinery. But, on the other hand, there is quite as strong a feeling the other way, quite as strong a dread on the part of the less populous states that an artificial provision, if carried altogether too far, will so tend to efface the interests of individual states, so tend, as they put it, to wipe them and their interests out, as to lead to such a diminution of power and of prestige in the component states, as will eventually lead to their absorption. I am not sure but I shall come to that part of my argument presently that that dread is altogether well grounded; yet, at the same time, it is a very natural dread, and it is a dread which we cannot blame any of those who are joining in this great work with us for entertaining. When we consider the great powers and importance of two of the states which we hope are about to join in the federation, and the fact that the others are at present perhaps not so rich as we, and we know they are not so populous when we consider these facts, we may well attribute to very natural reasons, and to the very natural desire for self preservation, not for aggression, the fears which are entertained lest provisions of this kind, if carried to extremes, may ultimately lead to their absorption. I can well understand such fears being entertained by any one of us who live in the larger states if we lived in one of the smaller states. We have to consider the question whether these fears are well grounded. This movement, therefore, is in a most critical position now, and I rise largely for the purpose of expressing my own opinion that this is the moment when the wisdom and patriotism of hon. members of this Convention will be put to their greatest test, and when it is most incumbent upon us to come to a decision that will be characterised by judgment and public spirit. That is a remark which I wish to apply to both sides, and I wish to say this in a spirit of perfect impartiality. On the whole, I think it will be wise, and I think it will be public spirited, to make some provision for the settlement of conflicts between the two houses in certain cases. As far as this movement is concerned, that way safety lies. If as I think we shall agree to that, on the part of many it will be considered that some provision is a necessity, and others will consider that it is at any rate a wise thing to make this concession to popular feeling, and also that by having it we are certainly not lessening the importance or safety of the measure. If we come to this conclusion, what sort of provision should be made? I entertain the opinion that in the first instance the provision should be one that is constitutional as being in accordance with the principle of responsibility. The arguments upon which the present clauses with regard to the money

powers of the two houses were largely supported is that we want the government of this federation to be upon the lines of responsibility which are familiar to us that is to say, the government is to be a responsible government in principle. A dissolution differs from a referendum in this, at the outset, that a dissolution is an assertion of the principle of responsibility, whilst the referendum tends to weaken the sense of responsibility. I expressed myself, however, so fully on that subject at Adelaide, that I do not wish to open an old question by referring to it to any extent. I say, at any rate, in the first instance, our provision should be one that will be constitutional, made to preserve the principle of responsibility both of ministers and members. Under these constitutional provisions the very mainspring of responsibility in the lower houses, as we call them, is the probability of a dissolution at any crisis a dissolution, that is to say, of the house, which, in ordinary constitutions, is the house elected upon the widest suffrage, and is called the people's house. But here you have a difference; because this is a constitution which provides for two houses, both of which are to be chosen by popular election, and both of which are to be elected on the same suffrage. Well, it would puzzle any one, I think, in reasoning the matter out, to come to a conclusion that the safeguard of responsibility is one which is attachable only to one of these two chambers.
It would puzzle anyone to argue the matter out if he were also assured that it is only Attachable to that chamber, because it is what we call the lower chamber. Responsibility is attached to that chamber because it is in the ordinary constitutions the representative chamber. It is the one that was elected by the people, and which returns to the people for a ratification of its acts. Here, in this constitution, we have the difference that both houses are so constituted. And we admit the principle, to a certain extent, of a dissolution of the senate, because we provide for the retirement of one half of its members, and their submission to the people every third year. Then what can be the reasonable objection, if you must make some provision for deadlocks, to submitting the other popular chamber to dissolution just as you submit that chamber which was originally called the popular chamber? They are both popular chambers. I call upon my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, to testify with me upon this point, because he even went so far as to express the fear that the senate would be too popular a chamber. We need have no fear of that if it be subject to the same responsibility as is the other chamber.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
It has not the same power!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
But it has power in dealing with the finances of the country; and if you are to make provision for deadlocks alone as to the finances of the country, it will be found hard to resist the argument that the same influence to which one house is amenable should apply to both.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Ministers are responsible to one house!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
That is no reason why members of both houses should not be responsible to their constituents.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The trouble comes from the lower house!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
It may, and in this constitution it may also come from the other. Strong as I have been in the assertion that, on lines of reason, some power to deal with money bills should be given to the senate, only provided they do not interfere too largely with the working of the machine of responsible government, that does not bind me to the conclusion that when these powers are given to them they should not in the last resort at any rate be made to feel that in case of crises they must act in the manner they deem to be acceptable to those who sent them there.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Not at the dictation of the government!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I do not care at whose dictation, because if a chamber be independent it will accept no dictation, if it feel that it is strongly founded in the esteem and respect of its constituencies, it will be independent. In going beyond that foundation, it is trespassing upon its trust. Having gone so far, you will have merely asserted the principle of responsibility to the extent required when you have two houses proceeding from a similar source, and elected on the same suffrage. Then the question remains: Will it be necessary to go further? As to that, I entertain the gravest doubts. "I am not blind to the fact that there are many members of our own Legislative Assembly who think that we ought to go further-I am not blind to the fact that there are some persons outside who think so. Certainly, if the necessity arises, I shall not be blind to any force of public opinion. But the question that confronts us at once here is: will this double dissolution be effective? If it be effective for the purpose for which we seek it, then it is not necessary for us to proceed further. Without expressing too strong an opinion upon that subject, I think it is worth considering whether it will not be a sufficient provision. I do not wish to express myself with finality upon this question, because I think that, having arrived at such a critical point as we have, the man who expresses himself with utter finality upon a matter of this kind is certainly not observing the duty he was sent here to discharge. The moral force of the double dissolution will be very strong, and we must not neglect the consideration of moral influence in a case of this kind - that is to say, the liability of members to a dissolution, with all its attendant dangers, which we have vividly in our recollections, and all its expense, as to which, of course, we should speak with bated breath. If there is something which exercises a very strong influence upon the members of an ordinary lower house, then when you have two houses elected in a similar way, and proceeding from a similar source, why should not the moral influence that is sufficient for the members of the one be practically sufficient for the members of the other? When I speak of moral influence I mean this: I can quite see that if you have a double dissolution carried out, there is the possibility of things in the end remaining as they were. That I look upon as a possibility - perhaps not much more. But then I see, on the other hand, a very strong probability that the subjection of the member of the second chamber, as well as the member of the first, to this liability to dissolution, with what I have described as its dangers and expenses - I see a strong probability that the subjection of both of them to the like treatment may induce a disposition to mutual concession and proper adjustment which may often, if not always, save even the trouble of carrying out a double dissolution. I believe, and have always believed, that constitutional provisions are, in many cases, more valuable by their moral influences than by their practical operation, and I am inclined to think that this will be a case of that sort. But it has been argued - and I have to refer to this - that the result of the double dissolution will be to leave matters as they are. Those of us who have experience of dissolutions in these colonies know that it is not at all a frequent thing that the result of the dissolution of one chamber is to leave things as they are. If we were to exercise our memories, we should find, notwithstanding recent experiences in this colony, that the results of appeals to the people have been, far more often than not, adverse to those who have declared for those appeals. If we are to have the experience of the past justified by the events of the future, what is there to make us suppose that the results of a double dissolution will necessarily be to leave things as they are, when the past has told us that generally the result of a dissolution has been to leave things as they were not? Then we must recollect that the moral force has not spent itself at that point, because if an agreement is not come to, and there is a power of double dissolution, it can be again exercised, and the same moral force which I described as acting upon members of both houses before one dissolution, will be intensified by the dread of another. Are not all these things very strong factors in the consideration of this matter? Is there not some reason for us to think that when we have provided one means for the solution of the deadlock, experience and commonsense will go some distance to lead us to suppose that that one provision will be sufficient? But I must admit this: If it is considered by the Convention that this provision is not sufficient, and if it is considered also that there is a force of public opinion, which makes it advisable to make further provision, I find myself in very grave doubt as to what the next provision should be. For this reason: First, I have already expressed myself against the referendum in matters of ordinary legislation, and I would say that while I would entirely trust the referendum for the making of a constitution, or for the amendment of a constitution, I do so, because, in those cases, the principle of the responsibility of members and ministers, which is at the root of our system of government, is there not considerably involved. The referendum, as applied to the ordinary purposes of government is, I think, calculated to sap that principle of responsibility, to relieve both ministers and members from that course of duty which their liability to a dissolution, instead of to a referendum, would make them feel that they must standby. But there is still this to be considered: If you first apply the double dissolution you have taken advantage of that principle of responsibility, that liability to popular judgment, which is the safeguard of the constitution, and it afterwards you find your question unsolved, and you then think it necessary to apply some form of referendum I must admit at this point that the referendum so used, and after that test, has not so many objections on the face of it as seem to me to attach to it when it is applied direct, and for the reason that it is only used then after the application of the principle of ministerial responsibility. When the application of that principle is exhausted, and when you have got out of ministers and members all you can get, by making them face that responsibility, there as the last resort it may be possible that the referendum will be a good thing. But just see the dangers that may confront us when we have to choose between two sorts of referendum. One is what is called the dual referendum, that is, a referendum by which the opinion of the people is taken, and in which an affirmative result on the part of a majority of the states and a majority of the electors, all of them voting on the same occasion, will carry the measure, and in which the defection of one branch or the other will lose the measure. That is the dual referendum. Then there is the general referendum, which makes so direct an appeal to one of those branches that the very affirmation or rejection of the measure by the mass vote of the people, taken in their proportion of numbers alone, will mean the life or the death of the measure. We have to choose between those two kinds of referendum; and here is the point where I see such very great difficulties, because I admit, saving the question of the responsibility of ministers and members, that in the dual referendum there is more justice, than in the general referendum. I admit that; but if you once get beyond the point of the double dissolution, you are doing so because you come to the conclusion that it is not effective—that it has not done what was required, and something more is needed. One great difficulty about the dual referendum is, that while it may be more just than the other, it is liable to the trouble of not being effective, because it is as possible in the case of the dual referendum, as in the case of a dissolution, that parties and houses will be left where they were. I do not say that these are insuperable objections, but they are objections that maybe fairly urged. Then any sort of referendum is liable to this objection, perhaps, that it has not the same effectiveness to bring about an agreement between two dissenting, two quarrelling houses, as a dissolution has, for the reason that the member does not have to go to his constituents on the referendum. He is safe in his seat. On a dissolution he is not safe in his seat, and, therefore, be wants to avoid a dissolution, and, consequently, will be impelled to come to a reasonable conclusion, instead of haggling about what, after all, in some of our deadlocks, have been mere trifles. There is that difficulty about the dual referendum. First, I believe it is more just than the direct referendum; next, I believe it is less effective. Let us come to the other alternative. Let us discuss the general referendum. There can be no question about its probable effectiveness, that is to say, it will mean decision one way or the other, a flat decision, one way or the other but, as I have said, it is open to the same objection as the other referendum: it has not the persuasive effect and moral force on members of parliament that a dissolution has, simply because it leaves them safe in their seats. The great difficulty about the general referendum seems to me to be the possible injustice, and so I put it that you have to choose between those two forms of referendum the first one the more just, and the less effective; the second one much the more effective, but, possibly, the less just.

Mr. HIGGINS:

What is the possible injustice?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The dispute on the very face of it is a dispute between the people and the states as represented in two separate chambers. It is a dispute between the people at large, represented according to numbers in the house of representatives, and the states, which, of course, means the people of the states, as represented in the senate. You have two parties to this dispute. Now we have a maxim which is as applicable to our ordinary concerns as it is applicable in law, and it is that nobody should be allowed to be a judge in his own cause. It seems to me that the difficulty about the general referendum is that, inasmuch as the people according to numbers on the one hand, and the states on the other, are, through their representatives the parties to this dispute, if you apply to one of them, namely, to the people, to settle it, or if you apply to the other, that is to the states, to settle it, in either case you are asking an interested party to decide his own cause. The dual referendum gets rid of this difficulty; but it is objectionable upon the ground of ineffectiveness. I want to point out these defects with impartiality. I am not speaking against the proposal to make provision for deadlocks, and I am not forgetting that you must have due regard to the force of public opinion. There is a further objection urged against the general referendum which is only, though in another form, the objection which I have just described and I wish these objections to be taken, not so much as my own, as the objections which have arisen in the course of this debate. This further objection is the fear that where the dispute is one between the people at large as represented in the house of representatives and the states as represented in the senate, the foregone, or I will say the very probable victory, upon all occasions of the one party to the dispute will tend to whittle away, what is called the individuality, but what I prefer to call the interests of the states. There is also a fear that a succession of applications of this remedy for deadlocks may tend towards unification. The hon. member, Mr. Trenwith, dealt with this question, and argued it rather cleverly. His argument and the hon. member will correct me if I do not state it rightly really amounted to this, that the circumstances of the severance of the other colonies from New South Wales, and of the present desire for unity, would, when well-considered, lead us to the conclusion that the proper remedy for the present state of things was unification, or a tendency to unification.

Mr. TRENWITH:

No, my argument was this, that separation is necessary for most of the purposes of government; but in performing the functions of government as separate colonies, we have learnt that there are some things which we cannot do separately so well as we could do them collectively, and that for those purposes we should unite.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I quite agree with my hon. friend in the way he puts his argument; but we must remember that while what he said is perfectly true, the term "unite" is capable of different significations. To unite way mean to unite in federation, or in a state of unification, We are still left to decide the question, in which way should we unite? What was the way in which some of the colonies separated from the colony which, if it is not arrogating too much to use the term, may be called the mother colony? Was it not found that a central government situated in a portion of this vast expansive country was ineffective to deal with a certain class of affairs which were manifestly and really affairs of provincial politics? That was the discovery which was made, and the result of it was the separation of the other colonies. The discovery which has been made since, and it was made within a few years after the separation of Victoria from New South Wales was, not that this separation had not been a right step to take, not that the causes which brought it about did not still exist, but that there were other matters, quite outside matters of mere provincial politics, which ought to be dealt with by a central and common authority. That was the principle according to which Wentworth, Charles Gavan Duffy, Deas-Thomson, and others worked; and the discovery was made as early as 1857. That is what has troubled the wisest men in these colonies from that date to, this, which has excited all the friction, and caused the demand for a federation to be what I believe is an irresistible demand. But what is the kind of union? The causes which led to the separation of these states still exist that is to say, the difficulty of governing provincial or municipal affairs from a common centre, and the inability to deal with national questions, has been the thorn in our side. Consequently, the terms of our union must be these: First, that we shall have a general authority, with sufficient power to deal with those matters which are not provincial and municipal, and at the same time we must so safeguard that authority that in carrying out its functions it will not, little by little, take away from the functions of provincial politics what should still remain with the states.

Mr. HIGGINS:

You cannot take them away under a written constitution!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

You cannot do everything, I admit, by a written constitution, but that is no reason why your written constitution should not save you from certain disasters. I do not think that the argument therefore that has been used is sufficient to make us forget that in a constitution there must be certain safeguards to prevent on the one hand the federation being under the control of the states, or on the other hand the states being under the control of the federation. Canada illustrates the whole position. Consider the position of Upper and Lower Canada when they separated. We know what happened there. As they were when united after Lord Durham's despatch, which practically brought about their union, when they made an amalgamated state, and as they are now, as members of a federation, we shall see the problem exemplified over again, that is, when you come to bring two large colonies or states together as you might do in the case of New South Wales and Victoria for the purposes of union. If you are going to do what was at first done in Canada, and give over to the parliament of the union legislative authority over both those large states in all their relations, and with regard to municipal and provincial affairs, you will have such an unwieldy form of government that the machine cannot go on. That was found out in Canada, and that is why Canada is now federated. And the federation of Canada, instead of being a step towards unification, has been a step away from amalgamation. If we apply these lessons in our own case, we ought to be very careful to see this: that whatever step we take to solve deadlocks, or for any other purpose, we should not be parties to anything which would tend towards either a weak federation on the one hand or the swamping of the states on the other. Now, the objection to the general referendum seems to me to be chiefly this tendency to destroy state interests - and I wish to say at the present stage, lest I should be misinterpreted afterwards, that in laying these considerations before hon. members I do not bind myself, because I consider there is a higher duty than exercising any one individual opinion or any one political principle laid upon us, that is that if, without making too great a sacrifice of opinion or principle, and without making any sacrifice of what is just to our own colonies, we can frame a constitution that will be accepted, it is our duty to sink individual opinions as much as we honestly can. For that reason, in pointing out this difficulty, let it be perfectly understood, that if the pinch comes, if it comes to a pinch about having a constitution or having none, I am prepared to support before the people the constitution, even if it contains a general referendum. I am not going to use the threats which have been used. I do not think we have been wise in making threats. I remember a similar occasion occurring in 1891 when a certain gentleman, whom we have no longer in politics, said something about his carpet-bag. I believe I had some influence on that occasion in preventing the appearance on the scene of carpet-bags. I do think we must not be precipitate in saying if we put this or that in the constitution you may say good-bye to federation. When you get such a case as occurred yesterday, it is a right thing for us to be frank with each other. It is a right thing for us to point out what we believe to be the public opinion of our colony. I believe I took a hand in doing that. I am perfectly willing to take a hand in doing that at any time; but at the same time I do not think I should be justified in saying this: if you put this provision in the constitution I will stump the country against the constitution. I do not want to be with my hon. and learned friend in his strong opinion against the general referendum, an opinion which I, to a certain extent, share, and which led him to say more than he would say now.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
I think it better to be candid!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I am quite in favour of our pointing out to each other what we think the opinion in our colony is; but the time for threats is not now. If there is ever a time for threats in a body of this kind, all I wish to say about that is, that I would implore hon. members on one side and the other not to be carried away for or against a certain course by what may be said in the warmth of debate. If this constitution in the end contains a general referendum, I believe I can reconcile it to my conscience to support the bill. At the same time I have always spoken against the referendum, although I admit, as I have already said, if the referendum is so safeguarded that a double dissolution precedes it, I believe its impingement on ministerial responsibility, and members' responsibility, will not be so severe. But I cannot be led into the assertion that I will oppose this constitution if it contains a certain provision, because I think we ought to be a little more cautious than that; and I say that with the very highest respect for all who have preceded me. May I say that the occasion presents itself to me as being one in which we must have due regard for public opinion? I think we are all of us in a position now, at least, to gauge public opinion to some extent in other colonies as well as our own.
The Hon. S. FRASER:
   It may not be public opinion six months hence!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
   My hon. friend, perhaps, considers public opinion more fickle than I do. I have great reliance on public opinion with regard to federation; but, nevertheless, I think we can all trifle with public opinion, however strong it may be in favour of a measure which we desire. All I am urging now is, that while we are to have due regard for public opinion, we must also, keeping that public opinion in view, act with caution in such a crisis as this, because the work we are doing is so entirely new. We are devising novel remedies to meet circumstances which we certainly cannot predict with accuracy. We cannot predict how this constitution will work. We can only form, from our experience of political and constitutional matters, a reasonable judgment as to how it will work. The working of the American Constitution, in many respects, has disappointed the expectations of its founders, and I believe in many respects it agreeably disappointed, even in their own lifetime, the expectations of its founders. We may say that in the case of Canada there were many prophets of evil. The merchants of Toronto, I believe, were as much afraid of the loss of their supremacy in Canada as some of the merchants in Sydney are today. All those predictions were falsified by events in that case; but it is not that so much I am thinking of as this: that, if facts falsify predictions in cases of commercial events and results, they may be expected to falsify predictions in the case of constitutions. Therefore, while I agree that we must have fair regard for public opinion, we must take care that we make a machine that will be still, in the main, in accordance with the opinions which we were sent here reasonably to put forward and to insist upon; and, of course, in doing that, I am quite sure that we shall do it with far more force, as well as with far more grace, if, by mutual concession, there are no ragged ends to our constitution, but it represents the rounded force of that modified opinion concurred in by sensible men; and I believe we may yet find a way out of this difficulty on those very lines.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria):
   I quite agree with my hon. friend, Mr. Barton, that we have now reached another very critical position with regard to federation. We have in our past meetings had to meet several critical positions. By mutual forbearance and by compromise, I believe that up to the present time we have been able to surmount all those difficulties, and I think now, once again, the Convention will do as our leader has asked us: exhibit that public spirit which has characterised our deliberations in the past. I agree with our leader that we should be frank with each other. I have endeavoured all through these deliberations to fairly state my opinions, whilst I have been perfectly prepared to fall in with the views of the majority, if it be at all possible. I say now that even if this bill contains provisions of which I have not approved, and of which I do not approve, still, unless they are very strongly opposed to my views, unless they are very strongly opposed to the interests of the colony of which I have the honor of being a representative, I will feel it my bounden duty to exercise my influence amongst the people of Victoria, to endeavour to induce them to accept every compromise at which we may arrive. We have listened tonight to more weighty words of wisdom from our esteemed leader, and I do not desire, in the few remarks I intend to make, to say one single word which may take away from the good effect those words must have had on all the representatives present. I can do that more honestly and more earnestly, as it is well known to my colleagues that I have differed from them and from the representatives of the other large colony with regard to what has been called the mass referendum. To show to our friends from the smallest colonies that there is no combination amongst the representatives of the larger colonies to do them any injury or injustice, my hon. friend has fairly told us that the bill, as now prepared, has removed many dangers and difficulties which we, otherwise, might have had to contend against; and I agree with him to a very great extent that it is not probable that what we have referred to as deadlocks will occur very frequently in the future. We cannot imagine that leading men from the various colonies, chosen to the high and honorable position of representatives of their fellow-colonists, either in the house of representatives or in the senate, will deliberately do anything which may be injurious to the interests of the whole of Australia; and I believe that, whereas we now, in our various parliaments, are led very often by small parochial feelings to quarrel among ourselves, those who meet in the larger assembly will recognise and realise that all the dividing lines the supposed lines of demarcation between the various colonies must, if we are to have true federation, be for nearly all purposes swept away; and whilst they are there, they will look upon themselves, not as representatives of some portion of our great commonwealth, but as sent there to do the best they can in the interests of the whole of Australia, and that being so, I think that these deadlocks which we have heard so much of in our various discussions, are not likely very often to occur. At the same time, there is no doubt that circumstances may arise under which they may occur. We here, having thought out and considered the matter in our own minds, may anticipate that they will not occur; still we cannot overlook the fact that there is a strong feeling amongst those who have not intimately studied the various phases of this question that these differences strong differences which cannot be reconciled may possibly occur between the two houses of the legislature. That being so, I think we are bound in framing this constitution in order to meet that public opinion which we cannot wholly resist, even though we may think that it is not absolutely correct, we are bound in justice to the various colonies to make some provision for the purpose of meeting those deadlocks if they should occur. At the same time, I am quite in accord with those who say that in making this provision we must be careful that we do no injustice to those whom we have been in the habit of calling the smaller colonies. One thing that we have to do is to see that the will of the people is carried out; but when we speak of the people, we must not forget, as was pointed out by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, that we have to regard the people as individuals, and as constituting each state; and therefore, in dealing with this matter we must be careful in carrying the provision into effect that we do not do what it has been suggested we may possibly do, lead to unification-unification with a larger meaning than my hon. friend, Mr. Trenwith has given to it. That, I think, is the real fear which those who represent the small states have brought so prominently before us today, and on other occasions. I am at one with those who say that we ought not to allow the government of the day to dominate the house. I am quite in accord with those who say further that we are not to allow one house to dominate the other, unless we know that particular house has the people at its back, and that, in endeavouring to force certain views upon the other chamber, that house is simply carrying out what is really the will and desire of the people of the federation. It has been fairly pointed out, and I agree with the observation that, as a rule, the opinion of our people will be fairlyascertained and gathered at the various elections which have to take place. The house of representatives will have every three years, at the longest, to meet the electors of the various colonies; and, if public opinion is against the views expressed by any of the members, in all probability those members will not regain their seats in the house; and by that means, and also by the fact that the senators will have to go to their constituents because every three years one-half of them will have to submit their views and their actions to the will of the people-by those two means we shall to a great extent ascertain the views of the country on the various matters which will have to be discussed and decided at different times.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

What more is necessary?
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

But still extraordinary circumstances may arise, and it is to guard against those extraordinary circumstances that we have to make the provision which I think we ought to include in the bill. Now, having admitted, whether by way of right, as some claim, or by way of concession, as others describe it, equal representation to the smaller states, I feel that we have no ground on which we can justly attempt to undermine by any provision that equal representation; and I do think, after having listened very patiently to the arguments that have been brought forward for and against the proposal to have a mass referendum, that if we were to adopt that particular proposal we should be, to a great extent, taking away from the smaller states that which we have willingly granted them. With that in my mind, I came to the conclusion that to carry this particular proposal would be inequitable and unjust. Although I might be voting, and probably would be voting, against many of my own colleagues from Victoria, and also, as far as I can gather from the tone of their speeches, against a large number of the representatives of New South Wales, I should have felt bound-if the proposal be pressed to a division, to cast my vote against it, and in favour of the claims made by the smaller states. In addition to that, when we see the representation here, and when we have listened to the speeches of hon. members, we must, although we might be strongly in favour of the view put forward, have come to the conclusion that, it would be hopeless for us to expect the smaller states to give us the concession involved. There would be no chance whatever of getting it from them, even as a concession, if we could claim that it was one that was fair and just.

An Hon. MEMBER:

That is to say that the smaller states will not be fair!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I do not say that. My experience of the smaller states here has been that whenever they could fairly and equitably meet the larger states they have willingly done so. I cannot forget that. Nor can I forget that in Adelaide many of the representatives of the smaller states, even against the wishes of a majority of their colleagues, threw in their lot with the larger states when they saw that the claim was an equitable claim, when they saw that by the refusal to throw in their lot with us they were jeopardising the great work they had in hand. Therefore, I say now that we, as the larger states, while we claim that the smaller states ought to help us, must not expect to have all from them. We must be prepared to give way ourselves in many respects. While we realise that we may have difficulty with our constituencies in inducing them to accept this bill, we must not forget that our friends in the other colonies may have equal, if not greater difficulty, in inducing their constituents to vote for the measure. If we could distinguish between state rights and other questions, I could understand that while we provided some mode of dealing with all questions which might come under the definition of state rights, we might apply the mass referendum to all other matters. But none of us could possibly attempt to make such a distinction, and that being so, we must be prepared to allow the whole matter to be dealt with in some other mode than that suggested, and which has been discussed here. Some say that if you put a sufficient check on the government of the day no harm would be done; but we know that the government, having the support of great numbers, having the support of a majority of the members in their various houses can always afford to sit quietly by and to hear discussion, and endure even any obstruction which may take place, seeing that sooner or later the force numbers will come in and carry any particular proposal. And so it would be with this particular proposal; or, at all events, if that fact did not exist, we cannot get rid of the position that the fear would exist in the smaller colonies that it would be done. We have, in dealing with this question, to see that we do not give rise to more difficulties than are absolutely necessary in obtaining the assent of our people to this particular proposal at the polls. My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Barton, has argued that as both chambers are popular chambers, a double dissolution is justifiable. I agree with him entirely in that proposition. I have always asserted that it is so, and I think that when we consider the constitution of the two chambers the strongest supporter of the senate must be prepared to admit that if doubt exists as to whether that chamber is representing or misrepresenting the views of the people, then its members ought to be sent to their masters to ascertain what their wishes really are. I can see no reason whatever why we should not apply to the senate the same dissolution that is applied to the house of representatives. It is unfair that we should penalise the one house, when a dissolution is asked for in consequence of some dispute between the two chambers, and not apply the same treatment to the other chamber. If we can send only one of the disputing parties to the people for their decision, surely that is very unfair to the house of representatives which may be in the right.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
You cannot do it now!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
We cannot do it now, because the upper houses in all our colonies are constituted on a different basis from that of the lower chambers. But even in our local parliaments I fail to see any reason, where the council is elective, why, if the dispute is of sufficient importance, they should not be prepared, willingly, to accept the test, and ascertain whether they really represent the feeling of those whom they assert they are properly representing. I fail to see why the legislative council in any of the colonies, or why the senate we are about to create, should claim to be free from the process of dissolution free from the power of the government for the time-being to ask them to go back to the people who sent them there, to see whether they are properly and truly representing their views.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

The upper house in that case would not be a revising body, but would be subject to popular excitement!

An Hon. MEMBER:

The House of Lords is not sent to the country!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The House of Lords, of course, is in a different position, as are also the nominee chambers in these colonies; but we know that if necessity should arise, there are means by which even these chambers can be forced to obey the popular will. But that is always a dangerous power, and should only be resorted to in cases of very grave emergency. My hon. and learned friend, while approving of the double dissolution, tells us that he has grave doubts as to whether we are justified in going further, and he considers that the fact that members will have to go before their constituents will make them very cautious and careful in the actions they take before they allow that event to occur. I quite agree with him there. I quite agree with him also that public opinion would very often have a moral force upon the contending parties. But then he tells us that if that fails, and matters remain as they are, there is still a remedy in the shape of another dissolution. Now, is it wise that, having had one dissolution, the ministry and the members having taken the responsibility which he believes they ought to take, we should then, for the purpose of endeavouring to settle the dispute, once more send the new house or the new houses back to their constituents for a further expression of opinion? I am afraid that is a plan which would not work, and that as between that and the referendum, if there are what I may, for the time being, call two evils, I think we ought to endeavour to choose the less.

An Hon. MEMBER:
There might be a dissolution almost every month!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I think that the feeling in Victoria is very strongly in favour of a referendum as the first expedient, but in the spirit of compromise, which ought to actuate us, I am prepared, and I have no doubt that many of my colleagues from that colony will be prepared, to say that we will agree to a mode of settlement which consists, in the first instance, of something in which we, do not believe so largely as we do in the referendum, we will be prepared to accept, as a first trial, a double dissolution, and if that fails, then, I think, we ought to be prepared to go a step further. We all know that when we are before our constituents there may be some particular point on which we ought to get a direct decision; but do we on a dissolution ever get that?

An Hon. MEMBER:

Certainly not!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I am afraid we do not. At every general election there will be a large number of people who will vote either for or against a particular candidate for personal reasons.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

For personal and local reasons!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

There will be many who will vote for local reasons.

An Hon. MEMBER:

On side issues!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

There will be many whose vote will be decided by what are apparently, to others, small matters, but which they regard as of the utmost importance, and to gain their own particular pet object, they will lay aside every other. Unfortunately that is so. It is so on a dissolution, it is so at every general election, and, therefore, to say that we take the voice of the country on a dissolution, or at a general election, is not absolutely true in fact. The real way to take it is by the referendum.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

The hon. member cannot show any precedent in any part of the world for it!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The objection apparently raised as between a dissolution and a referendum is that on a dissolution the ministers have to take the responsibility of their action, and that in a referendum the responsibility is altogether weakened or put on one side. I do not agree with that, because I think that any government who accepted the position of sending a particular matter which they had formulated as part of their policy, and insisted on as being for the good of the country if they chose to adopt the mode of referendum, and failed, I say that that government would have to give way just the same as they would have to give way if they failed on appeal to the constituencies on a dissolution; therefore, I cannot see that that difficulty should prevent us from adopting the referendum unless there are stronger reasons why we should not adopt it.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Suppose the referendum was as to the establishment of a state bank, would the hon. member resign if beaten?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I do not know that we would take a referendum on a matter of that kind. On a matter of that kind the government would probably say, "We will wait until a general election."

An Hon. MEMBER:

Does the hon. gentleman mean the mass referendum?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

No, I have already said that I am thoroughly opposed to the mass referendum, and would not adopt that on any consideration. I have said that in Victoria, in my opinion, there is a strong feeling that a dispute should be settled, not by a double dissolution, but by a referendum; but to meet the wishes of those who think otherwise here, I, for one, am perfectly prepared to endeavour to settle these disputes by a double dissolution, and I claim that if that proved unsatisfactory if the dispute still existed and we found that the people had not spoken clearly and distinctly on the particular issue in dispute then there would be only one course open to us, and that would be to send to the people a direct and distinct issue on which they might vote "aye" or "nay." In Victoria we have not claimed this referendum. In the amendments suggested by our Parliament, we have not attempted to claim it. Many of our members would have been in favour of it; but it was felt that it would be unjust to ask the smaller states to place themselves so entirely at the mercy of the mass of the people.

Mr. HIGGINS:

They did not say that it would be just; they said that it was inexpedient!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I am quite willing to say that, even if it were just, it is inexpedient; because we know very well that we cannot get it, and that the probabilities are, if we did get it, our friends from the smaller colonies would not join the federation. As practical men, we must not deal with mere theories.

Logic is all very well in a debating society; but we are met here as negotiators to frame the best bargain that we can, and a bargain which will be acceptable, not only to the people of our own colonies, but to the people of all Australia. We must, therefore, take into consideration the views expressed by the representatives of the other colonies, and we must see that we are not attempting to force upon them something which their colonies will not indorse. I agree with my hon. friend that, even if this were just, which I do not admit, it is wholly inexpedient, and as wise and sensible men we should not attempt to adopt it. The proposal of Victoria is that either house should have the right to take this particular step, but that two sessions must intervene, so that there maybe ample time for consideration. To prevent the second session from being held immediately after the dispute, it is provided that there must be a lapse of six weeks before parliament can meet. Then a resolution must be passed by one house affirming that the matter is one of urgency, and asking the other house to give it further consideration. That step gives another opportunity for full and fair discussion. Lastly, there is the responsibility of passing a resolution sending the question to the people for their decision; so that every step possible is taken to provide for a reasonable amount of delay, in order to give time for full consideration, so that the representatives of the people may fully thrash out the matter, and, if possible, avoid either a dissolution or an application of the referendum. Then I will ask the representatives of the smaller states to say whether the proposed referendum does not fully protect every right that they can have? Our Assembly went further than the Convention went in Adelaide, and provided that not only must a majority of the states and a majority of the electors voting be obtained, but that there must also be a majority of the electoral districts in the house of representatives in favour of the question before it can be decided in the affirmative.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is no referendum at all!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
This proposal is not antagonistic to the interests of the smaller states. I will admit that the result may be to leave the dispute undecided; but we have either to do that, or we must do something which I am certain we could never carry out. While we may have strong views about the majority of the people ruling, what is the use of attempting to embody them in a constitution, when we know that that constitution would never be agreed to? That is the proposal with regard to the referendum, and I am certain that the smaller states need not be in any way afraid to agree to it.

Mr. WALKER:
That is the dual referendum!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Yes. There must be the consent of a majority of the states, and the consent of a majority of the people in the states. There must be, further, a majority of the districts. We have gone to the fullest extent that we can go to do what is fair and just to those with whom we desire to federate. I think it is a certainty that we must have the amendment proposed here, because I believe there are very few who would be prepared to contend that we should allow this constitution to go forth without any means of settling deadlocks. If we think that some method must be adopted we must carry the first amendment so as to build up on that foundation some structure to give effect to our views. I am anxious that, if possible, we should be unanimous on this question. Although possibly the opinion of my own colony would be that we should insist upon getting the referendum, and not the double dissolution, I am prepared to meet the views of my friends here by endeavouring, if possible, to have differences settled by double dissolution. But while meeting them to that extent I am going to ask them in fairness to us to help us out of the difficulty we may get into by agreeing to that to assent to our proposal, which is that after we have tried the double dissolution and presuming that to have failed, then we should have the dual referendum. I think that is not unfair or unreasonable. We have all through endeavoured to meet each other so as to smooth the path we shall have to travel in our various colonies. I feel very certain of this, that if we can go to our respective colonies and say that after having fully discussed, considered, and fought out this subject, we have, practically, unanimously as I hope it will become to the conclusion that there should be a mode of settling these difficulties, if unfortunately they do occur, by a double dissolution, and, if that fails, by a dual referendum, I think we shall have very little, if any, difficulty, in convincing the people we represent that they may fairly and reasonably adopt it. But I am satisfied that if we are to leave in the bill equal representation, which I, for one, have willingly conceded from the first, although I have been somewhat blamed for doing, so, if we are to leave that and the other powers with regard to money bills which we have willingly given to the senate, and if we are to have no means of settling the difficulties that may arise, although I am prepared to use all the influence I possess to induce the people of Victoria to accept it, I am afraid that it will be a very difficult task indeed. Therefore, to help us out of a difficulty, as we are willing to help the representatives of the smaller states out of their difficulty, I think I may fairly and justly claim that they should accept the proposition which we submit. If they do so, I believe that, with the exception of the financial question, this will practically be the last difficulty which will have to be settled, and then we may be all proud to take back the bill to the people in our various colonies and ask them to indorse it; and I believe that the vast minority of the people, for the purpose of obtaining the benefits of federation, will be prepared to do so. I am sure I can appeal to the representatives of the smaller colonies to help us, as we are willing to help them, and I trust that appeal will not be in vain.

The Hon. H. DOBSON (Tasmania)[9.40]:

I think every member of the Convention is grateful to our honorable leader for his words of wisdom and common-sense. I think we also owe a debt of gratitude to the Premier of Victoria for the plain and practical advice he has given us, fair as it undoubtedly is from his point of view. I think our discussion or fight, if we are having a friendly fight as we are, contains a certain element of unfairness which I desire to point out. It appears to me that the larger colonies of Victoria and New South Wales are certainly to be the predominant partners, to use Lord Rosebery's phrase, in the federal government which is to be formed, and they certainly are the predominant colonies in this Convention; and, being the larger colonies, they have more able public men than have the other three colonies put together. They have more public speakers than we have; they have more able men in this Convention and outside it than we have; they have newspapers of enormous influence which are read by thousands of people against the hundreds that read our newspapers. These public men and these newspapers are always talking of the ultra-democratic form of the constitution; every speaker is trending in that direction; and anybody who suggests that there is another side to the picture, that there is another way to frame the constitution is hardly listened to, or else is listened to with no weight whatever, as compared with any utterance from a larger colony, or any article from one of the larger newspapers to which I have alluded. I do not hesitate, to say that if we had on behalf of the small colonies an Edmund Barton, and an Alfred Deakin, and four newspapers like the Age, the Argus, the Herald, and the Telegraph, the whole atmosphere of this Convention would he changed.
This is the element of unfairness which I desire to point out. Here I would ask my fellow delegates this question: Are we to frame this constitution in accordance with those principles which our political experience believes to be right, or are we to listen to the voice of the people without and absolutely let them dictate to us how the machine is to be framed? While I certainly am not advocating that we should be deaf to the voice of the people if we could only know what that voice is and we cannot while I am not advocating that we should not consider every suggestion which has been made by any single member of a house of legislature, I am inclined to think we are being guided too much by the outside voice and trusting too little to our honest and earnest convictions upon the subject which we were sent here to deal with. The question before the Committee is so complex and so complicated, that I certainly shall follow the advice and the example of our honorable leader, and hold my judgment in suspense. My opinions have been so modified, I have been so instructed by the debates, by the arguments which I have heard in this chamber, that I desire to withhold my judgment till the discussion is exhausted, and I have got every shred of light on the matter which hon. members can give me. While the leader of the Convention, and my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, say that we must give effect to the popular will, and that we shall make a very grave mistake in framing this constitution unless we do so, I think it is a very great mistake to talk about this popular will, as if any hon. member, or all of us put together, had any reasonable idea of what that popular will may be. While we are dealing now with the constitutional aspect of the machine we are constructing, we are altogether forgetting the financial aspect of it, we are altogether forgetting the self-interest which is wrapped up in that, and when the constitution goes before our people with the financial clauses there, and the terms of the bargain which we inevitably have to make one state with the other, I say most unhesitatingly that the constitutional question, which is now being made too much of, which is being exaggerated, if you will, both on the side of the small colonies and on the side of the great, will sink into insignificance; and those hon. members who have been bold enough to prophesy what the will of the people is will have no will expressed on those matters at all; but the will of the people will be expressed on those subjects which touch their pockets. We shall have the protectionist in Victoria asking himself, "Will that constitution suit my industry? Is it going to reduce the value of land in my colony £25,000,000,"-as pointed out by the hon. member, Mr. McLean. We will have the manufacturers asking, "Will a broad revenue tariff suit me instead of a protectionist tariff?" We shall have the colonists considering the matter to a great extent from the view of self-interest; and I say that then we shall find that those constitutional questions which are now being made so much of will sink into the background, and that hon. members who are now prophesying as to the will of the people being against federation if we insert a particular clause, or against it if we leave out a particular clause, will be absolutely wrong in what they are prophesying.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Some people will have some difficulties; others will have others!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

I quite think so. Some earnest radicals and some earnest tories will have constitutional difficulties; but the great bulk of the people will look at the advantages or disadvantages of the bargain. I therefore think there is a very grave danger indeed to the small colonies giving way too much to our predominant friends of the two larger colonies. What has led me to this argument is some remarks which have been made by two or three speakers who, I presume, are democrats, or who, at all events, take a different view on this question from that which my intelligence leads me to take; and out of their own mouths I think they have to some extent given away the case. Let us take a remark which was made by the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, at the outset of this debate. He said:

When we have a nicely adjusted constitution, do not destroy the balance of power by a mechanical contrivance which may become a tyranny.

Could anyone put the question for the smaller colonies into a more apt or precise sentence than that? The hon. member points out that we have with our labour, intelligence, and industry, constructed a machine with absolutely finely adjusted powers, and he urges us not to destroy that fine balance which we have created by any mechanical contrivance. These are the sentiments of some of the members from Tasmania. But that was not the only phrase the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, made use of. He went on to say:

When we have a nicely adjusted constitution, do not destroy the balance of power by a mechanical contrivance which may become a tyranny.

Could anyone put the question for the smaller colonies into a more apt or precise sentence than that? The hon. member points out that we have with our labour, intelligence, and industry, constructed a machine with absolutely finely adjusted powers, and he urges us not to destroy that fine balance which we have created by any mechanical contrivance. These are the sentiments of some of the members from Tasmania. But that was not the only phrase the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, made use of. He went on to say:

The only check on the tyranny of the house of representatives is the second chamber.

He again uses the word "tyranny," referring, as Mr. Maine, and other writers refer, to the fact that manhood suffrage may be the basis of a tyranny. Whether we build a tyranny upon it or not, depends solely and entirely upon the one or two men who lead our democracy. Those men must be patriotic, upright, skilled, and able to prevent this democracy running into, disaster. I think I was hauled over the coals rather unmercifully by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, last night for daring to say I desired to control, as I do desire to control, the democratic force which surrounds me, that is, not a desire which sprung merely from my own small brain. It is the leading of almost every book that I take up. I am told, not only by Maine, but also by Bryce, by Leeky, by Sedgwick, and every writer that I have read, that democracy is on its trial.

Mr. GLYNN:
They also, say that the referendum is a conservative institution!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
The Swiss referendum is, of course, a conservative institution, but not a referendum established, after having formed two strong chambers, having approved of the bicameral system, which says the will of the people is expressed only when the two chambers agree. We do away with the bicameral system, violate the principle on which we are constructing the machine, and say we are going back to the people to some extent uneducated people who have sent men to Parliament because they believe they could carry on the work of legislation better than they could themselves. I would point out to my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Glynn, that I am trying to raise the very point which is at issue before the Committee.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Sedgwick has some very strong arguments in favour of the referendum!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
He speaks favourably in some parts of the referendum; but I desire to point out to hon. members what hon. member after hon. member insists on forgetting, that no writer that you can get hold of over had to deal with such a constitution an this is at the time; and here I use again the words of Dr. Quick. Here is a marvellous sentence to come from one of the advanced democrats. Dr. Quick says:

Having called into existence the most democratic constitution in the world, we ought to provide for those historic occasions when conflict arrives.

Now there is a grand sentence! Having absolutely created the most democratic constitution in the world, our advanced democrats opposite are not satisfied. They ask the small states to give them something more. They not only want the most democratic machine in the world, but they want something else. Does not that show that there really is a danger of the small states being persuaded, being coaxed, being induced to give way, when their duty to their principles, their duty to their people, their duty to these small and not predominant partners, ought to compel them to maintain their principles? The hon. and learned member, Dr. Quick, also says:

The senate will be stronger than any legislative council, and therefore we ought to provide against deadlocks.

He also says-
The senate was without parallel in responsible government.

Therefore, having made this strong upper chamber, and this strong upper chamber emanating from exactly the same source as the house of representatives, and having behind it the popular will, when these two strong chambers, each having equal powers, and each being of equal weight-each having behind it the same popular authority disagree, I fall back upon the words of the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, who says:

Is it not then most unmistakable that there must be a period when time ought to be allowed for consideration?

If you have these two chambers, emanating from the same authority, differing and in conflict, what does that show? It shows the great difficulty to determine what the will of the people is.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Refer to their masters!
The Hon. H. DOBSON:
The hon. member says, refer to their masters! I am already reminding the hon. member that their masters have already expressed one opinion through one set of representatives, and that exactly the same masters have registered a different opinion through their other representatives, and hon. members want this mechanical contrivance which is condemned by Mr. McMillan to go and let the people say which course they will have. Why, the very fact of two popular houses conflicting and disagreeing with one another shows that the question in dispute is so complex and so intricate that the people have not made up their minds, and want time to consider. Let me illustrate it by an illustration I gave at the Adelaide Convention. When Mr. Gladstone formed his policy of Home Rule and I do not dwell on the fact of how he startled his followers, broke up his party, and alienated some of the best friends of his life what he proposed to do as the Unionists thought was to disintegrate the British Empire. For three, four, and five years that gentleman and his followers appeared to captivate and take with them the public opinion of the British Empire. Seven years afterwards it was not until seven years afterwards after the greatest battle of words and discussion Great Britain has ever seen, the Conservatives came back with the largest majority we have seen within the last two decades against a bill which at first seemed to carry the whole weight of the people with it. That seems to show that you may have two houses from the same people registering two different opinions; that when you go back to those people, when you go back to your masters, they may not have made up their minds themselves; you may possibly go back to them at a time when they have no particular will based on reason, based on thorough investigation of the complex matter brought before them.

Mr. GLYNN:
The hon. member's argument on Home Rule is based on premises which many of us deny!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
I do not want to drag in Home Rule. I will take this Convention, if you like. Look at the way in which opinion as to the question of framing this bill has altered since 1891; how every hour we are getting more democratic; how every hour the larger states are gaining and the smaller states are losing. I wish to join my hon. friends in doing that which is fair and right in framing a bill that will meet with the acceptance of the people, but I do see a danger. We are drifting and drifting always in the one direction. Now I want to ask hon. members what will happen when Queensland joins us? I know not whether Queensland will send here conservative, liberal, or democratic members, but I know that Queensland will have a very large say in the matter. I know that when Queensland comes in as I hope she will to the third sitting of this Convention that representatives of that colony who speak will be listened to with the very greatest weight indeed. Suppose the great colony of Queensland, which is large enough and rich enough to be made soon into three colonies, utters the same prophecy which some hon. members have uttered, "Unless you build a constitution on more conservative lines our people will not accept it, and we will go back and stump the country against it," what position will you be in then? Therefore I ask hon. members to consider that, while we want to give fair play all round, the persuasive eloquence of our friends opposite is influencing some of us against our reason in this matter, simply because we do want to conciliate, because we do want to give and take, because we do want to be friendly, but, at the same time, there are certain principles which we ought to recollect, beyond which we ought not to go.

Dr. QUICK:
You have given up nothing up to the present!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
I think we give a great deal when we say that this second chamber this controlling chamber which is an absolute necessity in a bicameral system-should be elected on manhood suffrage. I consider that is giving up a very great deal. But what did the hon. member, Mr. Fraser, point out some hours ago that perhaps within twelve or eighteen months, or two years at the furthest, one-half of the senate must face its constituents. One-half of the senate must go to the people for direction, and if the people be dissatisfied if their masters be dissatisfied with what the senate has done, if they the electors can change the opinion of one-half of the senate by sending back that half to represent their exact views, as the hon. member, Mr. Fraser, has pointed out, you practically have the means of registering the will of the people without this mechanical contrivance.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
A natural means!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
It is a natural referendum, which to use a phrase which has been so often used, is embodied in the constitution. I meant to dwell upon the fact-I need not do so long, as the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, has done it better than I can-that throughout the whole of this debate hardly one member has drawn a distinction between absolute deadlocks and simple disagreements. I cannot bring myself to conceive that our democratic friends from either of the two large colonies have a right to give us equal representation with the one hand and absolutely take it back from us with the other by asking us to have a national referendum, or any other referendum, on all those questions of general legislative concern which do not bring about a deadlock; and I think our discussion is not conducted on the highest lines of intelligence unless we keep broadly before us the distinction between the senate by its veto bringing about a deadlock and preventing the machinery of government from going smoothly on, and the senate simply negativing some bill of which it does not approve, and which it thinks may tend to disaster, and not to the prosperity of the commonwealth. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, pointed out that most of the things contained in the 52nd clause of the bill-those thirty-seven powers which we have given over to the federal government-were not of state concern; and my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, who made an excellent speech, but one which I humbly venture to think was based on a fallacy, argued that free-trade and protection was not a state right. To my mind it is the most vital state right. The whole of the revenue from Tasmania, sufficient to pay more than the interest on her public debt, is derived from customs duties; and if a tariff is framed in order to give protection to the industries of Victoria, and if you do not give us a very large revenue from tea, coffee, cocoa, and things of that kind, which we cannot manufacture or grow, we shall not get enough revenue with which to carry on our government. Therefore, it becomes a most vital question as a state right whether we are going to have an ultra-protectionist tariff or a broad revenue producing tariff. I would point out also to my hon. friend Mr. Holder, on the question of taxation, that if ever a war should come, or if ever a necessity should arise for some great expenditure, the power possessed by the federal government to tax every citizen of the commonwealth, including every citizen of the states, is of the most vital importance to the states, and is essentially a state right.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

Suppose the customs duties are practically exhausted, and suppose the commonwealth falls back upon a land-tax and an income-tax, what arises then? I hope some of the good folks who are here tonight are going to visit or settle in Tasmania; but I regret to have to inform them that we have a shining income-tax there practically a war tax.

An Hon. MEMBER:

We have an income tax of 1s. 4d.!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

And we have also a land-tax. If, therefore, the commonwealth are going to put an extra 3d. on income and an extra halfpenny on land, is not that a question of vital concern to the state-is not that a state right? Most decidedly it is. Then look at other matters. We notice that at home the Trades Union Congress is suggesting that all the means of production, all the means of distribution, and all the means of exchange should be socialised whatever that may mean. Suppose that questions of socialism, or questions affecting labour and capital, were introduced into the federal parliament suppose the question of banking was introduced, and some of our friends wanted to socialise or nationalise or democratise banking; and suppose our state, I do not care whether it is a small state or a large state-looked upon that law as absolutely full of disaster, and one which could only end in unsettling our commercial affairs and bringing about fiscal disturbance-is not that a state right?

Mr. GLYNN:

How could they be state policies or state rights if you may have them introduced by the federation?

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

I am talking of certain powers which we are going to give the federal government the right to administer, and I say that I can point to at least two-thirds of them which vitally affect the states, and, therefore, to some extent, state rights; and I say, "Do not give equal state representation with one hand and take it away from us with the other." I think that the referendum is a very much over-rated contrivance, and I ask my hon. friends opposite, would they propose to refer to the people a question like bi-metallism; would they refer to the people a question like war, or foreign policy; would they refer to the people questions dealing with defence? I take it that those are complex questions, which it requires experts to deal with; and, therefore, those people who expect to get hope and guidance from the referendum, I am sure, would find they were disappointed. The question before the Committee is, whether we shall adopt the first paragraph of a clause which goes on to give us a certain kind of referendum. I understand that the Prime Minister of this colony is going to speak tomorrow morning, and I dare say that the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, and other hon. gentlemen will also speak on this question. When we have heard everything that can be said on the matter, I hope that every hon. member will join in doing what be believes to be right; but, at the same time, that be will try to conserve some of those principles without which we cannot have a sound and enduring constitution.

Motion (the Hon. W. MOORE) agreed to:

That the Chairman do now leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

Convention adjourned at 10.8 p.m,
Thursday 16 September, 1897

Petition - Papers - Finance Committee - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITION.

Mr. GLYNN presented a petition from the Synod of the Church of England at Adelaide praying that, the Convention would embody in the constitution an acknowledgment of Almighty God.

The petition was read by the Clerk, and received.

PAPERS.

The Hon. J.N. BRUNKER laid on the table the following papers:-

A return showing the population of each of the Australian colonies and Tasmania on the 30th June, 1897.
A return showing the revenue of each of the Australian colonies and Tasmania during the last financial year.
A return showing the expenditure of each of the Australian colonies and Tasmania during the latest financial year.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.

Motion (by Mr. MCMILLAN) proposed:
That the minutes of the proceedings of the Finance Committee appointed at Adelaide be printed.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.32]:

I have no objection to the motion, as I understand the minutes are available.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I mentioned the matter to the hon. and learned member!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I am not aware at the present moment whether some information given to the Finance Committee by the Railway Commissioners has ever been printed by the committee. I understand that that evidence was to have been treated as confidential; but inasmuch as it has already been published in the Sydney newspapers, I think it might now be printed for the use of members of the Convention. No doubt some members of the committee have copies of the evidence in their possession, and now the bond of confidence has been broken, perhaps one of them will furnish me with a copy of it, so that I may move that it be printed.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It is among the papers of the Finance Committee!
Question resolved in the affirmative.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee (consideration resumed from, 15th September, vide page 641):

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales (vide page 541) again proposed.

The Hon. W. MOORE (Tasmania)[10.36]:

Having moved the adjournment of the debate last night, it is my duty to commence it this morning; but I feel that I am very much in the position of an armour-bearer of olden times, because I have received an intimation that the great guns are coming forward, so I am placed in this position to clear the way for the great men who are going to continue the debate. I believe that the Premier of New South Wales, and the Attorney-General of Victoria, will both address the Convention, and I hope that they will throw a considerable amount of light upon this matter. Not only that; but I think that the present moment is a very, critical time in the consideration of the question before us. We have had much time now to think over the matter, and it is necessary, to arrive at a compromise of some sort. I hope that the extremists on both sides will try to so modify their opinions that we may come to a conclusion in regard to the question. To be, or not to be, is the question with us now. Are we or are we not to have federation? If we insist upon some of the principles which have been brought forward, federation is impossible. If, for instance, we insist upon having a national referendum, I am perfectly sure that the smaller colonies will not enter the union. I was very pleased with the speech delivered by the Premier of Victoria last night, because I thought from what he said that we might come to an agreement upon the points at issue. If we now insist rigidly upon the principles which we have been advocating, federation will be impossible, and for that reason I think that some compromise is necessary. The first question to be settled is, how to prevent deadlocks? I am one of those who do not much fear the result of deadlocks. We have had deadlocks in Tasmania over and over again; but by a little delay and further consultation, these deadlocks have disappeared, and the result has been to clear the political atmosphere, and to put things in a better position than they were in before. Several suggestions have been made to provide against deadlocks. For instance a double dissolution has been suggested. So far as I am individually concerned, I think that it will be necessary on the part of the smaller colonies to agree to some compromise on this matter. I believe that if the house of representatives is dissolved upon any question, and when it meets again it again sends this matter to the senate, and the senate rejects it, the senate should then be dissolved. I cannot understand why the senate should not be liable to dissolution under the constitution which we are framing. The members of the senate should not be afraid to come face to face with the people.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

It will be found upholding its own rights!

The Hon. W. MOORE:

Yes; but it will have no right to supersede the verdict of the people. The senate will, of course, represent the states; but my hon. friend must remember that the senate in the proposed constitution will be a very different body from an upper house as established by any of the constitutions under which we are living at the present time. The principle was put so well by the hon. member, Mr. Symon, yesterday that the proposal formulated in his amendment ought to receive support from the members of this Convention. The principle of a dissolution is quite consistent with the working of the proposed constitution. Therefore, I cannot see why we should object to the principle of making the senate amenable to dissolution. I think a national referendum is practically in consistent with federation, because it would destroy the political entity of the individual states, and therefore, I am not in favour of it. The principle of a national referendum is never applied in connection with responsible government. It is foreign to the working and purposes of responsible government. The principle of a referendum as applied to the states is a different thing altogether, and that is a question that ought to receive serious consideration. There is no doubt that the question of a referendum to the states as states should receive our special attention. The question, however, has been so well put already that I shall not dwell upon it. I only desire that we should, as far as possible, agree to some compromise which will bring about the object which we all have in view. It might be well if the Premiers of the different colonies formulated some scheme which could be accepted by this Convention. I would advise that we should endeavour in every possible way by means of compromise to carry out the object we all have in view. I think federation will be an impossibility, if we insist upon taking extreme views on these questions. What we all desire, and what I am sure would benefit immensely the whole of Australia would be a grand federation of the whole of these colonies, and in order to carry that out, I am heart and soul with those who are anxious to consummate so grand and so glorious a work.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[10.45]:
I had intended to reserve the remarks which I have to make on this subject until we came to deal with the specific proposals for avoiding deadlocks; but after the speech delivered last night by the hon. member, Mr. Barton, and by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, it seems to me that it might assist to clear the air if I took an opportunity whilst the general discussion is proceeding of stating what attitude I intend to take up with regard to one of the proposals with which my name has been connected, and which I moved at Adelaide. I would first lightly refer to some of the considerations that have been raised in the course of this debate. What has impressed me most is the evidence that the debate seems to afford of the captivating power of phrases, and the danger that larks in fake analogies. The hon. member, Mr. Trenwith, whose judgment is always clear, and whose words always fit his thoughts, spoke of the matter involved as if, somehow or other, it raised a question analogous to that of plural voting. An hon. member from Tasmania, Mr. Dobson, the whole of whose speech I regret I did not hear, discussed the matter as if in some way or other a question was raised between democracy and conservatism; while there can be no question that among those who are outside this chamber and who do not follow the debates very closely, or perhaps who do not quite see the limitations of the questions that are at issue, there is a prevailing apprehension that something more is involved in this discussion than the relative powers of the two houses something more analogous to the old disputes which have taken place in our provinces between the lower and the upper houses; and that it is not merely a question of the conservation of state interests. Therefore, feeling that there is this widespread, as I consider it, misapprehension, I do not think I shall be unduly delaying the business of this Convention if I devote a few brief remarks to explaining the matter as it presents itself to my judgment. I entirely agree with what has fallen from all the speakers. It is curious that the same sentiment is shared by those who speak on both sides of this question that is, that under this Constitution there is very little fear of any deadlock arising between the two houses.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

Unless you encourage it!

Mr. WISE:

I would point out for the consideration of those who entertain more alarm on this question than most of us do, that the deadlocks that we are familiar with have always arisen from one of two classes of causes, either they have arisen from disputes as to the power of the second chamber to amend money bills or they have arisen from disputes affecting large social interests where persons of wealth or social influence have claimed special privileges or exemptions which the mass of the people have been unwilling to concede. Both of those causes are removed under this constitution. The power of the senate to deal with money bills is so clearly defined that I doubt if any ingenuity could suggest the possibility of dispute arising between the two houses on that question. That at once removes one of the most prolific sources of dispute between the two chambers in the past. Then as to the second class of dispute arising from social differences, all through this discussion, not, I admit, in this house but outside, the controversialists of one party ignore, or seem to ignore, the limitations of federal government. They forget that this commonwealth can only deal with those matters that are expressly remitted to its jurisdiction; and excluded from its jurisdiction are all matters that affect civil rights, all matters that affect property, all matters, in a word, affecting the two great objects which stir the passions and affect the interests of mankind. I fail entirely and I shall be glad if some alarmist will enlarge my views on this matter—to perceive in this bill any question on which there is any possibility of a conflict between the states and the people, except, in one respect, and I will define that in the largest possible way. In legislation affecting commercial interests, or financial interests, it is possible to imagine that the states will be brought into conflict as states with the concentrated majority of the populations of the two large states over a question of trade. It is possible to imagine the same thing arising over a question of commerce, or over a question of finance. Now, I ask if such a state of things arises that the Committee will give attention to the nature of the interests which are threatened. If conflicts arise over matters of commerce, trade, or finance, the interests that are threatened are not the interests of individual traders, but the interest of the state as a whole conducting a general class of business, or carrying on a particular sort of occupation. I will test what I mean. An effort is being made now in Victoria to grow beet for sugar; I hope it maybe successful. A similar effort in its earlier stages is manifesting itself in this colony. Supposing that the sugar interests in Victoria, and the sugar interests in New South Wales, became very powerful, and employed a large that are affected readily to concede? I will reverse the position. There is one clause in the constitution which gives the commonwealth power to regulate trade and commerce, and communication between the states for the purpose of furthering commerce necessarily follows the federal parliament in order to give effect to that provision. Everyone will admit that one very useful means of communication is a river, and that if the power of regulating trade and commerce is to be unanimously conceded to the federation, logically the federation should be able to take over the full control of all the river systems which may be made navigable, or which are navigable throughout the commonwealth, especially where those rivers pass through one colony into another. Yet there is not the most violent enthusiast in New South Wales, over what he considers this popular rule, who does not insist, and properly insist, that New South Wales cannot and ought not to surrender the control of her river system to the federal parliament. For what reason? Because our rivers are wanted for internal purposes of irrigation, because our rivers serve the double purpose of developing our national resources—the resources of New South Wales as a state—as well as the purpose of assisting communication and furnishing means of navigation from one part of the commonwealth to the other. If those who insist that the small states are never to be allowed to protect themselves against the possibility of unauthorised irresponsible power, of unduly exercised power by the majority of the populations of the larger states, logically they will also insist that we, who represent them here, should hand the control of our rivers absolutely over to the majority of the commonwealth. Why, to parody their argument, should not the majority rule? If the majority want to use the rivers of New South Wales for navigation, and to prevent us from using them for irrigation, why should not the voice of the great majority prevail?

An Hon. MEMBER:

Mr. WISE:

The answer is a simple one. I am not dealing with theories. I am dealing with facts. I accept the facts. The answer is this: we intend to develop New South Wales as a separate state by utilising, our natural resources. We do not dispute that logically you may demand these rivers; but we say that we require their waters for other than commonwealth purposes, and we intend to keep them. It, therefore, seems to me that a great deal of this cry for the rule of the majority comes from those who are very well disposed to the rule of the majority when they form the majority, but who are quite determined that they shall not submit to that rule when there is a possibility of their being left with the minority. It reminds me of the incident in the Philadelphia Convention when the question arose as to the United States being allowed to confer titles of honor. One bluff and hale democrat declared that for his part he would support a peerage, if he were quite sure of being one of the dukes; but as he knew that he had not any chance of that, he was opposed to any peerage whatever. And so with us, or some of us. They will support the rule of the majority so long as there is no fear of the majority controlling their special interests. But the moment it is said we should hand our railways or rivers absolutely to the rule of the majority, then we have the most clamorous cries on behalf of state rights raised by the very men who, when the interests of other states are involved, are most generous in giving them away. What is, after all, the possibility of a conflict? When the causes are gone, the possibility is reduced almost to a minimum. But supporting that in the matters I have referred to a conflict arises. We have the means of getting rid of the conflict by ordinary good sense, and if that fails by a dissolution, and, a third method is proposed. After all these methods have come into play, will it not be a fraction of a fraction of cases in which any insoluble conflict arises between the people of the states? I would not hesitate to say that, in the last resort, if the power of the concentrated state populations were used I do not believe it ever will be to destroy the country interests, the interests of the interior, the people of the sparsely populated districts have the right of self-preservation.

Mr. HIGGINS:
My hon. friend confounds the interior with the smaller states!

Mr. WISE:
I accept facts; and, indeed, that is the distinction: that two large states have the great city populations. It is the small states in a rudimentary or earlier stage of development which have an agricultural, pastoral, and mining population. It is the concentrated population which makes a large state. That which makes New South Wales a large state is that it has Sydney; that which makes Victoria a large state is the possession of Melbourne. In point of territory they are smaller than either Queensland or Western Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS:
There is the same proportion of town population in Tasmania as in New South Wales!

Mr. WISE:
It is not a question of population. The character of the people's pursuits is determined by the climatic conditions very largely, and by the question whether or not they are engaged in the development of internal productiveness or in the carrying on of external commerce. I want to meet the argument that all I can say can be turned the other way. I deny that. The relative position of the small states towards the large ones in questions that may give rise in conflict is not the same. The relative position the small states to the large states is not even an equivalent position; for this simple reason: In the long run, and behind, everything, is the ultimate sanction of all law that is, physical force. Behind the legislator there is the policeman, and if the case did arise where the small states, by opposing their veto to a scheme which had passed by a large majority the representative assembly, did disorganise the industries of the large states, if they did affect their existence as states, if they did give rise to such a tremendous outburst of feeling that the national progress of Victoria or New South Wales; felt itself imperilled, I ask who is going to enforce that veto? How will the small states ever be able to give expression to their will? In the ultimate resort the small states have the power of effective resistance by reason of their population. In the ultimate resort the small states have not that power. The small states could be coerced by force-physical force if necessary and the large states could not. Therefore, we are in this position: we are dealing with imaginary dangers and difficulties, which no one here admits or considers are likely to arise difficulties which may conceivably arise; but if they arise as against the large states, having it in their power to protect: themselves, they arise in the case of the small states without that power; and all the small states, are now asking is that they shall come under the constitution with the physical power of the commonwealth to protect them in the last resort, which the large states have by reason of their numbers; They should be given that same power by a provision in the constitution which enables them to oppose in the long run an ultimate veto, not of the senate, but an ultimate veto of the votes of their own people against any proposal which is intended to deprive those people of their liberties. I, at Adelaide, moved an amendment which was intended to get rid of one possible cause of conflict between the two houses. I recognise that the senate was primarily intended to conserve the interests of states, and was only incidentally a house of revision. But I was most deeply impressed by a speech of Sir Graham Berry, which pointed out the inevitable tendency on the part of all legislatures that were secured upon continuous existence especially when they were composed of men who had won their spurs in other fields of public work to grow out of touch with popular sympathy. Therefore it seemed to me desirable that there should be some method of securing that the senators acts actually reflected the popular opinion of their constituencies, so as to remove once and for ever all possibility of conflict on questions affecting personal interests. Since then I have listened to several speeches here, and I have come to the conclusion not to press that amendment, although it was recommended by the Parliament of Victoria as one of their alternative schemes. I recognise the force of what has been urged: That it is unjust to the house of representatives that it should be subjected to a dissolution and to inconveniences from which the second chamber itself should be free. Therefore I will agree to the suggestion of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner that a double dissolution should be accepted.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
At the same time!

Mr. WISE:
I think at the same time, but that is a matter of detail. I think it would be better, in the interests of the senate, that it should be at the same time. Otherwise without that power a minister desirous of quarrelling with the senate, and of punishing the senate by sending them to the country, can do so without inconvenience to himself or any of his supporters in the assembly. I believe it is a safeguard against the arbitrary exercise of this great power.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
That is the power of the Minister!

Mr. WISE:
The Governor advised by his Ministers.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The ministry have to accept a great responsibility!

Mr. WISE:
I was going to point that out. Whether or not there should be added to that a further provision taking a referendum, in the event of a dissolution can be said not to have correctly reflected the opinion of the states, is a matter upon which my opinion has wavered very much. It has wavered because I do not appreciate at present how the referendum is going to work with parliamentary institutions. I recognise the referendum historically as having been, from the time of Julius Caesar to the time of the third Napoleon, the favorite weapon of personal despotism; and it appears to me very difficult to bring into harmony an institution of that kind which overrides parliament, with the British habit of submitting to representative and parliamentary government. At the same time, I recognise that there is outside a very considerable demand for the adoption of this plan. I find, too, that it is theoretically justifiable as being a sure way of ascertaining, when all other means have failed, what the real views of the people, whom both houses represent, are, and if it is applied with the limitations which have been suggested, so that it can be used not as the daily food to use the phrase of Edmund Burke of the constitution, but as its medicine, I will be found surrendering my private predilections and voting in its favour. I should be opposed to making it replace any of the schemes with which we are acquainted for overcoming the difficulties between the two houses, because I am opposed to making any experiment in an instrument of this kind. I am profoundly convinced of the truth that it will be futile and chimeraical in us to attempt to frame any constitution which does not emanate from the history of our own people. We are a people of British origin, accustomed to parliamentary institutions. If we do not frame this instrument in such a way that it springs from our antecedents, and follows our tendencies, that it is imbued with the character and habits of our people, consonant with their beliefs, and even with their prejudices, then I say that, build what we may on paper and by act of parliament, all that we do will be false and perishable. But if, on the other hand, we pay a due regard to popular opinion, making concessions to its tendencies where we can make concessions without sacrifice of principle, then I believe that we will be able to present to the people of Australia a constitution which, however imperfect, will confer great benefits upon them, and which will contain within itself great possibilities of growth a, constitution, in a word, for the adoption and the successful working of which, every one of us will be proud to labour with all his strength.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[11.10]:

I confess that I feel sufficiently diffident as to my powers of solving this very serious problem to have waited, and to have listened, to a large number of speeches; and, again, I feel a sense of regret that, so far, the tendency of the debate has not been such as to promise us a satisfactory issue from all our difficulties. Again, it seems almost impossible that the Convention is able to realise that, in endeavouring to frame a constitution at this time, we must pay the fullest regard to the course and development of political history. We are too apt to get back to that state of things under the stress of which the Constitution of the United States was formed. We are too apt to forget that, since that Constitution was established, there have been enormous advances in political enlightenment, and that one of the greatest effects of those advances has been to realise that, talk as we will of parliamentary and representative government, we are very far yet from enjoying those blessings in their real substance. I find nothing with which to quarrel so long as vague generalities are indulged in. For instance, when we speak of parliamentary and representative government, those terms are clothed with a respectability which seems to assure for them cordial and unanimous assent. Indeed, we might go even further, and speak of the voice of the people as the ultimate arbiter in all national and even in all federal difficulties. Up to this point everything seems harmonious and entirely respectable; but when we come closer to these questions, when we come to rob them of their generalities, and endeavour to approach them in spirit and reality, it is astonishing what various shades of political belief are immediately struck off from the simple flint. In what country in the world to-day do the people, the real solid political power—in what country in the world can it be said that the voice of the people constitutionally expressed has a chance of being effectual? I know of no such country in Australia. We may perhaps have advanced more rapidly than some people would like; but we must take facts as they are, and we cannot shrink from the fact that in every Australian colony the people have been struggling for many years past to get a more real share, a more potent influence, a more direct control over what are called parliamentary and representative institutions. I do not need to go into illustrations to show how crude the political circumstances of some of the colonies are. I need not go out of the boundaries of New South Wales. We have here at the present time a constitution which is, I suppose, one of the most extraordinary anomalies known to the political chronicler; but, at the same time, there is a great deal to be said for it. In its working, although often it breaks down most abominably, it is as efficient an instrument of popular government as any in the world. But, unfortunately, we are not now addressing ourselves to the task of amending some imperfect constitution. Our solemn task is that of constructing an entirely new political constitution, and, so far as the British people are concerned, a constitution in which, if we are to proceed on the lines of the British Constitution, we have very little to guide us. My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Wise, was as satisfactory, as were all the other gentlemen, who indulged in platitudes. He was condescending enough to say that he was willing, to some extent, to how to the trend of public opinion, even, although public opinion may have the misfortune to differ from his own. We accept all these assurances with gratitude. It is highly satisfactory to me to hear, at this time of the day, that there are enlightened public men who have some sort of abstract respect for the significance of public opinion. I wish to go much further I wish to say that it is only in public opinion, in the efficacy of public opinion, and in the authority of public opinion, in shaping the destinies of any political constitution that its foundations can consist—that just as public opinion has had the freest control of the destinies of a country, so have those destinies become purer and more dignified. It is of no use to point to the United States as a country in which the people have political power. There is no country in the world where the people in a broad, massive, honorable sense have less to do with the government of the country than they have in the United States. They have become entangled under the provisions of their federal constitution in such a series of contrivances for subordinating the free honest expression of public opinion to the most unworthy purposes that, to my mind, nothing is more melancholy than the utter breakdown of the Constitution of the United States in that one saving respect—that the voice of the people can immediately and perfectly affect the course of government. I feel all the prouder of our connection with the mother country when I reflect that in spite of the House of Lords there is no country in the world where public opinion in its broadest form has so much weight. It seems to me that those who are timid of public opinion, who think that public opinion, allowed fair sway in the affairs of government, will throw our institutions into confusion might take some courage from the history of the British people since the year 1832. We know the extremity to which the constitution of the mother country was reduced in 1832, not by hollow false agitation, but by the collision of those two opposing forces, one of which had been gradually dying, the other of which had roused itself for that last desperate fight against the advance of the popular power. At that time, the British Constitution was in imminent risk of disruption. Fortunately, there was a safety-valve in the constitution which saved the people from the most disastrous convulsion that could ever come upon the British nation. Fortunately, at that critical time, as I say, there was a safety-valve, which enabled the will of the people to have effect. And what has been the result? We are now sixty-five years away from that point, and will not the most timid Tory admit, looking on the history of the past sixty-five years, that the history of England during that sixty-five years, that the history of government during that sixty-five years, that the history of the people in every sense as a governed people and as a governing people has been the brightest in the whole range of British history? Do we find today any signs of those destructive socialistic forces of which we hear so much?

Sixty-two years after that great revolution in the balance of political power, what do we see today in the mother country? We see a Tory government, that is a conservative government a government which some of my friends here would look upon as a perfect guarantee for everything that is upright and respectable in a position of triumphant power today, supported even by a democratic labour federationist. Are not these teachings of history, of the history of our own race under institutions resembling our own, are not these experiences enough to enable us, when we are framing here in this country, even more, in advance in some respects than is the mother country-infinitely freer from obstacles in the path of a scientific adjustment of political forces—to address ourselves to this great crucial problem with a feeling of confidence that the more the people are with us in the work of governing Australia, the more just, the more stable, the more successful the government will be? I confess that I listened with the keenest disappointment to the speech of my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner. It was a generous speech. We can all be generous when we are dealing with somebody else's affairs. I can be extremely generous when some great necessity of duty does not come in my way; but when a necessity of duty comes in my way a duty which I cannot very well abandon then I feel that I have to throw aside all these courteous phrases and to speak plainly and earnestly. My right hon. friend, it seems to me, has made this fatal mistake: he has, by the position which he has taken up, been ready to solve this most anxious difficulty between what I fully admit are the just rights of the smaller states and what are the equally just rights of the people as a commonwealth. In this difficulty we must see at once that there are certain things in which the rights of the smaller states, however small—however insignificant their people in proportion to those of the larger states must be respected. I quite admit that it is impossible to stand up at this stage and advocate federation unless we are prepared to admit that in everything which falls legitimately within the definition of state rights, majorities cannot be allowed to have their own way. It is only by coming down to definitions by paying some little regard to the precise character of the range which this federation is to assume, that we can clear the air of all these mysterious fears of brutal domination over principles which are dear to the hearts of every true born Australian in the smaller states. We must look at the work with which this commonwealth is to be intrusted. If it were a provision of this constitution that the commonwealth should deal with all matters not specifically retained by the states, I do not think that I could make the speech that I am making at the present moment I admit, because it would be impossible to define the line, or with any sort of resemblance to precision to define the line, over which state rights would come into the plane of the commonwealth rights. But we have simplified this most difficult problem—and I hope that hon. members will accept my assurance that, although I am speaking so earnestly, I am not at all indifferent to the intense and immense difficulty of this matter. I give my hon. friends who hold the opposite view to mine the most absolute credit for the most honest desire to do that which is right. Just as I stand here, perhaps, in a last entrenchment in defence of what I believe to be the rights of a majority of the people of the commonwealth, some of my hon. friends with equal honesty and equal duty, stand, perhaps, in their last entrenchment to defend the rights of the smaller states against a system which would set those rights entirely at the mercy of a mere majority of the electors of the commonwealth. If I stood up to ask them not to do that in reference, to state rights, I feel, that I should come here asking them to do a thing which no reasonable man ought to ask them to do. But what is the principle of this deed we are about to endeavour to seal? The first principle is that the commonwealth is to have no sort of pretence to power except upon the subjects set out in this bill. Fortunately, we will always have a court of high reputation, I hope, to see that everyone is kept to the terms of the instrument. Under the protection of the supreme court of the commonwealth, the sphere within which the commonwealth can assert itself or legislate is set out in so many words. I look over these subjects-clauses 52 and 53, I believe, contain them all and what do I find? I find:
The regulation of trade and commerce with other countries, and among the several states.
Customs and excise and bounties, but so that duties of customs and excise and bounties shall be uniform throughout the commonwealth, and that no tax or duty shall be imposed on any goods exported from one state to another.
Raising money by any other mode or system of taxation; but so that all such taxation shall be uniform throughout the commonwealth.
Borrowing money on the public credit of the commonwealth.
Postal, telegraphic, telephonic, and other like services.
The military and naval defence of the commonwealth and the several states and the calling out of the forces to execute and maintain the laws of the, commonwealth.
Munitions of war.
Navigation and shipping.
Ocean beacons and buoys, and ocean lights houses and lightships.
Astronomical and meteorological observations.
Quarantine.
Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits.
Census and statistics.
Currency, coinage, and legal tender.
Banking, the incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money.
Insurance, excluding state insurance not extending beyond the limits of the state concerned. Weights and measures.
Bills of exchange and promissory-notes.
Bankruptcy and insolvency.
© Copyrights and patents of inventions, designs, and trademarks.
Naturalisation and aliens.
Foreign corporations, and trading or financial corporations formed in any state or part of the commonwealth.
Marriage and divorce.
Parental rights, and the custody and guardianship and custody of infants.
"Parental Rights"-that is rather a strange thing to see in a constitution of this kind.
The service and execution throughout the commonwealth of the civil and criminal process and judgments of the courts of the states,
The recognition throughout the commonwealth of the laws, the public acts and records, and the judicial proceedings, of the states.
Immigration and emigration.
External affairs and treaties.
The relations of the commonwealth to the islands of the Pacific.
I have read down to thirty out of thirty-seven. Hon. members are familiar with all these subjects I would read them all if it were necessary, but I only point to these things to show that, so far as the sphere of what is called the socialistic agitator is concerned, it is not there.
The Hon. S. FRASER:
Oh, yes-paper money!
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I am glad my hon. friend has mentioned that, because it shows us in a vivid light that even amongst men who command the highest respect, by reason of having a practical mind, in all the affairs of life that there are some subjects upon which even the imagination of a Shakspere is not equal to theirs. Now, because at various times over this vast continent, and in other parts of the world, a faint flicker of some reckless eloquence on the part of some unknown person has announced some descent on the financial institutions, possibly and probably of Victoria, at once the practical mind is in a blaze - the whole political perspective is coloured with a lurid glare, because the Haymarket has been rash enough to question our present principles of money-making. What chance is there, in any form of Australian commonwealth, of there being any legislation which will attack the basis of credit-either public or banking credit-in the ordinary affairs of life? When our people have reached a stage at which they will have wild and revolutionary views, I do not know what precise form of constitution will keep them from doing mischief. But I would invite my hon. friends to distinguish between the spray on the surface of a vast popular movement, and not imagine that, because occasionally some sign of superficial extravagance appears upon the mighty breast of human progress, therefore, all humanity is spray, all humanity is extravagance, and that any system of government could be so used as to bring into true and real existence these extravagant outbursts which, to my mind, are unworthy of those who indulge in them. Let us look upon this Australia as a place in which at no time will the foundations of honesty be held in disrepute. Let us hope that at no time in Australia confiscation will have its way. If the spirit comes over Australians, we may believe that it will spread, and it will affect the whole of the states-the smaller states as well as the larger. But let us put aside all these chimerical fears, and let us look calmly at the position. I say to my hon. friends that if there is one of these subjects that seems a danger, or a difficulty, let us erase it. I am prepared to strike it out. I see one or two chimerical subjects in this list. I am prepared to strike them out—we have not come to them yet. I will strike out of this charter every possible difficulty in the way of a solution of the problem in which we are engaged; and if we remove from that list all subjects but those within which must be confined the legislative energy of the commonwealth, then we get much nearer a settlement of this vexed question. There must be in this constitution the commonwealth face, the national face, and the states face, and so long as those who represent the states wish that the state voice shall be so strengthened that it will always be able to drown the national voice, they take up a position which I for one can never allow to be created by this constitution. So, I admit, if we, who take the other side, were to desire to see imprinted in this bill such a contrivance that the voice of the nation would always drown the voice of the smaller states, we should take up a position in which we could not hope to succeed. Our difficulty therefore is: Are we to so arrange the constitution that in matters which are national, which are peculiarly national, the national voice shall prevail, and that in matters which involve state rights, which are different from the issues which I have described, the state voice shall not be drowned even by the national voice? Now that is the problem we have to deal with. I am making these remarks in the light of suggestions which have been made to the Committee. I wish now to test these suggestions as well as I can. I admit at once that this bill is already a vast improvement upon the bill of 1891—I mean from the popular point of view. I look upon the fact that the senate is to be elected by the people of the different colonies on the basis of one man, one vote, the votes being taken in the states as single electorates, as a marvellous advance, from the popular point of view, over the year 1891, and I am prepared to give the fullest weight and significance to that fact as affecting the larger states. I am prepared to admit that there are questions which some gentlemen fear are likely to occasion public enthusiasm in the smaller states. At present, of course, we are sharply divided, and it is astonishing to what an extent differences of feeling have grown up in the various colonies; out, given a federation, how rapidly will these provincial differences and this bitterness disappear! Once the nation breathes as a nation, how soon will the spirit of the people change—how soon will the knocking down of these barriers, which vex every daily commercial transaction of the people make them feel at last that there is nothing to divide them, nothing that boundaries can create. After the destruction of these subjects of bitter parochial feeling, you will rapidly find a state of things grow up under which, when great national questions come along, you will never be able to distinguish between voter of Western Australia, and the voter of New South Wales, and the voter of Victoria. I wish to point out one question, to which I would apply the last suggestion for solving the difficulty. We have before us three suggestions—first, a referendum, called a mass referendum. Well, I admit that upon certain subjects that would be wrong—that is to say, subjects peculiarly involving state rights. Just as I decline the hand over the 1,400,000 people of New South Wales to the smaller populations of the other colonies on national matters, so I expect them to refuse to hand over their 400,000, or 300,000, or 200,000 people into our hands upon matters affecting state rights.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
Can you distinguish between the two?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
That is the point. Under this constitution, with the leading principle in it that it is not to go beyond what is in it, no principle or subject which is not expressed within its pages can be dealt with by the federal parliament. Looking that in the face, I say it is possible to distinguish between the questions in which the voice of the nation must be supreme, and questions in which the voice of the states must be represented.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
It is well worth trying!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It is well worth trying. In the first place I do not give much for a state right which is not embedded in the constitution. Any state right which the advocates of the smaller states do not put into the constitution is not worth much, just as any popular right which is not put into the constitution is not worth much. So that our first subject of anxiety should be this: To put every legitimate subject of state right in the deed under such terms that a mere majority will not fritter away the rights of individuals. I will take one subject—I do not want to go into too long a speech here now—which has presented to me the other side of the question in the most forcible light. Let us suppose that we have adopted a dissolution for the senate as well as for the house of representatives. I admit that that is an extremely great concession—I am using a phrase which is used all round the chamber, and I make my friends a present of it on this occasion—we have got a great concession—a great concession from the smaller states, a proper one, I think, but still I call it a concession—a great concession from the smaller states—in providing for a dissolution of the senate. I quite believe that in the average life of this future commonwealth the mere power to dissolve the senate will keep it straight.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

If it does not?

The Hon. S. FRASER:

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

That is the sort of dissolution which amounts to the death of a man when he has not another breath to draw. It is the sort of dissolution from which humanity has not yet been able to escape. But if when the senators had just returned from that sort of energetic canvass of which my hon. friend is capable, over an enormous extent of territory, and had sat themselves down in their senatorial chairs, for as they thought six years solid, they knew that those who formed the executive of the country might be able to send them on another tour without delay, and without salary, it would make the senate a much more reasonable body.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

If my right hon. friend was speaking against a senate which could not be dissolved at all like the House of Lords and the Upper House in Canada I could understand him!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

There are houses which we know of in Australia which have developed a spirit of arrogance and self-sufficiency quite beyond that of the House of Lords. Considering the democratic surroundings of these gentlemen when they are outside parliament, it has been a standing conundrum with me how when they sit within their chambers they can seem an embodiment of immovable and absolute power, which I have not found anywhere in ancient history. The simple reason is that the breath of the people cannot be brought to bear upon them at a critical moment.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

I am afraid that that is more picturesque than practical!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
What could be more picturesque than my hon. friend laying down the law here, and if he is so here what must be his august dignity in the chair of that distinguished assembly of which he is the ornament? The dissolution of the senate is, I think, a very great concession in the line of the popular demand. So far as mere ordinary matters, such as we can conceive in the ordinary course of events, are concerned, that, with the provision for a dual referendum, might seem to provide a sufficient number of ditches for anything that has to be done. But the misfortune of this provision for the dissolution of both houses, and the dual referendum is that if a question arises in which the voice of the nation really comes into conflict with the voice of the states—

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
A national question!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Yes. I am referring to matters in which the interests of the larger states and of the smaller states come into collision really, seriously, and vitally. All these complex, costly, slow expedients then seem to me to resemble a series of ditches in which the commonwealth can flounder one after the other, finding itself at last in the biggest ditch of all. That is, after infinite trouble to get a decision, after infinite labour and concession, it will find itself in a more dangerous and a more envenomed state than when the difficulty began. I admit that there is a great deal in the very able arguments which I have heard more than once from the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton. I give the greatest weight to those arguments. No doubt the average differences between the two houses can, as a rule, be left to the ordinary play of parliamentary responsibility. But I am anxious to see the commonwealth start with the fairest prospect, so that this labour which is to bring the Australian colonies into union will never by any fault of ours, by any reluctance to face the crucial difficulties of the situation, be so formed that the deed which we offer to the Australian people as a charter of peace and union will be so faultily framed that under some serious, some dire strain, instead of showing the spectacle of a united people only divided by lines of broad public principle, we shall find ourselves precipitated into all those very difficulties to escape from which the constitution is being devised. I will take the first subject; the most important subject with which the commonwealth has to deal. The regulation of the fiscal policy is a matter of vast importance to every man in this country, legislation which more nearly touches the personal interests, the business, and prosperity of the citizens than questions of this kind, questions which we know will throw the people into violent antagonism. Let us suppose that a federal tariff is to be constructed. One of my reasons for urging that we should put into the bill a provision that the federal tariff should be constructed within two years, as a matter of absolute necessity, was that, knowing the differences of opinion, knowing the points at which the interests of different persons and, perhaps, different localities will come into violent contact, I felt the greatest apprehension lest, when we, the people of New South Wales, put our freedom to the risk of federation in an endeavour to construct a federal tariff which will pass a legislature constituted as this is, we may find ourselves, after infinite struggle and agitation, as far away from its attainment as ever. We in New South Wales may find ourselves in a federation which was to knock down the barriers which surround us, but to enter which we have surrendered our liberty without deriving any of the benefits of intercolonial free-trade. The objection was made, "What power is there to enforce the necessity of framing this tariff within two years?" The slightest study of the constitution would show that, so far from being an abortive provision, if the tariff were not constructed within that period, no man could be taxed under it without redress in the supreme court of Australia. Because this provides a test for all the legislation of the commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Is it not directory only?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

The term "shall" is never directory.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It does not say it shall not be done afterwards!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

That is the sort of refinement that might arise in some courts of limited jurisdiction; but in the supreme court of the federation the people have set up a tribunal to see that the expressed mandates of the constitution are respected, and, if it finds an absolute direction in the constitution that a certain thing shall be done within two years, and sees the reason for it, there is no doubt it will insist upon that provision being carried out. It is not difficult to find the reason for it, the reason being that it is the essence of the whole contract of federation that there shall be a uniform tariff and intercolonial free-trade. I do not think that any one off the police court bench would find any difficulty about that. Now, let me come back to this question of a federal tariff. We might find the federal parliament in a state of hopeless conflict over that tariff. It is true the senate could not alter it, and from some points of view that would only aggravate the difficulties of the situation. The senate will be put into this position, that it will have to say yes or no, and it is quite conceivable that by the states acting together it does not follow that it should be the smaller ones; it is conceivable that even the two larger colonies might combine in the senate—or by any conceivable combination of three against two or four against one, it would have the effect that at the very threshold of federation the one thing for which we federated could not be accomplished without some extraordinary powers of settlement. What are those suggested to us? First, a dissolution of both houses of parliament. It might very well be that on an issue that excites public feeling to such an extraordinary extent as the fiscal issue always does, that a number of people in each of the states represented by the blocking power, influenced by a thousand different reasons and points of view, all affecting their own pockets and interests as they think, would unite to prevent that tariff from becoming law; and the result of the double dissolution might well be that the senate and the house of representatives would find themselves in the same condition as before. Then we apply the other test to this terrible state of deadlock existing over this vital point. We would have another resort, which would be the dual referendum exactly a repetition of the same process. There would be exactly the same difficulty, because remember under the dual referendum the people would be in exactly the same position as the senate. Even the dual referendum is worse than the position of the senate, because the senate can suggest; on those suggestions they might not agree, or, if they did, the majority might envenom the difficulty instead of relieving it. Well, we go through this second serious call upon the people of the commonwealth; this burning question, which sets everyone by the ears, goes again to the people in another form, in which they have still less power of modifying the provisions of the existing scheme on which they can only say "yes" or "no." In this contrivance I do not see the prospect of sufficient safeguards for questions like this.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

No finality?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

No.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

They are the very questions that would cause the difficulty!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I candidly confess that if we got over this question I might not speak so strongly as I am now doing. I candidly admit that if we once got all these burning questions settled, and the life of the nation had time to develop, and if the feeling of sympathy among the people as a whole had time to circulate freely, I admit that even on this point I would not perhaps be so emphatic. But we must remember that while all these local feelings are rankling, while all these ideas of self interest are as rampant as ever, while each colony and each man in each colony is striving for his own view and his own pocket, or his own industry, such an extraordinary complication of votes and interests in the country and in the senate may arise that this constitution which is to give us a nation may give us chaos. I am prepared to surrender a good deal in order to have finality, because even if injustice is worked there are always opportunities of readjusting and correcting injustices. But we who are framing this constitution, we whom the people have trusted with this enormous responsibility, are bound not to take refuge we from the larger and from the smaller states in what really is shirking. I do not wish to praise my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, publicly or even privately, but I must be allowed in justice to him to express to this Convention and to the public my high admiration of the way in which that gentleman has shaken himself free from his surroundings and has adjusted himself to the task before him. I do not deny that we have all endeavoured to do the same; but I can only say that I should be a proud man if I thought I had done it as fully as he.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

Why not do it now?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I have always found that when, in the course of my public duty, I have had to recognise some good act on the part of an individual, there are other individuals not accustomed to such tributes who make disagreeable remarks. Now I think my hon. friend will admit that no man ever went into a more dangerous course for himself than the hon. member, Mr. Holder, did when he declared for a mass referendum. I do not know how he has contrived to live with his friends ever since. In his desire to get finality, to put within this machine something which will prevent it bursting into pieces and sometimes, I must say, when I hear gifted men speaking of providing a safety-valve in this constitution as a sort of thing equivalent to some fanciful piece of ingenuity not at all useful I often wish some of these gifted men would themselves only run a machine of some kind without a safety-valve.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Has the hon. member tried it?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
No, I have not tried it, and not having risked myself to it, I do not intend to risk the people of Australia to it either. We should really in this matter be as careful of the safety-valve as of our own people; and if we would feel some anxiety about the mechanical perfection of a locomotive which was taking us on a railway journey, I feel infinitely more anxiety about the construction of a machine to which the people of this continent are going to intrust their political rights.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
There is no safety-valve in most of the colonies now!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Not in Western Australia. I quite agree with my hon. friend, but, unfortunately, his colony is so far off that if there was an explosion there, it would not hurt us. There may be a safety-valve there; but, if so, my hon. friend is always sitting on it. I feel that my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, in his conviction that there must be a safety-valve conceded almost too much I mean a little more than, perhaps, we are entitled to. But I think we may reconcile a mass referendum to the rights of the states which in their nature are different from the rights of the people as an Australian people, which are put in the bed-rock of the constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Are not states rights already protected by the constitution?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I am afraid that my hon. friend's version would not be accepted implicitly by the gentlemen I am now addressing. I ask my friends from the smaller states, as far as they can, to tell us what those state rights are which require that the ordinary provisions of any political free constitution for the rule, in the last resort, of a majority of the electors should not have its sway? Every such right which requires to be specially safeguarded I am prepared to recognise and put in that constitution where it cannot be interfered with by any majority.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
That is impossible!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
My hon. friend might find many things impossible which might be possible to others. I admit that he is right to a great extent.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
It is utterly impossible!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
What are these state rights which cannot be inserted in this deed?

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
The hon. member seems to think.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I am not thinking at present. I am simply asking you a question. I ask those who say that state rights ought to be inserted in this constitution, whether they have arrived at such a conception of those rights that they can put them into the constitution?

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
The right hon. gentleman has to answer his own question: How can the state voice not be drowned by the national voice if you have a mass referendum?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I meet my hon. friend in this way. In all questions in which the rights of the States as geographical entities are not involved, no reasonable man can refuse the rule of the majority.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
What about their rights as human entities?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Now, there my hon. friend states it view which I confess puzzles me. What distinction is there between a human entity on one bank of the Murray and a human entity on the other? If there is a distinction, in the name of Heaven, let us put it in the constitution. Until those who are framing this constitution can rise to the one human entity of Australia, they are out of place in this Convention.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
The hon. member has just told us different?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
When my hon. friend, who is a gifted and able lawyer, as we know him to be, is unable to put into English one of these state rights that are not yet in the constitution, I am inclined to think that most of them have been safely provided for.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The senate is not limited to dealing with state rights. It has general powers!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
My hon. friend's interruptions resemble a bludgeon in more respects than one-they have no point.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
They are too pointed!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I am at present addressing myself to this question, if there are any state rights which make it necessary to distinguish between people inhabiting Western Australia, or Victoria, or New South Wales, or South Australia, and Tasmania, we owe it to these people to put them in the constitution, because it is the only safe place for them; and if they are state rights they ought to be there. But the fact is that every state right has been safeguarded in the constitution, except the state claim that since there must be some finality we will be on the right side of the hedge by saying that it rests with us on every question, state or national. Let us see the effect of this complicated series of contrivances. The effect of them may be, as I have said, with the minority. Those who represent the minority in one house, the senate, may be able, after all these suggestions, to prevent anything from being done. My hon. friend, Mr. Barton, very carefully and properly pointed out the pains we have been at to remove causes of offence between the two houses, and there is no doubt that our work in that direction has been most valuable. But I am not talking of this, I am talking of some radical difficulty in principle, or what is much stronger, in self-interest, between the two houses, or the people represented in the two houses. If that ran through the whole process, as it probably would, we would be left in this position: that through nothing being done, the veto of the senate would be the living force in the commonwealth. You may talk about the power of a house which frames and sends up measures; but the power of a house which can say "No," and is under no responsibility for administering the affairs of the country, leaves the terrible responsibility of carrying on the machinery of government, while it has the right of preventing the responsible power from carrying out its policy to provide the means for doing so. A house which possesses that power possesses a power which can at any moment - and that is the material point - throw the commonwealth into confusion simply by saying no; and then begins, if we have no legitimate way to solve a difficulty upon honest grounds, upon appeal to some disinterested or national authority, this wretched system of government and legislation by bribe and bargain. If a government is put in such a position that when it is confronted with a negative on some large measure such as a tariff bill when it reaches the senate and it is left helpless to get beyond the obstacle thrown across its path in an honorable, national way by an appeal to the principles and convictions of those who give the constitution its life and power, then it must from self-preservation resort to indirect, unworthy, and unprincipled devices. Of course, there is a promising field for the lobbyist with the two houses in a position of difficulty, "a thousand pecuniary interests knocking at the door. We had the picture before us only two or three months ago in that great Senate of the United States. So I, a thousand times, say we should not expose the executive government of this commonwealth to the necessity of stratagem, intrigue, and contrivance, probably in secret, over matters of fatal concern to the whole of the community. But that is the alternative. I quite admit that in the last resort, before the explosion comes, means will be found, perhaps, to solve the difficulty. But what sort of means? The free judgment of anyone? No. The house of representatives and of government under the stem necessity of compulsion-compelled, perhaps, to maim and disfigure its policy in order that the commonwealth should live. Well, we may have to come to that state of things; but I ask this Convention, framing a constitution in the light of things as they are, at the close of this nineteenth century, whether we cannot, in some way or other, provide that in great national exigencies we should not only know how to get from one ditch into another, but should know how to solve our difficulties in a constitutional manner that is to say, in a manner provided by the constitution. I admit it is easy to make these criticisms, and. I think they are proper to be made at the present time; and I tell hon. gentlemen frankly, from my knowledge of the public sentiment as it is in New South Wales today, that I feel that if I did not make the speech which I am making I should not do my duty to this Convention; because, above all things, I am anxious that we should all share the undying credit of framing an instrument which will pass the ordeal of public opinion in all these colonies. So I say I am prepared to meet my friends by safeguarding their legitimate rights, to sympathise with their legitimate anxiety, that in state rights they should not be exposed to the position of an ever hopeless minority. I will give to them in black and white, in this constitution, every state right which they ought to take, and, when I do that, I ask them to meet me; and in matters like these matters of national policy, matters affecting each human being in his daily life, in his business, in his pocket equally, as an Australian human entity I risk them in such matters to rise in the light of history, in the light of what we have seen of the working out of political institutions in the Anglo-Saxon race; I ask them to rise to this position: that they will leave these truly national matters to the truly national voice, confident as they must be that in no serious respect will an Anglo-Saxon race inflict a deliberate injury upon any member of our commonwealth.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[12.13]:

I think I should be very much wanting in my appreciation of the great speech we have just heard if I did not preface my own with a tribute of admiration for the lofty sentiments that have pervaded the expression which have just fallen from the right hon. the Premier of New South Wales; and with him as I am, and as most of my colleagues are, in fundamental opinions on most of what he has said, our admiration for his words are linked with a full appreciation of the reasons by which he has arrived at them. The gravity of the present moment cannot, I think, be over-estimated. I believe there is not a member of this Convention I might even go further, and say there is not a single member of the community that is not consumed with anxiety as to the result of our deliberations on this all important question We have got past the preliminaries of this great subject; we have got past all what we might term the flirtations of federation, and we have come down now to a definite statement of our absolute and final intentions. What we have done in the past, I apprehend, on the whole, while not commanding the assent of us all, will be regarded by the people of Australia as a great and good work. What we have yet to do, I believe, bears with it the fate of the whole movement. I quite welcome the attitude that prevails in this Convention that there must be some provision against deadlocks. I know that there are very strong opinions entertained even by some of my hon. colleagues from Victoria, that the less you do to interfere with deadlocks the better. I know that they still retain the opinions of a very antique period in our history. I know that they cling to traditions that most of us have outgrown. I know that they do not yet fully grasp the change of thought which has taken place throughout the British Empire on this all-important question. But, sir, I believe a majority of us, an overwhelming majority, entertain no sort of doubt as to the necessity at the present moment for inserting some provision and a substantial, effectual provision to avert catastrophes in our legislation in the future. I do not think I can better express the necessity for some such provision as that to which I have referred than in the words of Sir Frederick Pollock, a distinguished writer on political science, when he points out that the view formerly entertained with regard to the British Constitution, that deadlocks were an element of safety, and rather to be courted than guarded against, has now been abandoned, and that we have ceased to regard as a proper form of government a constitution in which the hour and the minute hands and the striking part should all be governed by different mechanisms, with no provision for the various indicators marking the correct and the same time. We are about to ask the people of Australia to accept a huge and a new machine. We know it will be costly. We can at least make it workable, and the people of Australasia will demand of us, not only, what will this machine cost, but, how will it work in actual operation. Therefore, when we approach this question we approach one to which there must be given a somewhat definite answer. I am quite with my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, when he says that we should found this constitution on the lines of the British Constitution, so far as that is applicable. I am thoroughly with him when he says that to properly understand the British Constitution we can scarcely go further back than 1832. At the end of the last century where was representative government? As we now understand it, it did not exist. It was still in the womb of time. About 6,000 individuals could return at that time an absolute majority to the House of Commons, and when, in 1832, the question that my right hon. friend referred to was agitated by the British public, the House of Lords maintained the position that it was a co-ordinate branch in all respects of the British legislature. The Duke of Wellington maintained that if the House of Lords gave way there would be a violation of the British Constitution, yet that noble lord not long after, to save the Constitution, counselled the house, of which he was so distinguished a member, to give way. Since that time, Sir Frederick Pollock tells us, the organism has worked well, deadlocks have not occurred frequently, and when they did occur, were easily mastered, not because there are checks and balances, not because we have to depend on the mere good will or the moral silent force of public opinion, manifested to the satisfaction of the legislature, but because it is recognised that in the last resort there is only one power in the nation. If you apply that test to the state, the answer is easy; but apply it to the federation and it is not so easy. That is the difficulty which confronts us at the present time. While I agree absolutely with my right hon. friend,

Mr. Reid, while I assent unreservedly as a matter of argument to the opinions he has urged, still I see that we have not maintained those opinions in our progress through this constitution. If the right hon. gentleman had taken up his present position absolutely upon the question of equal representation-

Mr. TRENWITH:
As we ought all to have done!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
If he had taken up that position upon the question of equal representation, and if he had refused to move from it, he would have been, if I may be allowed to say so, much more consistent than he is at the present moment. My right hon. friend, the Premier of Victoria, said last night, and I desire to repeat it today, that if we can in this Convention select matters which are of exclusive national importance, then he would not yield one jot in depending, in the last resort, upon a national referendum to settle them.

Mr. TRENWITH:
We ought to put nothing else in the constitution!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

My right hon. friend and I are in perfect accord as far as my individual opinions are concerned. But can my right hon. friend hope to satisfy everyone that those opinions are correct? If he could have done that, there would not have been so much objection to equal representation. It seems to me that we are narrowing down to the question, whether we are to stand, as the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, said, each in his last entrenchment, and defy the other whether we are each to stand in our last entrenchment and say-

An Hon. MEMBER:

We are being driven back to them gradually!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Whether we are to say, "This is our ultimatum; we will not take federation on any other terms." I admit that there is a limit beyond which no one can go. I refuse to adopt a policy of surrender, but I am willing and always have been willing and my opinion in that regard is strengthening to admit that we are bound to conciliate and compromise. I believe that the position taken up by my right hon. leader last night is a true and correct one. If my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, can put down on paper, not what I believe are national matters, but what will satisfy the people of all the colonies, are national matters and not state matters.

Mr. SYMON:

And every incident that may possibly bear on state questions!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

If my right hon. friend can do that, I think there will be no difficulty in obtaining assent to his proposal. But on the other hand, once we have arrived at the conclusion that the fears of the smaller states as to the invasion of what they think are state rights are not unreasonable and from that point of view we have conceded equal representation then it seems to me not unreasonable also to weigh with a good deal of fairness their claims in regard to this final arbitrament in disputes in the legislature. Now, my right hon. friend took the tariff and some other subjects. I would like to put to him one question, and I would ask him how he would decide it. Suppose, at some time or other, the proposal were agitated in the federal parliament to divide the states, for the electoral purposes of the senate, into six portions. It might be fairly claimed, and according to my opinion it would be rightly claimed, that it was a national matter. According to the arguments we have heard here, members of the smaller states might say that it was essentially a state matter. They might say, "The senators represent the states as states, and the states are right in deciding to allow no alteration to be made in the provision as to one electorate."

Mr. HIGGINS:
Suppose you made an exception of that?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
And of what else? Can the hon. member enumerate the exceptions? I feel the impossibility of doing so. I can understand the position we have taken up, that the things we have placed in the constitution are or ought to be deemed to be national matters.

Mr. SYMON:
You cannot tell how they may affect the states!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
They all affect the states more or less. The question, according to my mind, is this: Is the matter a national matter; if so, put it into the constitution; if not, leave it out. Of course, everything affects the states in some degree, or the states would not be concerned.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
That is what we are dealing with now-state interests in national affairs!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I was about to say that I can understand one position, and I can also understand the other position, of the smaller states, that in all these matters they insist upon having a voice as states in one house of the legislature. But I feel the strongest difficulty in picking out matters which I can offer to the smaller states and say, "You ought to admit, consistently with all you have said before, that these, at all events, are purely and exclusively national matters."

No policy could affect them as-

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
You can never tell until the question arises, and at this stage in the formation of a constitution, you cannot predicate whether in the course of our development those new problem which will inevitably arise are exclusively national or state matters. That is a task which none of us tainted with the weaknesses of humanity can ever hope to accomplish.

Mr. SYMON:
It is not arguable!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
If it can be done, I am prepared to assent as firmly as any man to a national referendum on those subjects; but I cannot fail to perceive-I have not failed all through the passing of the bill through the Victorian legislature to perceive, and to give weight to the consideration that if we are to have a federation including the smaller colonies, we cannot hope to force upon them the national referendum even in the last resort in all matters. I am forced to this conclusion much against my will. Hope sprang with some degree in my breast yesterday, when I heard my hon. friend, Mr. Holder's admirable, patriotic speech, and I waited with some degree of anxiety, and a large amount of desire, to hear similar sentiments from other of my hon. friends from the smaller colonies.

The Hon. J.H. Howe:

The hon. and learned gentleman was disappointed!

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:

I was disappointed. I venture to indorse, with all my heart, every word that my right hon. friend has said with regard to the views expressed by my hon. friend, Mr. Holder. I believe that in the future, as this federation proceeds, public sentiment will become enlightened, and the views we have urged, and the views to which that hon. gentleman gave expression yesterday, will be admitted to be the right ones. I believe that in the actual working of the constitution it will be found that those matters which we have included in the bill will be matters that will not concern one state more or less than any other; but we cannot persuade our friends of that at the present moment—we cannot hope to persuade them. We have to get the assent of the smaller colonies before this constitution can come into operation, and I would like to say this: that if we accept the double dissolution and the dual referendum as we believe they will yet be accepted, because Victoria can certainly claim that and if it should be found in the future that the

are not sufficient, and if the public sentiment in the other colonies should then be willing to concede what we think now is the right provision, the provision which we now seek to insert will not be unalterable. If it be found in the future that collisions arise that might lead to such disastrous consequences as civil war, then, if the two larger colonies think that the matter is really of such vital importance, one of the smaller colonies would at least be found to join in averting the disastrous catastrophe by assenting to a change of the constitution. That is a matter we can hope for in the future; it is not a matter, I am afraid, that we can insist on at the present moment. I would like to be able to say that I am satisfied that this Convention will yield at least what my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner has asked for. I believe, from what I have heard, that there is a sufficient majority to grant that. I am not one of those who are prepared to say that, without that, federation is dead, but I will say that, unless that at least is granted, I fear very much the fate of it. I believe that the people of these colonies will not be satisfied with the provisions which were framed a hundred years ago in the American Constitution, and which have been found sadly wanting. We have been told by speaker after speaker, who evidently had forgotten his "Bryce," that collisions did not occur in the American legislature. Turn to that author, and you will find that collisions are of frequent occurrence. It is true that be points out that no great block occurs, in administration.

Mr. GLYNN:

He says that they are mere academic displays!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

He says that no great block occurs in administration; but he adds that if the same collisions occurred in countries having responsible government, the consequence would be much more serious. He points out in words of warning, as it seems to me, that it is because the executive government is; removed from the legislature that these collisions such as they are, take place without overturning the state. We are bound to take advantage of all-that history, and that writers in their observations upon history, afford us, in order to frame for ourselves-to the advantage of our constituents, if not to the honor of ourselves, a constitution that soon be as free as possible from the disadvantages we have seen around us. We should much prefer that the houses, if they differ, should not in the first instance be subjected to the penalty of dissolution. We have embodied in this constitution a provision for the dissolution of the house of representatively and I should like to say to my hon. friends from the smaller colonies that if that were left standing unaccompanied by any other provision, it might lead to very serious consequences for those smaller colonies. There is no doubt that if we are to have responsible government we cannot do without a provision for the dissolution of the house of representatives; but I would like to picture this-in the event of a collision between the two houses of the legislature, and there being a mere provision in the constitution for the dissolution of one house, to ascertain the will of the population, if that house came back, strengthened, it may be, by the voice of their constituents, consisting of the people of the various colonies as a whole, and if the senate refused to give way under those circumstances, what would be the result?

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

But why should the senate not give way?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The hon. gentleman knows that to maintain the position of equal rights, he must adhere to the position that the senate is not bound to give way to the views of the house of representatives.
The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

The senate would be open to reason as well as the other house!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Yes; I am sure that the senate would be open to reason, but the people of the larger colonies will not be satisfied with that argument.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

Nor any, other!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Therefore, I would put it, as a matter for careful consideration, to my hon. friends from the smaller colonies, whether it is not necessary, for their makes, as well as for the sake of the opinion of the larger colonies, that some provision for averting deadlocks should be inserted in this constitution. There is no doubt about it. I think that they are absolutely satisfied that the larger colonies will not go into this federation without some such provision-without some provision which would be effectual, and they are satisfied, I have not the slightest doubt, that a mere provision for dissolution would not be deemed sufficient for the larger colonies, because, as I put it to my hon. friend, Sir Joseph Abbott, yesterday, suppose that a double dissolution takes place, what will happen? I should like hon. gentlemen who entertain any doubt as to the result of a double dissolution to consider how it practically, works. We will assume that the two houses are at variance. We will assume the matter to be of such importance that a double dissolution, will all its expense, is determined upon. The senators go back to their constituents. The question is a matter of state rights, as they think. Does any one imagine for a moment that, whether the people of the smaller states think with or in opposition to their representatives, they will reject them? Will it not be an overwhelming argument for any senator to Say to his constituents, who, presumably, are satisfied 'with him on every other point, "Are you going to reject me for my action? Are you going to reject me for standing by the rights of your colony? Are you going to be guilty of such ingratitude as to eject me from the senate because, in opposition to the desire of the large colonies, I wished to preserve your rights and privileges?" There could be only one answer to that question, and the result would be that the senators would come back, and the senate would not only be in as strong a position as it was in before, but it could not give way because it had received what would be considered to be a new and imperative mandate from its constituents. On the other hand it might be that the electors of the states would be of a different mind, and if so the double dissolution would have done its work. If, as I apprehend, that might not be effectual, and in any question of state rights, or so called state rights, it would not be effectual, then, if we had the dual referendum, we could say to the people of the states, "We ask you to avert a catastrophe in the commonwealth." The people themselves could do it with dignity. It is their rights and their privileges that are in question, and while their representatives and senators, as trustees of the will of their own constituencies, cannot, dare not, yield, the people themselves, who are masters of their own destiny, may say, "On the whole we are prepared to waive what our representatives in their fidelity to us have thought to be necessary to us. We are prepared to meet the larger populations." Or, on the other hand, the larger populations may say, "We are prepared to meet the smaller ones." To my mind it is a mode, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, of effectually settling any deadlock. The hundredth case may safely be left to take care of itself. But it is also a means of conserving the dignity of both houses; because as Sidgwick points out as my hon. friend, Mr. Dobson, a student of that authority, will remember-one house may not be able with dignity to yield to the other house; but either house may with dignity yield to the people. And, after all, what is the theory of our constitution? Government by the people. Why not effectuate it? What is the inherent objection to it? What is the objection to put into black and white, into actual practice, this theory which is vaunted by every parliamentarian? We are told that it is destructive to responsible government. I do not believe it. I believe it is the crown and roof of responsible government. What is responsible government? In the first place, responsibility of a ministry to parliament. But why to parliament? Because parliament represents and is responsible to the people. And if we say that the end and object of responsible government is that the will of the people shall prevail, why should we tie ourselves down to institutions that, perhaps, at the present day prevent us from attaining the end they are designed to serve?

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

We have different peoples here. This is not a homogeneous state. My people are not necessarily thy people!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I think my observations give full weight to that idea. I am now dealing with the objection of some hon. members who point out the supposed danger of the referendum. I am putting it to them, why should there be any objection to a referendum on the ground of its being an appeal to the people?
The Hon. S. Fraser:
Because it may be used to their disadvantage in times of excitement!

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
I can understand the swaddling clothes theory. I can understand the old story that the people are ignorant.

The Hon. S. Fraser:
No!

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
If they are not ignorant, why should they not be allowed to decide their own fate? I can understand the argument, which, perhaps, some of my hon. friends have not shaken themselves clear of yet, that the people are best governed when they are not allowed to govern themselves. That, I think, is a theory that ought to pass away as soon as possible. What is the argument? When my hon. friend, Mr. Fraser, stands in that chamber of which he is such a distinguished ornament, and resists a measure which has been passed by the lower house-

The Hon. Sir W.A. Zeal:
The Factories Bill, for instance!

The Hon. S. Fraser:
The Products Export Bill!

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
A very good instance.

The Hon. Sir W.A. Zeal:
One Chinaman, one factory!

The Chairman:
I do not think we ought to discuss Victorian politics.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
I am trying to put this as an illustration. What would my hon. friend, or any other member of the legislative council, say, in opposing a measure sent to him by the popular chamber? "The people are opposed to this." That is the answer; and if there was a dissolution on that question, and if the assembly came back reinforced, the other chamber would pass the bill. Why? Because the people had declared in its favour. If that is a sincere objection, what can be the reason of the opposition to taking the views of the people in the clearest manner possible?

The Hon. S. Fraser:
With sufficient time I have no objection to that!

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
That is a great advance. I am very glad to hear that. I still have hope of my hon. friend.
An Hon. MEMBER:
Ten years!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I should like to ask my hon. friend if the time is not past when we are to regard a second-hand interpretation of the people's will as the only mode of gathering it? Why are we to say that members of parliament, elected as they are at the present time, are to be the sole means of obtaining a recognition of the people's will? Do we not know as has been said so truly by my right hon. friend Sir George Turner that at an election each constituency deals with its candidates as it pleases, and not necessarily on one subject or on another? Do we not find that where there are double constituencies, as there are still in some of the colonies, there are men with distinctly opposite opinions returned by the same constituency to parliament? How can it be said that the people's will has been expressed definitely in such a case? We know very well that there are a multitude of considerations which determine the selection of a member? Therefore, if ever a great question arises between the Senate and the house of representatives a question of such a grave and important character that expense is to be disregarded, that a dissolution is to be resorted to, and still the matter is to be left in doubt and in contest and if, still further, it is deemed of so urgent a nature that the will of the people should be definitely ascertained to prevent what is worse-I would ask my hon. friend what legitimate objection there is to asking the people the necessary question in the clearest, the shortest, and most definite manner possible? The observations of my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Barton, last night, should be weighed well by every member of the Convention. He said that if the double dissolution were interposed between the quarrel and the final solution or what was hoped to be the final solution it would give time for education, it would give time for reflection, and it would give time and opportunity to put before the people the true nature of the question and the arguments for and against it.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
And exhaust the principle of responsibility!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
And, as he puts it, exhaust the principle of responsibility; I do not quite follow that, but still it is a matter which no doubt would have great weight. If that is done, what possible objection remains? I do not think all that preliminary course is necessary. One hundred years ago people had not the facilities for the interchange of thought, for self-education, and for obtaining the views of their friends and fellow-citizens, which they have now. But in these days, with all the industrial improvements which have been made, with the existence of railways and telegraphs, with the magnificent; apparatus of the press, they have every opportunity for the interchange of opinions and the collection of thought, and, therefore, why should we not adopt the best means possible, those means which have been adopted in other countries, for converging public opinion at critical moments upon definite questions, and thus focussing the desires of the people upon the question which demands a perfect solution?

The Hon. S. FRASER:
All the countries, in which these means have been adopted are foreign countries; they are not countries in the van of civilisation, as British communities are!
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I am prepared to accept what is good; I care not whence it comes. I am quite prepared to accept a measure, whatever be the place of its origin, if it commends itself to my reason and intelligence. But I should like to point out that the countries to which my hon. friend refers are not foreign to us in their origin, in their primitive modes of thought, or in their ideas of freedom. We know that every state in the American Union, with the exception of Delaware, has accepted the principle of the referendum. Millions of people in America are governed by state constitutions in which the principle is embodied.

Mr. GLYNN:
That is to stop legislation, not to precipitate it!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I was going to observe that it is mostly of a negative nature. But there is a strong movement on foot in America at the present time that the power of initiative should be, embodied in some form or other even in the federal constitution. In Switzerland a form of referendum exists which is closely, analogous to that which we now suggest.
The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
The application of the referendum after legislation!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The hon. member speaks of the referendum being applied after legislation. I would like to point out that there is a very common error upon this point In Switzerland the federal constitution has been changed many times. As Mr. Winchester has told us, there has been a gradual development from the provincial idea to a grand national idea, and that is growing day by day. The Swiss in their constitution of 1848 were far behind what they were in 1874. In 1874 their constitution made this provision for amendments:

Article 118. The federal constitution, may at any time be amended.

Article 119. Amendment is secured through the forms required for passing federal laws.

So that there they can amend the constitution without any reference at all to the people in the first place.

Article 120. When either council of the federal assembly passes a resolution for amendment of the federal constitution and the other council does not agree; or when 50,000 Swiss voters demand amendment, the question whether the federal constitution ought to be amended is, in either case, submitted to a vote of the Swiss people, voting yes or no.

I would like to state to my hon. friend, as he has no doubt observed, that that: is where there is a disagreement of the chambers.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

We provide for that whether there is a disagreement or not!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No, not when there is a disagreement; only when they agree. Article 120 continues:

If, in either case, the majority of the Swiss citizens who vote pronounce in the affirmative, there shall be a new election of both councils for the purpose of preparing amendments.

Article 121. The amended federal constitution shall be in force when it has been adopted by the majority of Swiss citizens who take part in the vote thereon, and by a majority of the states. In making up a majority of the states, the vote of a half canton is counted as half a vote. The result of the popular vote in each canton is considered to be the vote of the state.

These provisions of the Constitution were adopted in January, 1874, and the book from which I am quoting was published in May, 1891. Up to that time the Swiss people had the right of initiative only in regard to amendments of the Constitution. Since then, however, they have gone further, and I will quote from a book called "Direct Legislation by the People," written by Mr. Cree. He, at page 179, gives a very important extract from the Berne correspondent of the New York Evening; Post, under date of 30th July, 1891, giving an account of the adoption by the Swiss of the initiative as to federal laws.

The republic has taken the most advanced step towards democracy upon which it has ever ventured, namely, the application of the initiative, or what may be better called the imperative petition, to federal laws. The institution of the referendum, or the submission of laws just enacted to popular vote, when demanded by 30,000 citizens, was already in existence; but the power to demand that a given project be made law has just this month been assumed by the people. On Sunday, 7th July, the necessary constitutional amendment was voted upon in a general election, and passed. The vote was very light, but the majority in favour of the law quite decisive. A special session of the Federal Assembly was called for 27th July, and yesterday the law which sets the initiative in operation passed the Lower House.

I pass over a portion of the account which is not material, and on page 181, I find it stated:

The substance of the new law is to the effect that when 50,000 voters petition for an amendment to the constitution, or for the adoption of a statute, the federal assembly must submit the requested proposition within a given time to popular vote. The government may, at the same time, present a project of its own for choice, but in any case there can be no avoidance of the duty of giving the people a chance to say whether they want such a law or not. If a majority of all votes cast, and at the same time a majority of all the states, are in favour of it, the proposition becomes law.

I have read those extracts for the purpose of correcting an impression that I find prevalent that there is no provision anywhere, even in the Swiss Constitution, for settling a deadlock by means of the referendum or for passing legislation which has not been passed by the Parliament. They go even beyond what we propose. We propose that if after due deliberation, after exhausting the means of conciliation, of compromise, of mutual good feeling and understanding, there shall still prevail misunderstanding between the two houses of legislature, and after the full play of public opinion has been allowed to exert itself by means of the platform and the press, and all other agencies known to our civilisation, upon a measure which has been passed by one legislative body, there still exists a strong feeling on the part of one of the legislative agencies of the people that the measure should be passed into law, while there also exists an equally strong objection on the part of the other legislative agency of the people to its being passed into law, the principals to the dispute properly adjusted as the states and the nation shall be called upon to decide the question. I am told that this provision is not absolutely and completely effective; but is not that the result of the federal constitution as we are framing it? If we are to have a proposal that is to be absolutely effective it may mean in certain cases the annihilation of the principle of equal representation, and having granted that principle it behoves us to be loyal to it.

[The Chairman left the chair at 1 p.m.; the Convention resumed at 2 p.m.]

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I have not very much to add to what I have already said, and after the exhaustive manner in which the Right Hon. Sir George Turner dealt with the matter last night, I should have been well content to leave this Convention to arrive at a determination without further words from me; but after the splendid deliverance of the Right Hon. G.H. Reid, and the views he put forward, and in consideration of the magnitude of the subject, and the great importance of the issue, I should be wanting in my duty if I did not venture to place before the Convention the views I have expressed. I know that debate on this matter may not be useless at any stage. I recognise the importance of settling this matter in some way before we disperse; because, if we do not, a severe blow will be given to the confidence of the people in the various colonies. But I also recognise the great difficulty of arriving at a conclusion that would be eminently satisfactory to all concerned. There is a vast amount of truth in what has been urged on behalf of the smaller colonies, that they cannot consent to a national referendum on all questions. There is a vast amount of truth in what has been urged by the Right Hon. G.H. Reid, that there may be some questions on which it would be right that the smaller states should concede that a national referendum would be desirable. I think I am right in saying that it would be impossible to predicate in advance what subjects properly appertain to the two classes. It may be that, seeing the smaller states will be represented in the house of representatives according to population, they can see their way to consider and perhaps accept a via media—a mode which would enable the particular question to be determined as it it was a national matter to all intents and purposes, a national referendum might be employed for the determination of the question. That, if adopted, would enable us to have the matter determined on the spot. However that is a question for consideration. But I do think that, having accepted the principle of equal representation, we must not take a step that will cause our friends from the smaller colonies to possibly lose the benefit of the concession which we have made. I know that, in making the observations I have the honor to address to the Convention today, I run counter to the opinions of a good many of my fellow colonists. I know that in some respects the conclusions at which I have arrived will not command the assent of a journal in my colony.

[P.669] starts here

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Never mind them.
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
But I do mind them.
The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
We do not!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
But I do, and the people of Victoria mind them. It is a journal that must be recognised as a most important factor. I simply say that on this great question of federation and I am sure my remarks will not be misunderstood, because it is a fact it has a right to be taken into consideration. It has urged views that are acknowledged by all to be powerful as well as patriotic. It has placed its views before the public in the various colonies, and particularly in Victoria in language that has reached both the reason and the emotions. At the same time we have all to perform our duty as we as we can. While on the one band I see that, if we accept the national referendum in all cases without qualification, it means the utter failure of the scheme as it stands, that we shall see to a certainty our best hopes dispersed, our greatest aspirations baffled; on the other hand if we accept what Victoria has put forward, there is, in spite of the observations of the Right Hon. G.H. Reid, not only a certainty of our friends from the smaller colonies coming in, but the strongest probability of New South Wales joining us. I do not entertain any fear that New South Wales will stand out if the Victorian proposal is carried, but I do say that if neither the Victorian proposal nor the national referendum be carried, there is, if I judge the matter rightly, an absolute certainty of New South Wales standing out, and in all probability Victoria also. I am not prepared to accept the responsibility of giving a vote that must necessarily end in disaster. We have determined upon a course which has been explained to the Convention by my right hon. leader, which we have the strongest hopes will end, if adopted, in the consummation of federation. At all events we shall not incur the responsibility of failure. We shall ask our respective populations to accept it, and their will must in this case be the highest law.

Mr. WALKER:
Whatever may be the result of this division?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
If our proposal is accepted.

Mr. WALKER:
Oh!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I am perfectly frank. We have departed to a large extent from what we have urged, and we say we will not take a course which we say we know will end in absolute disaster. But we shall do our best to frame a colony that will offer the strongest possibilities of acceptance, and we shall hope for acceptance by our respective peoples. But its rejection, if that should unfortunately take place, must be the work, not of ourselves, but of our constituents. I am sure I shall not be misunderstood when I say to my friends from the smaller colonies that I invoke all the patriotism which I know animates them to help us in this emergency. I ask them not to allow any too rigid adherence to their particular views-
The Hon. J.H. Howe:
We recognise the feeling which the hon. member expresses!
The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
I am glad my hon. friend recognises it. I am sure the time approaches when the practical application of that feeling will become necessary, and I do hope we shall all unite, I trust unanimously, to pass a constitution that will convince the people of the various colonies that we have done a great work, that we have done a work which, if it achieves ultimate success, will reflect honor and credit upon ourselves and our children. I do sincerely trust that at this supreme moment we shall not fall into disunion, that it shall not be said of our efforts on this occasion that its end was failure, because I doubt in that case if the people of Australia would again in our lifetime nerve themselves to another effort such as that which has brought us here.
Mr. Higgins:
Surely they are not so lifeless as all, that!
The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
They are not lifeless, but this is not a work that can be undertaken every day. Therefore, I trust this may bring forth good fruit, and that it shall not be said of us and of our work:
'Tis an old tale: Jove strikes the Titans down,
Not when they set about their mountain piling,
But when another rock would crown their task.
Mr. Clarke (Tasmania)[2.16]:
As I come from one of the smaller states, which holds a very strong opinion on this subject, I desire to state the position I intend to take up. In Tasmania, which I have the honor to represent, the public opinion is that there is no necessity to insert in the constitution a provision for dealing with deadlocks; but, all the same, although that is the strong opinion of the Tasmanian people, I think we must look at the question now before us from every point of view. We must take into consideration the opinion of the people of the larger colonies. We must take into consideration the fears and the prejudices of the people of New South Wales and Victoria, and, if we possibly can, give into these fears and prejudices in a reasonable way consistently with our own safety and honor. I think we are bound to do it for the purpose of bringing about federation. That being the case, we have now to consider the proposals which have been placed before us. I think that this Committee owes a debt of gratitude to its learned leader for the able and statesmanlike speech in which he put the whole case before us last night. The first step that he suggested was a double dissolution. Although I am prepared to go a long way with the representatives of Victoria and New South Wales, yet, as at present advised, I object to a dissolution of the senate under any circumstances. It may be that hereafter I may see fit to modify this view; but at present I think we should not consent to any dissolution of the senate. Such a course as that would destroy the continuity of that body, and would prevent it from being in the degree we wish it to be, the guardian of state rights and interests. But while I object to a dissolution of the senate under any circumstances, such as would be the case in a matter of deadlock, I am perfectly willing to concede the principle of the double referendum. The people of Victoria and New South Wales want some scheme of referendum, and I believe if we wish to bring about federation it is absolutely necessary for this Committee to devise some system of referendum. Now, two schemes have been placed before us: there is the mass referendum and there is the double referendum. I am in favour of the latter system, because it preserves the rights of the various states. The federal principle, as I take it, as I have enunciated time after time in the Convention and in this Committee, is that all federal legislation requires the assent of a majority of the nation, and the assent of a majority of the states. If you give a mass referendum you violate this principle. You blot out our state boundaries, you ignore our state life, and you might just as well enact at the start that, if the house of representatives and the senate differ on any question, the senate shall always go under. That is my view of the mass referendum, and it is for that reason I am thoroughly opposed to it. We had an able speech today from the Premier of New South Wales. It was eloquent in many passages, but I could not help asking myself when he had finished, as some members of the English Parliament used from time to time to ask concerning the speeches of Mr. Gladstone, "after all what in reality has he said; what are really his opinions, and what does he propose?" As far as I can gather, the hon. gentleman said that we ought to separate in clause 52 of the constitution the number of subjects which ought to be dealt with by a mass referendum, and that we ought to apply the mass referendum for the purpose of getting over deadlocks arising on any of those subject. That is a project which, in the words of Mr. Gladstone, I may say passes the wit of man. I do not think any member of this Convention is capable of distinguishing between those subjects which, under no circumstances involve state rights or state interests, and those subjects which do. The right hon. gentleman went through all these subjects in clause 52; but, in my humble opinion, if there is any subject out of the thirty-seven subjects mentioned in that clause which does not involve state rights and state interests, it has no right whatever to be there. We have enumerated in clause 52 a number of matters which we consider can be better discharged by the federal parliament than by the state parliaments individually. It is for that reason that we propose to assign those matters to be dealt with by the federal parliament. But when we separate those subjects which can be better dealt with by the federal authority, in what kind of way do we want the federal parliament to deal with them? We want these subjects, according to my view, to be dealt with federally, and not in the way in which the parliament of a united commonwealth would deal with them. We have handed over these subjects as matters of federal concern, and not as matters that are to be dealt with by a parliament representing one people. If the project of the Premier of New South Wales were carried out, what would the result be? We should enumerate a number of subjects which would be dealt with by the federal parliament, as the representatives of one people. We should be establishing a system of unification, and not a federal system. We were sent here to form, not a constitution for a unified Australia, but a constitution for a federated Australia. For these reasons I do not think there is any virtue in the proposal of Mr. Reid. The right hon. gentleman was good enough to compare the double referendum to a last ditch, in which he said the constitution of Australia would find itself, and its last position would be worse than the first. I do not think the right hon. gentleman was quite correct in his comparison, but I would like to say that if the project of a mass referendum were carried out, that referendum would be the ditch into which the house of representatives would pitch the senate. As we want in federation the assent of the people of the states to all legislation, we should carry out the principle to the utmost, and we should not introduce into this constitution any system of dealing with deadlocks which would violate that principle. There must be the assent of the people, and of the majority of the states, and in as much as the double referendum does not violate this principle, which I consider the main principle of a true federation, I am, therefore, in favour of supporting, as one means for getting rid of deadlocks, the proposal that we should have this double referendum.

I have only a few words to say; but I do not wish the debate to close without expressing my views on the subject. As the last speaker has said, we have listened to an exceedingly able and eloquent speech from the Premier of New South Wales. The effect which that right hon. gentleman produces on any assembly he addresses is very marked, whether it be in the Centennial Hall or in this Chamber. It takes some time before the effects of the magic of his eloquence can be dissipated; but when the whole of his speech is winnowed down, his contention comes simply to this—and, to my mind, it involves somewhat of a contradiction in terms that, in federal matters—matters under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament there shall be unification. That is a contention which I never heard raised until the Convention met in Sydney. Certainly, during the elections which preceded the formation of this Convention, such a proposition was never considered in the colony of which I have the honor of being a representative. The proposition really comes down to this: that, in federal matters, you need only have one house; that the senate is absolutely useless, because, sooner or later, the majority of the most populous colonies is to prevail. Of course, we have been treated with the greatest possible candour by the representatives of the larger colonies in this matter. The hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, admitted that, in the last resort, unification was his intention, and it has been very properly argued, and with irrefutable logic, that if that is so in the last resort it may just as well be so in the first instance. Men will not struggle against anything when they know the result is inevitable. Reasonable men always yield where they know the greater force exists against them. If I offend against the standing orders of this Convention, and I am named by the President, and the Sergeant-at-Arms touches me on the shoulder, I walk out at once without any display of force, because I know I have to go. I know that in the last resort I have to go; therefore, it is just as well to go at once; and the senate will know that, in the last resort, it has to give way, and it may just as well give way without an idle struggle, of which the result is absolutely assured. Therefore, I say the question really comes to this: that we have had it gravely proposed here, after all these years of debate about the functions of the senate, that, practically, the senate is a useless body in a federation. The way in which this opinion has gradually come to be expressed with this frankness has been very insidious. When we met in 1891, you, Mr. Chairman, remember that we had an overwhelming majority in favour of a senate, as a co-ordinate house, with equal powers and equal representation to that of the house of representatives. I have not the Hansard of 1891 before me, but I am perfectly sure that that was the deliberate opinion of two-thirds of the representatives when first they assembled here. Then committees were appointed, and by some means or other the two-thirds dwindled down until we found ourselves in a minority. The senate was not to have co-ordinate powers; but it was to have what those who refused these coordinate and co-equal powers maintained was practically the same thing. We were to have the power of suggestion, which it was maintained was equal to the right of amendment of money bills. So the matter closed at that stage. Then the question was raised of equal representation, and we had to fight that, after conceding the other point. Then it appears that that point is yielded, but only in order to undermine us by something which takes away the value of the power of suggestion, of equal representation, and everything else in connection with the senate. If we are to have an ultimate appeal to the popular majority on federal matters, then those who somewhat grudgingly gave us the principle of equal representation in the senate might, without hesitation and without endangering, their position in the slightest degree, have given us equal representation, or even have given the smaller colonies the representation of two to one-twelve members instead of six in the senate. Even then they would have been perfectly safe, because in the ultimate resort they would be bound to have their way.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is illogical; but have we not been told again and again that we are not to be logical?

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

We have to deal with practical questions. We have to consider what would be the cases in which the senate would dare to stand out against the popular majority in the whole of Australia or a majority in the house of representatives. It would be only in cases where some injustice or coercion was threatened against one or more states. These would be the only cases in which, practically, the senate would stand firm, and these would be the very cases in which the deadlock provisions would be brought into play. The result would be that the constitutional provisions for deadlocks would only be brought into play when they were meant to buttress up, support, and perpetuate some contemplated injustice or coercion. I say that between the two houses the great remedy for deadlocks must be reasonableness on the part of men, and on the part of colonies; but this reasonableness must be in view of no present or prospective compulsion. However, I am quite willing for one to concede the principle of a reference to the people whenever any deadlock or difficulty arises. I have always been an advocate of the referendum. I think, in 1891, I was one of the few advocates of it in this chamber. If I remember rightly, I think I proposed the referendum on that occasion. I believe no harm could ever be done in taking the views of the people; but I want to know who are the people whose views we are going to, take? The voice of the people must rule, of course, but we want to be sure about what we mean when we talk about the voice of the people. When the Premier of New South Wales talks about the voice of the people as being necessarily supreme, he means the voice of the people of the larger colonies, and, to a great extent, the voice of the people of his own colony. But I consider the voice of the democracy of South Australia has also a right to be considered. That is just as much the voice of the people, although the people are not so many; and I say there is no chance whatever of any principle of democracy being endangered by some consideration being given to the opinion of the people of such a state as that of South Australia. The voice of the people must prevail in the long run because the people understand best what is for their own interests. I would put my hands willingly into those of the men who advocate the right of the people to govern their own affairs, but not necessarily to administer the affairs of others without some check or restriction. As has been said by one of the authorities I think Freeman—the question of local bondage or local liberty does not at all depend upon the form of the central government. You can have local freedom under the veriest autocracy which ever existed, and you can have local bondage under a representative government. The people can be trusted to manage their own affairs, because they know what their own interests are; but the people cannot be trusted to manage the affairs of others without some check. It has been suggested that we should take out of clause 52 all those subdivisions which are purely matters of national interests. I notice that the Premier of New South Wales read through thirty of them, but he did not go as far as the 31st.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I did not know what the 31st was!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
It is only the question of the right of South Australia to have some voice in the management of the Murray waters within her own territory.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I was afraid of wearying the Committee by reading them all!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
In the thirty sub-clauses which the Premier of New South Wales read there are many which, although dealing with matters of national importance, also very seriously and vitally touch the interest of the states. I do, not think it is possible to point to a single one of those sub-clauses which may not at some time or other become a question of vital interest to one or more states. We had an eloquent speech from the hon. member, Mr. Wise, in which he pointed out most conclusively that even a line in the tariff, although a national question, might be of so much importance to one or more states as practically to threaten their deepest interests. We have only to consider this, and we shall see that the hon. gentleman was perfectly justified in what he said. We have all sorts and conditions of climate in Australia, and an industry may become of the most vital importance to one portion of Australia which may not be one of the larger colonies possessing the larger population. And is no adequate consideration to be given to the views of the representatives from that colony, whose interests are so deeply affected, as to what the tariff is to be? When we have federation the industries of Australia will become localised, and having free-trade within our own boundary, those industries will spring up to which the conditions of the localities are most favourable. We may have, I believe we shall have, in South Australia one or two industries which, if they are not absolutely confined to our boundaries, will, at least flourish there to their greatest possible extent. Yet the question of the maintenance or development of those industries may not be at all a vital question to the eastern colonies, who have large populations. We all know that, as regards the question of the tariff, there is an infinite difference of opinion. The interests of the consuming population may be opposed to the interests of the producing population. The tariff may favour the consumer, who wants the article free of duty, although the taking it out of the tariff may have the most detrimental effect upon the producer who raises the particular article. Then we know that there are what are termed manufactured products which from another point of view are regarded as raw material. So one can quite foresee that upon questions affecting some of the industries of the colonies, not on the eastern coasts, but possibly in South Australia, possibly in the Northern Territory, possibly in Western Australia, possibly in Tasmania, there may be a complete difference of opinion as to the desirableness of this or that article being put within the pages of a protective tariff. This may be a matter of vital interest, and you cannot expect the smaller states to surrender practically all their voice in the matter, as they would if there were a mass referendum. I think we may well be pardoned for having some little fear as to the conditions of the future. Still I do not think the panic as to the future comes from the smaller states, although from their unprotected condition they have most to fear. It seems to me that gentlemen from the larger states have been those who have been most fearsome as to what may occur. But they are men in armour; they have nothing to fear.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
Your side has been safe all through!
The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:
We have given up one after another of our props.
The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
Still you have a number left!
The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:
But the right hon. gentleman, if he had his way, would take them all from us.
The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
No, I would not; I would provide for every state right in the constitution!
The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:
It seems to me that we have given everything away until we have come to this prop, which is our all, and I think it behoves us, seeing that all the tendency is to put power into the hands of the large populations, to be a little timid. A little timidity on our part is not out of place, but it is not becoming for those who have the great force of numbers with them to display in this matter such unreasoning fears as they do. I shall certainly support the principle of the referendum not the mass referendum, but the double referendum so ably put forward on so many occasions by the Attorney-General of Victoria. I would like to say again with regard to the proposition of the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales to differentiate in the sub-divisions of clause 52, and strike out all those questions which are of state interest, that it is not possible to make any such differentiation. Let me give a few instances. Take the question of postal, telegraph, or telephone services. Are there no state interests connected with those services? At the present time, we have the sole management of those affairs in our hands, and we know how it is possible so to administer the department as to assist the development of the colonies we represent. Is that continuance of good management within our own boundaries, in this respect, of no importance to us? When you are opening up a new country, I say that it is of infinite importance-
The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
That would be rather a matter of administration than legislation!
The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:
We know the importance of having some voice in legislative chambers, even in matters of administration. The opening up of a wheat market may depend upon whether you can get a line of telegraph constructed, in order that the producer and the buyer may be brought into intimate relations. Is not that a question in which the states, having enjoyed absolute autonomy in such matters, should be considered? Then take defences. Under the heading of defences you can do almost anything. With unlimited means to spend you can make roads, bridges in fact, you can make or mar the destinies of a whole portion of Australia.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   Leave that out!
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
   You cannot leave it out, because it is one of the great national questions. The questions of defence and of tariff are national questions of supreme degree.
Mr. HIGGINS:
   Why should they not be nationally treated?
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
   Because we propose to federate.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   You assume a certain narrow meaning for federation?
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
   According to the hon. member "federation" means the rule by the minority of the majority!
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
   No, it does not. What I say is that a certain right of veto should be given to a majority of the states when their interests are threatened. The right hon. the Premier of New South Wales asked us to point out those matters which involved state interests. Take ocean beacons and buoys and light-houses.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
   Are they subjects for a
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
   No; but in the administration of those matters you may make one port and mar another.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
   -
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
   A government will do what it has the power to do.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
No; it will live as quietly as it can!
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
It will, knowing that it has the power, often go near to the full exercise of it. A true federal government would not do so, because we should have an adequate voice in a federal government. There is the senate in a federal government to be considered, and we do not pre-suppose that the senate will be composed of men of straw, who ultimately must give in, who have the right to their opinion only until the cloture is put on them. We should not have any rights at all. What would be the rights of the senate if in the last resort it had to give way? Of course, even cases of the greatest injustice would not be called injustice, because we know that injustice is never perpetrated under that name; but a central authority very often errs through ignorance of the local conditions. It does not want to do an injustice, but it does not fully appreciate the conditions of distant localities. One of the objects of the senate in which every colony would have adequate representation is to protect interests which might be invaded under such circumstances; If you adopted the mass referendum you would strike at the very root of the power of the senate. You would practically render its deliberations futile. The representation of the smaller states would become a negligible quantity in the commonwealth. Then take the question of quarantine. That would appear to be a matter in which no question of local interest could arise. But in a continent so huge as this island of Australia, where there is every variety of climatic condition, even the question of quarantine may become a question in which the very existence of a state is threatened. We have a tropical climate, we have a sub-tropical climate, and we have a temperate climate. The northern portion of the island is tropical. A tropical disease may threaten Australia which we know cannot obtain any footing in the eastern, southern, or western provinces. Protection against this disease may be of insignificance to the larger populations, those living in the temperate climate to the south, but it may be a question of the most vital importance, a question of the very existence of the population which may ultimately gather on our northern seaboard. We hardly know these conditions yet, but I could enumerate half a dozen diseases.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
We have a common interest in preventing disease from decimating Australia?
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
But it would not decimate Australia, because it could only affect a few people, a comparatively small portion of the northern parts of this continent.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
But it might travel!
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
I mean diseases that would not travel; diseases that are strictly tropical.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
If they would not travel they ought not to come under a federal act!
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
You cannot pick out these things. The question might be one affecting two or three colonies possibly it might affect Queensland and South Australia only, or possibly also a portion of Western Australia. It might be a question of vital importance to those colonies, but of not the slightest importance to Tasmania, Victoria, or New South Wales.

[Page 677] starts here
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Surely the Government would do what was right!
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
The Government would do what was right if they had not the ultimate power to do what was wrong.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
The Government would not have any, interest in doing what was wrong!
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
We all know that, in representative chambers, the view that ultimately prevails is in accordance with the representation in that chamber. If a district is fairly represented, it gets justice; if it is inadequately represented, and can be disregarded, it very often does not get justice. It would be the same in the case of the senate, if its views could be set aside by a mass referendum. Even the question of marriage and divorce is of importance to all the colonies. At present, we have absolute autonomy in that respect; we make our own laws. It would be an injustice to say that the laws of marriage and divorce, which are to affect South Australia, should be framed by any parliament in which that colony had not an adequate representation. If there were power to set aside the wish of the senate, in which we would have a fair representation, you would make us really a quantity which need not be taken into account at all you would totally abolish our autonomy in these matters; and I say autonomy is too dear a privilege to be lightly got rid of in this way. We all of us now manage our own affairs according to our own views. We have a Federal Council, in which each colony is represented equally. Of course, I admit that the Federal Council has not anything like the power which this federation is to have; but still, in connection with the Federal Council, it was recognised that the colonies were to have equal representation in the one house which would represent Australia. The smaller colonies have now admitted that there must be one house in which they are, practically, to have it very small representation; still they want to maintain a fair representation in the other house which would be adequate to protect their interests. It was said very truly by the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, and the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, and many other gentlemen representing the large populations, that in America the Congress is never divided on the question of state rights or state interests. But we must be very careful how we choose our analogies.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is hardly the statement I made. I said that there was no conflict of interests as between states as states and the commonwealth!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
But politics in America are dominated by huge party machines which deal with legislation, and, to a great extent, with administration, and would never allow any injustice to be done to any state. The parties would never allow any coercion to be applied to any state, or any of its rights to be interfered with, because, if they did, they would lose their influence in states on which the existence or predominance of their party depends. The hon. member, Mr. Deakin, says that we should have party government in Australia. So we should; but nothing like to the same extent as they have it in America.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
It is a different thing. In America, party government depends to a great extent on the election of the president that takes place every four years, and in regard to which the parties strive with their utmost force. It is that which keeps parties together in America; but we should have nothing of that kind here.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
There will be an election every three years, at least!
Look at your own parties in South Australia, and at the parties in Victoria!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
They are altogether different from the parties in America.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
It is quite sufficient for this purpose!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
The parties in America have really lost sight of their original intention. Goldwin Smith uses words to the effect that:

The casks that contained the party spirit no longer retain the odour of the liquor with which they were once filled.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
That does not affect the issue here?

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
I do not think that we should have party government, or party spirit, in this commonwealth as we understand it in our parliaments now. How far are our present parties of any value to us? Do not I find myself voting here time after time with gentlemen from the other colonies whom we recognise as ultra conservatives. Does not the hon. member find himself voting time after time with gentlemen whom he must recognise as ultra conservatives.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
No; they are all liberals who vote with me!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
Do we not see that party lines are so blurred that hon. members who are in principle opposed to the referendum have actually supported it, because they think that their state would lose nothing by having it.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Does the hon. member call me an ultra conservative?

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
No; I was not thinking of the hon. member, nor of anyone from Tasmania. I am only too glad to hail under any circumstances those who are willing to vote for a referendum; but I say that it shows how little you can carry the experience of parties into new conditions if we may judge from what we see here, because we see so-called democratic measures advocated by so-called conservatives. That shows that original party lines have no value here. I myself have been regarded as a conservative for voting for what I believed to be state rights.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The phrase "state rights" is used as a stalking horse by reactionaries!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
State rights or any other question is used here just as it suits those who are arguing, and I was much amused yesterday to hear, some of those who were unwilling to give any more powers to the senate than they could help, because it might be ultra-conservative, admit that probably the senate would be the more liberal and democratic of the two houses. That shows how blurred our lines of party government have become. I would be not only willing, but glad, to support my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, in the matter of the double referendum. I think that the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, in spite of his magnificent speech today, made a little mistake when he said that in the past the referendum had been used as a weapon of personal despotism.

Mr. Wise:

Napoleon III expressly justified it because it was the only way to escape from the bondage of parliamentary control!

The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:

What has not been used for personal ends and ambitions? But as was pointed out, I think, by the Right Hon. Mr. Reid, last year, in the New South Wales Parliament, when he moved the adoption of the referendum, in a speech that was second to none ever delivered on the subject it does not alter the fact that in the old days the referendum was the guardian of liberty, and that the greatest legislatures the world has ever seen have been content to make all their proposals subject to the veto or the assent of the people. Why, Sir, the senate of Rome, the assembly of kings, as it has been properly called, could only frame their laws, could only decide upon what they wished their legislation to be, subject to the veto or the assent of the people. Why, sir, the senate of Rome, as it has been properly called, could only frame their laws, could only decide upon what they wished their legislation to be, subject to the veto of the people. When, after all their labours and after all the wisdom they could bring to bear - and I do not suppose the world ever saw grander or more intelligent assemblies than the senates of Greece and Rome - after all their combined wisdom had been brought to bear on these questions, they then had to go with the proposal in their hand to the people and say, "Do you or do you not accept this law as one under which you desire to live?" Instead of the referendum having been used to any great extent as the agent of despotism, it has really been the guardian of the liberties of the past. I will support my hon. friend, Mr. Isaacs, in his proposal for the double referendum. But I need not say that I shall oppose with all my power the mass referendum, because it strikes at the existence of the senate, renders that body of no value whatever, and we might just as well start our federation with one chamber, and have no more nonsense about it. I know it is the knowledge of this that brings my hon. friend, Mr. Isaacs, and his right hon. chief, Sir George Turner, into this position. They see that if we are going to have a mass referendum we might just as well have one house and from many points of view I should like to see one house. I want to see no second chamber erected to stand in the way of the will of the people. I do not want to see any checks on what is called the popular will. I simply want to see a chamber erected to protect the rights we have at present as autonomous states, and to see that they are not endangered.

Mr. HIGGINS:

On one side the hon. member is a radical, and on the other side a conservative!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

Of course we are all conservatives in a sense. We have proved many things, and we hold fast to that which is good. But, in the sense the hon. member means, I have not a conservative bone in my body. The hon. member knows that quite well, and everybody in this Convention knows it too. My struggles for the Senate have simply been struggles for autonomy, for home rule, for local government; because I believe you will have no local government whatever if you neglect the state majorities. There is no sound autonomy in the world that can be founded on the deconstruction of state majorities. The mass referendum of my hon. and learned friend is absolutely out of the question, not only from the point of view which I have endeavoured to touch upon that it would render the senate incapable but also because you cannot have two referendums in this federation. You cannot have two different forms of referendum. No one proposes that the referendum with regard to a change of the constitution should be other than the double referendum. We should endanger the double referendum in regard to a change of the constitution if we adopted the principle of the mass referendum in deadlocks. It would be an inconsistency to have two forms of referendum in one commonwealth, and, sooner or later, we should find, if the mass referendum were established for deadlocks, that there would be an attempt to introduce the same principle into the settlement of questions relating to amendments of the constitution. And, logically, there would be no holding back from that position. If we adopted the mass referendum now, we might just as well wipe out the referendum with regard to a change of the constitution, throw ourselves entirely into the hands of the majorities of the large, colonies, and say that autonomy in Australia is a thing of the past, that we centralise and unify now and for ever. If we do that, we say goodbye to democracy. We say goodbye to the will of the people, goodbye to what we know as popular government, because sooner or later a central authority is bound to become a tyranny. No truer words were ever uttered than those of Sir John Hall at the conference of 1890 "Democracy demands that the government should be conducted within the sight and the hearing of the people." The states are within the sight and hearing of the people. We must protect their privileges, otherwise we shall have the whole of Australia under one government, which, although it may be local to one state, will be infinitely distant to a great portion of the commonwealth—will be 2,000 miles away, and the voice of liberty will not carry that distance.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The referendum will protect their privileges!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
I would not depart from the principle of the referendum. The principle of the referendum in a federation is recognised. There is no referendum in any federation I ever heard of which is not a double referendum, and I think it would be extremely dangerous to depart in the slightest degree from that principle.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON (Tasmania)[3.2]:
I think it very desirable at the outset that I should correct a misapprehension that has arisen as to the attitude of Tasmania, and of the Tasmanian legislature, in regard to this matter. It has been said in the Convention and outside that Tasmania is one of the four colonies that have suggested provisions for meeting a deadlock. That is incorrect to this extent: that one branch of the Tasmanian legislature, and only one branch, has made a suggestion qualified in this way:

The Tasmanian legislature, through its House of Assembly, has practically said, "We do not regard any provision as necessary; but if you are going to have one, then let it be this one." And this one I should hope will receive some attention from hon. members inasmuch as it provides for a system of internal referendum, a referendum within the parliament itself, and one also which without putting the commonwealth to any very great expense, secures absolute finality. They say "If any solution for a deadlock be necessary." One cannot help marvelling how the necessity for this solution, for some mechanical arrangement for meeting deadlocks, has arisen suddenly after all these years, and has assumed the prominence it has done. In the bill of 1891 there was no provision at all for dealing with deadlocks. At the meeting of the Convention held in Adelaide some suggestions were made in this regard; but those suggestions were disposed of, and the bill passed without any machinery to meet deadlocks. We are now told that public opinion in this direction is gaining ground, and that machinery to meet deadlocks has become a matter of paramount necessity. Looking in the two local journals published in Sydney, this morning, to find light on the subject, I observed that while one paper advocates this machinery, the other paper is distinctly opposed to it, and points out an objection to the referendum which I do not think has yet been noticed in the Convention an objection of very serious importance. It is that the referendum transfers the responsibility of the ministry from the parliament to the people.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Have not the people to bear all the burden? Why, then, should they not take what responsibility they like?

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

I certainly do not want to take away from the ministry of the day their responsibility to the people through the parliament. When this question was raised in Adelaide, it was disposed of upon arguments which I think are almost unanswerable, and I should like to read two very brief passages from speeches which seem to me absolutely convincing. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, when this matter was under discussion at Adelaide, said:

We know that it is in these matters of mixing up questions of taxation together instead of keeping them in one bill, and of tacking to an appropriation act some extraneous subject of expenditure, for instance, that a bill is lost, and when it is endeavoured to force it on a second chamber, deadlocks arise. We know that deadlocks have arisen from these causes, and I submit that the practical provision against deadlocks is that bills embodying these provisions which have in the past been causes of deadlocks should be breaches of this constitution, and therefore may be declared inoperative by the high court of Australasia. These matters have all been provided for in this bill. There may be new causes, but I put it that so far as we can ordinarily do, so far as experience guides us, this constitution has sufficiently provided against deadlocks, and looking at the ordinary range of human affairs no other provision is necessary. I am not referring to those matters which may be settled on amendment, message, or conference. These subjects will be open as in the past, but in these three provisions carefully made for preventing the origination of deadlocks we have provided sufficiently, and may rest with them, whether we are asked to adopt the referendum or the Norwegian system, or any other.

I should like to read a passage from the speech of another distinguished member of the Convention:

I say now that to place a weapon of this kind for the ending of deadlocks in the hands of either house, or any authority in the state, would be to stifle that free discussion on questions of difference in which alone the people of the commonwealth must look for the best result of collective wisdom. Whatever methods you adopt for getting rid of deadlocks, you must bring this result about: The party in the state which feels its power in its hands will be anxious to use it, and will at once use it for the purpose of bringing about that deadlock, which will result in a solution in favour of the party that holds the power. There can be no question that if a strong party in the country hold a view in favour of a particular measure, and it is carried by large majorities, they would very soon seek to overcome the resistance of the senate by having a dissolution-sending the bill up again, and dissolving the senate. That brings me to one of the strongest objections to the proposal. I quite assent to the proposition that when you have a house elected by the people whether the house of representatives or the senate it should be brought into constant touch with the people. It should, by a process of election, have its members renewed in such a way that it will not get out of touch, and you secure that quite enough by a senate, half of which is renewable every three years. The ordinary life of the house of representatives is three years, and you secure the admission of one-half new blood into the senate by a process of triennial retirement of half its members. That is quite enough to keep the senate in touch with the people on all ordinary questions. It is only in some sudden access of popular feeling on some particular question that the senate is likely to be out of harmony with the general body of the people, and one of the greatest safeguards we have in the senate is that it is not liable to be immediately dissolved. In whose hands is the power of dissolution? It is in the hands of a majority of the house of representatives that is, in the hands of the government of the day; and if the amendment of Mr. Wise is adopted, you are placing this very strong weapon in the hands of the government of the day, to coerce the senate to take any view they may think fit. Can anyone doubt that is coercion?

An Hon. MEMBER:

From whose speech is the right hon. gentleman quoting?

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDOON:

I do not wish to mention the hon. member's name, because I do not think that the opinions which be expressed then are quite the opinions which he holds now.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The right hon. member is looking at me. He is perfectly at liberty to quote anything that I said at Adelaide, because I have not departed from the opinions which I expressed during our sittings there!

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

I mentioned the hon. and learned member's name in connection with the passage from his speech which I quoted. In discussing this matter, I have not only to explain the action of the Tasmanian legislature, but also my own position, because I am a very strong advocate for the dissolution of the legislative councils of our colonial parliaments and also of the referendum. I am an advocate of the referendum where it can be applied safely and it can only have a restricted application and for the dissolution of the second chambers in the colonial parliaments. But I recognise to the fullest extent that which I do not think is always recognised: that the senate of the federal legislature will occupy a position entirely different from that occupied by the legislative councils in the colonial parliaments. I feel that very strongly, and I think that it is our bounden duty to respect the continuity of the existence of the senate to the fullest extent, and to carry out the suggestion made in the last paragraph which I read. It is suggested that some of the subjects which are to be referred to the federal parliament should be so separated that there could be no difficulty in discriminating, between those which might involve interference with state rights and those which involved other matters. I agree, however, with the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, and other hon. members, that it would be absolutely impossible to make this discrimination. You cannot see at what point there will be a divergence from a national question, which will make the matter a provincial one-one of state concern, and, therefore, jeopardising state interests and state rights. While, as a friend of the referendum, I should be disposed to accept the proposition that after a dissolution of the lower house there should be a dual referendum, I do not see that it is possible for us, having regard to our duty, to safeguard the senate, and to preserve to it such limited powers as have been left to it, to go one whit further. If we did that, it would be, I should say, by way of compromise, and a very large compromise indeed.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[3.14]:

I had not meant to speak in this general debate, because I intended to confine my remarks to the specific proposals which, I understand, will be brought forward for the prevention of deadlocks; but, having regard to the course which the debate has taken, I think I should avoid misunderstanding better by speaking now, when, as it seems to me, we are approaching nearer and nearer to the dilemma which I feared from the very start of our deliberations in Adelaide. The dilemma appears to be although it is not, I am happy to say, quite expressed yet; and I hope it will never be a real and final dilemma that the larger states will say, "We cannot federate unless you leave the sovereignty at any rate, in the final result in the mass of the people." The smaller states will say, "We cannot federate if you do put the sovereignty in the final result in the people as a whole." I feel, when we approach a dilemma of that sort, that we should use language of the greatest moderation. It is a stage at which the greatest self-restraint is necessary, if we are to bring out any good result from our deliberations. I have heard with great regret the strong language which the right hon. the Premier of South Australia and the hon. members, Mr. Symon and Mr. Howe, addressed to the Convention yesterday. The Right Hon. C.C. Kingston said that he would stump the country against federation unless a certain proposal of his were carried. Then the hon. member, Mr. Symon, spoke as if he were going to lead an army with a free and flashing sword against the larger states if there were any infringement of what he considered to be the rights of the smaller states. As for the hon. member, Mr. Howe, his frenzy went beyond all limits. I feel as strongly as they do on my side of the question, but I hope I shall be able to speak with moderation, and without indicating that I shall regard any particular clause or any particular condition as essential to federation. I have carefully abstained from that. I think hon. members know very well how strongly I feel on certain subjects, but I will abstain from that to the end. I say we have no right, seeing the endless complexity of the provisions which may be suggested for this constitution, to lay down any condition as final, or to use what are called "carpet-bagging" threats of taking up one's carpetbag and going away. Approaching the question in that way, I was greatly impressed by the speech of the hon. member, Mr. Holder, yesterday. I felt that it was the most hopeful half-hour for federation that I had yet seen. The hon. member, Mr. Holder, is a minister in one of the less populous colonies; he is responsible to a constituency in that colony; he has held office for three or four years; and he knows the way in which his utterances and votes will be canvassed.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
He will be very much surprised to find the way in which they will be canvassed!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I have no doubt whatever that the hon. member, Mr. Holder, gauges public opinion in South Australia as correctly as the hon. member.
The Hon. F.W. Holder:

I accept the full responsibility of it!

Mr. Higgins:

As I have said, that half-hour was the most hopeful for federation that I have yet seen. There is no doubt whatever that that is the case. That speech was aided by the masterly and statesmanlike speech of the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, who I thought before, took a different view. It is quite true that there is an inconsistency between the extreme state rights view of the consent of the states being necessary, and the view taken by the hon. members, Mr. Holder and Mr. McMillan. If there is one thing that has been drummed into my ears continually, ad nauseam almost, it is that I must not be logical. Surely if that is a good lesson for me to learn, it is also a good lesson for others to learn. All I want is that if I am the goose for whom the sauce is provided, it shall also be applied to the gander. If it is inconsistent, if it is illogical, to give equal representation on the one hand, and to infringe on the principle with the other hand, still there is a via media which any reasonable man can see, and which may, and will, justify hon. members who have taken that via media. Is it not consistent for those who still are haunted by what I regard as the fallacy as to the consent of the states to say, "It is true we must give the states the right to protect themselves, to delay measures and obstruct measures which they think are unjust, until it comes to the last resort. But in the last resort, in place of the physical force which Mr. Wise puts as an alternative, let us have the peaceful operation of an appeal to the people as a whole." I regard the referendum as merely a peaceful mode of effecting the solution to which the hon. member, Mr. Wise, invites us. He says the majority of the people have the physical force, and can do what they like. That is quite true, but-

Mr. Wise:

I would like to point out that I said the majority could never be coerced, because they had the physical force. That is very different from saying they could do what they liked.

Mr. Higgins:

The hon. member said that when we came to a question of coercion the majority could not be coerced, because they have physical force. It is perfectly clear that by vetoing a measure which the majority want, you coerce the majority. I say, therefore, that those who can put a permanent veto upon legislation enact, in effect, that the existing state of things shall continue.

Mr. Wise:

The hon. member has not understood my argument!
Mr. HIGGINS:

I am very sorry, but I hope I will understand the argument hereafter when I read the report of the debate. I understand the hon. member says that owing to the physical force which the majority have, the majority cannot be coerced. I say that in place of having coercion rendered inoperative by physical force, let us have the coercion rendered inoperative by the peaceful solution of a vote by the people. I think there was a good deal in the distinction drawn by the hon. member, Mr. Holder, a distinction which in my addresses to my constituents I referred, between an alteration of the constitution and the alteration of a law which is under the constitution. He says you ought, at all events, to render absolutely essential the consent of the states to an alteration in the constitution to which they have agreed. I perfectly concede that. If men enter into a deed of partnership, they ought not to have put upon them another deed of partnership to which they have not consented. But in matters within the scope of the deed of partnership, it is only right the majority should rule. That distinction ought to be emphasised. Strong as my view is with regard to the rights of the majority of the people, I say, certainly, that if the states, and the people of the states, are coming into a deed of partnership, that deed of partnership the constitution ought not to be altered without at least the consent of a majority of the states. It is a very different thing when you are dealing with a measure which is under the deed of partnership. A great deal has been said to the effect that we must provide for deadlocks. I think that phrase hardly expresses the idea. It is not deadlocks that you must provide for; but what you must provide for is that the wishes of the people, the matured wishes of the people, after a full discussion, shall not be permanently thwarted. The thwarting of the will of the people is not always productive of a deadlock, and therefore a good many of the arguments to show that there is no danger of a deadlock do not affect me in the slightest degree. It is quite true, however, as has been said, that the differences between the two houses will not in any considerable number of cases be differences as affecting state interests. I take it that, although one is a state's house, and the other is a people's house, the differences will be on the ordinary lines, which we are familiar with in these colonies on the ordinary lines with regard to protection or free-trade, liberalism or conservatism, and so forth. I quite agree also to this, that there is much danger of a conflict, I do not say a deadlock, between the two houses having regard to the circumstances under which the two houses are elected. Both houses being elected on a very liberal franchise, each will feel itself stronger, and be more apt to resist the wish of the other, and there will be a tendency, no doubt, in the senate, as it feels itself to be a states house under the equal representation.
clause, to look more to the interests of the states as against the commonwealth. It will be a house that tends to provincialism, to all that is selfish, to all that is provincial, for in the early days of the United States they acted on the principle that a senator was bound to act in the interests of his state, was an ambassador of the state, without regard to the interests of the commonwealth. Several proposals have been made, not only for settling deadlocks, but for giving effect to the will of the people, even when there is no deadlock. The first proposal is that for a double dissolution. I have to remind hon. members that in Adelaide I proposed a double dissolution; I tabled an amendment for that purpose, and the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, asked me to postpone the clause so that it might be recommitted, but meantime my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Wise, had brought forward an amendment which provided for a dissolution of the senate after the dissolution of the house of representatives, if that house should still persist in its opposition. I was beaten on that amendment; I had only seven votes, including my own. If I may judge from appearances, there will be very many more votes given in favour of a double dissolution this time. Even my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Wise, voted against it.

Mr. WISE:
I will vote for it this time!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
So will I; I will go that far!

Mr. HIGGINS:
A double dissolution I cordially support. I think it will go a very long way towards rectifying some of the evils which will arise from this complicated system of a state's house and a people's house. I take it to be, as the hon. member, Mr. McMillan said, unfair to let one house have a means of scourging the other, and that is the means which the senate will have unless we give power to have it dissolved also, because the senate can apply the scourge to the other by saying "If you press this legislation you must go to the country." The answer under the proposed solution will be, "Well, if you oppose the legislation we will both go to the country, and see if the country sustains us." I take it that unless there be a provision for a double dissolution the house of representatives will be treated grossly unfairly. It is just as if you had two lots of men, with a rope between them, having a tug of war, and you allowed one lot to have firmly embedded rocks against which to rest their feet. In this case the senate would be strongly entrenched, would be resting against the rock of a six years' tenure without any liability to dissolution, and it is not difficult to see what the result of a tug of war of that sort would be. If you have one house with a liability to dissolution in the case of a difference, and the other house with no liability to dissolution in the case of a difference, but with a six-years' tenure, and with perhaps half of the members having still a five or six years' tenure to look forward to before they must go before the electors, there is no doubt that the power would ultimately tend to fall into the hands of the senate. For that reason, and for others, I am strongly in favour of it, but I hold that a dissolution is by no means a solution of the difficulty. First it brings into play a number of by issues as to persons and as to other matters. A man is often returned to Parliament on this consideration, "Oh, he is a good fellow on the whole, and although he differs from us on this point, we will send him in generally." Besides that, as a dissolution will send the senate to the colonies, you may have each colony backing up its senators and just leaving things as they were before. But, still, I do recognise that the mere fact of a possible dissolution impending over the head of the senate, will make them chary to some extent in withstanding the strongly expressed wish of the house of representatives and the country. Now, I will approach the next matter. It is said then, after a dissolution of both houses let us have a referendum. In the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, I was one of the joint authors of a bill for a referendum. I need hardly say that I am strongly in favour of the principle. I am not frightened by that cant about mechanical contrivances. I am not frightened by that cant with regard to its enabling members to shirk their responsibility. Every governmental contrivance, even electing a parliament of any sort, allowing the issue to go by votes in the parliament, is a "mechanical contrivance," one of those cant phrases we have heard used by ministers this morning. As to the shirking of responsibility, there is nothing in that idea. You cannot have a referendum unless there has been a vote in parliament on the subject, and as all reasonable referendums are proposed, you must have a vote first in one session and then in another session after a sufficient interval, and the thing will be fully discussed in the press, and members will have taken sides. Although I am strongly in favour of a referendum, I shall certainly, without the least hesitation, vote against the referendum which is called the double referendum.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

Hear, hear!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I have the applause of the Premier of Tasmania. I am very happy to find myself in his company. I do not care who votes for it or who votes against it, I am not going to vote for a thing called "the referendum", which I know will be a sham, which I see to be a fraud, a delusion, and a snare; a thing which is not the referendum but which will have the effect of a device to lead people to think that they are protected by a referendum when they are not protected. I do not expect in this matter to elicit any marks of approval from any side of the Chamber, and I do not court them. But, at the same time, I feel at liberty to say that I will not be a party to any proposal which you may dub a referendum, but which will not have the effect of a referendum. I voted in Adelaide in favour of the referendum to the states and to the people simply because I saw that there was no movement towards a conciliatory method, and that this thing would not be carried, and also that we had not full time to go into the details of it. But I certainly would much rather see this constitution go before the people without anything of the nature of a referendum than have it go before the people with a falsehood upon its face. May I indicate how the figures will work out? Supposing we got two states strongly in favour of a measure, and the other states pretty evenly balanced, but still against the measure upon the total voting. Here is a sample of how it might work. Suppose New South Wales had 110,000 for and 10,000 against; Victoria had 100,000 for and 10,000 against; South Australia, 14,000 for and 15,000 against; Tasmania, 6,000 for and 7,000 against, and Western Australia, 6,000 for and 7,000 against. The result would be that you would have 236,000 votes for the measure and 49,000 votes against. But that measure could not be carried, although the voting was in the proportion of about five to one. Not only that, but supposing in South Australia there was a small reversal of the position, and supposing the figures there were 15,000 for and 14,000 against. In that case you would have 237,000 for and 48,000 against. Even then, according to the proposal of the treble referendum-I might call it a demi-referendum-you would not have it carried, because you would have, perhaps, seventy-six electoral districts, and it might turn out that only thirty-seven went for the measure and thirty-nine against it.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
That is not my proposal!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I remember that, in the Victorian House, my hon. friend intimated that he cordially agreed with the amendment. It was proposed by Mr. Baker, and the hon. member at once said very frankly that he agreed with it, and that it would get over some difficulties.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Our Chamber objected to even the dual referendum!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Some wanted a national referendum!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think it will save some time if I proceed upon the assump-

...tion that this idea of the electoral districts is abandoned. Is it abandoned or is it not?
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
It is so as far as I am concerned!

Mr. HIGGINS:
It has come down again to a dual referendum, and we might very possibly have voting throughout the commonwealth, in which there would be 236,000 votes for and 49,000 votes against, and, still the measure would not be carried. What is the alternative? The hon. member, Mr. Wise, says physical force. I do, not want physical force. I want the will of the people to ultimately rule on all Australian subjects. There is one mode of solution which was suggested on a former occasion, and I am surprised there has not been more said about it in this meeting of the Convention. I refer to the idea of a joint sitting of the two houses. Of course, it will be obvious that that will cause far less expense; but, so far as I am concerned, I am strongly against a joint sitting of the two houses, if those two houses are not equally representative of the people. If my proposal for proportional representation had been carried, and if we had two houses upon the same basis, there would be a strong ground for saying, "If those two houses representing the people cannot agree, put them together, and see which has the most votes." Unfortunately, to my mind, we are not putting the senate upon the same strong basis as we are putting the house of representatives. We are not giving them the same strength of character, because we say the senate will represent in the main, and must represent, a minority of the people. I feel that there is a great deal to be said for that proposal. Still I confess I would much rather see something of that kind than see this sham referendum to which I have referred. I am very glad also to find that the Premier of New South Wales has dragged the Convention back to what is really not sufficiently attended to in this discussion. He has dragged the Convention back to a consideration of the subjects to be given to this proposed parliament. He has shown what the subjects are, and although the practical outcome is very hard to ascertain, I must say that the position he has taken up is perfectly correct. He says, "If there is any subject in clause 52 which ought not to be given to the federal parliament let us know what it is, and take it out, and do not let a majority in the commonwealth rule about it."
Unfortunately, I think the Premier of New South Wales qualified that position. He has simply informed us that we could have a, referendum on all national subjects and not upon state subjects, and he has left it to us to find out what are state and what are national subjects. Why, that is the whole difficulty of the problem. How are we, in clause 52, to find what are state and what are national subjects? I say that it is quite possible to limit clause 52 so as to show that there are certain subjects in that clause which might, even from the point of view of the smaller states, be left to the referendum in the final resort. For instance, marriage and divorce. What obstruction in the world should there be to a national referendum in that case?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Can the hon. member perceive any necessity for a referendum on that matter?

The Hon. A.J. PEACOCK:

That would be very hard on me and Sir William Zeal!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I can perceive this: that it is one of the most difficult social questions of the present day. Why should Mr. Peacock object to having such a matter referred to the people of the whole of Australia? In what way does the hon. member suppose that his interests would be prejudicially affected? Would he not be prepared, as a Benedict of the future, to trust to the people of the whole of Australia? I think the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, has this morning put me in the position of the junior counsel to the senior counsel. The senior counsel opened the case to the jury splendidly. He told them a magnificent story and their passions were thoroughly aroused. Their feeling as to the case was very intense. The junior counsel, having his brief, listened with breathless attention to the splendid opening, and when it was over, noticing his senior leaving the court, he pulled his gown and said, "How am I to prove that case which you opened?" The senior was there to put the case before the jury, and the junior was there to prove it. Now my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, told us in very eloquent words, "The whole difficulty is solved; you have only to distinguish between state rights and national rights." But my senior counsel does not help me very much when he says that. Who is to make the distinction between national rights and state rights? But although we had not the assistance of the hon. gentleman's acute mind in distinguishing national from state subjects in clause 52, still he indicated in his masterly speech the direction in which we can go if we take sufficient pains, and if we pursue the subject with the same diligence with which the special Finance Committee has been pursuing its labours during the last few days. I take it that it is quite possible for us to arrive at a compromise upon this 52nd clause that it is quite possible for us to say, "Here are certain subjects, and as to those there can be no referendum." It may be possible also to insert some qualifications with reference to one or two other subjects; and, as I do not wish to commit myself to any particular position, I merely want to indicate the direction in which, perhaps, there may be some solution acceptable to us with our divers modes of looking at the matter. I recognise that, although to my mind the fallacy of the scheme which has been put before us is as apparent as the sun at noonday, my hon. friends who differ from me are acting with a view to the best interests of the commonwealth quite as much as I am. They are, I am sure, quite as much interested in its good as I am, and whether they call me provincial or whether they call me anti-federationist, I claim from them the recognition that I am equally desirous with anyone in Australia for the union of these peoples under a workable constitution.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales)[3.49]:

It is with considerable diffidence that I rise to say a few words on the present occasion; but in this matter I am in the unfortunate position, as far as I can see, of being alone among the delegation from the colony I have the honor to represent. It seems to me that we are not confined to the referendum in the settlement of disputes between the two houses, and I was very glad to hear my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Higgins, say that he would like to hear the Norwegian system discussed, or some application or modification of that system. Although we might not have a full meeting together of the two houses we might have a certain representation from each house meeting together. Supposing, for instance, you have three-fourths of the senate. If there are six colonies there would be 36 members in the senate, and three-fourths would be 27. I would also have the house of representatives elect 27 of its members, making 54 members from both houses. Let these representatives meet together and discuss the subject in dispute. There surely must be some means of effecting a settlement in the case of differences between the two houses. It afforded me great pleasure to hear my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, speak in the admirable manner in which he did last night. The right hon. gentleman spoke in a most conciliatory and satisfactory manner to the representatives of the less populous states. He alluded to several of the safety-valves which already exist for the adjustment of differences which may arise between the two houses. My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Barton, also referred to the same phase of the matter. It seems to me that as one half of the senate retires every three years, there is an opportunity by that means of effecting a settlement of differences between the houses. There is in that provision what may be called a natural safety-valve. Upon this subject of safety-valves, I would take the liberty of reading a short extract from an excellent work in the hands of many members of this Convention. I refer to Mr. Garran's work on "The Coming Commonwealth." He says:

It must be remembered, too, that equal representation in one chamber is balanced by proportional representation in the other. It is in no sense true that the few have equal power with the many. The simple truth is that all federal legislation needs the consent of a majority of the people and also a majority of the states. A majority in the senate may conceivably represent a minority of citizens, but such a majority can never compel legislation it can only prevent legislation; and the legislation which it is likely to prevent is precisely that which in federation ought to be prevented, legislation, that is to say, which is offensive to the majority of the states. Fears of a deadlock may, of course, be conjured up, but deadlocks exist rather in theory than in practice. The possibility of deadlock is inherent in every constitutional government under the sun. The safety is found in the reasonable spirit of those who work the constitution.

He also remarks with regard to the use of the referendum as a cure for deadlocks:

This use of the referendum as an arbiter between the chambers is altogether new. We have not yet adopted it in provincial politics, and a federal constitution which is notoriously hard to alter is not the place for experiments. The referendum cure for deadlocks promises well, but it ought to be tried on a provincial scale before it is deemed worthy to rank as a federal institution. No one can foretell how a new political invention will work; and, though experiments must be made, they should not be made, in the first instance, on too large a scale.

It occurs to me that you have always the amendment of the constitution as a safety-valve.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The hon. member just said it was so difficult to amend the constitution!

Mr. WALKER:

I should think a clause might be devised which would make it not very difficult to do so in certain circumstances. I think that if you are to have a safety-valve which is not at present in the bill it might take the form of a dissolution of both chambers. I think that, as the house of representatives has to be dissolved under certain circumstances, "what is sauce for the goose ought to be sauce for the gander," and that under certain circumstances the senate also ought to be dissolved. That is a wholly different thing from the referendum; in the way of which there are difficulties. The double referendum seems to me to involve exactly the same difficulties. I am surprised that our friends from Tasmania have not on this p

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Three-sevenths, consisting of a majority of senators in a majority of states!

Mr. WALKER:

Well, strike out that part if you like. I do not object to that being done, though I think the smaller colonies might. It seems to me that that is one means of settling a deadlock. I should like to know if any hon. gentleman can inform me whether there is a constitution in which a settlement of deadlocks is provided for?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

That argument will stand against all reform!

Mr. WALKER:

I will read a few extracts from an address delivered by a gentleman who is highly respected and honored by all of us the hon. member, Mr. McMillan in which he refers to this very important matter of the referendum. He says:

What is a bi-cameral government? A bi-cameral government, after all, is an artificial system not to prove the sovereignty of the people, but to obtain the best results. Government is a practical thing. Legislation is a practical thing. You would not go and take the first 125 men of 21 years of age, electors of this country, out of the streets at random, and say, because they are of age and are electors of this country, they are fit to sit here and make the laws for the people of the country. The great bulk of the people in this country know nothing about legislation.

The hon. gentleman also says:

I want, in a practical way, to point out to hon. members some of the dangers of this bill, and the danger of introducing a purely artificial mode of procedure, instead of the higher, better, and nobler system of compromise and concession.

I ask hon. members to look at the condition of this country. Let us contrast it for a moment with the home of the referendum.

Where is the home of the referendum? Switzerland, I suppose.

In Switzerland, as in most Continental countries, you have communities who have grown up from generation to generation. They can trace their ancestors back for hundreds of years. There is little comparative movement in such communities. But what is the distinguishing characteristic of our people?-their nomadic habits. I understand that between 40,000 and 50,000 people who voted in the election of 1894 were disfranchised in the election of 1895 because they had changed their residence. Wherever there is a gold fever in another colony a great number of our people are drawn there. We are a community of change, as are most communities of Britishers who have left their own homes. Suppose a measure is sent to the people at some time when there is no general election in progress, will those who live in sparsely populated districts take the trouble to record their votes? I say that they will not, and the result will be to give a very unfair monopoly in regard to the referendum to the people residing within the metropolitan areas. It may be agreed that measures should only be sent to the people at the time of a general election; but I am perfectly convinced that if it comes to a deadlock between the two houses, unless some other expedient than this is proposed, the expedient which is now ready at hand of waiting for a general election, and then reintroducing the bill is far more sensible, more largely based upon our own experience, and more likely to bring about moderate and useful legislation.

With regard to the referendum, it appears to me that it is very much like referring from the more intelligent to the less intelligent. I do not wish to disparage the average elector, but, as a matter of fact, the electors are supposed to choose the more intelligent men to represent them in parliament.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Are they not supposed to express their views on a particular question, too?

Mr. WALKER:

But the members' views and theirs will be in consonance to a certain extent I suppose. It seems to me that this system of referendum, if carried out in its entirety, would reduce representatives to the position of mere delegates, to voice the views of those people who send them into parliament.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

They have to give pledges at the present time!

Mr. WALKER:

It seems to me that on some people the mention of the word "referendum" has the same effect as that fine old word "Mesopotamia" had on the Scotch lady who came home from church, and was asked what she had heard. She said that she had heard "that blessed word, Mesopotamia." It seems to me that with some people if anything is called "referendum" that is all they want. We have no guarantee that there is any great cry for a referendum. I have not heard of any petitions to this Convention in favour of it. We have had petitions on another matter both in this Convention and at Adelaide. The petitions at Adelaide did not seem to have much effect, and perhaps that has discouraged the people who want the referendum. I can only say that they do not show as much desire to obtain it, as hon. members seem to think they have.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Three parliaments have asked for it!

Mr. HIGGINS:
Not this referendum!

Mr. WALKER:
Several gentlemen, after the result of the Convention election in this colony, told me that the referendum had not somehow or other resulted as was anticipated by some, and that therefore the desire for the referendum was considerably moderated. I think that if a whole colony is treated as one constituency, you ought, if possible, to have a representation of minorities. In the United Kingdom there is not equal representation on a population basis. I remember, not many years ago, when Ireland had 105 members and Scotland only 53; but matters went on peaceably enough in those days. It was before Home Rule.

Mr. GLYNN:
They have not got Home Rule yet!

Mr. WALKER:
I mean before the Home Rule cry. I hope that there will be an adjournment of this Convention to allow Queensland to come in, and also to let our Victorian friends have sufficient time to consider the financial and other questions, and when this question comes before us again we shall have more information, and will no doubt be able to vote upon it. I voted against the referendum at Adelaide. It seems to me that a great deal may be said in favour of a double dissolution, but for anything beyond that I do not see any absolute necessity. At the same time, I reserve to myself the full right to vote as I think proper when the time comes, and if I find that it is necessary to give a vote to prevent three colonies from leaving us, I will certainly vote in that way. On the other hand, if hon. members will be content to take the dual referendum, I do not see any great harm in it. It seems to me it is very much like the same thing over again. Both houses will virtually go before their constituents, and will come back again. I think that with reasonable courtesy, to one another any difficulties that might arise ought to be settled without any of those artificial and mechanical means. If I understand the spirit of British parliamentary life, the principle has always been not to send particular questions to the country; but to send parliament itself, and when the members come back they have the latest views of their constituents.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)

At this late stage of the debate for any one to get up and attempt to say anything new on the subject would be to fall into the error of the ladies in the "Vicar of Wakefield," who "simply continued the conversation, but not the argument." However, the matter is an important one, and I will endeavour, in the few moments that I shall occupy, to state my opposition to the referendum as a general policy or from the point of view of consolidation, and at the same time to say that, for the purpose of furthering the federal question, I am prepared to subordinate my personal convictions against the referendum as a policy, and thus, following the example of so many other members of this Convention, display, perhaps, some federal spirit.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Would the hon. gentleman say that the double referendum is perfectly harmless?

Mr. GLYNN:

I would not say that. Sometimes it may be productive of a considerable amount of good; but a referendum in some respects will do harm, as I shall endeavour to show. I do not share the fears which have been emphatically expressed by some representatives of the smaller colonies, that if we went so far as some of the representatives of the larger colonies would go, and adopted a mass referendum, we should be striking at and in practice destroy the very essential character of the upper house by making it a unified rather than a federal one; in fact, would be giving the principle of equal representation on the one hand, and destroying its efficacy on the other. I do not share that fear in its intensity, and I may state at the outset one of the reasons why I do not. The combinations that are possible on any state question are not combinations of states. You will not find on the one side a combination of the large states against the small states. When a state question arises, the chances are that you may find one state largely interested in it, a small state, and perhaps the opinions of the representatives of the small state will be shared by the representatives of the large states. So that I fail to see that any state question can arise that is likely to differentiate the states as large and small in the federation. If that is so, the power of the larger states will not be used so as to destroy the so-called liberties of the smaller ones. I say this because I am afraid that, by leaning too much on these generalities, we shall imperil the success of the constitution. If we feed the people with prejudices on this point, tell them that if one particular form of settling possible constitutional difficulties in the parliament is not adopted, or another form is not adopted, the chances are that some of their liberties will be imperilled by the encroachments of the other states we shall do no good. I do not share any fear of that kind. I will go the length of saying that if federation were carried with a referendum which amounted to a mass referendum, the good sense of the people would, on the whole, make the constitution work properly. At the same time, we are dealing with men with strong and national prejudices. We are dealing with states that have been agitated by proposals, even during the last few years, in reference to this very question of the referendum, that necessitate our taking into account the very strong prejudices that exist. It was said in an exceedingly able and eloquent speech by my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, this morning and it shows the effect which a speech of eloquence and ability may sometimes have in diverting attention from the true issue before us that unless you adopt this mass referendum, at the very outset, of your federation you may find yourself in a deadlock you may be financially blocked. We are told, for instance, that possibly within the two years during which the tariff is to be passed and upon that point I agree with the sense of the interjection by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, that the word "shall" may not be restrictive to the two years; because you have to read the whole text of the constitution to understand what it means we were told, I say, by the Right Hon. Mr. Reid, that unless you make provision at once for deadlocks, you may find that your constitution will exist without the power on your part to accomplish the very first purpose for which it has been passed a uniform tariff. The plain answer to that is this: We are not going to create a a piece of political machinery in order to get over a difficulty that can be wiped off at once by a stroke of the pen. If you want to get rid of the possibility of the tariff not being passed, the true solution is not to create a remedy against deadlocks but to strike out the provision that the tariff must be passed within two years. Again, the hon. and learned member made a very ad captandum appeal to the passions rather than to the reason of his audience by pointing out the enormous advance which has been made in the expression of the popular voice in the last sixty-five years. I quite agree with him that the prognostications made in 1831, that if reform was granted the pillars of the constitution would be broken down, have been falsified utterly by the event. We all agree with him also that the voice of the people must prevail. But what we do not agree with the hon. gentleman in is this: that you can always get the educated or efficacious opinion of the people by a referendum. It is one thing to say that the will of the people must prevail; but it is another thing to say that you can get a body of people who are not experts to point out the true lines of social development.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Mr. GLYNN:

Undoubtedly they are. Why do we have parliamentary institutions at all? Men in the ordinary course of life have not time to study political questions. Are we not told time after time by writers that one of the most difficult things a man can take up is the question of politics? It is a task upon which we all enter with very light hearts, no doubt; but to bring together and reconcile upon some fair basis the conflicting interests and classes of society is one of the biggest tasks to which any man can set himself. Upon that point I have only to say that Buckle, after so splendidly dealing with this subject in that great work of his on "Civilisation," says that the greatest difficulty is to find the method of legislation, and not the desire of the people. The appeal we had from the Right Hon. Mr. Reid simply amounted to this: The opinion of the people ought to prevail; but I answer him by saying that the people must have an opinion before they should be asked to express it. The people must be in a position to form an opinion upon the details of a particular act of parliament before it becomes expedient to refer that act of parliament to them for their yea or nay. Look through the whole of the thirty-seven matters for federal legislation. Suppose the tariff turns up, and suppose there is a deadlock upon that point. You would have on the one side protectionists arguing the facts, giving statistics and analogies drawn from history, and indulging in sweeping generalisations as to the evils of free-trade; and you would have on the other side gentlemen equally emphatic in pointing out the evils of protection, each party claiming to be specialists as to the method of accomplishing social reform. We refer this contested question to people who have not had time to study the subject, and we ask them upon an abstract matter of politics and the details of an act of parliament to say what ought to be done. The people have adopted the wiser method of choosing men who can pay attention to the work, and become experts to settle these questions, and we ought not to cast upon them a task which they cannot accomplish in the way it ought to be accomplished.
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
But suppose the experts cannot agree!

Mr. GLYNN:
Should we ask the people to settle it before they have all the facts before them? Should we ask them to study the details of an act of parliament, and to say whether one house or the other is right as to a matter of public policy? That is really what we are doing, and it strikes at the very root of the adoption of the referendum, viewing it from the point of view of consolidation. We hear it said that the will of the people will be frustrated unless we introduce some measure to get rid of dead-locks. Is not that an assumption that the popular house will always be right in its judgment, and the senator always wrong?

[P.694] starts here

It is a curious fact that in four out of five cases of the application of the referendum in America the action of Parliament had been negatived. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, has kindly put before the Convention some of the results of referring constitutional amendments to the people in California in 1892. I presume that these are cases in which the voice of the Parliament that is, the voice of the representative body, rather than the voice of the Upper House-

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The voice of both!

Mr. GLYNN:
Yes, no doubt; but, as a matter of fact, we know that in America, as in England, the moving power in legislation comes from below and the blocking power from above. However, I will put it in any way you like to put it. Here we had questions referred to the people for their opinion, and what did they do? Instead of adopting the suggestions of Parliament they negatived them, in the one case by a majority of four to one, in another by a majority of three to one, in a third by a majority of three to one, and in a fourth by a substantial majority. So that, in four cases out of five put before us by the hon. and learned member, we find the voice of the people opposed to the wishes of Parliament.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
No; the voting was a decision of the dispute between the two houses!

Mr. GLYNN:
The people were called in to act as arbiters. These policies would not be brought before parliament if it were not that parliament desired them to be brought into operation. Parliament desired that these constitutional amendments should be made, but the popular voice was asked for, and in four cases out of five it was given in substantial opposition to the voice of parliament. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, referred to Switzerland. Before I deal with the details of the voting in Switzerland, I would point out that we cannot rely much upon Switzerland as an example. It was only this century that Switzerland adopted representative institutions for the cantons, which were established on the principle of having only one chamber. They practically set up representative government there on the principle of an oligarchy, without understanding very much about it. They were therefore of necessity driven back to the adoption of the referendum to check the autocracy of the single houses. In 1874 however, they saw the desirability of establishing a federal constitution, and the reasons which had operated with them at the beginning, and the cantonal precedents, induced them to adopt the referendum again after a very hot debate. Therefore, we cannot rely upon Switzerland to furnish an example, either from the point of view of historical analogy, or of expediency. Now, let us consider how the Swiss system has worked out. I refer to this matter because the representatives of the larger states have put their reliance upon the fact that the will of the people is the will of the larger house, and that deadlocks will occur through the blocking from above. That is about the end of their arguments on the point. I think it would be idle to imagine for a moment that there is any fear of legislation, initiated by the senate, being blocked by the house of representatives, and of this necessitating the provision of machinery against deadlocks. What has occurred in Switzerland? I find that in the majority of cases in Switzerland, proposals, suposed by the representatives of the people to be the expression of the popular voice, have been negatived by the people. Between 1882 and 1885 every measure introduced into the Swiss Parliament, and referred to the people, was negatived by them. It is stated by Mr. Lowell, in his work upon government and parties in continental Europe, that:

During the first three years after the adoption of the present constitution five laws were rejected and only two accepted. Then there came a quiet period of five years, in which no measure passed by the Assembly was condemned by the people, and, in fact, a popular vote on an ordinary statute was asked for only once. The calm was followed in 1882 by a storm of discontent, for the people had become so thoroughly out of sympathy with the radical tendencies of their representatives, and were so disgusted at the conduct of the party in power, that for three years they rejected every measure presented to them. Here we are asking for the adoption of a provision to give expression to the popular voice as represented by the house of representatives.

Their ill-will culminated in May, 1884, when they voted down four laws at a single stroke; but with this explosion the popular irritation seems to have exhausted itself, and, perhaps, we may add the legislators learned to be more cautious. Another period of quiet began, and during the next seven years the people again ratified everything. In 1891 the spell was broken, and out of five measures submitted to popular vote, two were voted down by large majorities. This was, indeed, the precursor of a third era of rejections, for during the last three years the popular vote has been negatived in almost every case.

So that, viewing the matter from a unitarian point of view, you are more likely to get the true expression of the people's will by leaving matters alone, and letting the upper house speak in the way of delay, than by adopting any expedient to precipitate legislation. That is justified by statistics as to the operation of the referendum in Switzerland. My remarks, however, apply to any referendum. I accept the solution offered by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs. By doing so, however, I am sacrificing very deep-rooted convictions in regard to the policy of adopting any referendum. If I had my will, I should leave the adoption of the referendum for future legislation. I would make this one of the matters which might be legislated upon by the federal parliament, even though in doing so, I am going a great way further than any of my colleagues, except, perhaps, the hon. member, Mr. Holder, would go, because this step would allow the federal parliament to adopt the principle of the mass referendum. Why should we not leave these matters to the federal parliament? Why should we anticipate the probability of deadlocks by creating machinery to prevent them?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

How would you do if one house wanted to pass a law providing for the referendum, and the other would not hear of it?

Mr. GLYNN:

No doubt the hon. member's interjection is very pregnant. But there is no use in sticking to one rule for the passing of all amendments. I would provide that in the clashing of two houses you should offer greater facilities for the amendment of the constitution than exist in the bill as drafted. The hon. member has quoted from the Constitution of Switzerland, where we find that, if a certain proposal for legislation is made by one house and obstructed by the other, you can put it to the people without referring it to the other house at all.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The people and the states!
Mr. GLYNN:
I will go further and say: If you propose an amendment to the constitution which will enable an amendment to be carried providing for future deadlocks without in the final resort even the consent of one house I will adopt that suggestion.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
What would the hon. and learned member provide for?

Mr. GLYNN:
I am merely speaking generally. I do not want to bind myself down to details, because these are matters which have only arisen during the debate. I would allow facilities for the amendment of the constitution with a view to making provision against deadlocks. In that case, I would provide that the measure should be carried into law without reference to the majority senate at all.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Would that be after a mass vote by the people?

Mr. GLYNN:
Yes, a mass vote; but it must be borne in mind that I am only dealing with a provision that would give some means of getting rid of a deadlock by legislation.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Would you allow the house of representatives, supported by a mass vote of the people, to pass a measure into law without the consent of the senate?

Mr. GLYNN:
Yes; I would as a last resort allow one house to make any provision it liked with regard to deadlocks under the conditions I have mentioned.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That is further than we propose to go!

Mr. GLYNN:
I would be inclined to go that length myself, believing the emergency would never arise.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is going farther than the Victorian members wish to go!

Mr. GLYNN:
I am prepared to trust the good sense of the people. That is when the hon. member is right!

Mr. GLYNN:
I would not say that. I have a great respect for the hon. member's acumen and ability; but when we are dealing with the destinies of the country, I think, sacrificing the credit of a smart repartee, such remarks might be dispensed with. I therefore will not be tempted. I am glad the hon. member has given me the strength of his support. I have made this suggestion for the consideration of the Convention. I can see no danger in allowing an amendment of the constitution, making provision for deadlocks, even though you have to dispense with the voice of one house.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Who is to say what the provision is to be?

Mr. GLYNN:

The house which introduces it. The house passes a measure and sends it to the second chamber, and they say, "No, we will not pass it." If a deadlock occurs, you can make provision for avoiding that deadlock, but only for the deadlock arising in connection with that measure. The object of other proposals making provision for avoiding, deadlocks is to fix the provisions in the constitution. I would leave it to the federal parliament to make provision for deadlocks rather than tempt a clashing of the houses by making provision for deadlocks in anticipation. I am simply giving a general indication of the liberality with which I would deal with the question of amendment. I shall not detain the Convention any longer upon this question. I believe that the referendum as a matter of general policy is a step in the wrong direction. At the same time, I know there is a strong and deeply-rooted conviction among some people as to the necessity of a provision against deadlocks being embodied in this constitution. I know that during the last two years in Australia we have had five attempts to introduce the referendum into our constitutions. Victoria actually went the length, on the recommendation of a commission, of introducing a bill that would on the reference of a matter to the people dispense with the necessity for a second house. So that I cannot be so far wrong in the suggestion I throw out when in Victoria it was proposed that after a referendum had taken place you could legislate by declaring that one particular house, the legislative assembly, with the consent of the people and without mentioning, the upper house at all, had resolved that any particular measure should become law. Again, in Tasmania, New Zealand, South Australia, and, I think, in one of the other colonies, within the last two years attempts have been made to embody the referendum in the constitutions. It is evident, therefore, that there are strongly-rooted prejudices in favour of the referendum, and those prejudices I intend to respect.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It is rather hard to call them prejudices!

[P.697] starts here
Mr. GLYNN:

Of course the hon. member will excuse me for saying that as I argue against the referendum altogether, I would say that this is nothing but a concession. As there is a strongly expressed opinion in favour of the referendum throughout the colonies, I respect that prejudice, and believing that we must make some concession to that strongly expressed opinion, I believe the best mode was that suggested by Victoria, but I would like to make a separation, if possible, between matters which are of a unitarian character, and those which are state questions. That you cannot do it by the method suggested by the Right Hon. G.H. Reid goes without saying. You cannot fix in the constitution beforehand what are and what are not state matters. If the tariff question comes up you cannot make provision in the constitution for the case of one colony, which may say that the tariff will be disastrous to it.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

You do not give the larger colonies a chance of saying that the tariff will be disastrous to us. Why should that be given to the smaller states?

Mr. GLYNN:

I am quite willing that the fallacy of the hon. member's argument should be extended to both the large and the small states. Whether they affect the large or small states, we cannot define in the constitution the nature of the questions that will arise; but you might, as suggested to me by the President of the Convention in private, allow a minority in the parliament or senate to declare that if in any matter of legislation state interests were affected, that question could be separated from ordinary legislation and the dual referendum could be applied to it. That is a suggested addition to the Victorian proposal for dealing with deadlocks. I think the smaller states might very well accept such a proposal. I do not see that it could do any harm to their interests, and it would certainly be a concession to the demands of the larger states.

The Hon. H.W. VENN (Western Australia)[4.33]:

Those who have not addressed the Convention up to the present time have enjoyed a great advantage in listening to the speeches which have been already made. It is not now necessary to weary the House by a recapitulation of the arguments contained in the many great speeches we have listened to. We have now come to the point at which we must give a decision on the important question which will be put from the Chair in a few minutes. That question is: is it or is it not desirable to manufacture some means of providing against deadlocks? I myself, I hope in conjunction with many others, believe that it is not at all desirable to provide a medicine for a disease that we never expect to suffer from. I am too firmly convinced of the ability, wisdom, and education of the future senate and house of representatives of the federal parliament to believe that a deadlock will ever affect Australia prejudicially. The opinions expressed by some of the ablest members of the Convention in this debate are thoroughly in accord with my convictions on that subject. The hon. member, Mr. McMillans, speech must have carried conviction to the minds of every hon. member who listened to him. Without desiring to give a silent vote on this question I will content myself by saying that I will be found in the ranks of those who think it is undesirable to import an element of this kind into our constitution.

I would not rise to address the Convention a second time on the same subject did I not feel that the occasion is so grave that our maturest consideration might well be given to the matter which is before us. When my hon. and learned friend, Mr. O'Connor, sat down yesterday with the word "unification" practically on his lips, I felt warmly. I rose immediately, and spoke strongly, perhaps more strongly than on maturer deliberation I would have wished to do. At the same time I spoke, being unable to divest myself altogether of the character in which I came here, bound to do my duty to the commonwealth at large, but sent here by the voice of the electors of one of the smaller states. When the word "unification" was employed, I applied it not unnaturally to some questions affecting the states as opposed to the nation, affecting the state from which I come, say such a question as the Murray waters, in which I think our state interests are of such a character that it would be highly undesirable that there should be any power in the federation to legislate on them finally, unless there was a consensus of opinion between a majority of the nation, and a majority of the states. I spoke from that point of view, and I felt that I was entitled to resent the suggestion that, in a matter in which the state interests were so vitally concerned, the state individuality should be practically exposed to the risk of extinction by the voice of the nation without due consultation with the states. I hold, however, that we should approach a question of this sort from every point of view, and, if we are bound to disagree with the expressions which are used by any other member of the Convention, we should endeavour, as far as we possibly can, to put ourselves in his place, and for the purpose of securing a solution that is fair to all, to picture to ourselves what our feelings would be were we circumstanced as he is. Under these circumstances, I asked myself what would be the position which, as a representative of a larger state, I would be inclined to adopt when it was proposed that, in a matter in which we were not concerned as states, in a matter of purely national importance, a provision was to be adopted by which a combination of the smaller states, representing only a small section of the community, might for a considerable period prevent effect being given to what undoubtedly was the national will. Under such circumstances, the resentment to which I tried to give expression yesterday, and which was natural under the circumstances, would be as nothing to the resentment to which I might properly give expression as a representative of the larger state when national interests were subordinated to provincial notions by a combination of that character, and in which state rights, as a matter of fact, were not really concerned. Now, sir, is there any way out of this difficulty? I think there is. I think that, whilst there are questions to which we may properly apply the term, "state interests," in which the states have a right, I will not say to a predominating voice, but to such a voice as will prevent them from being finally dealt with, unless there is the consent of a majority of the representatives of those states; still, on the other hand, there are questions to which no such term can be properly applied, Which, are national questions, and with which the states have no right to interfere practically as states-certainly not for any considerable period to subordinate the well expressed will of the nation to their own independent view, and when they have no independent interest in the matter. How then is it possible to differentiate between these two different classes of cases?

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

It is impossible!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I do not think you can do it within the four corners of the bill.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

Certainly not!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I do not think you can do it by picking out from the constitution various provisions, and saying, "This may affect state rights that will have no such effect." It seems to me that whether or not a question affects state rights is capable of determination at the time that question arises, when those who are called upon to decide it have before them all the circumstances which may affect the interests of the nation or the provinces. I am adopting, to some extent, a suggestion which has been made by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs. I put it to hon. members: Can we not hit on some middle course in connection with this matter? Representatives of the smaller states on one side, and representatives of the larger states on the other all representatives of the nation that is to be; is not there any possibility of making an arrangement which will conserve the rights of the provinces, and, at the same time, have due regard for the interests of the nation? I think it can be done. To put it within the four corners of the constitution by specifying the powers will be impossible. There seems to be a consensus of opinion as regards the propriety of the double dissolution, and no doubt that will be carried. But suppose that that does not remove the difficulty, does not, as it were, sweep away the deadlock, what are you to do? The referendum is suggested. To whom should the referendum be applied? Some say, "Refer the question to the nation"; while others say, "Provide for a dual referendum," a referendum in which double majorities are required of the nation and of the state. I suggest that it should be to the nation as a mass, unless you have good ground for believing that state interests are concerned in the matter, and then that it is a question which, for its solution, will require a consensus of opinion between majorities of the people and majorities of the states. How are you going to decide? I suggest this way, and I am prepared to take this course, having every reliance on the responsibility under which a vote of this kind can be given. You cannot let the majority of the senate decide, because the supposition is that they are in opposition to the will of the house of representatives. They may decide-I am putting a hypothetical case on provincial grounds. You cannot take a majority of the house of representatives, because they being in opposition to the senate, would be supposed to decide on national grounds. But provide for taking the referendum by the people, unless by an expression of opinion from a section a representative minority of the house of representatives-it is declared that state rights are involved, and a poll of the states is demanded.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Then you sacrifice the people to the representatives?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I sacrifice the people to their representatives, how? The position is this: There is a possibility of the dual referendum, subordinating, it seems to me, the interests of the nation to a combination of the states. Let us, a minority of the people, provide, therefore, that that shall not be the general rule, but at the same time let us take care to conserve the interests of the state, and if there is any real reason in favour of the question being treated as a state question, in which state rights are concerned, send it on to a dual referendum, and do not act unless you get a double majority. What I would put by way of suggestion for the acceptance of the Convention is: that if, say, one-third, I am not wedded to any particular proportion of the house of representatives declare
The Hon. E. BARTON:

Would not a clearer way of putting it be for a majority of two-thirds to declare that state interests are not involved.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

That is a matter of the most absolute detail; it is the same principle. Members of the Convention will see this: that the result will be that when practically there is an overwhelming majority in the house of representatives in favour of the matter being treated as a national question, it will be so treated; but still, at the same time, the interests of the smaller states will be covered by a provision of the character to which I refer, and which will enable them, although in a position of being only one-half of the majority which is against them on the question as long as there is a substantial representation that the matter is a state question, to have all the protection they can possibly desire by means of the dual referendum. I have risen for the purpose of making this suggestion. It is not a new matter. I dealt with the question in 1891, when I submitted that the operations of the senate, called into existence for the purpose of protecting state rights, should, as far as possible, be limited as regards practical interference to cases when those rights are concerned. I have since been embarrassed by the difficulty of securing anything in the shape of a definition which will mark the line of demarcation between state questions and national questions. I make the suggestion I have made in the hope that it may be of some little assistance in the solution of the question.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Not the slightest!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I am very sorry, indeed.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

That is my opinion!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I am sorry, indeed, it does not meet with the approval of my hon. colleague. I think the principle is generally recognised that in national questions the vote of the nation shall prevail. In state concern there should be a double majority before definite action is taken, and it is for the purpose of assisting, if possible, in securing some effective mode of giving effect to principles which, at least, will recommend themselves to the Convention—very difficult of accomplishment—that I have made these remarks.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[4.51]:

I only rise to re-echo the sentiment which has just been expressed, that it is the duty of everyone of us to lend what assistance we can to the solution of this very difficult and intricate problem—a problem not only difficult and intricate, but one the wise solution of which involves so much in connection with the great cause we are here to promote. As at present advised, it seems to me that the contribution we have just heard rather adds to the existing obscurity than tends to dissipate it. It is absolutely bewildering to introduce at this particular stage another referendum. We have been dealing with two or three modes of solving the problem of deadlocks, but we are now to have introduced into the constitution two kinds of referendum. We shall never know what sort of referendum is to be adopted whether it is to be a dual referendum or a mass referendum. I am not going to say, at this moment, whether there is anything to commend it in the suggestion which has been offered, but what I suggest is that upon a matter of this kind, after a debate which has lasted two days, dealing with the amendments which are on the papers in our hands, we might well ask to have this suggestion thrown into some tangible form and put in print before we begin to absolutely discuss it.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Certainly! Mr. SYMON: I dare say the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, has control of the whole subject, and that he is going to settle the question right off. I have not that quickness and acuteness of intellect of my hon. friend. I have been endeavouring to do the best I could with the materials at my disposal in connection with the proposals which have been submitted during the last two or three days, and I am not prepared now, just at the time we are about to adjourn, to enter on a new field of investigation and deal with something which, at any rate, whether successful or not, is imposing a fresh complication on this very difficult problem. That is all I rose to say except this: that, on the face of it, this is a relinquishment of everything we have been contending for with regard to the mass referendum. If a two-thirds majority of the house of representatives is to decide a question of state interests as against the interests of some particular state, however small, then I say we had better abandon the whole thing. But, again, I say I do not ask any hon. member I do not ask myself to accept that view as in any respect final. I hope hon. members will not suppose for a moment that I intend to throw any cold water on the subject, but that we will give it the best consideration we can, and if we find that it is not obnoxious to the objections which seem to me, if I may use a legal phrase, to prima facie surround it we may be able to evolve something out of it. At present it is a waste of time to further discuss it.
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia) [4.55]:

I listened with great pleasure to the speech of the right hon. the Premier of New South Wales. I intended to say nothing in reference to it had it not been for the speech we have just had from the right hon. the Premier of South Australia. As far as the speech of the Premier of New South Wales is concerned, I must confess I was confused and bewildered to know exactly what it meant. I knew it to be an able speech, because everyone said so. I know that it was delightful to listen to, because I had the enthrallment effects. I knew it was a humorous speech, because everyone laughed, and notably one of the hon. gentlemen from Victoria. But what it all came to boiled down I could not for the life of me make out.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I think the people of New South Wales will know what it came to!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

The right hon. gentleman, with his back to the Chairman-

An Hon. MEMBER:

The speech was not meant for us!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Addressed those who sat in the front gallery. I myself did not know exactly whom the hon. member was addressing, but the hon. member himself undoubtedly knew exactly whom he was addressing.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I represent them too!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Sitting here as a member of the Convention who thought that we were entitled to be addressed, and not so much those in the galleries, I felt myself rather confused both to know the line of reasoning of the hon. member and the persons whom he addressed.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

The right hon. gentleman may interject as much as he likes; I shall take no notice of his interjections. But I want to know what his speech, after all, came to. It was an able speech.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

Bluff!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

This speech is not helping federation!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I do not think the speech of the Premier of New South Wales helped federation. I have had the honor to be on friendly terms with the right hon. gentleman, and I certainly wish to say nothing which will offend him in any way; but his speech undoubtedly suggested many things, and meant nothing. We understood that there were to be some cases in which there should be a popular referendum, and other cases in which there should not; and we have heard from the Premier of our own colony, who seems to be moving on the same lines, that he is of the same opinion. What are these questions to be? That is what I want to know. What are to be the crucial questions which are properly subjects for a national referendum, and what are the subjects which ought to be left to a dual referendum? We have had very little assistance from anyone in arriving at a conclusion on that point. We have certainly had very little assistance from the right hon. the Premier of New South Wales on the subject. I understood in a general sort of way that the question of finance, and particularly the question of free-trade and protection, was to be one of the subjects to be left to a national referendum. But it was put in such a hazy ill-defined form that we, who are trying to draft a bill to make a constitution, have the greatest difficulty in understanding precisely what it comes to. Take, for instance, the question of customs. We consider that that is a matter which can be talked about only by the selected of the people's representatives in Committee. Upon this question, upon which member after member speaks again and again, which is considered line after line, which is considered one of so much importance in detail that those who are supposed to have more knowledge upon the subject than have the general public, have to approach its consideration with the greatest caution, there is to be a reference, after all, to the general public for their "aye" or "nay." It seems to me quite impossible that such a question could be intelligently answered by the public in any shape or form. Then it is proposed that all questions involving money are to be sent to a national referendum. We are practically saying that everything should be sent to a national referendum, because all matters which affect the public mind are so intimately connected with money that it would be difficult to find a bill which did not rest at bottom upon the question of money. We either have to say, therefore, that we will have a national referendum altogether, or we have to say we will not have any at all. There is no intermediate way. To my mind, it is quite impossible to select any subjects which you could say were proper subjects for the nation to speak upon and to distinguish them from other subjects which it would be proper for the states to speak upon, and yet other subjects upon which it would be proper for both to speak upon. Everything in life is so intimately involved that things are constantly overlapping. You never know precisely where you are upon many questions.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
You make yourself safe all round, and I am dissatisfied; I want to be a bit safe too!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I sympathise with that view, and I think it would have been much better had the right hon. gentleman taken us more into his confidence and told us what he meant; if, instead of making a very able speech, to which we all listened with delight, he condescended to bring himself to the humble position of the Drafting Committee.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
What are the Drafting Committee for?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
To find out what you mean. They have not succeeded so far, and that is what I am complaining about.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
We are not here to explain the milky way!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
If the hon. gentleman agreed with me, he would soon find a means of drafting!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I always find that I agree with the right hon. gentleman more and more as most of us do when we come to closer quarters; but at present, I say, upon my honor, I do not know what he means; and I say, on my honor, that I do not believe he himself knows what he means. I do not know at the present moment what my hon. friend means what he wishes the referendum about. I do not know either what the right hon. the Premier of South Australia wants.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
That is the hon. gentleman's misfortune, not my fault! It is the duty of my hon. friend to so instruct less intelligent persons as to let them know a little bit only a little bit-edgeways what he is up to. I cannot, for the life of me, understand myself what he is up to. I understand the hon. gentleman is very strongly in favour of popular representation. He wants always the people's voice, and not the voice of any one else. Yet an arbitrary third of the house of representatives, without any question of the relation of the states or the number of representatives they return, is to determine the matter. In other words, only the voice of the nation in the house of representatives is to determine whether a matter is to be sent to a national referendum, or is to form the subject of a dual referendum.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
Two-thirds can demand a national referendum; one-third can prevent it!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I understand that.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Then the hon. gentleman did understand what my hon. friend said!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I understood what he said.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
What more could you expect?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
As I have said, I never listened with more delight to any speech than to that of the Premier of New South Wales; but it did not involve any particular position it was a most able speech, and full of points, full of humour, perfectly delightful, but in the end we all said, as the public will say tomorrow when they read it in the paper, "What does it all mean?" I do not know. I know it means something

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Let us get to closer quarters!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I think that at this stage of the discussion we might have asked the right hon. gentleman to be a little more precise.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Well, we will force him into closer quarters!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I would not like to do that. The right hon. gentleman's weight is too much for me. I like to keep him at a respectful distance. But I say that the right hon. gentleman's speech, while delighting me, left me at last in a state of bewilderment delighted, but still wondering what this glorious victory was all about and I feel just the same at the present moment. We are here trying to settle a question which is of vital importance—are we or are we not to leave federation? There is an agreement all round that if there is to be a general referendum, it is so against all the principles, so against all the history, of federation, so inconsistent with the very essence of that which we call a federation, that the matter is ended, and our discussion need proceed no further; and yet we have at the same time all this refinement, and a middle course is suggested by the Premiers of New South Wales and South Australia, which is to segregate certain subjects, which they are not good enough to define.
The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
I am glad that I suggested something. I did not think that the hon. and learned gentleman understood me a bit!

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer:
I am going to show the right hon. gentleman that I did not. The right hon. gentlemen proposed to segregate certain subjects which they were not good enough to define, and to say that those were proper subjects for the referendum, knowing the absolute impossibility of any one defining those subjects, mentioning questions of finance, but mentioning them only for the purpose of showing how they ran through everything in legislation; and they were forced at last to the suggestion that the test should not be the views of the people of the different states, which they profess so strongly to represent, but the views of a certain proportion of the members of the house of representatives not of both houses which had no necessary relation at all to their constitution with regard to the different states, and which might in fact represent one state, and one state only.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
That is all the better!

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer:
The two-thirds which those right hon. gentlemen are in favour of might all come from one state.

An Hon. Member:
That could not be!

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer:
And then they would have the general referendum, and that one state would rule, federation would be at an end, and Australia would become a consolidated concern.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:
The right hon member, Mr. Kingston, said that one-third could demand a double referendum!

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer:
I care not whether one-third or two-thirds could demand it. I say that the result would be that powers which those right hon. gentlemen say belong to the people would be transferred to the members of the house of representatives. I hope that the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, does not misunderstand me, for I agree with a great deal of what he said. A certain majority I care not what of the house of representatives might, by their action, destroy the rights of the smaller states, force a national referendum, and leave the question of dual referendum out of consideration altogether. The speech that I heard from the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, like most of his speeches, had a ring of honesty that recommended it to me.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Because he agreed with the hon. and learned member!

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer:

I do not mind that. I admit that when a man agrees with you, you do not like him any the less for that; but he did not agree with me.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:

Nobody could absolutely agree with the hon. and learned gentleman

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer:

There is only one person who generally does, and that is not far from home. But what I recognised in the right hon. gentleman's speech was a true federal spirit quite apart from my local limitations.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

We know what a true federal spirit means. The little chap "collars" the lot!

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer:

I am quite sure that the Right Hon. Sir George Turner said just what he thought. Anxious for federation, he told us something I did not care for, and which I mean to oppose; but still he recognised the foundation principle that throughout all this discussion I have had in my heart and mean to contend for, when he said that there should be a federation, and that this Convention should not result in something which it is not our mission to create the consolidation of the whole of the colonies. Whether the senate is or is not forced back to its constituents, as the house of representatives may, of course, be, I look upon as a matter of detail about which we need not trouble ourselves very much. There is great force in the view which the right hon. the Premier of Victoria takes that we should have some sort of guarantee that the members of the senate as well as the members of the house of representatives shall truly represent the persons who return them. So far as that is concerned, I see no obstacle in the right hon. member's views to the federation of Australia; but if we go beyond that if we go beyond the question of the dissolution of one, or the dissolution of the other, or the dissolution of both, or, if you please, even a referendum although I hate it-

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Call it an appeal to the people!

The Hon. E. Barton:
No; that is a dissolutions different thing!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

A dual referendum, although I detest it, still I will accept it in my enthusiasm for federation rather than see the great cause fail; but when we have introduced, first of all, the national referendum which is destructive of all we have come here to construct, and which we have been very industriously and laboriously constructing or a refinement of it, which practically leaves us just as we were, and throws on the majority which has no reference to states, and which might in effect be composed entirely of one state the power of bringing this same destructive, anti-federal spirit about, then I feel it my duty, strong views as I entertain on this subject, to express my opinions adversely to it. Although we may all speak as often as we please at this stage of the Convention, I had not intended, after the many able speeches in which the views of hon. members have been represented, to say any more about this question; but I do think that I have not trespassed too much on the time of the Committee, and that I have only done my duty to myself in rising now to enter my vehement protest against the suggestion that is now made, and to express my determination to do all I can to prevent any so-called federation from coming about on terms such as these.

The Hon. C.H. GRANT (Tasmania)[5.14]:

I trust that hon. members will bear with me a few moments while I make a few remarks, which I am sure will here be of an unpopular character, drawing attention to the character of our legislation in regard to this federal movement. When we first commenced the consideration of a federation constitution there is no doubt that we were all imbued with a much more conservative spirit than we have at the present time. We have been gradually widening our platform, and have, so far, framed a new and original constitution, one of a unique character, and, therefore, we might well consider whether it will work satisfactorily. We should be very careful before going further in a democratic direction, and should consider well before deciding to give effect to the referendum, which, of all democratic ideas, is one of the most extreme. When the Convention sat in 1891 it was never intended that the senate should be elected in the manner now proposed in this bill. It has assumed a character quite unique, and is now in a form calculated to do violence to the feelings of those who are conservative in their ideas, because it is such a large departure from what we have been accustomed to consider as necessary in such an august body as a senate. We have now decided that the senate shall be based on manhood suffrage, and have thus given it the very widest possible basis. At the Adelaide Convention we attempted to give it an element of continuity by providing that its members should have a six years' tenure of office; that one half of the members should vacate their seats at the end of the first three years, so that, as regards half the senate, the voice of the electors should be ascertained every three years. We are now asked to depart from that principle, and as far as the referendum is concerned, the departure would be a very serious one indeed, and one which should only be adopted after the most mature consideration. We have always been accustomed, and rightly so, to consider the lower branch of the legislature the popular house. We do not complain that it is also based on the widest franchise and that it is truly representative of the people as component parts of a nation. But we have always been in the habit of regarding the senate as a chamber to be constituted on a different basis, as senates have been, and are at the present time, in other countries, and as being distinguished by continuity of office. We know that the Senate of Canada is a permanent body. We know also that the House of Lords, which is in one of the models of our Constitution, is a permanent body. The senates of our local legislatures are, in some cases, permanent bodies, and in other cases elected for considerable periods. But we are proposing to destroy altogether that idea of continuity, and fixity of tenure in the senate, and revert to a referendum whenever differences arise. I do not see much objection to the dissolution of the senate composed as it is; but I think it would be better that we should not go even to that extent. We might very well give up any notion of being troubled with deadlocks.

There will be no occasion in the constitution we are framing to make any elaborate provision against deadlocks, and in my opinion it is unnecessary that there should be a referendum or even a dissolution of the senate on any occasion whatever. The two houses will be e to their constituents at any time, will not have. I look with apprehension upon any attempt to interfere with that continuity of office in the senate, or any attempt to deprive it of that exclusive and conservative character which we have always been accustomed to regard as belonging to an upper house. That being so, it is not desirable that we should take into consideration the question of providing for deadlocks. We might safely leave it to the good sense of the two houses we propose to construct under this bill to settle any differences that might arise between them. In all cases the more permanent body, having regard to their constitution, and knowing that they are not so immediately in touch with their constituents, have always been ready to how to the will of the popular branch, and I do not doubt that it will be so in the case of the proposed senate. The upper chamber is not only so constructed that, on its first election, it will be "broad-based on the peoples will," but every three years there will be a reference to the people on the part of half its members. It will, therefore, always be in full touch with the constituencies, and we should consider whether it is advisable to derogate from its prestige by sending all its members to the country in an attempt to settle disputes, and thus belittle them in the estimation of the commonwealth. It would be very unfortunate to so constitute the senate that its members could be sent back to their constituents at any time. The chief function of a senate is exercised in times of popular commotion, so that in case of any exceptionally stirring event, or serious difficulty arising, it can allow the people time to recover from their temporary agitation, and consider the matter with calmness and deliberation. I notice that in the provision for the referendum, this view has received some consideration, inasmuch as a certain period of time has been allowed before the referendum can be applied, or before the senate can be dissolved. But I think we should go further than that. We should not make any provision whatever for dissolving the senate. But should we do so, the proposal of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, I think would be the best, that after the house of representatives has been dissolved, that house and the senate should be dissolved together, and thus the concrete will of the people at the time ascertained.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[5.24]:

You intimated, sir, that the question you proposed from the chair was put in order to give the Committee an opportunity of expressing their views on the subject without committing themselves to anything definite. I intend to move the omission of all the words of the amendment after the first word "If," with a view of carrying into effect the intimation you were good enough to give from the chair. The first thing to be decided is whether a majority of the Convention is, as I apprehend, in favour of making some kind of provision for the prevention of what has been referred to as deadlocks. The question could be decided upon the proposal to omit these words. If a majority of the Convention decides in favour of their omission, the way will be clear for the submission of each successive proposal.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

But if we omitted these words could their insertion be submitted to us?

Mr. SYMON:

I think so. At all events, I only desire to clear the way in order that we may record our votes upon the question of making provision against deadlocks.

The CHAIRMAN:
I would point out to the hon. member that if he wishes to insert new words I can propose the insertion of these words after the word "If." Then, if that amendment is negatived, anyone who wishes a modification of the clause as it stands can move another amendment.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[5.26]:

Might I make a suggestion? I understand that my hon. and learned friend does not want the whole of this clause to be voted upon at once. He wants to take a test division upon the question whether we should provide any mode of settling disputes between the two houses of legislature. The hon. and learned member will see, however, that if he moves to strike out the words which he proposes to strike out, the question will be, "that the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause."

The Hon. E. BARTON:

He can move his amendment by way of insertion!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I would suggest that he move the omission of the first word in the clause, the word "If." We might accept a vote upon that question as a test vote upon the question whether we should provide any means for settling deadlocks. If we decide that the word "If" should stand part of the clause, we shall be perfectly free to deal with any suggestion that is made afterwards.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[5.27]:

Undoubtedly the solution offered by my right hon. friend seems simple. The first question to be decided is whether we are to make any provision against deadlocks. If we decide that the word "If" shall stand, we shall have affirmed the proposition that provision should be made. Then to show what was in my mind-I propose to move an amendment, providing for the double dissolution, as it exists upon the statute book of South Australia. That proposal will come first in any event. What I understand is and I want to be quite clear upon this point that the proposed referendum, whether it be a, dual referendum or a mass referendum, is meant to be a proceeding subsequent to the result of the dissolution of the senate. Therefore there may be, and possibly there will be-but I do not make any prediction, although I know how I am going to vote myself-a majority of the Convention in favour of the dissolution of the house of representatives first, then of a successive dissolution of the senate, or of a dissolution of both houses at once, which is a matter of detail to be determined after; and then we should have to deal with the question whether a dual referendum or a mass referendum, such as has been described, should be adopted.
An Hon. MEMBER:
A national referendum!

Mr. SYMON:
A national referendum! That is the better and more euphonious phrase. I apprehend that the first thing we have to do after deciding that some means shall be provided for preventing deadlocks is to deal with the question of dissolving the senate. Having dealt with that question, we then proceed to decide whether or not there is to be a referendum, subject to modification in regard to the provisions made for a dissolution. I will accept there commendation of the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, and will move the omission of the word "If."

An Hon. MEMBER:
The hon. and learned gentleman cannot do that, because he is in favour of making some provisions against deadlocks.

Mr. SYMON:
Well, if I cannot move the omission of the word myself, I hope that the amendment will be moved.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[5.29]:
As we are not going to sit tonight, I do not think that a vote can be taken upon the proposition which I understand the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, intends to submit. I suggest, therefore, that Mr. Chairman's recommendation be adopted. The hon. and learned member might begin his proposition with the words "the senate," and move its insertion after the word "If." I make the suggestion for the reason that this gives a clear opportunity for adopting or amending his proposal. If the amendment is rejected, the paragraph will remain as it stands now, and will be open to amendment in every particular, so that all the details in it and the preceding paragraph will be subject to such modifications as will suit the desires of the Committee.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
If the course suggested by the hon. and learned member is taken it will not enable those who desire to do so to have a test vote upon the question whether we should or should not provide means for the prevention of deadlocks. I would suggest that we should get a vote upon the question by dividing upon the omission of the word "If."

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I take it that those who are against providing any means to prevent deadlocks will find exercise for their aspirations by voting against each successive proposal. It seems to me that the right way to deal with the proposal of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, is that suggested by the Chairman. However, if the right hon. member, Sir John Forrest, wishes to move an amendment prior to that of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, the course is open to him to do so. Of course, we could then take a division upon the general question as to whether means could be provided for preventing deadlocks.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[5.33]:

With a view to getting a test vote upon the question whether the Committee desires that provision should be made for the prevention of deadlocks, I move:

That the word "If" at the beginning of the paragraph be omitted.

Question-That the word proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause-put.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill - Communication from Queensland - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee (consideration resumed from 16th September, vide page 709):

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, again proposed:

Insert new clause to follow clause 56:-

57. (a.) If either house of parliament shall, in two consecutive sessions of the same parliament, with an interval of at least six weeks between, pass and transmit to the other house for its concurrence therein any proposed law which such other house fails to pass without amendment, within thirty days after receiving the same, in the second session, or within such period passes, with any amendment not agreed to by the house transmitting the proposed law, the provisions of the following sections of this part shall apply.

(b.) The proposed law passed and transmitted in the second session may include any amendment agreed to by both houses in the first session.

The house in which the proposed law originated may pass a resolution that, in its opinion, the proposed law is of an urgent nature, and may transmit the resolution and the proposed law with any amendments agreed to by both houses up to the time of transmission to the other house, with a request for further consideration.

If within thirty days of the transmission of the proposed law as last aforesaid, or if the session shall end before the expiration of such period, then within thirty days of the commencement of the next session of the same parliament, the other house shall not pass the proposed law without amendment, or with such amendment as the house transmitting the same agrees to, the house in which the proposed law originated may resolve that the same be referred to the direct determination of the people.

If such last-mentioned resolution is passed, a vote of the electors of the commonwealth as to whether the proposed law, as last transmitted as aforesaid, shall or shall not become law shall be taken, unless in the meantime the house to which it has been transmitted has passed the same.

Such vote shall be taken in each state separately, and if the proposed law is affirmed by a majority of the population of the commonwealth, it shall be presented to the governor-general for the royal assent, as if it had been duly passed by both houses of parliament, and on receiving the royal assent it shall become law. If not affirmed as aforesaid the proposed law shall not become law, and shall not be again proposed for a period of at least three years.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[10.33]:

I move:

That after the word "If," in the proposed new clause, the following new words be inserted: "the senate reject or fail to pass any proposed law which has passed the house of representatives, or pass the same with amendments with which the house of representatives will not agree, and if the governorgeneral should on that account dissolve the house of representatives, and if, within six months after the said dissolution the house of representatives again pass the said proposed law in the same, or substantially the same, form as before, and with substantially the same objects, and the senate again reject or fail to pass the said proposed law, or pass the same with amendments with which the house of representatives will not agree, the governorgeneral may dissolve the senate and the house of representatives, and thereupon all the members of both houses of the parliament shall vacate their seats."

The object of this amendment is to affirm the principle that upon a difference between the two houses which cannot otherwise be solved, the senate shall be liable to dissolution in a certain event. Substantially it is the provision in force in South Australia; the phraseology is altered a little by an amendment moved at the Adelaide session by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Wise. I do not wish to argue the matter. I only wish to say, as far as the phraseology, or the drafting, or the form, is concerned, I do not submit this amendment to be finally affirmed. I move the amendment with a view to affirm the principle that, in the event of the senate disagreeing with some measure sent up by the house of representatives, and a dissolution taking place, and the house of representatives adhering to the measure which has been so rejected by the senate, or so amended that the house of representatives disapprove of it, if the senate still refuses to give way, then a dissolution shall take place of both the senate and the house of representatives. So long as the Committee affirms the principle that there shall be, at any rate, one safety-valve, one method of securing cohesion between the two houses, then the form of it may be dealt with and adjusted afterwards. It is, as the right hon. gentleman, Mr. Reid, put it yesterday, a very great concession; it may be, as he added, a proper concession as well.
At any rate, there are some of us who feel that, whether consistent or not with the continuity which we are seeking to preserve in the senate, and with its position as a house representing state interests, and also as a check on legislation, it is proper in this respect that it may remove we hope will remove efficiently obstacles that lie in the path of some of our friends who sincerely desire federation. It is a great concession. It is one which some of us believe will be actually sufficient. At all events, it leaves entirely open anything further which those who think that this is insufficient may desire to propose. With a view to test the principle whether there shall be, under these conditions, a dissolution of the senate as well as a dissolution of the house of representatives, I submit this amendment.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[10.48]:

I am glad that my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon appears to have come to the conclusion that sooner or later, with the view to settling disputes between the two houses, there must be a dissolution of the senate, as well as a dissolution of the house of representatives. The only difference between us is, that I fail to see why, in the first instance, we should be called upon to penalise the house of representatives. If a dispute should arise, and the two houses, after having tried every mode of conciliation, and all the conferences which we know in our various parliaments are adopted to settle disputes, should fail to settle the dispute, why should we then select one of the houses, which in all probability is not to blame, or may not be to blame, and compel that house to go to the country, to incur all the expense and trouble that members individually will have to incur, and again come back and resort to this mode of procedure? After having penalised the one house, if that house comes back with the voice of the country behind it, the senate has not to carry out that voice, but both houses are again to be sent to the country. That is, assuming that the senate has come back with the voice of the country behind it, it has again to be penalised, and the members are again to be put to all the trouble and expense of a general election throughout the large areas which they have to contest. Surely that is not fair or reasonable: it is not just to the house of representatives, and it is holding, practically, a threat over the house that if they do not agree to the senate's proposals they have to go to the country. They have to take all the risk of coming back, and after they have come back they will have to take the risk of going a second time. I think the proposal is not a reasonable one so far as it penalises the house of representatives in the first instance, and I trust the Convention will agree to the provision that if the two chambers cannot agree, and fail, after having made every effort, to come to a satisfactory arrangement, then the two chambers at the same time shall go to their respective constituents and obtain the voice of the country as well as they possibly can obtain it. Holding these views, and believing a double dissolution in the first instance will, in nine cases out of ten, be the mode of settling the dispute, I am willing to support that portion of the proposal; but I cannot see my way to ask the Convention to support the suggestion that, in the first instance, the house of representatives which may be in the right, should be penalised, without at the same time penalising the other house.

The CHAIRMAN:

Does the right hon. gentleman move an amendment?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

No I shall vote against the addition to the new clause.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales)[10.42]:

I move:

That the amendment be amended by the omission of the words "and the house of representatives, and thereupon all the members of both houses of the parliament shall vacate their seats."

That carries out the wishes of the Premier of Victoria.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria)[10.44]:

The question before us is as much one of procedure as of anything else—that is to say of the order in which the proposals are to be taken. The proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Walker, practically embodies one of the suggestions which have been indorsed by the Victorian Parliament; but in moving it now he may imperil the chances of support which it might receive if the other amendment were disposed of. Some of those who are in favour of the amendment he is proposing may at the same time be unwilling to vote against the whole of the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Symon, and by that means the hon. member, Mr. Walker, will not obtain all the votes of those who would separately support his proposition.

I feel somewhat at a loss how to suggest a better method of procedure, unless it is understood that if we negative Mr. Symon's clause, we should then be free to consider something which might very closely approximate to his clause in the form submitted by our parliament. I take it, therefore, that if the hon. member, Mr. Symon, intends to press his amendment, we had better deal with it as a whole, and those who object to it on any ground should vote against it, knowing when they do so that they are not precluded from adopting some other form of the proposal, any variation being sufficient under the circumstances to justify its being considered as in order. If we endeavour to amend the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Symon, we shall inevitably lose votes for the various amendments which may be proposed. If we negative his proposal, we shall practically have a clear field to deal with other suggestions on their merits.

Mr. WALKER:

With the permission of the Committee, I will withdraw my amendment at the present time.

Amendment on the amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria):[10.46]:

I do not propose to discuss the suggestion of the hon. member, Mr. Symon, because my remarks would be mainly a repetition of those advanced by the Premier of Victoria; but I would point out that even the hon. member could scarcely say that after an appeal had been made to the whole of the electors by means of a dissolution of the house of representatives, and the electors had given a distinct verdict on the question submitted to them, and had returned an absolute majority to the new house in favour of the course proposed, it would be reasonable six months afterwards to send the same members back to the same electors to ask the same question.

Mr. SYMON:

That was Mr. Walker's amendment!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Not at all; he provides for only one dissolution of each house. You propose to put the same question twice to the same people, and to penalise the representatives who endeavour to give effect to the popular verdict. It appears to me to be most inconsistent and indefensible in that respect.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):[10.48]:

I think I shall be compelled, unless I hear good reason to the contrary, to vote against the proposal on the grounds stated by the Premier of Victoria. If there is to be a dissolution applicable to the senate, as well as to the house of representatives, I take it that the most convenient and the least expensive way, and the way best calculated to bring about an agreement, is to dissolve both bodies at the same time. If the amendment does not find acceptance, it will be necessary to amend the paragraph of the proposed new clause, because I take it that an in

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Ought not sub-clause b to come in?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Perhaps it ought, and the other matter after that.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

What I propose to do is to pass sub-clauses a and b, and then to insert a sub-clause providing for a double dissolution. That is the simpler way!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

We must all recollect that in passing the matter in that shape, the actual form will be recast. I should like to indicate that that is the course which I favour, and if the Committee go that far it will be simply a question whether they will proceed to other measures.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[10.49]:

I quite agree with the hon. member, Mr. Barton, that the question of six weeks or thirty days is merely a matter of detail. If we agree on principle I do not think there will be much difficulty in agreeing upon the mere lapse of time which is to take place, provided, of course, it is not extravagantly long or inordinately short. If we adopt the double dissolution in the first instance, no doubt the observation of the hon. member, Mr. Barton, made, will apply to the following sub-clause, which might conveniently come out. But that also is a matter of detail. On the main question I think, if I may be permitted to say so without offence, that we should be taking up the time of hon. members needlessly if we attempted to discuss the merits of an alternative dissolution, because I think a majority of the Convention has already expressed its mind that that would be unsatisfactory. I think it must be plain that it would not be acceptable to the Convention to propose that in case of a dispute between the two chambers it should always be assumed that one of the two chambers is wrong. Why should it be so assumed? If this proposal were to say that no matter where the proposed bill comes from, no matter what may be its merits, no matter what may be the unofficial expression of public opinion, no matter how the particular house proposing the bill—whether the senate or the house of representatives may be supported by the general colour of public opinion outside, it must always be one particular house which must go to the country, I say that that is not fair.

An Hon. MEMBER:

One house is elected for six years!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The other house is elected for three years. Now, I cannot conceive of any element of justice in saying that one particular house should be penalised. If you say that a dissolution will be an inducement to the house of representatives not to press its claims too strongly, surely it is equally fair to say that the fear of a dissolution will induce the senate not to press its objections too closely. If there is to be a means of conciliation, let the conciliation be reciprocal. Now, I do strongly urge upon my hon. friends that they should come to some decision upon this question as soon as possible. We have to deal with a good many other matters today in any of them important matters and when we reach some of them, no doubt, the debate will be longer; but upon this question there is such an evident majority against the proposal that I do not think we need occupy time by discussing it further.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia):[10.54]:

I suggest that this clause should not be pressed in its present form. Of course the idea is that, by a double dissolution, we shall ascertain whether or not the houses are in touch with their constituencies. But what does this clause really propose? It undoubtedly proceeds upon the assumption that the doubt will invariably affect the house of representatives, and that it ought to be sent to its constituencies first. I put it that the constitution of the two chambers suggests an altogether different conclusion. As regards the senate, one-half retires every three years; but the whole is not submitted to the verdict of popular opinion except after the lapse of six years. What is the case with the house of representatives? The whole of the house has to go to the people every three years. Under these circumstances is there not a prima facie case in favour of the probability of the house of representatives being more closely in touch with the constituencies than is the senate? There might be a difference between the senate and the house of representatives in the first session of the house of representatives. The house of representatives is hot from the country, but the senate has been subjected to no such test. Yet what is the proposal? Not that the house of representatives should be regarded as representing public opinion under the circumstances, but that it should be sent again to the country while the senate stands idly by, laughing, you might almost say, at the inconvenience to which it has subjected the other house. Then, when the house of representatives comes back again, reinforce by public opinion, not only the senate, but both houses, are sent to the country. Practically there are three references to the country by the house of representatives before an expression of popular opinion is secured as to the action of the senate. Now, it seems to me that that is monstrous.

An Hon. MEMBER:

It is an invitation to obstruction!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

It is not only an invitation to obstruction, but it amounts to an immunity from the results which ought to accrue from obstruction. I think it is highly undesirable that either house I do not care which it is—should have the right of sending the other to the country, and submitting it to the verdict of popular opinion without submitting its own conduct to that verdict at the same time. I think we should adopt a provision under which, if there be a substantial dispute, the question should be decided by the constituencies as to the conduct of both houses, and not of one of them. As to this amendment, it is, I presume, intended to be based upon the South Australian provision; but in one important particular it does not, if I recollect rightly, and I am pretty sure I do, follow that provision, because it is here provided that the first dissolution of the house of representatives must be a penal one on account of a difference with the senate. There is no such provision in our constitution.

Mr. SYMON:
No; that is taken from the amendment on the paper; but we can strike that portion out!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
That removes one objection. No doubt the first part ought to be struck out, but the latter part ought also to be struck out; and, since there is very little health left in the middle of the clause, I suggest that it would be more convenient, if we were to accept the suggestion of our right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, and negative it, in order that we may proceed to the consideration of the other proposals.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[10.58]:
I hope that the members of the Committee will be moderate this morning, and not show such a disposition to drive members like myself beyond that which we consider reasonable. I yesterday voted for some remedy for deadlocks, not because I think there is any necessity for it at all.

An Hon. MEMBER:
They are rather good things!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I do not say that, but I say that the British communities all over the world have got on remarkably well without any such provision. I have travelled all over the world several times, and I have seen no countries which have made similar progress to that made by British self-governing communities under our existing constitutional forms. I then asked myself, and I submit it to this Convention, what is the necessity for any sudden and foreign change? I am prepared, as the representative of one of the five colonies which passed the enabling bill, to go beyond my own views in deference to the wishes of the mother colony; but I deny that there is any necessity, so far as our own colony is concerned, to go beyond the present bill. I believe that the other members of the Convention would also be prepared to accept the present bill. I say so unhesitatingly, and I believe that I know the opinion of the people of our colonies just as well as the average man, or the average delegate, if you like the word better. Why should we, therefore, go in for some extreme revolutionary change? My hon. and learned friend, the Attorney-General of Victoria, laughs. In this draft bill there are provisions for amending the constitution. If the federal parliament and the people of the united colonies should determine in favour of having some further provisions for enforcing their wishes, they could obtain a remedy by means of a bill amending the constitution. Therefore, I say, why go to extremes at one jump?

There is no necessity for it. Something has been said about penalising one house. It is not penalising one house. The senator is not intended to be an active house like the house of representatives. It is only created for the purpose of delaying hasty legislation. The upper house never does stand in the way of recording the opinion of the people when those opinions are definitely known beyond question. It has never done so in the old country. It has never done so in any of the colonies, in Australia or in Canada. If we were establishing a senate not subject to dissolution the same as the House of Lords and the Senate in the Dominion of Canada, and the same as the Upper House in this colony, Queensland, and Western Australia—I would admit that there was some justification for the course now proposed.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

It would not be necessary then, because there is power to add to the numbers.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

That power is seldom used. History shows that it has never been used more than once, I think, in any British country once in New South Wales. That supports my argument that there is no necessity for this drastic legislation.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Does the hon. member say that the lower house must prevail?

The Hon. S. FRASER:

I do not say that the lower house must prevail; but I say that a bill that was sent up to the senate might be a bill affecting only a small section of the community. It might not be a bill that affected the whole community at all directly. It might affect only the butter industry, or the farmer, or it might exclusively affect the miner, or perhaps only a section of the miners. It might be a butter export bill a bill affecting only a section of the people of the country. What would the town citizens know about a bill like that?
You would be referring the bill to people who knew little or nothing about the matter that was referred to them.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Ignorance of the people!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
All my political life I have been as willing to go upon any platform as any man. I have never feared going upon any platform when I thought I was in the right, and I have always believed in my political opinions. They may be conservative. I do not think so. At any rate, I am prepared to go upon any platform and argue with any other candidate. I do not believe in the ignorance of the people. I say that the bulk of mankind, who have to labour in order to earn their living, have not the same opportunities of becoming well versed in politics as a politician, or as an educated man who has ample time at his disposal to post himself in such matters. It is not the honesty of the bulk of the people that most men have a fear of; they have no fear of that. The working man, the stone-breaker, is as honest and fair as the ruler of the country. They are all alike in that respect; but will hon. members tell me that the people of Greece, the other day, when they forced their Government to go to war, were well posted up?

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Stick to Australia!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Other gentlemen have gone into many questions of politics. I have just as much faith in the people of Australia, or any British colony, as any other member of the Convention has, and that interjection be rejected on that account. I will go beyond my own personal predilections, and support the amendment proposed by my hon. friend, Mr. Symon. I will agree not to subject the house of representatives to a second dissolution I will agree to that so far as to say that, when the house of representatives has been subjected to a dissolution, it should not be penalised a second time. I maintain that the senate would not be obdurate, even the first time, because the senate, knowing full well that they had to appear before their constituents every three years possibly in much less time, on account of the trouble not arising at the furthermost limit of the period would, of course, bow to public opinion, as expressed by either the rejection or the re-election of members to the house of representatives. Therefore, they, as wise men, should not make themselves subject to a dissolution at all. There would then only be one dissolution, namely, that of the house of representatives. In my opinion, that is how the system would work out. I believe that, on the score of economy, and for many other reasons, it is not necessary to subject the senate to a dissolution at the time that the house of representatives is dissolved. That would be coercion, and, in my opinion, such a course is neither warranted nor necessary, and would probably cause weak members of the senate to do an injustice to their colonies, and to their views, because they would not be independent enough to give a disinterested vote upon the matter referred to them. I hope that, for these reasons, the Committee will not drive hon. members to vote against unreasonable proposals.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Suppose that after the house of representatives is dissolved the senate still refuses to pass the bill!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
No; I would then agree that the senate should be subject to a dissolution. The reason why I would not agree to the other proposal is this: The ministry of the day, although its members might have the interests of country at heart, might be altogether wrong in its views as to the efficacy or advantage of a proposed course of action, and would probably select a time when the passions of the people were aroused, and perhaps inflame those passions and try to work up an inflammatory view of matters in order to have their proposal accepted. There may be no doubt about the wisdom of sending back to the constituencies the members of the house of representatives; but I think that sufficient time should be allowed to elapse to obtain the deliberate and matured opinions of the people before the dissolution of the senate. After such a time had elapsed, I would not hesitate to dissolve the senate.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[11.13]:
I would suggest to the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, that he should leave out the last few words of his amendment, which make it compulsory for both houses to be sent to the country. If the hon. and learned member desires to make provision for the sending of both houses to the country, I would suggest that he should make that proposal separately instead of mixing it up with the provisions contained in the earlier part of his amendment. I am altogether in favour of the proposal brought forward by the hon. and learned member, and I should be glad to give it every support. Yesterday, we devoted the whole day to the discussion of the question whether it was necessary to provide any means for preventing deadlocks, and we decided by a large majority that some provision was necessary. Although I voted in the minority upon that question, I now desire to give the best attention I can to providing means for preventing deadlocks. I do not desire to say anything in the way of reopening the debate, because I take it that the Committe has decided the question; but I must say that there seemed to be a decided impression in the minds of very many hon. members yesterday that the senate was to be established only to protect state rights and state interests. I do not think that that is so. If that were our only intention there would be no necessity for upper houses in the various colonial legislatures, because there are no state rights to be conserved in any of the colonies. I take it that we are now erecting the senate, not only for the protection of state interests, but also to provide a revising and controlling force in connection with legislation generally. If that is not so, we do not want upper houses in any of the colonies. All that we want is one chamber, having a free hand to do what it likes in the management of the affairs of the country. I think that those who are so anxious to reduce and weaken the senate are those who are opposed to upper houses altogether. I cannot help feeling, from the remarks of the President, amongst others, that he cannot forget that for many years he has been in controversy with the Upper House of his own colony, and he cannot believe that the upper house that we are erecting will not be similar to that which exists in South Australia.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
We have had a better upper house in South Australia than they have had in a great many other places!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I cannot help feeling that the right hon. member does not like the Upper House in his own colony.

The Hon. J.H. Howe:
Yes, he does!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Then he has a very queer way of showing it. I believe that he has rather a dislike to upper houses generally, and is of the opinion that except to protect state rights it would be better to have only one house under this constitution. It must not be forgotten, however, that at the present time the various colonies are independent states, and we are not going to enter into any partnership unless our future position as a state is guaranteed. To return, however, to the point at issue. Having decided that means are to be provided for the prevention of deadlocks, the question arises: What is the simplest, the best, and the most effective means that we can adopt? The suggestion of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner that, in case of deadlocks, both houses should be at once sent to their constituents has, at first sight, a good deal to commend it. Under ordinary circumstances, if two representative bodies disagreed, the solution of the difficulty which would occur to most men would be to send them back to those whom they represent, and let them decide the dispute. But would that be a wise provision to make in the constitution which we are now framing? At the time of the dispute, there may be a great deal of popular excitement and clamour, and all sorts of influences might be at work, and is it likely that we should obtain the result we are aiming at if we sent back the two legislative bodies to their constituents in the midst of that clamour and excitement? The chances are that both sides would be inflamed, and would stick to their colours, sending back again to the two houses the persons who represented them there before, and who, it would be said and thought, were defending the interests of the colonies they represented. The chances are that the members of the senate, when they went back to their own colonies, and told their electors that they had stood out to preserve their rights and interests, would be returned to again oppose the particular measure which had been the cause of the dispute. In nine cases out of ten, the house having the greatest power will be the aggressor. Every one knows that no case has; arisen in Australia, nor anywhere else, in which the upper house has been the aggressor, forcing upon the lower house some measure of which it disapproved, and thereby causing a constitutional disturbance. We know that such a thing has never happened, and never will happen. If any conflict occurs in the commonwealth in the future it will be caused by the house of representatives trying to coerce the senate. I think it is only reasonable that the house which causes the trouble—in my belief it will be the house of representatives should go to the country. After a limited time, say, six months or so, having returned from the country with a fresh mandate, with the weight of that mandate pressing upon the upper house, if the upper house still maintains the position it formerly took up, and refuses to give way, I then am willing to send that house to the country. Time will have elapsed six months or more people will have had time to work off their angry passions at any rate their excitement they will have had time to cool down, and the second election will be carried on under far different circumstances as to excitement compared with those of the original election.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

What second election does the hon. member mean?

The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest:

The senate should be dissolved in the second instance. It seems to me that that plan would make the house of representatives much more careful, much less eager to enter into conflict than it would be under other circumstances. We know that no one likes to be beaten. If one has an important measure to carry through parliament, his whole reputation perhaps may be mixed up with that measure, and he is sure to be desirous that it should become the law of the country. Everyone of us who has had anything to do with leading legislative assemblies knows how closely one associates oneself with the measures it is desired should become law. If you find the leader of a government entertaining these strong feelings, do you think he will rest without taking the verdict of the country upon an important measure at once in the full blaze of excitement? He will at once dissolve both houses and go to the country. Is that the sort of house we wish to erect here? This senate, this stable house this house almost immovable throughout all the colonies and the empire is this the sort of senate which you desire to build up? Do you desire that at any moment, at the will of the Prime Minister, he shall have power, not only to dissolve one house but to send the whole parliament to the country? I do not think that is what we want to build up here. We want to have a stable senate. The senate, in my opinion, should be immovable; but the Convention decided yesterday that that was not to be so. We are desirous of framing something that we have not got at the present time. Our legislative councils in all these colonies, with the exception of South Australia, cannot be dissolved, and if we cannot get a measure through the upper house we have to put up with it. We can certainly, dissolve the lower house, but that is not often taken advantage of, and, furthermore, it is not necessary. We have the highest constitutional authorities in the world telling us that the lower house does not exist at the will of the upper house, and that there is no necessity, no obligation to dissolve the house of assembly because it is not possible to carry a measure through the upper house. We have heard a great deal about the referendum, and, I dare say, we shall hear a great deal more during the debate today; but I think that an election of the senate is as close an approach to a referendum under this bill as it is possible to get. It is really a referendum at every election. Every time we have an election of the senate we appeal to the whole body of the people in the nation, and it is not an election such as occurs when the house of representatives is elected. That house is elected by various constituencies. The election is affected by all sorts of local prejudices and feelings, and is not really an appeal to the whole body of the electors. On the other hand, the first election or any election of the senate, will be to all intents and purposes a referendum. I should say to hon. members, and to all those who are desirous of making, the senate a weak, and, I might even say, a discredited body, as it would be unless it were strong, that there cannot be real federation unless the federation applies to the whole of Australia. We have had to carry on our deliberations without the assistance of one great colony; but I venture to think that a federation which we might create without that great country would not be the real federation which we all so much desire. I would urge that it should be the desire of those who come from the larger colonies not to do anything which will prevent a real federation of Australia taking place. There have been a great many changes since 1891 in this bill. There have been changes even since the beginning of this Convention; but all those changes have been in the direction of reducing the power and influence of the states and the states house. I accept the verdict of this House with regard to what was decided yesterday. I hope, now that we have got so far, and a means is to be provided for preventing deadlocks, that we shall make that plan as simple as possible, and that the means provided shall not be such as can be too easily availed of.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales):[11.28]:

I rise at this stage of the debate only to say a word or two. I take it that many of us, those of us who are not possessed of any great degree of originality, are waiting for some concrete scheme with regard to a dissolution of the senate that may be acceptable to the Convention as a whole. But I should like to ask whether there is any necessity for a concrete scheme at all? I take it that the main point at issue is the question of the dissolution of the senate. At the beginning of our proceedings in Adelaide, very few of us would have imagined, probably, that such a proposal as this could have been brought forward with any chance of being carried. But on the principle which most of us have laid down that any ground of settling differences between the two houses should be one of a character that would give time to the people to think, which would give every possibility for the fullest consideration of public opinion, we have come to the conclusion that, while we might think the constitution could be left entirely to its own working, this proposal to dissolve the senate is on the whole the best, and

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

Together!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

No, I am coming to that point. Here we are, probably, on the verge of making another rigid arrangement which may not meet the circumstances of the case. Who can tell the variety of circumstances which may bring about a deadlock? I will give an illustration of a practical character. Suppose the house of representatives has lived for a period of two years and nine months, and is within three months of an absolutely necessary dissolution, and suppose some burning question arises in which it seems impossible at the moment to have an agreement between the two houses what an absurd thing it would be, three months before a general dissolution was to come about, to have a penal dissolution of the senate!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That is provided for in the Victorian suggestion; the interval must be more than six months!

Mr. SYMON:
This amendment does not do what the hon. member fears!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I know, and I am only now referring to the desire of some hon. members to make a double dissolution under all circumstances. We want a constitution that will work with the least possible friction and the least possible expenditure. Then, again, we know that every three years, not necessarily at the time of the dissolution of the house of representatives, half of the senate must retire for re-election. Suppose one of these burning questions arose within a month or two of the time when one-half the senate would, under ordinary circumstances, retire, would there then be a necessity for a dissolution of both houses? Do not let us have anything that will preclude that proceeding in which men of common-sense and not lunatics would try to arrange their difficulties on patriotic principles. I do not intend to refer to its machinery, but if ever there was a constitution which was a model of simplicity, which laid down principles and left details to be worked out according to the circumstances, it is the American Constitution—one of the simplest and noblest instruments for a constitution in the world.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The stiffest!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It may be the stiffest, but we do not intend this constitution to be the stiffest in that sense. I am making a proposal to do away with the rigidity. I have been surprised in this Convention to find that so many of the extreme democrats if I may call them so who point to the rigidity of the American Constitution as a bar to the progress of the people, instead of leaving the parliament and the executive directly responsible to he people to act according to the varying conditions, want to make hard and fast rules to carry out some democratic shibboleth.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Who wants to?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I do not pretend to have any strong opinion on the subject. I do not pretend to have any original views of my own. I simply rise at this moment to put before the Convention the question whether it would not be better simply to leave in the constitution power to the governor-general, through his executive, to dissolve either house at any time when certain circumstances arose.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

Would not that put the senate at the mercy of the house of representatives?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Not at all. Because we must take it for granted, as I take it for granted, in everything we do that we are dealing with a responsible government of a patriotic character, responsible to the people of the country and to public opinion. I hold that this dissolution is intended to be more of the character of a deterrent, than that it should be adopted with any expectation that it will ever be put into force.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

The moral effect!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The moral effect. Who is to judge when matters have come to such an extreme that a deadlock has practically supervened? It must be the executive government, who are responsible for the management of affairs. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be wise not to make any hard and fast rules for the dissolution of both houses under all circumstances when a deadlock seemed to intervene. In my opinion that would be a very evil proposition. It would tie you down at times to take a course which would be utterly inconsistent with a regard to public convenience. As I said before, my own view of the case would be simply to leave that power of dissolving the senate as a co-ordinate power with that of dissolving the house of representatives, and leave the circumstances themselves to decide on what occasion it ought to be carried into effect.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

That is a larger power than we are asking for now!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I do not mind giving the larger power, because you must recollect this: that you must deal with a question of this kind in view of the principles you have laid down in your governmental machinery. We have laid down the principle that this house is to represent the continuity of national life; that it is to have six years of existence, and that one-half must retire at certain periods. Those principles being laid down, any government and I am willing to trust this federal government to that extent ought to feel that to destroy, or attempt to interfere with, the continuity of that house, would be to take a step of the very gravest responsibility. However, under no circumstances, speaking personally, would I vote for such a drastic arrangement as the dissolution of the two houses at the same time?

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[11.37]:

In order to disentangle the real question of substance from the rest of this amendment, I desire to move the omission of the words at the end, to which the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest has just called attention, namely, those involving a second dissolution of the house of representatives.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

Then we need not talk any more about it. We can go to a division at once!

Mr. SYMON:

What the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, and my right hon. friend, Sir John Forrest, said, has satisfied me that that would be improper. I wish also to eliminate the words" on that account" in the eighth line; so that if there was a dissolution of the house of representatives under this amendment, and the house of representatives, whether on that particular account or generally, acting, in its belief, on the strength of public opinion, passed the measure again, it should have the same effect as though there was a dissolution specially for that purpose.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[11.38]:

The suggestion for the omission of the concluding words no doubt makes this amendment less objectionable. But I cannot agree with my hon. friend, Mr. Howe, that when once those words are omitted the task becomes so simple that we shall immediately go to a division. I should like to point out and it is surprising to me that it has not been seen before clearly and easily the utter absurdity of the proposal of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon. I should like to take advantage of the speech of the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, to point out the utterly loose ideas which seem still to prevail in certain quarters with reference to this particular project upon which we are engaged. The right hon. gentleman speaks of seeing that the independence of the states shall be guaranteed. If you enter into a federation, how can you guarantee the independence of each state?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

We do not want to be taken in body and soul we do not want to be unified!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

That is the trouble with us that we cannot get unified in some way or other; we are all discord. That is one of the difficulties in the way of hon. gentlemen representing the smaller states. No matter how small the state may happen to be, the one thing they look for is a sort of constitution which will guarantee their independence. They forgot that in this federation the larger states might have an interest in the same direction, and want their independence guaranteed.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

It is of no use to misrepresent me. I did not mean that at all, and the hon. member knows very well I did not!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Indeed I do not. What did the hon. member mean? because I will accept his own view of what be meant. I do not want to take a view opposite to his own.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

He meant what the hon. member told us yesterday, that the national voice must not drown the voice of the states.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I always find it better that a man should explain himself than that he should have a volunteered deputy. Perhaps my hon. friend will tell me what he meant?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I do not want to interrupt the hon. member. I had an example yesterday of the way in which the hon. member treats interruptions.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I am very sorry that my hon. friend should have taken anything I said in that way. I am sure I stood some rather severe and unjust remarks yesterday without saying very much. Could a greater insult be offered to a member of this Convention than was offered to me yesterday, when it was stated that I was addressing people outside instead of addressing those here?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I did not say that!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

It does not interfere with the friendliness and courtesy of my hon. and learned friend, Sir John Downer, and I do not allow such matters to interfere. I might easily have retorted that it was my duty, in expressing my own convictions, to introduce the opinions of the people of New South Wales to the notice of this Chamber, and that was really what I was doing. Then, again, I did not complain when my hon. friend, Sir John Downer, complained that I was turning my back on the Convention when I simply had, from the geographic absolute necessity of the position, to turn my back on someone unless I stood on the wall. I did not complain of these pleasantries, because we all indulge in them occasionally, and when they come we ought to take them in good humour; so that I hope my hon. friend will not think that in any interruption I made yesterday I wished in any way to affront him. I assure the hon. gentleman that I took down his words as he spoke, unless our independence is guaranteed.” We ought to clear up misapprehensions of this kind. If we come into this federation, we must all lose a portion of our independence every man in the states, every state. The great trouble between us at this moment is to endeavour to hit a line which will seem to act fairly by us all in our differing circumstances when we do give up our independence in respect of the subjects of this constitution. But we must all give something up, and the gentlemen who represent the smaller states and when I say the smaller states you know I mean the states with the smaller populations must not quarrel with us when we are just as earnest as themselves in endeavouring to secure that the rights of the larger populations shall be respected in this constitution, and unless those who represent the larger populations faithfully and frankly express the interests of those people in this Convention, I do not know where else they ought to be expressed. This is the proper place in which to express them, and we save ourselves infinite and useless labour if we proceed on these lines. I do not accuse gentlemen representing the smaller states, when they utter sentiments which are peculiarly provincial, of talking to their colonies. I quite understand that they must, to a great extent, safeguard those interests, and, small as a state may be, that there are interests there which are just as properly subject to careful safeguarding as the interests of the larger populations of the commonwealth. But I must ask this Convention, which is composed of a majority of gentlemen representing the smaller populations, to show equal courtesy to us, when we are endeavouring to put the views which commend themselves to the larger populations. Let me show the utter absurdity of this proposal of the representative of South Australia. I mean the proposal as it was amended - it was still more absurd as it stood originally. There is a proposal that if a conflict arise between the two houses, there may be a dissolution of the house of representatives, and then if after that dissolution, the difficulty still remains, there may be a dissolution of the senate. Well, the project when two houses are in conflict of cutting off the head of one, and leaving the other to live another six months to see what may turn up in the political world, does not commend itself to me as a pattern of federal justice. What a maimed and lame attempt this is to solve some burning, perhaps most urgent, question, until the settlement of which the whole commonwealth is thrown into a state of the utmost confusion, say, on a tariff! Now, we all know when questions affecting the tariff, say, a reconstruction of the tariff, especially of a federal tariff, are before the parliament, all the industrial interests of the country are thrown into a state of confusion, enormous loss and inconvenience are caused to the business community of any country whose fiscal policy is in a state of uncertainty and transition. Let us suppose that on that burning question, affecting the daily interests of every man in Australia in a most practical and important way, there is a hopeless difficulty between the two houses. What sort of solution of such a situation is this? Then let me show even a greater absurdity than that. There is a dissolution of the house of representatives, which means that the whole question is remitted to every elector in the commonwealth. The result of that election will show exactly what the public opinion is, not only of the commonwealth as a commonwealth but also of the states as states, and then six months after that -

The Hon. J.H. Howe:

Not necessarily so. The states may be divided, you know, by what we have done previously.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

I am speaking, of course, of the states as they will exist at any time, no matter what the subdivision is, because the moment you subdivide you simply rearrange the electoral boundaries; in fact, as far as the popular house is concerned, the subdivision would not necessarily involve any alteration of the commonwealth electoral boundaries except for the provision which we put in, and which I opposed, that as nearly as practicable the houses should be in the ratio of two to one. That will involve a most awkward and inconvenient arrangement of all the commonwealth boundaries when a subdivision takes place, and that is one of the great disadvantages of the scheme. But for that a subdivision would simply mean a larger number of senators without necessarily any alteration of the commonwealth electoral boundaries. But my argument would not be affected by a subdivision. If the subdivision had been complete and the electoral boundaries rearranged, then when the appeal to the commonwealth electors had taken place, inasmuch as the commonwealth electors will be within certain defined boundaries which will not overlap the state boundaries probably no electoral boundary will be so constructed if it can be avoided as to have half an electorate in one colony and half of it in another, I imagine. The more natural course will be to follow the well known lines of the different colonies. But even if they overlapped, anyone be easily able, once the house of representatives had been dissolved, and every electorate-in the large electorates remember, not in the small ones; that is, in electorates containing 50,000 inhabitants had expressed its opinion on the subject of reference by the particular candidate elected, then the senate would be in this very comfortable position. If the result of the appeal was to show that in this dispute between the two houses the senate had a majority of their own people behind them that is, the majority in the senate, we will say the senators, of three small states out of five here represented saw that the majority of the electors of their own states were against them there would be no trouble. The head of the wrong man would have been cut off; but there would be no redress for him, because he would be gone; and the other, the offending party the house which had created the necessity for cutting off the head of the popular chamber would quietly allow the measure to pass, and live on peacefully and happily ever after.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
That is the price we pay for responsible government!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I know. That is the price we are asked to pay for what is called responsible government; but that very expression shows that my hon. friend is rather cloudy as to what responsible government is. The principle of responsible government is that it is subject to the control of the representatives of the people. That is responsible government, and the digression therefore will scarcely apply. But if all the representatives of the commonwealth were the subject of appeal the result of that appeal would be known to us all, and it would be seen whether a majority of the electors in the smaller states favoured the one house or the other. If a majority of the electors in the smaller states favoured the view of the senate, all the dissolutions of the house of representatives would leave the senate absolutely immovable, and we would then be in a state of things, perhaps resembling this and this is the sort of thing the people of the colonies are not likely to stand: the house of representatives might, possibly, come into conflict with the senate on the tariff and I know of no subject more likely to create a conflict than that. There is an appeal to the people, as it is called, and a house of representatives is returned which shows that 2,000,000 people in the larger colonies I have not the number of electors in each colony, strange to say; I have it for two colonies, but not for five, and I must, therefore, go by population-cast their votes in favour of the policy of the house of representatives. In the smaller states there are votes cast which show that on that particular question, out of a total population, at of 670,000, 500,000 vote in favour of the position of the senate, and that is taking a pretty high view. We have thus this anomalous position: that we have gone through what is substantially a farce. It is a farce to appeal to the people if the people have not the power to decide if, after an appeal has been made, 2,000,000 say yes, and 500,000 say no; and that "no" makes the senate immovable, and enables them to stand to their position with the absolute certainty of success. The terrors of dissolution nearly all disappear when you know beforehand that you are going to be elected without any trouble. The terror of a dissolution is the uncertainty which surrounds it. With this sword of a dissolution before them, the senate know beforehand exactly how they stand. This sword hanging over them is a sort of comfortable arrangement which is represented by the homely phrase, "Heads, I win; tails, you lose." That is the philosophy of this proposal. If the senate find from the appeal to the electors of the commonwealth that they are wrong, they are not punished; they simply subside. If they find from an appeal to the commonwealth that, although an enormous majority of the people say they are wrong, a sufficiently small minority in three of the states say they are right, they are still strong and immovable, and if the sword falls upon them, they simply, by prolonging their opposition to the result of the appeal to the people, go back to the smaller states to receive the political honors accorded to those who successfully vindicate the interests of their country. That sort of arrangement, it seems to me, is one-sided, to say the least. I will only, at present, push these observations to one practical point on this clause, and it is this: that if there is to be any pretence of fairness in applying this great arbitrament to the dissolution, the two houses must be dissolved at the same time. Whatever the constituencies, whatever the constitution, whatever the safeguards gentlemen representing the smaller states think right to put in the constitution on this point, where both have to appeal to the country to have their difficulties settled, both must take the risks of the situation, and that is fatal to the proposal of the hon. member.

Proposed amendment, by leave, amended by leaving out, in line 8, "on that account," and by inserting after "representatives," in line 10, "by an absolute majority," and by leaving out all the words after "senate," line 18. Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[11.57]:

I should like to advert to a former proposal of the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, who said that we ought not to do anything rigid, and that it should be optional to dissolve both houses or one. I was struck with that suggestion at the time. Nevertheless I think that it would amount to a scourge upon the senate. Supposing there is a ministry which has a majority in the house of representatives, and supposing that ministry to be opposed in the senate, if that ministry had the option, it would certainly dissolve the house which is against it, and not the house which is for it.
Therefore, out of justice to the senate, I think it only fair that the ministry ought to dissolve both houses, and have them both sent before their constituents. With regard to the proposal of the Premier of Western Australia, I think the answer of the Premier of New South Wales is absolutely insurmountable. That proposal simply makes the houses of representatives a cats paw in order to pull the nuts out of the fire. It simply allows the members of the senate to see by the voting in the different states which way the feeling of their states is going, and they will know exactly then as to whether it is or is not worth while for them to face a dissolution.
Considering that it is boasted that both the houses are based on the broadest franchise, I can see no possible reason why there should be a distinction between them. The only course will be, in fairness to both houses, as they are both based on the suffrages of the people, and both claim to be representative, to dissolve both.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL (Victoria)[11.59]:
I shall not obtrude myself on the notice of the Committee for more than a few moments. I desire to say, and to emphasise in the strongest possible manner, that if we are to have federation at all it must be on the lines common to all. This question was debated at great length at Adelaide, and I thought we had arrived at some kind of finality; but it seems that we are now rediscussing the whole matter, and all kinds of novel and dangerous proposals are being submitted to us, to which the majority of the Convention cannot agree. I was very much surprised, after the efforts of the Attorney-General of Victoria, and after his able advocacy of the referendum, that he failed to bring forward a scheme for the adoption of this novel proposal, based on wider grounder than those which has submitted. If

hon. members look at what he has proposed, they will find that, with the exception of one or two, the questions referred to are of the most trivial nature. It is proposed to revolutionise the whole of the government of the Australian colonies, and to introduce a system which has no acceptance in any Anglo-Saxon community in the world. What does the referendum mean? The effect of the referendum will be to emasculate our parliament, because if the provision be carried in its entirety, the parliament will selfishly fall back on the referendum as absolving them from any responsibility for their action.
The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
If they can resort to the referendum only after a dissolution, that is not likely to be the case!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
I do not think the proposal for the referendum is one which the Australian colonies will accept. On the other hand, I think the proposal before us is one of the most liberal ever submitted to intelligent electors. It is, if anything, of too democratic a character. However, I am quite willing to accept it. I can quite see the difficulty of my hon. friend, the Premier of New South Wales. The whole of his observations yesterday plainly showed the difficulty he feared; but I would point out to him that the Finance Committee have not been called together, and, if this Convention is not prepared to meet the great colony of New South Wales in a reasonable way, then it will be open to the right hon. gentleman and his fellow colonists to say that they will not come into the confederacy. Let us deal with one thing at a time. No reason has yet been shown why we should have recourse to the referendum.

The CHAIRMAN:
I would point out to the hon. gentleman that there is not now before the Committee any proposal for the referendum.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
It has been referred to as one of the side issues.

The CHAIRMAN:
A general discussion, upon the whole question took place on paragraph 1. That general discussion having taken place, I must now ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the amendment before them, which is that of a double dissolution. The proposal contains no reference to the referendum.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
I cheerfully bow to the Chairman's ruling. I have no wish to take up the time of the Convention unnecessarily; but I think I might be excused for having transgressed the ordinary rules of debate by referring to remarks which have accompanied the proposal in its general aspect I am aware that for the present the referendum has been dealt with, and I will, therefore, postpone any remarks which I may have to make as to that proposal. The proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Symon

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
It has been allowed to remain from 1882 to 1897, and the hon. gentleman has such power in his colony, and is so much thought of there in one branch of the legislature, if not in two, that I am sure that if he and his colleagues had seen any injustice in the provision they would have given effect to their objections,

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
It is a great deal better than nothing!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
I am prepared to accept the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Glynn, based, as it seems to me, on fifteen years experience in the colony of South Australia. In our colony we have not found any difficulty in this matter. It is true we have had differences with the other Chamber; but the other Chamber has been the aggressor in every instance.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
That is not what the other chamber says!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
But it is what I say, and I can prove it to be so incontestably.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
If one man stands still and the other man moves on, the man who moves on is bound to look like the aggressor!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
We need not discuss this proposal a second time. If you are desirous that these colonies shall federate, I think it is time that this discussion came to an end, and that we came down to a vote. If the hon. member insists upon his amendment I shall support it.

Mr. SYMON:
I intend to insist upon it as amended!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
Then I shall vote for it with such amendments as the hon. member may deem it fit to accept.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[12.3]:
I should like to make an explanation. The Premier of New South Wales appealed to me to explain what I meant. I thought I had better not do so at the time, having regard to what happened yesterday; but the right hon. gentleman sought to hold me up as a most ignorant person-

Hon. MEMBERS:
No!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
The hon. gentleman, Sir John Downer, said that I did not know what I was saying for an hour, and that is pretty rough. But I did not mind, it is only fun!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

The right hon. member represented me as saying that we wished to maintain our independence, and to have it guaranteed, and that I was under the impression that after a federal government was established the states would have all the powers they possessed at the present time. I think it would be rather absurd if, after sitting in the Convention in 1891, again in the Convention at Adelaide, and now here, I should be under the impression that, having relinquished the powers we are prepared to relinquish to the federal government, we should still occupy the same position in relation to all those matters which we occupy at the present time. I do not think the right hon. gentleman could have thought for a moment that I intended to convey anything of the kind. What I meant was that I was anxious that in the federal parliament the senate, representing the states, should not be coerced by the house of representatives, where the states might have very small representation.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I can assure the right hon. gentleman that he is perfectly correct. I did not suppose for a moment that he was not aware of the matter he refers to; but the bearing of my observation was this: that the hon. gentleman, while aware of that, was fighting all along the line to secure such a state of constitution that the states in a similar position to his own would always have a power equivalent to an independent power in a majority of the senate, leaving the larger states in a position in which they would have no guarantee whatever.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[12.8]:

I might mention, for the information of the hon. member, Sir William Zeal, that the proposal before us is not really founded upon any precedent in South Australia, because, although this provision in the law has been in force there since 1882, it has never been acted upon. The fact, therefore, that the provision is upon the statute book in South Australia is not an argument upon which much reliance can be placed. The legislation was the result of rather a single contest with the upper house. A further pretext for it was that the constitution of the electoral districts of the Upper House had been amended in 1881. That was, I think, urged as one of the arguments in favour of the passing of the provision. As a representative of one of the smaller states, I object to the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Symon. I think it will be exceedingly unfair to the larger states, and unfortunately hon. members seem to be raising the issue once more of the smaller as against the larger states.

Mr. SYMON:

That will always be raised!

Mr. GLYNN:

I do not think so. In my opinion the practical result of the operation of the constitution will be a unification with a large measure of protection for local interests, through the principle of equal representation in the senate. I do not think there is any need to raise the bugbear of state interests; in doing so you really endanger the passing of the constitution itself. I would suggest to the hon. member, Mr. Symon, that he should not insist on something that would probably lead to the defeat of this amendment; but that he should accept the evident sense of the Committee, that the dissolution must be a joint one; and in order that the dissolution shall not be too hasty, I would suggest that he should amend the amendment by making it provide for a dissolution after the passing by the house of representatives of the measure in two successive sessions not that a general election should be interposed, for, if so, you might be met by the objection, properly raised by the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, that that would be subjecting the house of representatives to a second dissolution, and the result would be that the initiative in a matter of radical legislation would never or seldom come from the house of representatives. I therefore suggest that the hon. member should omit the following words:

"the governor-general should on that account dissolve the house of representatives, and if within six months after the said dissolution"; and that after the words "the house of representatives" in the next line, he should insert the words "in the next succeeding session." That would mean that if the house of representatives in two successive sessions passed the law, then both houses should be dissolved.

Mr. SYMON:

Without a general election intervening?

Mr. GLYNN:

Yes, without a general election intervening. I cannot understand the position taken up by some representatives of the larger states. Some members of the smaller states are not asking for this. We do not want to make the upper house the stronghold of conservatism.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Nor do we!

Mr. GLYNN:

If you leave out of account the fact that we shall be dealing with unitarian matters under this constitution you may convert the upper house into one of the most conservative houses that we could possibly conceive. I am justified in saying that, by the, position taken up in America by the Senate on many questions.

An Hon. MEMBER:
How would the amendment read, as the hon. member suggests it should?
Mr. GLYNN:
It would read as follows:-
If the senate reject or fail to pass any proposed law which has passed the house of representatives, or pass the same with amendments with which the house of representatives will not agree, and if the house of representatives in the next succeeding session again pass the said proposed law in the same or substantially the same form as before, and with substantially the same objects, and the senate again reject or fail to pass the said proposed law or pass the same with amendments with which the house of representative will not agree, the governor-general may dissolve the senate and the house of representatives, and thereupon all the members of both houses of the parliament shall vacate their seats.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Mr. GLYNN:
There must be at least an interval of five or six weeks. The writs cannot be issued and returned in less than five or six weeks, and during that time there will be an opportunity for members to express their opinions, and for a decision to be come to upon them. If we do not have what I propose, we would take away from the house of representatives the initiation of radical measures, and I will not consent to that. I believe that the legislation of the federal parliament will mostly be on matters of general policy, and not in one case out of a thousand on matters touching merely state interests, and I think that unless such an amendment as I suggest be adopted, the constitution might be endangered by the raising of exceedingly dangerous issues. A double dissolution would have this advantage: If you were to send only one house to the country you might, as at present, have many members returned largely on personal considerations, and the interests on which the test was intended to be taken might be subordinated to those considerations; but if you were to send the two houses to the country together, what would be prominent in the minds of the electors would be the fact that there was a fight between the two houses, and the issue would turn, not on the personnel of the members, but on the question of one house as against the other, and you would have a very great chance of the house of representatives, if it were in the right, being returned with the same personnel as before.

Mr. SYMON:
So you would if the dissolution was not concurrent!

Mr. GLYNN:
What I say is, that if the dissolution were concurrent the chances of that would be greater, for if you sent the two houses to the country at the same time, the prominent fact in the minds of the people would be that there was a conflict between the two houses, and, if you sent the members of one house only to their constituents, I am afraid that they would lose sight of the great national measure, and would return members largely, as at present, on personal and local considerations; for we know how exceedingly hard it is to get an expression of opinion on measures as against local interests and personal preferences.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The people will look after that!

Mr. GLYNN:
There is too much talk about the people and what in the abstract they might do. We must look at the matter from the broad lines of commonsense. We know from experience that we do not get a clear-cut issue at many elections, and that if there is a broad issue put before the electors their judgment is apt to be swayed under present conditions by personal and local considerations. Therefore, if we are to have a penal dissolution, we ought to have the one that applies to a unitarian government, as it exists at present, with the addition of delay and the inclusion of the second chamber. I hope that the hon. member, Mr. Symon, will accept the amendment that I have suggested.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)
I think that the Committee have pretty generally come to the conclusion that as a step towards settling deadlocks a dissolution of both houses should take place, The difference of opinion seems to be as to whether the dissolution of both houses should be simultaneous, or whether i and it also means a great loss in the industrial progress of the community, and a great delay in political progress. I say that in the application of any system for getting rid of difficulties between the two houses, we should be careful not to make the settlement of those questions more onerous to the country generally than is necessary, and, therefore, a very strong reason why the two dissolutions should be taken together is that the whole question at issue instead of dragging on, perhaps, for six months, would be settled at one time through the states, and through the constituencies representing the nation.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Taking them separately would be doubling the expense, too!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Yes, as the hon. member points out, taking them separately would be doubling the expense, which, because of the immense area of the constituencies, would be a very serious consideration.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The second might never come about!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
The second might never come about, but we are dealing with a case in which both might, and probably would, be used. The hon. member, Mr. Glynn, has made a suggestion which I do not think the Committee will fall in with. The proposal of my hon. friend, Mr. Symon, seems to contemplate that the senate is the house which is standing out, and which is not in accord with the opinions of the people generally.

Mr. SYMON:
Oh, no!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I should like to point out to the hon. and learned member, and to those who wish to see the senate maintain the qualities of permanence and stability as far as possible under this constitution, that a plan which enables the senate to be dissolved at the will of the majority of the house of representatives is a plan which, to a very large extent, puts that weapon in the hands of a majority of the house of representatives. The original proposal, which the hon. gentleman proposes to amend the first paragraph of the amendment of the New South Wales Parliament deals with this question, it appears to me, on truer lines, from the point of view that the difficulty might arise in either house of parliament, and it provides that if either house disagrees with the other, then the house which passes the bill without amendment, which bill is not assented to by the other house, may be, the cause of the dissolution. That is to say, it is not only in the house of representatives that the difficulty may arise; it may arise in the senate. One can easily understand a political position of that kind. Suppose, for instance, that towards the close of the life of a parliament a ministry thought it had the country and the states with it, but, for some reason or other it was in a minority in the house of representatives, the difficulty would concern both houses, and why should not the majority in the senate be entitled to have the question sent to the country?
The Hon. S. Fraser:
You would be making it the aggressive house then. The upper houses have never been the aggressive houses hitherto!

The Hon. R.E. O'Connor:
The hon. member falls into a confusion of ideas when he speaks about the aggressive house. The house of progressive active legislation is always regarded as the aggressive house by the house which wants to stand still. If a measure is passed by the senate to which the house of representatives is opposed, the hon. member might describe the senate as the aggressive house. The term is one which has no meaning whatever.

Mr. Higgins:
The proposed law is also aggressive!

The Hon. R.E. O'Connor:
What I want to point out to my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon, is: that there was a difference of opinion as to whether the dissolution should or should not be concurrent. I am afraid that if the hon. and learned member's amendment is carried, he will lose the very great advantage of being able to use the weapon of dissolution in the case where the senate stands out for its rights, and will only be able to apply it when the house of representatives does so.

Mr. Symon:
I should not like to lose that provision!

The Hon. R.E. O'Connor:
If the hon. and learned member will look at the amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, he will find that it reads as follows:-

57. (a) If either house of parliament shall, in two consecutive sessions of the same parliament, with an interval of at least six weeks between -

That is too short a period-pass and transmit to the other house for its concurrence therein any proposed law which such other house fails to pass without amendment, within thirty days after receiving the same, in the second session, or within such period passes, with any amendment not agreed to by the house transmitting the proposed law, the provisions of the following sections of this part shall apply.

If the early part of that amendment is left, and there is added to it a provision that, under these circumstances, the Governor shall have the power to dissolve both houses of Parliament, you are applying what is a perfectly just principle that is, that either house may have the advantage of the appeal ensured by the dissolution of both houses.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The smaller states have asked for that!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I do not know whether they have or have not asked for it. My endeavour is to make the constitution as just and fair as possible.

An Hon. MEMBER:
We have all the same object in view!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I think we have all the same object in view. I regard this dissolution, not as a weapon to be placed in the hands of the majority of the house of representatives, not as an additional aid to be given to an executive government, but simply as an exceptional remedy to be applied in a case where the two houses cannot agree. It is for that reason that I should like to have this power exercised equally on behalf of the house of representatives and on behalf of the senate. Therefore, I suggest to the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, that it would be much better for his view if, in that spirit of compromise which he has been so willing to show hitherto, inasmuch as the sense of the Committee generally appears to be in favour of the double and concurrent dissolution, he will recognise the situation, withdraw his amendment, and accept the first portion of the amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, adding to it a provision giving power to the governor to dissolve both houses.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)
I agree with the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, that to give this additional power to either house would be a great advantage, and would have a modifying influence upon both chambers; but what I object to, and what I hope the Committee will bear in mind, is this and for the purpose of my argument I will state an extreme case. Suppose a designing executive has set its mind upon some measure. It might possibly get the house of representatives to agree to it. Another session could then be held by design within a few weeks, and the same body would, of course, not go back upon their votes, but would agree to the proposal a second time, as indeed they would, if they were asked to do so, a third, fourth, and even a fifth time. I would ask the Committee, however, to provide for the intervention of time between the first and the second passing, so as to allow the voice of the country to be heard in the meantime.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
Does the hon. gentleman mean by dissolving the house of representatives?

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Yes.

Dr. QUICK:
Why not the senate!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I believe, as the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest just now stated, that the opinion of the country obtained through the house of representatives would have just as good an effect upon the senate as if the senate was dissolved.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Would the hon. gentleman like to substitute the senate for the house of representatives?

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I do not know that that would be such a great drawback as the hon. and learned member thinks. What I desire is that the opinion of the country may be obtained before any measure is passed a second time. What is the use of passing it a second time unless the opinion of the country has been obtained upon it in the meanwhile? I have seen the time in my own colony, and I think in other colonies, when the house of representatives would have passed a measure a dozen times if necessary, so long as there was no dissolution. Surely legislation is not of such a character that the people of Australia cannot wait a few months to make sure that their matured judgment is in favour of a proposed change.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
To ascertain their opinion would the hon. member agree that the house which refused in two sessions to pass a bill should be the house to be dissolved whichever house it might be?

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I would agree to the dissolution of the senate if the opinion of the country was obtained by a general election.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That might be penalising, a house which was in the right!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Every general election is in a sense a penal election. At any rate many members think it so.

The Hon. A.J. PEACOCK:
The men who are "licked"?

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Yes; the men who are "licked" think it doubly penal. If the government of the day set its heart upon a measure which was not in the interests of the nation, and the senate refused to agree to that measure, I think that the voice of the people should be heard before the measure was thrust down their throats against their true judgment. Times without number I have seen it illustrated that a house of representatives would pass a measure at the dictation of the government. Every political man in the community and in this Convention knows that a powerful government, and sometimes a weak government, can get a house of representatives to pass a measure without any trouble whatever. I hope this Convention will see that the opinion of the country is obtained by a general election before this power is given to the house of representatives. There is no necessity for rushing this legislation. Cannot we go on in the same way as all other British countries have gone on from time immemorial, and they are all powerful cannot we wait six or even twelve months without any jeopardy to their living interests? Therefore, be moderate.

Hon. MEMBERS:

Hear, hear!

The Hon. S. FRASER:

I suppose I can sit down after those cheers?

Hon. MEMBERS:

No!

The Hon. S. FRASER:

I hope the Convention will in house of representatives need not be in such hot haste that they will force a measure on the senate. Let the ordinary time elapse, it may be only three or six months, and let the opinion of the country be obtained with proper machinery and in a proper manner. If we are going to have federation, surely we ought to rise above the miserable feeling of forcing a constitution on this country which is not on the face of any statute in the British world.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales)[11.33]:

I think I can make a suggestion which may possibly get over the whole of this difficulty, that is that we should pass this proposal, and not make it applicable to the representatives of Victoria in the senate.

The Hon. J. HENRY (Tasmania)[11.35]:

It may be supposed that an apology is necessary for a layman to address the Convention, but, perhaps, no apology is necessary on this occasion, seeing that the hon. and learned members of the Convention have spoken at length. I hope hon. members will bear with me while I state the reason why
I am opposed to any proposal for giving the house of representatives practically the power of dissolving the senate. I should like to premise this: that I am on the side of what is called liberal politics, and it is not from any obstinate, conservative point of view that I speak. We have started with this constitution-building, and we admit that the bicameral system is to be portion of the constitution. It occurs to me that there is a strong necessity to see that the second chamber shall be an effective brake on any hasty legislation which is one of the purposes for which I understand second chambers are instituted. The senate which we propose under this bill, as we know, will occupy the dual position of a state house, and also a house which, at the same time will perform the ordinary functions of a second chamber in general legislation. I start with this, and I know it is admitted by all reasonable democrats that a brake on democracy to prevent undue haste is absolutely necessary. The question that arises in my mind is this, whether the giving practically to a majority in the house of representatives the power to dissolve the senate in case of disputes will not impair the efficiency of that brake.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The house of representatives will dissolve itself at the same time!

The Hon. J. HENRY:

I am aware of that, and I will deal with that presently. We know from practical experience of politics that it has happened in the history of colonial legislation that a ministry has used the threat of a dissolution without any intention of executing it to intimidate weak-kneed or rebellious members. If we place this weapon in the hands of a majority, in the hands of the ministry of the day in the house of representatives, it will be exercised as a threat, not necessarily to be put into execution; but I fear it will be used by ministers in exceptional cases against the senate when a conflict arises, so that weak-kneed members of the Senate may be forced to yield, and consent to the passing of a law which is opposed to their convictions. That is what weighs with me in voting against any proposal to dissolve the senate. I, in common with other members, have agreed that a concession shall be made. Although we consider it unnecessary to make any provision for deadlocks, yet we have yielded to the arguments urged by so many hon. members that such a provision will facilitate the great cause in which we all have a common interest. While opposing a dissolution of the senate on any account unless stronger reasons are urged which will remove the doubts I have in my mind on the point. I have just raised, I am prepared to vote for the referendum of the hon. member Mr. Isaacs. I know that you, sir, have ruled that that referendum cannot be discussed, and I have no wish to transgress that ruling; but I would like to say that it appears to me there is so little difference in effect between the proposal to dissolve both houses and the proposed referendum, that I think it is unnecessary to adopt both measures. The only difference that occurs to me is, that in the one case-that of the referendum you will have an expression of opinion by the whole of the states and of the people, whereas by a dissolution of both houses you will have a doubtful expression of opinion on account of the personal and other considerations which will weigh with the electors in returning members to the senate or house of representatives. For these reasons I shall feel it my duty to oppose any proposal to dissolve the senate. I would further add that, so far as I have studied this question, the great distinction between these two houses one important distinction, at any rate, is that although both are elected by the same franchise, in the case of the senate, the longer tenure of office and the provision that half the members shall retire every three years, secures continuity to that body. If you give the proposed power to dissolve the senate, you will impair or destroy that conservative element in the senate. For that reason I shall vote against any proposal to dissolve the senate.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[12.40]:

I desire to say in reference to the point my hon. friend has raised as to substituting, as I think he intends, a double referendum, or something of that kind, for a dissolution, instead of having a dissolution first, which is the intention of my hon. friends from Victoria, as one safeguard, superadding to that, if they can, some other provision, which I do not intend to discuss, he proposes that there should be one, and one only, and of the two he prefers the referendum. I regret that I am unable to accept the amendment suggested by my hon. friend, Mr. Glynn, because it really emasculates the proposition. It takes out of it the very element which I, at any rate, desire to have decided, and which I think hon. members of this Convention desire to have decided, namely, whether those of us who are in favour of a dissolution as one step-a first step, but, perhaps, not a final step-in this process, prefer that the dissolution of the two houses should be successive or concurrent. If we were to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend it would interpose between the passing of the measure and the dissolution of the senate, not an appeal to the people by the house of representatives, but merely a second session. Now, that is not the point to which I have sought to direct attention by this amendment. I am deeply indebted to my hon. and learned friend, Mr. O'Connor, for the suggestion he has thrown out, and, more than that, for the exceedingly moderate and fair way in which he has put the view that he has commended to my acceptance in connection with this amendment. I feel with him that, whether in substance or not, it has, at any rate, an appearance of conferring upon the senate a power seemingly co-ordinate with the power which would be vested in the house of representatives, and to that extent it would be an advantage, and I should like to see it secured. But at present it does not appear to me to be capable of being secured conjointly with the principle which I seek to affirm, of having a dissolution of the house of representatives before any dissolution of the Senate. I do not see how it can be fitted in, and of the two I should prefer to guard the senate against being dissolved at the dictation of a majority of the house of representatives rather than put it in the power of the senate to drive the house of representatives to the constituencies. I think of the two this is the better in the interests of the senate and the interests they are specially elected to serve.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
The clause might be recommitted with the view of assimilating the two!

Mr. SYMON:
No doubt. I want specially to point out that my only desire is to affirm the principle, to ask the Convention to decide whether they wish a concurrent dissolution of the senate and house of representatives, or whether they wish to have a successive dissolution of the two chambers.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
That is the issue!

Mr. SYMON:
That is the issue, and it is from that point of view that, with the permission of the chamber, I have withdrawn those other provisions which simply entangle that issue. I think that is reasonable and clear. I do not see my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, here-

An Hon. MEMBER:
He has gone, of course!

Mr. SYMON:
He has gone, and, therefore, all I will say is, that I did not take it as any particular argument against the principle embodied in this amendment that it should be characterised as an absurdity. I am not thin-skinned at all; I know that my right hon. friend is a master of picturesque and figurative expressions, and therefore I always feel that when he uses an epithet of that kind it is not intended really to convey argument but to embellish his discourse. That, I take it, is the only use to which the hon. members of this Convention would be disposed to apply these highly-entertaining, but, so far as furthering the object we have in view is concerned, not very effective expressions. Upon the principle of successive, as opposed to concurrent dissolution, all I say is this, in one word, the house of representatives is supposed specially to represent the people of the nation. I think we may take that as admitted on all hands, even by those of us who desire to secure a strong and effective senate. If the house of representatives passes a measure, and sends it to the senate, and the senate rejects it, it in effect says, "You do not represent the people," so far as that particular measure is concerned, and the house of representatives then, if a dissolution is brought, about, go to the people with the view of ascertaining whether they do or do not represent the people, and coming back with the mandate of which the senate says they stand in need. That is the principle underlying every system of responsible government with which I am acquainted. It is the principle upon which the House of Lords in England rejected the Home Rule Bill. They said that in passing the Home Rule Bill the House of Commons did not represent the people. It was a plea, an effective plea, for delay, and having put in that effective plea for delay, a dissolution took place, and upon that dissolution, instead of the Gladstonian policy of Home Rule being affirmed, it was rejected, and the measure has never again seen the light. We are introducing into this federal system responsible government, and the underlying principle is that the house of representatives, representing the people, is amenable to some degree of criticism on the part of the house which imposes the check, and that it is within the constitutional consequences that it shall go to its constituents. If it comes back supported by the people, the senate must either give way or go to its constituents. That is the proper constitutional course, and it is upon these grounds, stated in one sentence, that I venture to say that the principle of successive dissolution, dissolution of the senate after a dissolution of the house of representatives, and with that interval, is the proper order in which these proceedings should take place. Therefore, on that ground, with a view to have the principle either affirmed or negatived at this stage, I propose to press the amendment.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS (Tasmania): was understood to say that, in his opinion, neither a referendum nor a dissolution of the senate was required in this constitution. The Attorney-General in Victoria had alluded to the state of England at the time of the Reform Bill. The Reform Bill had no more to do with the question before the Convention than had the man in the moon. The Reform Bill was introduced because the people were not properly represented in the House of Commons, and by the carrying of the measure, what was almost a revolution was prevented. But here the circumstances were entirely different. Under the commonwealth the house of representatives would be elected by the people, and the senate also would be elected by the people. We talked about the popular chamber; but, under this constitution, which would be the popular chamber? It would be that which would support the general views of the community. It did not follow that the house of representatives would be the popular chamber. We knew that ministers had certain ways of influencing constituencies, and that it was very easy for the house of representatives, through the ministry, or for the ministry through the house of representatives, to get up a cry against the other house. In this colony the Council was a nominee house; in Tasmania we were more liberal, but we were called conservatives. It was just the opposite. Any man might be elected to a seat in the Upper House, for no qualification was required, except that a man should be of full age and be a natural-born or naturalised subject of her Majesty. In New South Wales, however, they nominated their councillors, and yet they talked about their liberties. In our little colony we had true liberty in every shape and form; the only true ballot which existed throughout Australia was in Tasmania. In any colony on the main land you could trace out how a man voted, but in Tasmania you could never trace out how a man voted. Now, what did we want with all this machinery? Why not go to the people at once? If there was to be a referendum let there be one. He was perfectly indifferent what course they took. Why should you have all these absurd provisions for spending the money of the country? Why not vote on the point at once, and if the two houses did not agree, have a referendum and be done with it.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Move an amendment in that direction!

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[12.54]:
It has been attempted to justify our refusal to send the senate to its constituents by some analogy between the senate and the House of Lords.

Mr. SYMON:
There is no analogy whatever!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
I am glad that my hon. and learned friend has to abandon the argument. The reason why the Lords are not sent to the constituencies the same as the House of Commons is because the House of Lords has no constituencies to be sent to.
The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
We all know that!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
I am very pleased that we agree in that matter. It is a very different thing when there are two houses claiming practically the same constituents, and a difficulty as to which is faithfully interpreting the desire of the constituencies. I submit that, under such circumstances, the proper course is to send both at the same time, and let the constituencies decide between them. The suggestion that it should be placed in the power of one house to refrain from subjecting itself to a popular verdict while sending the other to the constituencies is indefensible.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[12.56]:
I was not in the Chamber this morning during the greater part of the speech of the Premier of New South Wales. I understand that there were some mutual explanations between himself and the Premier of Western Australia, which I, unfortunately, did not hear, and that in the course of them the Premier of New South Wales referred to my observations of yesterday as being decidedly insulting.

An Hon. MEMBER:
He did it very good humouredly, though!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I am quite sure that no one in the Chamber could be more reluctant to insult anyone with whom he is on terms of personal friendship than myself. I am happy to say on this occasion that the Premier of New South Wales himself accepted the position that he was not addressing the Convention but the public outside, and in what I said I was only repeating what he had said. Unfortunately, I do not see the hon. member, Sir William Zeal, in his place. I managed to offend him by an interjection this morning.

An Hon. MEMBER:
He is not offended!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
We are working sole-heartedly on the same side that I really could not understand how on earth I could have offended him. On the question before the Committee, I will vote with my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon. My view is so strongly against the possibility of what they call a deadlock, against there being any necessity to provide this machinery, that I will vote for minimising any cure which may be set up for a disease which is not likely to exist to any appreciable extent. But, in the end, if we are, and the house is resolved that we shall have some mode of sending the senators back to their constituents, I care not at all whether there is a joint dissolution or a separate dissolution.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I care not whether the senate and the house of representatives are sent back together or separately. It will make no substantial difference in the result. We have no analogy. All the analogies which are set up are false analogies.

Mr. SYMON:
They are only illustrations they are not analogies!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
They are illustrations, not analogies. I am sure that my hon. and learned friend, if, unfortunately, his amendment should happen to be lost, would have no fear himself in cheerfully adopting the other proposal, which the Premiers of New South Wales and Victoria seem to favour, of having a joint dissolution.

Mr. SYMON:
I think this is better; that, is all!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
For my own part, I am indifferent if nothing is done. First of all I think that this provision as to a deadlock is absolutely unnecessary; but as the Committee has decided that it is necessary although I shall vote for minimising the operation of every proposal which is made, I care not whether there is a dissolution with the precautions surrounding it, which my hon. and learned friends seek to surround it with, or whether there be a joint dissolution in the way in which the representatives of the larger colonies seem to prefer.

Question-That the following words be inserted in the proposed new clause after the word "If" in line 1:-the senate reject or fail to pass any proposed law which has passed the house of representatives, or pass the same with amendments with which the house of representatives will not agree, and if the governor-general should dissolve the house of representatives, and if, within six months after the said dissolution, the house of representatives by an absolute majority again pass the said proposed law in the same or substantially the same form as before, and with substantially the same objects, and the senate again reject or fail to pass the said proposed law or pass the same with amendments with which the house of representatives will not agree, the governor-general may dissolve the senate-put. Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[2.3]:

   After the vote which was taken before we adjourned-
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
   I desire to move an addition to the words which have been agreed to!
Mr. LYNE:
   So do I. I am about to read the words the addition of which I propose to move. Whatever may be the views of hon. members as to the result of the vote which has been taken, there is no other course for them but to add to the words which have been passed any other provision which they may deem desirable. The addition which I intend to propose is one which I think should be proposed at this juncture. I was quite prepared to vote in favour of the double dissolution of the senate and house of representatives concurrently.

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer:
And stop there?

Mr. Lyne:
No, I would not stop there. I intend to move the addition of the following words to the words which have been agreed to:—

And if, after a dissolution of both houses of the federal parliament, as above provided, the subject matter of the contention that led to such dual dissolution is again passed by the house of representatives, and again rejected by the senate, such measure shall be referred to the electors of the commonwealth by means of a national referendum, and, if resolved in the affirmative, shall become law.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:
I think my proposal would really come before that of the hon. gentleman!

Mr. Lyne:
I hardly think that any other proposal can come before mine. I intended this morning, had there not been so much discussion upon the proposal of Mr. Symon, to suggest to the leader of the Convention that it would be more convenient to deal with this question of a mass or general referendum before dealing with any of the intermediate proposals which may take its place if it be rejected. My reason for wishing to do so was this: Take my own case, and the case, perhaps, of other hon. members of the Convention.

I should be prepared, probably to vote for some intermediate course if I found it impossible to obtain a mass or general referendum. But until such time as a vote was taken upon that question, I should be compelled to vote against any other proposal which might be submitted to take its place. So that, in that case, my vote might be misconstrued, and I should be placed in an unenviable and awkward position. That being so, it seems to me that the proper time to discuss the question of a mass or general referendum is now.
If it be defeated, then I say, unhesitatingly, that, as far as I am personally concerned, I may see my way clear to vote for some intermediate course. I could not do that if I were put in the position of having to vote upon everything until I had an opportunity to vote upon the question of a general referendum. On the question of a general referendum, that is, the desirableness of leaving the question to be decided by the people as a whole, I think there is very little necessity for me to say much at the present time. I feel that, in a country like this, we cannot go far wrong if we leave to the verdict of the whole people any serious or important question. It would be a safeguard in the future against a combination by any state or states, or by any section, small or large, of the people for the purpose of carrying against a majority any proposal of a serious character which may be submitted to the general parliament, passed by the house of representatives, and rejected by the senate. When this Convention met in Adelaide, and when we discussed the question of equal state representation there, I felt that we could have well done without the proposition that I am making at the present time, and also any other safety measure for deadlocks, by providing for a dissolution of both houses, had this Convention agreed to proportional representation in the senate. That, to my mind, underlies the whole question. It would have been infinitely better, to my mind, to agree to proportional representation in the senate with a dissolution in case of deadlock, than to be driven into the position in which I am driven now, somewhat against my will, of endeavouring to alleviate the position in which we find ourselves at the present time by proposing a mass referendum. I recognise that there are occasions when a question referred to the people, no matter how serious its import, may not be thoroughly understood by the people when voted upon. I recognise that that may be the case and for that reason I should be prepared to have proportional representation of the states in the senate instead of any referendum at all. I think it would have been better, as things have turned out, to have let the Convention know in Adelaide - those of us who desired some form of referendum or proportional representation - what the feeling of the people of this colony was upon this question. I took that course as far as I was concerned, and I feel in myself that I took the right course. I regret that the speech delivered yesterday by the right hon. the Premier of this colony or at any rate the substance of it, was not delivered to the Convention in Adelaide at an early stage of our proceedings, because I think the hon. gentleman would have been placed in a better position than he is placed in now by the reversal of the attitude he assumed on the first occasion. As I have said, we cannot lose sight of the fact that this question underlies the constitution of the senate. I do not think it was a right or wise thing for the right hon. Premier to lead the Convention to believe that the people of this colony were against proportional representation and in favour of equal representation, and in the last few days of this Convention, almost on the last day, to find the right hon. gentleman absolutely turning from the course he adopted when in Adelaide. I think there is no necessity for me to detain the Convention at any length upon this proposal. I recognise that it is one to which probably the smaller states will not, unfortunately for us, agree. But I do recognise that, unless we have some such provision as I am submitting now being forced into the position I am I will not say that the bill will not be accepted by the people of New South Wales, but its acceptance will be retarded.

An Hon. MEMBER:
How does the hon. member know that?

Mr. LYNE:
There is no overlooking the fact it must be patent to every member of the Convention that this question underlies the whole ultimate power of the senate, and leaves to the people as a whole, not as each state, but as a whole, the right to determine absolutely upon any particular question, after the process provided for in the hon. member, Mr. Symon's, clause. There is on every strong reason why I favour this course now, and it is this: If you have a dissolution of the senate and of the house of representatives, each house will go back to each state on its original basis. The members of the house of representatives of course go back to their separate constituencies. The members of the senate go back and ask the approval, not of the whole people, but of a section of the people as constituted in a state, and I think that the effect of that would be to make the senate very much stronger than it would be without a dissolution, because if I were a member of the senate, and took a certain course on a particular bill which was assented to by the house of representatives, and if I went before my constituents in a state, to ask their approval of my vote, and their approval was given to the course that I had taken, I should simply vote again as I had voted before; other hon. members might do the same thing, and, instead of the deadlock being done away with, it would be emphasised, and that would make the senate stronger to enforce its views against the will of the representative chamber. It is only after that point has been reached that I ask the Convention to agree to some further method of referring any particular matter that may have been dealt with up to that stage, and to ask for the vote of the people as a whole not in states as to whether that should or should not become the law of the land. I do not intend to occupy any undue time in debating this question. After the long, debate that has taken place, and when certain hon. members are anxious to close the proceedings of the Convention, if possible, within the next day or two, I do not think that this is a time when we should create delay. I simply submit this matter for the consideration of the Committee, hoping that it will meet with the approval of the majority of hon. members, which will assist me to a very large extent to overcome my objection to the bill as it is at the present time, with equal state representation, and will assist me to carry the bill to the constituencies in this colony, and ask them to give an affirmative vote to accept it as the constitution for the future commonwealth of Australasia.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid (New South Wales)[2.18]:

I do not propose at present to discuss the proposal which has been submitted by the hon. member, Mr. Lyne; but I should like to correct a misapprehension into which he has fallen in reference to my action in this matter. The hon. member is entirely mistaken in saying that, by anything which I said yesterday, I have departed from the attitude which I took up at Adelaide or at any other place. My attitude all through has been perfectly consistent. I have seen that it was impossible to secure any federation without conceding this principle, or whatever it may be called, of equal representation in the senate. That has been recognised by every person who has taken any interest in the subject during the last ten years, and I, recognising the logic of necessity, I saw at once if there was to be any federation that I must give way on that, and having given way I have not made any bargain about it. I have given away absolutely, not only now, but always; and, in speaking to the people of this colony and in my published address, I explicitly stated that I felt we must yield on that point; but I invariably connected with that most grave concession, as I take it to be, the fact that in other parts of the constitution there must be something which would moderate the force of that concession. I have invariably taken up that position.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Or destroy it!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

I do not wish to do that exactly; but I do not wish the legitimate force of numbers to be destroyed. That is the difference between the hon. member and myself. The hon. member and many others a majority, I can see, in this Chamber are determined that, at all hazards, the power of the smaller states, the power of the smaller number of people over the larger number of people shall be made absolutely sure. That is the rock from which a lot of danger will come. I have never asked for quite so much as that in the interests of the larger populations; but unless my hon. friends are prepared to moderate their demands for certainty for themselves, and do not give us even the pleasures of uncertainty as to our position, I am afraid that I shall have to address the Convention even more emphatically than I did yesterday.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[2.21]:

With a large number of the observations made by the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, I thoroughly agree; and if his amendment goes to a division I feel, though with very great reluctance, bound to say that, somewhat against my own feelings and convictions, I shall be compelled to vote for it, after the vote which has just been given. I feel that, by the action of the representatives of the smaller states, I have been placed in a false position; I feel it very difficult to get out of. If I am compelled to vote for this amendment, I shall be compelled to take a step that I strongly feel is not altogether in the interests of the federal movement; yet, to my mind, it is the only step that can offer us any means of escape from the difficult position in which we have been placed. I want, if I possibly can, to avoid that, and I was anxious to move an amendment in the first instance. The only way in which I can now bring the matter before the Convention is by moving an amendment on that of my hon. friend. In the first instance, we, who represented what we considered to be the feelings of the people of Victoria, at the Adelaide Convention desired to have a referendum direct a referendum of some sort without any double dissolution without any dissolution at all. We thought we were carrying out the wishes of our people by asking that, if any dispute arose between the two houses, and they unfortunately could not settle that dispute, the matter should go directly to the people for their decision.

An Hon. MEMBER:

And not the states!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

We were prepared to accept a referendum to the people and the states; although, if I interpret rightly what the people of Victoria would desire, they would ask for the national referendum; but, feeling that in that they were going further than the small states were likely to go, we were willing, as we always have been-and I especially have been to concede as much as we possibly could to the smaller states for the purpose of gaining the larger object; and I, from observations made to me by some of my colleagues, have come very strongly to the conclusion that, holding a leading position in the Colony of Victoria,

I have from the first taken a wrong course that I have conceded, honestly conceded, too much to this Convention.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

You do not get much thanks for your concession, can see!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
It would have been far better if I had kept back my own personal desires, and asked for more if I had haggled and endeavoured to make bargains. But that is not my nature, either here or elsewhere. I honestly put forward what I think ought to be carried. That being our view that we did not want to have anything to do with a dissolution, either joint or separate, but wanted simply a referendum of some sort we, in order to meet the wishes of other representatives here, and, as I said the other night, if possible to get a unanimous or nearly unanimous vote on this great difficulty we, against our own convictions, were prepared to postpone the referendum until after the question had been decided by a double dissolution. But we are not prepared to postpone the referendum until after the question has been decided by a penal dissolution of one house, and afterwards by a dissolution of the other chamber.

Mr. SOLOMON:

The dissolution under this amendment is not necessarily penal!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Not necessarily; but it generally will be!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Then we do not want it at all.

Mr. SYMON:

It is substantially a general election!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Why encumber the bill with it if that is all it means? I take it that if the government of the day were within a few months of the expiration of parliament, they would not rush for a penal dissolution. The object of the provision is that if disputes arise in the early life of a parliament, there will be some means of going direct to the people and having the question settled at once, without waiting two and a half years for parliament to expire. It can surely never be intended that this dissolution is only to come into operation on the expiration of parliament by effluxion of time. That would be too absurd, and I am sure that my hon. and learned friend never intended such a thing. I was prepared, against what I believed to be the strongly expressed desire of the people of Victoria, and against the very strong protest of my hon. colleagues, expressed by their voices if not by their votes, to concede a great deal to the smaller states; because I know that, while I shall find it difficult to induce the people of Victoria to accept the various concessions which have been made, the hon. gentlemen who represent the smaller colonies will find it equally difficult to induce their people to accept the bill, and I wanted to make the trouble as little as possible for both of us. I am surprised at the result of the vote which has taken place. I cannot say that it was a wrong and improper one, because it was the vote of the majority; but, having listened to the speeches which were made here today, and on former occasions, I was perfectly certain that a very large majority were prepared to agree to what I believe to be a reasonable and proper course, the double dissolution. While I am surprised and sorry at the result of today's vote, I am more sorry that the result of the division was brought about by a combination of the representatives of the smaller states.

Mr. SYMON:

The opposite vote was a combination of the larger states!

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

What does the right hon. member call a combination?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I do not mean anything improper.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

Then, why say it?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

If the word has a meaning which is improper, I will not use it. I will say, instead, that this result has been brought about by an unfortunate joining of the votes of the representatives of the smaller states.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

Four South Australian representatives voted with the right hon. member!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

What will be the result of this division in the minds of the people of the larger colonies? They will say that what will happen today will happen when we have a senate in which the states are equally represented, and that they are not prepared to trust themselves to a body which will have the great powers which we have given to it, and will not be subject to dissolution until after the popular assembly has gone through all the pains and penalties of that process. That will be the view of a large number of our people. I feel that the plan proposed is so unfair that I am prepared to adopt any other plan. I will, if I cannot carry the amendment which I intend to propose, vote for the proposal of my hon. friend, though I do not want to do so if I can avoid it. I want to get back to the position in which I stood before I made a great concession by agreeing to a double dissolution before a referendum. I desire that there should be the two modes. The mode which has been carried will, I presume, be insisted upon by the victorious party. It provides for two separate dissolutions. Of course, if they agreed to a double dissolution, the whole matter would be settled. I must assume, unless I hear to the contrary, that hon. members are prepared to stand by the victory which they have just gained. Then I want, in justice to myself and to the colony of Victoria, to get back to the position in which we were at Adelaide, and I therefore desire to strike out the first word of my hon. friend's proposal in order to insert the words

Provided that in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives, the proposed law should be referred to the direct determination of the people, as herein after provided.

While I was prepared to accept a double dissolution with the referendum added, if it should ever become necessary, though I believe that it never would be necessary, I cannot agree to, the proposal, which has been carried, which is that first of all we should punish the house of representatives, and that the, senate, which it is to be supposed would do the blocking, should, stand quietly by and force the members of the house of representatives into heavy expense and loss. Since I cannot get what I consider a fair and just compromise a double dissolution-I must fall back upon, our original proposal, and with a view to getting it, with a view to ascertaining whether my hon. friends from the smaller states are prepared to help us out of this difficulty, I suggest, in lieu of this proposal, which we look upon as something we, ought not to accept, the simple expedient of going direct to the people.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

Does the right hon. member suggest that by way of alternative?

Mr. SYMON:

Where would the right hon. member's amendment come in?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The hon. and, learned, member, Mr. Symon, has carried an amendment which provides that if the senate rejects a measure the house of representatives may be dissolved, and if, after the house of representatives has come back victorious the senate will not pass the measure, the senate may be dissolved. Now, why, should we have this turmoil and trouble going on month after month-why should we have all the trouble and bother of electing the house of representatives if the senate in not to be bound to accept the decision of the house of representatives after its return? I could understand the hon. and learned member if he said that the house of representatives should go to the people, and, if they came back with a majority, the senate should be compelled to give way, as is the constitutional principle in England and in the colonies.

An Hon. MEMBER:

You might as well wipe out the senate in that case!
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

No. In the proposal which we have carried, you ultimately wipe out the senate if they are wrong. You would only wipe them out under my suggestion if the people said that the house of representatives was right and the senate wrong. I do not want to have the turmoil and trouble which the proposal of the hon. and learned member would cause. Month after month must go by, and the whole commonwealth be thrown into a state of disorder when these disputes occur. Twelve months will not cover the period of disorder.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

It would only be in a very extreme case that these disputes would occur!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

So much the more reason why my hon. and learned friend should consider the very reasonable appeal which I made the other night. When these disputes do arise, we should have twelve months turmoil, trouble, and delay, besides the enormous expense of the elections. I feel the seriousness of the position in which we stand; therefore, in fairness to ourselves, I want to get back to the original position. Having held out the olive branch which I believed would be accepted, and having, failed by a considerable majority, I cannot conscientiously agree to the decision which has been come to. I now want the smaller states to put us back in the position in which we were before. My amendment is shortly this: that where a bill has been rejected in the manner described by the amendment, in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives and sending them to the people, and then following that up with the other dissolution, there shall be a choice, an option of appealing to a referendum.

An Hon. MEMBER:

What referendum?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I am not going to say what sort of referendum.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The dual referendum!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I am perfectly prepared, personally, to accept the double referendum.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Hon. members will not know what they are voting for unless you put in the dual, or the national referendum!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I have left that open.
Mr. LYNE:

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The hon. member's proposal would shut out mine altogether. It assumes that the two dissolutions are to take place. I consider that is hopeless.

Mr. LYNE:

Does the hon. member's amendment propose to alter the decision which we have arrived at?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

No, I propose to give an additional means of getting out of the difficulty— an alternative leaving it to the choice of the executive of the day to adopt one course or the other. The executive of the day will be in a position to say, "We feel so sure, about this that we are prepared to allow the house of representatives to go to the country," or they may say, "We will not put the country to the enormous expense of a dissolution, and we are not going to subject the members of the house of representatives to a penal dissolution when we believe them to be right. We will adopt the principle of the referendum, go direct to the people, and get their opinion."

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

We should not object to that in the least!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I have left it in this form so that the matter can be quietly and calmly discussed, I hope without any feeling.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

What will the hon. member accept himself?

An Hon. MEMBER:

The hon. gentleman told the Convention the other night, but it was not accepted!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I am not going back on what I said the other night. If I cannot get a double dissolution I am quite prepared to wipe it off the slate altogether. If I cannot get a double dissolution I desire to wipe out the dissolution altogether, and I am prepared to take the referendum straight; but whether my colleagues are prepared to do that, or whether a majority of the Convention are, is another question. I want to have the question as fairly discussed as possible, therefore I have not attempted to cloud it with the other question of what sort of referendum we are to have. I am leaving that matter and my own mind open.
Mr. SYMON:
It will not clear it if the hon. member leaves that open!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Yes it will, in this way: If I now bring forward a hard and fast proposal, hon. members will have to vote for and against it, whereas, if I leave it open, we shall be able to discuss the matter fully, and ascertain whether we are prepared to accept either one or other class of referendum.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The difficulty is that hon. members will not be able to understand the consequence of their vote!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
it will be still open to them to come to a decision on that point. They will be perfectly prepared to say, "We are ready to give an alternative; then, when it comes to the point of saying what the form of referendum is to be, those who want the mass referendum will be in a position to vote for that; those who want the more limited referendum will be in a position to vote for it, and the majority will decide. I am going to put the amendment in this form: In lieu of a dissolution, such as is proposed, the question will be referred to the direct determination of the people "as hereinafter provided."

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Would the direct determination of the people preclude the other?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
No, the direct determination of the people "as hereinafter provided." That shows we mean to do something later on. Subject to the correction of the Chairman, I hold that it will leave it perfectly open to propose subsequently a national referendum or a dual referendum.

Mr. LYNE:
Does not your amendment in effect reverse the vote we have arrived at?

Hon. MEMBERS:
No!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
We have already provided that there shall be one means of settling the deadlock. There is nothing in the world to prevent us providing two means. All we have said is that there is one mode of doing it; but we are not bound to stop there. I shall not detain the Committee any further, I feel we are in a somewhat false position. I am anxious to get out of that difficulty and yet stand loyally by what I have promised to the smaller states.

The CHAIRMAN:
The question is as follows: The Hon. member, Mr. Lyne, has moved to insert certain words. An amendment has been moved to leave out the word "if" in those words: The question is that the word "if" be left out in the proposed addition to the proposed paragraph of the proposed new clause, with the view of inserting some other words.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia)[2.44]:

I have refrained during this lengthy debate from taking any part in it, because I recognise that, in this matter, which is of great importance to the federal interest, the opinions of those who have made a close study during their lifetime of constitutional law were of much more value to this Convention than my opinions could be. But after weighing carefully the opinions moments ago by the Premier of New South Wales that, when he voted for equal representation in the senate, or rather when he gave way on that question, he did so because he saw that proportional representation would mean a death-blow to the federal scheme, seems to me to justify all that the representatives of the smaller states have said in reference to the desire of some of these hon. members on the one hand to give a sham equality in the senate, a sham power of no value whatever, and on the other hand, by side-issues such as this issue to take away the privileges they otherwise would give. This appears to me to be the boiling down of the opinions of the gentlemen who have taken such a prominent part in this debate.

Mr. WISE:

Why did the hon. member play into the hands of the Premier of New South Wales by voting against us the last time?

Mr. SOLOMON:

I, unfortunately, did not vote on the last occasion.

Mr. WISE:

I thought you said you voted with the majority?

Mr. SOLOMON:

I did in the last division; but when the Convention met in Adelaide, I did not have the opportunity of either voting or taking part in a debate on this particular question.

Mr. WISE:

I was referring to the last division!

Mr. SOLOMON:

I do not think that in the last division I played into the hands of the Premier of New South Wales. On the contrary, the effect of that division has been to bring the Premier of Victoria to his feet, to tell us that, rather than sacrifice federation on this point, he is prepared to do away with this complicated question of a dissolution of each house, and to accept a referendum not a mass or national referendum, but a referendum such as most hon. members I think the majority will agree to a double referendum, a referendum to the people and to the states; a referendum in which a grave and important issue, which will be of interest to the whole of federated Australia, will not be decided by the numerical strength of one or two great colonies, parties to the federation, but will be decided both by the numerical majority, and by the majority of the states. If the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, and some of his colleagues, and a majority of this Convention, will agree to accept such a referendum, they will at once do away with all the difficulties of the smaller states in this matter. The Premier of Victoria expressed regret that he had been so candid with the Convention in regard to the concessions, as he was pleased to term them, that were made to the demands of the smaller states. For my part, I am pleased to acknowledge the candour of the right hon. gentleman. I wish that the same candour had been imitated by many other hon. members of this Convention. He has nothing whatever to regret in the action he has taken, or in the candid way in which he has given us his views. So much so, that I feel sure that, after his speech, a majority of the Convention will now be prepared to trust to the integrity of the right hon. member and those of his colleagues who are with him; and, even though we leave a loophole by admitting the portion of the amendment he has now proposed, without knowing what is to follow, we are prepared to accept his assurance that, as far as he is concerned, he is willing to concede the dual referendum. I hope hon. members, who are discussing this question now, will see the importance of recognising that this old question of state rights is at the bottom of the whole thing once again. We have been fighting this thing over day after day, fighting it over with all the cleverness, and with all the diplomatic dodges that could possibly be brought to bear, and we are now face to face once again with this question of whether the numerical majority of the more largely populated states is to rule in this federation, or whether the smaller states are to have some degree of protection. This seems to me to be coming back to the whole crux of the question again. It is absolutely useless to grant the smaller states equal representation in the senate to grant it with a great deal of "hi-falutin" about the concession which is made, with a great deal of condescension that I think is utterly unnecessary because, after all, equal representation in the senate does not amount to a very great deal, when we, have an overwhelming majority from two of the larger states in the popular chamber, the house of representatives a house which commands the whole of the finances of the federation, and which virtually commands the whole of the government. It is all very well to compare the position we are taking up here with the position in America. We have had the American Constitution, and the Swiss Constitution, and slabs of the Canadian Constitution brulded at us from all sides ad nauseam. We have had nothing else but this American Constitution from all sides of the House, and to bolster up every kind of opinion, and I have come to the conclusion that the American Constitution is such a many-sided one that it can be used to back up every argument on every possible side of the federation question. I am rather inclined to believe, with one hon. member whom I heard speak before, that it would have been a very good thing if the statistics of the various colonies had been burnt before we commenced this Convention, and if, also, we could have arranged for an exploration party to go through all the various libraries of the colonies, and burn all the works of reference on the American, Canadian, and Swiss constitutions. We should at least have been saved some hours of very eloquent dissertation, accompanied by enormous extracts from the works of writers who did not write with a knowledge of our present circumstances, or our present desires, but who wrote for an altogether different period, and different circumstances. I am inclined to think that the amendment of my hon. colleague, Mr. Symon, has placed certain members representing the larger colonies in a difficult position. Coming to this Federal Convention with an earnest desire, not to sentimentally profess to give and take, not to profess that I intend to meet every one in a spirit of conciliation, but with an earnest desire to show that I do feel that federal spirit, and that I do desire to meet the necessities of the representatives of other colonies than my own, I feel very much inclined to agree with the Premier of Victoria, that in passing the amendment of my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon, we have perhaps placed a grave difficulty in the way of some of the members of the Convention. Feeling this, and without being able to bind the Premier of Victoria to any definite declaration as to the policy of his colleagues, I am satisfied to take his word, in view of the candid manner in which he has treated the Convention right through, the straightforward speech he made the day before yesterday on this question, a speech which—well, I do not wish to make comparisons but a speech which will compare favourably for federal spirit, for straight forward businesslike declaration of opinion, with any speech that has been made since the Convention met I say, in view of all that, I am inclined to agree with the Premier of Victoria, and to give an opportunity to the Convention to reconsider the decision that has been arrived at with reference to the amendment of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, with a view, not for one instant of putting into this constitution a national or mass referendum, because that I shall oppose tooth and nail right through, as inimical in the highest degree to the best interests of the smaller states, but with a view of giving an opportunity of proposing something which may be less unacceptable, which may be less injurious in the opinion of the delegates who represent the larger colonies.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[2.55]:

I should like to put it to the Convention whether either the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, or the proposal of my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, should be accepted at the present time. In speaking to the question of conflict between the two houses not long ago, I stated that I declined to hold myself bound to any course at that stage. In what I shall do now I shall in the same way refuse to hold myself bound to a final decision, because, whatever anybody else may say, I conceive it to be our duty not to lend ourselves to any course at this stage which might mean a disastrous finality. I have been, I believe, suspected, since I spoke the other night, of a leaning towards the referendum. I have always been opposed to the referendum as an engine of government, and I am in principle opposed to the referendum now, but I decline to say that I shall put myself in such a position, or that any one of us should put himself in such a position as to say that he will sacrifice this constitution rather than submit to a referendum of some sort. This is the point where there should be an approximation of views, where the value of the union of Australia can be placed in the balance, and the question of the danger of a certain instrument of government can be put on the other side. Those of us who believe that, without any formal provision for deadlocks, the common-sense of the people and their representatives will find them a way out of deadlocks, can also believe that if we make a concession by putting on paper a provision for deadlocks, still the governing sense of the community will be the real power, whatever you may place in your constitution. I am a little opposed to the amendment of my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, because he puts it as an alternative to a dissolution. Before I go further, I should like to intimate the intention I hold with regard to the vote which has been given with respect to the consecutive dissolutions of the two houses. Having spoken the other night in favour of a double dissolution, I wish it to be understood that I meant a simultaneous dissolution, and that I find myself quite unable to agree to a proposal for consecutive dissolutions, inasmuch as such a proposal involves what seems to me to be the penalising of one house for a disagreement to which both are parties. I object to consecutive dissolutions I am not canvassing the recent vote; but only explaining my intention for another reason. I believe that they will not tend any more to an absolute solution of the question than will a concurrent dissolution; that they will repeat the friction and the turmoil at two separate times, and the result of that will be to make the process much more expensive, and the solution not any nearer.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

A double dissolution might result in the same effect!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

A double dissolution might result in the differences of the parties being still repeated, so might consecutive dissolutions, and I see no difference in the probabilities in one case and the other. I will make it my duty, when the proper time comes, to ask the Convention to reconsider the vote which has been given, and to ask the Committee whether they will not consent, as they are in favour of consecutive dissolutions of both houses, to make the dissolution simultaneous.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Would it not be possible to have that retested today?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

If by any means it is possible, I shall be very glad to consider that proposition favourably; but I would remind my right hon. friend that a little lapse of time for thought, a little time for reconsideration, is more likely to bring about a different result than to test the question again in hot blood. I have mentioned the feeling I hold about the double dissolution because I wish to say that I have not so solid an objection to the referendum—the dual referendum if it is preceded by that acknowledgment of the principle of responsibility which is involved in a double and simultaneous dissolution, as I should have if it were offered in the first resort or as a mere alternative.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

One of the reasons which induced me to agree to it is the very point the hon. and learned member has put!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

As far as I am at present advised, I am strongly against placing in the hands of the government the resort to the referendum, or the resort to the dissolution the power to accept the responsibility of their position when it is altogether safe to them to accept it, and the power to escape from the responsibility of their position when they wish to run away. That is a proposition which I cannot entertain, and I am afraid that that is the proposal involved in the amendment of my right hon. friend. I am, on the other hand, at the present stage, against the proposal of my hon. friend, Mr. Lyne, because, so far as I can see, there has not been sufficient argument adduced to convince me that the general referendum is a fair solution of difficulties in which state interests are involved. I am at one with my hon. friend in his proposal that the resort to some form of referendum should not take place until after a double dissolution has been tried. To that extent the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, and I are at one; but I am seriously troubled about the justice of a general referendum what is called a national referendum in matters where state interests are involved. As I put it before, if you have two parties to a dispute, one of them being the people at large and the other being the states, who, of course, have the people of those states behind them-if you put it into the hands of one of the parties to settle the question, you are appealing to a side which is entirely interested, and it is there indeed that the phrase used by my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, this morning is truly applicable. That is really a case of "heads I win, and tails you I"

Mr. LYNE:
How will you get finality unless you get a national referendum?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
My answer to that is: how will you get justice if you have it?

Mr. HIGGINS:
No man can serve two masters!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The finality in all constitutions, I have always pointed out, is furnished by the sense of the people, and it is furnished by the action of that sense in adopting ordinary constitutional methods of government. If we require to go further and I for one at once concede that public opinion does require us to go further-if I am to make that further step, I must consider, and I am bound to consider, whether the step I am asked to take is just. I cannot come to the conclusion, at present, at any rate, that the national referendum will be a just solution of certain of these affairs. I admit its effectiveness. It is the most effectual thing in the world. It is as effective as the guillotine but that is no argument that the guillotine was always just. The Premier of New South Wales pointed out yesterday that he would be very glad to submit to have the matters which gave rise to questions of state interest so defined in the constitution that, with respect to them, the dual referendum would obtain, whilst with respect to all others which might be regarded as purely national interests, the general or national referendum should obtain.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
"State rights" was the expression I used!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I will concede that state rights was the expression that my right hon. friend used. I used the expression "state interests" because I can see that what is at the root of this discussion is not merely state rights, but also state interests. No one knows better than the right hon. gentleman the eloquence of whose speech, of course, I admired that it is exceedingly hard to define what is a national interest purely, and what is a state interest purely. We may define what are state rights that is to say, what are the rights of legislation of states. We may leave undefined altogether what are national interests; but we shall not escape from this difficulty that, in carrying out the legislation of a federal commonwealth, there must and will be repeated instances in which the decision of questions remitted to the commonwealth must gravely and perhaps vitally affect state interests. That is the one point from which we cannot escape, and we must, in coming to our conclusion, at any rate, hold this position in view if we have ultimately, under some circumstances which I cannot yet foresee, a national referendum, let us recollect that we may decide that a great public interest requires finality, and yet confess to ourselves that, for the sake of finality, we may be committing an injustice, although we may suppose the one end to be so vital that its vast importance excuses the injustice of the means.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
That is a dangerous position!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
That is, as the hon. gentleman has suggested, a dangerous position; I admit it; but there are very few vital positions connected with the decisions upon questions of this kind. Upon the manufacture, because it is a manufacture, of a constitution for a federal commonwealth, there are very few vital points which do not involve some danger. Do not imagine for a moment that I am speaking now in favour of the general referendum. What I say is that if it becomes necessary in the end to have resort to that referendum, properly guarded, it will only be, I suppose, because we come to the conclusion that the necessities of federation, the necessities of our position, are more binding upon us than accurate justice in every respect. In the meantime, until I have that proof, I shall be an objector to the general referendum. When the Premier of New South Wales spoke yesterday, he referred to nearly all the powers of legislation embodied in clause 52 of the bill, with the view of pointing out that it would be a desirable thing if those matters in which state rights were involved could be indicated so that upon them we might consent to a dual referendum, whilst upon those matters which were purely national interests we might enforce the claim of a general referendum. The difficulty of this question, as I said, must be manifest to the right hon. gentleman, for the mere reason that those definitions are nearly impossible, for the very reason that the variety of circumstances and affairs which arise in a federal commonwealth render it impossible for you to predict with reference to a particular power of legislation whether or not the interests of one or all the states will not be involved. If I were challenged to name some of the powers with reference to which the power of a general or a dual referendum might be conceded without any consequences, I could name something like thirty powers in regard to which you might, if you were not a sensible man, say, "Yes, I will have a general referendum;" or, "yes, I will have a dual referendum"; but as to which, if you are a sensible man, you will say, "If I consent to any sort of referendum in matters of this kind I, shall be a fool." That is the position of a number of the powers mentioned in the 52nd clause. Let me refer hon. gentlemen to questions of this sort. Who wants a national or a dual referendum as to the question of posts and telegraphs? Who wants either sort of referendum as to the purchase by the government of shells and gun powder-munitions of war? Who wants a national or dual referendum about the question whether our Astronomer Royal should have a station on Mount Kosciusko for astronomical or meteorological observations? Who wants a double or single referendum as to questions of navigation, shipping, ocean beacons, quarantine, census and statistics, weights and measures, patents, and the incorporation of banks? Who wants a national or dual referendum as to these: Bankruptcy and insolvency, copyrights and patents of inventions, naturalisation and aliens that is the naturalisation of aliens, parental rights, and the custody and guardianship of infants? Is it necessary to go on to "the service and execution throughout the commonwealth of the civil and criminal process, the influx of criminals, and external affairs and treaties" Of course these are purely national matters, and I think this is where My Right Hon. friend stopped short. Who tells us that we are to take-is it a national or is it a dual referendum about this: The control and regulation of the navigation of the river Murray, and the use of the waters thereof from where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales to the sea. Do we want there a dual or national referendum? Do we want a dual or national referendum as to the control of railways with respect to transport for the military purposes of the commonwealth? I am sure the right hon. gentleman will concede to me that, in nearly all, if not all, the sub-clauses to which I have referred, it would almost be a farce to take a referendum of any kind, simply because we cannot imagine a state of political friction which would divide the commonwealth through its two legislative chambers into irreconcilable parties as to any questions of this sort. What is left?

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
That is it, come to the point!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I am coming to the point; I think I generally do. Then we will concede, as it does not much matter, that the right hon. gentleman is prepared to give us that is to say, the people of the commonwealth—a dual referendum with respect to any one of these matters I have spoken of, as to which I do not think any one wants a referendum of any sort.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I have not said a word about the dual referendum in praise or blame!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I am not saying that my right hon. friend praised or blamed the dual referendum, but he asked for a definition. Going through all these sub-clauses, he asked for a definition so that we might get to the matters in which state rights are concerned, and give to those a dual referendum, whilst he would reserve the matters in which national rights are alone concerned, and give to them a general referendum. I put out of hand a number of these sub-clauses, and I come to others:

The regulation of trade and commerce with other countries, and among the several states.

Does anyone tell me that the states are not interested in that? "Customs and excise and bounties." Who is it who contends that the states are not interested in that? "Raising money by any other mode or system of taxation," "Borrowing money on the public credit of the commonwealth," "Military and naval defence, "Immigration and emigration," the whole question of alien and coloured labour, the question of the taking over by the commonwealth with the consent of a state, of the railways of that state. That is a question upon which it will be admitted great disturbance or jealousy might arise on the part of the other states who might consider that the taking over by the commonwealth of the railway system of one state, while the railway systems of the other states were left alone, might create a situation in which they had every right to have a say. Then, as I am reminded by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, there is the public debt let us look at these things in a reasonable manner. Let us consider now the second part of these sub-clauses.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Do you think you will get an intelligent answer from a national referendum on both of these classes of subjects?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I will give an answer to that question directly.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Will a state referendum give an intelligent answer?
The Hon. E. BARTON:
If we are going to quarrel to this extent that one-half of us think that a national referendum is of no use, while the other half think that a state referendum is no good, then we have very much of a quarrel in which the old adage of rubbing it all out and beginning again would have application.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Hear, hear!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
But we are not going, if that is what my right hon. friend's interjection implies, to rub out the work we have done and to commence again.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Not the good work!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
I say we are not going to rub out the work we have done and commence again, although with reference to the vote which has just been taken, I think we might have an opportunity for reconsideration to that extent I shall be glad to assist my right hon. and learned friend. The second sub clause is "customs and excise, and bounties," and the third, "raising money by any other mode or system of taxation." I suppose that that, of all things, is what my right hon. and learned friend would describe as a national question upon which a general referendum might properly take place. Now, let us project ourselves, if our bodies be not too corporeal for that purpose, a little into the future, and imagine the position of the first parliament of the commonwealth. Will it not be necessary for that parliament to raise money I will not say by any other mode or system of taxation besides customs to carry on the government? Under this draft constitution, power is conferred upon it to raise that revenue; but it will have the task and duty of collecting the whole of the revenue of customs and excise for the whole of the states; and on the very face of the matter it will be conceded that that revenue will leave it with a large surplus, which must be distributed among the several states. A government may come into power which may say, "We conceive it to be our duty to raise sufficient revenue for the purposes of the government of the commonwealth, and also for the purpose of handing back to the various states exactly that which they possessed before the federal government was instituted." Another government may come in before or after the government to which I have just referred, and they may say this, "All we are concerned with is the maintenance of the commonwealth; let us raise sufficient money from customs and excise to enable us to carry on the business of the commonwealth; after that is done, we are not concerned how small the surplus may be which we hand over to the states, because, recollect, we are a nati

An Hon. MEMBER:
They would not last long!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
I do not know about that. But if you give a national referendum, what does my hon. friend say to that?
An HON MEMBER: We are not likely to give it!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
Does my hon. friend not see which way the cat jumps now? Suppose a government saying that their concern was to raise a sufficient revenue for the purposes of the commonwealth-admitting that a large surplus must necessarily remain for distribution among the states that their concern was not to make that surplus sufficient to meet the ordinary needs of the states, the states themselves having their ordinary powers of taxation. That might be the opinion of the government of the day. I do not quarrel with the position, because I am not arguing on party lines. But let us assume that position. Then we shall see that the smallness, relatively, of the surplus to be distributed among the states would lead to the enforcement upon the several states of a certain financial policy. They would either have to submit to their inability to meet their financial obligations and that they must avoid, because it would mean the bankruptcy of the state or they must, on the other hand, agree to such a scheme of direct taxation as, while saying the solvency of the state, might implicate the solvency of most of its members. What is the answer to that position? That if ever there was a question in the world in which the interest, life, government, and financial policy of a state was concerned, it is this very question. Yet we are told that that is a question upon which there is to be a national referendum. The very vitality of the state is concerned, and yet it is not to have a voice in it by way of taking part in a dual referendum.

An Hon. MEMBER:
We have provided for that in the statute!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
How can it be provided for in the statute? I do not think my hon. friend has quite followed me. The statute provides that revenue which may be left over shall be returned from the commonwealth; but it does not provide what shall be left over. If too little be left over to carry on the affairs of a state it may involve a question of its solvency the solvency of every one of the citizens in the state may be involved.

Mr. SOLOMON:
As the bill stands we provide, not only for the return of the surplus, but also for a limit to the expenditure!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Suppose we leave that clause out, we still have the fact that the surplus has to go back to the several states, and it is subject to the determination of the parliament how much money maybe raised, and how much money there will be to go back. It will rest with the house of representatives, and with the senate, therefore, to say what the revenue raised is to be, and what the amount returned is to be.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Only for five years!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
There is a five year period laid down in the bill, but there is also a provision for a per capital distribution after five years, and the remarks I have made apply to both positions.

[P.754] starts here

An Hon. MEMBER:
There is a provision up to a certain time!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
That is where the difficulty lies. While there is a provision up to a certain time, the difficulty to be provided for in the affairs of the commonwealth is one which will be eternal. It will last as long an the commonwealth lasts.
How can it be, urged that if the amount to be returned is a matter for the determination of the commonwealth parliament, the question involved in the return being perhaps a question of the vitality of the states how can it be urged that the states as represented in the senate are not deeply interested? How can it be urged that the question is one upon which a national referendum shall take place when, in its very root and depth, it is obviously the question of all questions in which the states are most vitally interested, because if finance be government, this is a question not only of the government of the commonwealth but of the government of the states?
Now, I do not speak here to throw difficulties in the way.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
Who finds the money?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The citizens find the money; but does my hon. friend look at the states in such a one-eyed way that he can see only the citizens as citizens of the commonwealth, and forget that they are citizens and taxpayers in the various states? We must not look at things in both ways or we shall squint. We want to see both things at one and the same time. There is no escaping from this aspect of the question: that a taxpayer pays to the commonwealth simply as a citizen of the commonwealth, for this reason that he is the same person who pays taxes to the state as a citizen of the state, and the question with him is: what is his total quantum of taxation how much has he to pay with one hand, and how much with the other? It may be a question of taxing one breeches pocket, if he is a taxpayer in an ordinary community, and of taxing two breeches pockets if he is a taxpayer in a federal community. I think I have said enough to show that if the general referendum is to be reserved for those questions which are purely national in their nature for those questions which involve state interests then the finance of the federation is one, question that intimately involves state interests; and therefore, as between the two forms of referendum, it should be the subject of a dual referendum. I do not wish to take up much longer time on this subject. I realise as fully as any one in this Chamber does, the difficulties to which we are exposed. I am pointing out the difficulties, and it may be supposed that I have spoken with some warmth on this subject, but that is my usual mode of speech. I do not wish hon. members to think for a moment that I am carried away with any enthusiasm one way or the other on the question; but I wish to lay rightly before this Convention the difficulties of the whole situation as they affect, my mind. Upon the considerations that I have been advancing, I say this, that, for the sake of the success of this constitution, I am prepared to accept some form of referendum which will be safeguarded by the prior application of a double and simultaneous dissolution that I cannot, as at present advised, give my acceptance to the form of referendum called the dual referendum. However, I recognise, although I do not bind myself down, that, as between the two forms of referendum, while the dual referendum may not be the more effective of the two, it is, so far as I can see, the more just. I am speaking now of the application of these two forms of referendum purely on such matters as I last read from the constitution that is to say, such matters as defence, the public debt, the regulation of trade and commerce, immigration and emmigration, and so on. All these are matters in which I concede the states to be largely and in some cases vitally interested; and, seeing that, I take up the challenge that has been thrown down-I point out that those are the real matters of vital state interest; and, if it is conceded that those are the matters specially adapted to the dual referendum, it seems to me that there ought to be no hesitation in saying if the dual referendum is granted at all, that it should cover those matters. I have already said that I do not feel myself at liberty to support the amendment moved by my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner. So far as it leaves open the dual referendum, I would be inclined to support it; but so far as it offers an alternative to dissolution, instead of insisting on the prior application of the double dissolution, for reasons often given by me, I cannot, on that ground, support it.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The hon. and learned gentleman might test it by moving to amend my amendment, so as to provide for a dissolution!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I will have a look at the amendment presently. On the other hand, with regard to the amendment of my hon. friend, Mr. Lyne, I believe in it so far as it gives the referendum as a condition subsequent to the application of the double dissolution. But because it gives a general referendum upon matters which so far appear to me to be inexplicably involved in state interests, I cannot accept it as a general referendum. If, then, the proposition becomes so modified that we should have a double dissolution provided for, and if the application of that double dissolution fails as a means of reconciling the parties at conflict, and if it is further proposed that there shall then be a dual referendum—a referendum taken, of course, at once, as one vote, but in which the vote of the whole majority shall be counted, and the vote of the majority in each state shall be counted, and applied according to principles which we know then I shall be found, as a matter of necessity, under the circumstances of this, constitution, supporting such a proposition.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I am thoroughly in accord with the hon. and learned member!

Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[3.29]:
Both in Adelaide and here I have consistently endeavoured to take one course the shortest road towards union. In doing so I have had to differ from many of those, with whom I usually act in local politics. I have had to act in opposition to some of my colleagues in this Convention; but, although a representative of one of the larger states, I have endeavoured all through to view the matter from the standpoint of the representatives of the smaller states. I may say, therefore, that all who listen to me will give me credit for speaking with great feeling when I express myself, for the first time, either in our deliberations here or in Adelaide, as being discouraged by what has taken place; and I hope that the leader of the Convention will find an opportunity an early opportunity of again taking a vote on the matter that was recently submitted to the Convention. The vote that has already been given places me, as I believe it places others, in a position of great difficulty in regard to the amendments which have been moved by the hon member, Mr. Lyne, and the Right Hon. Sir George Turner. For my part, I do not hesitate to declare myself an advocate of and a believer in unification. I have always believed in unification. In 1894, when Sir Henry Parkes first brought the project of federation into the arena of practical politics, he proposed in this Chamber a scheme of unification—he proposed, I think, from that chair, a scheme based on the Canadian model, which would have meant unification. That scheme was unanimously rejected, and Sir Henry Parkes acquiesced in its rejection; and, from that day to this, every portion of Australia has accepted the decision then arrived at. I, too, have loyalty accepted that decision. I would be glad if Victoria had never separated from New South Wales. I would like to see Tasmania annexed to this colony, and I would like South Australia to form part of our western boundary; and I would not be averse to extending the jurisdiction of New South Wales to the farthest west of this continent; but I recognise, and have always recognised, that we cannot frame any scheme of federation except by recognising the equal existence the broad, independent, national existence of all these colonies. Recognising that, I have loyally endeavoured, all through our deliberations here, to give effect to that belief; and I have refused, not only as a matter of tactics, but, as it seemed to me, as a matter of common honesty, to make any effort to do indirectly that which I declined to do directly to take away with one hand that power of equal representation which we had given with the other. I admit that in taking that course, many of us were running a great risk, not from any fear that the smaller states would abuse their powers; but because, in giving an equal authority to a house composed of representatives of groups of population with that composed of representatives of the whole people, we ran that risk which you, sir, indicated in your opening speech at Adelaide the risk of being unable to carry on the government of Australia along the well-known lines of responsible government. The problem which we therefore tried to solve was how to reconcile the continuance and active beneficial exercise of responsible government under the constitution of a federal state. We believed that we had arrived at a solution the day before yesterday, when it was recognised—I believe recognised almost throughout this Chamber—that if the responsible ministry of the day were given a complete control of the parliamentary machine, then responsible government, as we know it, would operate. It was also seen that they could not get that complete control unless they had the power of dissolving each chamber, and after the broad, clear, and conciliatory speeches of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, and the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, the evening before last, if the voting had been taken then I believe that that view would have commended itself to a large majority of this assembly. Circumstances have altered now. For my part, I deeply regret, as I regretted yesterday, that everybody in this Chamber did not see that the course proposed by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner was the sound one; and I regret that the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, felt it his duty to make a speech which, however eloquent and powerful it might have been, did not appear to me calculated to advance the interests of federation in this chamber. No doubt the right hon. member acted, as we have all been acting here, with the desire to advance, and with the conscientious conviction that what was being done would best advance, the interests of the cause. The representatives of the smaller states may have thought that the members of the New South Wales representation as a whole were prepared to derogate from that which has already been done - to go back from the conciliatory attitude assumed by the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, and the right hon. member, Mr. Reid. So far as I am concerned, however, I have no intention of acting in that way, and I do not think that the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, had any other intention. Any feeling which may have been aroused - and I know that feeling was aroused, although the right hon. member may not be aware of it -

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
Surely hon. members did not vote because of their feelings!

Mr. Wise:
Any feeling which was aroused was caused by a misapprehension of what was intended. If the vote which has been taken is not reversed - though I hope it will be - the position in which I shall find myself is this: As an advocate of unification I would like unification if I could get it. If the question of unification is put directly to the vote, I shall vote with the ayes to see how many are in favour of it. If I were a representative of a small state, I should be against unification; but I have been released by the vote which was taken to-day from any necessity of recognising this union as a federal compact - that is, as a compact between states - because that vote places the dissolution of the house of representatives, not under the control of the responsible ministry of the day, but under the control of the states. It places it in the power of the states to dissolve the house containing the representatives of the people, instead of putting it in the power of the representatives of the people to dissolve the body composed of the representatives of the states. While I am willing to agree to a federal compact which will recognise and balance the interests upon either side, am I bound to submit to an arrangement which will put it in the power of the representatives of the states—that is, in the power of a minority—to force the representatives of the great body of the people to go to the country?

An Hon. MEMBER:
It cannot be!

Mr. WISE:
It cannot be. But putting altogether on one-side the possible divergence of interest between states and people, is such a scheme consistent with the practice of responsible government as we know it to-day? Is it possible for any ministry, which owes its whole existence to the presence of its supporters in the lower house, to carry on, when the whole machinery of government may be disorganised by a majority in another house, representing a minority of the people? The reason why that does not operate now is that every state is a unified state. It is not where there is that divergence of interest, each of them unwilling to yield, each of them justified in holding out

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Surely it is no worse than if there were no safety-valve at all, and the hon. and learned member was willing to do without a safety-valve!

Mr. WISE:
I think that it is worse. Although I made this proposal myself in Adelaide, reflection, and, I may add, the speech of the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, have convinced me that I am wrong. If there were any credit or kudos to be gained, I should be proud to have embodied the proposal in the constitution as a proposal of my own; but I now believe it to be an unsound proposal.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Worse than nothing!

Mr. WISE:
Worse than nothing.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I do not say that it would be worse than nothing. I only say that the hon. and learned member means that it would be worse than nothing!

The CHAIRMAN:
I would point out to the members of the Committee that we have agreed to an amendment, and ought not, therefore, to re-discuss the question which it involves. We cannot arrive at inconsistent conclusions in the same committee stage.

Mr. WISE:

I would ask whether I should be in order in moving this amendment if the Right Hon. Sir George Turner will withdraw his amendment? My amendment would read as follows:-

Provided that in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives alone in the first instance, both houses of parliament may be dissolved simultaneously-

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

That question has been decided

Mr. WISE:

And if after such dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendment, the proposed law may be referred to the direct determination of the people by a referendum as hereinafter specified.

The CHAIRMAN:

I do not think I can put that amendment.

Mr. WISE:

I would point out that we have not come to any direct determination against having a double simultaneous dissolution. All we have decided is that in a single case which may arise dissolutions shall follow in a certain order. I now propose that in every case, and not necessarily as the result of a disagreement between the two houses, the Ministry shall have power to dissolve both houses simultaneously. I venture to think that the amendment is not inconsistent with our previous decision, whether you regard the power as optional or as a general power.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

On the point of order I would suggest that the whole clause is under discussion. An amendment has been carried; but surely it will not be out of order to suggest a provision which would, in fact, be an alternative to the provision contained in the amendment. The amendment which was moved by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, provides for a dissolution of the two houses, while the proposal which the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, now puts forward provides an alternative Scheme; and how can we advance arguments in favour of an alternative scheme without referring to the scheme already adopted? I would suggest that, in view of the fact that we cannot discuss an alternative scheme without referring to the scheme already adopted, it would be highly inconvenient for you, sir, to rule that hon. members were precluded from referring to the amendment, already carried.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I think we have already decided that a dissolution of the house of representatives must take place before there can be a dissolution of the senate. I hold that we cannot go back upon that vote.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
We have not decided that a dissolution of the house of representatives must take place. We have decided that if a dissolution takes place something may follow. That is my reading of the amendment.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
Something else must follow!

An Hon. MEMBER:
Must follow!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Not necessarily. The amendment provides that, if the house of representatives has been dissolved, and certain things happen, then the governor-general may dissolve the senate; but what is proposed now is that, instead of having simply a dissolution of the senate under certain conditions, there shall be at once a dissolution of both houses. It is quite consistent to say that instead of the government of the day having to dissolve the senate after certain things have been done, the government of the day shall have another power altogether—that is, to dissolve both houses at the same time.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I would point out that the Committee has decided that, if the senate reject or fail to pass a proposed law, which has been passed by the house of representatives by an absolute majority, or if they fail to pass it in another session, the governor-general can dissolve the house of representatives, which is a power he possesses already; but the amendment goes on to say that, if within six months after the dissolution, the house of representatives again pass the proposed law, and the senate again reject or fail to pass it, &c., the governor-general may dissolve the senate. Now, that is altogether a new power which the governor-general had not before. This amendment is to give the governor-general additional alternative powers. He can exercise the powers cumulatively or alternatively. The question is whether in the same clause, by an additional proposition, the Committee can go on to confer additional powers to be exercised at his option cumulatively or alternatively. I submit the Committee has clearly that power.

The CHAIRMAN:
When I first heard the amendment read out, I came to the conclusion that it could not be put; but on looking at the amendment since it has been handed in, I have come to the conclusion that it can be put. This amendment is an alternative; in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives the proposed law may be referred to the direct determination of the people by a dual referendum. It will be seen that this amendment now suggested is very similar to the amendment suggested by the Right Hon. Sir G. Turner, except that it is more definite; it is simply giving a choice to the governor-general—which I presume will be the government—of alternative action, and I think it can be put.

Mr. WISE:
Without further words, I now move my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN:
The Right Hon. Sir George Turner must first withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WISE:
I do not think it is necessary, as the amendment is to strike out the word "if." Mine will come as an amendment to the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's amendment.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I propose to insert certain words if a blank is created. It is quite competent for my hon. friend to say, "I do not want to insert these particular words; I want to insert a modification of these words." Some hon. members may be prepared to insert the words I have proposed, and some may be prepared to insert those words, including the additional words that the hon. member, Mr. Wise, desires to insert. If I withdraw my amendment altogether, and the Committee reject the insertion of my words and his words, I shall be in a difficulty. The hon. gentleman will gain his object, with which I thoroughly agree, by first of all creating a blank; then I will propose my amendment, and he can propose to amend my amendment before it is put.

Mr. WISE:
I quite agree with that. I suggest that we can create the blank without being committed to anything. Then the discussion can take place on the new proposal put from the chair. If my amendment is carried I shall vote for the dual referendum afterwards.

Mr. SYMON:
Where does the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's amendment come in?

The CHAIRMAN:
After the word "senate"-that is, provided the hon. member, Mr. Lyne's amendment is negatived.

Mr. SYMON:
Sir George Turner's amendment is to substitute an alternative in the shape of the dual referendum. Now, I understand the hon. member, Mr. Wise, has moved to substitute an alternative in the shape of a joint dissolution to be followed as may be-

The CHAIRMAN:
Not a joint dissolution—a joint referendum.

Mr. WISE:
My amendment will come as a

Mr. SYMON:
I do not wish to interpose the slightest obstacle to the reconsideration of this matter on a point of order. We are not here to seize a victory, or anything of that kind. We are here to negotiate. If arguments can be used later on to show injustice, we are bound to reconsider them. As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly satisfied; but I want to point out that this new amendment is inconsistent in the shape in which it is submitted with the amendment we have already passed. If we are to have a reconsideration, would it not be better to adopt another course, and I am sure the hon. member, Mr. Barton, would be able to suggest some course by the suspension of standing orders, or in some other way, to bring the precise point under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN:
I think I can put the precise point quite well. The hon. member, Mr. Lyne, has moved an amendment. The Right Hon. Sir George Turner has moved to strike out the word "if" in that amendment in order to insert other words in lieu of it. Then Mr. Wise has moved an amendment to the words proposed to be inserted by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I would suggest that the hon. member, Mr. Wise, should not move his amendment yet. If we decide on excising the word "if" from Mr. Lyne's amendment, then it will be time for the Right Hon. Sir George Turner to move his amendment, and after that for Mr. Wise to move his.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[3.55]:

[P.760] starts here
As the point of order is disposed of, there are two or three statements I have to make with reference to the debate that has taken place. In the first place, the hon. member, Mr. Wise, who spoke a few moments ago, announced his position to be that of a member in favour of consolidation.

Mr. Wise:
If I could get it!

The Hon. F.W. Holder:
The consolidation of the states into one unified nation. I do not approach the question at all from that point of view. I am not in favour of unification; I am in favour of federation. And besides that, I take it that the mandate which we have to obey in coming here is to frame a constitution, not for unification at all, but for federation. I hope, therefore, in all our discussions, in all the resolutions to which we come, we shall keep steadily in mind, not unification, but federation. If we do anything else I am quite sure we shall do that which the electors of the majority of the colonies will have nothing to do with when we have finished our labours. Having said that much, I want next to say that, while I approach the question from an altogether different standpoint, I agree very much with the conclusions to which the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, came. But before I deal with those conclusions I want to deprecate just one sentence or two at the most in the very excellent speech the right hon. member, the Premier of Victoria, made early in the afternoon. I regret that that right hon. gentleman made it appear that the decision which we arrived at a short time since was arrived at by a block vote of the smaller colonies against the larger colonies. Although I voted on the same side as the hon. member, I want to put it so clearly that no one may be misled by what takes place here, that that vote would never have been carried in the way it was but for the fact that four delegates from the larger colonies voted on the other side.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:
That fact having been brought to my notice, I willingly withdraw the observations to which the hon. member has referred!

The Hon. F.W. Holder:
I knew that no one would be more ready than the right hon. member to do that when the matter was explained. But I will conclude my sentence—but for the fact that the motion was carried by reason of four delegates from the larger colonies being on the opposite side, and to make up for them—to say nothing of any other colonies, there were four delegates from South Australia voting on the same side as the hon. member. A word or two on the merits of the question itself. I hope we shall not at the present stage complicate matters so exceedingly as they would be complicated by accepting either the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Wise, or that of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner. It seems to me that we have made up our minds that we are willing to allow an opportunity for another vote on the question; and that being the case, why make the position more complicated than it is? If we are going to take another vote, I would suggest to the leader of the Convention that there is no reason why we should not report progress for half an hour, or some other time that he may deem sufficient, and then, when the President is in the chair, get the standing orders suspended, so that we may, right away, before we get into any further difficulties, reconsider the vote of this morning; and I earnestly hope that, on reconsideration, there will be at least enough come over to reverse the decision.

An Hon. MEMBER:
I hope not!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I was not going to discuss it, but I am bound to discuss it now. I say I hope there will be enough come over to reverse the decision arrived at. I hope that will be so in half an hour. If every hon. member has made up his mind, nothing I can say will alter a vote. But the matter is so immensely important that, even if I cannot alter a single vote, I must still put the points as they appear to me. If the two houses are in conflict, if there is any matter of concern in which they cannot agree, or will not agree, it is altogether unfair to assume that either house is wrong. What right have we to assume that the house of representatives is wrong? What right have we to assume, that the senate is wrong? If they disagree, why not send them both to the only persons who can say whether they are truly doing their duty and representing their constituents? It is said that the house of representatives is more likely to be wrong than the other. Now, I doubt that altogether.

Mr. SYMON:
Oh, no, not at all!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
The hon. member is giving away the whole position. If that is so-if either house might be equally in the wrong-why choose one and penalise it before the other?
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
And when that would decide nothing!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Very often a difficulty might arise out of a measure originated in the senate. The senate, according to these proposals, would not have to go to its constituents at all. It might throw down the bone of contention, and cause the whole trouble, knowing very well that, before it could be touched, the other branch of the legislature must be sent to its constituents, and have to undergo all the cost and toil of a general election. It is intolerable that one house, which would be free, at least for a time, from the consequence of its act, should be in a position to take such action as that to which I have referred. If the two houses disagree, the least we can do is to send them to their constituents. If we saw a couple of men in dispute in the street, and the dispute came to blows, we should not expect a policeman to take one up, and, after he had served whatever term the bench might sentence him to, then that search would be made for the other. We should expect the policeman to take them up together, and treat them both alike. I should like to know who has the right to say which of the houses is in the wrong when they disagree? Besides, there is even a more serious matter. What do these prolonged controversies mean? I mean prolonged controversies such as would be likely to arise out of a deadlock. These things can only come once in a lifetime perhaps not then. They can only come on questions which are of vital importance. I cannot conceive of a serious deadlock arising out of anything else than a very important matter.

Now, is it tolerable that if a very important question is raised, and a dispute arises over it, the whole commonwealth from one end of Australia to the other, not forgetting Tasmania, should be torn and troubled by dispute, which cannot be settled in one election, which, perhaps, cannot be settled in two elections? Consider the steps contemplated before a deadlock can be settled, first, two sessions of the parliament, then the dissolution of the house of representatives, then the dissolution of the senate, after that a dual referendum. Why, it means, not months—if it were months it might be tolerable—it means that for years the commonwealth would be torn from end to end, people set against each other, and all sorts of trouble and expense incurred, for the sake of settling a dispute which surely ought to be settled in some other manner.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Why not leave it as it is?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

Why not leave the engine without a safety-valve? I am not in favour of that. An hon. member says there is no precedent. I cannot help that. But I deny that. I gave a precedent for it the day before yesterday, when I quoted from a South Australian statute, to show that we have provided in that colony for dealing with deadlocks. There is a precedent for dealing with deadlocks elsewhere.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Not a referendum!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
No, but a safety-valve; and what hon. members, to my astonishment voted against yesterday was the provision for a safety-valve. In the British Constitution there is a safety-valve, they can put in more peers. In the New South Wales Constitution there is it safety-valve—they can put more members in the nominee house. While these safety-valves exist, are we going to frame a federal constitution without any safety-valve at all?

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Common-sense is the safety-valve!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
We have to provide not only for conditions when common-sense will prevail, we have to provide for conditions when common-sense may be temporarily suspended. We have known such a case.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
This is an argument for delay!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Quite so; and no one would wish the matter to be settled in a day or two. But there is a world of difference between a reasonable time-six months, if you like, and three years; and we have seen, too, that the various suggestions before us may mean the continuing of this most serious agitation, wasting the time and energy of the people, wasting their money on a continuance of this agitation for, perhaps, in the whole, nearly three years.

An Hon. MEMBER:
To keep the Government in power!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
There is no Government in power which dare do such things as this.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Does the hon. member forget that disputes which have agitated the political world have taken one, two, three, and four years to settle?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
So much the worse for the countries in which the disputes occurred.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Nothing of the kind!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
If disputes have happened in the smaller colonies which have been serious enough to take two or three years to settle, how much more serious will be disputes that will arise in the commonwealth, where there will be, not hundreds of thousands of people, but millions of people? I think it ought to be quite unnecessary to argue in favour of having some form of safety-valve, and it ought not to be necessary to argue in favour of having the thing which would lead to the most speedy and certain determination on the whole question.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The more haste the less speed!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Within reasonable limits. There is only one point more with which I want to deal. I took a position the all the colonies, to say nothing of the group of smaller colonies? Is it not the maintenance of that commonwealth, of that government in which we live? And are not the smallest colonies as much interested; is not the very smallest colony as much interested as the very largest in the making of some provision which would prevent such an event as we saw in the United States some years ago, when that terrible civil war took place? I can conceive that the heated feelings of the public, especially if we go through all these stages of dissolution after dissolution, referendum after referendum, may be so fanned to a blaze that the conflagration may be as serious in comparison to our population as was that in the United States. I plead with the Convention to take some step to provide a settlement which will render such a state of things impossible.
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[4.10]:
I have none of the fears of my colleague, who has just resumed his seat. The safety-valves he spoke about are created in the governments which we know as constitutional governments by providing judicious checks on hasty legislation. My hon. friend has just been arguing that these most necessary and legitimate checks are in themselves dangerous to society, likely to produce rebellion, and to land us in civil war. Such an argument, however excellent it might be and apposite to the present occasion, if carried to its legitimate conclusion, would make one house one suffrage necessary in every colony, and would make all the checks which our experience of the world have shown to be needed to be placed on hasty legislation illusory and vain. At the same time I appreciate the seriousness of the situation, I appreciate the seriousness of the position of my right hon. friend, the Premier of Victoria, and I admire his frankness. I appreciate also the difficulties under which my right hon. friend, the Premier of New South Wales, is labouring. I am willing to believe that both of these honorable gentlemen are true and hearty federationists, but are overborne by local influences, so that they fear, unless they get some concession, or unless they get something which seems to be some concession, because it appears to me that that would do as well, they will not be able to do anything.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Will not that apply all round!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
The smaller states have not asked for any concession.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
You have got all you want!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
They have never asked for a concession from start to finish. They have asked that this commonwealth should be established on the lines on which alone federations can succeed, and on the lines which experience shows that alone they can be safely constituted. And when these gentlemen seek to drive their coach-and-four through all the federation lines, and we resist, they accuse us of wanting to take everything, and attribute to us a want of generosity, that really is in themselves. Now, sir, where are this demand and concession to end? That is really what I want to know. If this were our final meeting; if we could now during the next fortnight or three weeks or month sit continuously and get our constitution settled, I might approach some of those considerations from a little different point of view from what I do at the present time. Supposing we concede the joint dissolution and the dual referendum, what guarantee have we that when we meet again—because we certainly are not going to finish our work now—

Mr. WISE:
Why not?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
If we finish our work now, I shall be happy to reconsider it. I wish nothing better than to finish our work now.

Mr. WISE:
You could if you tried!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I complain very much that we are not going to finish our work now.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Will you try if I stop a couple of days longer to help you to finish?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I will tell the Premier of Victoria, with the frankness he has shown to us, that, for my part, I will vote for his simultaneous dissolution, although I am bitterly opposed to a referendum. I would rather than that the cause should be lost, support a referendum to the states and to the people—a dual referendum. A referendum, sir, I think is a return to barbarism. We had a speech in Adelaide from our leader in which we felt that we were back in the haunts of our early ancestors with very little on, and mostly under trees.
This reversion, which he then deprecated so very much, to more primitive habits, might seem to one who thinks much of the nineteenth century a bit of a return to a bygone state which it is not well to concede; and some thoughtful persons might fancy that, however good judges the people we hear so much about might be in reference to persons, they might not always be very good judges on particular measures which involve immense difficulties, which we ourselves have to consider in Committee, and waste days over so as to deal with them in detail, and there could be no more miserably inefficient means of deciding the truth than to appeal to them on subjects which involve, not one question but thousands of questions, which questions they are not competent to answer and deal with. I deprecate this referendum principle absolutely. I think it will be no protection. I think it will do no good to anybody; but so strongly do I feel on the subject, and so little do I hope that it could interfere prejudicially with the due working of the system, that I would accept something I thoroughly dislike in order to see accomplished the great cause which I for many years have longed. I would submit to both of these things rather than that the cause should be lost. But, supposing I take that position, as I do now, and say frankly that is the very most that I am prepared to do, where is the guarantee that there will be an end of it? Have we not had a declaration from the Premier of this great colony—as far as he, at all events, is concerned and I suppose he speaks for himself and his Government—that when this is conceded he will want more. There may be some argument in saying to one house as to the other house, "You were returned by the same suffrage. You represent the people of your colony. You represent the people of the colonies; but you are elected on precisely the same method—why, if one can be sent to its constituents, cannot the other? We want to get at the will of the commonwealth and the will of the states, and we send you back. We say, "You do not represent the will of the commonwealth, or you do not represent the will of the states." In that position there is immense force; but if you say that, after establishing the senate with a view of keeping up the position—the entity of the states—you are to send disputed questions on a referendum to the whole of the commonwealth, why, then the senate becomes a delusion and a sham. If it is to be so, better make it so at once, or better not make it at all. It is said that the difficulties which will surround the exercise of this power of sending to the people will prevent its ever being acted upon. Its very existence will operate as a rod held over the heads of the representatives of the states, who ought to be independent and equal to the other body, and will be used as a means of producing those very so-called deadlocks about which all this legislation is to be passed in order to remedy them. The way to create a danger is to anticipate one. Our act in South Australia has been referred to. That is what the hon. member, Mr. Symon, suggests should be adopted here. It is asked, how could responsible government be carried on under such a constitution as this? My hon. friend answers, "It is because responsible government can be carried on under that constitution that I have moved the amendment which has been carried."

An Hon. MEMBER:
It has been carried on for sixteen years!
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
It has been carried on, and the mere existence of the power has prevented the necessity of its ever being exercised.
Mr. WISE:
You cannot argue from a unified to a federal constitution!
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I admit it is very difficult. I, who have been always complaining of the false analogy created between the two, would be the last to say there is any at all. I do not think the senate need fear being sent back to its constituents because, in all great questions of conflict between the colonies, it will have its constituents at its back, and will be infinitely more powerful, because it is sent by the direct vote of its constituents than it would be if it were a nominated body, which would never know what authority would support it. I have no fear of combinations between different parties-labour parties or any other parties in the colonies-ever interfering with a house intended to be more conservative. I am, on the contrary, convinced that the greatest radical in each colony will become the biggest conservative when the rights of his own colony are at stake as against those of another.
Mr. HIGGINS:
Hear, hear; we see it now!
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I understand that what the hon. member means is that that is his own attitude throughout this Convention, because he, as a declared radical, shows the determined feeling that a radical of one colony has to preserve his colony's state rights. That is an illustration of the correctness of my view.
Mr. HIGGINS:
I am afraid the hon. member has misunderstood some one!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I do not think I misunderstood the hon. member. He is perfectly clear. I have no fear at all of intercolonial cliques that will injure the federal cause. I am perfectly sure that in each colony there will be no such thing as radical and conservative as between themselves and the other colonies; and I am satisfied that both the senate and the house of representatives, instead of having their position weakened by being liable to be sent back to their constituents, will have their position considerably strengthened. I care very little, therefore, from this point of view, whether this is or is not carried; but if it be carried, and if the Premier of Victoria will stay here long enough to let us finish the bill, and will incidentally devote an hour or two to the financial clauses—which the Drafting Committee have had to consider, having more time than the Finance Committee—so that we should have some guarantee that the work would be finished by Tuesday or Wednesday, I will promise him to support both his proposals, although I think the referendum is a most pernicious system, and ought never to be adopted. But if, on the other hand, we are to have the business kept back, and practically nothing done, if the Finance Committee will persist in doing nothing and will not endeavour to solve what is one of the most serious problems, then it is useless for the Premier of Victoria to tell us he is willing to stop until Tuesday or Wednesday to finish the bill; and unless I know we are going to finish it, I remain true to my principle, which is, first of all, to stand by the resolution which has been carried; secondly, if that is upset, to go for the simultaneous dissolution. To that I really have no objection. I would not mind going for that at once, but to a referendum I only go as a last resort, when I am perfectly satisfied that the cause of federation depends upon it.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria)[4.24]:
I should like to state that the concluding remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat seem to me very materially to clear the way so far as he is concerned.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
That is all!

Mr. TRENWITH:
He is prepared to vote for a joint dissolution. That appears to me one, at any rate, of the questions now in dispute—the question of a concurrent dissolution of both houses, or a dissolution of both houses with a considerable interval. He is prepared in the interests of federation, rather than lose it, to accept a double referendum; but he is afraid, in that connection, that something further may be asked. Now, I respectfully submit that our attitude here ought to be to do all that can be done to meet each other, going as far as we possibly can, and, when anything further is proposed, then is the time to come to a halt. But if it seems to any of us that a certain step in a direction which we think to be slightly injudicious in the main is calculated to advance federation, let us take that step, and not be afraid of taking it for fear something else may follow. When that something else is presented to us, then is the time to call a halt. I submit, also, that the hon. member, Sir John Downer, in his opening remarks, altogether misstated the attitude taken in the very admirable, conciliatory, and courageous speech of the hon. member, Mr. Holder. The hon. member, Sir John Downer, said the attitude which Mr. Holder took was that checks were dangerous, and that they might lead to civil war. I venture to say that Mr. Holder pointed out that checks were necessary, that they existed in the various constitutions to which he referred, but that checks were accompanied by safety-valves, that this constitution at present contained checks without any safety-valve, and, that, in order to avoid a possible revolution in the future, we should introduce some provision of the kind. We ought to be guided by the constitutions of which we have knowledge. We ought to be guided by those institutions with which we are acquainted. But as we are making an entirely new constitution, we ought not to be afraid to try innovations upon such points as in existing constitutions have proved to be faulty.

An Hon. MEMBER:

We have made innovations already!

Mr. TRENWITH:

That is true. No reform can come anywhere in the world without innovation. While every innovation may not be reform, certainly no reform can arise without innovation. Therefore, I say to the hon. member, Sir William Zeal, when he says there is no precedent, that that argument is not sound, since he has many times to establish precedents when he considers them necessary for the dispatch of business in the house over which he so well presides. Every precedent must have had a beginning. It must have been initiated at a time when there was no precedent. Therefore, the hon. member's argument is not sound. But we are at a juncture in our debates, as is acknowledged and recognised by all the delegates, when federation is in great danger, when the principle for which we have all been contending for years is in danger of being set back. I would, therefore, urge this consideration upon those who think, with Sir John Downer, that possibly an advance might be made here were it not for the danger of something else being subsequently asked—that if an advance can be made in the minds of delegates without itself entailing danger, that advance ought to be made, in the interests of compromise, remembering that we can always call a halt when anything unreasonable is demanded.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[4.30]:

I intend to say very little at the present stage, because on the merits of the question which has been again brought under discussion, I said practically all I had to say before the division was taken immediately before luncheon. I desire, however, to express my gratification that the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, should have withdrawn the somewhat unguarded allegation he made as to the previous vote having been carried by a combination of small states. Now, I say that, because it is exceedingly undesirable that, on such an important question as this is on its merits, we should have the question of small and large states introduced. It is calculated to create the greatest possible prejudice, and a great deal of unnecessary heat. I make bold to say that every member coming from the smaller states is animated by as sincere a desire for the furtherance of the great cause of federation, and by as high a patriotism in that cause, as any member coming from the larger states can possibly be; and if we deliberate upon a question of this kind, and a conclusion be arrived at contrary to the views of those who come from the larger states, we shall always be liable to have it recalled and reconsidered on the same ground that we are asked to reconsider this question to-day. What we are bound to do, coming from large or small states, is to see justice done, to arrive at what is a fair conclusion on the particular matter under debate; and, for my part, I declare most emphatically as regards the amendment carried before luncheon—I do not pretend to say that other hon. members who take the opposite view are not absolutely as clear and well grounded in it as I am in mine—but I make-bold to say emphatically that I consider the amendment carried before luncheon contains the fairest and most just solution of the question. I adhere to that view, and I intend to give effect to it when the question is again put to the vote. The debate which has taken place now has strengthened me in that view. Now I do not know whether or not it is in accord with the views of other hon. members, but I do not think it is desirable so soon after we have arrived at a deliberate conclusion, while we are all influenced by our own preconceived notions and the arguments which have convinced us that we should be brought so hastily to further debate and further decision. I wish to interpose no difficulty whatever in the way of reconsideration. So far as my personal effort is concerned, I should wish to do everything in my power to bring about a reconsideration of the question, because we are not here to sit down on any particular victory we achieve. We are here for such a purpose that if any number, whether a majority or not, should consider that more ample consideration will bring about a more just result, it is our duty to see that more ample consideration is given; and, so long as I have the honor to be a member of this great assembly, I shall be actuated by that principle on every occasion whether the minority who seek reconsideration be a large or a small one. We are here deliberating as some hon. members have said, negotiating—and it would be ridiculous to put ourselves at any juncture in the position of an ordinary legislative assembly, in which party feeling might desire to secure, at all hazards, a particular victory, and, having got it, would use any effort to prevent it from being recalled. That is not the attitude I propose to take up. Therefore, I am entirely at one with hon. members in wishing, at every stage of our progress, that the fullest and most exhaustive consideration should be given to every question. At the same time, I think it is undesirable that we should do what is proposed in so much haste. I believe that a little further time should give opportunity for reconsideration and a more detailed exchange of views than is possible in a debate of this character upon three separate amendments with which it is very difficult to grapple. I say, then, that, so far as I have heard the further debate, it has strengthened, in my mind, the position I have taken up. My hon. friend, Mr. Holder, in the very clear statement he has just made, has supported the attitude that I took up the other day, and has shown that to say that amendments, referendums, and checks of all kinds might save the country from revolution and from civil war is really an untenable position. I said then, and I say now—and I am glad to be supported by what my hon. friend has said—that the more you multiply checks in a constitution such as this, the more you subject the country to turmoil and agitation, and the more troublesome it becomes to secure a calm decision of the country, and the more it would intensify the chance of civil war if that was at all imminent. I was glad to hear my hon. friend put that as strongly as he did, seeing he appeared to take the opposite view the other day. In answer to the argument of some hon. members that no check is required, he pointed to our own Constitution and said, "There you have a check, just as you have in New South Wales the less popular check in the shape of adding to the members of the Legislative Council." If that check is held up, and held up triumphantly, as an illustration of the benefit of having a check, then I say that, if in this constitution we are to introduce a check, we cannot do better than follow the only precedent we have in relation to a chamber elected, not on the widest, but on an extensive franchise. The upper chamber in South Australia is elected on a very wide franchise. We have in the check there, to which the hon. member, Mr. Holder, alluded, a precedent for this, and we have a precedent for its efficacy as far its it goes, and that is exactly the check or safety-valve, as we have sometimes called it, which is embodied in the proposition that was carried, on my motion, before the Committee adjourned for luncheon.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:

There you have a unified state-different from what you would have in a federation!

Mr. Symon:

I recognise every distinction that exists between the federation we are creating and a unified state; but, for the life of me, I can see no distinction that would lessen the value of that safety-valve existing in a unified constitution as compared with its efficacy in a federal constitution. On the contrary, it seems to me-and I put this to my hon. friend in all sincerity—that where you had the senate representing the states—that is, the democracy of each state represented in the senate—you would find this particular safety-valve of which we enjoy the benefit more effective than you would if you had it in a unified state. Take our colony. Do you suppose that those men sent by our colony, as one constituency, into the senate would hastily act so as to bring about a dissolution which would send them to their constituents under these circumstances? Do you suppose, if they saw, as they would have a right to be assured, that the popular will was expressed by the majority of the house of representatives on a question that did not affect the vitality, the very being, of the state, that they would not give way? Of course they would, and it is for that very reason, it seems to me, consistent with every principle of constitutional law and fair play that you should first dissolve the house of representatives, which legislates in a particular manner—it may be in a moribund session of parliament—before you dissolve the senate, which is merely a check; and I believe that if you adhere to the proposition embodied in my amendment, carried before the adjournment for luncheon, you will never—at any rate, you will on very rare occasions—be called upon to bring into operation the provision for the dissolution of the senate.

The Hon. F.W. Holder:

The senate may be the obstructing body?
Mr. SYMON:
In what way? Of course, if my hon. friend assumes that the house of representatives is always going to be right-

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
No, I do not. Either might be right, or either might be wrong!

Mr. SYMON:
Quite so. You cannot predicate of the house of representatives that it will be obstructive.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Nor of the senate!

Mr. SYMON:
You cannot predicate that of the senate any more than of the house of representatives. But if the senate is to be a check at all, surely it is to be a check only in this way: that it is to invite the house of representatives to show that it is giving effect to the will of the people as a nation, before the senate is sent to its constituency.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
The legislation which was the cause of the trouble may have originated in the senate!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
In that case the executive would not order a dissolution!

Mr. SYMON:
I think that could not be so under my amendment. My amendment, my hon. friend will find, is limited, because I do not claim the same power for the senate. The proposition of the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, was that the senate and the house of representatives should be on the same footing. I do not claim that for the senate. I am willing to take it if it can be done. But, as I wish to be perfectly fair and moderate, and to bring about only a just system of federation, I do not claim that at all. I think it would place the senate in a position it ought not to occupy in the federation; but still if that were given it would strengthen the senate, and, as my views are in favour of strengthening the senate, I certainly would not be found voting against it. All I say is that, under the amendment which has been carried, we do not give the senate that power.

Mr. WISE:
Against whom do you strengthen the senate-against the ministry?

Mr. SYMON:
You do not strengthen the senate against anybody, except in its protection of the interests it is elected to protect; but-I draw a distinction here, you enable it to exercise effectively that power of check, that position of a drag on the constitutional wheel, which we want to give it. If we do not want to give it that, there is an end of the discussion. You might as well give it a kind of executive or

An Hon. MEMBER:
Or there might be only one chamber!

Mr. SYMON:
Yes, or there might be only one chamber. Without some mode of protecting the states, what is to prevent a condition of civil war? I do not say that there are not other methods which might in some degree secure the same thing; but in commending this, I say that it deals -only with the senate as a check on hasty legislation, and, why in the name of all that is constitutional, you should send this house-which is to be merely a check, so as to ask the house of representatives if it thinks it has the country at its back to get that support-to its own constituents in the first instance, is beyond my comprehension. What I want to see on all these questions is the house of representatives in harmony with its constituents. The check exercised, the only result of the check is to invite the house of representatives-which way be in a moribund political condition-to receive the warrant of its constituents; and if it does receive that warrant, and if it comes back fortified in the course it has been pursuing, then the senate must either give way or it must go to its constituents and receive their mandate. I do not think any second dissolution will be necessary. I beg hon. members not to be swayed by these considerations of rival state interests. I ask every hon. member to act as the members representing South Australia are acting. Let each of us, in seeking to secure what is right, act upon our individual judgments.

Mr. WISE:
I do not regard this as a question of state interest. It is a question affecting the existence of responsible government.

Mr. SYMON:
I take exactly the same view of it. I say that, by having a simultaneous dissolution of the senate and of the house of representatives, you infringe every principle of responsible government with which we are acquainted. In adopting such a provision, you are undoubtedly taking an entirely new departure. It may be right, and it may work well; but we have no experience to support us, and my belief is that it will not be effective; but will bring about a state of things in connection with the senate which, not we of the small states, but you of the large states, will in the future very greatly deplore.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.47]:
I have a suggestion to make to the Committee, and I am quite sure that every member of the Committee will agree with it. I think there is a general disposition on the part of hon. members, notwithstanding the strictness of the views which are held, to come to an agreement upon this question during the present session of the Convention. That being so, I think it is desirable, inasmuch as there are a number of complicated amendments before the Committee, that there should be time to discuss and reflect upon them before we finally decide which we shall adopt. That brings me to the suggestion which I have to make, which is this: If I have the support of the Committee, I shall presently move that you, Mr. Chairman, do leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again at half-past 7. That will bring the President into the chair, and I will then ask hon. members to support me in moving the suspension of the standing orders to enable us to postpone new clause 57 with the proposed amendments thereon, notwithstanding that the clause has already been partly dealt with, and that we may get leave to reconsider and rescind the decision arrived at with regard to the clause when it comes on again. If I get the standing orders suspended, I propose to go on this evening with such other parts of the bill as will suit the convenience of hon. members, and on that matter I shall be open to receive suggestions. In the meantime, I think it will be in the interests of all of us, and of the cause generally, that we should leave the further discussion of the question of deadlocks until, say, Monday morning. I think that notwithstanding the urgent political engagements of some members of the Convention, even they will concur with me that, looking at the stage at which we have reached, and the vital necessity of arriving at some reasonable conclusion on a subject such as this, it is better not to proceed with it to-night, when we are, in our friendly way, at odds, but to leave it to some future time when we can consider it from a point of view which will enable us to come to an agreement.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[4.51]:

It is well known to a majority of hon. members that I have made arrangements to leave Sydney on Sunday next, in order that I may be in Melbourne on Monday, and meet the Assembly upon Tuesday, to finish off the remaining business of the House before we proceed to our general election. This work is undoubtedly important in the interests of the colony of Victoria; but, at the same time, I realise that the work we are attempting to do here is important in the interests of a larger constituency than Victoria. Although it will be at some considerable inconvenience to myself, to my colleagues, and to the members of the Victorian legislature, I shall be very glad, if there is any hope whatever of settling this matter satisfactorily by the course suggested by the leader of the Convention, to make arrangements by which I shall be able to meet the Victorian Assembly later in the week. Of course, if there is no hope of a satisfactory settlement, it will be useless for me to remain here.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I think there is every hope!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

On the assurance of the leader of the Convention that there is a hope, and because of what I have heard from hon. members who are desirous of reconsidering the matter to see if they cannot modify their views, I shall be glad to fall in with the suggestion which has been made, and remain here one or two days next week to settle this and the other difficult matters with which we have to deal. If we settle these matters, I have no doubt that the other members of the Convention will, in the absence of the representatives from Victoria, be able to deal with the machinery provisions of the bill in a manner which will be satisfactory to all. I hope that those who voted against the view which I hold will, in the meantime, give the matter earnest and careful consideration, and see whether they cannot once again help us out of our difficulties, and enable us to join together in framing a scheme of federation which will be acceptable to the various colonies.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia):

I do not rise with the intention of opposing the course suggested by the hon. member, Mr. Barton, because I feel it my duty to meet his wishes in every respect. At the same time, it seems to me that the course which he suggests is an unusual and unprecedented one, at all events, so far as the procedure of our parliaments are concerned. On many occasions, when during our deliberations, decisions have been come to by the vote of a narrow majority, which it has afterwards been thought well to reverse, it has been the custom, and I think it is the custom in all legislative bodies, to accept the position and to take the proper constitutional course to reverse the decision. There are plenty of opportunities given by our standing orders for reversing any decision which may have been arrived at in the discussion of this bill. For instance, the bill could be recommitted for the reconsideration of the clause, and I think it would be better for that course to be pursued than to upset the constitutional procedure by asking for a suspension of the standing orders, with a view to getting hon. members to reverse the decision at which they have arrived. I think it is very unreasonable to ask members of the Committee to reverse our decision, after we have given a deliberate vote on a subject which has engaged our attention for a long time. If we were new to politics, and had never sat in a legislative assembly in our lives, and knew nothing about the duties which we are called upon to perform, we might deal with these matters in a perfunctory way, without making up our minds beforehand. But to ask me to change my mind on a matter of the greatest importance, such as this, within a short time, is, I think, unreasonable.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The right hon. member need not change his mind now he might do it on Monday!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

If we were going to finish the bill before separating there might be some necessity for taking this course, but we are not going to do so.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Yes, we are!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Hon. members must know by this time that we shall have to return to our colonies without finishing the bill.

Mr. WISE:

I hope not!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Not if I can prevent it!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I am certain that when the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, and his colleagues leave us, it will not be in the interests of federation to continue our consideration of the bill. That being so, what necessity is there for dealing with this matter at the present time? We shall have to meet again in a few months, and by that time we shall have had an opportunity to fully consider it. We shall then be able to come back to our deliberations after having had an opportunity of fully considering the whole matter. That is the procedure we should adopt. Why should we make an exception in this House because a decision is contrary to the views of the members of the larger states, when none would be more unwilling than those gentlemen to take any course of that kind in connection with a decision given contrary to the views of the members from the smaller states? For that reason I am altogether opposed to the procedure proposed to be adopted. I have no doubt my opposition will be futile. We have been dragged down step by step all through the discussion. The environment, the surroundings, have been too strong for some of us. The representatives of the larger states have dragged us along nearly to the bottom of the hill.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
No!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I say the great majority, but not every one. We have been dragged along in this matter. Our views, if they have not been scouted, have been ignored or taken little notice of. We are now asked to rescind a resolution deliberately adopted only an hour or two ago, in order that the views of members from the larger colonies shall have effect given to them. We are asked to reverse our judgment—a course which has not been taken before—which is altogether unusual and contrary to our standing orders—merely to satisfy those who cannot take a defeat, I have had to accept defeat many times, but it seems others are not prepared to do so. We ought to accept defeat, and not try almost immediately afterwards to reverse a decision by asking Hon. members to change their views on a matter which we consider to be of vital importance. It is asking too much, and it is altogether unreasonable.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[5]:

I should like to say, before submitting a motion, that I scarcely think the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest is justified in putting the matter so strongly, seeing that he obtained the suspension of the standing orders for a very similar purpose.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Not to reverse a decision!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Not to reverse a decision, but to completely upset the order of procedure on a bill. This is for the purpose of changing the order of procedure on a bill. I would remind my right hon. friend that this is not a question of inability to accept defeat. It is a question of inability to accept a position of danger to a cause which may be relieved from that danger by a wise course taken now. What I wish to do is this: If we do not take the course which I have been just suggesting, we shall first have to deal finally in Committee for the purposes of the Committee with this clause. Then we shall have to go to the end of the bill and deal with every other clause in the bill before we get another opportunity of dealing with this matter. That will be a cumbrous process, and in order to avoid it I intend to suggest a certain course.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Recommit the bill!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Instead of recommitting the bill at once I shall ask the concurrence of the Convention to suspend our standing orders. That will give an opportunity of having a calm, reasonable, and friendly discussion. I shall certainly make a motion in Committee for the suspension of the standing orders, and it will then be for my right hon. friend, if he has a majority in the House, to defeat that motion. If he has not a majority he can then do what he thinks is such a good thing—accept defeat.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Certainly I will!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I have no doubt of that. I beg to move:
That the Chairman do now leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again at 7.30.
Question resolved in the affirmative.
Progress reported.
Motion (by Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:
That so much of the standing orders be suspended as will enable the Hon. E. Barton to make a motion without notice.
Motion (by Hon. E. BARTON) proposed:
That it be an instruction to the Committee of the Whole Convention that they have leave to postpone the proposed new clause 57a, and all proposed amendments thereon, notwithstanding that it has been amended, and to reconsider and rescind all or any resolutions arrived at, and votes taken on the said clause, and on amendments thereto.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
Is that an instruction to rescind?

The PRESIDENT:
No; that the Committee have leave to reconsider. It is purely permissive.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
Very well, if that is distinctly understood. As I heard it I took it to be an instruction to rescind.

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:
No instruction to rescind can be given to the Committee.
Question resolved in the affirmative.
[The President left the chair at 5.3 p.m. The Convention resumed at 7.30, p.m.]

COMMUNICATION FROM QUEENSLAND.

The PRESIDENT:
I have the honor to announce to the Convention that I have just received from the Acting Premier of Queensland the following telegram:

In pursuance of the following resolution passed by the Legislative Assembly of this colony on the 16th instant: "that in the opinion of this House the Acting Chief Secretary should request the Australasian Federal Convention now sitting in Sydney, not to conclude its work until Queensland has an opportunity of being represented at that Convention by representatives directly appointed by the electors of the colony" - I have the honor to submit the above request for the consideration of the Convention. Letter posted to-day. HORACE TOZER.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[7.31]:

I take it that this Convention will be deeply gratified by the communication which has been received by you, sir, and that there is not one among us who will not look forward with renewed hope to the prospect of a consummation of a federation which there is now every probability will embrace the whole of the Australian continent as well as Tasmania. I move:

That the communication received by the President from the Acting-Premier of Queensland be recorded on the minutes of this Convention, and that the President be authorised to acknowledge the same, and to intimate in reply that this Convention has received it with gratification, and will give the request which it conveys the best consideration.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[7.32]:

I desire to second the resolution, which I have no doubt will meet with the unanimous approval of this Convention. I quite agree with our hon. leader in the remarks he has made. Whatever our feelings may be as to what has occurred in the past, or whatever doubts we may have had with regard to the desire of our sister colony to join with us, I think they will now be at an end. It is our duty, as I am sure it will be our pleasure, to do anything we possibly can, to bring the whole of the Australian continent into our federation.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[7.33]:

As there seems no doubt - I have-none whatever myself - that we are not going to conclude our business at the present sitting, and will have to adjourn, would it not be more gracious for us to say that we shall be able to comply with the request? I do not, think there will be any doubt about it. I do not intend to move an amendment; but I would suggest to the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, whether, as we are not going to complete our work now, we should not say at once that we are glad to be able to inform the Acting-Premier of Queensland that we hope to be able to comply with his request.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[7.34]:

I would suggest that the course taken by the leader of the Convention seems the proper one. It will be better, I think, at a subsequent stage, to deal with the point raised by my right hon. friend, Sir John Forrest. At present we simply have to receive a certain message from the gentleman representing the Government of Queensland. In supporting the motion made by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Barton, I have to express the very great feelings of gratification with which I, as one of the representatives of New South Wales, have received the communication you have just announced. All along I have felt that this federation would be lame and incomplete without the colony of Queensland, and it is on the part of the people of New South Wales a matter of the deepest gratification that we have now a prospect of completing the circle of Australian union.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales):[7.35]:

In explanation, and in answer to what my right hon. friend, the Prime Minister of Western Australia, has said, I would point out that it would be scarcely right for me, on a motion of this kind, to prejudge any course which the Convention may take. The probable entrance of Queensland into our deliberations, with the view to her joining in the federation, is a matter which will arouse all of the support towards its being effected, that every one of us can give. But the practical way to meet the request, I take it, is that when we do adjourn, if we have to adjourn without completing our labours, we should perform that act in such a way, as while we carry our work on as far as we can under present circumstances, we shall leave no part of it not open to reconsideration. The telegram, as I am just reminded, says there is a letter to follow, and that letter may be much more expressive, may convey much more information than is conveyed in the telegram. What I hope to do is to go on with the work of the Convention; but on the understanding that if the majority of hon. members desire that there should be at some stage an adjournment in order to allow of the participation of Queensland in our work, we should at any rate do as much as we can until circumstances prevent some of our friends from remaining with us any longer, and at that point, having achieved as much as we can, we should then report progress and adjourn till. such a date. as will enable this question to be decided in Queensland, and allow us then to resume our deliberations in Sydney or in such other city as way be agreed upon. I think that is what will meet the views of hon. gentlemen. I do not think hon. members want, now they are here, to part without doing as much as they can in the limited time available. I think it will be consonant with the wishes of all of us that we should do what we can within that time. I would plead with hon. members that, with reference to the matter which was under discussion this afternoon, we should not part without having gone at any rate some way to show what our feeling and opinion are with regard to the provisions to be made for conflicts between the houses of the legislature. I think we shall be able tonight, without too long a discussion, to dispose of the question of the functions of the executive. I think we will be able on Monday to go on with this question of deadlocks, having had the intervening time for thought, and we will then come to a decision, which, probably, will receive the approval of each colony and of the people thereof. That, at any rate, is my hope. I hope also that we may go so far that all the other matters that are committed to us as to show, either that we have come to some decision, which is an advance on our previous work, or that we are proceeding in such a way as will give the people of these colonies confidence in the result of our deliberations. That is what we have to aim at. That confidence is that which we have to gain ultimately. I think we should proceed in the effort to gain it in as much time as is available to us, and then, after such an interval as may be agreed upon, to resume our work in the hope that we shall be joined by Queensland in the final completion of it. That is the view which suggests itself to me. I think it will be no breach of Confidence to say that, in the communications which passed between Sir Horace Tozer and myself about the time of the opening of the Convention, I intimated that if a decision was come to by Queensland to join in our work, or if we had something which gave a definite promise of her being represented, she would have my personal assistance in securing a reconsideration of any part of the work we did at this Convention when she came to be represented among us. With that assurance, knowing that in the meantime we ought to do that which is incumbent upon us as our statutory duty, I think we should go on until the time comes for the Premier of Victoria to leave us, or perhaps even later than that, if we have completed the most difficult part of our work, keeping this fact before us: that when we adjourn there is no finality until it is definitely ascertained whether Queensland will or will not join us.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee:

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[7.41]:

The leader of the Convention has just expressed his opinion that we should not proceed to-night with the further consideration of the matter which has engaged our attention now for some considerable time. I thoroughly appreciate the motive that actuates that expression of his desire; but I would suggest, in order to elicit the opinion of some hon. members of the Convention whether it would not be better for us to finish the work upon which we have been engaged. We have now before us, in all their freshness and vigour, the various arguments that have been urged in connection with the proposal. We are familiar with every aspect of the case, and there does not occur to my mind any good reasons why we should not be prepared this evening to give an answer to the various questions which arise in connection with the provision to deal with deadlocks. Of course if there are hon. members who desire a postponement of the matter, that will be another question; but I think the subject permits of more than one aspect in considering the advisability of postponement. I see some danger in delay. I think our minds are brought together as closely its they can be. I think we are all persuaded of the necessity of coming to an early and clear decision on the subject, and I do not think any further consideration would enlighten our minds or incline our hearts more to the determination of the question. I, therefore, would suggest to the leader of the Convention, if he does not consider it of vital importance, to allow the matter to be continued and determined to night.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[7.44]:

Of course in such a body as this I must be entirely in the hands of hon. members. but it struck me when I moved that the Chairman leave the chair a little earlier this afternoon than usual, that I was taking a course which tended towards a calm and deliberate consideration of the points which had arisen between us. It was only in accordance with that, and following out what I then gathered to be the general desire of hon. members, that it was my intention to go on with other clauses of the bill to-night. Of course it may be true, as my hon. and learned friend has said, that we are as near to agreeing as we shall be; but I prefer not to think that. I prefer to think that there are amongst us a few who will come closer to mutual accommodation in their views. We know that there are amongst us gentlemen of stalwart disposition who will always hold extreme views, and whose sturdy independence forbids them from making any concession at all. But we know that the majority of us are not made of such brave stuff, or, at any rate, such Spartan stuff, and therefore that, with time for thought and reflection, most of us are likely to come to some adjustment of this matter which will not involve a great sacrifice of principle on the part of any one of us. Holding that view, I suggest to my hon. friend that he should withdraw his opposition to the course I have suggested, and allow us to get on with the clauses dealing with the executive, on the understanding that on Monday morning we revert to the consideration of these provisions against deadlocks, and settle the question, so far as this Convention in its present session can settle it, on that day if possible.
The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[7.47]:

I join with my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, in the desire that the discussion on this matter shall proceed until the Convention arrives at some decision, because I foresee that any postponement is not likely to expedite business. We shall probably come here on Monday having arrived no nearer at a solution of the difficulty; hon. members will address themselves to the subject refreshed by their rest, and the chances are that we shall have a much longer discussion than if we proceed with the matter as it has been before us. With the leader of the Convention, I have no extreme anxiety to press hon. members to a decision on this matter; but I do think that the time might be more profitably occupied this evening in discussing those points wherein we do differ. There are points of difference which have not been fully dwelt upon by this Convention in the discussions we have had. We have hardly touched on the question as to how we stand, relatively, in our support of the principles of a dual referendum, or a mass referendum - that question has not been an issue put clearly before us - and I venture to say that, when the Convention does deal with that question, it will be found that we are more divided than we appear to be now, and it is just as well for us to understand clearly the position we do occupy - the differences which divide us. If we spend this evening in a discussion of that character, we shall, perhaps, after an adjournment, be better able on Monday, knowing our differences, to arrive at some definite decision. I would not object to go thus far - to let the determination of this much-vexed question stand over, not only till Monday, but also till we meet again at some later period next session.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

No!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

All I desire to advocate is, that the time we have at our disposal cannot be better spent than in discussing that which we all agree to be the crux of the whole question. We are now at the parting of the ways, and nothing can be gained by giving up any valuable time to other matters-any burning question at issue between us. I, therefore, respectfully urge, not that we proceed to a decision this evening, because I think it is hopeless to expect that, but that we occupy the time as profitably as we can with move discussion and further discovering the points of difference between us, and, by that means, help forward the matter to a solution more speedily than we shall if we now turn our attention to some matters not at present in our mind, and then come fresh to the consideration of this question on Monday.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales)[7.50]:

I confess that the proposal to postpone this matter until Monday comes from the vanquished party with an honest desire that we should give every possible attention to this subject. Our decision upon this question may affect the whole of the issue before this Convention, and it does seem to me that in all matters connected with our proceedings we ought to lean to that view of the subject which gives time for consideration, which gives every possible deliberation, and shows our anxiety to conclude our proceedings with every possible consideration for all the interests concerned. This is a question which may decide the popular view in two of the largest colonies. I do not think I am likely to alter my own opinion, but it seems to me when we get a proposal like this from the leader of the Convention, who no doubt has consulted with others who have very strong views on the question, and who to a certain extent guide public opinion, it will be courteous on our part to agree with that proposal.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[7.52]:

I wish to say no words which would be discourteous to the leader of this Convention; but I desire to make one suggestion. It seems to me that, if we proceed at once to a further consideration of this question, with all the facts adduced during the debate fresh in our minds, we shall be in a position to make the utmost use of the three days' debate which has taken place, and which lies just behind us. On the other hand, if we go now to the discussion of the important matter of the executive, we shall, to a large extent, let the other matter fade from our minds; and, when we come on Monday to approach the consideration of the question, we shall have practically the whole of the debate over again. It is quite probable that if the matter be postponed until Monday, we shall have one if not two days' debate upon a question which we might be able to settle to-night before we rise. If we had two or three weeks ahead of us to devote to this matter, I should fall in most cordially with the view expressed in favour of delay; but it is of the utmost importance that we should make the utmost use, having regard to the few hours we have before us, of the debate which has taken place; and for these reasons I urge strongly, unless hon. members have gone away upon the understanding that the matter would not come on to-night, in which case I have not one word to say, that we proceed with the consideration of the matter at once, to save that which is precious-time.
Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria)[7.54]:

I submit to hon. gentlemen that we have no excuse for discussing the matter at all except that we have arrived at a somewhat hasty conclusion. I think we decided this question to-day rather hastily; and, in view of the importance of the question, it is reasonable that those who voted to-day should have time for further consideration. That seems to be a sufficient reason for deferring the matter until Monday. In the meanwhile, hon. members will have time to consider the matter in all its aspects. It does not seem reasonable to say that we should proceed now with this discussion with a view to arrive at a decision to-night, which I hope will be somewhat different to the decision we arrived at to-day. I feel that we must not discuss the point, but I offer this suggestion with regard to a question which seems to cover an important issue in connection with our deliberations.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[7.55]:

I want to give one other reason for postponing the consideration of these matters until Monday, and it is, that while it will give hon. members who formed the majority this morning an opportunity to further consider the matter, it will also afford my hon. friends opposite an opportunity to reconsider their position, and I hope they will come round to our way of thinking, and swell the majority by their votes.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[7.56]:

I move:

That the proposed new clause 57 (A) be postponed until after the consideration of clause 70.

We can then go on with the provisions dealing with the executive, and if we complete our consideration of those provisions within a reasonable time, I can again move the postponement of this new clause, so that we may deal with some other subject, such as the judiciary. Before the provisions dealing with the executive are reached, there are two or three formal clauses which we might pass now, because it will be inconvenient to go back to them.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Proposed new clause, and all the amendments suggested for the prevention of deadlocks, postponed.

Clause 57. When a proposed law passed by the houses of the parliament is presented to the governor-general for the Queen's assent, he shall declare, according to his discretion, but subject to the provisions of this constitution, either that he assents to it in the Queen's name, or that he withholds assent, or that he reserves the law for the Queen's pleasure to be made known.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria:
Line 5. After "constitution" insert "and to her Majesty's instructions."

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria) [7.58]:

Speaking from recollection, I believe that the suggested amendment was agreed to upon the motion of an hon. member of the Victorian Assembly in order to make sure that the governor-general's position would not be indefinite. Still-speaking from recollection, it was, I believe, intended that these words should be embodied in the clause to bring it in to accord with some of the constitution acts, so that the governor-general, who will be the agent of the Crown, might be limited, not only by the terms of the constitution, but by the instructions he would receive from the Imperial authorities, so far as they had the right to, instruct him.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

But is not that part of the constitution as it is?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I think not. I think that it would be very hard to contend that it was part of the constitution.

Mr. SYMON:

Is it not included in the word "discretion"? His discretion would be regulated by his instructions.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The amendment seems to fix the instructions as part of the constitution!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Yes; but the question was raised as to whether the clause was not more comprehensive than it was intended to be. At the present time I have not got the notes with me that I intended to have; but I have some recollection that attention was drawn to this matter by Sir Samuel Griffith. However, it is quite clear that in some instances the instructions are expressly referred to, and for that reason it was thought advisable, in order to save any difficulty here, to put in these words. The Drafting Committee, perhaps, if they think necessary, can insert the words.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia) [8.1]:

It seems rather a remarkable circumstance to put an unknown quantity like this in a constitution. It is not a question of drafting, it is one of principle. If the Drafting Committee do incorporate it, I shall take the opinion of the Convention as to whether we will incorporate an absolutely unknown quantity in this constitution.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
As far as I can see, I do not think there is any particular necessity for the insertion of these words. The governor will be acting under instructions from the Queen. It is utterly impossible to imagine that he will not have received those instructions. Whatever he does must also be subject to her Majesty's instructions, irrespective of a provision of this kind. Perhaps the better way would be to formally negative the amendment, and I will make a note to see if there is any necessity to deal with it.
Amendment negatived; clause agreed to.
Clause 58-Disallowance by order-in council of law assented to by governor-general-agreed to.
Clause 59. A proposed law reserved for the Queen's pleasure shall not have any force unless and until within two years from the day on which it was presented to the governor-general for the Queen's assent the governor-general makes known by speech or message, to each of the houses of the parliament, or by proclamation, that it has received the assent of the Queen in Council.
An entry of every such speech, message, or proclamation, shall be made in the journals of each house.
Amendment suggested by the Assembly of South Australia:
Line 2, omit "not."

The CHAIRMAN:
There are a large number of amendments to this clause, which have been suggested by the House of Assembly, and in one instance by the House of Assembly and the Council of South Australia. If hon. members will look at them, they will see that the clause, as amended, would read as follows:-
A proposed law reserved for the Queen's pleasure shall have force after one year unless within one year of the day on which it is presented to the governor-general for the Queen's assent the governor-general makes known by speech or message to each house of parliament, or else by proclamation, that the Queen has thought fit to disallow the bill.
These amendments follow one another.
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[8.4]:
We all know that in the Canadian federation the reservation of bills for the royal assent has practically fallen into disuse. The Governor's instructions no longer contain anything with reference to reserving bills. A bill receives either the royal assent or veto on presentation. The whole question of reservation of assent has become obsolete. I suggested in Adelaide that we might very well, in our federation, follow the practice which has sprung up in Canada, but at the same time I can see that the conditions are not altogether the same, Canada being much nearer the mother country than we are. The means of communication are, of course, much more readily available. While not proposing that this clause should be struck out altogether, the House of Assembly of South Australia proposes that the veto, if exercised, should be expressly exercised, and not simply brought into effect by silence. As the clause stands at present, a bill passed by both houses of the federal parliament and reserved for assent is disallowed by mere effluxion of time. The power of veto ought to be expressly exercised, if at all, and if nothing is said on the matter by her Majesty's ministers— that is to say, the Queen in Council—the bill should have force.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Should become an act of parliament without the royal assent?

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

If silence can give consent, it can give consent in this matter as in any other. It will give rise to extreme suspense if the clause remains as it stands, with the power of veto by mere pigeon-holing. We pass an act, it is reserved for assent, we hear nothing about it for two years, and then all we know is that, no voice being given, the solemn act of both houses of the legislature has become null and void. It is most harassing that a veto should come into force by mere silence, and it will be a great improvement if this amendment is carried. The proposal is simply that silence should give the royal assent. If there is any reason why the bill should be vetoed, let her Majesty's ministers inform the federal parliament through the governor-general of the fact, but if nothing is said, then let the bill have effect.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The principle the hon. member is advocating is contained in section 58!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

There is nothing, very new or unconstitutional in the proposal. I think it will be found convenient to adopt it. There will not be the same amount of misunderstanding, and it will be very much better to have definite reasons given for disallowance. Unless we hear within a definite time that the bill is disallowed, then that bill, which has probably been the result of a great deal of discussion, has taken a great deal of time, and which very often is thoroughly necessary to the good government of the community, should become law. The first proposal which the amendment makes is that the veto shall be active instead of passive, and the second is that the period should be reduced from two years to one year. Suspense is worse than anything. It is far better to know exactly how we stand; and when we consider the rapidity of the means of communication as compared with many years ago, while two years might not have been too long then, one year can be said to be quite, sufficient now.
The Hon. S. FRASER:

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

Not very often; but there are acts as to which it is very important that the Queen's pleasure should be known as soon as possible. A great deal of expense and irritation is cau sed by long delay in knowing what the fate of a measure is to be, and there is no reason why, if the veto is to be exercised at all, it should not be exercised within the space of one year. I hope the Committee will carry these amendments. I cannot see that anything can be said against them.
There is a very great deal both with regard to convenience and celerity, and with regard to avoidance of irritation, to be said in favour of the view we take.
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[8.10]:

I think the hon. member, Dr. Cockburn, is wrong as regards the provision in the Canadian act.
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

It is an instruction to the governor!
Mr. GLYNN:

I will read section 55 of of the Canadian act:

A bill reserved for the signification of the Queen's pleasure shall not have any force unless and until within two years from the day on which it was presented to the governor-general for the Queen's assent, the governor-gen eral signifies by speech or message to each of the houses of parliament or by proclamation that it has received the assent of the Queen in Council.

I agree with the position taken up by the hon. member. In the convention at Adelaide I suggested that this clause might be struck out and that clause 53 be made to act in both cases, which simply gave the governor power to assent to a bill and allowed the Queen within a certain time to disallow it if necessary. I fail to see the necessity of practically suspending the law for two years, and if the Queen should not then give her assent to it declaring the law to be null and void. I fail to see the necessity for keeping up that practice, because in the earlier portions of the bill we have practically substituted the delegation of the powers of the governor-general for the letters-patent. The real reason for keeping up this clause was that originally the letters-patent might from time to time be varied; but the instructions which will be given will be given on the appointment of the governor-general, whose appointment will be a statutable appointment, and whose duties must be prescribed at once. Under the present arrangement an appointment might be made without any prescription of the duties of the governor, other than those prescribed by the general letters-patent issued in all cases.
Mr. SYMON:
It will be an anomaly to introduce into the constitution of a commonwealth under the Crown a provision that certain acts may become law without getting the Queen's assent.
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[8.13]:
It is a suggestion by the South Australian Parliament that if the Queen does not within a certain time assent to a bill, her Majesty shall be deemed to have assented to it. The suggestion reduces the time from two years to one. It would be a novel feature to say that a proposed law, passed by the federal parliament consisting of the Queen and two houses, should become law without the consent of the Sovereign.
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
If it is a good feature, never mind!
Mr. GLYNN:
Why should not the Governor assent in all cases with power of disallowance?
The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
Because he is guided by his instructions!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I would point out that this provision only applies to proposed laws reserved for the Queen's assent. It is quite true that in Canada the royal instructions to the Governor-General are different from the royal instructions to Australian governors.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
They would be the same if we federated!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
No doubt they would be the same. My recollection is that the royal instructions to the Governor-General of Canada do not contain any provision for reserving bills, but still the Governor-General has power to reserve a bill. If, for instance, he sees that it is one which concerns Imperial affairs, and may, if passed, entangle the empire, or be in conflict with treaty obligations he may very well think that it is a bill to be reserved for the signification of the Queen's pleasure, and a period of two years is better for the federation than a period of one year, because the circumstances of the case might be such that a correspondence, and perhaps a very long correspondence, between the mother country and foreign nations, might ensue, which would extend beyond the period of one year from the time of the passing of the bill by the federal parliament. If we limited the period to one year, and that correspondence extended beyond one year, the whole of the legislation would fail. Two years are better for the commonwealth than one year, because the royal assent, if given in two years, would effectuate the desire of the commonwealth to pass the bill into law. Therefore, I think we should retain the clause in its present form.

Amendment negatived.

Suggested amendment by the Legislative Council of South Australia negatived:

Omit "two years" insert "one year."

Clause agreed to.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales)[8.16]:

I understand that it is your desire, Mr. Chairman, and I am sure it will be the wish of the Committee, to take part in the discussion of the clauses relating to the executive. An hon. member who has devoted so much attention and research as you have to the consideration of that question, would not be well treated by us if he had not the opportunity afforded to him of joining in the discussion. I therefore move:

That the Chairman have leave to address the Convention from the floor of the House, and that the Hon. Sir Joseph Abbott, in the meantime, take the chair.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

The Hon. Sir Joseph Abbott took the chair.

Clause 60. The executive power and authority of the commonwealth is vested in the Queen, and shall be exercised by the governor-general as the Queen's representative.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid (New South Wales)[8.18]:

I desire to point out a verbal amendment which is not of much consequence; but I think it would be more in harmony with the nature of the clause which vests in the Queen the power and authority of the commonwealth. I move:

That the word "exercised," line 3, be omitted with a view to the insertion of the word "exercisable."

Amendment agreed to; clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 61. There shall be a council to aid and advise the governor-general in the government of the commonwealth, and such council shall be styled the federal executive council; and the persons who are to be members of the council shall be from time to time chosen and summoned by the governor-general and sworn as executive councillors, and shall hold office during his pleasure.

Suggested amendment by the Legislative Council of South Australia:
After "council," line 1, insert "of six."

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER (South Australia)[8.19]:

I am very much obliged to the Committee for giving me the opportunity of expressing my opinion on one, at all events, of the great principles involved in this constitution, and I am obliged to you, Sir Joseph Abbott, for temporarily relieving me of my official duties. I take it that the amendment to insert the words "of six" will be a test question as to whether in this federal constitution we should retain what is commonly called "cabinet responsible government." The amendment which we are now considering is one which is suggested in effect not only by the Legislative Council of South Australia, but also by the House of Assembly of South Australia. If the amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia is carried in its entirety, the clause will read as follows:-

There shall be a council of six to aid and advise the governor-general in the government of the commonwealth, and such council shall be styled the federal executive council, and the persons who are members of the council shall be chosen at the commencement of each parliament to hold office for three years, unless the two houses of parliament sitting together as one house should otherwise determine. The senate and house of representatives shall each choose three members.

Now, I admit at the outset that if we are going to abandon the system of cabinet government the words which I have just read will not be sufficient, but they are quite sufficient to test the question. The house of assembly of South Australia has proposed in clause 63 to leave out the words "governor-general may from time to time appoint officers," that is, members of the executive council, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "parliament may elect." These two suggestions come to the same thing. Both houses of the legislature of South Australia have recommended that we should abandon the system to which we have been so long accustomed, under which the people of this country have grown up, a system which no doubt will be considered to have worked most excellently in its results by most of the distinguished and eminent men I see surrounding me, a system which has been said to be ingrained in the minds and ideas of the people of every English-speaking colony. I know very well that in attempting to persuade this Committee that I am right upon this question, I have an uphill task to perform. I dare say I shall be considered by most persons as running my head against a stone wall. I have no doubt that in asking the distinguished Premiers and distinguished politicians who are now listening to me, to depart from a system under which they have obtained the position they now hold, a system which has had so excellent effects, so far as they are personally concerned, and which they therefore naturally imagine is in itself excellent, I shall be met with the argument, "You are departing from the fundamental principles of the British Constitution. You are departing from the form of government to which the people are accustomed, and to which they are attached, and endeavouring to form a paper constitution"; but, notwithstanding all that. I have the courage of my opinions. It may be that will not quote, because I will give hon. members credit for having read it. Therefore I do not stand alone on this question. I have the Parliament of South Australia behind me, I have one of the most distinguished statesmen who has ever studied the federation question alongside of me, and although the task that I have is a difficult one, I hope that before I sit down I will be able to persuade the members of this Committee that it is a matter, at all events, worthy of the most serious consideration. In the first, in the only speech that I have hitherto made in this Convention—which I made at Adelaide—I attempted to show that that form of executive which is known as the cabinet-responsible system is inconsistent and unworkable with the existence of two houses of parliament with co-equal power. In that opinion I think I was followed by every member of the Convention—at all events many members coincided in the opinion, and no single member said he differed from it but the conclusion at which I desired the Convention to arrive was not arrived at, as a matter of fact the Convention arrived at exactly the opposite conclusion. The conclusion which I thought would be inevitable was that inasmuch as we had been elected to form a federation we must make all parts of the machine of government subservient to the fundamental principles on which federation is founded. But the Convention came, I do not say by any resolution, but tacitly came to the conclusion that they would adhere to the cabinet system of responsible government, and that if there were anything in federation which was inconsistent with such system, that thing must go. We are not here to discuss abstract principles, we are not here to discuss the meaning of words; but I venture to think that no one will dispute the fact that in a federation, properly socalled, the federal senate must be a powerful house. The federal senate ought not to be an entirely subsidiary house similar in position to the legislative council of one of the constituent states. My hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, the other day said that I was arguing in a vicious circle—that I gave a dogmatic meaning to the word "federation," and then argued that anything inconsistent with that dogmatic meaning must be contrary to federation. Now, I will say to that hon. gentleman, and also to all my hearers, that all forms of government are machines to bring into effect the wishes of the people, or, at all events, they ought to be machines to bring into operation and to give effect to the wishes and opinions of the people of the country at the particular time they are formed.

Mr. HIGGINS:
And not of the states of the country!

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:

Of the particular people who gave the mandate to those whom they elected. Now, the question is, what people? I assert that the mandate which I have from the people of South Australia is to form an instrument of government under which they will give up-to a certain extent but not altogether some of the sovereign powers they now exercise-under which they will give to the central authority that is to be constituted the power of legislation concerning certain subjects, provided such central authority is constituted in such a manner that the states will have some controlling influence even concerning those subject-matters. If that is so, it does not matter how you define the word "federation." I assert that we ought, in giving effect to the mandate which has been committed to us, to consider the wishes and the opinions of the people who sent us here, and it is because I wish to do so that I wish to make the federal senate a strong, a powerful, and a living house. Can we do that if we have the cabinet form of executive? Is it not of the very essence of the cabinet form of executive that one house should be predominant? Let us look at Great Britain, or at any one of these colonies, and what do we see? We see the executive a committee of one house, appointed by that house, responsible to that house, holding their positions by the will of that house; and we see the other house-I do not say exactly a mere gilded ceremony, but rapidly approximating to it. Is it not of the very essence of responsible government that one house should be the predominant partner, and, not only the predominant partner, but the predominant partner to such an extent that the other house rapidly ceases to exercise any real power? The essence of federation is the existence of two houses, if not of actually co-equal power, at all events of approximately co-equal power. The essence of responsible government is the existence of one chamber of predominant power. Now, how are we to reconcile two irreconcilable propositions? Let me give hon. members a little illustration. In South Australia not long ago, the Legislative Council, a council elected on the broadest basis on which any council is elected in these colonies, passed a resolution instructing the Government to do a very simple thing, a matter of which the details are of no importance. It involved the issue of a proclamation necessitating an expenditure of £15, not by the Government, but by a district council. There was no doubt about the legality of it. As a matter of fact, it was urged that the Government were bound by law to do this thing, even if they were not bound by the resolution of the Legislative Council. But what did they do? They sat secure with a large majority in the other house, who they thought, and probably correctly, would uphold their inaction. They said, "We will not do it"; and the Council were powerless to compel them to do it. Will not the federal senate be in the same position if the federal executive is exclusively responsible to one house of parliament? I cannot see how any different conclusion can be arrived at. In South Australia, when this thing happened, it was argued in the Council that their resolution should be obeyed; but how could they secure its observance? How could they vindicate their position? They had only one way of doing it, and that was by refusing to grant supply, or to pass measures in which they concurred, and they shrank from so drastic a course. The fact is that an upper house in these colonies has only one weapon. It is like a fort which has only one big gun, and that gun so powerful and so uncertain in its effect that they hardly dare to let it off, because it may burst and injure those who occupy the fort, and possibly blow it to pieces. This big gun is the power of refusing to grant supplies, and to thus cause the stoppage of all the functions of government. Of course they cannot use it except in the very last resort. They have no practical power over the executive. If such a little incident as I have just now narrated takes place under this federal constitution, what will be the result? The federal senate will say to the federal executive, "You must do so-and-so." The federal executive will take no notice. What can the senate do? Will not such a position as that gradually but inevitably bring the federal senate into such a position as is now occupied by our local legislative councils? What we want in a federation is this: an executive responsible to parliament, responsible to the people through the parliament, but not exclusively responsible to one house of parliament. We want the executive so constituted that it is enabled to lead debate and legislation in both houses of parliament, not dissociated altogether from the legislature, as is the case in America, but so connected with parliament that it can perform the function of leading and informing parliament, which is necessary to secure harmonious working, but at the same time so constituted as not to be exclusively responsible to one house. I dare say I may be told that I am trying to form a paper constitution. I assert that it is exactly the contrary, that those people who are trying to graft the British Executive on the American Federal Constitution, are trying to form a paper constitution; they are trying to bring into existence a machine which has not yet been known to the world.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Not in Canada!

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:
Mr. Walter Bagehot has pointed out in most powerful language how difficult it is to alter any of the delicate portions of the machinery which constitutes a government, composed of checks and balances, and how if you alter one insignificant looking wheel, you may throw the whole system out of gear. How much more true is that if you try to alter this foreign machine—because I assert that the federal form of government is an absolutely foreign machine—a machine of which none of us have any personal knowledge concerning its actual working in one of it most important parts! If you try to alter this foreign machine by taking out one of the most important portions of that machinery and inserting another, by inserting a fly-wheel instead of a cog-wheel, you will turn the whole thing out of gear. I do not say that we cannot form a workable government with the executive form of cabinet; but I do say that you cannot form a workable federal government, that the machine will not work in the manner intended— at all events, it will not work in the manner I intend, it will not work in the manner the people in the smaller states intend—it will result in an amalgamation instead of a federation. We are now really discussing one of the many phases of the subject which we have discussed from the first, namely, the relative power and position of the two houses. I want the members of this Committee to consider carefully that, no matter what theoretical powers you may give to the senate, those powers are inoperative unless they will work out in a practical manner, are useless unless you provide for their practical application. I do not care whether the federal senate has or has not sufficient theoretical powers. I do say this: that, no matter what theoretical powers you give it, if it has no voice in the constitution of the executive, if it has no power over the executive after that executive is constituted, then it will cease to be a powerful factor in the state, and become a mere glorified appendage of the house of representatives.

Mr. GLYNN:
Suppose one house wants a cabinet minister out and the other wants him in, will the cabinet be as strong as it is at present?

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:
I do not want a cabinet at all. I will come to that by-and-by, and will explain what I do want. Perhaps I may be told that we must not load up this constitution with provisions that will render it unacceptable to the people. Now, do the people greatly revere this cabinet system? I do not think they do. If you were to poll the people of Australia from one end to the other, I think they would say, "Abolish it." The popular opinion is this: that it simply results in a struggle between the ins and the outs. It has been described as ten men trying to carry on the government, with another ten men trying to prevent them. But whether that is true or whether it is not, I do not think there can be much doubt that, in the opinion of the man in the street, "the ins and the outs" is a game played by prominent politicians, in which in many cases principle is conspicuous by its absence, and the struggle is for place and pay. I am not, saying whether that is or is not true. I am only asserting that, in my opinion, that is the view held by the general body of the people, and that it will be no bar to the acceptance of this constitution by the people of the various states, if we abolish the cabinet system of responsibility, and adopt something else in its stead. The question is: what shall we adopt? In the Constitutional Committee, in Adelaide, I moved the following resolution:-

That there shall be six members to be chosen at the commencement of each parliament to hold office for three years unless the two houses of parliament shall otherwise determine. The states assembly and the house of representatives shall each choose three ministers. A minister shall have a seat in and the right to speak in either house, but he shall have no right of voting except in the house of which he is a member. Ministers shall be individually responsible to both houses, and either house may, by resolution, demand that two houses shall sit together as one house to consider the conduct or policy of a minister.

I take it that that system, if adopted, will shatter to atoms the quasi-corporate character of cabinet governments.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

They will be all kings!

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:

I admit what my right hon. friend says. I admit that every one will manage his own department!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

All premiers!

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:

All premiers, in their own departments, irrespective of every other minister, and the Governor will probably not have to act on the advice of anybody at all. As a matter of fact, we know that the supposed acting of the Governor, on the advice of ministers, is a mere sham.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: Oh!
The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:
Does anybody here imagine that the governor exercises any real responsibility I

An Hon. MEMBER:
No!
The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:
Are not the so-called advisers to the governor dictators to the Governor?
The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
No doubt about that!
The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:
There is no doubt about that, and that is another reason why we should not start this new constitution by inserting the British sham that the governor chooses his advisers and acts on their advice. What are the facts at present? The real facts are that the parliament dictates to the governor his so-called choice of a premier. I do not say that there is any absolute direct election such as I propose; but who can say that the lower house of parliament at present does not dictate to the governor who shall be Premier, and who will say that the Premier is not, in the choice of his colleagues, greatly influenced by the consideration as to whom he thinks the lower house will approve of? So that though there is no direct election, there is even at present, in one sense of the word, an indirect election of ministers by one house of our local parliaments. Although I am not one of those who would like to needlessly knock down old institutions, even after they have ceased to be useful, which are historic survivals of ancient realities, still, in framing this new constitution of a foreign character, it is absurd for us to import into it a British sham, which will not work with that foreign constitution. When I was led away I was commencing to describe what would be the effect of the system which I suggest. One effect would be that each minister would manage his own department, subject only to parliament; that there would be no collective responsibility by ministers. Why should not parliament, who are the elect of the people, who represent the people, retain in their own hands the power of dictating to each individual minister the policy he should pursue? In matters of administration, let him manage his department; in matters of policy, let him be dictated to by parliament.
The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
Six different policies!
The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:
Six different policies, if necessary—one for each department.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
HOW would you manage about the finances?

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:
That is just what I was coming to. I will give the hon. member, an illustration of how I would manage about the finances. Not very long ago, in Germany, there was a difference of opinion between the Minister of Marine and the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Marine said, "I want so many more millions in order to build new ships." The Minister of Finance said, "I cannot afford it, and I cannot give you the money." Who decided between them? Why, the legislature did? Why should they not decide? Who decides now?—why that modern autocrat, the Premier. Why should the direct representatives of the people delegate to one man that power and those responsibilities with which they have been intrusted by the people? I may perhaps be taunted with this consideration: that the collective responsibility of ministers has grown up, and been an evolution out of the individual responsibility of ministers. But the members of this Convention must recollect that the original responsibility of ministers was not to parliament, but to the Crown, and that we have never yet tried the system with individual responsibility to parliament. That, however, is not an untried system. That is a system which exists in Switzerland, and, so far as I can gather from my reading, it is a system which works well in that country.

Mr. GLYNN:
And it is in the Constitution of France, and has been the cause of untold trouble there according to some writers!

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:
I believe they have had in France forty different constitutions of late years, and nearly all of them have become unworkable, chiefly because of the characteristics of the French people, and because they wanted to give immediate effect to the uneducated and unchecked will of the people without due consideration.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
We are now proposing to try some foreign inventions!

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:
This federation is a foreign invention.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID: Thoroughly Australian!

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:
Federation?
The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
We are going to have an Australian religion, too!
The Hon. Sir R.C. Baker:
I have no doubt that the right hon. gentleman will be the high priest. There is one minor consideration which I may as well mention, now that I remember it. Under this new system we wish to establish, we shall double the number of elections which the people will have to attend. We have now in each colony elections to the local parliament, and bye-elections. We shall have to elect a federal senate, and a federal house of representatives, and we shall have bye-elections again there. It is difficult enough now to persuade people to go to the poll; but if we double the system of elections it will be still more difficult. Then, if we have this double dissolution, this double referendum, or this mass referendum-whichever we agree to—we shall have an infinitely greater number of elections; so that the average elector will have to rise early in the morning, and look at his diary, and see what election he is going to attend. If we abandon responsible government there will be no deadlocks; there will be no penal dissolution, and consequently few elections, less trouble and loss to the people, and less expense.
The Hon. A. Deakin:
And no popular control!
The Hon. Sir R.C. Baker:
There will be just as much popular control as there is at present, and there will be more satisfaction amongst the people. To hear hon. members talking in this Convention, one would think that the average elector is one who studies all the possible political questions of the day, and rushes to all the elections; whereas, we know exactly the contrary. However, this is, perhaps, a matter of minor importance. I do not want to labour this question. I have addressed the Committee, perhaps, longer than I intended. I have desired to be as clear and concise as possible. I hope that the question is of such importance that it will receive due consideration, because I feel that from the very start of the 1891 Convention in Sydney to the present day, to the present hour, we have been gradually frittering away the power, the position, and the dignity of the senate; and I want to do something to counteract that to some small extent. When I spoke in Adelaide I was told, "You ought not to go to foreign countries for your constitution; you should stick to everything that is British"; and now where are we going for our referendum? We are going to Switzerland, and if we can go to Switzerland with advantage for a referendum, I do not see it is any more foreign if we can go to Switzerland, as we may with advantage, for an executive. At all events, if this is not an argument, it is a consideration which answers the objection raised in Adelaide—that we ought to stick hard and fast by all the lines of the British Constitution. Why, in this constitution which we are now considering, we have departed at the very start from every line of the British Constitution, except that principle which is common to all manner of constitutions all over the world—that there should be representatives chosen by the people. We are to have two houses of parliament each chosen by the same electors. What principle in the British Constitution is there there? We are to have, instead of a highly centralised government such as they have in Great Britain, a division of powers in fact we are to have, at all events, an attempt at a federation. What principle in the British Constitution is there there? We are going to have a double dissolution, and perhaps a double referendum. What principle in the British Constitution is there there? Why, sir, we have day by day and every day, departed from the lines to which we were told we should adhere, and when I ask members of the Committee to depart from them a little more—I do not say it is a necessary conclusion that they ought to do so, but I do say that they cannot turn round upon me and say, "You are asking us to adopt a foreign innovation, and we must adhere to the British type of constitution." Probably I shall be in a minority. But the history of this Convention, if it has shown anything, has shown that those who are in a minority one day are not necessarily in a minority on another. It has shown that argument and reason have their effect. If it does not show that, it shows that time has its effect. I hope that, inasmuch as the probability is that we shall not conclude our labours at the present sitting, that time will have its effect in showing to members of this Convention how absolutely inconsistent with the fundamental principles of federation is the principle of cabinet executive government.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[8.56]:

Since the hon. member has referred to certain observations in a speech of mine, I hope I shall not be considered presumptuous if I follow him briefly. I understand the hon. member to say that he has no hope of changing the views of hon. members as expressed in Adelaide; but I presume his speech has been made, not without any definite object, but rather with the idea and desire of stiffening the views of those who hold with the hon. gentleman these peculiar theories with regard to federation. Now, my attitude with regard to the hon. member's views is very simple. I think he is absolutely logical, and, as I said before, if there is one thing during these debates which has been frequently instilled into me, and about which I have been often warned, it is that I should not be absolutely logical. If you give the hon. gentleman his premises, his conclusion is irresistible. The only point to which I wish to draw attention is that he assumes—and I hope I shall be absolved from any intention of presuming that I have studied the question as he has done, or that I have had the experience in parliamentary matters which he has had—that if you are to have a federation, you must abandon responsible government. I dispute with him that there is an absolutely rigid and definite meaning to the word "federation." He says we must take the word as meaning that the people of the states give up certain powers on condition that they, as states, shall have a voice in moulding the laws. But it all depends on the agreement. The question is, what agreement we shall make. Are we to enter into an agreement that the people of the different states are to give up their powers on condition that they, as states, shall have an equal voice in moulding the laws? The hon. gentleman says that in a federation you must have a states' house and a people's house; that these two houses must be equal; that if you have responsible government you cannot have that state of thing—that under responsible government you must have one house greater than the other. That is quite true. The two things are inconsistent. They will not mix logically; they are perfectly irreconcilable. It is quite certain that if you have a federation in the form of that certain definite, rigid agreement which he describes, you cannot have responsible government. But the hon. gentleman treats federation as if it were an Athena sprung ready armed from the head of Jupiter—that it was something absolutely defined from its first inception. But I take it that "federation" is a word used to indicate a number of devices which have, as their general object, the relegating of certain subjects to the central government, and the leaving of other subjects to the state governments. I take it that there is no reason for treating federation as if it were a matter to be explained among words in a school-book. I take it as a simple matter of commonsense and expediency. I may say that I have read the pamphlet on the federal executive which the hon. member, Sir Richard Baker, has published; and I cannot see how those hon. members who adopt this rigid view of federation can escape from the logic of the hon. member, Sir Richard Baker, which seems to me to be absolutely conclusive. It seems to me that if you once start with the idea that you must have the consent of the states, as well as the consent of the people, the hon. member, Sir Richard Baker, is absolutely right, you cannot have responsible government. But this beautiful system that we propose makes it evident that for Australian purposes we cannot have a federation in the sense in which that word is used by Sir Richard Baker, for the very matter in which state interests are most involved is state expenditure, and we are limiting the powers of the senate in regard to money bills. I want to know where those hon. gentlemen who have been airing theories in regard to the absolute necessity in a federation of having consenting states as well as consenting people now are? I said in my opening speech that that rigid theory of federation was like a bubble that has been pricked, and I adhere to that view now. I submit, that in no form of government are two houses necessary - I hope I shall not be taken as advocating that there should be only one house in this government. As Benjamin Franklin said a long time ago, the system of having two houses does bear a resemblance to trying to drag a cart with one horse in front and one horse behind - one horse pulls one way and the other horse pulls the other way. But I do not say that in a federation there is no room for a second house. I rather think that John Stuart Mill has expressed the more correct view when he said: it is not for a check that you want the second chamber, but it is to prevent the one chamber feeling the deterioration which otherwise follows the sense of irresponsible power. The is a good deal to be said in support of that opinion. I do not intend, as this is not a live question, to go any further into the matter now. I would not have had the presumption to rise after so weighty a speech as that delivered by my hon. friend if he had not made some reference to what I had said. Whatever may be the course of the debate-whatever maybe, the result of our deliberations here-I feel that the chief of our difficulties which have arisen in the course of framing this constitution has arisen from the publication throughout Australia of a rigid-theory of federation to which we now find we cannot practically adhere.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[9.4]:

For many years past I have been a supporter of the principle of an elective ministry, and I am none the less disposed to support that system on this occasion, because under the proposed amendment a certain proportion of the executive would owe its origin to the senate or states' house. I think that this principle is one which in no way destroys the principle of responsible government. It makes each minister more directly responsible than ever to parliament. Having advocated this reform in the local legislature as being applicable to the colony I have the honor to represent, I think it is still more applicable to the new conditions under federation. Of course I do not believe there is much prospect of its being carried, but I am glad it has been brought forward. I think that if it is not carried at the present time it will spring up under federation, and will become the practice in the federation when once formed. I am of opinion that the principle of electing officers is superior to that of nomination. As a matter of fact, ministers are at present practically nominated by a member of the house of assembly. I think that a much superior way is for the members of the executive to be directly elected by and responsible to the assembly to which they owe their origin, and from which they derive their powers. I hope that the hon. member will take a division upon this question. Should he do so, I shall have much pleasure in voting with him.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[9.6]:

There are one or two matters which I should have liked to have had further elucidated by the hon. member who has submitted this proposition to the Committee. He speaks of the proposed federal constitution as a foreign institution. I should like him to tell us where this foreign institution has been put into practical operation in the shape which he proposes. I should like to know to what country we could go for experience of elective ministers where the constitution is established under the Crown—where you have as the supreme head, not a president elected by the people or by the parliament, but a monarch. It appears to me that my hon. friend has lost sight of this essential of our proposed constitution, that we, first of all, insist that it should be under the Crown. Theoretically, this may be a sham; but, term it what you like, the mandate of the people is that the semblance of authority is to proceed from the Crown itself. My hon. friend says that these ministers or executive officers are to derive their policy from the parliament. We know very well that our experience of parliaments is that they change their policy very frequently.

An Hon. MEMBER:

So do ministers!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

We must therefore have it as a condition of the proposal put forward that the ministers of education, of lands, of railways, and whatever ministers you choose, to make must change their policy from week to week in order to keep in touch with the parliament which elects them.

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:

Do they not do that now?

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

Even if they do, it is upon rare occasions. It is not the rule, but the exception to the rule. my hon. friend's proposal, however, would make it the established rule that ministers should be the agents of parliament, to give executive effect to its wishes and directions. Suppose the houses of parliament differed as to their policy, the senate desiring one policy and the house of representatives another, which should the ministry follow? More than that, does not the hon. member know that one-half of the work of an executive body, be it a cabinet government or any other form of government, consists in administrative official acts which do not come under the cognisance of parliament at all? How, too, are you to reconcile the existence of cordiality and agreement which is necessary in order that these functions may be properly carried out, if you have the ministers selected, not at their own choice, not with any desire to work in harmony with each other, not from any guaranteed policy which will ensure harmonious working, but from different parts of the house, holding different views, and, possibly, some of them, not on the friendliest terms? You may see, as a consequence, ministers and their administrative arrangements reducing public affairs to a state of chaos, and bringing, them into contempt with the people. As a necessary corollary to the hon. member's proposition, if he wishes to make the federation one consistent with the foreign lands from which it is supposed to be derived, let one supreme head be elected by the people or the parliament, and let that person have the responsibility of all executive authority as in the United States; then the federal machine will work as smoothly as the greatest theorist would desire; but that machine would not agree with the inclinations and desires of the people, who have commissioned us to form a federal constitution under the Crown. I take it that, if we now agree to have so drastic a change as this, it would result in the machine having to be further amended, so as to place in it this principle of an elective governor or president, and so do away with the one link which connects us with the mother land. It may be "a British sham"; but it is an essential principle that we retain our connection with the mother land and with its institutions which are really the motive of our desire for retaining that connecting link. We desire to retain that connection, as far as possible, under our federation. I hold, with the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, that we may use this term "federation" in such a way as to run the theory to death. We may, as the hon. member, Sir Richard Baker, points out, make a workable constitution, and, if we make it workable, I do not care how many theories I violate, or help to violate, as long as we make the constitution workable, and promote the happiness of those who are to live under it.

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER (South Australia): I should like to say one word in reply to the remarks of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers. He says the system I advocate is not workable if this is to be a constitution under the Crown. Why not? We have at present a constitution under the Crown, in which, practically, who are to be the advisers of the Crown are dictated by the lower house of parliament, and, practically, those advisers tell the governor what he has to do. Where is the difference between the system which exists at present and the system I am now advocating so far as that point is concerned? I can see none. The hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, says supposing the two houses differ, what policy is the minister appointed by one of these houses to adopt? If the hon. member had followed me, he would have seen that that is provided for by a modification of the Swiss system, namely, that the ministers should be individually responsible to both houses, and either house might by resolution demand that the two houses shall sit together in one house and consider the conduct and policy of the ministers, so that the two houses sitting together in case of a disagreement shall decide on what the policy of the ministry shall be. That is, as to those political and ministerial acts that are of sufficient importance to come before parliament. There are many ministerial acts that do not come before either parliament or premier under the present system. What difference would there be if each minister managed his own department (as he does at present) subject to the dictation of parliament, or to the dictation of his premier? I do not see any difference. I believe there is a very large majority against me, and, therefore, I shall not labour the matter any longer.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 61 (Constitution of executive council for commonwealth) agreed to.

Clause 62 (Application of provisions referring to governor-general) agreed to.

Clause 63. For the administration of the executive government of the commonwealth, the governor-general may, from time to time, appoint officers to administer such departments of state of the commonwealth as the governor-general in council may from time to time establish, and such officers shall hold office during the pleasure of the governor-general, and shall be capable of being chosen and of sitting as members of either house of the parliament.

Such officers shall be members of the federal executive council, and shall be the Queen's ministers of state for the commonwealth.

After the first general election no minister of state shall hold office for a longer period than three calendar months unless he shall be or become a member of one of the houses of the parliament.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia:
Omit "governor-general may from time to time appoint," line 3, with a view to insert parliament may elect."
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia:
Omit first and second paragraphs.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[9.15]:

I think it right that I should state the reasons why the South Australian Parliament proposed these amendments. Of course, we were aware of the arguments which Sir Richard Baker has used here to-night in reference to the executive. He had not convinced all of us that the cabinet system was absolutely incompatible with federation; but he introduced into most of our minds a doubt on the question, and we thought that, from our point of view, it would be better in this cast-iron constitution not to say either on the one hand that the responsible cabinet system should be adopted, or, on the other hand, that it should not be adopted, and the idea was to leave out these sub-clauses so that the matter might be left entirely an open question—so that either system which might be required as time went on, might be adopted, and the federation work out its own salvation—to use a phrase used here before. I am not going to urge the matter at all. I simply give this explanation of the reasons why the clause is proposed to be amended in the manner indicated.

Suggested amendments negatived.

Amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of Tasmania:

Omit the last paragraph. Insert "Every minister of state shall, during his tenure of office, have the right of entrance to and audience in both houses of the parliament, but shall not be entitled to vote in either house, unless he has been duly elected a member thereof."

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH (Tasmania)[9.17]:

In this suggested amendment hon. members will discover the handiwork of the Hon. I.A. Clark, who, it will be remembered, gave to the Convention of 1891, from the very bench at which I stand, an admirable disquisition on the subject dealt with this evening by Sir Richard Baker. It will be remembered that he gave a quotation from Freeman with respect to the advisability of exempting a ministry from responsibility to parliament, and of assimilating our practice more with that of the American states. Therefore Mr. Clark desired that the Convention should eliminate paragraph 3 of the clause. The provision found its way into the bill at Adelaide, and was not in the bill of 1891. If these words are struck out it will be possible for a minister to be in office for a considerable period, even though he may not have the responsibility of being elected. I am not commending this clause to the Convention, but I consider it my duty to call the attention of hon. members to the purpose which the mover in Tasmania had in view. In the words proposed to be inserted, the idea is to follow the United States practice.
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The United States practice?
The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
I refer to the practice which allows a minister or the presidents to speak in either house.
Mr. SYMON:
The Sandwich Islands practice!
The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
The attorney-general may not be able to get representation in the senate o

The CHAIRMAN:
I will put the question that the paragraph stand part of the clause. If it is struck out the Tasmanian suggestion will be inserted, but, if the paragraph stands I cannot put it.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[9.21]:
I think it my duty to put before the Committee some of the reasons which my friend, Mr. Inglis Clark, the Attorney-General of Tasmania, has communicated to me in favour of this amendment, leaving them to the judgment of the Committee. Mr. Inglis Clark's reasons proceed in this way:
The apparent object of the insertion of subclause 3 is to secure the adoption of the system of responsible government;-
There, of course, I think he is correct. It was as a safeguard to responsible government that this sub-clause was inserted.
But it is submitted that, in order to attain that object, it is not necessary to insist upon the presence of all the members of the cabinet in the parliament of the commonwealth, because we have seen several instances, both in England and in the Australian colonies, of one or more members of the cabinet being unable to obtain a seat in parliament during the whole of one or two sessions; and so far from securing for all time the adoption of the system of responsible government, it might be found in the future to facilitate and bring about a system of election of ministers by parliament and a co-terminus duration of their term of office with the duration of parliament. The proposed substitute for sub-section III is similar to, the provision which finds a place in the constitutions of France and Italy, and of other countries which have adopted the system of responsible government, and which have found the provision very advantageous in securing the more perfect and satisfactory working of that system of government.
I have been unable to convince myself, sir, that this is a desirable proposal to insert in the constitution but I have thought it was only a matter of duty, as well as courtesy, to the very able gentleman who has forwarded these reasons to lay them before the Convention. On the whole, I think we may do well to retain the clause as it stands. I am not quite sure that there would be a direct opposition between the clause as it stands and the amendment if it were inserted; but, in any case, I take it that we ought to retain the clause as it stands, whatever is done about the amendment. As to the amendment, I will require to be a little convinced before I can consider it a desirable innovation.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[9.23]:

I intend to vote against this paragraph, because I think it is a matter for legislation. Hon. members will have noticed from the pamphlet published by Sir Samuel Griffith, that this is one of several clauses which he asks should he struck out on the ground that we are really interfering with what ought to be the legislative power of the commonwealth. I would suggest that it this amendment be made, the words, "until parliament otherwise provides," ought to be inserted at the beginning of it, because, otherwise, you are making provision in the constitution for what is a matter of legislation. The proper way would be to give parliament power in clause 52 to make such a law. Although this power does exist in the French Constitution of 1875, that Constitution contains a provision for the responsibility of two houses on somewhat the same lines, sir, as you recommended for the adoption of this Committee, and it is probably in consequence of some of the ministers being by the Constitution in the Senate in France that the right of audience in both houses has been given, I do not think we are called upon to adopt the French precedent, considering that the circumstances are so very different.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[9.25]:

I should like to ask the leader of the Convention whether the parliament has power to legislate in regard to the number of ministers who would sit in either house? It appears to me necessary that there should be some provision that one or more ministers should be members of the senate. Under the Constitution of Western Australia one member of the ministry must be a member of the Legislative Council, and it seems to me desirable that there should be some provision in reference to the matter.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[9.26]:

There is no distinct provision in the bill that there should be any distinct number of members of the government in either house. I take it that there will be an inherent power in parliament to legislate on this subject, and for this reason: the powers of responsible government are mainly given in this constitution, not by any direct form of words but because the power of the purse is given to the parliament. The power of the purse is mainly given to one house, no doubt, and in that case the responsibility would be primarily to that house. In the working of that system, parliament may, from time to time, insist on them being a number of members in this or that house. It can do that by resolution, and there is nothing in the constitution to prevent it; and if it can do that by resolution, I do, not see that there is anything in the world which will prevent it making it also a subject of legislation. But that is a matter which I think cannot find its place in any constitution, but which must be left to the evolution of the constitution itself.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[9.27]:

I also should like to ask the leader of the Convention a question. Looking at the Tasmanian amendment I see that it might be very convenient to have this power, and if the power could not be given under our constitution without an alteration of that constitution, I think we might meet the difficulty by carrying the amendment as proposed by Tasmania, with the words added before the amendment, "Parliament may provide that." Then it would certainly confer upon the federal parliament power to do this, as I think we ought to confer the power unless it can have it otherwise without a special provision.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[9.28]:

I suggest that the proper way will not be for the House to accept the amendment suggested by the hon. member, Mr. Holder. His suggestion is not to confer the power on the constitution, but to give parliament power to legislate for it. If you begin to say parliament may do this and not do that, you interfere with the delegation of the powers under clause 52—that is, with the constitution, as we are drafting it. The proper way is to stick to the delegation of the powers under clause 52, because they are the definition of what parliament can do.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Are not powers given all through the bill?

Mr. GLYNN:

I do not think so. So far as political machinery is concerned they are; but there are no powers which are not merely functional given to parliament except under clause 52. Even under this very part of the bill itself, as clause 69 will show, where there is a specification of certain other things, such as customs and excise, taken over as federal departments, the prescription or assignment of these departments is merely auxiliary to clause 52, and gives amplification to its provisions. I suggest the addition of the words "until parliament otherwise provides."
Mr. WALKER (New South Wales)[9.29]:

I feel considerable delicacy and hesitancy in speaking on this matter; but in the absence of a gentleman whom I hope to see present after the next adjournment of the Convention, Sir Samuel Griffith, I would draw attention to the fact that he in his pamphlet refers to this very matter. In his notes on the drafting of the Constitution Bill he says:

The only material change made by the Convention in the draft bill of 1891 with respect to the executive government is the introduction of a provision that after the first general election no minister of state shall hold office for a longer period than three calendar months, unless he shall be or become a member of one of the houses of the parliament.

He goes on to say:

Cannot then the federal parliament be trusted to insist upon ministers being members, if it thinks fit to do so? Why this want of confidence in the parliament? They will have to work the machine which is now being constructed. Why should the use of a recent invention never tried in a federal state be prescribed for all time, and why in the case of what is admittedly a mere experiment prohibit the use of a safety-valve?

In truth the reason for the insertion of this provision seems to be a fear that the sacred ark of responsible government may not find a secure anchorage in the unknown sea of a federal constitution, and a desire to establish an artificial shelter for it. But surely, if the institution in its present form is good it will last, and if it is not good it ought to be modified. Precedent, with one or two exceptions, is distinctly against the proposal. The history of most countries where responsible government has been tried is against it. In regard to law officers, especially who in the Australian commonwealth will have to discharge most important functions, there have been frequent instances in which the necessity has arisen of appointing a lawyer not a member of parliament.

In Queensland in days gone by there have been ministers without portfolio who have not been members of parliament.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

How long did they hold office?

Mr. WALKER:

They held office without portfolio, and without remuneration, for the whole lifetime of the cabinet speaking from memory.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

What was parliament doing all the time?

Mr. WALKER:

I am not prepared to say that that condition of things lasted very long, but I can mention one or two instances. The Hon. George Raff was minister without portfolio in the Herbert administration. Then Sir Samuel Griffith continues:

With the proposed small number of members of both houses, the difficulty is extremely likely to occur. If it is desired that the best men should be appointed ministers of state, why arbitrarily limit the field of choice? It may be noted that the provision is distinctly objectionable in form, as being a limitation of the royal prerogative. This term it may be well to observe rarely expresses the embodiment of the sovereign power of the whole people, and does not signify the personal privilege of an individual. But, perhaps, the strongest objection to such attempts to fetter the freedom of a nation is their utility. The exclusion of ministers of state from Congress in the United States has not prevented the practical exercise of important functions which under our system of government properly appertain to the executive government by committees of Congress, and a law which required that executive functions should be formally exercised by a member of parliament would not prevent the real exercise of them in the name of a member by a person not a member if the state desired that they should be so exercised. The result might be the establishment of a bureaucracy under the disguise of responsible government. It is manifestly desirable that the person who rarely exercises authority should, as far as practicable, be the same person who is formally responsible for its exercise.

It seems to me that we might make an addition to the present laws in the manner suggested by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Glynn, by inserting the words "until parliament otherwise determines." If the question comes to a division, I shall support the insertion of the words proposed by the hon. member, Sir Philip Fysh.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL (Victoria)[9.34]:

I think it would be a very inadvisable power to grant to federal government; there may be particular occasions when a minister in one house may be asked to explain a measure in another house, but that could be done under a resolution. I do not think there is any necessity for placing such a provision as this upon our statute-book. The case can, no doubt, be met by a standing order. If a minister having a particular knowledge of a subject in one house, say in the assembly, were required to explain that measure during its passing through the council, if that was thought to be essentially desirable, it could be done by resolution, and the Minister could be heard at the bar, and could explain the object of the bill in a definite and detailed manner.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
It could be provided for by legislation by the federal parliament!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

Or by standing order passed by both houses.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[9.36]:

It seems to me that the best course would be to strike out the third paragraph altogether and leave the whole matter to the federal parliament. There really seems no necessity to make provision that no minister of the state should hold office for more than three calendar months unless he became a member of one house of parliament. We may assume that, as we are going to have responsible government, parliament would take care that its ministers are members of parliament, and it would be a pity to introduce a hard and fast rule into the constitution when there is no necessity for it. The parliament would see that the responsibility was kept alive; and if we leave that provision out, I also agree that, as to the amendment from Tasmania, that is not a matter that need be embedded in this constitution. It is provided for in various ways; and parliament might deal with it as each particular case arose or by standing order, which until revoked, would enable any minister holding a seat in one house to conduct a particular measure through the other house. We might well leave that, as Sir Samuel Griffith says, to be dealt with by the federal parliament - at any rate the federal parliament, if we have a system of responsible government, will take care that ministers who possess its confidence will have seats in the parliament.

The Hon. H. DOBSON (Tasmania)[9.37]:

While I admit that there is force in the argument in favour of introducing into the constitution the amendment suggested by the Attorney-General of Tasmania, I am inclined to think that, apart from that, the matter has not obtained the consideration it deserves. As you, sir, pointed out in an admirable speech a few minutes ago, we are framing a federal constitution, and I think we are keeping too close to that model of responsible government in the English Constitution which, I venture to think, time will prove is not so well adapted to our federal wants and a federal constitution as most hon. members seem to think. The amendment suggested by the Attorney-General of Tasmania is, to my mind, so useful that I desire to see it embedded in the constitution, and I do not desire to see federal government carried on for many years without this matter having been considered. I make this suggestion for this all-important reason: We have had various discussions, and we are going to have many more discussions, as to whether the voice of the states should be drowned by the national voice. We are going to have many discussions, and the battle is going to rage still further, and the battle has to be won over again or lost. We are going to have that in relation to state rights; and what could be more conducive to the settlement of the question of state rights and the reconcilement of all differences by common-sense or conciliation than to allow the premier, a member of the lower house, to go to the senate, or a minister in the senate to go to the lower house, and, without having any power to vote therein, to lay before the house, to which he did not belong, the reasons which he had induced the senate, on the one hand, to insist upon its views, or the reasons which had induced the house of representatives, on the other hand, to insist upon its views? If we desire to have a kind, of dual government, in which the voice of the nation and the voice of the states are, to a certain extent, to be heard, and to be sovereign, and not either to be overridden by the other, it appears to me that the suggestion before the Committee is a most admirable one, and I say at once that if a minister went down from the senate and pointed out to the lower house the reasons which induced the senate to say that a particular measure affected a state right—that it affected the rights of the whole state—that it affected them disastrously—that would do a great deal indeed towards removing any difference that might arise. I, therefore, hope that the amendment will be carried. I am not inclined to favour the suggestion made by the hon. member, Mr. Glynn, for the insertion of the words "until parliament otherwise provides." I agree with Sir Samuel Griffith, and others who desire to make the constitution elastic, so that there shall be the fullest and most ample opportunity for the federation, to develop a kind of government of its own. I do not believe in adhering too closely to that form of responsible government which, while it has many virtues, has many known defects.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid (New South Wales)[9.41]:

There is no doubt that at first sight this proposition appears worthy of consideration; but I would submit to hon. members that, after all, it would be a novelty for which there is not quite sufficient warrant.

The Hon. H. Dobson:

It is a harmless novelty, and it may be of use!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

I will point out a use which may be made of it, and which, if I were a very ardent admirer of the powers of the senate, I should not like to see taken advantage of. Under this provision a government might leave itself unrepresented in the senate. It could say, "Oh, we will send the Premier up from time to time to explain our measures."

The Hon. H. Dobson:

Suppose we had a Mr. Reid in the senate!
The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

I shall be in the other place, if I am anywhere. This provision might give an excuse to a government to allow itself to be weakly represented in the senate. Therefore, from my hon. friend's point of view, it would be a dangerous innovation. I also think that on the merits of the case, a government to be efficient should be properly represented in both houses of legislature. If it is so represented, there will be no need for this contrivance. The members of the senate will know in advance by reading Hansard, the records of the lower house, and other public papers, everything that has been said and done by ministers and the supporters of a measure in the house of representatives before it reaches them, and there will also be a representative of the Government there to supply any further information which may be necessary. I think that on the whole, there is not sufficient warrant for this change.

The Hon. A. Douglas (Tasmania):

[Inaudible.]

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs (Victoria):

There are two questions which have been agitated in connection with this paragraph. The first is whether the third paragraph of the clause shall or shall not be retained. I strongly hope it will be retained. We have, already, I think, determined that the system of responsible government shall be maintained; at all events, that it shall begin, with the life of this commonwealth. It would give rise to a very uneasy feeling, throughout these colonies if the people thought that principle was in danger in, the slightest degree. We have already decided that the governor shall exercise his official functions by the advice of the executive council, and it is understood that that clause shall have the confidence of parliament. There should be no doubt about retaining that part of the clause. As to the suggestion of the Tasmanian House of Assembly, I think very highly of it. With some of my colleagues, I was a member of a parliamentary procedure commission some years ago, and we reported very strongly in favour of a similar proposal. The hon. member, Mr. Deakin, and others were on that commission; but I do not consider a constitution is the place for such a provision. It would be an experiment. I believe it would be a successful one; but we do not know how far experience would justify it; we do not know how far provisions that might appear correct in the first instance would require to be modified. It is one which I think will come peculiarly within the province of the federal parliament when that body is constituted.

Question-That paragraph 3 stand part of the clause-put. The Committee

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Is it competent to move that "six months" be substituted for "three months?"

The CHAIRMAN:
No; it is only competent now to add something to the clause.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The period of three months is too short. altogether.
Clause agreed to.

Clause 64. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the number of ministers of state who may sit in either house shall not exceed seven, who shall hold such offices, and by such designation, as the parliament from time to time prescribes, or, in the absence of provision, as the governor-general from time to time directs.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of Victoria:
After "seven," line 3, insert "of whom two at least shall be members of the senate."
The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL (Victoria)[9.53]:

was understood to say that the object of the amendment was that at least two members of the ministry should sit in the senate. It seemed to him a very reasonable proposal, and one which should commend itself to the unanimous approval of the Convention.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Why not say that two should sit in the house of representatives?

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

The government was formed in the house of representatives, and it was preposterous to suppose that that chamber would not look after its own interests.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[9.55]:

If the senate maintains the position, which I hope it will, as a reasonably strong house, depending as it will on the popular will, being elected by popular suffrage, then such a number of members will maintain their seats in the senate as its importance demands. If, on the other hand, it is found that the government can be more conveniently conducted sometimes with one, and sometimes with three members in the senate, the working of the constitution will provide for that. It is far better to let things govern themselves in matters of this sort than to hamper them with a restriction.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[9.56]:

I have not the slightest doubt that it will be found absolutely impossible in practice to carry on the government without having some minister in the senate.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

Why object?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Because I do not think that this is the place to insert such a provision. If you are going to put a provision of that nature in this constitution, we do not know where we are going to stop. A question, and a very pertinent question, was put to my hon. friend by the leader of the Convention: why do you not make some provision as to the number to be put in the house of representatives? That is altogether unnecessary.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

How many members do you say will be in the government-seven?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No; not to exceed seven. It may be five or it may be four. I think the hon. gentleman will see that, to put a provision of this nature in the constitution would be - and I think we have gone a good deal in that direction as it is - to put in a matter of detail which ought to be left entirely to the legislature.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[9.57]:

There is no doubt that the insertion of these words would make it absolutely necessary to have seven ministers. It may be that when the commonwealth is formed, five ministers would be found sufficient. Any government which may be formed will have too substantial an interest to stand well in the senate, to treat them badly in the matter of representation. Under any conceivable constitution that this Convention is likely to frame, the senate will be very well able to take care of itself, and no government, on the point of one or two, will get into bad relations with the senate.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

Will the hon. member agree to the salaries of ministers being struck out if he says there ought to be five?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I do not know that they ought to have any salary in the constitution bill; I have not sufficient confidence in it yet. This is not a matter which should be put in the bedrock of the constitution. I believe that the senate will be well able to take care of its own interests, and whether it is or not I do not think any government will endeavour to govern two houses without being properly represented there.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

Why object to it then?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

There is not much virtue in numbers. For instance, one minister, if he is a man of the right stamp, may be a far better representative in the senate than two men of inferior stamp. It is not a question of numbers at all. My hon. friend will admit that it is altogether a question of the ability and tact of the gentleman who happens to be there.

One good minister, one able man who is in sympathy with the senate, will give them infinitely more satisfaction than, perhaps, two who would fail in the requisite qualifications. Take my hon. friend himself. If he were sent up to represent a government in the senate, you could not find another like him to begin with. He is so good that no one would ever think of anyone else after him. So, under the constitution, inasmuch as the representation would depend more on the ability and fitness of the individual than on the number of the individuals, I think we had better leave this provision as it is.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[9.59]:

I agree with my hon. friend, Sir William Zeal, in thinking that some provision should be made for the representation of the ministry in the senate. In our constitution, while there is no limit to the number of ministers, still it is provided that one at least shall be a member of the Legislative Council. That provision, I think, has worked well. It prevents a government from giving all the offices of profit to the members of one house, as it is quite easy for them to do, and to appoint ministers without portfolios in the upper house without any emolument. That is a thing which might occur. And seeing that it is generally agreed that there must be one minister or more in the upper house, I see, no reason why we should not insert a definite provision. I would be satisfied if there were one member rather than two.

The Hon. Sir W.A. Zeal:
We must have one!

The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest:
Unless we make provision for it, it will be competent to appoint ministers without portfolio and salary to represent the government in the upper house. I do not know that they could not carry on business without ministers there at all.

The Hon. Sir W.A. Zeal:
Not for long!

The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest:
At any rate the provision was made in the West Australian constitution and it has been found to work extremely well. No one, I think, can reasonably object to the provision that at least one minister should have a place in the senate. I place importance upon this from the point of view I have just mentioned—that is the point of emoluments. It would be very convenient, perhaps, for a prime minister who would hold office during the pleasure of the lower house to give all the positions of emolument to persons in the lower house. That fact alone should induce us to insert a provision of the kind proposed.

The Hon. A. Douglas (Tasmania)[10.2]
was understood to say that the clause provided that until otherwise ordered there should be seven ministers, and it was evident that seven ministers could not carry on the federal parliament. There must be more. He thought that two members out of seven was only a fair proportion for the upper house. It should be compulsory that the ministry of the day should be represented in the senate as well as in the house of representatives.

The Hon. N.J. Brown (Tasmania)[10.4]:
I am very sorry to hear that the hon. member, Sir William Zeal, is so determined upon this point that he intends to call for a division. Personally,
I would much rather be found voting with the hon. gentleman than voting against him. I cannot help, however, concurring in the views expressed by the Attorney-General of Victoria that we are displaying a tendency to put too much detail in the constitution bill. We know that there are a number of matters which must be worked out and decided by the parliament when it is elected, and afterwards by the will of those whom parliament represents.

As a matter of practical politics, I quite agree with the idea that no ministry who hoped to secure the confidence of the house of representatives and of the senate would be so misguided and so insensible to the necessities of the occasion as not to provide for due representation in the second chamber. I think these views are fairly warranted by what we see occurring from day to day in our comparatively small local legislatures. That being so, it does seem to me that it would be very wise to encumber this Convention with the proposed provision. I am extremely sorry that I am obliged to differ from those who take the opposite view, but I would advise members of the Convention to avoid on this and other occasions which will arise in the future burdening this Convention with what may be regarded as unnecessary provisions.

The Hon. C.H. Grant (Tasmania)[10.6]:

It seems to me that the senate has very few friends in this Convention, and that probably arises from the small number of members of the upper houses of the various colonies who are here as compared with the number of members of the lower houses. The privileges of the senate appear to have received very small consideration; but in this Convention, as you, Mr. Chairman, so ably pointed out in your interesting and instructive speech, it is necessary to preserve the power and prestige of the senate in a marked degree. In every clause of the bill in which this powers or position of the senate are mentioned, I think it should receive special consideration, with a view to the preservation of its integrity and influence. I hope, therefore, that these words will be inserted with the object I have stated.

Question-That the words proposed to be inserted, "of whom two at least shall be members of the senate" be so inserted put. The Committee divided:

Question so resolved in the negative. The Hon. H. DOBSON (Tasmania) [10.10]: I desire to move an amendment in this clause with reference to ministers in the senate. I was struck with the argument that the number of ministers might not be seven, or in other words, that in the inception of the commonwealth fire ministers would be quite, or more than, sufficient to carry on the business. But supposing the number of ministers is seven, I am firmly of opinion that two of them might be in the senate, and it might be provided in the constitution that, supposing the number of ministers is five, one only out of those five should be in the senate. The amendment I desire to move is to the effect that the number of ministers shall not exceed seven, and while there are only five, one of them should be in the senate; but when there are more than five ministers, two of them shall be in the senate. I ask if that amendment will be in order?

The CHAIRMAN:
I do not think the Hon. member could move the latter part of it; but he could move the other part of it. The amendment negatived was two of whom at least shall be in the senate."

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
One of the great arguments which I think gained some votes was supposing there were only five ministers you certainly could not have two out of the five in the senate, and I do not ask for that. Upon the argument of the Prime Minister of this colony the matter has been decided-

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Leave it to the federal parliament!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
No. Speaker after speaker has admitted that the senate should be a strong feature of the commonwealth, but I think we have neglected the senate in every possible way. The hon. member, Mr. Higgins, has told us we shall not have a federal constitution, so to speak, but simply a constitution in which all the financial powers are given to the lower house, and he is perfectly right, and when we desire to have one minister in the senate to uphold the, state rights, and to be in touch with the cabinet, and so be in touch with the people-and recollect the senate is a people's house-I cannot understand the object of taking away the power of the senate in every possible respect. No one is better pleased than I am that Queensland is going to join the Convention, because, now if a man suggests anything upon the more conservative side of this question than the advanced democracy of our large colonies, he is not listened to and is laughed at-is told that he must give in, and that he is lowering federation. I believe that we are making a great mistake. We are making our constitution lop-sided, we are forgetting that the senate springs from the people, and that when the people speak from two chambers, and over voice is different from the other, that is the time when great consideration is required. I desire that the dignity and power of the senate should be upheld. if hon. members will now allow a ministerial senator to go down to the lower house and explain the policy of the states there, if they will not provide that a minister shall sit in the senate, they will detract from the dignity and power of the senate. While hon. members opposite are asking us to give to them, they give us nothing in return. I ask that my amendment be put because it differs from the last amendment, and may possibly gain a few votes, and even win the day. I move:

That the following words be inserted after the word "seven," line 3:- "of whom one shall be in the senate when there are five ministers; and two shall be in the senate when there are more than five ministers."

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I will take your ruling, Mr. Chairman, as to whether the latter part of the amendment is in order, the Committee having already decided that there shall not be two ministers in the senate. They negatived the proposal that there should be two ministers in the senate, and the hon. member cannot evade that decision by submitting a proposal contrary to it, although he has added another provision.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

The hon. member cannot separate my amendment!

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

One part of the hon. member's amendment may be in order, while another part is out of order. I submit that that part which is out of order cannot be put from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN:
I think that the amendment is substantially different from the amendment which the Committee has negatived. The amendment which was negatived provided that in any event there should be at least two ministers in the senate. This amendment says that there shall be one minister in the senate when there are five ministers, and two when there are more than five ministers.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
The clause provided for seven ministers when the first amendment was put!

The CHAIRMAN:
It said "not exceeding seven"; so that there might be only two.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales)[10.19]:
Well, I submit that the Committee should reject the amendment. It is an attempt to unnecessarily load the constitution. If the Ministry of the day desire to exercise power and influence in the senate, they ought to have liberty to send three ministers there if they think proper.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
So they could!

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
If the hon. member limits them to one, they will not be able to send three. I do not think that this provision should be embodied in the constitution. The hon. member talks about belittling the senate; but I think he belittles it by his assertion that the members of the Convention desire to make the senate weak and incapable of acting-against whom? Against the people. But will not the senate be there to act for the people? When the hon. member says that we desire to make the senate weak, he is making an assertion which is not in accordance with-I should be out of order if I said fact-but, at all events, contrary to the ideas of the Committee. We desire to see the senate strong, and a resting place for members, like my right hon. friend, Sir John Forrest.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Good old English oak!

Question-That the words (proposed by Hon. H. Dobson) be inserted-put.
Ayes, 12; noes, 20; majority, 8.
AYES.
Briggs, H. Lee-Steere, Sir J.G.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[10.25]:
I desire to call the attention of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, to the use in this and other clauses of the terms "governor-general in council," and "governor-general." It seems to me that it will cause less confusion if the term "governor-general" is adopted throughout.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Does the right hon. gentleman want to know why the words "in council" are sometimes used and sometimes omitted?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Yes. The practice has now become almost general in acts of parliament to avoid the use of the words "in council," and to use only the expression "the governor." The term "governor" constitutionally is well known, and is understood to mean the governor acting with the advice of his responsible ministers. If you use the words "in council," a doubt arises as to whether the governor is expected to act on his own responsibility or with the advice of his ministers. In the Constitution Act of Western Australia there is some confusion owing to the use of the terms "governor in council" and "governor." The term "governor-general" will be thoroughly understood, and I think there is no necessity to add the words "in council." In clause 63 it is provided that the appointment of officers to administer the departments shall be made by the "governor-general in council," while in clause 64 the designations of ministers holding different offices is to be fixed by the parliament or by the "governor-general." If it were a matter of prerogative I do not suppose it would be left to the parliament; as it is not a matter of prerogative, I expect the governor-general in council is meant. My own experience leads me to the conclusion that the words "in council" should not be used if they can be avoided.

The Hon. E. Barton[10.29]:

The distinction is this: Where the act is done by the governor-general or by the authority of the Crown it is done upon-prerogative. When the act is not a prerogative act, when it is an administrative or executive act, then the term "in council" is used. It is a fallacy to suppose that any distinct act is done by the governor of the colony, even upon prerogative, with the advice of ministers. One might say more than that.

The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest:

Where is the prerogative in the last line of clause 64?

The Hon. E. Barton:

I was endeavouring to explain a matter to the hon. member, which it is quite evident from his question is not generally understood. The reason of the difference in this bill is founded on that question. I am not unmindful that there is a difference in clause 63. In that very clause the term "governor" is used in one place, and the term "governor-general in council" in another, for this reason: that the appointment of ministers is a prerogative act, but the mere establishing of a department of state is not an act of prerogative, but an executive act which generally requires the authority of a statute, and rests on the authority of a statute in this case. That is the reason of the difference in this case, and the hon. member will find it running right through the bill. I hope there will be no debate on questions of that kind in this Committee. The whole matter was considered at very great length in Adelaide by the Constitutional Committee. It was threshed out in a long debate there. There was, again, in Adelaide, in Committee of the Whole, as my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, will recollect, along and keen debate on the subject, and I think we all came to an understanding about it I think the hon. member will be assured by any legal member of the Convention that the right distinction has been used throughout the bill. In defining those executive acts which are done as mere acts of prerogative and those which are done in the ordinary execution or administration of government apart from the prerogative.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs (Victoria)[10.32]:

If I caught the question of the right Hon. member, Sir John Forrest, aright, he drew a distinction between clause 63 and clause 64. He has not quite gathered the sense of these two clauses. There is no discrepancy whatever between the two. In clause 63 the appointment of ministers is by the governor-general. The reference to the governor-general in council is not to the appointment of ministers, but to the establishment of departments of state. It means that the governor appoints his ministers by virtue of the prerogative, but that when he comes to establishing a department, he acts by the advice of his ministers. But, in clause 64, the expression "governor-general " is used because it would be impossible to put in the expression "governor-general in council" there, for this reason: it says the ministers shall hold such offices and by such designation as the parliament from time to time prescribes, or, in the absence of provision, as the governor-general from time to time directs.

Ministers are in the first instance to be appointed before there is a council. There is not to be a parliament until there is a ministry, and the parliament has to be summoned by the governor-general.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[10.33]:

As to the unreasonable nature of my question, I may inform the hon. member, Mr. Barton, that in our constitution the designation of ministers is left to the Governor-in-Council, not to the Governor.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I did not say the hon. member was unreasonable in asking the question; I said it was rather unreasonable for him to ask the question and not allow me to answer it.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I only wish to place my question before the hon. and learned member, and if I did not do it quite in the way be desired, I am very sorry.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I am quite satisfied.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 65. Until the parliament otherwise provides, there shall be payable to the Queen, out of the consolidated revenue fund of the commonwealth, for the salaries of such officers, the sum of twelve thousand pounds a year.

The CHAIRMAN:

It is proposed by the Assembly and Council of South Australia and by the Council of Tasmania that we should omit the word "twelve" before the word "thousand" with the view to insert other words.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
May I ask you, sir, to divide the question, because some hon. members may wish to see the words "twelve thousand" stand, who would be quite willing to insert the words "a sum not exceeding."

The CHAIRMAN:
The hon. member may move to strike out the words.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
As it is to be done until parliament otherwise provides, if the hon. member is very anxious about it I will accept the insertion of the words "a sum not exceeding."

Amendment (Dr. COCKBURN) agreed to:
That the words "the sum of," line 4, be omitted with the view to the insertion in their place of the words "a sum not exceeding."

Suggested amendment, by the Legislative Council of Tasmania-That the word "twelve" be omitted-negatived.

Amendment, by the Legislative Council of Tasmania-That the word "twelve" be omitted-negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 66 (Appointment of civil servants), 67 (Authority of executive), and 68 (Command of military and naval forces) agreed to.

Clause 69. On the establishment of the commonwealth the control of the following departments of the public service in each state shall become transferred to the executive government:
- Customs and excise:
- Posts and telegraphs:
- Military and naval defence:
- Ocean beacons and buoys, and ocean lighthouses and lightships:
- Quarantine.

The obligations of each state in respect of the departments transferred shall thereupon be assumed by the commonwealth.

The CHAIRMAN:
In connection with this clause several legislatures have suggested the omission of the word "on" in line 1.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.36]:
I understand there are one or two matters in this clause which may cause debate, and which I do not wish to take at this late hour of the evening; and as I understand the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, has something to say about it which may give rise to some discussion, I think I shall be making a fair concession to that hon. gentleman by postponing it. I therefore move:
That the consideration of clause 69 be postponed.
Motion agreed to; clause postponed.

Clause 70. All powers and functions which are at the date of the establishment of the commonwealth vested in the governor of a colony with or without the advice of his executive council, or in any officer or authority in a colony, shall, so far as the same continue in existence and need to be exercised in relation to the government of the commonwealth with respect to any matters which, under this constitution, pass to the executive government of the commonwealth, vest in the governor-general, with the advice of the federal executive council, or in the officer or authority exercising similar powers or functions in, or under, the executive government of the commonwealth.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[10.38]:

I would point out that in reference to this clause the powers and functions to be transferred are described in the first part as the powers and functions vested in the governor of the colony with or without the advice of the executive council; so that to continue that state of things it will be necessary after the words "vest in the governor-general, with," to use similar words "with or without the advice of the executive council," or else we shall change the prerogative.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

And insert "as the case requires"!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Yes, "as the case requires." I move:

That after the words "vest in the governor-general, with," lines 11 and 12, the words "or without" be inserted.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment (The Right Hon. G.H. REID) agreed to:

That after the words "federal executive council," lines 12 and 13, the words "as the case requires" be inserted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I move:

That the Chairman leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. MEMBERS:

No, no! Go on!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I should like to know what is the reason for this newly discovered energy on the part of the hon. member, Mr. Wise? We shall have an arduous sitting on Monday.
The CHAIRMAN:
I may point out that if we go on we shall have to deal with the referendum.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The next clauses are those dealing with deadlocks. I think I shall have the concurrence of the Committee in taking those on Monday morning. Motion agreed to; progress reported.
Convention adjourned 10.40 p.m.

Communication from Queensland-Commonwealth of Australia Bill-Return.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

COMMUNICATION FROM QUEENSLAND.

The PRESIDENT informed the Convention that he had received from the Acting-Premier of Queensland a letter in precisely the same terms as were employed in the telegram which had already been dealt with by the Convention on Friday. The telegram had been recorded upon the minutes of the Convention, and he presumed that it was the desire of hon. members that the letter should be dealt with in a way similar to that in which the telegram on the same subject had been dealt with.

Hon. MEMBERS:

Hear, hear!

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee (consideration resumed from 17th September, vide page 807):

Clause 56 (Recommendation of money votes).

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales:

Insert new clause to follow clause 56:-

57. (a) If either house of parliament shall, in two consecutive sessions of the same parliament, with an interval of at least six weeks between pass and transmit to the other house for its concurrence therein any proposed law which such other house fails to pass without amendment, within thirty days after receiving the same, in the second session, or within each period passes, with any amendment not agreed to by the house transmitting the proposed law, the provisions of the following sections of this part shall apply.

(b) The proposed law passed and transmitted in the second session may include any amendment agreed to by both houses in the first session.

The house in which the proposed law originated may pass a resolution that, in its opinion, the proposed law is of an urgent nature, and may transmit the resolution and the proposed law with any amendments agreed to by both houses up to the time of transmission to the other house, with a request for further consideration.

If within thirty days of the transmission of the proposed law as last afresaid, or if the session shall end before the expiration of such period, then within thirty days of the commencement of the next session of the same parliament, the other house shall not pass the proposed law without amendment, or without such amendment as the house transmitting the same agrees to, the house in which the proposed law originated may resolve that the same be referred to the direct determination of the people.

If such last-mentioned resolution is passed, a vote of the electors of the commonwealth as to whether the proposed law, as last transmitted as aforesaid, shall or shall not become law shall be taken, unless in the meantime the house to which it has been transmitted has passed the same.

Such vote shall be taken in each state separately, and if the proposed law is affirmed by a majority of the population of the commonwealth, it shall be presented to the governor-general for the royal assent, as if it had been duly passed by both houses of parliament, and on receiving the royal assent it shall become law. If not affirmed as aforesaid the proposed law shall not become law, and shall not be again proposed for a period of at least three years.

Upon which the following amendment by Mr. Symon had been agreed to:-

That after the word "If," in the proposed new clause, the following new words be inserted:-"the senate reject or fail to pass any proposed law which has passed the house of representatives, or pass the same with amendments with which the house of representatives will not agree, and if the governor-general should dissolve the house of representatives, and if, within six months after the said dissolution the house of representatives by an absolute majority again pass the said proposed law in the same, or substantially the same, form as before, and with substantially the same objects, and the senate again reject or fail to pass the said proposed law, or pass the same with amendments with which the house of representatives will not agree, the governor-general may dissolve the senate."

Upon which Mr. Lyne had moved:

To add to the words inserted "If after a dissolution of both houses of the federal parliament as above provided the subject-matter of the contention that led to such dual dissolution is again passed by the house of representatives and again rejected by the senate such measure shall be referred to the electors of the commonwealth by means of a national referendum, and if resolved in the affirmative shall become law."

And upon which the Right Hon. Sir George Turner had moved:

To leave out the initial word "If," with a view to insert "Provided that in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives the proposed law may be referred to the direct determination of the people as hereinafter provided."

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I presume that if the word "If" be omitted, my amendment will be proposed, and it will be open to the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, to move his amendment upon mine?

The CHAIRMAN:
If the words which the right hon. gentleman proposes to insert are not inserted, the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, can move that other words be inserted.

Mr. SYMON:
I presume that the first amendment to be considered will be the amendment of the right hon. member, Sir George Turner!

The CHAIRMAN:
Yes.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I thought we had arrived at an understanding that the whole question involved in the vote taken the other afternoon should be reconsidered, and that it would not be out of order on the part of hon. members to discuss amendments which had previously been dealt with.

The CHAIRMAN:
If a motion be submitted to rescind the previous decision of the Committee, the whole question can then be rediscussed.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
But that has not been done!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I would suggest to members of the Convention whether it would not be well, and whether it would not be the way most likely to lead to an intelligent solution of the question if the power given by the Convention on Friday were taken advantage of, and if the whole ground were cleared by rescinding the decision already arrived at? Only one proposal has been carried, and the rescission of that would not necessarily be an intimation that it would be rejected finally when the whole ground had been cleared for rediscussion. In pursuance of the lead given by the Convention, I think it would be advisable to first clear the whole ground by rescinding the determination upon Mr. Symon's amendment, and starting afresh, not necessarily with a view to rejecting my hon. friend's proposal in the end; but in order that everything may be open to discussion.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

The proper way to get rid of the amendment which has been agreed to is to move that it be rescinded.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Other amendments which have appeared on the notice paper can be withdrawn. Nothing will require a motion except the rescission of the amendment carried at the instance of my hon. friend, Mr. Symon.

The CHAIRMAN:

If the amendment carried on Friday be rescinded, then the other motions will fall to the ground, because they are simply in the nature of adding words to the words of that amendment. If that amendment be rescinded, therefore, there will be nothing to which to add any words in the way proposed.

Mr. SYMON:

In the event to which you refer, Mr. Chairman, I take it that the whole subject will be brought on, and it will be possible for the Committee to discuss, among other things, the amendments which have been already proposed. The question is, whether it would tend to facilitate and shorten the proceedings to have us put in the position in which we started on Friday morning, with all the other amendments to come on later, and to be rediscussed. I think it would be better to reopen the whole ground, if any motion could be made with that effect.

The CHAIRMAN:

The position in the event of a motion to rescind the resolution already arrived at being carried would be that the whole question could be reconsidered.

Mr. SYMON:

My amendment and the other amendments?

The CHAIRMAN:

Yes.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

I would suggest that we should proceed to consider the proposals in regard to the referendum, because it is quite possible that the decision of the Convention will lessen the importance of the questions in reference to dissolution. The questions as to the two forms of dissolution may come to be of relatively less importance if this course be taken. The immediate rescission of the determination of Friday would bring us face to face with the difficulty which appeared so overpowering on Friday morning. If, on the other hand, the question the referendum be dealt with, we may find that the question of dissolution does not present one-half of the difficulties which are feared.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
I think the hon. and learned member has just suggested the most common-sense way of dealing with this matter. I think we had better proceed to consider the question of referendum. The whole matter can be discussed again at another sitting of the Convention; but I think it would be better to leave the work which has been done up to a certain stage.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I do not agree with some of the remarks of the hon. member, Mr.
McMillan. We must finally settle this question. There is one other important question left open in regard to which we cannot help ourselves-I refer to the financial question. But with regard to this particular question, it should be settled to-day one way or the other. I do not think we ought to rescind what we have done. We have already provided for an alternative dissolution, and I believe that many hon. members who voted for that do not desire to altogether rescind it, but they are prepared to give an alternative and a double dissolution, throwing the onus on the government of the day of selecting which. We have determined that we will have the alternative dissolution; let us take a vote and see whether we are prepared to throw on the government of the day the onus of following that up by having a double dissolution. When we have decided that, we shall have the other question still open-namely, are we prepared to go a step further, and have a referendum if the double dissolution fails; and, if so, what sort of referendum? Then we will be in this position: We will have the alternative dissolution, and the government of the day will decide whether they will take that or the double dissolution. It seems to me that that is the course which is most likely to meet with the approval of hon.
members.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales):
Do I understand the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, by what he says, to mean that he is prepared to allow the amendment of the hon. member, Mr.
Symon, to stand-as to the alternative dissolution of both houses?
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I am prepared to proceed further on that, and to give the government of the day the option of dissolution of both houses at the one time!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
The alternative power of double dissolution?
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Yes; the alternative power of double dissolution, and throwing the onus on the government of the day!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
And in the other case the power of dual referendum!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I am looking at the right hon. gentleman's amendment-

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That, of course, is to be amended. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, made a suggestion which we are perfectly prepared to accept!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Do I understand that on the matter now before the Chair it will be possible by some method to get rid of the alternative dissolution, because I have the strongest possible objection to it?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The successive dissolution!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Yes. I do not at all object to there being power in the governor-general in council to dissolve both houses or either house, and that I think would be the best way to get rid of this difficulty. I strongly object to a successive dissolution. I do not object to a simultaneous dissolution, or to a dissolution of one house or the other, in the discretion of the executive power; but I fancy that unless we have an opportunity of rediscussing and reconsidering the amendment of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, we shall get into a false position. If the amendment of my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, as proposed to be amended, will get rid of that objection, I do not ask that the amendment of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, be rescinded. I believe that if we were to adopt the suggestion made by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, we would deal with this difficulty in a much more satisfactory way; but at the same time I admit that if any member of the Convention has carried a proposition, he will not lightly consent to its rescission. I am strongly of opinion that the suggestion made by the hon. and learned member, is in our own interests, whatever our opinions may be one way or other on the question at issue.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Whatever we may do now will not be absolutely final, and therefore, if we adopt this course, it will not prevent the consideration of the amendment proposed by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
We all have a common interest in doing whatever is best, and, unless the suggestion of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, is adopted, I fear that we will get ourselves into a position which will be more unsatisfactory than now.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Whatever we do in Committee may be reconsidered on the recommittal of the bill!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
No doubt; but that will not take place until we meet again. If what I suggest will be open to us on this amendment, I am satisfied.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON (Tasmania):
I hope that the course suggested by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner will be adopted. It is quite true, as he has said, that some of those who voted for this first amendment did so in order to guard themselves against what possibly might, or might not, be carried afterwards. Several of those who voted for that amendment will be disposed, for example, to grant the dual referendum. If we proceed with the various amendments, and dispose of them, and if it be found necessary to consider the question of rescinding the amendment of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, we shall then be in a much better position to consider it, and to give a conscientious and thoroughly just vote upon it, than we can be in until we know what is to be done with the subject.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales)[10.46]:
I should like to say a word or two in regard to difficulties which it strikes me must meet some hon. gentlemen who voted with the majority the other day? My doing so may clear the ground a little. I feel that one of the great objections to a simultaneous dissolution is that it ignores all the facts and conditions of the case that it may be very inconvenient at certain times to have a simultaneous dissolution. You might have this condition of affairs: That one house had come fresh from the country, and it would not be necessary to send the house back, or vice versa. One of my reasons for voting for, and being tenacious to keep the proposal made so far, is that I should like to see some concrete system drawn up, which I personally have not been able to frame, by which there should be an alternative given to the executive to dissolve either the senate or the house of representatives according to the peculiar conditions of the case.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Mr. MCMILLAN:
No. I would safeguard that. I would desire to safeguard the manner in which it would be adopted by some proposal like this; if I am in order now in speaking to the question.

The CHAIRMAN:

I do not think as a matter of fact there is anything before the chair at the present time.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Then I shall go an as if the whole matter were before the chair.

The CHAIRMAN:

There is an amendment before the chair, namely, to leave out the word "if."

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

That gives a wide range!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It would require a considerable memory to keep in ones head all the amendments that have been proposed on this matter. I would say at the outset that I am absolutely opposed to a simultaneous dissolution of both houses. I hold that, at the present moment, we are more in what you might call the bi-cameral stage of this discussion than in the stage in which we deal with the senate as representative of the states. When we come to the question of a dual or a national referendum, then we shall deal more directly with the peculiar character of the senate as representing state rights and state interests; but, although I know I am more or less on the unpopular side in the vote that I have given-

An Hon. MEMBER:

Not at all!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I have a strong desire, for the present, to sustain in its integrity the bi-cameral system of government.

Whatever evolution the future may bring forth, I am perfectly certain that, with a federated Australia, with a complicated system of government such as we are instituting, no people would be safe with only one house of representatives; and, although I do not want to make one jarring note in the harmony that has existed in this Convention up to the present, on the whole, I cannot help thinking that the atmosphere we have been breathing during the last few days has not been of that tranquil temperature which has generally pervaded our proceedings, and which ought to pervade the deliberations of an assembly like this.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

The reason is that this is not the complimentary stage of the business!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I quite allow that we have now come to a stage at which we are practically reviewing certain of our work, and that probably it would have been better if the question of equal representation had been dealt with in conjunction with the question of deadlocks. At the same time, I feel that it is a difficulty that we are in that we are viewing this question now more as a question of one house, which is looked upon as a house of conservative principles, as against another house which is looked upon as the popular branch of the legislature. I cannot help feeling that the atmosphere of our politics, both in Victoria and in New South Wales, during the last few years, has been so charged with electricity in connection with this matter that it is very difficult for us, especially as practical politicians of the day, to get rid of influences which may affect our judgment. At the same time, I hold that we should, as far as possible, get rid of all preconceived views in dealing with this new machinery that we are going to erect. If we desire to put into the constitution a senate which may be viewed in the double light of a second chamber, and of a great states chamber, we ought to deal fairly with it, and if we of the larger states have found it necessary to concede, so to speak, equal representation of the states, then, although we ought to see that the senate should not be unreasonably obstructive of the will of the people, we ought not to draw a line in any part of this machinery which would render it absolutely impotent. I cannot help feeling that a great deal of the trouble which has arisen in this debate has arisen out of the modus operandi adopted in the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Symon, by which, under all circumstances, the house of representatives must be subject to a penal dissolution. Hon. members, who are, perhaps, overweighed by previous antagonisms with the upper houses of their own colonies say, "Why should one house be penalised as against the other?"

And it seems to me that there is an idea that by thus penalising the house of representatives, you cast a slur upon this body, and give the senate a superior position. I do not care a jot about the peculiar relative positions of these two houses in this case. I simply recognise that the essential root of bi-cameral government is that you must have check and criticism, and, if that is worth anything you must at times come to severely strained relations. A deadlock in itself is not an absolute disadvantage; a permanent and unalterable deadlock is a calamity. The principle which we are going on is this: that if you have no safety-valve and no solution there is no alternative but revolution. In my election address, and in the speeches which I delivered throughout the country before I had the honor to become a member of the Convention, I said that it would be far better for the smaller states to obtain only proportional representation in the senate than that after having got equal representation it should be rendered absolutely useless. I still hold to that position. I am willing to go as far as possible in order to create some check, to obtain some solution of this difficulty; but I should like to know how you could preserve the principle of bicameral government by having a dual dissolution at the same time? I know that I am dealing with questions which are perhaps not dealt with outside among certain political forces in that calm and considerate manner which should permeate our feelings in a Convention such as this. I know that the moment I say that the senate may be composed of more stable elements than the house of representatives, that it may have embodied in it more or less the conservative instincts of the constitution, I raise an outcry on the part of many who think that there ought to be no bi-cameral government at all. But I want to point this out: If you have a dual dissolution of the houses under certain conditions it will not be a question of state rights that will arise. You may find the representatives of the different colonies in the senate divided upon different questions, and if the two houses go simultaneously to the country the question at issue may not be the subject-matter of the dispute, but the question of one house against the other. I do not for a moment say that there will be any strict analogy between the legislative councils of these colonies and the senate of united Australia; but in certain phases of their political life there will be considerable analogy. We have known ourselves that when we have had a dissolution to obtain consideration of some matter of state policy this matter has been absolutely swept away in the heated passions of class against class, and house against house. Let us look at the practical aspect of the case. When is it that the senate, the revising and checking chamber, will not yield to the overtures of the other chamber, and after every possible means of arriving at a settlement by conference and compromise has failed? It is only then that you have a deadlock In nine cases out of ten the second chamber says to the lower chamber, "We do not believe that you represent the opinions of the people". And when does that occur? It occurs either in the third year of the life of the lower house, or at any rate when that house is practically moribund. How absurd then would it be to say, when the lower house was within three or four months of expiring by effluxion of time, and the upper house simply wanted to be sure of the opinion of the country, and was willing the moment it found out what that opinion was to give way, to dissolve both houses.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:
We provide for an interval of six months!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I am now speaking with a view to the reconsideration of the whole position. So far as I am concerned, with what judgment I have now, I should not under any circumstances agree to a dual concurrent dissolution. Let us consider the history of this matter in its evolutionary character. In the year 1891, when the last Convention met, there was no question of the dissolution of the senate. It was only in the way of a very mild suggestion that the matter came up at the last meeting of this Convention. I am quite willing to allow that the idea has worked rapidly forward from that time till now, but that is all the more reason why we should be very careful before we commit ourselves to any concrete scheme. Suppose, for example, that the bill of 1891 had passed or that the bill as it was framed in Adelaide had become the law of federated Australia, and suppose any dispute occurred between the two houses, what would have been the result? As a last resort the house of representatives would probably have gone to the country to try and show the recalcitrant senate that it had really the will of the people at its back. What does this modest proposal do? It simply proposes to do what you want—

Mr. LYNE:

That is not the proposal which has been adopted!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

No. Now, that is what I want to come to. Why is it that we have this rapid evolution of opinion? Why have we been told by hon. members who, a year ago, would never have expected any such concession, that the whole federation proposals are going to be wrecked unless the concession is made? I do not believe in this cry of "wolf"? trying to coerce the judgment of others. I have the most profound respect for public opinion; but I do not always believe that the mere froth on the surface represents the opinion of the people of the country. I am anxious to see that we here are not made the slaves of wire-pullers and political agitators, who do not represent the interests and the feelings of the country. I say that, although it is strong language, with the utmost consideration, and having given to it all the judgment I possess. I have never myself been afraid to face the people. Certainly, I have not, as a rule, been on the side of the big battalions; but I have often found that the real opinion of the people was not in unison with the current idea of the moment. I want, in this matter, to put my own personal feeling very clearly, although it is only a matter regarding myself. I believe we have now come to a period in our deliberations when each individual must be responsible to himself for the trust reposed in him. We have not been asked here to make a constitution merely to suit the end of the nineteenth century; but we have been asked to make a constitution which we ourselves have declared shall be indissoluble. I would be the last to ignore public opinion. I am not a member of the Legislative Council. I never expect to be, or of a senate either. When a popular constituency fails to elect me I shall be no longer in public life, so I am not afraid of the real public opinion; but I cannot forget that even in England, the very home of constitutional freedom, the very cradle of our rights and liberties, public opinion is often absolutely reversed in a few years. When I consider the position we occupy, that our action will not be criticised by the mere ephemeral, frothy views of certain people at the moment, but will be considered by the people of this country through all time, I say that while I am willing to try to the utmost of my knowledge and ability to gauge public opinion, while, I say, that if I knew thoroughly what public opinion was on any question, I would bow to it; still, I believe that the people of this country by the confidence they gave us practically instructed us to make a constitution which would be not merely the outcome of a passing wave and wind of opinion, but a constitution which we believe is based on principle, on the lines of our own constitution, and which will stand the shock of time. I am quite willing, as I said before, to leave to a certain extent this matter in the hands of the executive. I believe myself that in the current of events occasions will arise when it will be well, if there is a deadlock to dissolve the senate. At other times it will be well to dissolve the house of representatives, but I fail to see what sense there is in making a hard and fast rule to dissolve both at the same time. I would be willing to accept a proposal of this kind in order to get out of the difficulty. I have not had an opportunity of discussing it with anybody, and these matters always require a great deal of discussion. I do not think, in regard to any great piece of machinery, that anyone's individual opinion is worth much. You require to have it put in the sieve; to have it thoroughly looked at and tried and weighed, and every possible argument urged against it, because what appears to be a beautiful little theory may very soon be knocked into pieces by the active mind of another. To show, what I mean, I may say that I would be willing, in the case of a house of representatives which had been in existence only two years or not more than two years, that the senate should go to the country first. I have no feeling one way or the other as to the dignity of the senate in this matter. It is purely a mode of getting out of the difficulty and getting at the opinion of the country; but I do feel that to go and ask the senate, half of whose members have perhaps just been returned, and who believe that they have a knowledge of the opinions of the people, to go back to their constituents, along with a house that may be very near its death, would be an absurd thing.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:
We do not desire that. I am quite willing to accept twelve months, but I think that the two houses should go together.

Mr. McMillan:
No; I am entirely against the two houses going to the country at one time, because I say that, above all the principles with which we deal in matters conducted under the bi-cameral government, is the principle according to which, in the first place, you get the acute criticism of another body of men. In the second place, if there is any dispute there is a certain time for consideration, a certain time in which the country can come to a determination, but to do that you must have no mixing up of the characteristics of each house. You must have no cry, "Here is the popular house representing the people (with a big "P"); the other house represents capital, conservatism, and other elements." We do not want that; what we want is that, while not giving any undue influence to the senate, we shall keep up its character as a senate. I say most distinctly that if you send those two sets of representatives to the country at the same time you will never get a clear result on the issue.

The Hon. J.H. Carruthers:
Under the constitution the two houses will be elected at the same time in the first instance, and also afterwards.

Mr. McMillan:
Not at all. It is almost impossible to imagine that them two houses will continue to be elected at the same time. No house of parliament, even under the present conservative ideas which prevail as a rule lives out its full term of existence, and if it is only three or four months short of the term of its natural existence then, as time goes on, it must differentiate more and more from the other house in the periods of its elections. That, I think, is perfectly clear. However, notwithstanding the remarks which have fallen from the two right hon. gentlemen that this question should be settled at once, I feel that it would be better to have even a tentative scheme now with which the larger colonies as a majority are not in agreement, and leave a certain time to elapse, when we shall have the benefit of the representation of all Australia in the Convention, than to now allow these angry feelings to arise, to ask men to be practically coerced in their judgment from the fear of this movement falling through, because that is the position we are face to face with to-day. We have been told in the newspapers, we have been told by gentlemen on both sides of this chamber, that if this vote is not rescinded federation is wrecked. I object to that sort of thing.

Mr. SYMON:

It is expressed this morning as an ultimatum!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I do not give any credit to that sort of public opinion, and I do not believe that the more sober-minded gentlemen on both sides of the chamber desire that the ultimatum should be given. This is the natural reaction from the vote on equal representation. You must recollect that we have a large number in this Convention who do not believe in a second chamber, and it is only as a necessity of federation that they agree to the senate under any circumstances. They have given equal representation, not because they believe their colonies desire it, but because they believe it is the only means of getting federation. So far as the people of New South Wales are concerned, I believe the great bulk of the electors prefer proportional representation in the senate. I believe at the same time that they are not going to make it a sine qua non. All I want to do at this stage of the proceedings is to appeal to the fairness of this Convention. You have conceded equal representation; do not try to destroy it. I hold, of course, that having arranged for equal representation, you must have, probably, more stringent checks on the senate than you would if you had proportional representation. And it would have been better for the smaller colonies to have proportional representation in the senate with less stringent checks than to have equal representation and checks which would render their action almost impotent.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

Would the hon. member mind stating again what course he agrees to as to a dissolution?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I would agree to some arrangement which, as I have said, I have not been able to put in a concrete shape, by which, under certain circumstances, the senate would be dissolved, in order to get at a knowledge of the will of the people, and under other circumstances the house of representatives would be dissolved.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

What are the circumstances?
The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
The hon. member's idea is to send first to the country the house which had not last been to the electors!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
My idea generally, if it can, be managed, is to send to the country that house which has been longest away from its constituents.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
That will always be the senate!

An Hon. MEMBER:
No, half of the senate!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
That is understood.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Would the hon. member dissolve the senate if one-half of that house had only just come back from the people?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I would not.

An Hon. MEMBER:
He says "No"!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Then his scheme would not work!

Mr. LYNE:
It would not work; you have to face the thing straight out!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
My hon. friend's views are well known.

Mr. LYNE:
And it would have been better if they had been followed further in this Convention!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
My hon. friend is now only in a state of evolution, because he has told us that he is not quite sure whether it would not be better to have one house.

Mr. SYMON:
What stage in the evolution has

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I think he is between the devil and the deep sea.

Mr. LYNE:
The hon. member is misstating what I said. I never said anything of the kind

Mr. MCMILLAN:
My hon. friend said at one time he was not quite sure that it would not be better to have one house.

Mr. LYNE:
I beg the hon. member's pardon. I did not!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Then I was wrong. I am not usually given to so much repetition as, unfortunately, I have been guilty of this morning; but I feel that this is a matter which requires the fullest possible explanation and consideration. It has, unfortu-

Mr. TRENWITH:
In that case, would the hon. member make the other house comply with the verdict as given?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The house would have to comply.

Mr. TRENWITH:
No; that is the difficulty!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It would be practically a compliance if the senate were returned. That, of course, brings up the question of finality. There is no finality in the scheme. There is no finality in the dual referendum. And there is no finality without destroying the idea of federation. I am not going to say that there may not be occasions in which the mass vote of the people would be the right vote for a particular subject; but I think it is impossible to discriminate what is a matter connected with state interests, and what is a matter of general interest.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

It cannot, be done!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

You cannot do it. No human being can possibly discriminate between them. Even supposing that you were to take the whole of the subjects which you relegate to the federal parliament to-day, and supposing that by a nice discrimination you were going to make a difference between them, you do not know in the future, and no man knows what subject might arise which would be really a matter of state interests, but which would appear to be a matter of solely general interest. I have spoken, perhaps, rather warmly, but I do think it will be a question of very careful consideration on our part before we introduce any system which, to my mind, is absolutely fatal to the dignity and revising function of the other house. I do not hold with those who think that the senate is going to be a powerful chamber, except, of course, that it does practically represent the same constituencies. The house of representatives, having the executive government in it, having the right to initiate expenditure, having all the patronage and all the power arising out of government, must be the great preponderating house, and, therefore in dealing with the senate, unless we have an absolute prejudice against its very existence, we ought, when once we introduce it as an element into this federal government, to see that no drastic regulation is introduced which will render it absolutely impotent.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria)[11.19]:

The hon. member who has just resumed his seat has once more contributed to the debate. a thoughtful and impartial study of the situation from his point of view. I believe we are indebted to him on this occasion for the judicial temper of his remarks, which at all events should restore us to a more equable state of mind than obtained during the discussions of the past week. If I may be permitted to say so, it appears to me that we are in some danger of encouraging outside, and, perhaps, of developing within these walls, a mistaken view of the federal constitution as a whole, by dwelling, as we are compelled to dwell at this stage, upon what is, after all, an adjunct, so to speak, to the main body of the constitution. Our attention is concentrated upon disputes and dissensions which the most pessimistic of us do not expect to occur with any frequency. Still, when we are discussing these aspects of the question day after day, we appear to be in some risk of impairing our judgment by constantly dwelling upon its irregular, and, in a sense, ungovernable manifestations. These may occur in connection with any constitution, and ought, doubtless, to be provided against; but the study of them day after day and hour after hour, the constant picturing to ourselves of two houses in serious conflict and verging on civil strife is not calculated to promote that view of the constitution or of its normal working which we must not fail to bear in mind. The daily processes of this constitution will not necessarily imply deadlocks, or demand any of the expedients we are considering. The regular, normal, healthy working of this constitution will resemble the working of those constitutions with which we are familiar in this colony and its neighbours. What is the deadlock that we dread? It is, in plain language, a breakdown of the legitimate machine. One chamber represent the people, and acts under the impression that it has a mandate to do certain work in a certain way, while the other chamber, also claiming that it has a mandate from the people, resists that policy, or its expression, in it particular measure. Such extreme antagonisms of opinion are abnormal. Under the system of government proposed to be created, it is desirable to evoke differences of opinion in order to obtain a full discussion upon every question that is submitted. I am a hearty advocate of the bi-cameral system, and see within the range of prophecy no time within which that principle can be safely departed from. But recognising as we do that whilst in normal processes of discussion between the two houses differences of opinion must arise, and are intended to arise, we surely cannot disguise from ourselves the fact that these differences will be settled ninety-nine times out of a hundred by ordinary methods, and without recourse to special expedients. There will be mutual concessions; there will be delays; there will be compromise; and there will be on the part of one or the other, surrender. But, by one means or another, the bulk of the questions which arise day by day will be settled by the devices with which we are all familiar. If we remember this, we shall realise that, vital as the question is, by dwelling upon it continuously as the circumstances of the case now compel us, we are apt to overload our imaginations, to overcharge our apprehensions, and to arouse an unnecessary amount of heat. After all, if both sides will recognise that we are not at present dealing with normal operations of the constitution, if we recognise that what is sought to be provided for is the unusual and abnormal, we are then able to approach what I may call its pathological treatment with greater calmness than we should if we assume, as some hon. members appear to, that we are really dealing with the ordinary operation of the constitution. We are proposing to deal with uncommon conditions, and with special and exceptional circumstances. We are only seeking to cope with circumstances which arise outside the ordinary operations of the constitution. We may well consent to deal with them in an extraordinary way, which we would not be justified in adopting in the ordinary working of the constitution. Under our system, differences of opinion are inevitable, but those grave and serious differences which give rise to what we term deadlocks will be rare, and, as they are rare, may fairly be met by exceptional methods. I fail to grasp the full force of the argument of the hon. member who has preceded me, that the proposal which has been submitted to us—for a simultaneous dissolution of the two chambers, is in its nature, and in its essence, antagonistic to the bi-cameral system. The hon. member put it strongly, and he put it in a variety of ways, but, it may be owing to its novelty, his argument has failed to make that impression upon my mind that it has made upon his. I admit with him that occasions can readily be imagined on which the double dissolution is the employment of too great an engine for the solution of the difficulty. I admit with him that there are occasions when a dissolution of one chamber may meet the difficulty, but I am not able to follow him in his assertion that under no circumstances whatever—and that is what his contention amounts to—is a simultaneous dissolution defensible. I entirely fail to see how a simultaneous dissolution under the circumstances could impair in any sense the efficiency of the bi-cameral system of government. I will not detain the Convention by detailing at length the conditions which suggest themselves to me under which a double dissolution would be the natural and effective remedy. They are those to which our attention has been called almost to the exclusion of all others, those with which the question of state rights is coupled. When state questions are supposed to be involved in a particular measure, and there is a prolonged contention, the senate may say to the house of representatives, "We question whether on this proposal which affects the rights of the states you have the assent of the majority of the people"; or the house of representatives may reply to the senate, "We represent the large majority of the people, and the nation is with us; but we doubt whether, when properly submitted to the populations of the states, it will be found that they are in favour of our view." Those are disputes that may occur where state rights seem to be involved. These cases, would be rare; but, when they do appear, when state rights arise, is it not unreasonable to send the house of representatives to its constituents without also sending the senate? What argument is there against dissolving both at the same time, when the point in dispute must be remitted to the same public at the same polls? The question would then, in every part of the country, be discussed from two sets of platforms in every constituency of the commonwealth, the representatives of the senate putting their case as they would have a right to do, and the house of representatives putting their case. Can we imagine a more favourable condition of things for the operation of moderate influences, than when both houses would be in touch at the same time with the people? The electors would have both sides of the question put before them. At the same time that they would be listening to the wooing voices of candidates for the representative house they would also be hearing appeals from those who sought seats in the senate. The double dissolution would be quite as much an advantage to the senate as to the other house; it would give an opportunity of preventing the mass of the electors from being carried away by the enthusiasm of one party without having opposing views properly submitted. The two parties would meet on a fair and equal footing before the electors, and if anything could produce an educational influence on the conduct of the election, and elicit an expression of the soundest judgment of the electors, it would be such a contest conducted by such means. For my own part I consider those state questions, as I have often urged, would rarely arise, and the real question which would be submitted-however you have your dissolutions would be the question of the one party against the other-the policy of one section of the community against the policy of another section. Hon. members throughout this discussion appear to me to have, to some extent, biased their judgment on both sides. The one party by assuming that necessarily the majority in the house of representatives will be the liberal majority which in our legislatures usually obtains the mastery in that chamber, and probably will obtain it in the commonwealth. In the same way, those who are defending what they believe to be the rights of the senate, have in their minds the resistance offered by the legislative councils throughout these colonies as affording them the best illustration of the struggle which they expect to be raised. That analogy fails once more, because in this instance both bodies spring from the same franchise. Both bodies spring from the same class of electors, simply divided into different constituen cies. Under those circumstances you can have no deadlocks under this constitution unless you have one party dominant in the one chamber, and the other party dominant in the other. Under no circumstances will it be a struggle, as the hon. member put it, of house against house -using those terms strictly - but it may well be a struggle of the majority of one party in one house against the majority of another party in the other house. Under those circumstances

- the questions being rarely state questions - the questions being party questions - the struggle being of one party in the country as a whole, against the other, each party having its representation in both houses, and each party's aim being to have that majority in both houses which will enable it to control the policy of the whole country according to the principles of that party, it appears to me that deadlocks are less likely to occur in this constitution than in any federal constitution the world has yet seen. The ordinary modes of settlement are likely to operate all through owing to the equal franchise - and the similar constituencies, and qualifications of the two chambers - in nine cases out of ten. When the serious struggle does come it will never be a struggle of the large states against the small, or the small states against the large. It will be the ordinary party struggle maintained now in every chamber throughout Australia, the one party ranking against the other. Those who so jealously view this double dissolution have no more to fear the majority in the house of representatives than they have to fear the majority in the senate itself. I admit that our great difference on this question, as on so many questions, arises from one fact: that these colonies, at present, are in very different stages of political development. Our friends in Western Australia have all their troubles before them. The right hon. member, Sir John Forrest, an optimistic premier by nature, and also by experience, seeing that he has never known what it is to lead an opposition or be in a minority in the colony he represents, and who is obviously most unwilling to learn what it means to be in a minority here -

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I am old enough to learn!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

He wants to make a place for himself under the constitution!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Most happy should I be to see so able an administrator and doughty a champion find his due place under the constitution; but if he will permit me to say so-speaking from my small to his large experience-I think he will admit that on those questions which relate to the difficulties that arise in the working of a constitution, necessarily New South Wales, as the oldest colony of the group, can speak with the strongest voice, and the other colonies without distinction can practically speak in the order of their birth. In the states where there is the largest population, naturally there has been the earliest assertion of those constitutional rights which in the mother country have led to the undoubted ascendancy of the popular chamber. The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, with his optimistic view, drawn naturally from his own experience in the colony he represents, if he could see with the spectacles which have had to be worn. in the older colonies, would perceive the difficulties which inevitably arise out of our constitutions, and would be more willing than he seems at present to assist us in providing some means of solving the difficulty. This is the position: the different colonies are in different stages of political development; it is a disappearing difficulty, and will tend more and more to disappear, for reasons which I have mentioned in connection with another part of this subject. In every colony in the group—even in the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest's own colony, and in his own policy admirably adapted to the circumstances of that great and growing part of the continent, I have myself seen an undoubted advance in a liberal direction year by year, and certainly parliament by parliament.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I have been the leader of it!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I admit it. The right hon. gentleman is the leader, and I believe be is likely to remain so, and I warn the Legislative Council of Western Australia, through its acting President, Mr. Hackett, that when the time comes for the struggle between the two chambers of that colony, and the cure for deadlocks is undertaken, the fiercest champion he will have to encounter will be the right hon. gentleman, Sir John Forrest. It will be simply a question of time and experience.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
We have no provision at all for that!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Because you have not two parties. Practically, you have not two houses. Practically, there is only one house, one party, and one premier. Now, if what we have to face is not a struggle of state against state, but of party against party; if that is maintained upon lines of party politics and party principle; if the effort is simply to obtain a majority in both houses, and if those two houses have, as under this Constitution they have, practically the same constituency, what is the natural, the inevitable solution—as it appears to me—that is called for by the very circumstances of the case, and in the very constitution we are drafting? What is the natural solution of all difficulties which may arise? Both chambers are elective, both derive their authority from the same electors. What more natural than to refer both chambers, in the first instance, back to the people? The conclusion is inevitable. This constitution provides for that at certain periods—at least every three years the house of representatives and one half of the senate must face their constituents. At least every six years must the whole of the senate be renewed. We have enshrined the principle of the rule of the majority in this constitution, and surely there is nothing sacred in the mere time of its application. The sacredness is in the principle that the majority should rule. There is no sacredness in the condition that it is to be every three years or six years that the people should express their will. We say, "Under the regular, natural operation of the constitution, the elections every three and six years will suffice, and be likely to prove ample."

Mr. MCMILLAN:
That is under ordinary circumstances!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Yes. But when we have a special emergency, what are we to do? That which we do now under the constitution every three years to the whole of one body and to half the other, we should do to both at once. That is the natural way of solving the difficulty. Could there be less departure from the principles of the constitution, or the machinery we have embodied in it than that? We are to have under the constitution one means only of obtaining authority from the people, and of returning to ask for a renewal of their trust, that is by an election of both chambers. What more simple than to say that under certain circumstances both those chambers should appeal to the electors for instructions as to a particular about which they cannot or will not agree.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Supposing half the senate had just been re-elected? How can you get over that difficulty?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
The hon. member who preceded me said very fairly that you could put a number of cases in which obviously a single dissolution of one house might suffice. But if you have half the senate just elected, and the whole of the house of representatives just elected, what are you going to do under those circumstances?

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
No dissolution would ever be ordered then. They would wait until the house of representatives had nearly expired!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
That is probable, but not always certain.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
Almost certain. The executive would never inflict any more punishment on the house of representatives on which it depends for its very existence than it could help!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Quite so. The hon. gentleman has given me my strongest argument. Under the proposal for the dual dissolution they can never dissolve the senate without dissolving the house of representatives, which, as my hon.
friend points out, they would be particularly slow to dissolve. What better guarantee does the hon. gentleman ask for the senate?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
You do not follow the hon. member!

Mr. SYMON:
You have not caught his point!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Only as far as convenient!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Let me hear the hon. gentleman explain if I have done him any injustice.

Mr. SYMON:
You have the wrong end of the bludgeon to which the right hon. member,
Mr. Reid, referred!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
The executive would always inflict the least possible penalty upon the house of representatives, from whom they would derive their existence.
They would punish the senate, but not the house of representatives.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
What my hon. friend means is, that the executive will not dissolve the house of representatives until its term is drawing to a close, and then the election will be held practically at little or no extra cost to the house of representatives, but at great cost to the senate. The hon. member has failed to note that the Premier of Victoria has already intimated to the Convention that he is willing to accept an intervening period of six months or twelve months. He has stated that he is willing to agree that the dissolution should be delayed even for twelve months. As the hon. member will see, that gets rid of his objection.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
It does not get rid of it altogether it mitigates it!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Does my hon. and learned friend mean that they would delay the dissolution?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
The Premier of Victoria this morning said that in order to meet the possible objection that the double dissolution might be employed by the house of representatives when, under the circumstances of the case, it was compelled to be dissolved itself, and when, therefore, it would be making no special sacrifice, he was prepared to allow six months, or even twelve months, to elapse between the day when the measure was rejected by the senate and the day on which the two bodies should be sent to their constituents for an expression of their opinion on the merits of the question.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
If the question can wait for twelve months it cannot be very urgent!

Mr. LYNE:
Better leave it alone, if you are going to make the time twelve months!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It would want a special incubator to bring it to life again!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
The interval to elapse may be discussed when we come face to face with the question. The amendment, if adopted, offers a complete reply to the objection urged by the hon. member, Dr. Cockburn, and as such I employed it; but I by no means say that the same object is not to be attained by other and better means. I point to one simple and obvious means which has already been indicated; and, under these circumstances, claim that, having answered the interjection, I have disposed of the whole of the objection urged to the double dissolution by those who, like my hon. friend, consider that we in some way infringe upon the bi-cameral system by the simultaneous dissolution—not "Symon-taneous."

Mr. SYMON:
A very good pun; it quite lightens the discussion!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
A simultaneous dissolution, as the hon. member Dr. Cockburn's interjection showed, is a course by no means likely to be adopted by an executive responsible to the house of representatives, except under extreme pressure, and its equity, under these circumstances, is one of its chief recommendations. It gets rid of the idea that either house is being penalised. In one sense, a dissolution at anytime is a penalisation of the particular members who are put to personal inconvenience, outlay, and difficulty in order to contest their seats. But, looking at it from a public point of view, the word "penalisation" cannot be said to apply especially when both parties to the dispute are sent to their constituents at the same time. I think the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, himself might be expected to admit that the existence of such a power as that of simultaneous dissolution in the constitution would be an even greater incentive to moderation on the part of both chambers than any proposal for a single dissolution of will naturally seize every opportunity of punishing their opponents by compelling them to face their constituents, and will take every chance of destroying the government on any side-issue which they may be able to introduce. I admit at once that the argument might be put with similar force against the otherwise reasonable proposal of the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, for a dissolution of the senate alone. If the house of representatives had the dissolution in its hands—that is to say, the dissolution of the senate—the executive in the same way, if the majority in the senate was against them, would say, "If you reject this bill we will take the opportunity, even though we otherwise would accept your amendment, of seeing whether we cannot turn your majority into a minority, and regain a majority for our party in the second chamber." The hon. member will see that under these circumstances in each case the one house has something to gain by dissolution. The executive has something to gain or something to lose. This would make dissolution frequent.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

But the hon. and learned member will allow that there is some sense of responsibility?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I allow there is a sense of responsibility.

Mr. WISE:

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

It is because of the responsibility evoked that I wish to emphasise the advantage of a double dissolution. I honestly believe that if this provision for a simultaneous dissolution be placed on the statute-book, as you put equal pressure on both parties to the dispute, as both parties to the dispute have to pay an equal price in support of their own opinion, as both parties to the dispute have to take their political lives in their hands and face their constituents, if they persist in disagreeing, you have an eminently fair and equitable device for rendering disputes short and dissolutions rare.

Mr. WISE:

Each will act under the same sense of responsibility!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

It appears to me that the defect in the method proposed by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, and that suggested by the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, is this—and I am using one of their own arguments against themselves: You will multiply elections and make dissolutions of frequent occurrence for working the constitution for merely party purposes. Neither party would hesitate to seize and use the power to dissolve a chamber in which there was a majority opposed to it. Whenever one party was in a minority in one house, it would make use of this single dissolution for its own political ends, and not to solve deadlocks or in the interests of the state. But if you place them on exactly the same footing with the same penalty imposed upon both, you make both equally desirous of avoiding strife. You give the greatest encouragement, the greatest inducement both to compromise and to hasten a settlement that you could possibly offer. Both chambers would occupy the same position. Instead of one taking its life in its hands at the bidding of the other, both would escape dissolution so long as they agreed. After twenty years' experience of political life in one colony, and some slight acquaintance with politics in other colonies, I have yet to discover any two houses of parliament anxious to dissolve themselves before their time. I firmly believe that the introduction of this provision into a federal constitution would be the greatest safeguard, the greatest encouragement and inducement to moderation, agreement, and harmony between the two chambers, which you could contrive. One majority would not be able to punish another majority. Both sides would have a similar end to gain, and both would be likely to approach a settlement of the question in a spirit of fairness, straightforwardness, and willingness to concede something in a rational way to the other's views rather than run the gauntlet of an election together.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

The country might say, "a plague on both your houses!"

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

The strongest instinct in the Australian elector, as in the British elector, is the instinct of fair play. And when the electors were brought to a knowledge of the compromises which had been rejected by one house or by the other, the house which was recalcitrant would be made to pay the penalty. It is quite possible that the country might consider that neither house ought to have forced such an extreme step as a dissolution, in which case both parties might be made to pay the penalty by an indignant body of electors. It seems to me, without elaborating the matter any further, that the main support of the proposal lies in these manifest advantages which a double dissolution enjoys over a single dissolution from a public point of view. I say that the more frankly because this proposal marks a great concession on the part of the men who have made it. I cannot conceal from myself our existing differences of opinion and of political principles in this Convention; and I submit that, from the standpoint of hon. members from the less populous colonies, they have made, a great stride towards unity. If this had been made in Adelaide, it would have considerably relieved the tension of the situation; but not being made in Adelaide, it has roused so great a feeling that the public here are not now prepared to stop where they might have stopped before. At that time it appeared that no proposal for the solution of deadlocks would be accepted by a majority of the Convention. At this meeting we find that a proposal which, when made by Mr. Wise in Adelaide, received but a few votes, is carried by a majority of the Convention against a minority, some of whom, like myself, regard the proposal as a considerable concession. I regard that as marking a great advance. The proposal is one which, if no other could be obtained, I myself would accept; but because I would accept it in the absence of a better proposal, it is not necessary that I should blind myself to the fact that, having in the light of this debate more closely examined the proposal for a dissolution of one house or the other, I have come to the conclusion that a single dissolution in neither case can prove itself efficacious. The only dissolution of any value which could properly become part of the constitution, and encourage the settlement of difficulties, is a double dissolution. I now see that a single dissolution would mean the perpetuation of mere party warfare instead of a solution of deadlocks. If a simultaneous dissolution be accepted, it has been suggested that the proposal to provide a still further step in the shape of a dual referendum is unnecessary.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Would not the want of finality make the difference more marked?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

There is no absolute finality, I admit; but the provision for a double dissolution first, would often permit of the settlement of difficulties without the referendum. The greatest merit of this proposal is that it provides an opportunity for a pacific settlement of most difficulties without an appeal to a double dissolution. You will have introduced into the constitution an admission of the principle that the prevention of deadlocks is better than their cure.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Does not the hon. member think that the provision for a referendum may induce the senate to still more strongly oppose the house of representatives?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I will come to that presently. I admit that there is no absolute finality in a double dissolution.

And even when you go beyond that to a double referendum there is no absolute and certain finality.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

With a double dissolution you may give rise to more complication than ever!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I think not. Even under existing circumstances it is necessary to have a single dissolution before you settle vexed questions; but the advantage of a double dissolution is that, in a number of cases, it would not be applied.
The mere existence of the provision would operate for the settlement of disputes. If you have a double dissolution the circumstances of serious difficulty which remain after it will be infinitesimal in number, and if they do remain you can take the farther step of a double referendum. Even those who oppose the referendum admit that at an election it is impossible to properly solve a single and separate issue owing to local considerations, and party considerations of many kinds. Electors may differ with their member on one point, but will not always lose the services of a man who has represented their constituency for a number of years because of that difference, vital though it may be.
Mr. SYMON:
The electors will put men before measures then!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I do not think they should always put measures before men. There are many circumstances and considerations which determine their choice.
Take, for instance, such leaders of policy in England as Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Balfour. I could understand conservatives or liberals in the constituency of either of those gentlemen sinking their principles at the polls so that neither man should be lost to the councils of the nation. I do not say that in exceptional circumstances that course would not be justifiable. But the circumstances would be exceptional. The familiar fact is that at our elections you cannot, as a rule, so isolate an issue as to obtain the verdict of a constituency upon that alone. If, on the other hand, you take the referendum, it will allow you to clear away all such electoral inconsistencies. All those purely personal and local questions which are so frequently introduced into an election will disappear. The personal question would certainly disappear, and it would become a question of the measures, not the man. Under these circumstances, it is manifest that the dual referendum has the advantage of clarifying a situation, by showing what the electors do think upon a precise issue. Hon. members say there is no finality in the step. I admit that. Before you take the dual referendum, however, you have had a double dissolution, a simultaneous dissolution, when all party forces having been brought into play, you will have obtained a general verdict, as nearly as local circumstances will permit, upon the issue in dispute. When you come to the second struggle, no doubt some other considerations will come into play. Each party will attack the weakest point on the other side, efforts will be concentrated upon the doubtful states, and it is probable that in the great proportion of cases, a majority which was doubtful, from a double dissolution, may be rendered certain by the referendum. In neither scheme of dissolution can you have absolute finality. But this process will afford such instruction to politicians, and such a warning to the executive of the day that even if it does not solve the deadlock, it will teach us the, true situation as nothing else can. I have not now much to add. I cannot disguise from myself the fact that hon.
gentlemen representing different political principles are naturally opposed to a double dissolution. A dissolution of the senate is to them something they cannot swallow without a wry face. I appreciate the magnanimous and generous speech of the hon. member, Sir John Downer, who, I understand, is prepared to make some sacrifice with a view to the solution of this vexed question. We ought not to forget that we are being met in this matter in a conciliatory spirit, and the encouragement which has been offered in the solution of this and other difficult questions by members from less populous states, has been the means of saving this Convention at its first hour and in its last. They saved it in Adelaide, they saved it here.

An Hon. MEMBER:
From the extremists on both sides!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
We gave them an overwhelming majority for equal representation, showing we were not unwilling to follow the noble lead they had given us.
They have met and are meeting us in the fairest possible spirit, and it appears to me that the only words that ought to be used in this debate are those which express and convey concord, amity, and good feeling.
Naturally a somewhat vehement politician, prone perhaps to take offence, I have been unable in this Convention to feel my wounds, though I have received a considerable number of blows, perhaps deserved, especially those from my hon. friends, the presidents of legislative councils. It is my cross in life to have the presidents of legislative councils perpetually chastising me, because they love me. With becoming meekness I have submitted to the correction which they have administered, and am unable to remember it with any regret. It appears to me that in this Convention the growth of good-feeling has been greater than any of us expected or believed possible. I did not dream for one moment that we should see approaches which we have already witnessed on the part of hon. members, and decline to believe that, having approached so closely, we shall not before we separate place in this measure some provision in regard to deadlocks. It may not be perfect from any point of view, but it will exhibit the stream of tendency in ourselves, and which exists out of doors. We shall show that the reality of this issue is recognised, and that while we believe that under this constitution there will be less complication and less opportunity for serious deadlocks, and though we believe that they will occur only under very exceptionable circumstances, yet, recognising that what we are constructing is a legislative machine, we shall not be turned aside by the word "mechanical" - "mechanical means of escape", or "mechanical safety-valve" - from adding this essential to our machine, though even that may not make it perfect. We are here to do our work scientifically. Having seen the possibility of a grave parliamentary contention, which might threaten the very life of the community, no matter how remote may be the concatenation of circumstances necessary to generate them, we have been forewarned. Knowing what we have ourselves experienced in these internecine disputes, knowing how high party spirit can rise, and recognising that the very principle of the British Constitution implies the shock of opposite opinions, discussions, and constant differences, and the solution of difficulties in a manly way by constitutional procedure, we have not hesitated to provide the best means in our power so as to protect this constitution in the future, and enable it to maintain in harmony its onward march. We are planning a constitution in which this provision shall find a place apart-as its medicine, and not as its daily food which will prove that a statesmanlike foresight existed amongst us, and that nothing was wanting on our part to provide against all the dangers which might possibly occur.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia):

Such a provision as the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, has so eloquently described in the close of his speech is embodied in the amendment which was carried on my motion on Friday last; therefore, I might leave the general description of the great benefits that are to arise from a provision of that kind to the language so well employed by my hon. and learned friend just before he sat down. It would be ungracious if I did not acknowledge the exceedingly fair and moderate, as well as powerful, effort made by him to bring under our notice every possible reason in favour of the simultaneous or concurrent dissolution, as against the successive dissolution which we support, and I also feel that he is quite justified in referring with expressions of appreciation to the vote of hon. members representing the smaller states in support of his view. But we might expect him to recognise, at the same time, the magnanimity operating in the minds of hon. members representing the larger states who in opposition to a state of feeling—a state of clamour I think I might almost call it—have come forward and vindicated their own independent judgment and have supported the proposition which we from the other states have brought forward. If there is magnanimity on one side, there is equal magnanimity—greater magnanimity, it seems to me—on the other, because, as has been pointed out over and over again, the influences which are brought to bear are difficult to resist. It is very hard, indeed, for members representing the larger states to act as they think right upon an independent, honest, and conscientious judgment in order to give effect to a proposition which is immediately scouted because it is said, most unjustly said, to be the outcome of a combination on the part of the smaller states. I deny that position.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
That has been withdrawn already!

Mr. SYMON:
I was not referring to what my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, has said. My hon. friend, Mr. Holder, is mistaken. I am referring to statements that are cast broadly throughout the land. We meet them at the hotels, we meet them in the streets, we meet them in the public press.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Hotels are the best places in which to meet them!

Mr. SYMON:
"I do not want to be diverted in any way from what I am submitting to hon. members; but-underlying what my hon. friend, of course, in a jesting way, interjected—there is no doubt that the feeling which animates all of us is that threats, jeers, and gibes of all kinds are to be drowned in some way or other. So far as we from the smaller states are concerned, we intend to put them wholly behind our backs. I thank the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, for his courageous speech this morning. It may not have been convincing, but it was brave, and I tell him, and also hon. members of the Convention, that we are not going to have our judgment coerced; we are not of those of whom it was said:

A marcial Providunce fashioned us holler,
O' purpose that we might our principles swaller.

We do not intend to do anything of that kind; but such a speech as my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Deakin, has just made, is calculated, at any rate, to induce men to reconsider from every point of view the position which they have taken up, and to give all possible weight to the arguments which he has addressed to them. I think that my hon. and learned friend would have been more convincing if the senate and the house of representatives had identically the same power—if hon. members had allowed us in the senate the same money powers, if they had allowed us in the senate some control over the executive, if they had allowed us in the senate, not all, but some measure of that control over appointments and administration which exists—I think in an unnecessary, excessive, and improper degree—in the constitution of the United States. Then I say there would have been a great deal of force in the speech of my hon. and learned friend. It is just because you have shorn the senate upon which the states which are the less populous now, but which may not be the less populous states in the future, of the great nation which we are about to create, rely, and which is the protector of these communities, of the powers which are necessary for an equal control, that my hon. and learned friend's argument fails in its effect. What are we to do now? Are we to hand over the senate bodily to the greater populations represented by their greater power in the house of representatives—represented by the executive government, which is responsible to the house of representatives, and to the house of representatives only?

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is the point!

Mr. SYMON:
My hon. and learned friend said that we had made a great concession. I consider that we have made an immense concession. In 1891, there was no suggestion of the necessity for making any concession of this kind.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Yes; I moved it in the Constitutional Committee. The division was against me!

Mr. SYMON:
Well, I know that, so far as I have been able to ascertain, it was not dealt with seriously in the Convention of 1891. I freely grant that in the process of time there is a natural evolution of political principles and practice too.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
And divergence, too!

Mr. SYMON:
Possibly. We are developing from day to day, and it is for that reason that this second session of the Convention is now being, held. I said a few days ago that in the interests of the cause we have at heart, and as safeguards were provided, I should not further resist the provision which took away from the senate the power of amending tax bills. In my belief we had settled and dealt with it finally at the Adelaide Convention. There were no additional reasons brought forward, and as there were important safeguards, as I felt them, amongst which this so-called deadlock provision is one, to permit of time for consideration, I yielded on that point. But, and this comes home to me more because of the hon. and learned member's speech, if we had given this up at the Adelaide Convention, instead of paving the way for harmony and finality it would have paved the way to additional and larger demands. Is the Premier of Victoria content to accept the concurrent dissolution as final? Is he content to waive his demands for a dual referendum?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Considering that I went for a dual referendum, and only put in a double dissolution on pressure, I do not think it likely. I am perfectly prepared to take the dual referendum without a dissolution.

Mr. SYMON:

Is my right hon. friend prepared to take the converse?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

No. I only take that as a compromise!

Mr. SYMON:

Then we are landed in the double dissolution and the dual referendum, and super added to that we may have a national referendum as well. If we give way upon this point we will have to give way upon other points. Hon. members are like the horse-leech. With them it is give, give.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The daughter of the horse-leech!

Mr. SYMON:

An authority reminds me that it is the daughter of the horse-leech. When we give way on this matter, which is so essentially a matter of principle, other matters of principle will be put before us, and we shall be expected to give way upon them. The axe is laid at the root of the tree, and if we do not take care, the senate, which represents the constitutional tree, will be felled to the ground. All my hon. friends who are desirous of adhering to a clear and intelligible principle will, I hope, stand firm as to this, and will say that, granting it is well that in order to secure the success of federation there should be some outlet, some safety-valve, and that that safety-valve should take the form of a dissolution of the senate at some stage or other, at any rate that dissolution should not take place until after the house of representatives has gone to its constituents and come back.

with a mandate to which the senate must either yield or be asked in the constitutional way to seek the authority of its constituents to maintain its position. I think the suggestion as to procedure made by the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, is the best one. I do not for a moment believe that the amendment establishing the principle of successive dissolutions will be rescinded in this House. But if the right hon. gentleman says that he wishes to have an opportunity given for the executive government of the federation to put in force the alternative, if the conditions require it, there is great reason in that attitudes and it is possible that some hon. members—at present I am not one of them—who support the other may be willing to entrust the federal executive which is responsible, to the house of representatives with the power, as they will have the responsibility, of undertaking so serious a selection as that.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
It would always end in a dual referendum!

Mr. SYMON:
I do not wish to shut my eyes to the views taken by different hon. members; but, putting it as a question of procedure, so far as bringing the matter under consideration to decision is concerned, it seems to me that this provision for successive dissolutions is that which has met, and I believe will meet again, with the support of a majority of hon. members. At the same time, there may be a majority who are willing to trust the federal executive and to have the alternative suggested by my hon. and learned friend as well.

Mr. WISE:
The amendment I propose to move, if the blank is left, is an alternative proposal!

Mr. SYMON:
I do not intend to go over the ground that we have already covered in these debates. The shorter we can make the discussion, so long as our views are fairly expressed, the better. But I want to emphasise what I have put before, and what I have said again to-day. The functions of the senate are twofold. That, it seems to me, some hon. members do not bear in mind. First of all it is for the protection of state interests, seeing that in the larger sense it is the states house, and when difficulties arise between the house of representatives and the senate, the custodian and guardian of state rights, things will become very serious indeed. But in addition to that the senate is the house which imposes check and secures delay in the ordinary legislation of the country. In that capacity it seems to me that its duty is to see that the house of representatives is giving effect, in the measure brought before it, to the will of the people. If that is not the function of the senate so far as its position as a revising house is concerned it has no function at all. Its duty is to interpose delay and bring about reconsideration, and the only purpose it can serve is to secure that it gets a full and adequate expression of the will of the people. To send back a measure to the house of representatives with amendments, or in its original state, declaring that it will not accept it, and that the House must go to its constituents before the measure can be brought under their notice again, seems to me a perfectly adequate and right position for the senate to take. If, on the other hand you say that merely in another session, after an interval of six or twelve months, the bill has to go up again to the senate, then you are not getting an expression of the will of the people at all. You are getting the expression of the will of the house of representatives, which may not be in harmony with the people they represent. Difficulties have been pointed out, and there are difficulties of course in every solution you may attempt. If you have a successive dissolution, you have an election at two different times; if you have a concurrent dissolution, you have an election at the same time. But with a concurrent dissolution you will intensify the struggle that has been initiated between the two houses, because you will have the members of the senate, and the members of the house of representatives addressing their constituents throughout the country at the time, and you will have the personal element introduced which is sought to be eliminated by the referendum. You will have popular prejudice introduced, and you will have the men on both sides raising the standard of a struggle between the house, of representatives and the senate.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
You will have both sides of the question put at once; by the other method both sides of the question will be put at different times!

Mr. SYMON:
My hon. friend does not see that if you have both sides of the question put at different times, you do not have the two champions coming into constant conflict.

Mr. TRENWITH:
-

Mr. SYMON:
Of course there is a remedy, that is, to fight it out; but that is the Donnybrook kind of argument.

Mr. TRENWITH:
That is better than having the fight all on one side!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
The hon. member says, "Let the other fellow fight it out!"

Mr. SYMON:

My argument is, let the house which is in the position of the quarrelling house—not the house whose duty it is to exercise a check, and to soothe and subdue the inflamed passions of the other man—let it go to its friends and constituents and see if they approve of this excited front that it presents to those who are supposed to check him, and when that house comes back with the approval of the constituents

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

They will continue the fight!

Mr. SYMON:

Not at all. You do not continue the fight any more than you do now. What would happen in our colony, for instance, if you had such a dissolution? The members of the house of representatives would be withdrawn from the fray; they would be out of it. It is, then, a question whether members of the other house have acted as they have done with the sanction of their constituents; that is all. I wish to say that I have no desire to aggravate the difficulties of the question. Our duty is to see if we can arrive at a just and fair solution. If your solution is better than mine, I am prepared to accept it; but I say mine is the best at present. If yours is better than mine, and it is put into the constitution, we must give consideration to the most effective way of recommending it to our people; but at present we are endeavouring, by bringing the propositions together, to secure something which will be just to all, and fair in the solution of this very difficult problem. But I am pointing out now that the very difficulties which you suggest, and which may arise, undoubtedly, in a successive dissolution, you will have in just as large measure with the concurrent dissolution, with the added personal element, the added element of personal bitterness in fighting the matter out, which you are bound to get when the members of the house of representatives and the senate meet before exactly the same constituents. You will have the members of the senate heated and angry instead of calm, as they would otherwise have been—calmer still if my hon. friend had been a member of it. They will be filled with the idea that they have been caused the endless expense and trouble of an election by the overbearing majority—a very unjust expression to use no doubt in the house of representatives.

Mr. TRENWITH:

The senate cannot be overbearing; it must always be the house of representatives!

Mr. SYMON:
I do not know, I am sure; but I think that they, very possibly, might be overbearing. I do not say that they are more likely to be angelic; they will be human beings with passions like ours; and I do not think they will be any more angelic than the house of representatives. It is for that very reason, as my hon. friend feels and I am sure he will accept my deduction—it is because they are men having like passions with the members of the house of representatives that I do not believe in the concurrent dissolution. You will not have them addressing their constituents with the same calmness, or, at any rate, with the same moderating effect on the public mind, as you would have them in the case of a successive dissolution, with intervals of six or twelve months between. Then the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, said there would be little or no probability of these powers being exerted. That is a position that cannot be emphasised too strongly. For the very reason that that is, probably, the opinion of the whole body of this Convention, it is not an argument for putting this provision in the constitution; but it is a very good argument for saying that it should not be put in. If we are so satisfied that this difficulty will not arise, the less drastic the powers we put in the constitution to exercise a controlling influence over the senate, the more we are likely to frame a lasting and prudent machine of government. The double dissolution, my hon. friend said, would be less likely to be used. I am not so very sure about that. In some respects it might not be likely to be used; but what an instrument it is you are holding over the senate!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

And the other chamber too!

Mr. SYMON:

Not so much the other chamber. The hon. member knows that the other chamber, in every well regulated system of English responsible government, is liable to be sent to its constituents now under a dissolution. I do not call it a penal dissolution. I object to that term. It is only a mode of bringing them into harmony with the feelings of the country. That exists at this moment. It applies to some upper houses in some unified constitutions; it does so in ours; but we are introducing it as a new thing in a federal constitution. We are putting a new weapon in the hands of the federal executive and a majority of the house of representatives. If we do put it there, we ought to take care that it is not a two-edged sword, but a weapon that will have no more destructive effect than we can possibly help. Let us minimise it. We are all agreed that there should be a dissolution; let us make it as moderate in its effect as we possibly can. It does seem to me that the moderating influence is all in the direction of having a successive dissolution, with an interval for reconsideration of the same measure-an interval for calming the political passions which have been excited—and if we have that, it will be ten thousand times better than a mere interval in which you do not get the opinion of the country upon a measure; but merely the same opinion of the same body of representatives. When both houses go to the country concurrently the result will be that you will have an acrimonious struggle, and it may be that you will bring the parties back in exactly the same position as they were before. It will be ineffective as well as troublesome. I feel sure that such a provision as that will be a blot upon the constitution which we are now engaged in training.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Without that there will be no constitution to have a blot upon!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I do not know why the hon. member should talk in that way!

Mr. SYMON:

After an interval of six months for consideration there is to be a double dissolution. My hon. friend will feel that he has been a little hasty in making that remark. I am sure that he did not mean it. However, we shall endeavour to make the best constitution that we can. We have submitted our proposal. I venture to think that that which was carried the other day is the best, looking at it under all the circumstances. My hon. friends will make such proposals as they think right for making it still more effective, and in the meantime I am sure that all of us will only be too ready to listen as we have done with great instruction to such arguments as my hon. friend, Mr. Deakin, addressed to us from his point of view. I do not propose to deal now with the dual referendum or with the national referendum. The dual referendum I confess I do not like. I think it is an abnormal provision altogether. There are reasons against it, as there are reasons against the national referendum. Of course one point of objection does not exist with regard to the dual referendum which, in the estimation of those who come from the less populous states, applies to the national referendum. I think we are now at really the most critical point in the construction of this constitution; we all desire to see it so framed that it shall be an enduring foundation for the indissoluble community that we propose to create under it; and I hope myself that whatever plan is adopted, it will be received even by those who may be defeated, whether I am on the defeated side, or my hon. friends are on the defeated side—that it will be received by all of us with goodwill, and with the determination that, whatever our own personal opinions may be, we shall give the constitution, whatever shape it may take, our best support when it is handed over to be adopted by the people who send us here.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales) [12.35]:

I should be extremely pleased if I thought the situation of affairs was so simple that we could proceed at once to the question, as my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, has explained. So far from feeling that, I deemed it my duty a day or two ago to speak very emphatically as to the dangers of the position which we are about to find ourselves in—and I thought in doing so that I acquitted myself of a duty to this Convention, because it would be a thousand pities if we in this Convention did not fully exchange our opinions upon vital matters such as these—nothing would be more agreeable to me, nothing more easy, than to indulge in a number of pleasant observations which would excite complete harmony, and probably lead to the general conviction that I was a prince of good fellows in federal matters. But, in taking up such an attitude upon a crucial matter of this sort, I should betray the Convention and my own colony. I should be asking the Convention to take up an attitude which I feel would not be accepted by the people whom I represent, hence my anxiety to impress my views upon this Convention. I was very pleased indeed to listen to the speech of my right hon. and learned friend, Sir George Turner, upon the matter. We all know the power of his acute intellect, and what pleased me about my right hon. friend's speech was that he seemed prepared to bow now to a more liberal solution of this matter, judging from the observations which he has addressed to this Committee. I should be prepared for very much stronger arguments from my hon. friend if he was not in that happy frame of mind. So far as I am concerned, I have made it very obvious to the Convention, sitting both in Adelaide and in Sydney, that the only point on which I become obstinate is the point when I believe that the Convention is getting on a track which will lead to disaster. I am prepared to trust federation in the largest possible way; but I cannot get beyond what I believe are the limits of moderation, still less can I get beyond the limits which will be supported by the people of this country. Now, it seems to me very clear that my hon. friends who represent the smaller populations, and who have shown such a resolute determination to safeguard their powers in the constitution, cannot be at all surprised being conscientious themselves if the same anxiety is shown by those who represent the larger populations a similar position and said that we, as representing the larger populations, would not be satisfied with any constitution which did not in every event safeguard the rights of the majority of the commonwealth to rule—if we took up that position, I admit that we might be safely censured from their point of view, as I honestly think they are censurable from our point of view.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
That is the very thing you are advocating!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
What?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
That you should always have the power to rule!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
No. So far, seeing the steadiness and determination with which my hon. friends have determined that a minority should rule, I have ventured to put in a word or two in the interests of the majority. I quite agree that if we were to endeavour to override the interests of the smaller state by some rough-and-ready method which would secure the preponderence of the larger population, I admit that we should be exposed fairly to the same criticism from the other side. Now, I want to see if we possibly can discover some sort of solution of this difficulty which will not be exposed to the fault that it leaves the smaller states entirely at the mercy of the larger, and I am equally anxious that we shall arrive at a solution which will not leave the larger at the mercy of the smaller. There is our trouble. If my hon. friends from the smaller states had their way in this constitution, a state of things would arise in which, no matter how overwhelming the majority on the national vote, it would be in the power of a comparatively small minority to set aside for ever the voice of that absolute majority. Coming down to figures, we will suppose that there was a mass vote, representing 2,000,000 or more in the federal population.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
They would be all in accord I suppose!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Since my hon. friend declines to allow me to get an explanation from him, I hope he will allow me to proceed without interruption. Suppose that a mass vote representing over 2,000,000 of the people affirms one line of policy in legislation for this federal body. It is quite possible, under things as they are proposed at present, that a majority of an inner circle of population, representing not 2,000,000 but 600,000 people could absolutely and finally not only block the voice of the 2,000,000, but by their power of saying "no" to every proposition emanating from those representing the 2,000,000, would produce such a state of deadlock that, perhaps, for the salvation of the federation, the voice of the enormous majority would have to be set aside and affairs adjusted to the will of the small minority. That sort of federation no sane people in New South Wales will accept.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Or anywhere else!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Or, I should think, anywhere else. That being the case, we must bend our best energies to see if we cannot relieve this constitution from the odium, from the destructive criticism to which it will be exposed if it is put in that shape before the people of this country. I am sure that hon. members will see that it is infinitely better that that sort of criticism should be heard in this chamber before the work is done than that it should be made with destructive effect after the work is done. So far and so long-as I represent the people of this country in this federal matter, I decline to hand over the prospects of federation to men who are bent on destroying them. I am anxious, if possible, to see this constitution assume a shape that I can go forth into the country and to the districts of the country loyally and honestly supporting it. And hon. members cannot expect me to do that if the constitution is left in such a shape that I find myself absolutely unable to say a word for it. I think my hon. friends who differ so strongly with me will bear with me.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Suggest something! The Right Hon. G.H. REID: I intend on this occasion to see whether I cannot in some way or other suggest something which will enable me at any rate to see a solution of the matter, which will enable me to go into the districts of this country and support the constitution. I quite feel the force of the criticism which was levelled at me with reference to the speech I made a day or two ago. I quite admit that we are bound as far as we can to find some solution of these difficulties which we are compelled at the same time to point out. Now, before I endeavour to do that, I think I ought to show in what respects the solution which has been adopted by the Convention fails to satisfy those conditions. The Committee has adopted the proposal of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon-and it is quite a concession as usual-which provides that when representatives of the people as a commonwealth wish to pass certain legislation which is not agreeable to the gentlemen who will compose the senate under a widely different franchise, then the first thing which shall follow shall be a dissolution of the house of representatives.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
Where is the difference in the franchise?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
The expression was wrong, but my hon. friends know, I think, precisely what I mean.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

No, I do not!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I will tell my hon. friend. A sort of arrangement in the constitution under which six gentlemen, representing 150,000 souls, will have as much power in dealing with the money and legislation of the commonwealth as six gentlemen representing 1,300,000. I am indebted to my hon. friend for his correction. It is not a fair political exchange, as far as the senate is concerned, without some sort of balance in another part of the constitution.

An Hon. MEMBER:

-.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I have accepted it because I see no federation without it; and, having accepted it, I want to endeavour, in other parts of the bill, to put the constitution in such a shape that the people of this colony will also accept it. That is my desire in the remarks I am making now. With reference to the senate, unless some alteration is made, you cannot commend it to the common-sense and justice of the 1,300,000 people of this country, that, in dealing, we will say, with the finances of the commonwealth, six gentlemen, representing 150,000 persons, should have precisely the same power-

An Hon. MEMBER:

Nothing of the sort!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I quite admit it is not so in the house of representatives; but I have sufficient knowledge of the working of constitutions to know that the supreme power in the second chamber, which is not liable to the same constituency, which is not liable to the same risks of dissolution, at the same time is practically an immovable authority, that it is a comparatively thankless task to have the responsibility of driving the state coach when a passenger inside can always apply the brake. That is really the position we are in. We are given, apparently, a democratic chamber on the broadest possible basis. We are given a grand stage coach with "democracy" painted all over it, but those who give us this state coach are determined that the man on the box shall always be a safe conservative, and that the man who has the brake shall always be a safe conservative. I am not prepared for that sort of democracy, in which the brake is so strong that it can always arrest the progress of the state coach without supplying anything which will enable those who are responsible for its progress to adjust it so that it can advance.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
Why did you bring us here?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Well, I am sure I do not know. I do not know what brought the hon. member here; I did not. What I desire is that whilst there should be a strong break in the second chamber, which can always prevent the will of the representatives of the people from acting at once as it likes, that there should be in this document something; not in the interests of this or that party, but in the interests of the whole people, in the interests of the whole concern, which will prevent the constitution we are framing from being defective in some vital respect.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Does the right hon. gentleman wish to make the brake weaker?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I do not mind how strong the brake is, so long as the man at the brake is in some sort of responsibility which will reconcile the man on the box with the man who is using the brake. As long as the driver could use the brake there would be some sense in the management of the vehicle. But if one man has all the trouble of the driving, and the other man can put on the brake whenever he likes, and is strong enough to stop the coach whenever he likes, then we get a sort of machine and a sort of progress for which it is scarcely worth while putting our hands into our pockets. I would remind the Convention that its own deliberate vote has affirmed that statement. There was a time when provision for deadlocks was ridiculed. I was exposed to the keenest satire once, years ago, for advocating a cure for deadlocks. I will be frank. Many of my criticisms of the bill have disappeared in the light of better judgment and greater experience; but this is the one criticism which I have felt all through, and still feel was a just one; and the position I took up in that one respect—if only in that one respect was justified the other day by a large majority of the Convention. The proposition was solemnly put to the Convention the other day, "Shall there be a provision for deadlocks, or shall there not," and there was a large majority in favour of the provision.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Of two to one!
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Yes, of two to one. By a majority of two to one we have agreed that there must be in this constitution something which will enable us to look upon the machine as one which will get out of a deadlock, if such a thing—it might never occur—unfortunately happens.
The Hon. S. FRASER:
We have given you a lot more than "something"!
Mr. SOLOMON:
A great many voted for that on the ground of expediency, and not of necessity?
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I voted for equal representation on the ground of expediency; but without some adjustment in the constitution to prevent what might follow from such a concession, I would never have dreamt of voting for it. But I voted for it with my eyes open; I did not get up and tell the Convention I was doing a wondrous and virtuous thing. I said nothing, but I voted for it. I will stand by my vote, and I am prepared to vindicate it all over the country when the time comes, if the situation which may arise out of that principle is provided for. Hon. gentlemen of—I will not say ferocity because that is foreign to natures like those of the hon. members, Mr. Fraser and Sir William Zeal, but gentlemen with calm, cold-blooded temperaments, have shown, that there are no men in Australia who have got a keener perception of the bearing of these things in practice than my two hon. friends. There are no men whose convictions are more sincere. Mor

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Oh no!
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
The will as expressed by the representatives of the people. Of course, there are a number of gentlemen who always think they are expressing the will of the majority, in their better moments, by going against them at all times; but in politics we cannot have these saviours of society we have to go to the ballot-box. As I say, the keenness with which this thing is fought by men of sense and discrimination shows that there is a good deal in it.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
No doubt!
The Right Hon. G.H. REID: Exactly.
The Hon. S. FRASER:
I do not dispute that!
I agree with my hon. friend that there is a great deal in it that we, as representing the larger populations, have to watch.

The Hon. S. Fraser:
We represent the larger populations!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
We!

The Hon. S. Fraser:
Sir William Zeal and myself!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
I will not venture to say what the opinions are in the other colonies; I can merely speak of my own. Speaking entirely for the people, one of whose representatives I am I wish to point out that the tenacity with which my hon. friends represent the senate view has so impressed, and properly impressed, intelligent persons in this community, that they are naturally anxious that the other view should be safeguarded with equal faithfulness, equal ability, and equal determination; and the other is this: That whilst we concede equal representation—as this is a federal union, and as union would be impossible without it—we want to see some sort of provision which will, afford to the people of all sets of opinion, this satisfaction: that however wrong the decision of the people, or house of representatives, or the senate, or altogether may be, the machine is not to break down—that there is to be some finality. The fatal defect of all these provisions is that not one of them gives us finality. You draw out a number of intolerable and, perhaps, expensive contrivances as a remedy against deadlocks, not one of which possesses, the element of finality. I say if there is to be no element of finality in your provisions against a deadlock the old bill is infinitely better. If a deadlock is to be left insoluble, the old bill of 1891 is a far more sensible measure than this will be. If it is affirmed that the deadlock is not to be left indissoluble, and if we, by a resolution of two to one, have affirmed that there shall be a provision against deadlocks, we have taken the responsibility of constructing a provision which will show some appearance, at any rate, of finality. That is the responsibility we are under, and we have taken it upon ourselves. If hon. members had said "No, we will have no provision except the common-sense of the two bodies working under conditions which will inevitably bring about a solution in some way or other," I could understand it. But inasmuch as we have gone beyond that, and have said, "There must be some provision against deadlocks," I say the provision of the Premier of Victoria, the provision of the hon. member, Mr. Symon, every provision. before the chamber except the provision of the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, is lacking in, finality, and therefore is worse than useless. Let us look at the matter as it is presented by the hon. member, Mr. Symon. The elections for the house of representatives, if dissolved, would show the members of the senate, precisely what; public opinion was upon the question in dispute.

[The Chairman left the chair at 1 p.m. The Committee resumed. at 2 p.m.]

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

There was a remark of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, in which he referred to the dissolution of the house of representatives in order to bring it into conformity with the will of the people. That expression only throws a vivid light upon the difficulties we should be thrown into by the proposition before the Convention. What is the use of ascertaining the will of the people unless that will is to have some sort of effect? For instance, there are two wills that have to be consulted under the propositions before the house—the will of the people in one sense, meaning the commonwealth, then the will of the people, as a different quantity altogether, forming the constituencies of the senate. For instance, in the appeal to the people of the commonwealth it might be clearly brought out that, although there was a very large majority of the electors of the commonwealth in favour of a certain course, and only a small minority against that course, yet that minority was in such localities that its power was equal to that of the majority; and there being a conflict between the senate and the house of representatives, whilst the house of representatives would be re-formed in the light of the appeal to the people of the commonwealth, the difficulty would remain in that case more. intensified than before; because, while the persons forming the majority in the house of representatives would come back and say, "We have won," those in the senate who took the opposite view would say, "No, we have won, because a majority of our constituents have expressed themselves in favour of the view we have taken."

An Hon. Member:

That would be a majority of the states!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Yes. My hon. friend will see that, on the different composition of the two houses, it might very well happen that, while taking the larger states together, there was a larger majority for one side of the contest, yet, looking at the smaller states in a majority of those there would be a majority in favour of the view of the senate, and that majority quite decided enough to justify the senate in saying, on the lines of this constitution, "This appeal having been made in the case of the house of representatives, it brings out the fact that, in the opinion of our constituents, we have been doing our duty, in resisting this measure." All the trouble would have left things precisely as they were, only in a position of greater difficulty. While the one house would be clamouring and saying, "We have had an appeal to the people of the commonwealth, and it shows the majority are for us," the members of the senate would say, "You talk as if there was no constitution. The constitution gives as a certain position, and, looking at our position, the appeal has gone in our favour." Well, that would not settle a deadlock. It would intensify it. Then we take the next step. The two houses having been brought into this state of uncompromising opposition, the constituencies of both having approved the opposite policy of both, what have we before us? A prospect of repeating exactly the same operation in, I will admit, a slightly different form. There would again be an appeal to all the electors of the commonwealth, and the effect of that appeal would be that, after the vote was taken, the votes would be sorted out again under the dual referendum, and the result might come out-national referendum, a large majority for the lower house; states referendum, a large majority for the senate. So that we should have to face the deadlock again in a still more intensified form. We should have had the people twice saying to both houses, "You are both right."

Mr. SYMON:
The dual referendum is full of mischief!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I do not say that. It might be a good thing; but in this particular case, for this particular object, it might leave us in a worse position than before. What is the use of exposing the people and the public business to this incessant contest, and this great expenditure over a matter, perhaps, affecting vitally the interests of the whole community, if at the end of it all we are left in a worse position than before? I say again, it would be infinitely better for us to give up any idea of solving deadlocks unless we are going to solve them. It is no use playing at settling deadlocks. It may be an amusement to us, but it would, be a loss and an injury to the people, and would prove a keen disappointment to the people. Very wisely there is a provision in the constitution that it shall not be amended unless a majority of the states, as well as a majority of the population concur. That is a basic principle for an amendment of the constitution; but, unfortunately, we are put, by the other provisions of the constitution, in this position: that every conceivable proposition which may be submitted to the commonwealth parliament has to undergo exactly that same test. Unless it commands a majority of the people in one house, and a majority of the states in the other, no legislation is possible, and nothing can be done. Can any constitution work when it is absolutely necessary, in the case of every form of legislation, that there should be a concurring majority in both houses—not a concurring majority of ordinary chambers of legislature in one community—that is comparatively simple—but a community majority under the two different sets of circumstances, and on the two opposite and almost hostile qualifications? Such a constitution would work under very great difficulties. I listened with great interest to a reply which was made to my reference to the items which are to form the subjects of legislation in the commonwealth. It was pointed out to me by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Barton, that every one of these may be said to involve a state interest. That does not carry us any further. It is impossible to think of a state interest without the interest of the people in the state. The expression "state interest," as apart from the interest of every human being in the state, is an expression I cannot understand.

An Hon. MEMBER:

It means the same community!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Exactly; it means the same community. It is no use wasting time to tell me that every state community has an interest in every subject of state or commonwealth legislation. The question is not answered in that way. Every individual in every state is in the commonwealth, and in the electorate of the commonwealth; and his interest as an individual in the state is absolutely protected in the same way as the interest of every other human being in the commonwealth is protected. Take, for instance, the tariff question. Can any one fairly say that that question, with all its complexities, will ever be settled unless it is settled on the one test—the test of the majority of the people of the commonwealth?

The Hon. A. Douglas:

The small colonies would not take it!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Of course, we cannot speak finally on a subject of that sort. In a matter of taxation and trade, the interest of every person in every state is only the interest of every person in the commonwealth. He is not two individuals; he is the same individual, whatever the state or commonwealth interest. So that, while it is quite true that every state has an interest in everything, every state has not an interest as apart from the people of the state; the people of the state, and their interests, can only fall into the common lot and be decided by the general opinion of the whole commonwealth as represented in the house that frames the tariff, or it cannot be represented at all. It would be infinitely better, if we are to have no provision against deadlocks, to let the upper house amend money bills, because if some particular state, or two or three states, representing only a small number of the taxpayers, the persons interested, have the power together to do that which prevents any tariff law from being enacted because it does not satisfy them on one or two isolated points, when shall we ever have a tariff at all? This clashing of interests in tariff matters must have an end; there must be a final arbiter, and if that arbiter is not in the house which has the power to amend, how can we find it in a house which has no power to amend? It is of no use talking about the house of representatives being the arbiter, because if on some aspect of the tariff a majority of the smaller states are dissatisfied, they can prevent any tariff from being constructed by simply saying, "No." That, to me, is an intolerable state of things, from which I shrink, and it brings us back to this: If there is to be a solution of deadlocks, it must be one which must lead to finality. On this point we must all speak with great diffidence, because the difficulties are very great. While speaking earnestly, I do not wish hon. members to think that I am putting forward anything I say with any great confidence. I do not say that the proposal, which I put forward as one to be considered, will certainly be satisfactory; but it will have this improvement upon all the others, that it will be final.

The Hon. J.H. Howe:

Oh!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

The hon. member may laugh; but surely my hon. friend, as a good business man, would himself, in any important business matter, especially one which affected the interests of his own clients—people say that the matter was not quite one to be laughed at if it were left in a state of uncertainty. This is particularly and especially the case in matters affecting the tariff of the country, because in that case, if you have no finality you have no prosperity, no certainty. Surely it is not necessary to point out to all who are interested in business communities that a long fight over a tariff, absolute uncertainty as to what a tariff is going to be, is a serious evil. And this will be one of the first questions to which the commonwealth will have to address itself. The public require in such a matter that there should be finality, and they expect us to make the measure of such a character that it will be satisfactory on some basis which is fair to all. I have been endeavouring to see as far as I can, by studying the constitutions of other countries, how difficulties in those countries are met, and as the result of any study which I have been able to give to this matter, referring to those constitutions, and looking at the proposition before us now, I have come back to the conviction which I expressed when I issued my address to the people of this country as a candidate. I pointed out then all the difficulties in this matter as far as I could foresee them, and I endeavoured then to throw out for consideration a plan which at any rate would have the merit of finality. It is a plan which, although some hon. members may be strongly opposed to it, may in the end, I think, be accepted as a solution of the difficulty, whatever the conditions may be. I do not object to a dissolution. I prefer, however, that the power should be given to the executive to be exercised simultaneously or not. The matter is one which I do feel very strongly about; but I think there should be power in the executive to dissolve one or either house, or both of the houses. That is the first step, which is, I think, a highly proper step, so that the people of the country may have a voice in any matter which forms the subject of dispute between the two houses. After that appeal to the different constituencies-those of the senate and those of the house of representatives-if it be then impossible to get over the difficulty, I can find no other conceivable method which will give us finality than some provision under which the two houses would be made to sit together and settle it. But these are matters of detail. I must deal first with the main point. Now, I find that this sitting and voting together by legislative bodies is by no means so uncommon a practice as it at first seems to be. For instance, in France, under the reformed constitution, the two houses sit together, although their numbers are very different, the upper house having 300 members, and the Chamber of Deputies 584—much the quota that we have in this constitution, namely, two to one. It is the law there that, even in so important a matter as the revision of the Constitution of France, the change shall be effected in that way, the two houses sitting together, deliberating together, and voting together, in the most important question of constitutional change.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Can the hon. gentleman give us an instance in which that has been done in France?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It is comparatively a new constitution. It cannot be done at all, unless in each house there be a vote affirming the necessity for constitutional change. That is a condition precedent; but, on the two houses agreeing that there shall be a change in the constitution, the question of what that change shall be is decided by the two chambers sitting together.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Called the national assembly!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Let us look at what is done in that very mixed quantity of another country, the Austro-Hungarian Empire. We know that these federal difficulties exist there in greater force and complexity than under any constitution we have thought of here. We all know the complex elements of the Austro-Hungarian Empire; and the fact that there are two different parliaments—the Hungarian and the Austrian—shows how difficult the problem has been in that empire with its different races. There are two sets of parliaments.

Mr. SYMON:
And two executives!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Two executive governments, and all the difficulties arising from difference of race and creed and so on are solved in this way. Well, they have to solve their federal difficulties. The two parliaments each send sixty delegates—twenty from the upper house of each parliament and forty from the lower house. The 120 delegates then sit and vote together, and decide matters affecting the empire in its larger sense—war, finance, and so on. These questions are settled by a simple vote at this joint sitting. The decision of these two delegations voting together binds the whole empire. This is another case where, whenever there are great difficulties, the solution of sitting and voting together on the part of two legislative bodies has been adopted.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
Does the right hon. gentleman suggest that the senate and the house of representatives should send an equal number to the conference, as is done by the two parliaments in Austro-Hungary?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
No. The two cases are certainly not similar. There you have two great empires of independent existence. I do not think the cases are parallel. At present I am not insisting on anything; I merely wish to mention the one or two instances which I have come across where difficulties are settled in this fashion. That is all I am putting before hon. members at present. In Norway the two houses, if they disagree over a bill, meet together.
An Hon. MEMBER:

Does that apply to Norway alone, or to Norway and Sweden?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

To Norway separately from Sweden. In Belgium there is a joint sitting of the two houses in matters affecting the capacity of the monarch, the appointment of a regent, or the guardianship of the heir presumptive during his minority. The two houses sit together in Belgium for purposes of that kind. In Switzerland, while there can be no alteration of the constitution, as with us, except by a majority of the states, as well as a majority of the people, as hon. members know, in that federation there is the freest possible opportunity given for a mass vote which decides all measures of legislation. I do not need to go into it—it is much more ample than anything talked of here—but in effect that federation preserves the rights of the states by equal representation in the upper house; but, at the same time, matters of difficulty which arise between the two chambers or matters of legislation are settled by what is known as the mass referendum.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Must not the law pass both houses?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

No, the people themselves can propose a law. Now take the United States. Look at the vast powers the President has under the Constitution of the United States. The question of who is to be president is decided by a mass vote of the United States, without reference to the rights of particular states. I quite recognise the difficulties of my hon. friends about a national referendum—I do not blind myself to their difficulties at all—but, at the same time, if nothing better is proposed, if I, as a deliberative unit of the Convention, have to choose between these tangled propositions, which lead us into greater difficulties than before, and do not solve anything, I shall vote with my hon. friend, Mr. Lyne, without the slightest hesitation; because, although his proposition may be unsatisfactory to representatives of the smaller states, it has the one cardinal virtue which we must expect from any proposal under the head of solving deadlocks—that is, it gives us some chance of settlement.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I sympathise with my hon. friend's difficulties; but I shall have to vote for that proposal against the other propositions, for the one reason that it does solve a deadlock, Whether it is or is not satisfactory to some members of the Convention, as a solution of this difficulty, it is infinitely better than the dual referendum. I look upon the dual referendum as the greatest monstrosity, the most utter absurdity. I can understand a reference to the people of the commonwealth; I can understand a reference to the people of the states as people of the states; but how can I understand this double-tongued sort of appeal to the people of the commonwealth, the effect of which would be that you might get the answer "yes" from 2,500,000, and you might get the answer "no" from 600,000, and the "no" of the 600,000 would be as powerful in the dispute as the "yes" of the 2,500,000?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Is it not the same with a double dissolution?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Not if it is followed by something. This is just the position we are in. I do not recommend a joint sitting of the two houses as the most perfect course, or even as at all perfect. But, driven as we are, I think that we have practically come to a dissolution of both houses, whether at once or eventually—the hon. and learned member Mr. Symon's amendment affirms that—and having practically agreed that there shall be a dissolution of one or both houses, if necessary, now the practical question before us who are anxious to remove these difficulties is, "Are we to stop there-to be satisfied with that?" I say "No." Those of us who say "No" have to choose and say what is to follow. I say with the greatest respect, that to follow it with a dual referendum is—perhaps I used too strong language just now, and ought to withdraw those expressions, but they very roughly represented my views on such a problem—I think that it would bring the referendum into the most utter disrepute all through the world, so lame and impotent a process would it be.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
They have that in Switzerland, and it has not brought it into disrepute there!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It is an effective referendum there—it is a mass referendum.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
No!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
Not for a change of the constitution. It is the double referendum then!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I am not talking about that point. I began by admitting that on matters affecting the constitution, a majority of the states as well as a majority of the people is necessary. We have that provided for in the constitution now.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The right hon. gentleman is not right. Since July, 1891, they have had a referendum to the people of the states on matters of ordinary federal legislation.

The Hon. J.H. Howe:
And it has worked exceedingly well!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
I have not had time to wade through the mass of literature on this subject; but I have seen a list of the appeals to the Swiss electors by referendum—a mass appeal.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
I read the extract the other day!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
I accept my hon. and learned friend's statement. My hon. friend is a close student of history, and I may be wrong in that respect. But that does not at all touch the trend of my observations. I am leaving all these unsatisfactory illustrations—they are all unsatisfactory—and I am dealing with the thing as it is. I admit that the referendum has the preliminary objection that it would lead to enormous expense—even the best form of referendum would have a strong objection on that score—and when I am asked to commit myself to a sort of referendum which would go through the form of settling the difficulty between the two houses and would throw the people into confusion—compel them to go miles to vote when the votes of 500 persons because they happened to live in certain localities would outweigh the votes of 2,000,000 because they happened to live more closely together—I say that such a sort of appeal by referendum, it seems to me, is not likely to give any sort of satisfaction.

The Hon. H. Dobson:
It is consistent with a federal constitution such as we are framing!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
Does the hon. gentleman call this dual referendum a federal referendum?

The Hon. H. Dobson:
Certainly!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
Well, would it not save a great deal of time, as well as being a matter of fairness and political principle, if, instead of going through the farce of asking the big populations what their opinions were, there were a quiet referendum amongst those who really could decide the matter—a referendum among the smaller states? That would settle it. We should know where we were, and we should save expense. Why should we put 2,000,000 people to the trouble and expense of recording their votes which, under easily imagined circumstances, might not be worth the paper they were written upon?

The Hon. J.H. Howe:
You forget the overwhelming power of the house of representatives!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
If "No" can be said to them, they might as well sit down and give up the task of attempting to legislate.

The Hon. J.H. Howe:
The hon. and learned gentleman knows better than that. Numbers will always rule!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
If that is so, what is the use of making a fuss about this? It is a vague, ineffectual, attempt to hold back the tide of public opinion. You will only irritate it. You will not do any good. I do not agree with my hon. friend. He is a business man, and he knows that if he gets the constitution in the form in which it will be when we have a double dissolution and a dual referendum-

The Hon. J.H. Howe:
I am willing to leave it to the people!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
Then the hon. member would accept a mass referendum?

The Hon. J.H. Howe:
No!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
According to my hon. friend there seem to be two kinds of people in the commonwealth, one black and the other white.

The Hon. J.H. Howe:
I mean the representatives of the people, in the two houses of parliament. They will settle everything!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
Oh! the representatives of the people are the people. I never understood it in that sense before; but I am very glad to think I am the people after all, though I never tell them so when I go up for election, and I do not think my hon. friend does. There is a slight difference between the people and their representatives, and we feel that when we are going before them. It is no use talking about the referendum. What I say is this; if there is a question at issue between the two houses over which there has been a dissolution, the effect of which is to leave both houses as obstinate as ever, the hon. member must see that, supposing there were five colonies in the federation, if a referendum showed that in two colonies 2,000,000 people were in favour of a proposed change, and in the three other colonies a majority of 400,000 or 500,000 against it, the senators representing the smaller colonies would be bound in political honor and honesty to stand their ground; and the result would be that, instead of solving the difficulty, you would have put every hon. member in the senate in one immovable position, and every hon. member in the senate in another immovable position. I know what the result of that would be, and so do other members who are wise in their generation. In a great struggle, the immovable senate would always get the better of the movable house of representatives; and, instead of the commonwealth being governed by principle, it would be governed by intrigue. Those who held executive power would, in order that the progress of legislation might not be impeded, give way to the minority in a thousand underhand ways, and the minority would rule. I do not object that minorities should interpose time for deliberation and reconsideration, so that every sentiment of fairness could be brought out; but if we stand here in this chamber, before the people, having solemnly affirmed that the solution of deadlocks is necessary in this constitution, it is necessary to do one of two things: either to say that we cannot find a solution, and that we give up the task, or at any rate give up the idea that a double dissolution, and a double referendum

An Hon. MEMBER:

Let us leave it, like other things, to the federal parliament!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

That is the old point that we have now got away from, and very properly so, because the balance of the constitution cannot be left to accident. No constitution will work well if there is not in it some broad principles which will enable adjustments to be made, not by intrigue but by constitutional methods. This battle-and it is that which makes it so serious a contest in my mind, if I have any knowledge of practical politics-is as to whether, in the future necessities of the commonwealth, great emergencies are to be dealt with constitutionally in the open, or privately by intrigue, stratagem, and underhand management. An immovable senate must be victorious at last, and I earnestly submit that if we can find nothing better, in mercy to the people of Australia let us adopt this simple expedient of allowing the two houses to appeal to their constituents, and if after that they fail to agree, let us compel them to come together and decide the matter as one body.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

What majority would the right hon. member allow to carry the bill?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Well, let me get this provision inserted in the constitution, and I will talk to you about that afterwards.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[2.36]:

I feel sure that the house is indebted to the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, for the remarkably fair speech he has just made, and which has convinced me that he has carefully considered the subject from a point of view not altogether unfriendly to federation. I felt a little anxious when my very clever and talented friend, the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, paid me a few compliments this morning. I began to fear the Greeks very terribly when they were becoming civil. I admit that, as a last resource, I would make considerable concessions of my views, and try to persuade others to follow my lead, in order to bring about federation; but I am not at all clear that the time has yet come for doing this.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I will not compliment the hon. member again!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

My hon. and learned friend's speech, which, with the embellishments his taste and fancy would naturally supply, followed very much the leader of the Daily Telegraph this morning, made me rather anxious than reassured, because, although he is at present content with a double dissolution and a double referendum, he did not say he would stop there; so that, when we meet again—if we have the misfortune not to finish our work during the present session—there might be a proposal that we should have a national referendum added, as a means of curing all disorders.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I spoke about that the other day at length, and I did not want to repeat my remarks!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Is the hon. member still in favour of it?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I would vote for it, but I could not make the same appeal in its support. This is a compromise!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Yes, we are to make a compromise, and get nothing out of it. That has been the game all through, and I do not blame those who are doing it if they think they are wise in doing it, or if they think they will make us better friends by doing it. The hon. member, Mr. Symon, resisted the stand which I have taken throughout, that this provision for deadlocks is absolutely unnecessary; that, as the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, says the very possibility of deadlocks is a necessity of federation; and just in proportion as you create this bogy and destroy its possibility you weaken the cause you are guarding. "Deadlocks" is a mere term; what is meant is the difference between two houses having equal rights, the absence of that agreement which we carefully provide in our constitution must occur, for an agreement must occur before proposals can become law. The very precautions which the wisdom of our ancestors has suggested are tried to be made the subject of terror, and are called names which frighten the fearful. I agree with the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, that the term can never be applied until the difficulty between the two houses approaches a calamity. Until then there is no such thing as a deadlock. When you reach such a condition that civil war is imminent, then it might be well that you should have some remedy; but anything short of such a possibility as that ought not to deprive us of a proper constitutional check.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

That would be the time to use the provision, not to create one!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I agree with my hon. friend there. As far as the hon. member Mr. Symon's amendment is concerned, I think it is rather a pity that we did not at the present stage, at all events, adhere very strongly to the position which we took up before, that the possibility of deadlock is the safeguard of the constitution. Between the proposition of my hon. friend and the proposition of those who want the dual dissolution, I fancy experience will show there is no practical distinction. At first sight, I admit I liked the notion of the dual dissolution because it appeared on the face of it to penalise the representatives in order to get the opinion of people on the question. But looking at it more closely I saw it would work out in the same way under either of the proposals, because there would be no dissolution of the representatives if the proposal of my hon. and learned friend was carried out—that is to say, there would be a nominal dissolution. The government, as the Hon. Dr. Cockburn interjected, would be always studying the wishes of the house of representatives, and would take precious good care not to be premature in their dissolution of that House. The result would be that their dissolution would be a mere name—would have no substance, in fact. It would be mere expiry by effluxion of time of the house of representatives, and then what would happen? The government would send the senate to their account.

Mr. WISE:

We could guard against that!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I know it is very easy to say we can guard against it!

Mr. SYMON:
All I sought by my amendment was to affirm the principle, and I intended to add something afterwards!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
The more you think about conditions the more impossible they are, and the more difficult it is to formulate and explain them. I agree entirely with what fell from the Premier of New South Wales. I very humbly at previous times ventured to say the same thing. I say your double dissolution is a farce. I believe your double referendum will be a farce or I would not agree to it. I do not wish to be misunderstood a bit. If I thought that by agreeing to the double dissolution and the double referendum I would be frittering away the basis of a federal constitution I would be no party to it. But my hon. friend took a different view, and we will have to leave it. As far as my judgment is concerned I am willing to take the risk. How it will work out it is very hard to say. The similarity between institutions with which we are acquainted and this federation I decline to ically one house, there might be two or three men here who would agree to that; but there would not be more, and I am not sure that there would be one.

Mr. WISE:
It would depend upon what kind of colony you made. If you made it New South Wales, all the members from that colony would agree!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I was not referring to it from that point of view. If a proposal were made that Australasia should be one colony with two houses, with the same qualification for electors, with varying tenures of office, but both liable to dissolution at the will of the ministry, I do not believe them is one colony in Australasia that would agree to it, Yet that is substantially what we are now asked to do. That is the proposal Underlying all these deadlock arguments, and all these attempts that are being made to weaken the very essence of the federation we want to establish. Then we have precedents brought from various places, and varying arguments addressed to us by identically the same individuals from a diametrically different standpoint. The Premier of New South Wales told us that we were essentially English, that we should follow what we are accustomed to, and ought not to go to foreign countries for constitutions which arose from their own surroundings and idiosyncrasies, and which we find great difficulty in assimilating to our own temperaments.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
If you give the governor-general power to add to the senate I will agree with you!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

My hon. friend was on the question of the executive when he took that view very strongly, Hon. members who are in the habit of saying that we must have under this bill an executive established on the lines of responsible government always do take that view. Having taken that view, and having got their own way in it, they want something else. They straight away rush from dear old England, and ramble all over the Continent, taking precedents in the most ruthless and reckless way to support an argument of a diametrically opposite character. To a man of feeble intellect, who likes to see one thing at a time, these speeches become puzzling. When my hon. friend told us of these precedents from Norway, Belgium, Switzerland, and so on-

The Hon. S. FRASER:

Most of them were wrong!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

My book is dated 1890!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

These things all vary according to the opinions of the text writers. I hope it will be a warning to my right hon. friend to in future keep to one line, and that is the British Constitution.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I am going to keep to this "Lyne"!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

We are told that in Norway the two houses sit together, and that in Belgium they sit together. And as for Switzerland, I really think the Committee should present me with a testimonial if I do not refer to that country, because we have had its Constitution discussed at very great length.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Tasmania is three times the size of Switzerland, and more important!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I am very much obliged to my hon. and learned friend for mentioning Tasmania: he always does help me. Tasmania is a remarkable instance of this policy. We talk of its being impossible to work a government under a British constitution with an upper house which has the right to amend money bills. In Tasmania they do this. It is true that the power has always been disputed, but nevertheless it is always exercised. We have there an object lesson of a place which my hon. friend reminds me is larger than the model country, in which the constitution has been worked with the end of insuring the perfect freedom of the people in it, and in which this fatal power—which they say none of the colonies would submit to—of the senate amending money bills has been in force for years, and with very little difficulty.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

They say we must not do it again, but we do!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I think we have had this matter pretty well talked out before to-day; and if we are to fight it out on the true lines of federation, I shall stand by my previous vote, and try to give a stronger vote to prevent even that means of settling deadlocks being provided for. Consistency is generally what I am accused of. I stand by the words I used the other day, not before we finally depart from here, but before the Convention finally breaks up. I am not satisfied that those who ask for this now will not ask for more in the future.

Mr. TRENWITH:

What if they do? If this will clear up the difficulty, refuse them all!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

That is what I propose to do with the permission of my friends. As far as I am concerned, I would refuse it. This is no time now for compromise. This is a time for getting fresh offers which you do not bind yourself to accept. No business man would do such a thing. Even if my friends opposite bound themselves now that they would stand to this whatever happens, they could not do it. Still, we have the Premier of New South Wales who disagrees with it, and we know, therefore, that whatever we give at the present time more will be asked in the future. Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the only method we can adopt is to stand by the amendment we carried.

Mr. LYNE:

Does the hon. member think it is wise to go on with it now in view of Queensland coming into the Convention, because it will all have to be done over again?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I think it is a matter deeply to be regretted that we are not able to finish the work of this Convention. I think it is a matter deeply to be regretted that, when we were hurried through the business in Adelaide in order to enable a certain number of gentlemen to go to England, with the understanding that we were to meet in September and finish the bill, and when we all came here under that impression, we were not informed at the time that it was impossible that the Victorian Ministry could devote to the consideration of the measure the time which was necessary for completing it. Still, I recognise the imminence of the position. It is a question of postponing, I suppose; if I thought it was not, I would certainly go against any postponement. I admit that it is a question of postponing or breaking up the movement for some considerable time. Under these circumstances, what is the good of asking us for an interim session, for a sacrifice of both our intelligence and our conscience in favour of something we may think of even greater importance than an interim session unless we know whether more will not be asked for afterwards. I have made up my mind to stand by the amendment which has been moved and carried at the present stage of the Convention. I repeat my regret that, instead of that amendment being moved and carried, the representatives of the colony that require protection did not join with me in resisting all means of curing deadlocks, at all events, at the present stage of the Convention.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[2.56]:

I need not say that I am just as ardent for federation as any member of the Convention. I realise that to my own colony and to the other colonies it will be of vast benefit. In a national sense, of course, the benefits and facilities afforded to us cannot be overstated. But rather than agree to pass a constitution, which, in my opinion, is fraught with serious and grave dangers to the people-rather than see a federation that would jeopardise the liberties of the people, I would see no federation. I make this remark with great regret. I am not going to go back on my vote. It is admitted in every country that two houses are necessary for the good government of the people. I think it is generally admitted in every country on the face of this earth that the bi-cameral system is absolutely necessary. We have stripped the senate of all powers that might endanger the liberties of the people by this bill which we have agreed to so far, and now we are going to make the senate amenable to the dictation of any unscrupulous government at their own time. For the sake of my argument I will use the words "unscrupulous government."

Mr. SYMON:

It will not be unscrupulous!

The Hon. S. FRASER:

Does my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, object to the word unscrupulous"?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

From the opposition point of view they are always unscrupulous!

The Hon. S. FRASER:

I greatly respect my hon. friend's objection to the word, and for the sake of my argument I will say a designing government.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
They are all designing from the opposition point of view!

The Hon. S. FRASER:

A designing government will select their own time for an appeal to popular clamour, and my only objection to a concurrent dissolution. in the fact, and only the fact, that I am afraid that the deliberate judgment, of the people may not be given. I have no hesitation in agreeing to what I agreed to the other day, the dissolution of the house of representatives; and the opinion of the country being then given I have not the least objection to a dissolution of the senate, provided that they do not agree to the measure passed by the house of representatives. Of course it is said that that is penal. I say that the upper house is only there as a steadying machine. In every countryman the face of the earth the upper house is only there to steady the political machine.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Then why give it more power?

The Hon. S. FRASER:

You do not give it one-tenth part of the power that you give to the house of representatives. If you agreed to give it similar power, perhaps I might agree to all you ask for; but I say that you assume a position which is not a fact. You assume that the senate has similar power to the house of representatives, but that is a grossly extravagant statement to make. The upper house has no power to initiate the spending of one shilling; it has no power to increase expenditure by one shilling; it has no power to throw out an appropriation bill except by an absolute veto. It has no power even to amend a tariff bill, except by suggestion. It has no power to amend a loan bill.

An Hon. MEMBER:

It has power to veto any bill!

The Hon. S. FRASER:

It has only the bare power of saying "No" to an appropriation bill.

Mr. LYNE:

Or any other bill!

The Hon. S. FRASER:

Of course any other bill. If you do not give it power to, veto any other bill, or to make amendments, in it, what is the use of an upper house? The senate, in my opinion, is shorn of all its powers. Therefore, I fail to see why you are so much afraid of its doings in respect to its veto. I do not think there is any danger of the upper house interfering in regard to the regulation of trade, the raising of money, post and telegraphs, military and naval defences, munitions of war, and so on. I wish my right hon. and learned friend, Mr. Reid, was here. I would draw the attention of the Committee to clause 121 of the bill. Suppose it was proposed that the constitution should be amended under that clause, so as to give a national vote with regard to the navigation of the Murray, the Darling, the Edwards, the Murrumbidgee, and other rivers in Australia, would the New South Wales representatives agree to the constitution being so amended that South Australia or Victoria could regulate the waters of the Darling, the Murrumbidgee, and the Edwards rivers?

Mr. TRENWITH:
They should have their fair voice in it!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
It is quite on the cards that if that question was submitted to a national vote New South Wales would be outvoted. South Australia would be very anxious to get control over the Murrumbidgee, Darling, and Edwards waters, because they are close to their territory, and all are navigable rivers. The Victorian people might also vote for it. The Tasmanian people, having no interest in the matter, would vote either way; and the same with regard to Western Australia. New South Wales might find herself in a dilemma if you do away with state rights.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Quite right if she wanted to act unjustly with those waters!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I say that if you do away with state rights the Murrumbidgee, the Darling, the Edwards, and other rivers may be controlled by the federal parliament. There is no doubt about that. I only repeat that for the edification of the New South Wales delegates I commenced from the first in favour of state rights, and there is not the remotest chance of federation without state rights. Therefore, what is the use of wasting our time here, it we are to go back to the A B C of our education? Some months ago I issued an address to the people of Victoria, and I advertised that address practically in all the papers of the colony, certainly in all the leading papers. I will read a part of it. In that address I said:

The federal parliament shall be composed of a senate elected by the vote of the ratepayers,

Remember, "elected by the vote of the ratepayers"- or as proposed in the Commonwealth Bill by the parliaments of the several states for the term of six years, and the house of representatives shall he elected by the votes of the people for a term of three years.

I have gone further than that. I was elected on that basis.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Not much!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I had many thousands of votes to spare. The hon. member knows it.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I did not mean it in that sense. I say the hon. member was not elected on that very much!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I appealed to the voters of the colony of Victoria on that basis, and I spoke at only two or three centres.

Mr. TRENWITH:
You would have had more votes if you had not appealed on that basis!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Probably I might have had less. I say that I have gone further than that in the votes that I have given here. The other day I went further. To cure deadlocks I went further than I was justified in going. I have gone a deal further than my published address by agreeing to the dissolution of the house of representatives, and, secondly, to the dissolution of the senate.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Make the reform complete by "going the whole hog"!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I would willingly go as far as I could. As a matter of conscientious principle, I have gone as far as I can. I have been about twenty-five years in political life. Like my hon. friend, Mr. McMillan, I have declined to take office frequently. I have done so lately. I say that if we are going to refer this matter to a national vote, then we might just as well go home; we are only losing our time here in discussing it much further, because, as far as I can judge, we are going more apart instead of approaching each other. I should like, of course, to agree with others who are opposing me if I could see my way; but as a matter of principle I cannot vote otherwise, than as I did the other day.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[3.9]:
I feel myself in some difficulty in addressing hon. members on this subject a second time. I should be sorry if hon. members should think that I am taking the action which I am taking in this matter solely because I represent one of the smaller populations of the Australian continent. I do not act in this way because I represent one of the smaller states; but because I desire that the senate that we are making should be a strong body, not only in our interests, but in the interest of every one in Australia. I regret that the whole of the day should have been spent in discussing this matter. I do not think for one moment that we shall be able to throw much new light upon it, seeing that we have discussed it for two days already. It seems to me an extraordinary position to get into. A very unusual course has been taken in the matter, and I cannot help thinking that those who are responsible for it have shown us a very bad precedent and example. And I am quite certain that the course which certain hon. Gentlemen have taken, and which we have not dissented from because they seemed so very anxious about it, is not a course to which they would have assented if the representatives of the smaller states had happened to be in a minority. If, in regard to the question of the power of the senate to amend taxation bills—upon which question I voted in the minority—I had almost immediately proposed to take the course which has been taken on this occasion, I think I should have had very little support from those who were in the majority. In fact, we have got into the wrong groove altogether. Instead of going on with our business, we are rediscussing a question upon which many hon. gentlemen are not willing to accept the verdict of the majority. A great deal of unnecessary time will be expended upon it, and as a result we may not get very much nearer a solution than we should have done had we gone on with our business in the usual way. The discussion upon the matter has been allowed to be general, and I must take the same course which has been pursued by others in putting before hon. members the view I hold in regard to the matter. We are asked practically to reverse the decision at which we arrived the other day. We are asked to give up the opinions we held, to change the vote’s we gave, and to show ourselves—I think I may use the expression—weak and vacillating. But we are asked to do more than that. We are not only asked to show ourselves weak and vacillating, but we are asked to take up an undignified position, which I, for one, am not prepared to do. I do not think it at all probable that I shall change my opinions as time goes on; and, notwithstanding that time works a good many changes, which I freely admit, without a reasonable interval I think it is unreasonable to expect anyone who has given a deliberate vote on an important matter, to change his opinion. I have no knowledge as to what the views of other hon. members are. I am not an election canvasser or agent. I do not go about trying to find out whether members have changed their opinions. Therefore, I have no knowledge as to whether any one will vote differently from the way be voted the other day. All I can say is that if I find hon. members voting differently, I shall take care when the opportunity offers not to go tiger-hunting with them, as I fear they would leave me to the tiger. It has been asked by the Premier of New South Wales, and by others, why, in a case of difference between the two houses, the house of representatives should be the first to be dissolved. That question has been asked over and over again by those who really must or ought to have the solution of it in their own minds. Under the constitution under which we live at the present time, there is no power for the dissolution of the upper house. The great difference between the two houses under the constitutions with which we are acquainted is that one has the control of the executive government and the other has not. That is the great difference between the two houses of legislature in these colonies, and the great difference between the two houses we are asked to form under this constitution; and we may depend upon it that ministers who owe their existence to the house of representatives will certainly consider their wishes before they consider the wishes of a senate which has no power to control their existence. Everybody knows that I was opposed altogether to any provision for deadlocks. I hoped and felt that, under the constitution we are erecting, mutual respect and a desire to carry on the business of the country would be sufficient, as it is at the present time in all these colonies, for two houses to carry out the duties intrusted to them without any undue amount of friction. Of course there will be some friction. If the two houses would always work in accord, there would really be no need of two houses at all. Still the wisdom and patriotism of the British race has always been sufficient in the old country and in many other parts of the world to carry on government without undue friction.

Mr. TRENWITH:
In the old country they have the means of solving deadlocks!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
That means is seldom taken advantage of.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Because it is understood that the lower house must rule!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
At any rate there are no means where the hon. member comes from, and for over twenty years there has been no friction there. There may have been friction to a small extent. If there had been any serious friction I have no doubt the people would have taken means to remodel their constitution, but they have not done so. The fact that in Victoria the Legislative Council is as popular to-day as is the Assembly, shows, I think, that the people of that country are satisfied with the institutions under which they live.

Mr. TRENWITH:
The general election did not show that *****
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Hon. members have decided, against my wish, that there shall be a provision against deadlocks. Then the question arises "What provision shall there be?" The hon. member, Mr. Symon, has made a proposition, which has been termed by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, a concession. I think he called it a great concession, as coming from those who were opposed to any provision being made. We say that the provision exists now and is exercised now of dissolving the lower house. The ministries of the different colonies have that power, and they have exercised it on many occasions. They exercised it in this colony not long ago, in order to show to the Upper House what the feeling of the country was, and, I believe, with good effect. That power should remain. In addition to that, if the Upper House does not heed the views of the country, as expressed by the house of representatives, when returned fresh from the country—if it perseveres in a course adverse to the wishes of the house of representatives, then it, too, in the wisdom and at the will of the Government, should also be sent to the country. That seems to me a great change, a great advance on things as they exist at the present time. I know that in Western Australia there is no provision whatever against deadlocks. The Upper House is absolutely supreme. There is no means of coercing it except by the effluxion of time. Every two years one-third go out for re-election. There is no other means whatever of coercing that body. Although difficulties occur, still the government of the country is carried on. If it is possible in these colonies to carry on the government without any provision for escaping from deadlocks, surely this extra power given to the government to send the senate to the country ought to go a great way to obviate any difficulty that is likely to arise. A great deal has been made of the concession, as it is called, of equal representation in the senate. For my own part, I would rather not have equal representation in the senate than have it given to us with one hand and taken away from us with the other. I would much rather have proportional representation in the senate, with equal power on the part of the senate over taxation, than have equal representation with the position in which it is proposed to place the senate. The Premier of New South Wales drew a very pretty picture of 2,000,000 persons in the larger colonies being coerced by 600,000 persons in the smaller colonies. He seemed to think that the sole object of the 600,000 persons would be to try to coerce the 2,000,000 persons. He did not look at the other side of th

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Make it a three-fifths majority, and you get a fair proportion!
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I only mention this to show that what the right hon. member fears so much in regard to the smaller states, he does not seem to fear when the larger states are in question. Throughout all this discussion I cannot, help thinking that hon. members representing the larger colonies cannot forget that they have been opposed for many years to an upper house. The representatives of the larger colonies, generally speaking, come from lower houses, as we have just been told, and they cannot forget that the lower houses have been in controversy with the upper houses in the various colonies. They seem to think that the senate will be a body similar in all respects to the upper house, which they do not like. I do not think that will be the case. I am in favour of the proposal we carried the other day. In all disputes time is the essence of a solution. People are not likely to settle disputes unless there is a considerable interval of time. In our daily intercourse with each other, unless some time is given, we are not likely to settle disputes which arise. I would ask hon. members to consider what will happen under the proposal for a dual dissolution. A measure will pass the lower house, we will say, without any difficulty, and it will go to the upper house. In that chamber there is a great discussion about it. The newspapers favourable to the government will at once begin to threaten the upper house that, if they do not pass the measure, they will be dissolved. While they are considering the measure, a pistol will be held at their heads. Is that the sort of constitution we want to create in this country? Is that what we desire?-that the upper house should be coerced at the beginning-that it should be told, "If you do not pass this measure in the way that we have passed it, you will be dissolved" I They would be threatened even before they had actually come to any decision, and great disaster would result.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Is not the very same threat held over the lower house continually?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

The lower house knows well that, under its constitution, it is subject to a dissolution. It is not altogether a matter in the hands of the governor-in-council. It is generally supposed that the governor exercises some sort of constitutional right of his own as to whether he will accept the advice for a dissolution. But, be that as it may, the lower house knows that it is part of its constitution, part of what it is accustomed to-that, if it gets out of touch on any great measure with the wishes of the ministry, and if the electors have not had an opportunity of deciding with regard to that measure, its members may be sent back to their constituents. Although I am sure that, under this constitution, it will rarely occur, still, it is a constitutional position which every lower house thoroughly understands. As far as I am concerned, I am very anxious to try and work amicably with hon. members in dealing with these important matters. I have not, perhaps, given way very readily in regard to those matters that have been carried against me, because they have not been in accord with my wishes. At the same time, I have been willing to accept the decision which has been arrived at, and make the best of it. But I think the time has come when that inclination on my part will soon come to an end. If you make the senate weak, as I think you will, by providing means of coercing it, I do not think I shall be able, at any rate, to recommend the acceptance of the constitution by the people of Western Australia. That may be a small matter now; but it is the position which I am forced to take up. I do not think it lies altogether in the mouths of hon. members representing the larger states to say that they have in any way given way—that we desired to give nothing, and they have been giving way all along. If we compare the constitution bill in its present shape with the bill passed in 1891, I think hon. members will see a great deal of difference, a great change, even from a democratic point of view. For instance, the upper house is to be elected by the whole people, whereas it was proposed in 1891 to have it elected by the houses of parliament. In fact all along the line we have been asked to give way. I admit freely that I have not given way very willingly, because my firm belief is that the stronger we make the senate the better will it be for the constitution. For all that, we have had to give way, and I have accepted the verdict of the majority upon these various points. I do not think I need say more. I hope hon. members will deal with the matter as quickly as they can. I think we should be able by this time to make up our minds in regard to it. That which we do now is not final;

we shall have to meet again, and in view of that circumstance I think some decision might be soon arrived at. Although it has been done, without any ill feeling whatever, we who represent Western Australia, have been twitted with voting together on all questions. That is not altogether the case. We have not always voted together. On various occasions some of my colleagues have not voted with me. The same statement would apply to some extent to the representatives of the larger colonies. We do not find them voting in different ways very frequently. The majority of them generally vote pretty well together. After all it is only reasonable for persons who come from the same colony, whose interests are identical, who desire to pull together as much as they can to stand by one another and vote together. It has been said also that we in Western Australia are somewhat indifferent to federation, that we do not really intend to come in.
If that is so we are a very foolish people, because we have taken more trouble than has anyone else to be represented upon this Convention. Why should I have urged the legislature within three or four days of my return from England to allow parliament to be prorogued in order that ten representatives of the colony might be here at a time when their attendance was required elsewhere; why should I have urged that the whole business of the country be upset by the course I suggested, unless I thought the country was really anxious to take its part in the efforts which were made to form a federation? I deny altogether that the people of Western Australia are here for pleasure. It is altogether against my own interests to be here. Both my duty and interests require my presence elsewhere, and I can say with truth that the sooner we complete this business, and I and my colleagues can return to our homes, the better pleased we shall be. I ask only this of hon. gentlemen: If they desire that Western Australia should take any part in framing a federation for Australia, let them allow moderate counsels to prevail. We shall have a hard task, perhaps as hard a task as any of you who represent the larger colonies will have, in inducing our people to accept this bill, and to enter the federation, and unless some moderate counsels prevail, and some scheme be finally adopted which we can recommend to the people as being just to all, I feel that that great federation to which we have all been looking forward will not come to pass for many years.

The CHAIRMAN:

It has been remarked that this discussion is irregular. No doubt it is so, but then it must be remembered that the standing orders have been suspended, and that this Committee has received authority from the Convention itself to rescind one of its resolutions. Under those circumstances I felt compelled to allow the general question to be discussed.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[3.35]:

I think it would be a calamity if this Convention were to adjourn without having come to some decision upon a point which has engaged our attention for so many days. The only apology I make for addressing hon. members this afternoon lies in the hope I have that, by some amendments which have been circulated among hon. members, an opportunity will be afforded of taking divisions which will test the opinions of the Convention upon all the proposals which have been submitted. I gather that the suggestion which emanated from the Premier of this colony this afternoon is one which is growing in favour with the Convention. It has this in its favour: that it is a proposal which insures finality. No proposal to deal with deadlocks would be acceptable to the people of this colony, or to the people of Australia, which left deadlocks intensified by the provisions which would have been brought into operation. I regret very much that in this debate the question has been considered almost entirely from the states' standpoint. I have never in the discussion of this matter, or in the votes I have given considered the state-rights question as the predominant influence. The phase of the question which I have always regarded as carrying conviction to my mind has been the right of a majority under any constitution to ultimately rule. I do not think that this proposition involves the question of state rights at all, but in the whole of our discussions emphasis has been laid markedly upon the way in which the various proposals would affect the larger or smaller states. I will put one case which has been overlooked, and which might possibly happen, and I would like the smaller states to consider this aspect of the matter. The enabling act provides that the constitution shall be brought into operation after a certain procedure. Three of the colonies having passed the necessary resolution, and this constitution bill having been passed by the Imperial Parliament upon the address of those three parliaments, you might have such a state of affairs as that Victoria, New South Wales, and Tasmania would be federated. The parliaments of those three colonies might pass the necessary address to the Crown for a federation. Where, then, would be the safeguard to the small state of Tasmania? What would be the use of her having six representatives in the senate to be outvoted by the twelve representatives from the larger colonies? Has that aspect of the case ever presented itself to hon. members who have been so stalwart in their advocacy of the senate as a body to uphold the rights of the smaller states? It may, possibly, happen under a federation that the states having the balance of power would not be the smaller but would be the larger states, and all those provisions made in the constitution to safeguard rights supposed to be trampled under foot by the larger colonies would be without avail. It will be seen that the rights of the smaller states are inadequately safeguarded by the provisions of this bill; but I do not regard that aspect of the case at all. Like the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, I believe that the moment this commonwealth is established, it will be found not that lines of geographical demarcation divide us—they cannot divide us when we are one in heart, language, and feeling—but that we shall be divided by those matters of politics which now divide us in our various local concerns. We shall have conservatives and democrats, free traders and protectionists; there will be all those matters of politics which naturally divide the people of one race, speaking one language, and possessing the same amount of reasoning power. What I fear is that there may, possibly, be from time to time a refusal on the part of parliament to give effect to the will and wishes of a large majority of the people. When that occurs—and it will occur sooner or later—it may not occur very frequently, but it is a possibility that must be taken into account—when it does occur, the result will be a national calamity unless the constitution provides some elastic machinery to meet such an emergency, possibly by letting evolution take effect, rather than force a revolution by having too rigid a constitution. I am lost in admiration of a great many hon. members who hold totally different views from mine. The hon. and learned members, Mr. Symon and Sir John Downer, have been stalwart in their adhesion to their principles, and have refused to allow a safety-valve provision to be inserted in the constitution. I respect and honor them for their opinion, and I have listened to their arguments with a great amount of admiration. I will only say in regard to those hon. and learned members that I would rather see the Convention ended by a clear test—some distinct line of cleavage—than I would see a compromise of such a character that nobody would be at all satisfied with it. If we have a compromise of such a character that it is a sacrifice of liberty on all sides, we shall have a constitution which will not have any enthusiastic supporters, but critics on every hand, who will direct a deadly criticism at it, and, without enthusiastic supporters, and with criticism of that kind, the constitution will be in a very bad plight indeed. We have been asked to insert in this constitution a provision as a safety-valve. Many of the provisions offered to us are mere pitfalls, much more to be feared than the dangers of deadlocks, and I have no hesitation in characterising the proposition that has already been carried, and some others which we have been invited to consider, as offering a stone to people who are asking for bread. We have been asked, and shall be asked later on by our Victorian friends, to follow the double dissolution by the dual referendum. May I say at once that if you are going to muzzle the people by your constitution, it is dangerous to take their muzzle off just for a few short days while the election is on, and after the election is over to put the muzzle on again. It amounts to this: If you allow 2,000,000 people to know that, when they possess the will and the wish, the constitution does not give them the way to have their desires and their wills put into law against 500,000 people, you are muzzling the popular voice, and you may depend upon it that if there is any manhood in the English race, you having disclosed the power of that multitude, and having also disclosed their powerlessness under the constitution, you will do one of those things which produces revolution, and if revolution does not take place, it will simply be on account of the proverbial patience and common-sense of our race - the patience and common-sense which are enthusiastically eulogised by hon. members here, and by a large number of the politicians in various portions of the colonies. I am surprised, indeed, to hear so many hon. members who speak of being satisfied to trust to the common-sense of the people - to always abide by popular opinion - say that there is a decided objection to allowing the people to express their opinion in their own way and by their own methods, and assert that we should always take their opinion through some representative. If we are going to attach any importance to public opinion and to the common-sense of the people, it is wise, when an emergency does occur, and it is very hard to discern what that opinion is from the representatives, to let the people themselves have their say, so that they can speak for themselves better than their representatives have spoken for them. I may say at once that I see very little possibility of this Convention carrying a vote in favour of the mass referendum. I hope there is no possibility of the Convention carrying a vote in favour of the dual referendum, because it will only be an insult to the intelligence of the people, if we offer them that which practically does more than perpetuate the evil of a deadlock - which flouts the people by offering them something which is totally antagonistic to that which they require - by offering them an instrument by which the minority may again outvote the majority and so take the deadlock from inside the walls of parliament into the homes of the people and to the ballot-boxes at the hustings. A referendum of that character should have no place whatever in our constitution. I would rather have no referendum at all than one of that kind, and I hope that the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, and those other hon. members who have been so stalwart in their advocacy against the safety-valve provision, will not in any way modify their views so as to accept as a compromise that which will be more dangerous to the cause of federation than any proposal made in the bill. Until we test the matter by a practical vote I shall continue to advocate the referendum.

But I wish to point out that what we have to consider is not merely the possibility of a deadlock arising from the obstructive action of the senate; we must, in all fairness, consider that it is possible for either house so to obstruct the work of legislation as to cause a deadlock. I am not in favour of any instrument which is to be directed entirely at the senate. I go with those who say that, if you do construct this house, having defined its powers in the constitution, it is an utterly improper thing to attempt to weaken the senate by any machinery whatever. What I propose to do is to have a machine which would equally weaken -if weakness is to be an element in the proposition at all—either the senate or the house of representatives; that it shall be a two-edged weapon, one which will strike equally at the house of representatives as at the senate. I say advisedly that reflection teaches me that it is not a proper forecast of the future, and that the right hon. gentleman, Sir John Forrest, and other hon. members here, especially Mr. McMillan, are utterly in error in supposing that the senate is going to be the conservative body of the constitution. I have always held the opinion that the senate will, in actual operation, be found to be the radical body, not, perhaps, after the first election, but ere long. It stands to reason that when the people of a colony or state as a whole elect ten members—when you ask the people to vote in battalions—that party, whatever it may be, which has the best organisation is the one that will carry the whole of the states; and the chances are that, under this constitution, the radical chamber, ere long, will be the senate. Elected by one man one vote, by the whole colony as one constituency, where organisation can have the best effect, you will have all the states captured by one or other organisation. The consequence will be that where there is a wave of popular impulse on any matter that excites the people, the senate is the house that will first, most assuredly, most keenly, feel that wave of popular impulse. Therefore, it is just as well for the conservative members of the Convention—and there are conservative members of it—to have regard for that aspect of the case; and it may be well to have a check of some sort, not merely on the senate, but to have a mutual check on the house of representatives as well as on the senate. I can put a case which will commend itself to the minds of hon. members. This constitution gives power to the federal parliament to deal with all questions of currency or coinage and banking legislation. We may, at a very early period in our existence, have the question of bi-metallism introduced. We have already our silver state—we have one or two silver states—and the question of the value of silver may very soon become an important factor in federal politics. We may have that question brought up as a states question. The senate has the power of originating legislation on a matter of that kind—it is not one of the forbidden subjects therefore we may have legislation introduced from time to time in the senate in regard to the money-value of silver, in regard to our currency and coinage, and we may have that legislation blocked time after time in the house of representatives. The senate may claim that they represent public opinion, and that the popular will is not finding expression in the treatment which their proposed law meets with in the house of representatives.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

They could do nothing in such a case!
The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

It would be a wise thing, in such a case, that a deadlock beginning in the senate and carried on in the house of representatives should be met by a provision applying equally to the house of representatives, when it was the obstructive body, as to the senate, when it was obstructive. Every proposal of this character must be of a mutual character, not directed at one chamber, but at either chamber as it from time to time stops the progress of legislation. A proposition of this character is one which should receive support. The next proposal is that there may be a joint dissolution of the two houses. If a state question be involved-and that is the point which carries so many votes for or against the proposal-take my hon. and learned friends, Mr. Symon and Sir John Downer, for instance-you may be satisfied that a dissolution of the senate will produce no good whatsoever, because the men who stand up most for the rights of the states they represent are the men who will have earned the gratitude of their constituents and who may be most certain of being returned. You will therefore have the deadlock continued and intensified; but you will not have finality. We must be prepared to go further than that, and the proposal I wish to advance is that after we reach the stage when there has been a dissolution of both houses of parliament, if the proposed law be again refused concurrence in the obstructive chamber within thirty days after it has been received by that chamber, there shall be a full conference of the two houses of parliament. It seems to me that we are not giving parliamentary institutions fair play if we do not exhaust all the means available for bringing the two chambers together, and, by reasonable conference and voting, attempt to end the deadlock. It is no use to say that the parliamentary machinery provides for conferences. We know that such conferences are merely assemblies of ten men chosen from one house and ten from the other, with no voting power and no power to make any compromise unless it is one agreed upon unanimously, or practically unanimously. So that the machinery which may be called into operation-the ordinary standing orders of parliament-will be inadequate to cope with a question of this kind. We have a proposal before us to adopt the Norwegian system of joining the two houses. I am only prepared to accept that provision on the distinct understanding which was conveyed to my mind by conversation with hon. members, and by listening to the debate here, that a large majority would be against the carrying of the mass referendum. That being so, I must be prepared to take the best course I can, and I think it is no invasion of the rights of parliament to ask these two chambers, elected practically on the same basis of one man one vote, to meet together and attempt to settle their differences, and to provide that, if the estates of the realm cannot by ordinary intercourse and argument settle their differences, there shall be a vote of the people sufficiently large to insure the representation of the majority of the state interests taken, and that that vote shall bring about finality.

Mr. LYNE:
But does not the hon. member include the mass referendum in his proposal?

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
I hope hon. members will understand me. I am determined, so far as I can carry the matter to an issue, to have a vote in this chamber upon the subject of the mass referendum. I do not believe in that compromise which gives up matters before you have tested the opinions of those with whom you are working. No one would respect me if I halted at any step short of getting a final decision from the body in which I sit. It is, therefore, my intention to divide the Committee at some stage upon the question of the mass referendum.

If I get it I shall be pleasantly surprised, and I am sure that the people of this colony will be agreeable to taking it. I propose that in this full conference a two-thirds majority of those present and voting shall be necessary and sufficient to pass a proposed law with or without amendment, and that thereupon it shall be presented to the governor-general for the royal consent. I provide in resolutions 6 and 7-

Mr. SYMON:
The hon. member does not want resolutions 6 and 7 now!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
My hon. and learned friend does not want them; but until the Convention tells me by standing on the right and the left what it wants, I am going to press forward this proposal. Like my hon. and learned friend, I am a reasonable man, and, if I cannot get all I want, I am prepared to take the best I can get for the people of the country. But I am not prepared to go before the people and to say that I abandoned any principle to which I was entitled before I have been defeated upon it. With regard to the referendum, I have no doubt that if my hon. friend, Mr. McMillan, was here, I could show him that even his vote might be given for the principle. I do not regard the referendum merely as an instrument to say when a law shall pass. I regard it also as an instrument to say when a law shall not pass. That is how the referendum is used in Switzerland, and so here I propose that it should be used to prevent the passing of laws against the wishes of the majority of the people as well as to aid the passing of laws which are in accord with the will of the majority. Therefore, I propose that after the conference has finished its labour, and a two-thirds majority has passed the necessary resolution affirming the bill, it shall be lawful for the minority to petition the governor-general for a referendum to ascertain whether the law should or should not receive the royal assent; that is, that the minority, although outvoted in the conference, shall have the right to claim a referendum to veto the bill if they have the people behind them. So, if a two-thirds majority cannot be obtained in the conference, an absolute majority shall have the right to petition the governor-general to send the proposed law to the people to express their will upon it. These proposals are in a very tangled condition; but as soon as the Committee reach a stage when we can have these proposals submitted, I will propose them. They have this virtue: that every proposition submitted to the Convention can be tested upon them by an amendment. The Tasmanian proposal, which I regard as a remarkable concession, coming from so small a community, can be tested in this way. The Victorian proposal, of having a dual referendum instead of a mass referendum, can also be tested, and so can the proposal to have a simultaneous double dissolution, instead of a successive dissolution. I hope that we shall not conclude our labours after so lengthy a discussion on these matters without coining to some resolution which will give the people of the country an opportunity during the interim which must elapse between now and our next meeting-an opportunity equally with ourselves-of considering the work which we have done, and of analysing it. I hope that with these remarks I have not tended to weary the House; but I thought it was only right, having a proposition of this character to make, which would bring our proceedings to a close with something definitely done, that I should offer these remarks in explanation of the proposal I have to submit.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[4.1]:

I think it is right to say briefly that the proposal that the two houses should sit together is, in my opinion, so much waste of time. It is quite true that in France there is a provision in the Constitution that the two houses may sit together in certain cases.

Mr. GLYNN:

Is not that the case only with constitutional amendments?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Yes. But France is not a federation, and there is no question of equal representation there. The whole provision has been condemned by a writer who has been quoted already, that is Dr. Burgess. His observations are very clear in a chapter on the organisation of the state in the French Constitution. He disposes of the criticisms of one writer, whom he mentions, and he goes on to say:

There are but 300 senators to 573 deputies. This difference alone would enable the deputies to overpower the Senators in National Assembly, and force upon them constitutional revision in regard to subjects which they in separate assembly would never have consented to bring before the joint assembly. The fact is that when the constituent Convention ordained the Constitution of 1875-6 the Legitimists, Orleanists, and Bonapartists made up together the majority in that body. They constructed the Senate so as to make it the representative of royalty as against republicanism, and they meant to furnish the Senate with the power to prevent the deputies from revising the Constitution at their will.

Are we going to make provision to enable the senate to prevent the assembly from doing as they like with the affairs of the nation?

It is true that the republicans are now in a majority in the senate, but the senate is still far more conservative in its republicanism than the Chamber of Deputies, and, therefore, a conflict may still arise between the two bodies concerning the fundamental principles of the organic law. In the second place, it is conceivable that if the two chambers were composed of the same number of members, still the majority in the national assembly might not represent the majorities in the two chambers taken separately. Yea, it is even conceivable that a practically solid senate, if supported by a respectable minority of the deputies, might overcome the majority of the deputies in national assembly and force revision of the Constitution in regard to subjects which the deputies in separate session would never have agreed to bring before the joint assembly.

Mr. GLYNN:

They can only deal with matters which they have already decided in their own houses to take up. That makes a great difference!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

That is another objection. It is no provision for settling deadlocks unless the two houses choose to meet together. What we want to provide is some means of settling deadlocks when the two houses will not agree. What would this amount to? It amounts to a suggestion that wipes out the small states in some cases absolutely, and it wipes out some of the provisions which we have laboriously endeavoured to put in the constitution, most notably the provision as to money bills. As to how the thing would work out, I ask hon. members to consider for a moment. If the proposition is that a mere majority of the houses sitting together is to prevail, I should like to see the representatives of the small states who would agree to it. If it is to be anything more than a majority of the houses sitting together, I should like to know how this is a proposal which will enable the majority of the population to enforce its own will? If it is a proposal that is not to enable the majority to carry out its own will, as the Premier of New South Wales said ought to be provided, it leaves deadlocks just as possible as they will be under any other system.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

No!

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:

Let me point out why. If you are to have six colonies with six senators for each colony, and if you are to have a quota of 2 to 1, which I may tell hon. members will never be agreed to, with this provision in, you will have a minimum of seventy-two members in the house of representatives and thirty-six in the senate. Sixty-two will represent the majority, and if it is going to be a question which the dual referendum will not settle, if it is going to be a state question on which you will have the two large states against the other four small states, you must expect a block vote in the two houses whether voting separately or jointly. If you get a block vote of that kind you will never get a proper majority, and unless you provide that an absolute majority is to prevail you will have no satisfactory means of settling the deadlock. You will tell the large colonies, "You may have a joint sitting of the two houses, but you will still be thwarted."

[P.863] starts here

Mr. Glynn:

If two-thirds is the majority!

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:

That is a negation of the principle that the larger populations should prevail.

Mr. Wise:

Should they prevail?

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:

If not, the dual referendum is the proper remedy.

The Hon. J.H. Gordon:

No doubt, but members will not agree to it!

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:

Let us consider what is the proposal of the hon. member. My opinion is definite and clear that, unless you have the quota of 2 to 1, the representatives of the small states will not consent to the houses sitting together. If you have the two houses sitting together, it is absolutely hopeless to maintain the quota provision. I can speak confidently of Victoria, and I say that it will not be agreed to there that the quota should remain as it is; and, judging from a very able and unmistakable article in the Sydney Daily Telegraph, New South Wales will speak in the same voice. This extraordinary provision of 2 to 1 cannot be allowed to remain in the constitution scarcely under any circumstances, and certainly not with this so-called Norwegian scheme wedged into the constitution also. I wish to be perfectly clear and frank. My right hon. leader has gone to the very verge. There was nothing we were so pronounced against in our campaign among the electors of Victoria than this proposal of the two houses sitting together. I have left out of sight altogether for the present the possibility of conservative and liberal questions arising. We have, in our colony, an extraordinary position, some people say to my mind it is remarkably ordinary. We have a Legislative Council and a Legislative Assembly, and, if there were a proposal made there for the two houses to sit together, it would be scouted in an instant. We should have an almost inconsiderable minority in the Assembly being able to ally themselves with practically the bulk vote of the Legislative Council, and the majority of the people's representatives in the popular chamber would be out-voted at once.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Your upper house is based on property; but there will be no property qualification here!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
There may be no property qualification. But we do not know how this is going to work out. We do not know whether the one electorate is going to give us conservative or liberal representation. But if there was anything as to which the Premier, the Chief Secretary, and myself pronounced ourselves more definitely than another, it was on this single proposition which is now urged by the Premier of New South Wales, and by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers. As far as I can judge, it is simply wasting time to endeavour to carry that proposition. We have stated what we think is the easiest course to adopt. The dual referendum is admitted on all hands to afford to the small states

Mr. HIGGINS:
The Premier of New South Wales said it would be a farce!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
It is not a farce. It is an appeal from the representatives of the people when they have come to such a position of variance that they can proceed no further, and then we have a right to go to the people and say to them, "Will you maintain this state of collision?" I have no doubt whatever that the people in their good sense and wisdom will find a means to extricate themselves from it. If it is such a question that they cannot agree, that the smaller states cannot fall into line with the larger, for my part, I am willing to allow the matter to remain in abeyance, because I admit that in such a case, under the constitution as we now have it, you cannot fairly ask the smaller states to give way. But if we are going to bring the two houses together, we have not only the difficulties I have just spoken of, but this further difficulty: we allow the senate to come into the determination of questions relating to finance. Now, there has been nothing more difficult in the Victorian Assembly than to stand by, as far as we can, the provisions of the compromise with regard to finance. We do not stand in this proposal by them all. I endeavoured in vain to persuade the Legislative Assembly to maintain the clause allowing the senate to make suggestions instead of amendments. I failed there. They voted in a majority against me. We have carried it here. But do hon. members entertain the slightest doubt for an instant that the Victorian people would reject any proposal which would allow the senate to come to the decision of questions relating to finance, except to the extent of rejection?

Mr. HIGGINS:
   It is not proposed!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
   It is proposed.

Mr. HIGGINS:
   No!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
   It is proposed distinctly that if they cannot agree the two houses are to meet together.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
   My hon. friend does not do justice to his own perspicacity. He sees perfectly plainly that the senate sends down a suggestion as to a money bill; the suggestion is rejected; the senate then refuses to pass the bill.

Mr. HIGGINS:
   It is not proposed to apply the joint conferences to the cases suggested!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
   My hon. friend, if he waits a moment, will see that I am right, and will see how it works out. In the first place, the senate has the power of suggesting an amendment; the house of representatives refuses to carry the suggestion out; the senate rejects the bill, and a dissolution takes place; then the senate is called to a joint sitting with the house of representatives to determine whether the bill shall pass or shall be rejected or shall pass with amendments.

Mr. HIGGINS:
    No!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
    My hon. friend has not read the proposal.

Mr. HIGGINS:
    The proposal here is not as to finance bills!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
    It is as to everything. I can understand that the smaller states would be most particular as to these finance questions. But if you take it as to finance questions, these are the subjects we may have most difficult collisions about. However, the thing presents such terrible difficulty on all sides that I think it right to be frank with my hon. friends in this Convention, and to say that, if they want to take the shortest course of raising difficulties, it is to carry a proposal that, if carried, means, in any event, the disappearance of the quota. If it means the disappearance of the quota, it leaves the representation of the house of representatives to grow with the population, and ultimately to swamp the senate. If it does not, it means absolutely the rejection of the proposal. I put it to my hon. friends whether they will not do what was done before, either take the double dissolution or the dual referendum with or without the double dissolution, or else put us in the position of voting for the national referendum.

Mr. SYMON:
    Is the hon. member prepared to take the dual referendum without the dissolution of the senate?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
    Certainly. We have advocated the dual referendum as a provision against deadlocks. We proposed that from the very first, and when it was put to us by some hon. members that parliamentary institutions required that there should be something between the deadlock and the referendum, we reluctantly consented to that. We have not asked for the double dissolution to be put in between the two. We met the small states fairly.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
    Is the hon. member willing to accept that if we accept the other?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
    Certainly. My right hon. friend Sir George Turner's amendment now standing on the notice paper speaks of dual referendum, and of that only. I would like to bring the attention of my hon. and learned friend, Mr.
Symon, to one very important matter. In the Constitutional Committee, in Adelaide, I submitted a series of proposals which now stand exactly in the form in which the South Australian Assembly has passed them. In them I provided that, in certain cases of deadlock, there should be either a dissolution or a referendum of the kind I have mentioned. I saw afterwards that that might not be fair to the smaller states—that it might put into the hands of the executive of the day the power to dissolve the senate, and in my further proposals I struck that out, because I wanted to stand fairly and properly with regard to equal representation and with regard to the smaller states, and then our proposal was that we should have a dual referendum. To my mind, that would settle nineteen-twentieths of all the questions that might arise. In the residuum, if it is a question that concerns state rights as such, I admit at once that that is a thing which should not be forced on the smaller states by the larger populations. But if we are to be told that we are not to have even that much, if we are to be told that the senate is to force itself into the consideration of these other questions, to insist upon sitting with the house of representatives, and still to have no provision that the majority of the two houses shall prevail, as is the case in France, if I remember rightly; and if we are to be told also that there is to be no security for settling deadlocks, even in that case, I say we are asked to give up a great deal more than we were ever called upon to give up. We are asked to concede a matter we pledged ourselves absolutely, against, and I see no prospect whatever of carrying it.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[4.18]:

With the hands of the clock pointing to the hour when this Convention must adjourn, it will be a mistake to delay hon. members by any further remarks than are necessary to state plainly the position which I take. From the first I have been an advocate of the scheme proposed by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, for the dual referendum; but it appears to me that no hon. member who has followed the debates during the last two sittings can have come to any other conclusion than that the dual referendum will not be accepted, at any rate, by New South Wales.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Yes, it Will!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

We have the clearest expression of opinion from the leader of the Government that it will not.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It will be accepted in Victoria!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
We have the clearest expression of opinion from the right hon. gentleman, Mr. Reid, who is the leader of the Government here, and we have the clearest expression of opinion from the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, who is the leader of the Opposition here, and everybody who reads the influential newspapers of Sydney, all of us who have been mixing with the people of Sydney during the last ten days must have come to the same conclusion, that the dual referendum will not be accepted by New South Wales. It is of no good to engage in a war of wits or a war of wills if we see that no practical result is to come from these fights. So that I am going to be a pervert from the scheme of my hon. friend opposite, not because I do not still think it is the best thing, but because I think it is one to which this Convention, at any rate, will not agree.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The hon. member might have told us so a day or two ago. It might have saved a lot of time if he had.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

The proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, was not then before the Convention. Again, I suppose one may be pardoned for leaving his moorings in a storm like this if he can find a better anchorage. I think the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, is one which solves the difficulty practically-not the best solution, by any means, but the best which this Convention will accept.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

You do not adhere to the quota principle!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

The quota principle must stand; that is basic.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

There is no hope of that. I can assure the hon. member!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

I was a little surprised when I found my hon. friend, for a time, the ardent champion of the small states when he was championing this proposal.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I occupied the ground which I had taken up all along!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

The hon. member has always been very logical and very fair. With regard to the quota, as a basic principle, it must stand. I think that the suggestion which has been made is one which will meet the views of the majority of the Convention. It is a practical, common-sense way out of this difficulty, involving the subsidence of opinion all round, a compromise on all sides, and the preserving of the working of the constitution by practical methods.
It is quite clear, on the one hand, that the national referendum will not be accepted by the smaller states, and it is equally clear that the dual referendum will not be accepted by the larger states.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

One can only take the opinion which has been expressed by hon. members and by the public. The suggestion of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, meets the difficulty splendidly, and it had the advantage of being fairer, I think, to both houses than the suggestion of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, because his proposal referred only to legislation initiated in the house of representatives, and has no correlative application to legislation initiated in the senate. By this proposal the senate would have the same rights as the house of representatives with regard to legislation which, having been initiated in the senate, may be blocked in the house of representatives. To that extent it clearly strengthens the position of the senate. This proposal also has the advantage of cheapness. The referendum would be immensely costly; but here is a simple method of obtaining the expression of the will of the people by a fair majority of representatives. If no clear and certain sound, as far as the will of the people is concerned, can be gathered from two-thirds of both houses sitting together, then, as suggested by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, the bill may well re-

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It is an utter impossibility; they will never consent to it. Take the press of this city!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

The hon. member referred to the press of Melbourne!

The CHAIRMAN:

I would ask hon. members not to refer to press comments!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Except so far as they may be mentioned as a part of public opinion I will not refer to any particular paper. But it is competent, I presume, to refer to the opinions of the press as representing the opinions of the public. I am not going to detain the Convention. I suggest that when the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, moves his motion in detail, that he should strike out in subsection III the words "and the senate," leaving the executive to dissolve only the house of representatives. With that exception, I shall vote for the proposal. I shall support the proposal made now, inclusive of sub-section v.
The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
I should like to draw the attention of the Attorney-General of Victoria to the speech delivered by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, who was not in the chamber when the hon. member quoted him as not being in favour of the dissolution of the senate. The right hon. member, Sir George Turner, on Friday, spoke very strongly against one house being dissolved without the other, and went on in this way:
I cannot see my way to ask the Convention to support a constitution in which, in the first instance, the house of representatives, which may be in the right, should be penalised without at the same time penalising the other house.
The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
As a sole remedy for deadlocks!
The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
I assure the hon. member that if he looks at the speech he will see that Sir George Turner strongly objected to one house being dissolved without the other being dissolved at the same time.
The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
That is quite consistent!
The Right Hon. C.C. Kingston (South Australia)[4.25]:
I hope that if the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, has expressed the opinion just quoted by the right hon. and learned member, Mr. Reid, be will stick to it, because I am inclined to think that we shall be making a, great mistake if, in a matter of this sort, we free the senate from the responsibilities to its electors to which we subject the members of the house of representatives. I have been prepared in connection with federation to recognise the necessity for allaying the fears of the small states that their interest will not be properly safeguarded. With this object I have been a, willing party to the creation of the senate, and I am prepared to give that senate every power which is necessary for the protection of state interests, but I am not prepared to go further. Certainly I am not prepared to put the senate in this position—that it can with immunity throw permanent obstacles in the way of the accomplishment of the popular wish without the slightest responsibility to the people who sent them there, and without the risk of being properly punished as a responsible house ought to be punished by the verdict of the constituencies an the question at issue. Something has been said about the disadvantages to which the senate might be subject by a provision of this description. One eloquent representative draw a very touching picture of the state of subjection to which a weapon of this sort wielded in the hands of an opposite party would naturally reduce the party which was threatened. But what is the position as we find it to-day? What is the position in view of the amendment that has been adopted at the suggestion of Mr. Symon? It is this: that in discussing a matter of this sort the senate can rest upon their oars utterly disregarding the force of the arguments advanced by members of the house of representatives, and tell them plainly that they will not listen to reason unless that house goes to its constituents and comes back armed with a fresh mandate from the people. Then the senate will not be in a position to be punished for their misinterpretation of the views of their constituents. After all this is done, they can hark back and agree to some compromise which they ought to have agreed to in the first instance. Look what would be the result to the house of representatives. The country has been put to an expense which might have been avoided. Members of the house of representatives have been put to an expense and inconvenience from which they ought to have been free. They come back, practically told by the country that they are right, and yet nothing whatever is to be done to the senate, and they are to be encouraged in a repetition of the same course with impunity. It seems to me that, in the natural order of things, seeing the greater frequency with which the house of representatives goes to the country as a whole, the presumption should be in favour of the house of representatives, in a serious matter of this sort-of course, nothing, but a serious matter would be made the subject of a deadlock-more accurately representing the country and the feeling of the constituencies, which both houses are equally supposed to represent, than the senate itself. Why, then, should the senate be put in a position to send members of the house of representatives to their constituencies without going themselves? Surely there

Mr. HIGGINS:
Each to face the same music!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
To adopt the expression of the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, they should each face the same music. There is no doubt that quarrels of this sort will be infrequent. I think, seeing the way we have provided for the creation of these two houses-responsible alike to the same constituencies-that we have very little reason to fear that they will often occur. Still when they do occur they may be of the greatest importance, and seeing that each house, from its constitution, is supposed to give effect to the will of the same constituency, although voting in different groups, surely in the question which will be at issue as to which is faithfully representing the view of the constituencies, both should be treated alike, and asked to obtain a mandate from the people whom they profess to represent. It is possible that, under such circumstances, the verdict of the country might be practically "a plague o'both your houses." There is no doubt whatever that the country would be disposed-and it seems to me properly dis-disposed-to resent an unnecessary quarrel involving the state in an expenditure of the character to which I have referred. If you expose only one house to this responsibility, you arm it with a weapon which will be used to the disadvantage of the other house and to the injury of the community; and I trust, under those circumstances, no such provision will be obtained. I do not find fault with the amendment which has been carried at the instance of the hon. member, Mr. Symon, except to this extent: that I take it that it is the final provision which he intends to propose in this matter.

Mr. SYMON:

No!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I am glad indeed to hear that it is not. It was, I understand, suggested at the time it was moved, as an adequate provision for meeting the mischief of a deadlock. I trust that we shall add to it at least a further provision. Taken as it is it recognises this position: That when there has been a dissolution of the house of representatives in the middle of the struggle, and the new house reaffirms the position which was taken by the dissolved house of representatives, there shall be a power on the part of the executive to send the senate to its constituencies. I think that is following out the line of argument which was used by the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, who attempted to draw some line to define the house which should be sent to its constituencies by considering which was last from the country. I have suggested that, in the natural order of things, the house of representatives will be the body last from the country; but it is possible to be otherwise. But possibly that object might be met by giving to the executive in a case of that sort the power to send to the country the chamber in respect of which there was the least interval as regards the senate from a periodical election, or, as regards the house of representatives, from a general election. No doubt there is some reason in that, but arbitrary rules as to which House you are going to send seem to me, to some extent, objectionable; and although the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, has put it that there may be a warmth of feeling which might well be avoided when two houses appeal to the constituencies, at the same time it strikes me that, in the heat and clash of popular opinion, both sides being fairly put by those who are contesting the constituencies, you are more likely to get a true verdict as regards the popular will than are you under any other circumstances—than if one house went at one time, and the other house went at another. Provide for the simultaneous dissolution, and it seems to me you will have this: Not only will there be a great disinclination on the part of both parties to bring anything of the sort about, but if they are plunged into it, at least both sides of the case will be fairly put to it, and you will get a fair verdict which will enable you to form a correct conclusion as to who is really in the right and who is really in the wrong. I am afraid that those who have already gained the victory will not willingly listen to anything in the shape of an abandonment of the amendment which they have already carried. I would not press for anything of the sort; but I would ask for an addition in the way of conferring on the executive a power of sending the two chambers to their constituencies, subject to certain safeguards, which will prevent this power from being used without due consideration. I will not suggest all the details of these safeguards; they can be fixed after we agree to the principle. It seems to me, however, that we ought to provide for the carrying of the subject of the deadlock in the house of representatives, or it might be in the senate, in two consecutive sessions, with a certain interval. Where you find, under those circumstances, that you cannot get the houses to agree, then I put it, as they substantially represent or are established for the purpose of representing the same constituencies, only in different groups—either they are doing so and will be strengthened in their position by an appeal to the constituencies, or they are not doing so, and ought not to be permitted to continue in that course. Here I may say this: something has been said as regards the parties into which the federal parliament will resolve itself. Something has been said—it may be mistakenly—as to the parties into which this Convention is resolving itself. I do not believe, when we have the federal parliament established, that we shall find parties of small states against large states, or anything of that sort. We shall be liberals and conservatives; it may be free-traders and protectionists. Free-trade and protection seems to me to be a matter natural to be settled in the early stages of federal history, and will not permanently divide the various parties as the other classes to which I refer. But it strikes me that, in a matter of this sort, every liberal instinct compels us, who class ourselves under the category of liberals, to vote in favour of the popular control, not of one chamber or the other, but of both chambers, and of the solution by an expression of the popular will of any difference as to whether or not these two chambers, owing their existence to the popular breath, on the same broad franchise, on the matter of quarrel are or are not really representing the constituencies which they profess to represent. I can well understand that, either here or anywhere, a strong conservative feeling which seeks to justify the creation of a body designed for permanently checking, blocking, and baffling the popular will, will strive for the purpose of removing one or other of those chambers from the popular control, knowing full well that for conservatism to achieve the control of one of those chambers their end is encompassed, because progress is impossible without the consent of both. With regard to a simultaneous dissolution at the will of the executive, is there any representative who thinks that that will be lightly exercised, and punishment extended, not only to those who are supporting the opposition view in the house of representatives or in the senate, but punishment wantonly inflicted on ministerial supporters? I am sure representatives generally will see that it is impossible to apprehend any position of that sort. The power may, therefore, be safely left to the executive to refer these matters for the decision of the people in the knowledge that that power will be exercised with the utmost discretion, seeing that it will affect alike ministerial supporters and ministerial foes. Then, suppose we have a dissolution of both houses, and by the verdict of the people of the states the senate is justified, and by the verdict of the nation as a whole the members of the house of representatives are supported in the attitude they take up what will be the position then? Some have said a national referendum, others have advocated-a dual referendum. When I spoke on this matter first, I said I would be delighted if we could provide for a separation of cases involving state interests and those having no such effect; the one in which a dual referendum might be necessitated, and the other in which it could not be justified-and I think we can, if we seriously make the attempt. The great majority of cases will not, to my mind, involve state interests, and, therefore it would be well to generally provide for the solution of a deadlock, after a double dissolution, by a national referendum. I think I expressed-myself pretty clearly on this point at an early stage of the debate. I am willing to submit all these questions to a dual referendum, while, at the same time, I am not willing to submit them all to a national referendum. Take a question affecting the waters of the river Murray. That is a case in which state interests are likely to be particularly involved. We have created a body representative of the people-the house of representatives-and we have created another representative of the states-the senate-and I think, in a matter of this sort, where the individual interests of a state as a state might be so seriously involved, before any action is taken when a deadlock has occurred, you ought to provide for the two majorities as a mode of guarding the existing condition of affairs.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

There are many other points!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

There are a number of other points; but I am only addressing myself to such as occupy my attention at this moment. No doubt, the other points will be more satisfactorily dealt with by others. What I suggest is this: that, while you provide for the national referendum generally, you should give a power to a certain section, a small but representative proportion, of the house of representatives, to demand a national referendum where they consider that state interests are involved.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Would not the opposition, in almost all cases, be strong enough to carry the demand for the dual referendum, so as to embarrass the ministry?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I do not think so. I trust that those who are called upon to discharge their important functions-the members of one or other of these high and responsible bodies-will do so with some due regard to the principles on which this constitution is framed, and will not wickedly and want only take advantage of a provision such as that which I suggest. The power of demanding a dual referendum I would give to one-third of the house of representatives, or to one-half of the representatives of half the states in the house of representatives, and I would provide for the purpose of guarding against abuses of the character suggested by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Higgins, that the final referendum should be demanded by affirming a proposition that the question affects, not only the interests of the commonwealth, but also the interests of any particular state or states.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Would not that allow the smaller states to dictate to the larger states?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

No. This is the position I take: that in purely national questions, when there is no suggestion of any necessity for interference by the representatives of the states in state interests, the nation should rule. I think that is a principle from which we cannot get away. At the same time, in state questions, in matters in which state interests are really involved, we have created a senate for the purpose of guarding those interests, and we ought to give it an effective power. We ought not to allow the senate within its proper jurisdiction to be overruled by any other persons than its own constituents. The national referendum, alone would enable the senators to be overrated by—I am justified in using the word—other than their own constituents, because, although they are the same people, they are voting in different groups. The dual referendum will throw around them the protection of the groupings which is provided in the state interests. Is it not possible to differentiate between the two classes of cases? The case of the Murray waters within our own boundary is surely a matter in which we have a risk to the protection of the dual majorities. Take, on the other hand, matters of the character you will see referred to from time to time within the powers of the federal parliament—matters relating to marriage and divorce, the guardianship of infants, and other questions.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON: Do you not think that divorce may be a very vital state question?
The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON: No; I do not think so. I think it affects the individual and the nation. It seems to me that it is intolerable to say that in a matter of this sort—say of marriage and divorce—the senate may block the way of any advance, may practically negative reform and re-enact the existing law by the support, as has been put by my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, of 600,000 people—who may prevent, in that respect, effect being given to the wishes of 2,500,000, or even a greater number. Is that a fair thing? Each individual in a matter of that sort is equally interested. It is a national question, in the gravest sense of the term. It is not a state question; and, in a matter of that sort, the majority

The Hon. J.H. GORDON: Still the provision is open to the objection that there is no finality in the dual referendum!
The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON: There is no finality, and there ought not to be in a federation. There ought not to be conferred on the representatives of the nation power to overrule the representatives of the states, except by the means to which I refer, that is, a dual majority where state interests are concerned.

Mr. LYNE: How do you provide for that?
The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON: I do not intend to provide for it at all. I am prepared to provide for the overruling of a minority by a majority when the question is a national question, and not a state question. I take it that the federal idea, the essence of a federation, lies in the erection of a second house in which all these safeguards are provided, and where state interests will be duly conserved. Whether you give the power of control in the first instance, or in the end, it is the same thing. I do not think that where there is really a clashing of interests the representatives of either house should be compelled to give way; but I do think that upon national questions which would naturally chiefly occupy the attention of the federal parliament, the power of the majority ought to prevail. I think also that a provision can be adopted enabling it to prevail, at the same time safeguarding the rights of a minority on state questions in the way to which I refer.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Suppose that we cannot get the national vote, and the states vote to agree on a tariff!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

Does the hon. gentleman think that a tariff is a state or a national question?

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think it would be treated as closely affecting the states, if any question is to be so treated!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I think there is a good deal to be said in favour of its being considered a state question, but at the same time I think that matters of the sort should be dealt with in the way I described. If there had been a dissolution, and if the members had come back at issue-and I make bold to say there seldom will be such a thing, because they will soon agree if each of them have the same liability to a dissolution-but if there were a dissolution, and members came back disagreeing, there could, if the facts warranted it, be an affirmation that state interests were involved by a representative section of the house of representatives, by one-third of the whole number or one-half of the representatives of one half of the states. The doubt would then be solved by those who said that it was a state question and required the protection of a dual majority.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Under that arrangement 600,000 persons might stop the passing of a tariff desired by 2,000,000!

Mr. LYNE:

There should be a mass referendum!
The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

If the hon. member says that the will of the people should prevail to the extinction of state interests, I am not going with him, and so far as that is concerned, he may go alone. I am going to the extent I have indicated, which I think is a fair thing. Upon national questions let the nation be supreme, irrespective of the groups into which it is divided, and the artificial boundaries which appear upon the map; but upon questions which are alike of national concern and peculiarly affecting state interests let us give to the people of the states that protection which every true federation affords. Let us throw around them the protection of a dual majority—a majority of both houses—and if you cannot get that, let existing affairs wait until you do. I do not think that there will be much suffering as the result. As regards the way in which the thing would work out by way of figures, I have taken it that under the existing conditions the house of representatives would be composed of 76 members, of whom New South Wales would have 26; Victoria, 24; Queensland—and I am sanguine as to Queensland being with us—9; South Australia, 7; Tasmania, 5; Western Australia, 5; 26 of these representatives who were willing to take upon themselves the responsibility of saying that state interests were involved in any particular question, could demand the protection of a dual majority. Going a little further, and taking one-half of the representatives of one-half of the states, and applying that provision to the smaller states, then four South Australian, three Tasmanian, and three Western Australian representatives who set their hands to a declaration of the character to which I have referred could ensure a similar result. What more is wanted? It would not be right and proper to intrust this definition of state rights to a majority to the extinction altogether of the views and wishes of a minority. I take it that no poll would be demanded unless there were some real ground for it.

Mr. LYNE:

Could a number of small states demand that the referendum be a state referendum upon the question, for instance, of the tariff?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

A majority of the three states to which I have referred could affirm a resolution, but they would not be likely to do it lightly; it would be done with a due consideration of the constitutional provisions relating to the scheme. The affirmation of a resolution that state interests were involved in the question would ensure to the states, on whose behalf they spoke, the protection of a dual referendum, and they ought to have it. This is the position: on one side we have those who claim a national referendum in all cases; on the other hand, we have those who say that there shall be a dual referendum in all cases. For my part, what I want to do—and I suppose we all wish to do that—is to bring about a fair agreement among ourselves. I think it would be a mischievous thing if, with the weight of one side or the other, a resolution were carried by a narrow majority which the other side bitterly resented. It would be infinitely preferable, although it might involve some small departure from principle, that we should agree upon a scheme which we could all go to our people and recommend; and feeling as I do that this is a fair middle course between the two schemes—a national referendum and a dual referendum—I suggest it for the consideration of the Committee. As a usual thing a national referendum would be preferred, and upon questions of state interests a dual referendum would not be required unless there were some fair reason to ask for it. In other words, there would be a national referendum, unless a dual referendum were asked for.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

The size of the majority is a matter of detail. I have provided that there shall be a representative minority, and a representative minority would not claim to exercise a power of this sort unless they thought they were fairly entitled to it. It would be a question of state interests or no state interests, or, in other words, a national referendum or a dual referendum. A national referendum could always be discarded in favour of a dual referendum if there were fair cause for it. That is secured by giving a minority the power to call for, a dual referendum. I would just like to point out before I sit down that a dual referendum will be ineffective unless a majority of the states vote in a way different from a majority of the people. If the matter is so clearly a national one, or it is so hopeless to expect that the individual states will overrule the verdict of the nation, that neither one-third of the house of representatives, nor the representatives constituting the majorities of three states, can be got to ask for a dual referendum, there is no good reason, in such a case, for requiring the dual referendum, and it should not be taken. I am sorry that, in a matter of this sort, there seems to be such a conflict between the two cases of the national referendum and the dual referendum. I do hope that some means of getting out of the difficulty may be devised satisfactory to us all. I should not have risen unless I had thought that it was the duty of every hon. member who could make a suggestion which might, by any possibility, be of use on this occasion, to do so, and I shall indeed be glad if my observations have, in the slightest degree, contributed to such a result.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[5.1]:

If this debate has done nothing else, it must have removed the misapprehension that was evidently current this morning, that the question before the Committee was one that divided the representatives of the larger states on the one side from the representatives of the smaller states on the other side, and perhaps no speech has contributed more to the removal of that very injurious misapprehension, than the speech of the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston. His suggestion has been before the Convention two or three days, and I venture to think that it possibly contains within itself the germs of a sound solution of this question, which is rendered difficult, not because it presents any intrinsic difficulties of fact which have to be faced, but because we are grappling with an unreality-something which in our hearts we all know to be an unreality-and which we are endeavouring to grapple with only in order to remove popular misapprehension and popular alarm.

An Hon. MEMBER: We dispute that!

Mr. WISE: I recognise as fully as any one the necessity of devising some method that, in the last resort, should the two houses fail to agree, will enable some decision to be arrived at. But I see clearly, what I do not think any one of us has much doubt about—that the occasions when these difficulties can arise are so rare, so unimaginable, that for all practicable purposes we may regard them as negligible. There is only one form of constitution of which I know under which a deadlock cannot occur, that is, a personal despotism. Wherever you have a constitution of checks and balances, you must run the risk that, at some period or other in the movement of the machine it will stop. I have always understood that deadlocks are the price which constitutional nations pay for the benefits of constitutional freedom, and when we are putting together a federation composed, as ours will be, of a union of independent states, the price which we will pay for federation is the possibility that those states may at times think their interests are so interfered with that they will prefer to cry "halt," and leave things as they are. None the less, it is clear that that power of stopping progress, in remote but conceivable contingencies, may act as a check on the national development of large portions of the continent; and, therefore, that some means should be devised to give effect to the national will, when the national will is involved, appears to me to be highly desirable. I do not know that any scheme has been presented which would have that effect, except the scheme of the right hon. the Prime Minister of South Australia, which by clearly separating national interests from state interests, and by leaving the national will to take effect in all ordinary matters, and imposing on the representatives of the states the responsibility of declaring what matters are, in their opinion, matters vitally affecting the states as states, draws that line of demarcation which we cannot draw now because we cannot see how the powers given in this bill will affect on the one hand the states, or on the other hand the commonwealth-and which, while it draws that line, draws it with a hand that is responsible to the people of Australia and to the people of the states. I admit that even under that scheme there may be cases in which what is called finality will not be obtained. But there is finality of two kinds. There is that sort of finality which was illustrated when the giant went out hunting with the dwarf, agreeing to share the spoil on equal terms, and when there arose a difficulty about sharing the venison the giant pointing out that there was not enough for him, and the dwarf insisting that if their appetites were kept within bounds there was enough for both, and each voting and not getting finality-the giant swallowed the dwarf first and the venison afterwards. That is the sort of finality which might be brought about-the larger states putting an end to the national aspirations of the smaller states by the exercise of their voting power. This sort of finality does not appear to me to be just, and we, by our votes, have declared that it is not the sort of finality intended under this commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The small Jack killed the big giant, and so the minor states might be able to kill the bigger states!

Mr. WISE:

That is a reason why I, for one, think that the larger states will not exercise their power any more than the smaller states will exercise theirs. We have been going into an agreement about which alarms have been excited, and it is our duty to allay those alarms. We may think that they are ill-founded; but possibly we are wrong, because a majority of hon. members are against us; but still, alarm existing, we must devise some means of saying it without endangering the fundamental compact which lies at the basis of this constitution. I would not have risen to take part in this debate, after the masterly constitutional address of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, were it not that I have been compelled somewhat to change the position I occupied at Adelaide on this question. The amendment that was carried by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, the other day, and against which I voted, was the same amendment I myself proposed at Adelaide, and on that occasion the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, was one of my most vigorous opponents. Times have changed since then.

Mr. SYMON:
The hon. and learned member convinced me!

Mr. WISE:
Having convinced the hon. and learned gentleman by the arguments I used then, I hope that I shall convince him by the arguments I use now.

Mr. SYMON:
They are not so good!

Mr. WISE:
What has convinced me are the arguments used by you, sir, in your speech in opening the debate at Adelaide, and which suggested a matter upon which all of us have been reflecting ever since, in dealing with this question, when you pointed out to us that the riddle to be solved was how to reconcile responsible government with the federal system. It appears to me that the only solution of that riddle is to place in the hands of the executive, which is the driving power, the whole control of both parts of the parliamentary machine; for to allow one part of the machine to exercise control over the other is to tie the hands and weaken the power of that body on whose vigorous initiative the whole success of responsible government must depend. I quite agree that the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, was right from his point of view, when, in answer to me, he said that, under our present system of responsible government, it was sufficient for the government to have power to dissolve the assembly, and that, then, after the dissolution of the first chamber, the second chamber would give way. My hon. and learned friend, from his point of view, made a great concession in allowing the second chamber to be dissolved; but, there is this difference between the constitution which we are creating, and the constitutions to which we are accustomed: under the new commonwealth constitution we shall know no such thing as constitutional conventions. All those devices, those traditions of elasticity which soften the conflict between the two houses—which act as buffers between them—will be non-existent. Each house under the Commonwealth Bill will act within clearly well-defined lines laid down by the constitution, and will not only be justified in acting, but will be bound to act, up to the extreme limits of those lines. Further than that, each house will, as has been many times pointed out, appeal to different constituencies whose authority is final. Therefore, we cannot rely upon any of the old considerations for overcoming the differences between the two houses if we have to see whether some new device cannot be invented to give to the executive the same authority over the parliamentary machine under the new system as it possesses under the present system. I fail to see that there is any possibility of giving this power unless you impose upon the representatives in the second chamber that full sense of individual responsibility for every vote they give under which every member of the house of representatives must lie. I recognise that unless the power of dissolving the senate is possessed by the executive, you may have votes given in the second chamber from personal ill-will, from a desire to obtain popularity in a particular constituency, or from any motive other than that which pays regard to the broad interests of Australia as a whole. It is to prevent that, and to secure that every senator when he gives his vote does so at the risk of being called upon to answer for it to his constituents, not only in the future, but immediately, that it is necessary that the executive should have power to dissolve the senate. I am not going to repeat the arguments which have been used; and, indeed, I almost owe an apology to this Convention for putting forward my own views when they so much resemble the views which have been expressed by others. But it seemed to me that I should be lacking in candour if, holding such a different view upon this matter from that which I took in Adelaide, I did not explain the reasons which had brought about the change, in the hope that what had weighed with me would weigh with others. When the dissolution of the senate has been agreed to, I am prepared to accept any proposal, whether the dual referendum or the meeting of the two houses, to secure finality. I believe there are many who share my view that we should accept any proposal that would commend itself to the majority. The danger which we are trying to meet does not appear to me a real danger; but still it is necessary to provide some means to meet it in the remote possibility of its arising. Therefore any means to preserve state interests, when the interests of states are affected, will be cordially supported by me. The Right Hon. Sir George Turner proposes to omit the word "if." If that word is omitted, the first result will be to create a blank, in which he proposes to insert the following words:-

Provided that in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives, the proposed law may be referred to the direct determination of the people as hereinafter provided.

If that amendment is put, I shall propose to amend it by inserting after the word "representatives" the following words:-

Alone in the first instance, both houses of parliament may be dissolved simultaneously: Provided that the senate shall not be dissolved within a period of six months immediately preceding the date of the expiry by effluxion of time of the duration of the house of representatives. And if after such dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendment.

If my proposal is carried it will give an alternative to that already carried by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, the alternative being that in lieu of the course confirmed by the carrying of the hon. and learned member's amendment both houses may be dissolved, provided and here is the safeguard for the security of the senate—that the dissolution of the senate shall not take effect within six months of the period at which the house of representatives would expire by effluxion of time. That is to say, to guard against the danger, suggested by one of the representatives of South Australia, of the power of dissolution being recklessly used when the house of representatives is just about to go to the country, in order to punish the senate and involving no punishment of the house of representatives, I propose that the senate shall not be dissolved at any time within six months before the natural expiry of the life of the house of representatives. That is a safeguard against the abuse of the power, while the possession of the power would be a weapon to insure, and the only weapon which will insure, to the executive the proper control of the parliamentary machine. If the amendment be carried, we can afterwards discuss what should take place in the event of the dissolution not giving satisfactory results—whether the referendum should be adopted, or whether we should provide for a meeting of the two houses. At the present moment, I do not see my way to support a proposal for the meeting of the two houses before any dissolution takes place, or before the power of dissolution has been given to the executive, because, as the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, pointed out, the result might be that the majority of the senate might conspire with the minority of the house of representatives to put out a ministry which was responsible to the house of representatives, and which had a majority there. If that ministry went out of office, what could the incoming ministry do, because it would have a minority in the house of representatives? Representative government could not be carried out under these conditions. Therefore, as this device of the meeting of the two houses is only to be employed as a last resource, I shall be prepared to trust to the old, well-known methods of giving to the executive government full control of parliament, and to trust them to prevent its abuse, and, if possible, its exercise.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria):[5.18]

This matter having been so fully discussed, and I having spoken on a previous occasion with regard to it, I do not intend to detain the Convention at any length now. I rise more to speak with regard to the new proposals which have been lately placed before us, and also to endeavour to remove some misapprehension which appears to exist in the minds of some representatives with reference to the position of my hon. colleagues and myself in regard to the referendum. We asked in the first instance that where the houses could not agree there should be a referendum. We did not ask for a double dissolution, and we did not desire to have a double dissolution. We were perfectly satisfied that where the two houses could not agree the people should be allowed to decide the matter upon a direct, vote. But it was pointed out that there would be a larger inducement to the government of the day to use the referendum, because it would require them to take little, if any, responsibility, and therefore to follow out the constitutional principle, the government should first of all be compelled, by means of a dissolution, to consult the constitution. Seeing that there was some force in that argument, and being satisfied that having got the double dissolution we should also have the referendum-

An Hon. MEMBER:

The dual referendum!
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The dual referendum. That we considered would be a satisfactory settlement of the difficulty. I was prepared to accept the referendum with the dissolution, and I am also prepared to accept what I asked for in the first instance-the referendum without the dissolution. There seems some misapprehension that we are anxious to get this double dissolution; but we are not. We merely accepted it because we thought that it would be an inducement to others who felt that there was some strong argument in favour of it to agree to our proposal that the ultimate resort should be to the people. Another proposal has been submitted by the Right Hon. G.H. Reid, and, by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, that is, that these difficulties should be settled after the double dissolution by the two houses meeting together, and if a majority cannot be obtained there is to be a national or mass referendum. Of course I am prepared to accept his scheme as far as the double dissolution is concerned; but then he asks that the two houses meeting together, we should have a two-thirds majority. That neutralises the whole effect of his proposal. If he proposed that the two houses should meet together, and that those present, and voting, should decide the matter, I could understand that there was some reasonable foundation for the proposal. But that is not the case and we should simply, by this proposal, be unquestionably handing over the larger states absolutely to the smaller states. I do not agree, and never have agreed, to the two houses meeting together, and I have spoken strongly against it. I do not think that is a reasonable or proper mode of settling these disputes. Even if the hon. member proposed or suggested that an ordinary majority should decide the question on the two houses meeting together, my objections would not be removed, and I should be bound to vote against the proposal. We have endeavoured, by giving the best attention to this problem, to solve it, and I think the Right Hon. C.C. Kingston has hit upon the true and proper solution. When speaking origin-aly, I said there were certain questions which ought to be settled by the national referendum, and there were other questions which, in fairness to the smaller states, should only be settled by the dual referendum. My difficulty was how to place words in this bill which would divide those two classes by a sharp line of demarcation. I failed to see any mode whatever of doing that. If I could have seen a mode, I should have been very glad. Therefore, knowing that it was utterly impossible to induce the representatives of the smaller states to agree to the national referendum, and being anxious to provide some mode of settling these difficulties when they do arise, I was prepared to accept the dual referendum, although I admit quite freely that that would not give finality in all cases, but it would unquestionably settle the vast majority of cases that are ever likely to arise. The Right Hon. G.H. Reid saw the same difficulty, and he desired to throw on the smaller states the onus of preparing a list of matters which they considered should be decided by the dual referendum. They might fairly retort and say, "No, you prepare a list of the matters which you desire to be settled by the national referendum." So we see that that mode of settling this difficult problem is impossible.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDO:
Nobody can prepare a list!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Nobody can prepare a list now to meet all the difficulties that may hereafter arise. The Premier of South Australia has, to my mind, suggested a mode which we can all fairly accept. He said, "Let us lay down the principle that the referendum is to be made as a national one. If, however, a fair minority of the house of representatives say that state interests will be affected, let them have the right to

Mr. SYMON:
That would cause a great deal of agitation and deadlock in the house of representatives. You would be asking them to decide a judicial question!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
It is as much a constitutional question as any other matter that could come before them. The small states need have no fear of that. My hon.
friend told us it would require, twenty-six votes. If we take Queensland, South Australia, and Western Australia, they will have the twenty-six votes, even if they could not get any of the representatives of the larger states to combine with them to demand the referendum. I cannot realise that, in any dispute we may have, we are going to have state against state. I never can conceive it. It seems to me utterly absurd to say that, when men meet in a federal parliament, representing the whole continent, and with our states practically effaced, so far as their deliberations are concerned, the disputes which may arise, and, probably, will arise, will be only those in which states will be pitted against states. I fail to realise that, or to see the slightest foundation for it.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Does not that show the absurdity of asking for the consent of the states, as well as of the people?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I am not going to deny that it is absurd, but we have to deal with matters as they are. What is the use of endeavouring to get what we know a two to one majority of this Convention will not give us? If we take the views of hon. members who have spoken we know perfectly well that if a mass referendum is forced to a vote, the majority against it will be two to one. Insisting upon that, and saving we will take nothing else, is simply wasting our time, and, will lead us into a position where we shall have bad feeling, and shall not be able to retrace our steps. That is what induced me, when I could not see, in my own mind, any means of dividing the two classes of disputes, so that they might be separately dealt with, to say that I was prepared to take the dual referendum, trusting that it would very rarely have to be put into operation, that nearly all the disputes would undoubtedly be settled by the double dissolution, and that it would only be in one or two extraordinary cases that we should possibly have to resort to the other steps. However, I think the Premier of South Australia has devised a means that I shall be perfectly prepared to accept. I think the larger states can accept it, and trust that when the matter is being debated in a federal parliament it will be fairly dealt with. I think the smaller states will be amply protected, and should be satisfied. I, for one, and I believe a majority of my colleagues, will be willing to fall in with the suggestion of the Premier of South Australia. But we certainly cannot accept the proposal for a meeting of the two houses with a two-thirds majority, or with a bare majority.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)[5.29]:

I think we all recognise now that a vote of the members of the Convention upon any of these questions is really of very small moment, except in view of the probability of its representing the opinion of the colonies which are represented here, because we are really here, each one of us, representing the people of the different colonies, and the proposals which we make are not to be settled by the question of majorities or minorities here, but by the question of the majorities or minorities of the people of Australia, who will have the final dealing with this question, and I think that one of the most satisfactory elements of this discussion is that there has been a general recognition of the responsibility under which we act—that is to say, not a responsibility to the members of this Convention, but a responsibility to those who sent us here. At the same time, I would be the last to advocate any slavish following of the cry in any colony for a particular form of constitution. The only extent to which it appears to me we are bound to bow to public opinion outside is, in so far as we believe it expresses the real settled convictions of the people who sent us here. As I stated in my remarks when this question first arose, I am, and always have been, opposed to the referendum in any form. I approve of the application of it only for the reason that I believe in that mode alone respecting the settlement of the serious deadlocks which might, under certain circumstances, arise between the two houses. I admit to the fullest extent everything which my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Deakin, said so well this morning, as to the extreme unlikelihood of these difficulties between the two houses terminating in what are called deadlocks. But I do recognise that, infrequent as these disputes are likely to be, as infrequently as they are likely to prove insoluble, when they do prove insoluble they will present infinitely more dangers than the deadlocks we are acquainted with; and it is to meet cases of that kind that I think, not only in deference to public opinion outside, but in deference to what we must know are the dangers of this constitution, we should arrive at some means of finality.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

We have to make a workable machine!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

We have to make a workable machine, and we have to see that in all possible circumstances it will be workable. If a selection were to be made of the kind of questions upon which a deadlock is likely to arise—that is to say, a disagreement which will bring the operation of the constitution itself to a standstill for a moment, I should select at once a class of questions on which these difficulties are likely to arise, and they are the very class of questions which this constitution has removed from the control—except so far as veto is concerned—of the senate itself. If you regard the operation of this constitution in regard to any question of taxation, and any question of appropriating the ordinary supplies for the services of government, you have the two points, and the two points only, on which a disagreement between the two houses is likely to prove disastrous. In all other questions there is time for public opinion to adjust the difference. In regard to these questions there is not time, and I quite agree with the observation of my right hon. friend, the Premier of New South Wales, when he pointed out that in the very inception of this constitution, in dealing with the very first question which we will have to face, the framing of a uniform tariff, we may very well be met with differences of opinion which will divide the people, not according to party, but possibly according to states, and it is in regard, therefore, to a question of that kind, which embraces finance or taxation, or any questions of appropriation, which embraces financial and other points of view—it is in regard to these questions, and these questions only, we are likely to have these difficulties. If we had to vote on some system of referendum, I should be quite willing to modify my former view as to the adoption of the referendum, in the general settlement of questions of that kind. If there is to be a general referendum, it will be quite sufficient if that referendum is confined to cases in which an appropriation for the ordinary services of the year was sought, or in regard to which a proposal of taxation was made, and if the referendum was restricted to those questions, then you would be following  out by analogy the very same restriction which you place on the powers of the senate itself in dealing with money bills. Why is that restriction placed on the senate in dealing with money bills? Because it is recognised that in the working of responsible government, of which the life and soul is finance, you cannot have a responsibility to the two houses, one house must rule. Following the same principle, it is because one house must rule, the house which supports the executive, that a difference on a question of that kind will bring you into a deadlock. And it is for the same reason, if it is to be a mass referendum, that these questions, and these questions only, should be referred to, the general consideration of the people for their arbitrament.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

But suppose there is a tack to the appropriation bill?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

The hon. member will remember that there is a provision under the head of money bills which prevents a tack.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

The government might do it, all the same!
The government could not do it. The hon. member will see under these circumstances that the government would be acting illegally if they did anything of the kind, and their measure, if passed into law, would not be worth the paper it was written on, and there will be a tribunal under the constitution to decide that point.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Suppose that 2,000,000 people want a navigation act and 600,000 people say no?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

The 2,000,000 people by the force of their public opinion, their power in the commonwealth, their power in the house of representatives, their power over the executive government, will in time assert their own way, and if with all these powers at their back they cannot assert their way, there must be some very good reason inherent in the thing itself why they should not. The difficulty which I foresee, and which I wish to prevent in the working of this constitution, is some block in the working of the machine itself which we cannot wait to be adjusted by the ordinary forces which adjust deadlocks in unified communities. The case my hon. friend refers to is an illustration of one of those matters which will adjust themselves, which can afford to wait but these matters of finance and appropriation which are connected with the daily life of government, with the life of the administration itself, are matters which cannot wait, matters in which the house representing the majority must prevail if we are to have responsible government, and matters in which in the last resort if you are to have an arbitrament which will settle matters finally, the only arbitrament can be the majority of the voters—the taxpayers of the community.

Mr. HIGGINS:

That is a true deadlock, of course!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

A true deadlock, and the only deadlock which is a dangerous one. I so far agree with those hon. members who have spoken in protest of any provision for dealing with a deadlock that I recognise that every mode for settling a deadlock is, to a certain extent, a stifling of discussion on a public question, and any stifling of discussion on any public question at any stage of it is, in a certain sense, the brute force of the majority, and is also a loss to the community in the loss of that reason and consideration which should be at the bottom of all legislation. But there are circumstances in which you throw these considerations over for the highest consideration of the safety of the commonwealth. It is only where I see that the safety of the commonwealth is involved in a conflict between the two houses that I would apply this process of the referendum to the people generally, and if it came to the question of applying the referendum, I would be quite willing that it should be applied with that limit which it, seems to me would not only be logical in regard to the frame of this constitution, but would be consonant with fact. But then, sir, we are met with this difficulty. I cannot shut my eyes, nor can any hon. member who has sat here listening day after day to the discussions, shut his eyes to the fact that it would be impossible to carry the mass referendum in any form in this Convention, and if I thought that, even though it was impossible to carry it in this Convention, there was a probability of public opinion in the smaller states supporting at any future time a proposal for a mass referendum, I still would be inclined to persevere in my view. I say that any man who regards the question from an impartial point of view and not from the point of view of a doctrinaire or a member of a debating society, any one who regards the question from a practical point of view, must be convinced of this: that the very arguments which we are obliged to use to enforce the necessity to the large states of the use of the referendum will be, in the hands of the opponents of the bill in the smaller communities, the strongest reasons against the adoption of the mass referendum; and, having regard to the principle to which I before adverted, that we have to decide matters, not by vote here but by the probability of our vote being ratified by the communities that sent us here, I say that circumstance is a practical consideration that we cannot lose light of. Therefore, I am driven to the conclusion that as far as the mass referendum is concerned, although if it does come to a vote in this Convention I shall vote for it, I can see at once that as regards carrying it in the country as an adjunct to federation it is a forlorn hope.

Mr. LYNE:
You can carry it in this colony right enough!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I do not know that we should; but the hon. mem-
[P.883] starts here
ber will recognise this, that you cannot view the matter from the point of view of any one colony, that Victoria's difficulties in this respect are our difficulties, and the difficulties of Victoria and New South Wales are the difficulties of South Australia. If we are to have - as I hope we all believe we shall have - the whole continent in this federation, then any insuperable difficulty to the carrying of the bill in any one of the colonies is worthy of serious consideration by us. We may be safe in our view; but, unless it is safe in the other colonies, our labours will be to a large extent of no avail. I have pointed out that we must, if we wish to come to a practical conclusion, endeavour to find some way out of this difficulty. Various proposals have been made. We have been referred to different schemes for the dissolution of the house of representatives and the senate.

[The Chairman left the chair at 5.45 p.m. The Convention resumed at 7.30 p.m.]

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

I was pointing out when we adjourned that dissolutions had been suggested as a way out of this difficulty. I have always been opposed to a dissolution of the senate, except under pressure of absolute necessity, and for this reason: that it appears to me that one of the merits of the constitution of the senate under this bill is that it is not liable to a sudden dissolution at the hands of the majority of the other house, and that it possesses that stability of policy and conduct which a continuity of existence produces. It is not altogether removed from the people. Every three years it is brought, as to part of its members, in touch with the people. That, it appears to me, gives a sufficient contact with popular opinion, whilst continuity and stability of the senate is preserved. But I was willing even that the senate should be dissolved with the view of getting finality of decision. Much as I dislike a referendum, it appeared to me that the referendum to the people was the only way of settling the difficulty; but I felt so strongly that the referendum, without previous discussion which a dissolution would bring about, without the previous education of the people on the question at issue, without the feeling of responsibility which a dissolution would compel members of both houses to observe—that the working of a referendum in itself would be disastrous to representative institutions. I still hold that view. I still hold the view that any referendum, without a previous dissolution would be sapping the very basis of representative institutions, would place ministers in the position of acting in any way they thought fit, without a sense of responsibility, and would enable public questions to be decided, not after discussion, ample and full, and the interchange of opinion in the places where opinion in the first instance ought to be interchanged, but from considerations, possibly, of quite another character, and with an imperfect knowledge of circumstances and conditions under which inevitably the opinion of the people might be obtained. But, still, there appeared no other way out of the difficulty. Even now, if I saw any other way out of the difficulty I should be in favour of a dissolution with a view to insure that the referendum should, in some sense, obtain, and carry out the views of the people under circumstances which would enable those views to be given intelligibly. But if we are to have a dissolution, then I say the dissolution should be concurrent. If we are to have a dissolution, both houses should be sent to the country together. It appears to me that whether you make your dissolution concurrent, or whether you do not, whether you give a power only to dissolve the senate after the other house has been dissolved, you will find that any ministry working responsible government in the ordinary way, will take very good care that the dissolution of the senate and the house of representatives are as nearly, as possible simultaneous. You will find that the minister in charge of affairs will not plunge the country into confusion, and run the risk of breaking up his party, by submitting an important public question until he is on the eve of a dissolution by effluxion of time. You will very likely find, therefore, that in the working out of the thing practically, whether the power to dissolve the senate is given concurrently or after the dissolution of the other house, it will come to the same thing. But if there is one thing to be observed more than another in the consideration of all this machinery for getting rid of deadlocks, it is this: that every dissolution, every disturbance of the ordinary current political action, is a distinct injury to the country, a disturbance of business, a stopping of administration, and a great expense to the whole community. It means a dislocation of the whole machinery of government, and of the constitution, which ought to be avoided in every way that is possible. For that reason, amongst others, there can be no question that if we are to have a dissolution at all, that dissolution ought to be concurrent, so that the question may be submitted to the electors at one time. A number of reasons have been submitted in support of that view by other hon. members, which I do not wish to repeat. But, going beyond that, what is to result from this dissolution? I have already spoken of a mass referendum. But it appears that a number of hon. members are in favour of what is called a dual referendum-a referendum to the people and to the states. At first I was rather captivated by this idea; but it appears to me that to place a provision of that kind in the constitution with the notion that it will secure finality, is to adopt delusion and a snare to ourselves and to the people. It cannot result in finality. It will lead to further discussion, and if the difficulty is of such a nature that it separates the people from the states in the way in which we contemplate that these serious questions of difference will separate the people, then you will have the same senate and the same house of representatives returned, and you will have the same answer back from states and people. If the difficulty is great, when the senate and the house of representatives are not in agreement, how much greater will the difficulty be when you are face to face with a position in which the people and states are in irreconcilable conflict, and when there is no step behind by which you can solve the difficulty? Unless your referendum is to bring finality, better have no referendum at all, better trust public opinion, better trust to the operation of institutions worked by men who are used to self-government, than to trust to a referendum which is only a delusion and a snare, which will plunge the country into confusion and insure no finality. Now, is there any remedy beyond that? I say at once that rather than have a dual referendum I would have no referendum at all. But my right hon. friend, Mr. Kingston, has suggested, it appears to me, a way out of that difficulty, which seems more scientific than most of the proposals, and is to a certain extent satisfactory. My right hon. friend suggests that inasmuch as it is just that you should have finality, and that a national referendum in cases in which state rights are not involved would not be fair to the states, we should put it in the power of the house of representatives to veto a national referendum and demand a state referendum.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

By a representative minority!

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR:

By a representative minority. Now, the difficulty I see, looking more particularly to the interests of the larger states in the carrying out of this proposal is this: My hon. friend says that a third of the house of representatives will be sufficient to bring about that process which will prevent the operation of a national referendum, and make the referendum one for the states. Now, as I think the Right Hon. Sir George Turner pointed out, taking the states as constituted by ourselves, with the admission of Queensland, you will find that with the six states represented in the senate, and taking the number according to the 50,000 quota, the smaller states if they combined would have twenty-six representatives. Now, twenty-six is exactly the one-third required to protest, so that in any case where the smaller states chose to combine they could always do so with the effect of turning the national referendum into a States referendum.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Into a dual referendum!

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR:

I am speaking of a states referendum as distinguished from a national referendum. It follows that you leave it entirely in the hands of the smaller states at any time to insure the carrying out of the dual referendum.

An Hon. MEMBER:

They must be unanimous to do that!
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
No doubt they must be unanimous, but if they were unanimous at any time, no matter what the question might be, they could ensure the carrying out of a dual referendum.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
They must affirm the proposition that states rights are concerned

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I know that the hon. member has added that precaution, but it is quite evident that that would be done. It does not require any great stretch of the imagination to suppose that in almost any important question—any question in which this difficulty arose—state rights would be involved.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I do not know that the hon. and learned member can say that. The hon. and learned member and myself are in agreement upon one point—we want finality.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
As nearly as you can get it!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
As nearly as you can properly get it!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
As nearly as you can properly get it. The difficulty I see about the right hon. member's amendment is this: that it carries you no further on in your difficulty. My objection to the dual referendum is that it does not give you finality. On the other hand, you put it in the power of the smaller states at any time to bring about a dual referendum instead of a national referendum. I admit that it is very much better than the proposal of a dual referendum. I admit that it is an attempt in a scientific and practical way to solve this difficulty, but it does not satisfy me. In the first place, it appears to me that it almost ensures this: that in any case where you get a combination of states, the referendum will be to the states as a nation instead of to the nation alone.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
But that is after a double dissolution, which is a considerable safeguard!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
That is unquestionably the case. I admit that it is one of those solutions which come very near to what we require.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
You would only get that combination where state interests were involved!
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

I quite see that you will get that when state interests are involved; but as the hon. member is probably aware, the question of state interests, like every other question in politics, will not necessarily be decided upon the purest possible grounds. Irrelevant matters of all kinds will probably creep into the discussion. There may be party considerations and personal considerations. Other questions will no doubt operate in the matter. My only fear is, that the referendum will be used in such a way that it will tend to become a states referendum instead of a national referendum. I come now to the other proposal, which appears to me to offer, perhaps, a better solution of the difficulty than any yet proposed. I do not pretend for a moment, in expressing this opinion, that I have come to a conclusion very strongly in my own mind as between the proposal of the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, and the proposal of the right hon. member, Mr. Reid. But it appears to me that the latter proposal does give more finality—that it lessens the expense, and brings about finality with less convulsion and disturbance of the machinery of government and the business of the country. For that reason, I am very much more inclined to support the proposal of the right hon. member, Mr. Reid.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Is that the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

It is the same thing in reality. It is a proposal which, I think, I originally made or gave notice of in Adelaide, though in a more restricted form—that is, that the two houses should: sit together.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

That means that the quota already fixed shall stand good!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It depends upon that!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

So far as I am concerned, that would very likely be so; but, in deference

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

See what would happen. The senate would veto it, and, according to this proposal, the two houses would meet together to settle it!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Not necessarily. But, supposing that were so, I will point out to the right hon. gentleman by-and-by how that would put him in no better position. I was led a little bit away from what I was saying by my right hon. friend's reference to the quota.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

One hangs on the other, so far as I am concerned!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

No doubt. I would be willing to make that concession in regard to the quota, that is to say, not to make it an irrevocable part of the constitution, but to make it a beginning in the working of the relations between the two houses. Some objections are made as to the working of my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid's, proposal, and it is said that the system would be objectionable, because it would place the power entirely in the hands of a combination of smaller states. The amendment, as it is proposed, giving power to a two-thirds majority, it seems to me, would have that effect, and I should be altogether opposed to placing the power of finality in such a case in the hands of a two-thirds majority. But I think that a three-fifths majority might very well be allowed both in fairness to the smaller states, and in fairness to the larger states.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

It is not three-fifths of the house, but three-fifths of the members present!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

I do not care very much whether it is three-fifths of the house, or three-fifths of the members present.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

If you make the quota a shifting quantity the whole thing becomes a sham. You can then make it anything you like!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

I do not wish to make the quota a shifting quantity.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

The hon. and learned member implied as much!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

In that case I have been misunderstood. The only concession I made was this: that in regard to the quota proposals I would make them subject, like a great many other parts of the constitution, to the determination of parliament; that is to say, I would not embody the quota proposals in the constitution itself.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Then the whole thing becomes a sham!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

I think the hon. member is using too strong an expression. The hon. member will find that a system which initiates legislation between the two houses and establishes it with a power in one house to make its objection to any removal of it is something much more than a sham. My reason for suggesting that the matter might be left to the consideration of the federal parliament is that it seems to me that there are some strong reasons why this principle which is a very good one indeed, and one which should be carried out—should not be placed beyond amendment in the body of the constitution. The objection has been made that this proposal to have the two houses voting together would place the whole power in the hands of the smaller states. If there was a three-fifths majority that would not be so. Suppose six states form the union, there will be 112 members in the senate and house of representatives combined. Sixty-seven is three-fifths of that number. Of the total number of members, giving New South Wales and Victoria the number of representatives which they would have with their present population, the total representation of the larger states would be sixty-two, so that to carry a proposal by a three-fifths majority it would be necessary to win over five members from the smaller states.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

It would be very easy to get five radicals to alter the quota, and then where are we?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

The hon. member might apply exactly the same principle to very many portions of the constitution, and it might be applied equally well the other way. Sixty-seven members will be required to make the requisite majority. Therefore, to make up this majority the larger states would have to vote in a solid body, and to win over five representatives of the smaller states. If the smaller states voted in a solid body the three-fifths majority could not be obtained. On the other hand, upon certain occasions, the representatives of the smaller states might win over some of the representatives of the larger states. There is an equal chance either way.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Do hon. members suppose that all the representatives of the larger states will ever vote together?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

I was about to point that out. The whole of the objections to the working of this system are founded upon the supposition that you will have all the smaller states upon one side and the larger states upon the other. The thing is impossible and almost absurd, when it is remembered that one of the smaller states—if Queensland is included in that category—will be separated by New South Wales and Victoria from the other small states, with which, according to the supposition, she is to be in league against her larger neighbours. When you apply what are the probabilities to criticism of that kind, it seems to me that it appears very unsound.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The same criticism applies to the proposal of the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I am aware of that; but the difference is this, that there is some chance of finality in this proposal which I make, however it is brought about. The finality sometimes may be possible against the larger states; it may be against the smaller states; but the finality comes after full discussion, after a representation of the views on both sides, and in a way which insures more discussion and a better chance of a result which will be satisfactory to the people. It is for that reason, objections being, perhaps, equal in many ways to both of those proposals—that I am inclined to support strongly the proposal of the Right Hon. G.H. Reid, because it insures finality, and in a way which will operate fairly and with less friction than any of those other proposals, in the interests both of the state and the people.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
If a majority is not obtained you don't go any further!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
If a majority is not obtained the proposal drops. That reminds me now of a remark made by the hon. member, Mr. Wise.

Mr. CLARKE:
Where is your finality?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The deadlock continues!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
No; the matter comes to an end exactly in the same way-

Mr. CLARKE:
What do you mean by "finality"?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
A decision; an agreement is come to pass or not to pass the measure.

Mr. CLARKE:
It has to wait!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Yes, The same thing happens whatever proposal you adopt. It will happen with a national referendum, which is the most final method you can adopt. Even then, if a proposal is not carried, the matter drops in the same way. You have the same kind of finality that prevails in this Convention, or a house of parliament, when a bill is brought forward and rejected. I now come to the objection raised by the hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, and repeated by the hon. member, Mr. Wise—that is, that you throw the whole theory of responsible government into confusion by a proposal of this kind, and that it would give powers to the senate which they otherwise would not have in dealing with money bills. That is a matter of detail, with regard to which I am open to argument and reason. I, think there may be a very great deal to be said in favour of simply leaving the proposal of the bill in the form in which it is finally sent up by the house that sends it, to be decided "yes" or "no" by the legislature; or it might be that, on the other hand, discussion might be allowed. It appears to me, following out logically the principles we have already embedded in the constitution, that having deprived the senate of the power of amending money bills in the first instance, it would be rather an extraordinary stretch of principle to allow them the same power when the houses are sitting together. But that is not necessarily a part of the proposal. My hon. friend only outlined it in fact it would be reasonably within the proposal itself that when the houses sit together there should only be a definite "yea" or "nay" as to whether the bill is to pass. The hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, and the hon. member, Mr. Wise, have both suggested that the theory and meaning of responsible government would be very largely trenched upon by this proposal, that if a minister who had a majority in the house of representatives found that that majority was turned into a minority when both houses were sitting together, what would be his position? It would be this: that as long as he held the confidence of the house of representatives, to which his executive government is responsible principally, in which he carries out all his financial proposals, it would matter very little if, on a special vote and under special circumstances, a proposal were carried against him. It would mean no more than, in the case of a referendum, a decision of the same kind would mean.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
There will be no means to carry on!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
The hon. member is brought up against that wall whichever way he turns. He says there will be no means to carry on. Exactly in the same way, if the referendum were carried against him, there would be no means to carry on. These are difficulties which I quite agree with my hon. friend, Mr. Deakin, may not arise once in twenty, thirty, or fifty years. We only want to be ready for them, and the probabilities are that when we do arrive at any difficulties of that sort, instead of being as we are now the representatives of different states trying to imagine how we will work when we are one nation, national aspirations and instincts will develop in the whole body of the people, so that what appears to us to be difficulties will, from the nature of things, turn out to be no more than trifles.
of our relations, absolutely disappear. I do not wish to detain the Committee at any great length, but I should like to say finally, if we are to arrive at a decision on this matter, it appears to me that it would be very much better if we could arrive at some decision, not based upon votes given here, upon our own absolute opinions on these different propositions which are put forward, not a vote which is the vote absolutely of the majority according to their different opinions, but that we should endeavour, if possible, to arrive at some way out of these difficulties—that we should give it the stamp of our approval, t

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[8.2]:

I think at last we are beginning to see some light in this dark and entangled wood. I have been listening all day, and for several days, to this question of deadlocks, and with a good deal of interest; but I did not understand this morning why the debate proceeded. We all know that if we introduce ten more men from Queensland at the adjournment of the Convention, the whole question may have to be re-discussed and settled again. Not only is it that which gives unreality to the debate, but I feel also that we have had no assurance that the amendment which was carried the other day, is to be rescinded.

Mr. SYMON:

Certainly not; it is not going to be rescinded! Mr. HIGGINS: Here, then, we have been all day talking on the assumption that my hon. friend, who is not a man generally to change his views for a very light motive, or a light current of air we are talking on the assumption that we can get a double dissolution if we like.

Mr. SYMON:

The proposals are to add some alternative!

Mr. HIGGINS:

Quite so. We have been talking to the general question, forgetting that we have carried by a majority, and there stands against us, or in favour of us, the provision that there is to be a dissolution, first of the house of representatives and then of the senate. As to what is at present the vote under that amendment it is very peculiar. At the Convention in Adelaide the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, proposed that, the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, opposed it, and I proposed a double dissolution. Now, we seem to be like playing baseball, we have all moved on one peg. It seems that the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, has come now to move for a double dissolution, and the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, is going to move the resolution which the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, discarded.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Where is the hon. member?

Mr. HIGGINS:

I am just where I was, and I intend to keep in the van. I think we ought by some means before we part come to a consent to have a simultaneous dissolution of the two houses. There is only a small difference between us in the numbers, and it is not a difference in principle unless we are to assume that the house has more of original sin than the senate.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Which house will the hon. member be in?

Mr. HIGGINS:

In the house of representatives, of course, if I am in any; and I expect the hon. member to be in the House of Lords. What I do think is this: that there is no difference in the principle, it is merely a difference of expediency; and you have two houses elected upon manhood suffrage, both relying on the people. Of one thing I am certain, and I think I shall have the support of members of the larger colonies in this-I have not ventured to prophesy hitherto-but I feel that if you are going to treat the senate as not to be dissolved at the same time as the house of representatives, you have no chance of getting the constitution accepted by the larger colonies. As to a dissolution, the advantage of that is this: that we shall be proceeding largely upon those constitutional lines that we have been used to in these colonies-you appeal to the people at an election. We have as yet no referendum. But I think the advantage of the system of dissolution is that we are going on well-known constitutional lines.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Mr. HIGGINS:

Still we know what a dissolution is. In no colony have we a house like the senate. I can see no reason why there should not be a dissolution of any house which is elective. The only reason for not having a house dissoluble is that they have no electorate. That is the reason why the House of Lords is not dissoluble; that is the reason why all the nominee houses are indissoluble. But there are one or two colonies where we have the houses quasi-elective, or partially elective, and where we have still kept up the vicious system of not making them dissoluble. I take it that if you have an elective upper house it ought to be dissoluble just as you have the other elective house. There really is no ground for dissolving one and not the other. If they both rest upon the people, why not both appeal to the people?
Mr. SYMON:
Then the hon. member supports my amendment!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I have indicated before that I regard the hon. member's amendment as imperfect in this respect, that it penalises or punishes the house of representatives. It sends them to the country before the senate instead of both together. I must not labour this matter too much. There is this defect in a dissolution, that it does not solve the difficulty, because you may still have the same members, or substantially the same members, returned, and you may still have the same difference of opinion between the senate and the lower house. That difficulty is not got over by a dissolution. Then comes the next proposal—the national referendum. In a speech the other day I spoke in favour of a national referendum; and hon. members who have been so good as to lend me their ears at all during the debates, will recognise that, to be consistent with my principles, I treat the whole of the subjects which you relegate to a federal parliament as being national subjects to be treated on a national basis; but I feel sorry to say, notwithstanding the hopes that were held out to us, from the speeches of the hon. members, Mr. McMillan and Mr. Holder—and I must speak frankly at this stage, that in consequence of the speech of the right hon. the Premier of my own colony, Victoria, this hope of having a national referendum was rudely shattered. I confess that I was exceedingly chagrined and very angry, because there was every possibility of our coming to a reasonable conclusion regarding a national referendum. To surrender that principle which the right hon. gentleman, and the hon. the Attorney-General, have indicated so clearly in their speeches, that this ought to be in the commonwealth—to abandon that principle without at least having a test vote, is a proceeding which I do not understand.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
It never had the ghost or a shadow of show!

Mr. HIGGINS:
The right hon. gentleman says that it never had a show. I have an equal right to say that, without leaning upon the national voice, the general voice of the people at least in the final resort, you will never have a shadow of a ghost of a show in the larger colonies of carrying this bill. I have only said that because I was provoked by the interjection. I speak on that matter with as much knowledge as does the right hon. member. I feel deeply disappointed at the attitude taken on the matter by one whose government I support, and have supported with great zest. At all events, there is no doubt now that in this Convention there appears to be given up the national referendum. Now there is a proposal for what is called the dual referendum. I have already indicated that I shall vote against that proposal. I shall vote against it for the very same reason that the hon. member, Sir John Downer, will vote for it. The hon. member has said he will vote for it because it is a farce. I will vote against it because it is a farce. He knows that a dual referendum will have no effect whatever in settling deadlocks- that the dual referendum will have no effect whatever in giving effect finally to the will of the people. Far that very same reason I shall vote against it. I do not know how it could be seriously proposed in any assembly. The more you look into it the more impossible it becomes. I indicated the other day, by some figures that you might have 236,000 voters in favour of a measure, and 49,000 voters against, and still the voice of the 49,000 voters could easily overrule that of the 236,000 voters. I will not go into the figures again, but I may indicate this: that the very fact of putting those two sets of figures opposite to one another in the public papers, and before the public mind, enabling electors in Australia to see that although they may have 236,000 for, and 49,000 against, they still cannot carry their way, will lead to grievous dissatisfaction with the constitution, and may lead to disturbances which would never occur if they felt they had a reasonable hope of carrying their way. If they have five votes to one, practically, they still cannot carry a measure. I hold that that accentuates the position that the minority is ruling the majority. There is nothing so dangerous in a commonwealth, or in a state which is ruled upon professedly representative institutions as to feel that a huge majority can be overruled and overridden by a minority. Now, the analogy to this dual referendum is in Switzerland. The difference there is this: I was not aware until this afternoon, when the Attorney-General of Victoria was good enough to speak, that in 1891 a bill was carried which allowed even federal laws to be put under a referendum-that is, the referendum to the cantons and to the people. But if we look into it, we shall find that that referendum is not used for the purpose of settling deadlocks between the one house and the other. It is not used for the purpose of settling a difference between the senate and the other house; but it is used after both houses have conceded the law; and by way of veto 30,000 electors, or eight cantons, can come in and say, "Notwithstanding that both houses have passed the law, let us see if the people will approve of it."

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

That is not correct!
Mr. HIGGINS:

In 1891 the same referendum was applied to federal laws as to laws amending the constitution.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The hon. and learned member is wrong!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I have refreshed my memory during the last two or three hours. I find on page 77 of the "Swiss Confederation," by Adams and Cunningham, written in the year 1889, two years before the amendment—these words:

But, as we have seen, the latter—the revised constitution of 1874—also contains an article extending the exercise of the popular vote when demanded by 30,000 citizens, or eight cantons, to all federal laws and all resolutions of a general nature which have been passed by the chambers.

But the point is that they must have been first passed by the chambers. In addition to that, the referendum in Switzerland for ordinary federal laws has only been in operation for six years. Are we to base our legislation upon the experience of six years? During this debate, the imperfections of this system of referendum have been shown clearly—that it is not final, that it does not settle things, or, if it settles them at all, it settles them on the side of the house which says "No." The Attorney-General of Victoria, after having shown so clearly in his speeches that this system of looking for the consent of the states as distinct from the people is absolutely wrong, I am sorry to find the hon. and learned gentleman buttressing up that system in all the votes and speeches he has made since. In mere loyalty to the growing population of the colonies, it is our duty to try to prevent the evils which must result from leaving questions of this kind to the arbitrament of the smaller states. I am dealing with these proposals on the assumption that the parts of the constitution we have already passed will abide. They do not express my views, but I will assume that they will be accepted. I am dealing with this matter hypothetically, on the assumption that the other parts of the constitution will be accepted. The proposal of my right hon. friend, Mr. Kingston, appeared to me to strike a true note, and I was at first attracted by it. His idea is, that we cannot decide at present what the subjects are upon which the states are to be allowed to give their votes apart from the votes of the people, and that we should leave it to the federal parliament, so that the house of representatives would be able to say, "This is a state subject, and it ought to be left to the states as distinct from the people." That proposal was at first attractive; but there is one difficulty which I cannot see that the right hon. member has got over. If you make the proportion one-third or one-fourth of the members of the house of representatives who must declare that the matter is a states matter, and, therefore, needs the assent by referendum of the states as well as of the people, then, I take it, the vote upon the resolution in the house of representatives would be a party vote. In most of the lower houses in the colonies, you will find about a third of the members in opposition—except, I believe, in Western Australia, where there are practically none in opposition. It would be very easy to get one third in opposition to embarrass the government. They would be certain to find some reason for saying that the subject.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

The hon. member will soon be all feathers!

Mr. HIGGINS:

As the hon. member says, I shall soon be all feathers. I find, with regard to this matter of a joint sitting of the two houses, that I first proposed it in this debate. I discover now that a large number of members are coming round to that idea. I am getting really to feel that I must have some prevision into the seeds of time, and am able to say what seed will grow and what seed will not grow. Perhaps I shall find hon. members coming round to my other views, which are thought to be extreme at present, with regard to equal representation. Time is on our side, and we shall see what happens. I find that on Thursday last I said I was surprised that the proposal for a joint sitting of the two houses had not been more pressed. Now I think that if you have two houses, and if those two houses are based upon proportional representation, and also upon an equally liberal franchise, nothing is more natural, nothing is more desirable, than that you should bring your two houses together, and by their sitting together inexpensively determine which is to rule.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The hon. member supposes that one-third of the house of representatives would be in opposition!

Mr. HIGGINS:

Quite so. The right hon. member has in view possibly the difficulty which a joint sitting of the two houses might occasion in the colony of Victoria. I quite admit that if there were a difference of opinion between the upper and lower houses in Victoria, one-third of the members of the lower house being in opposition, and the whole council being regarded as one party, the members of the upper house coming in would give a majority to the opposition, and their combined votes would be bound to defeat the ministry. I quite agree with the right hon. member upon that point, but the distinction is that we should be dealing with a liberal house, based upon liberal principles on the one side, and on the other with a house based upon the old and obsolete principle of a property vote. To mix those two houses would not be fair, and I should decline, as strongly as any one, to have those gentlemen who were elected on a restricted qualification treated as having equal voting power, at any joint sitting, with those who were elected by the people as a whole-I should decline to treat their votes as of equivalent value. But I do not wish to raise any controversy.

The CHAIRMAN:
Does the hon. and learned member think that that has anything to do with the question before the Chair?

Mr. HIGGINS:
With all respect I do. I say that a majority of the two houses-

The CHAIRMAN:
Does the hon. member see that no property qualification is provided for?

Mr. HIGGINS:
But I was saying that the joint sitting is a proposal to be considered carefully. I was interrupted by the right hon. the Premier of Victoria, who indicated that he had in his mind a difficulty in regard to a majority in Victoria. I was, therefore, trying to clear up that position, and it is hard to keep within strict rules in dealing with any matter of the sort. But I do feel that this joint sitting proposal is to be considered very carefully, especially when in the senate you will have men elected upon no property qualification, but upon the principle of one man one vote. So I say that two houses there are more on an equality than the two houses in any of our present constitutions. I quite admit the criticism that has been directed against it by the Attorney-General of Victoria. He says that, as to finance, that would never do. I perfectly agree with him. If you do not give the senate, with regard to money bills, equal power with the lower house, it obviously stands to reason that you cannot pass paragraph 5 of the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, in its present form. It says that in such full conference a majority of two-thirds of those present, and voting, shall be necessary to pass the proposed law with any amendment therein. Of course that would enable the upper house to refuse to pass a money bill, and then to call for a conference, and at that conference to put any amendment in a money bill, and thus defeat the scope of the constitution. I admit that that criticism is quite right; but I think that the hon. member can see that that paragraph of the proposed amendment could be qualified without any difficulty-that we can except from the amendment money bills, and show that it is not to apply to them-that is to say, that hon. members at the joint sitting would not be able to pass a money bill with any amendment therein.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

That would be providing no method of dealing with deadlocks on money bills!

Mr. HIGGINS:

Supposing that you have a money bill which is vetoed by the senate, it is possible to have a joint conference on the mere question: shall that bill, or shall it not, be passed without amendment? Supposing that the decision is that it shall not be passed, then of course another bill must be brought in by the ministry, or the ministry must retire; and all I say is that there must be a modification of paragraph 5 of the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, by making it clear that you cannot in the joint sitting pass a money bill with amendments—that you can only say "yes" or "no" to the money bill as a whole. That is a view to which I should adhere. I am glad that proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, has been brought forward, and supposing that he says that if a majority—but not a two-thirds majority—are in favour of the bill which has been proposed, then the majority can say, "Well, let us have the referendum for the whole people," I have no objection to that.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Does the hon. member agree to a two-thirds majority?

Mr. HIGGINS:

No; I am going to refer to that. But if on the other hand there is a considerable minority, say one-fourth, who are against the bill which has been passed, that minority can also call for a vote of the whole people. I am asked whether I am in favour of a two thirds majority? I am not. I think that under paragraph 5 a simple majority ought to be sufficient—a simple majority of those present, and voting. Of course there can be no doubt that it will be a time of extreme tension when you have two houses sitting together, and in that time of extreme tension nearly all the members would roll up, and I take it that they might secure finality, and quickly, by so simple a device as saying "We will count heads and see who has the greater number." I would suggest, not two-thirds or three-fifths, but a simple majority. In this connection, the matter of a quota becomes very material. I quite agree that if the bill is left with the rigid quota of two to one in the house of representatives, this proposal will not do. I feel with my hon. friends here that the quota proposal is one of the most dangerous proposals for us to put before the electors. I feel that to fix the number of the house of representatives, which is supposed to represent the population of the colonies by the disconnected number of states, would be a most improper thing. What has the representation of the population of Australia to do with the number of states. What connection can there be between the two? Is the house of representatives to wait until the states subdivide before its number of members can be increased? I know that attempts that have been made to qualify the provisions in detail; but they do not qualify it altogether. The quota provision is a most dangerous principle to embody in the bill, if it is to be put before the people of the large colonies; and I shall oppose as strongly as I can even the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, for a joint sitting, if the quota principle is retained. It would give undue weight to what I call the minority house—that is, the senate. In conclusion, I would say that the great argument used throughout against these proposals for solving deadlocks is, "Let the matter alone; questions will settle themselves." That is the old story, the old cant, the old declaration with which we are always met when we propose anything in connection with this matter.

The Hon. J.H. Howe:

There is a good deal of truth in it!

Mr. Higgins:

Quite so. Questions settle themselves; but how do they settle themselves? By the party which says "No" having its way.

The Hon. N.J. Brown:

No!

Mr. Higgins:

Questions continually arise, and the force of the electors is for the time being concentrated with the intention of having a measure carried. To that end members are returned to the houses of assembly who are earnestly desirous of having the measure passed into law. It is sent to the other house, and the other house says "No." In the meantime some other question arises which is more urgent, and the first measure is put aside for the time being. It is settled for the time being by the party which has said "No" having its way. I do not think that that is fair. It is a device which I have watched in operation in these colonies for years past—a device by which, as I think, the reactionary party has for years past obstructed efficient legislation in Australia, I hope that in framing the constitution we shall see that we have some efficient mode of securing finality. After all, it simply comes to the old principle that no man can serve two masters. You cannot have as your final master in this commonwealth both the states and the people. You must have the sovereignty in one or the other. The sovereignty in England—that is, the real power of government-is ultimately placed in the House of Commons. You must have the ultimate power of saying "yea" or "nay" placed somewhere; and if we frame the constitution with something which purports to be a settlement of the question but which is not, we shall be in a sea of difficulties at once. What I feel keenly and bitterly is, that from my own colony there should come a proposal for the dual referendum, which of all things is the most misleading, which will not secure finality, which will be simply a will o'the wisp. People will say, "There is the word 'I referendum,'" just the same as the word "federation." "We follow federation," say the parrots; "We follow referendum," say the parrots. It is a mere word. I decline to be a party to voting for the referendum, which is simply a snare to the people.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

The hon. member believes in a referendum which will be a snare to the states!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I sincerely hope that we will for the present accept the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, which is consistent with the rest of the bill in this respect, that if we cannot decide whether the states or the people are to have the ultimate decision, we may, by a combination of the states' house and the people's house, get some solution of the difficulty which may arise.

The Hon. N.J. BROWN (Tasmania):

We have had during this debate a great many appeals for some mode of arriving at finality. I am about to make an appeal to hon. members to arrive at some sort of finality on the question now before us. There has been a very long and interesting discussion to-day, a continuation, in many rest all events, to-morrow evening, it is about time that we came to a decision on the question before us. Amongst other very pleasant entertainments and reminiscences which we will carry away from Sydney, we have heard the chiming every quarter of an hour of those beautiful bells at the Post Office. We have also had chimes today which have been very pleasant to listen to. I might say that the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, sounded the first quarter of an hour's chime. Then we had the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, and the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, sounding the half-hour chime. Now, I think we might come to the conclusion that our eminent legal friend, Mr. Higgins, has sounded the last quarter of an hour, so that it is about time that the hour struck.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The hour and the man have both come!

The Hon. N.J. BROWN:
Without going into the subject minutely, which would be very improper for me to do, seeing the position I take up, that we have discussed the matter sufficiently, I may say that I listened with very great pleasure, indeed, to the admirable speech of the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, this morning, and also to many other speeches which have been delivered. It seems to me the matter has been sufficiently discussed. Most of us have pretty well made up our minds as to how we shall vote when the question is put. After the first question is decided there are several others which require discussion, and I appeal to hon. members to arrive at a decision within a very short time on the first question before us that is, as to whether the first word of the amendment proposed by the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, shall remain part of the question. After that we can discuss seriatim the several proposals which have been submitted—that is, as to whether we are or are not prepared to add to the amendment of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, certain alternative provisions, and as to which I shall say at once I am perfectly prepared to vote for one or other of them. It would clear the way if it were possible to put the question in some such form that we could arrive at a decision as to whether we will or will not consent to what is generally recognised as a mass referendum. I think there is a clear cleavage of opinion in the Committee on that point, and if it were possible to at once clear that on one side, I should think that we would get on very much better. Unless you, sir, see some mode of putting that before the Committee in a definite form, I am not prepared to suggest any way in which it can be faced. At the present moment we have to decide whether we will or will not accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, and which embodies the mass referendum. I would ask hon. members to take my warning seriously that they have to be very careful as to what they are about, because if the do not deal in the manner in which I think they intend to deal with the intervening amendments they may find themselves landed in a very awkward position with regard to the proposal made by the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, and to which I believe a very large majority of the Committee are opposed. With these few observations, only desiring to expedite business, riot desiring to interrupt useful discussion, but believing that we have had all the debate that is necessary to enable us to make up our minds, I would appeal to hon. members to come to a decision on the first point, at all events, as soon as possible.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[8.43]:

I sympathise very much with the opening remarks of the hon. member, Mr. Brown. I feel that with four days debate on the question of deadlocks we seem to be making little progress. Today the lawyers have discussed the subject at length, but I feel some diffidence, not being a lawyer, in taking part in this debate, which has progressed so long and so far. However, there are a few things I want to say, and perhaps I may as well say them just now. In the first place, I, fancy that many of those who are in the galleries of this house must think that we are contemplating, not a federation of friends, not a federation of those who are of one blood, one nationality, but a union of some kind or other among those who are only waiting a chance to fly at each others' throats. The kind of language we hear suggests the idea that the large colonies seem afraid that the small colonies want to take some advantage of them, and that the small colonies seem to think that the large colonies want to take some advantage of them; in fact, it looks very much as if we were trying to create some huge monster, and that the large colonies, afraid lest its hands should scratch them, want promptly to tie its hands, and that the small colonies, afraid lest its feet should scratch them, want to tie its feet. I do not think that is the spirit in which we should view this question. I think, if we look at the divisions which have taken place here during the last few days, we will find a reason to abandon that point of view altogether. The cleavage in the Convention has not been between the greater and the smaller states. The divisions clearly show that the difference has not been between state and state, but the difference has been almost wholly between those in favour of giving the freest and fullest effect to the public will and those who want to put on brakes, interpose delays, and provide checks. That is the kind of thing we hear about. On the one hand, we are asked to give effect to the popular will, and there is a pretty solid vote here in favour of giving effect to the popular will as soon as it can be ascertained.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
Going back from the original proposal?

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
The hon. member is trying to justify his action!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I am not trying to justify my action I am dealing with the remarks which have been made since the resolution to which the hon. member refers was passed, remarks which seem to suggest that if, was desirable to maintain a second chamber. What for? We heard it to-day from the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, and from several others, that the purpose that this senate is to perform is to be a check on hasty legislation, to be a brake to prevent too rapid progress, to provide for delays here, delays there, and delays yonder.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Not a permanent check!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Not a permanent check; but to cause delay until the agitation has died out. Has not the hon. member heard that "hope deferred maketh the heart sick"? That is the kind of thing that some hon. members seem to desire—to provide checks and delays until those who have started any movement, who have undertaken any task of reform, are so weary and sick of the matter that they would give it up. That is the way they want to kill it.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The hon. member does not want an upper house?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I want an upper house, not to interpose checks and delays, but to be the guardian of state interests; and I want an upper house for no other reason. If an upper house be asked for anything else, I am not amongst those who so ask. It is, perfectly clear, if hon. members mean what they say, that a large number of hon. members desire to so interpose checks and delays. Even the right hon. member, Sir John Forrest, I believe, if he spoke his mind clearly, which he generally does, would tell us candidly that he desires to see a strong senate, not chiefly to protect state interests—that is a very small part of it—but so that these checks, brakes, and delays might be interposed. In regard to that, I am not with the hon. member at all.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
What does the hon. member have an upper house in his own colony for?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I should be sorry to see a repetition of any errors made in the past. I say we should take the good and leave out the bad. As far as that is concerned, the cleavage in the Convention is not between the small and the larger colonies, but between those who wish to interpose checks and those who do not. I would take the division on the motion of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon. I think I am absolutely correct when I say, though it is a little difficult to classify hon. members, that those who voted for that hon. member's motion were, with one exception, conservatives, and those who voted against him were all those who are in favour of progress and obedience to the public will.

Hon. MEMBERS:
Oh, oh!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
What is progress?

Mr. WISE:
Upper house reform!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I expected a storm. I am not going to undertake to answer all questions at once. I will deal with one or two, and with others if they come in later. The hon. member, Sir William Zeal, asked what is progress. I should have thought he would have known.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Upper house reform!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Of course if the hon. member desires to be among the number of those who wish to hinder the popular purpose, and to delay the attainment of what the popular mind has been set upon, I can understand that he does not know what progress is.
The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
I do not if the hon. member is opposing the motion of the hon. member, Mr. Symon, which has been dealt with. In doing so he is acting in an irregular way.
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
If I am acting in an irregular way, I am at least in remarkably good company. I think I am in the company of nearly all the lawyers, and of a very large number of other members of the Convention. In fact, by a majority, the Convention has given an express permission for this debate to take place, and for the very action to be taken which I am now taking. Therefore, if I am irregular, I have for my companions a majority of the Convention, and I am content to be irregular in such company. The remark I made just now as to liberals and conservatives met with a storm of approval and disapproval mixed; but if liberalism and conservatism be classified upon the lines with which I began, I think my remarks will be found to be very near the truth—that those who vote with the hon. member, Mr. Symon, sympathise with his views in desiring these checks and delays.
Mr. SYMON:
And those views are liberal!
Mr. HIGGINS:
They are liberal in their checks on delays!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Very, but not liberal in granting the people the right to do as they want to do—the right of the majority to do as they desire.
Mr. SYMON:
The hon. member does not want the smaller states to be subordinate to the larger populations?
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
It is not a question of large or small states. Does the hon. member want further proof of that? If so, I will give it to him. In the division to which I refer, when the hon. member's motion was dealt with, there were four representatives from South Australia, one of the smaller states, opposed to the hon. member, and only five with him. That looks as if there were no cleavage of states. There were two representatives of the colony of Victoria with the hon. member, and eight against him. That does not look like a cleavage of states. It looks like a cleavage of policy, and when we think whom those hon. gentlemen were, we know well that the cleavage was one of policy, and not one of states. Now, we come to the mother colony of New South Wales, and do we not find precisely the same thing—that the colony does not vote, solid, but that there are two on one side—two tinctured with less liberal views— and that on the other there are eight who are tinctured with more liberal views. Thus, I think I have demonstrated again, in greater detail than I did just now, that the

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The hon. member is becoming the historian of the Convention!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Give us a turn!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

Perhaps the hon. member wants me to say something about Western Australia. The youngest amongst all the Australian colonies is perhaps, for the present, the most conservative, or if the hon. member likes it better, I will put it the other way, and say that the youngest of them all is, for the present, the least liberal. It is coming along very nicely, and if the right hon. gentleman, Sir John Forrest, remains at the head of affairs a few years longer, as we hope he will, I have no doubt that in some future Convention we shall be able to welcome the Western Australians here and find them not in the rearguard but in the very vanguard of the progress of these colonies.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

They are that already!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

For the present we have to take things as they are, and we recognise precisely what they are. I go a little further, and I ask what is before us just now? It seems to me that we have to discuss two or three questions, and the first and foremost is the one of whether we can clear the way—remove the rubbish, so that we may begin to build afresh. At our feet is this very question which was carried the other day by a small majority—which I think will be very soon rescinded when we get to the vote, the question of the simultaneous or consecutive dissolution of the two houses. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, put it this morning that it really did not matter—that it would not prevent a proper measure of public opinion if the dissolution were consecutive. He put it, "Why should not, to-day, the house of representatives appeal to its constituents and put one side of the question, and then, after some months, it may be years, the senate should go to its constituents and put the other side of the question?" The hon. and learned member wished us to believe that the public mind could be tested, the public opinion ascertained, as well in that way as if the two houses went to their constituents together. Why, sir, the thing is absurd. The hon. and learned member is an able advocate, a most clever advocate. I should like to know whether he would be content to deal with any case he might have in court on these lines: would he be content to go before the court to-day with his side of the question, present his case to the court, and obtain what verdict he could, knowing full well that, some months later, the other party to the case, who had not the right to appear in the court when he did, and who had no right to answer his arguments and deal with the other side of the question when he presented his side—that this other party to the cause should come in some months later, when he was unable to present his view of the case-

An Hon. MEMBER:
There is no analogy!

Mr. SYMON:
It is preposterous!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
It is preposterous. My hon. and learned friend has correctly characterised the proposal he made this morning. It is absolutely preposterous.

Mr. SYMON:
The hon. member's proposal, I said!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
The proposal I have put is analogous to the one the hon. and learned member put to us this morning. However, I do not want to do the hon. and learned member any injustice, and I will explain-

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Yes, explain it a little more. I do not understand the hon. member!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I am not surprised. The hon. and learned member seems utterly unable to understand speeches. While he professes his inability to understand speeches, yet he criticises them. Well, an hon. member who, without understanding a speech, will criticise it-I think I had better leave that hon. member alone.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Would the hon. member mind explaining, nevertheless, what he did mean; because I do not think any one understood him?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I will not begin all over again. It is a little too bad that, for the sake of one hon. member, I should take up the time of the Convention for any lengthened period. But as the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, put it this morning, that the public opinion would be gauged just its well by one side of the case being put to-day, without the other, and then the other side of the case being put to-morrow-

Mr. SYMON:
Not without the other!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Yes, without the other.

Mr. SYMON:
No; the electors would vote!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
The hon. member's whole contention was that if you let both vote together you would have a condition of heated feeling. Was not that the very essence of the hon. and learned member's argument? He said, "Send the two houses to their constituents together, present the two views of the question at the same time, and you have personal feeling aroused, and political feeling aroused." So, in order to avoid these difficulties, he said, "Put the one case to-day, and put the other case in the future." I was showing that that was an utter absurdity, and I claim that the interjection of the hon. and learned member just now fairly described the proposal he made-it is absolutely preposterous.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Does not the hon. member believe in time for reflection?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Yes, I do; but I believe in putting both sides of the case, and not hearing one side first and then the other side later on. The plan proposed by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, is one which I am quite sure will not be assented to at the final meeting of this Convention, if it be agreed to tentatively on this occasion. That it has not been finally agreed to on this occasion is clear from the fact that we have the permission of the majority of the Convention to reconsider and rescind the motion. Now I come to the next scheme before us, and that is the proposal to give an-alternative dissolution-to enable the executive of the day, in place of doing what the hon. member, Mr. Symon, would permit it to do, to order a simultaneous dissolution. I ask those who are on the other side of the question to myself what they think of that? Is it not absolutely certain, will not all those of us who have had any experience of government believe, that with such an alternative, the administration would on every occasion dissolve both houses together? Is it at all likely, is it within the bounds of possibility, that a ministry, dependent for its existence upon members of the house of representatives, would send that house and not the other house to the country at any time? It seems to me that we are simply trying to rescind our resolution without appearing to rescind it, playing fast and loose with ourselves in considering any such proposition. If we accepted the proposal at all, it would be accepted for the appearance of things; and not at all on its merits. The question of a dual referendum has been debated at such length that I do not feel justified in going over the arguments again. I can only sum up the question in these words: It has been admitted by even its advocates that a dual referendum settles nothing, but leaves the question where it was at the beginning.

Mr. LYNE:
Worse! The Hon. F.W. HOLDER: If possible in a worse state, because public feeling will have been inflamed, public excitement will have been intensified, and the whole difficulty will have become accentuated. I do no think that those who desire to see a dual referendum themselves believe that it would be a satisfactory way out of the difficulty with which we are face to face. The Right Hon. the Premier of South Australia has made a proposal which appears to be a very proper one, indeed, and the more we consider it, the better we shall like it. I should like, at the same time, to put this view before the Convention: The scheme is a somewhat complicated one, and I do not know if any of us at present are prepared to Pass our final judgment upon it. The first impression of most of us is favourable; but, personally, I feel that I should like to reserve my final judgment, especially upon some of the details, until a few calculations have been made, and until some consideration has been given to the possible results, of the working of such a scheme. Is there any necessity to deal finally with the question now? Is it of any use? We have put aside another question-the question of finance, a question not more difficult than is this question, not involving more radically the existence of the federation than does this scheme, and if we are obliged to put aside that question for further consideration, would it not be wiser to deal similarly with this question. I regret exceedingly that we cannot finish our work now. I had hoped when we came here that we should be able to conclude our work this session, and that we should be able to appeal for the popular verdict upon that work at an early period, but it seems absolutely necessary now that we should consent to an adjournment. When we next meet we shall have not fifty members but ten others, sixty in all. Whatever we do now if we adopt that which seems in the light of our present knowledge and experience, and with the information now before us the most perfect scheme, the question will have to be debated over again in another session.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Surely we are not going to drop all our discussion on the off-chance of Queensland coming in?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

I will allow there is great weight in what the right hon. gentleman says; but, even if we leave that out of consideration—I do not like to do so, because I hope to see Queensland in—but, if we leave her out of consideration for the time-being, we shall all have had time for second thoughts upon the various matters we have been discussing here. Would it not be folly, knowing that we have three or four months to come before we lock the door behind us, to settle anything now definitely and irreversibly?

Mr. LYNE:

We cannot settle the question definitely. We shall have to reopen it!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

I know that nothing we do will be done irreversibly. We are all anxious to make the best use of the very precious hours which remain to us to deal with the various matters before us, and the question is whether it is of any advantage to do anything tonight which would be admittedly and avowedly tentative, inviting public criticism and provoking debate upon the platform and the press, so that when we come together again we may have not only the advantage of our own second thoughts, but also the advantage of the second thoughts and review of very many people outside. I am quite sure that whether we do or do not deliberately wait for that criticism we shall have it, and we might just as well wait for it, and instead of spending more time now, in considering this subject, it does seem to me that the wise course for this Convention to follow will be to determine that, as with the finance question, so with this, we will put in pro forma, to fill the gap, avowedly tentatively, some provision which shows that we mean to deal in some way or other with this question of deadlocks, and that we should wait before finalising what we do until we meet again with the additional wisdom which time and experience will bring us, and we settle it, as we shall have to settle it then, once and for all.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):[9.6]:

I do not think that the proposition of my hon. friend who last spoke would be a wise one for this Convention to adopt. My right hon. friend, the Prime Minister of Victoria, has stayed here at very great inconvenience, under circumstances which loudly call for him in his own colony, in order that he may assist in arriving at some settlement of this question. I believe that the settlement to which we should come on this occasion is one which speaks our honest voice. I do not think that it is right that we should adopt some proposal on the mere ground that it is only a tentative proposal I think that there are dangers surrounding a course of that kind which only used to be stated to convince my hon. friend who has just spoken that it would be unwise to adopt it. When we consider the extreme activity, the extreme animosity, of some of the criticism which the enemies of federation bestow upon every stage, every act, and every word in the furtherance of the project, we cannot be too anxious in seeing that whatever we do at this meeting we should do it up to the time which is limited to us, in the spirit that expresses the opinions that we have - that we put it there, because up to this stage it is the best that we can arrive at. Everybody knows that, if we adjourn, our conclusions at this moment are not final. Those who are friends of this movement will be sufficiently active to explain that where we have decided a question, the very nature of the case deprives that decision of entire finality, if it is a fact that we are at some time to adjourn in order to enable Queensland to join in our deliberations. But it will never do for us to come to a decision on a matter and say "We have only put that into the bill pro forma - we have put that there only in such a form and under such circumstances as deprive you, the public, of the right of criticism." It was intended from the beginning that every stage of our work should be open to public criticism and we cannot get away from the necessity of our work being open to public criticism by simply saying, "This is pro forma," or "That is tentative." We must, within the time limited to us, do whatever we are able to do, and I intend to ask the Convention to sit during all the time that is available to it-to sit up to such a time that the clauses of this bill will, in we way or other, be dealt with, and in the dealing with them hon. members will express that which we up to then consider it is right and just for us to do. We have no right to play with the public. Whatever opinions are held about some of us-as to whether one is a little more democratic or a little more conservative than another-we knew very well that, being elected by the people, our charge is from the people, and that we must determine our work up to that time at which we have for the time being to separate, in such a way as to show that we are earnest in our work, and doing nothing formal and nothing tentative.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think that the hon. member, Mr. Holder, has expressed the same views!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I was going to say that I think my hon. friend is really not separated very much from me in opinion, and that when he used the words "Pro forma" and "tentative" he simply meant that we should exercise the best of our judgment as to those matters with which we can deal in the time which remains to us, and that nevertheless we should allow them to go to the country as up to the time the best provisions that had occurred to us. If the country is in favour of federation-as I believe it is, and I think that when I speak of the country I am entitled to speak of the continent-if the continent is in favour of federation, there need be no fear that the work we do will be understood not to be final, because it cannot be final when we are waiting the advent of Queensland, and it is in its essence not final. But it does not follow that we are entitled to put anything in the bill which is merely a pro forma expression of some view which someone else has expressed, and not the honest view of the majority. I do not wish to make any speech to-night. I think we have had a very full and long discussion on this matter. Let it be recollected that this is the fourth day during which these proposals for deadlocks have been discussed. I think it is time we came to a division. It is always to be recollected that the decision is subject to review, and subject to review on our own part, but it must, nevertheless, be regarded as the decision which animates us upon such information as we have up to the present time, and such argument as has pressed upon and convinced our minds. We have had a number of propositions-in fact the whole question is entangled with propositions-

An Hon. MEMBER:

How many of them are there?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I am not a good arithmetician.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Five!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I know that a number of propositions have been put before us, and I think it would have been better if the suggestion I made this morning that the decision come to on Friday should be rescinded had been adopted, not because it was necessary in passing the vote of rescission that the Convention should express its opinion that everything in the amendment was bad, but because it would have been a good way to open up the ground afresh, and to arrive at some decision which, after all the arguments and opinions expressed, could have had some chance of expressing with that new knowledge our then opinion upon the question at issue. Unfortunately that course has not been followed. What is the position now?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

It is one of entanglement!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

We have carried a proposal for a consecutive dissolution, a proposal which in itself is entirely novel, and which, if I may characterise it, means that where there are two houses resting upon the same suffrage and deriving authority practically from the same people, and if there is a difference between them, because one of them is called a house of representatives and the other the senate, that difference is to remain. The arguments of those who think that there should be a difference between them contradict the position which they set up when they say that the senate is not constituted as an ordinary upper house but as a house to represent the states. If this were a case of mere upper and lower houses, there might be some reason for the arguments advanced that one of them should be dissolved before the other. But being constituted in the way they will be constituted when they are established, both of them springing from the same source and from the same suffrage, and differentiated only in that the members of one represents districts and the other states; the only difference between them is that they are so constituted that one of them represents the general and national interests and the other, not the local, but the provincial and state interests. That has been the argument of most of our friends who uphold the position of the senate, and I am very strongly influenced by the desire to maintain a strong senate in the commonwealth. But they must not fall away from that argument, and when we seek to apply to two popular houses the remedies—if you like to call them remedies, or the appliances or instruments if you like—which are properly applicable to houses resting on the same basis, they must not go away from that and say, "Oh, we make a difference here, because who ever heard of an upper house being dissolved?" It is not a question of an upper house according to their form of reasoning. Neither is it with me a question of an upper house. I agree with them that it is not an ordinary upper house. It may have to perform some of the functions of an upper house, because this is a question of bi-cameral legislation. But those functions of an upper house are intrusted to it simply because it has been already called into existence as a house to represent the states, and having that reason for its existence, it is also called upon to exercise the other function of a second chamber. If that were not so, you would have the peculiar anomaly of a constitution involving a third house of legislature.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Is not the continuity of the senate a very material difference?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Yes; but I was not touching a upon that point. I was saying that unless you have three chambers of legislature you must have a chamber representing the people according to districts, another chamber representing states as states, and that chamber discharging the ordinary functions of an upper house. If you want to make a logical distinction between all these things you will want three chambers; but we have already resolved that we shall only have two chambers. It is for that reason that the functions of an ordinary upper house have been cast into the hands of the senate, which primarily represents the states. Two houses being called into existence in that way, the primary functions of the senate not being those of an upper house, it seems to me that a great deal of the argument is wasted as to the position of an upper house. A great deal of argument which would be tenable and right in order to prevent an upper house from being dissolved or from sharing the same fate as its congener which is based on the same foundation, seems to perish with a statement of that distinction. I was always, therefore, in favour, from the moment this proposal of a double dissolution came forward, of the proposal that there should not be a consecutive dissolution; but if it became a question of taking the whole sense of the country in some such way as would tell the two chambers what the country desired, the dissolution should be a dissolution of both chambers. Now we have arrived at a difference. I have already announced, as far as I am personally concerned, that the proposal made by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner is to my mind a superior proposal to that which the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, has put forward. I have already announced that, although I might see it as an ultimate resort in a state which was not federal, I cannot see in a federal state the justice of applying the general referendum.

Mr. LYNE:

Does not the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's proposal depend upon adhering to the proposal already carried, that of the hon. member, Mr.
Symon?
The Hon. E. BARTON:
I do not know that, because the proposal of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner starts as an alternative, But I was going to make an explanation which I think will satisfy my hon. friend. I said that as between the two proposals put forward I have always been of opinion that there should be a resort to the principle underlying constitutional government: the principle of responsibility of members and ministers before resort is made to any such instrument as the referendum. I think I explained that at such length that it is not necessary to state it again, except very briefly, because I thought, and I still think, that a direct application of the referendum is an abandonment of that feeling of responsibility, and because I think that after we have taken all this trouble to convince our neighbours of the small states that you can only govern this federation according to the ways we know as Britishers, that you can only govern according to the principles of responsible government if you once convince them, either by your arguments or by that very potent argument of a vote, that you are going to apply that principle of responsible government; having said that that heritage of ages which we possess as constitutional government, as responsible government, is a thing we must all stick to in this constitution, I have always been of opinion that we are not very consistent, that we are not very true to the arguments we put forward, if, having once enunciated that principle, we turn to an expedient which is calculated to sap and undermine responsible government, and that is the referendum. Well, having felt that, I consider that we have now, in the discussion which has proceeded to such lengths, dropped into a most unfortunate position. I believe we would have done well perhaps, had we agreed to a double dissolution, and I believe we should do more perhaps now, if, as the first step in what we are going to do on this head, we do agree to a double dissolution.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. E. BARTON:
It is not only possible to do it, but I think perhaps that the common-sense of the country will be satisfied if we agree to a double dissolution without first resorting to the expedient of my hon. friend Mr. Symon's alternative, because I do feel rather strongly that if there is to be this dissolution on account of a deadlock, while you may wire draw and hammer a theory, and wire draw and hammer it again, you still get back to this position, that a dissolution is the constitutional method of ascertaining the opinions of the people with regard to elected houses; and having once grasped that principle it would seem a curious thing to abandon it with regard to one house, and to maintain it with regard to the other; so that if I had to choose, if we had nothing before us but this question whether we should have a consecutive dissolution or a simultaneous dissolution, I should be in favour of the latter. But we seem to have got beyond that stage. We have a lot of other proposals. My hon. friend, Mr. Lyne, wants to tack on to a consecutive dissolution, against which I voted, a further proposal that there should be a general referendum in case of need; and my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, wants to tack on to the consecutive dissolution a power for a double dissolution and then for a dual referendum.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I want it in lieu of the other!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
My right hon. friend wants to tack on to a consecutive dissolution an alternative power for a double dissolution and then for a dual referendum in case of need. I omitted the word "alternative."

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Not to tack it on, but to substitute it!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
He wants to add to it. He wants to give that additional power, that the governor shall have two powers in his hands—that is to say, he can either give a consecutive dissolution or he may give in place of that a simultaneous dissolution of both houses, and then in case of need there shall be a dual referendum.

Mr. SYMON:
I understand that, he has given way—that he only wants the dual referendum

The hon. E. BARTON:
I am told by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon, that his understanding is that my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, is ready to give way about a double dissolution and to tack on the power of the dual referendum only to the consecutive dissolution. I should like to know if that is so?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Not to tack it on; I do not like that word!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I will use any other form of words my hon. friend prefers.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I am quite willing to accept the double referendum in lieu of the proposal of my hon. friend. It is only the strong arguments of the leader of the Convention that induced me to agree to the double dissolution.

The Hon. E. Barton:

I am very much obliged to my right hon. friend. He, therefore, comes back to his original proposal, that the dual referendum shall be an alternative to a consecutive dissolution. I have already stated that, as far as I am personally concerned, I do not accept a referendum as an alternative to a dissolution, and for this particular reason: that I cannot accept any alternative to the proper responsibility of ministers and members to the country which brought them into their places. It is all very well to tell us that the dissolution does not settle the question in specie—that it does not settle the particular-question, and that the referendum does. That is not necessary to my argument. And the main argument is this: that we have forced, I will say by our arguments, the other states to agree to a form of constitutional government. We are not consistent if we add to the method of constitutional government something which looks very pleasant and very innocuous, but which will be the first instrument resorted to by a minister in order to save the skins and necks of his colleagues and his supporters. We do not want that. I have said already that in the last resort I would support some form of referendum, but I must be tireless in saying that I support any such thing as a last resort, as a proposal which I have to accept in deference to some public opinion with which I do not agree, because I cannot conceive of a man being true to the cause of federation yet saying that he will withstand that demand until he gets exactly what he wants. We can never get federation on those terms. Therefore, much as I am against this principle of the referendum, I will submit to that under certain limitations, and those limitations are these: that the responsibilities of ministers and members must first be recognised. Their responsibility is only to be conserved and accentuated by a dissolution. Now we come to a different set of principles. My hon. friend, Mr. Lyne, accepts that proposal, and he proposes to add on to it a general referendum.

Mr. Lyne:

I should prefer the dissolution of both houses at once!

The Hon. E. Barton:

My hon. friend accepts the proposal with regard to a dissolution whether consecutive or simultaneous, and proposes to add on a general referendum. There I am at issue with him, because I have said already that I think that a general referendum cannot really be a just method of determining a dispute in which the interests of the states are inherently and thoroughly embedded. I hold that opinion still, and whilst I might under certain circumstances see the justice of the referendum in a state constituted like New South Wales, or any one of these colonies, which do not rest upon the federal principle, I cannot reconcile my mind to what is called the justness of the proposition, when it is committed to one of the parties to a dispute to settle the dispute with the other party. Then in what position are we left? There is the dual referendum. As I ventured to say in a speech last week my difficulty about the dual referendum is this: that whilst I concede that some of the most important proposals which may emanate from the government in this commonwealth may be called national in their application, from the fact that they apply to every citizen in the nation; yet if they are, such proposals as finance, military matters, the regulation of trade and customs, immigration and emigration, and so on, they are so wrapped up in themselves with matters which are vital to the state that it is impossible to disentangle these things, and the result is that if you try to say, "That matter is a state matter," you are met with the answer, "Yes, but it is also a national matter." You can say on the other hand, as some hon. members say "This is a national matter," but you are met again with the answer, "yes, but it is also a state matter." And it is a state matter in most cases; and I put the illustration as I put it before, that if you wish to make a federal tariff a question whether you are going to leave a surplus over and above the requirements of the commonwealth of £1,500,000 or £4,500,000, that is a question of what the financial policy of every state is to be. I, of course, wait for instruction in the matter; but I cannot conceive the reason or truth of any assertion that that is not a matter in which the very existence of every state as such is involved, and the well-being of the commonwealth is involved. Therefore, if a general referendum is to be resorted to in those matters which belong to the nation apart from provincial entanglements, and the dual referendum is to be resorted to for matters which belong to the people of the provinces, and subject to those entanglements, that will bring us to the conclusion that these matters should be subject to a dual referendum and not the general referendum. But then I fall back upon this, that much as I am in favour of adopting some proposal for the settlement of deadlocks, I find that if we have to resort to a general referendum we refer to one party in the dispute as to a a method which is effective and not just, whilst by the other course we revert to a method which all the representatives of the small states seem to regard as just. But the argument is used that it is not effective; but there is no man who believes that disputes will go to the length of reaching referendums who can come to the conclusion that the dual referendum does not run into some danger of being ineffective-that it may be perfectly just, but that it may be ineffective. Then, if I may put my position, I should like to place it in this way: I was perfectly prepared to adopt the double dissolution. I was not prepared to adopt a consecutive dissolution. I was prepared to adopt some method of dissolution which would be at the same time effective and just. I have not been able to find a combination of justice and effectiveness in the general referendum. I have not been able to find a combination of justice and effectiveness in the dual referendum, because where one preponderates in favour of justice it is ineffective, and where the other preponderates in favour of effectiveness it is unjust. Therefore, if we can find a means for the solution of difficulties which avoids the referendum I, for one, so long as it is a means which conserves the ordinary principles of responsibility, and is a fair means for the settlement of disputes between a free people, am willing to welcome a proposal at least to that end. I think that is where we are now.

Mr. LYNE:

Then what will we do?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

My hon. friend asks me what then we shall do. The first thing we ought not to do is to admit my hon. friend's proposition. We find ourselves then in this position: that we are all in favour of some solution of deadlocks.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

I am not!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I quite omitted him; more than that, I was very unfair. When I said we were all in favour of it I meant that we had carried a vote by 30 to 15. I did not mean to disparage the 15 in any way.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

I have satisfied myself since that a number of the fifteen are dissatisfied!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I think there are a number of us who are dissatisfied about nearly all the propositions which come before us, and that is the natural result of trying to tinker up a constitution with artificial and paper experiments. But I have never faltered in saying this: that I consider this constitution as it stands, would have been sufficient without any of these experiments. But if public opinion demands the adoption of some experiment, let us try to arrive at one which will combine effectiveness with justice. A proposal has been brought forward that if a deadlock exists, and is not solved by a dissolution—and I should prefer that proposal to saying that if a deadlock exists, and is not solved by a double dissolution—then the two houses shall sit and vote together, and by a majority of two-thirds or three-fifths, whichever it is to be, that majority can carry a bill.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Two-thirds would be better than three-fifths!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I am not quite sure about that, because after all, if we once think of a proposition of this kind, we are debating then about what is the proper majority to secure the reasonable independence of the house of representatives on the one hand, and of the senate on the other; and I was inclined to think that a majority of three-fifths would be sufficient to show that. That would mean, in two conjoined houses of 112 members, 67 3/5, and, as you cannot cut a man into five pieces and take three, it would mean 68. Are we continually, as I put it a little while ago, to wire-draw and hammer, and hammer and wire-draw again, about the ultimate effect of constitutional propositions? Are we not to try to adopt something which will be the most convenient, the least expensive, the most effective, and the least unjust of the proposals we can get adopted for making a constitution workable? When I say making a constitution workable I mean this: this constitution would be entirely workable without any of these proposals. But when I say workable, in the second sense of the word, I mean workable according to the beliefs and ideas of the people; and I believe that the people of the states, and the people of the commonwealth that is to be, would welcome any solution of the difficulty which did not necessarily lead to an accumulation of that terrible process of voting which some of our politicians here so much deprecate. I heard a gentleman in one of the houses of our legislature say that under this federal constitution a man would never be done voting—that a man would not be able to swallow his breakfast before he would have to go to a municipal election to cast his vote, and before he got to his lunch he would probably have cast his vote in a provincial election, a local government election, and a federal election, and then somebody might say to him, "Come along here, you have not finished yet; come and vote at a referendum." Is it not rather a serious thing to contemplate, that we are multiplying these occasions of voting, that we are asking our people to vote, vote, vote about this and that, until they will become so tired of voting that they will say, "A plague o' both your houses?" If, then, we can arrive at a reasonable solution of this difficulty, which may not be according to the theories of economists and philosophers, but which may give its proper weight to the decisions of the two houses in such a way that it will be an ultimate solution, which in the majority of cases will not cause an irritation in the state or jar and confusion in the commonwealth; if we can do that, without necessarily rushing out into the country and making speeches in favour of the adoption of some proposal as to a dissolution or a referendum, my belief is that our fellow countrymen will not be angry with us but will thank us. I said a little while ago that I was not bound down at this stage of our proceedings absolutely to the adoption of any proposal; but I cannot help thinking that there is a great deal of good sense in the suggestion made by the Prime Minister of this colony. I should prefer myself that the proposal for the two houses to sit together should follow a dissolution of both houses, so that the one house should not have it in its power to penalise the other, and that whatever good was to be got out of a general election should, at the same expense to the country, be got out of both houses as well as out of one.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is what Mr. Carruthers wants!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Yes, I understand so. I say I prefer that. But I think we shall be unwise if we go with our political guns trying to shoot every political hare of theory that we can possibly find in the country. We are not here for the purpose of devoting ourselves to dissolutions or referendums or anything else. We are here for the purpose of making a machine which will be the vehicle of the intentions, and the will of the people of the country; and if we succeed in any way in applying some method which, in the case of a difference between the two houses, will lead to a settlement of that difference without inordinate expense and without inordinate delay, then, after all, does it not seem a good thing that we should make an effort to apply that instrument instead of running hair-brained into our theories? My belief is that there is a great deal to be said in favour of the proposal that there should be a sitting together of the two houses. I have postponed saying what I am about to say until this moment. I think it will be remembered that, in discussing this proposal about deadlocks at Adelaide, I said if you were going to plaster something on to your engine to be called a safety-valve - and I do not think there is much of the safety-valve in any of these things - then the best thing you could do was to put on to it the least ostentatious and least expensive thing. I am not in favour of, nor do I care about, the enormous expense of a lot of dissolutions and referendums, knowing as I do that the federal election must have cost the five colonies between them something like £40,000 or £50,000, or at any rate £30,000. I am not in favour of expedients of this kind unless I see that the actual necessities of the people, the preservation of their liberties, require such things, in which case I should think no expense too much, unless I saw that there was some other means of conserving the liberties of the people without unduly saddling and burdening them. I think we may avoid the undue saddling and burdening of the people by adopting the suggestion of the right hon. the Premier of New South Wales. Every one knows that the hon. gentleman and myself do not camp in the same place politically. Every one knows that we have been very much at loggerheads in provincial politics; but I think the hon. member will give Mr. Reid and myself credit for this, that we are anxious to adopt some reasonable method of getting out of this difficulty without much expense, and, at the same time, preserving every attribute of liberty to the people. To this end we ought to leave off hair-splitting, and take to what is in accordance with commonsense and reason. Now, I do put it to this Convention, that while as between the proposition of the right hon. the Premier of Victoria and the proposition of Mr. Lyne, I must vote with the right hon. the Premier of Victoria, since these two proposals were put before the Convention, we have had brought forward another proposal which is eminently deserving of the consideration of every man among us who favours the preservation of the popular liberties, and their salvation from undue, unnecessary, and burdensome expense.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It will necessarily mean that the ratio between the two houses will be preserved!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The hon. and learned member is right there. I suppose that the less populous states will be disinclined to support this proposal unless they found there was to be some reasonable proportion maintained between the number of members in the senate and the number of members in the house of representatives. Upon that supposition, which I ought in fairness to make, I can quite see the objection urged by my hon. friends on the other side from Victoria to the quota; yet, having considered and weighed them, I have not been able to come to the conclusion that Victoria will, any more than will any other colony, suffer from the application of the quota principle, nor do I see any inherent injustice in maintaining the ratio of one house at the low ratio of one-half of the other. The only argument that has been urged with any consequence and effect against it is that in some places, such as the United States, there has been a steady and regular number of the members of the senate—that that house, has not been increased, although the number of the house of representatives has been increased; but I find that that argument comes from a number of gentlemen who have frequently told us that we ought not to rely upon the example of the United States or of any other federation. That does seem to me to be an application of a maxim with which we are acquainted in law, "The argument from inconvenience matters much." When gentlemen who have told me that we ought not to apply certain theories and practices in our constitution, because if we do so we shall be copying them from some other constitution, turn round and tell us that we ought to apply certain arguments and theories at this stage because we shall be copying them from another constitution, I do not see any consistency in their position. In reply to the interjection of the hon. and learned gentleman, I must say that I have not yet seen the injury to his colony—the injury to any colony—that will follow from the application of the quota system, and I do not believe that the maintaining of a certain proportion between the two houses will do anything which will take away from the prestige, the influence, or the command of the house of representatives which, though I believe that there will be a strong senate, I believe will be a stronger house than the senate. I do not wish to detain the Committee any longer, I only thought it was right that I should make this explanation in regard to my own views, because, as between the two amendments, I wish to restate that I prefer that of my right hon. friend Sir George Turner, to that of my hon. friend, Mr. Lyne; but, since the now amendment has been suggested, which has been spoken by the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, and the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, I cannot help thinking that both those amendments throw a great deal of added light on the situation, and it may be that it would be a wise thing if the Convention were to adopt some proposal such as that, and avoid all the difficulties, all the dangers, not to the provinces, but to the commonwealth itself that is to be—all the dangers that would arise from the constant practice of making fresh occasions for votes, and the great expense that would accompany that—and I think that, on the whole, I shall think it my duty to vote with my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, as I announced I would, against the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Lyne; but I will still hold myself free in relation to the amendment suggested by my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

What does the hon. and learned gentleman propose to do as regards the provision that has already been carried—a successive dissolution?

Mr. SYMON:

The proposal of the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, could follow upon that!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The proposal of my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, could follow upon that; but I am not going to conceal my opinion—I think I have expressed it earlier. in the remarks that I have made—that I do not think that a proposition like that, standing in the way it does, is one that it would be advisable to adopt; but that a proposal providing for a dissolution of one or both houses, if followed by the proposal that my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, has made, would be deprived of a great many of its objections, and I would take that rather than I would take nothing—I would add it on to the proposal of my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon, rather than I would take nothing. But the more—I put it in this way—you conform yourselves to the ordinary methods in British constitutions of settling disputes by way of dissolution, and the less you complicate all your proposals by unnecessary dissolutions, referendums, votes, or anything else—the simpler and shorter you make your business in this regard—then the more I shall be likely to support the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN:

Before I put the question I think I should intimate to the Committee that inasmuch as we have now discussed this question for four days, the time for general discussion will pass when this amendment is disposed of, and I shall ask hon. members afterwards to confine themselves to the particular amendment under discussion. I will first of all—

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[9.49]:

Before you put the amendment, sir, I should like to address a few words to the Committee. As the division that is likely to be taken is a critical one, I ask the attention of hon. members for a few minutes whilst I try and support some of the arguments advanced in favour of the position that I intend to assume on this occasion. We have several methods proposed for the settlement of deadlocks. We have also had the suggestion made that whether any such provisions are or are not adopted, the ship of state will not be in danger. I stand by the position which I originally took up that if, in this constitution, no provision be made for deadlocks very little harm will result. I agree with the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, in the remarks which he made at the beginning of the debate today, that in dealing with this question we have laid rather too much stress upon the necessity of making these provisions, and we are raising in the public mind a fear that, if a particular method of solving these difficulties is not adopted, the federation, from the point of view of one state or of another, will become a dangerous experiment. I do not share these feelings, because I think that we have been dealing with exceedingly remote possibilities, and not with probabilities, of difficulty. But we have to face the fact that there is prejudice in regard to the establishment of a provision against deadlocks, and that I desire to respect it is the apology which I offer for departing from opinions which I would otherwise stick to tenaciously. I say this because I do not believe in a referendum of any kind. I think that as a matter of general policy it is very strongly to be condemned. It would be a mistake under consolidation, and therefore in accepting it, or rejecting it, my idea is to assist the federal cause. I do not accept it because I think it would be in all respects efficacious, or that it is the remedy required. Hon. members who suggest the referendum to cure these imaginary disorders have not the courage of their convictions, because not a single exercise of the referendum which affirms the desirability of a particular law will make that proposed law legislation. We have had suggestions for a referendum from New South Wales and from Victoria; but, with the exception of the solution suggested by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, there has not been one proposal which would be final in its operation.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:

The suggestion of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, is not necessarily final!

Mr. Lyne:

It is not final in the way the hon. member proposed it!

Mr. Glynn:

I understood that the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, proposes that if, after the dissolution, two-thirds of the joint houses decide upon a certain course, that course will become law, upon being recommended on address to the governor. If that is so, it is final. If it is not, we are continuing this academic discussion to absolutely no purpose, and the result will lead to harm. By making provisions for deadlocks which are not final, you will be keeping up ferment and turmoil in the state. There are two methods of solving these difficulties, either of which I shall be prepared, if obliged to do so, to adopt. I believe that the suggestion of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, is one which the Convention, consistently with what ought to be conserved by the representatives of the smaller and of the larger states, might affirm, of course, upon the understanding that the numerical proportion of representation will be preserved. It has been objected by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, that this principle, as applied to constitutional amendment in France, has been condemned by Mr. Burgess, and according to his testimony has broken down. I would like to show by two instances only, how it has really operated in France. I believe that, in the French Constitution, it is provided that if the senate, by an absolute majority, decides that a constitutional revision is to take place, and the Chamber of Deputies, by a similar majority does the same, the two must come together and form the National Assembly, and the revision is made upon the voting of an absolute majority of that body. Hon. members are told, in effect, that if we amalgamate the two houses here, we shall have the numerical disparity which exists between them individually existing under the amalgamation. But what are the facts in France? The figures which I will give to hon. members on the point are striking. In 1884, about seven or eight years after the adoption of the constitution, in one of the most crucial divisions in the National Assembly, the point which had to be decided was one that vitally affected the strength of the Senate. If we find the voting going on as it would under consolidation, it is a very strong argument in favour of the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, because it will show that the members of the two houses vote, not according to their respective numbers—I think the proportion between the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies in France is three to five—but largely according to their personal views of the subject under consideration.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

They do not vote as representing separate states!

Mr. GLYNN:

No, but at the same time they represent constituencies infinitely stronger in prejudice; they represent classes. Besides it is a case of one house against the other. In a federation you find state divided on matters of consolidation and not on state interests. In a division taken in 1875, the voting was 526 against 249, and in 1884, in a division in the National Assembly as the result, of a prolonged agitation upon the point in dispute, the division was 509 against 172. I, therefore

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I was not laughing at that. I did not hear it!

Mr. GLYNN:

Whatever may be the cause of the hon. member's cachinnation I know that he has strong opinions as to state rights which might lead him to suspect a proposal from a large state. I would ask the representatives of the small states what more could they ask than this proposal made by the Victorian representatives, that is, that even after the mandate of the people is given by the referendum it is not to be final even as regards the action of the senate? Even after the referendum they say, "we will leave you in the position in which you were originally, trusting that the voice of the states and of the people will ultimately lead to a moderation of the views of the senate, and that the legislation desired will be passed." I exceedingly regret that my friends did not at the very beginning accept the olive branch that was offered by Victoria. If it had been accepted it would have saved us a great deal of trouble. Then we have the suggestion made by the Right Hon.
C.C. Kingston; but an objection which is exceedingly strong against that is this: that for the sake of getting a referendum upon a state question you make provision for a referendum in all unitarian matters. That is to take place simply because you are, driven to the necessity of making a referendum on a state or federal question.

Mr. SYMON:

Mr. GLYNN:

Certainly, after the double dissolution. But on a matter of abstract policy which is applicable to a federation, the hon. member says you must introduce the general referendum, because there is a necessity for introducing the referendum to settle the clashing of interests between state and state, I object to it, because I think that the referendum as a matter of policy ought not to be adopted. The principal matter we have to discuss, and the one upon which all the argument really has turned, has been what is suggested by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon. As a matter of fairness to the large states, I cannot see how the representatives of the smaller states should support that. It certainly destroys the power of initiation in the lower house.

The Hon. N.J. BROWN:

How can that be?

Mr. GLYNN:

Undoubtedly, it does that.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: No!

Mr. GLYNN:

If the lower house is to be dissolved on a matter of legislation which is blocked by the upper house, and you have to wait for six months and again dissolve that house, the house of representatives never will introduce very radical measures, because they will know that it will, or fear that it may, mean the extinction of some of their number. The suggestion of my hon.
and learned friend, Mr. Symon, is first dissolve the house of representatives, wait for a time, and then dissolve the two houses. To do that would be absolutely to impose a penalty on the introduction of radical legislation. The distinction here will be between the senate as the conservative house and the house of representatives as the radical house, and I think hon. members should bear that in mind in considering what the are likely to do on this question.
Mr. GLYNN:

It maybe the present practice in all the states; but the position is altogether different in a unitarian system, because there is not the same apology for the action of the Legislative Council as there will be for the action of the states house; its full strength is embedded in the constitution itself, and the position is altogether different. I will not detain the Committee any longer. I trust, whatever decision is arrived at, it will be one that will lead to moderation and temperance on the part of hon. members. I believe we have reached a very critical stage in our deliberations, a moment which really will test the mettle of which men are made, which will make a very large draft on the temperance and judgment of the members of the Convention, and I hope that in our voting our patriotism will be shown to have risen to the level of the emergency.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[10.3]:

Before I say a few words

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

Mr. LYNE:

I will be just as long as I like. The hon. member cannot "sit" on me as he "sits" on the members of the Legislative Council of Victoria. I have remained here very quiet all day, and I should not have risen to say a word now had it not been for the speech of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton. After he decided, first one thing, and then another thing, and then nothing at all, I think it is about time for me to say something. I desire, first, to know in what position we are regarding the proposal before the Committee. I understand that the actual question before the Committee is the omission of the word "if." That is the first word of the amendment I moved in connection with the mass referendum. What I want to know particularly is whether, in voting on that question, it is intended to be a vote for or against the mass referendum? I am prepared to submit to the will of the majority of this Convention; but I am determined, if possible, to have a straight out vote on the question of a mass referendum or no mass referendum.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Mr. LYNE:

I will tell the hon. member the reason why I am determined to have a straight out vote on this question. It is that I will use it hereafter. I would be much obliged to you, sir, if you could, tell me at the present stage whether it is to be understood that in voting on the question to omit the word "if," it is to be it vote for or against a general or national referendum, or whether, in view of that word being expunged, the amendment of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, then comes in, and is voted upon; and if the word "if" is rejected, the amendment that I have given notice of will be voted upon?

The CHAIRMAN:

I think that a test vote will have to be taken upon the word "if," because if the word is struck out, and if the amendment of the right hon. member is amended by the hon. and learned member Mr. Wise's amendment to insert certain words, they would be inconsistent with the remainder of the clause as proposed by the hon. member, Mr. Lyne.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The last words of the amendment are "as hereafter mentioned." It seems to me that it is quite competent to submit a proposal for a dual referendum on which an amendment might be moved for a mass referendum, or it is quite competent to submit a proposal for a mass referendum on which an amendment can be moved for a dual referendum. Then we shall get a straight out vote.

The CHAIRMAN:

Of course it is a question for the Committee to decide, not for me, as to whether it will take a test vote upon any particular word. All I want to point out is that if certain words are struck out, and certain other words inserted-and I cannot know what words will be inserted, I do not know what will be proposed, and we have already six or seven amendments-if words inconsistent with the mass referendum are inserted, a question with regard to the mass referendum cannot be put.

Mr. LYNE:

Then I wish to point out that I may be left in this position: that I may get no straight out vote on the motion of which I have given notice.

The CHAIRMAN:

It all depends upon the words that are inserted in lieu of the word "if."

Mr. LYNE:

I shall not consider that I have been treated fairly if I do not get a vote. All I ask is that I may be allowed to get an opportunity for a straight-out vote on my amendment.
Mr. WISE:
The hon. member will get it!

Mr. LYNE:
I quite understand that, as the Chairman said, if the word "if" is knocked out, and the words proposed by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner are put in, and the words proposed by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, come after them, they will be inconsistent with my amendment, which cannot then be put.

Mr. WISE:
That is not so. If they are all carried, it will still be open to the hon. member to move his amendment!

The CHAIRMAN:
The hon. member can move his amendment on Mr. Wise's amendment.

Mr. WISE:
I should like to ask if the word "if" is omitted and a blank is created, and then there is a proposal by Sir George Turner to fill up the blank, and if my amendment is rejected, and Sir George Turner's is carried, whether it will not be still open to the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, to deal with the question of the referendum as a distinct question?

The CHAIRMAN:
That is so; but other hon. members may move other amendments. Mr. SYMON: I might suggest that it would be better if the Right Hon. Sir George Turner would withdraw his amendment to strike out the word "if," and allow the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, to take a straight-out vote.

Hon. MEMBERS:
No!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The hon. member, Mr. Lyne, might withdraw his amendment for the present.

Mr. LYNE:
No!

Mr. SYMON:
I do not suggest that with, a view to bringing about the result that my hon. friend, Mr. Peacock, is alarmed at. Either what I have suggested should be done, or else the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, should withdraw his amendment, Turner's amendment, it will be competent to move an amendment in favour of either a mass referendum or a dual referendum.

Mr. LYNE:
I am afraid that we are no nearer to an answer to the question which I put.

The CHAIRMAN:
The only answer that I can give is this: that the hon. member's amendment will be put, unless in lieu of the word "if," if it is struck out, some words are inserted inconsistent with his amendment.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
I desire to point out that really the amendment of my hon. friend, Mr. Lyne, will not follow in its proper place if put now, because it provides for what is to happen after a dissolution of both houses of the federal parliament. No such dissolution is yet provided for.

Mr. LYNE:
Yes!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
Of both houses.

Mr. LYNE:
Yes.

The CHAIRMAN:
I would point out that the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Symon, dealing with the dissolution of both houses has been carried. The proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, is to add words to that amendment.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I should like to say that I hope the question will be put so that we may first have a vote on the question of a double dissolution. Then we may have a vote on the question of the dual referendum.

Mr. LYNE:
No thank you!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
And in case that is lost we may have an opportunity of voting straight out on the question of a national referendum. We have taken up the position all through that we wish loyally to abide by the question of equal representation. We do not want to be forced into the position of having to go to the national referendum which will mean a reconsideration of the whole position of equal representation. But we do want, in case our proposals are rejected, to be perfectly free to consider the question of the national referendum.
Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[10.12]:

The hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, has just put the position as I do not want it put, and I am not going to allow it to be put in that way if my amendment will prevent it. When I gave notice of my amendment, I said that the reason I gave notice of it then was because, if we did not take a vote on the national referendum first, I should be precluded from voting for any of the other provisions. I look upon the national referendum as coming first, and I shall vote against every other provision until I get an opportunity of voting for it. If the proposals come in the manner suggested by the hon. gentleman, I shall be precluded from voting for the amendment of the Premier of Victoria, for the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, for the amendment of the Premier of South Australia, and for other amendments, until I come to my own. I think there are a number of others who are in exactly the same position. I should like to meet the leader of the Convention in every possible way; but at this particular time I do not want anything to be carried if I can avoid it. I recognise that the chances are that I shall be beaten; but I recognise also that I am not going to be placed in the position, if I can avoid it, of having to vote against every other proposal, because I affirm that the proposal I have made is the one in which the people of the colonies believe. Therefore, I have no right to vote, nor would a number of other hon. members have a right to be called upon to vote, for other propositions which may exclude a vote on the national referendum.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

They cannot exclude it!

Mr. LYNE:

Yes. Supposing the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, which seems to be in favour at the present time, is carried, what becomes of mine?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

The hon. member can move it in addition!

Mr. LYNE:

No, I cannot, because it is antagonistic.

An Hon. MEMBER:

No, it is not!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Cannot the hon. member, if we fail on the two-thirds or three-fifths majority, move later on there shall be a national referendum?
Mr. LYNE:

I might go on filtering for years before I got to that. I shall have to be in parliament as long as the hon. member, Mr. Douglas, has been, in order to get a referendum. I want, if I possibly can, to take a decisive vote on the word "if." That is the, proper position. It is unfair to me, having offered the first amendment, that I should be precluded from having a vote on that amendment by other words being brought in which puts it on one side and prevents any definite decision being arrived at. Depend upon it the people of this community, are watching us at the present moment with very great interest, and watching the politicians very keenly on this particular point, and I do, not wish any shirking: of it I have not shirked the question from the time, we entered the Convention at Adelaide. I have taken up a certain, position from that time until the present, I have never varied in my mind or in my expressions one iota from the position I took up then. I do not desire at this last moment to be foisted out of that: position by amendments brought in by other gentlemen after the amendment of which I gave notice. I ask you to rule, sir, that those who vote for the exclusion of the word. "if" vote against the national referendum.

Hon. MEMBERS:

No!

Mr. LYNE:

That is the proper course to take. I hope I will not be forced into an unfair and unjustifiable position, and be obliged to wait until you have got half a dozen proposals, or, at any rate, one or two, which will take the sting, or take the virtue, out of the proposal I am making at the present time, so that it will fall flat upon hon. members, who will be able to turn round and say to their constituents and others, "We could not vote for the proposal for a national referendum, because we had got something in the constitution before it." I shall be as brief as possible in the few remarks I am going to make. In the first instance, it seems to me that we commenced this Convention on a wrong basis. For this we have only our own parliaments to blame. In the initiation of the Convention we should not, by allowing ten representatives to each colony, have gone to that extent in equal representation of the states. Were it not that the present time we have in the Convention ten representatives from each of the smaller colonies, and only the same number from each of the larger colonies, we should not have been brought to the position in which we find ourselves at the present moment.

An Hon. MEMBER:

We should not have been here!
Mr. LYNE:

Yes, we should have been here. I regret exceedingly that some of the members of the larger colonies gave way, and offered and held out to the smaller colonies what was not asked for in the first instance. We should not have been placed in the position we find ourselves in to-night, had it not been that a great deal was offered to the smaller colonies before it was ever asked for. Had not an undue proportion of representatives from a minority of the people, but from a majority of the small states, been here in this Convention, we should have had men proportionate representation in the first instance, and we should have been in a position now to have dealt with this question without undue-

[p.919] starts here

heat, and without disproportionate votes. What chance has a colony like the one I represent, when she is surrounded on three sides with thirty votes to ten, in framing a constitution which should be equitable to that colony, which is twice as large in population as the other three colonies put together?

An Hon. MEMBER:

No!

Mr. LYNE:

Yes, twice as large, and even larger. I am coming back to first principles in this question. Hon. members who know they have that majority here can afford to laugh at what I am saying now; but the people of this colony cannot afford to laugh. The people of this community have to look forward to what may take place in the federation if the Commonwealth Bill should ever become law. What have we seen since last Friday, since that vote was taken last Friday, in reference to which vote my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, said that it was a combination of small states against the larger ones?

An Hon. MEMBER:

He has withdrawn it!

Mr. LYNE:

That is in his mind now, and I was glad to hear him saying what he did. I say it now. The hon. member said in effect that there was practically a combination of the smaller states against the larger states. That was to all intents and purposes correct. Now it is proposed to take the unusual course of asking hon. members, like the right hon. the Premier of Western Australia, to come down within forty-eight hours after giving a vote for Mr. Symon's amendment, to rescind their vote. This is done for what reason? It is done for the purpose of inducing New South Wales to enter a federation; but if a vote of this kind took place in such a federation I should like to know whether there would be such a proposal made as that which is now before us? When New South Wales had the rope round her neck, when Victoria had the rope round her neck, should we have a proposition within forty-eight hours to rescind a vote founded upon a combination of small states against large states? We have had a lesson dealt out to us in this respect, and I feel that I am called upon to express my views in no unmeasured terms. I did express my view of another proposition in no unmeasured terms in South Australia. And I say now that if those hon. members who voted for equal state rights in South Australia had commenced at the foundation of the trouble, and had not allowed the matter to go over until the present stage of our proceedings, we should have a more equitable, a more just, and better proposition submitted in this Convention in the shape of proportional state representation with a minimum, and, if you like, with a maximum, than you have in the proposal for a referendum. I feel that the trouble to which we are brought at the present time is, to a large extent, due to the interim proposal of my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, a proposal which, to my mind, is worse than no referendum at all; it mixes the whole thing up from the start, and I was more than surprised to find the representatives of the sister colony of Victoria coming down with a proposal for a dual referendum which is to be applied only after it is impossible to arrive at a decision between the house of representatives and the senate, between the people's house and the states' house. What do you propose by means of a dual referendum to do? To refer the question, whatever it may be, to the states, to return, probably, the same men with the same opinions, if it be truly a state question, to come back doubly supported and emphasised in the position they took up against the representatives of the people in the first instance, not reducing or getting away from your deadlock at all, but emphasising it and making the possibilities of serious trouble greater than they were in the first instance.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

But the referendum does not return men at all!

Mr. LYNE:

The hon. and learned member is trying to catch me.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No!

Mr. LYNE:

Yes, he is. He knows what I mean perfectly well. The hon. and learned member knows perfectly well that his proposal and the proposal of the other representatives of Victoria was for a dissolution, and that the dissolution of the senate was to send those people back, and when those people returned again, then the referendum was to come as a referendum to states which would support those people as they were returned on the dissolution of the two houses. The hon. and learned member knew perfectly well that that was what I meant, and every word what I have said applies in that case, and it emphasised the trouble which would, in the first instance, be created by the differences between the states of the people and the country. Hon. members can bring forward as many proposals as they like; they cannot get away from the one bedrock of the people of the country; that is the one bedrock from which they cannot get away. There are five proposals before us at the present time. We have the proposal which I have made for a national referendum, which is the voice of the people, and, by the way, let me say again, even with the fear of repeating what I said the other night, that the referendum I do not prefer, and I was only forced into that position by the vote the other afternoon which provided for a dissolution of the house of representatives, and, I think, afterwards a dissolution of the senate, but not a simultaneous dissolution. I was then compelled to take some further course, as far as I could then see my way, the only course, and as far as I can see my way now, the only course, to try and arrive at an absolute solution of any difficulty that might arise; but wh

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I did not say that!

Mr. LYNE:

The hon. and learned gentleman took exception to the word "tentative"; but he says that it is a proposition which we have to reopen and rediscuss again in the future; and, with Queensland coming into this Convention, I take it that there is not one provision, that there is not one clause, with which we have dealt during our meeting at Adelaide and during our meeting here, which we will not have to rediscuss over and over again; and that being so, I think the words that fell from the hon. member, Mr. Holder, are particularly applicable at the present time-that it would be wise to wait and see how far we can harmonise our views before we are forced into the position of voting on this question. We have five proposals submitted to us. We have the proposition of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, which, as submitted in print, means, first of all, a certain filtering process, but that the groundwork of everything is to be a national referendum. Now I understand that the hon. gentleman is proposing to strike out the provision for a national referendum—and we shall then have only a vote by a two-thirds' majority of the houses sitting together. I do not say that probably it is not one of the best proposals, if not the best proposal, that has been made; but I have had placed in my hand within the last few minutes a proposition by the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, wherein he makes another proposal which, if it can be worked out on the figures, I think is also a good proposal. We are now called upon to vote upon these propositions at a moment's notice. I mention this to show that we are being called upon to vote upon questions about which we should have had some time to deliberate.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Has not the hon. member already had four days?

Mr. LYNE:

No; I have had only four minutes to consider the last proposal, and I have had only two hours to consider the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers. I think it would be very much better, if, instead of giving a vote upon the question now, we fairly and fully considered it. This is an all-important matter to the whole of Australasia. It is an easy thing for any of the states to join in the federation; but it will be impossible for them to withdraw if they find that they are not bound together upon the principles and lines upon which they desire to be bound together. Let me adduce one argument to show that public opinion is travelling fast. In 1891, the ideas which have been put before this Convention would have been flouted. Though an important proposition was then proposed by the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, it was, practically, not considered by the Convention of 1891. At Adelaide, the proposals now made were put on one side. Since then we have had the criticism of the press and of the public upon these proposals, indefinite as they were when before us in Adelaide. We find them being treated very differently by the Convention now. What are we to expect when minds and principles are travelling so rapidly? What are we to expect to find when we meet in Tasmania or Victoria, or one of the other colonies three or four months' hence? I think that we shall have the concurrence of Queensland, and that if we cannot get proportional representation in the senate, the national referendum will be accepted.

Mr. WALKER:

Queensland wants equal representation!

Mr. LYNE:

The hon. member does not live in Queensland, and I presume that he does not know much more than I know about what Queensland wants. It will depend entirely upon the manner in which the elections there are conducted as to what will be desired by the representatives of Queensland.
If the elections are conducted as they were conducted in New South Wales and Victoria, the whole colony being treated as one electorate, we shall have a set of men sent here favouring proportional representation in the senate; but if Queensland is split up into various electorates, we will have men sent here who will support the principle of equal state rights. I wish to emphasise the opinion that it would be wise and proper for the Convention to wait until we are joined by Queensland, instead of rushing this matter to a vote nearly in the middle of the night. The whole question has been debated during the last three or four days, but we have not had the particular proposals to which I have referred before us. It seems to me that a great deal of the trouble has been caused by the vacillation of the representatives of Victoria, who have not stood straight upon the principal of the referendum. If they had stood fast we should have had a different state of things. All I can say, is that I wish to emphasise my statement that we must and should be compelled when Queensland comes in to reconsider the whole of these principles. Therefore the vote which is to be given now is an absolutely false vote that will not stand when we re-assemble. Therefore we should not be called upon to give that false vote; but, of course, all I can do is to protest against the action now being taken. When an opportunity comes, as far as I am personally concerned, I will not swerve from the course I have adopted. Whenever the opportunity offers to submit to the people or the Convention the principle of proportional representation, I shall do my best to carry out what I advocated in the first instance.

The CHAIRMAN:

I will put first the proposition in the ordinary technical parliamentary language—that is, that the word "if" proposed to be left out in the proposed addition to the words inserted in the proposed paragraph of the proposed new clause stand part of the proposed addition to the proposed new paragraph-

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

May I just say that it will be a very great pity that the really serious issue which my hon. friend, Mr. Lyne, is submitting to this Convention should be put before us in such a form-

The CHAIRMAN:

As I stated, I put the question first in the technical parliamentary language. I now put the question in this way-That the word "if" be left out in Mr. Lyne's amendment.
Mr. LYNE:
That is to be the test of my amendment!

Hon. MEMBERS:
No!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
As a point of order, I protest against its being taken as a test.

The CHAIRMAN:
That is not a point of order. It is not for the Chairman to say that a particular word is to be a test or not. I cannot decide that.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
The decision that the word "if" shall or shall not stand part of the question is not a final determination of the question of a general referendum. It is not and it cannot be. The meaning of it is that if the decision is adverse to the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, the Committee does not adopt a general referendum as following a consecutive dissolution. It does not mean that the Committee does not adopt the general referendum with reference to any other possible position that can be imagined. It simply says that a general referendum as following upon the consecutive dissolution is not adopted by the House. It means no more than that. It is not a decision against the general referendum in any other feature.
Mr. LYNE:
I direct your attention, sir, to this fact: that on a previous occasion on a very important matter the question of the word "if" was taken as a test.

An Hon. MEMBER:
We refuse to do so to night!
Mr. LYNE:
The other night, when a motion was moved for the purpose of deciding whether or not there should be provision made for deadlocks, the vote was taken on the word "if."

An Hon. MEMBER:
It was a matter of agreement!
Mr. LYNE:
I think it is very unfair that I should be met in this way when I want a straight out vote, by a number of mem-[P.923]ers who wish to vote on other questions first. It seems to me, in fairness to the proposition I have made, especially with the precedent we have already established when the word "if" was taken as a test of a most important question, that the Chairman should reverse the decision at the present time for the purpose of getting in something else which will take away the sting or power from the amendment which I have moved.

The CHAIRMAN:
I would point out to the hon. member that it is not within the province of the Chairman to dictate to the Committee whether they shall or shall not take a test vote on the question to omit a particular word. The Chairman can make a suggestion, and that is all. If no further amendments are moved, except the amendment of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, and that of, Mr. Wise, after these words are inserted, if they are inserted, I will put the question "that the remainder of the clause stand," and then the hon. member can take a straight-out vote on that.

Mr. LYNE:
Then I would ask my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, not to move his amendment until that vote is taken!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
I am willing not to move my amendment until a division is taken on my hon. friend's proposal!

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[10.41]:
I intend to move an amendment to the proposal of my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner; if it is put, to leave out the words "hereinafter provided," and to insert the words "by having a referendum." The proposal of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner is, in lieu of dissolving, to refer the question to the people by a dual referendum, I will not be in a position to vote for other than a national referendum.

Question-That the word "if" stand part of the amendment-resolved in the negative.

Question proposed:
To insert "Provided that in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives the proposed law may be referred to the direct determination of the people as hereinafter provided."

Upon which Mr. Wise had moved:
That after the words "house of representatives," line 2, the following words be inserted: "alone in the first instance, both houses of parliament may be dissolved simultaneously: Provided that the senate shall not be dissolved within a period of six months immediately preceding the date of the expiry by effluxion of time of the duration of the house of representatives. And if after such dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendment."
Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[10.43]:

I only want to say one word on this to make it clear to the Committee what we are voting upon. This question affirms that, before any question arises as to the application of a referendum, whether dual or national, or before any question arises as to the meeting of the two houses as one house, there shall be a simultaneous dissolution of both the house of representatives and the senate, and it further provides to meet the objections which were raised principally by my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, that there can be no dissolution of the senate during the last six months of the life

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[10.44]:

I would point out to my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Wise; that he used the expression "there shall be a dissolution." That is not so, because the government of the day will have the option of selecting one or the other.

Mr. WISE:

Quite so. I am much obliged to my hon. friend?

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[10.45]:

I opposed the concurrent dissolution as first proposed, because it would be the means of constantly penalising the senate without inflicting any penalty whatever on the house of representatives. The amendment moved by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, removes this objection to a great degree, and, therefore, I will vote for it.

Question-That the words (of Mr. Wise's amendment) proposed to be inserted (in Sir George Turner's amendment) be so inserted-put. The Committee divided:

Ayes, 25; noes, 20; majority, 5.

AYES
Abbott, Sir Joseph Isaacs, I.A.
Barton, E. Kingston, C.C.
Berry, Sir G. Lewis, N.E.
Brunker, J.N. Lyne, W.J.
Carruthers, J.H. O'Connor, R.E.
Clarke, M.J. Peacock, A.J.
Cockburn, Dr. J.A. Quick, Dr. J.
Deakin, A. Reid, G.H.
Fysh, Sir P.O. Solomon, V.L.
Gordon, J.H. Turner, Sir G.
Hackett, J.W. Walker, J.T.
Higgins, H.B. Teller,
The CHAIRMAN:

I shall now put the question:

That the following words be inserted in lieu of the word "if":- "Provided that, in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives alone in the first instance, both houses of parliament may be dissolved simultaneously: Provided that the senate shall not be dissolved within a period of six months immediately preceding the date of the expiry by effluxion of time of the duration of the house of representatives. And if after such dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendment the proposed law may be referred to the direct determination of the people as hereinafter provided.

The proposition now consists of the amendment of the Premier of Victoria as amended by the hon. member, Mr. Wise.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I take it that the adoption of the proposal of the Premier of New South Wales would come to this: that, after the words "the proposed law," we should insert, in place of the remaining words in the question the following words:

shall forthwith be submitted to the members of the two houses deliberating and voting together thereon, and shall be adopted or rejected according to the decision of a majority of three-fifths of those present and voting on the question.

That would embody the proposal of the Premier of New South Wales.

Mr. LYNE:

It was understood that that should not come in before I moved the motion in reference to the national referendum!
The Hon. E. BARTON:

I want to save the Committee from any complications. I am not at the present moment anxious to move this amendment; but, if we leave the words "may be referred to the direct determination of the people, as hereinafter provided," we declare for some sort of referendum. If, on the other hand, as the clause is now, we reject those words, we reject the whole clause. The hon. member, Mr. Lyne, wishes to insert the word "national," so that it will read "May be referred to a national referendum as hereinafter provided."

Mr. LYNE:

I desire to strike out the words "hereinafter provided" with the view of inserting "by a national referendum!"

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The difficulty is this: If we get down to those last three words, "as hereinafter provided," and there is an attempt to substitute the words "by a national referendum," and those words are negatived, then the words "as hereinafter provided" remain part of the question, and there is a decision not for a national referendum, but for some form of referendum. If the intention of the Committee is to adopt the proposal of the Premier of New South Wales—that is to say, that there should be a reference to the two houses sitting and voting together—it will be impossible to put that proposal at that stage, because the stage applicable to it will have been passed. I only wish to save the Committee from any complication that may arise.

An Hon. MEMBER:

But if Mr. Lyne's amendment is inserted?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Then the national referendum will be carried. But if it be rejected, the difficulty will be that we shall have got passed the words "referred to the direct determination of the people," and we shall not be able to put in the words, "referred to a determination on the part of both houses."

The CHAIRMAN:

I would suggest as a way out of the difficulty that the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, should move an amendment to insert after the word "referred" the words "by a national referendum."

Mr. LYNE:

I shall be quite willing to do that!

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[10.58]:

Before my hon. friend does that, I should like to direct attention to what the position is. The amendment which was carried on my motion on Friday is still existing. The proposal of my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, is now before the Committee in the shape in which it was amended by Mr. Wise.

The CHAIRMAN:
The hon. and learned member must recollect that these words have not yet been inserted.

Mr. SYMON:
That is what I understand, and that is all I wish to call attention to. The Right Hon. Sir George Turner's amendment has not been inserted. It will be competent to raise the issue of a national referendum in the way the Chairman proposed—that is, by inserting after the word "referred" the words "by a national referendum." That is a convenient way of doing it. It does not at all follow, as the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, suggests, that we should then, if Mr. Lyne's amendment is negatived, deal with the amendment proposed by Mr. Carruthers. That amendment can be proposed as an alternative, or added to my amendment for a successive dissolution. There are many hon. members, amongst others myself, who will not vote for the amendment of Mr. Carruthers, if it is attached to the simultaneous dissolution embodied in the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's amendment. I only want to make that quite clear so that there shall be no misapprehension.

Mr. LYNE:
Is not the simultaneous dissolution included in Mr. Wise's amendment already inserted?

Mr. SYMON:
Yes, but so that there should be no misunderstanding, Mr. Carruthers' amendment may be put as an Addendum to my amendment already carried, and the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's amendment ought to be negatived. It is not essential that we should engraft Mr. Carruthers' amendment, as explained to us by Mr. Reid, upon Sir George Turner's amendment, but we can ingraft it upon my amendment which has been carried. I only say this so that there shall be no misunderstanding.

Mr. WISE:
There will not be any!

Mr. SYMON:
There certainly will not be any on my part. Although if it is attached to the successive dissolution of the two houses, I shall vote for Mr. Carruthers' amendment in preference to the dual dissolution, I shall vote against it if it is tacked on to a simultaneous dissolution of the two houses.
Amendment (by Mr. LYNE) proposed:
That the words "by a national referendum to" be inserted after the word "referred," line 12.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[11.1]:
As I have pointed out on several occasions, I am not prepared to vote for a national referendum if I can possibly avoid it, although I am prepared to vote for a dual referendum. Now the object and effect of taking the motion in this form is that we shall be compelled to vote against the insertion of the word "national." If we reject that we can afterwards reject a proposal to insert the word "dual," in which case there will be no referendum at all.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
That is exactly what will come about!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
It is what ought to come about!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
It will not come about, if we can avoid it. We want a straight out division upon the question, whether there is to be a "dual" referendum or a "national" referendum.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
The test will be upon Mr. Lyne's amendment.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
No, the test will be upon the word "dual." I move:
That the word "dual" be inserted before the word "national" in the proposed amendment.

Those who are in favour of the dual referendum can vote for it. If we fail to insert the word "dual" it will be still open to those of us who desire a referendum of some sort to vote for the word "national." I cannot vote in the first instance for a "national" referendum.

Mr. LYNE:
The right

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I am not prepared to reject both kinds of referendum.

Mr. LYNE:
The right hon. gentleman has been playing tricks with me all through.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I am in favour of a dual referendum, but if I cannot get a dual referendum-

Mr. LYNE:
If you get the word "dual" put in I will vote against my own proposition.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Had we not better go to a vote?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I think I have sufficiently explained to the Convention that my desire is to have a dual referendum. If I fail to get that I shall support a national referendum, and to test the question I move the amendment which I have already submitted.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[11.3]:
In good faith, Mr. Chairman, I accepted your suggestion; but if my proposal is to be manipulated in this way by the right hon. gentleman, who did precisely the same thing when I moved a direct referendum before-

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Hear, hear. He blanketed you every time!

Mr. LYNE:
I do not think it is a dignified position for the right hon. gentleman to take up in this Convention. I certainly think it is fairer to decide the larger question, before you decide the smaller one. I feel very sorry for the action of the hon. gentleman in trying to shirk a straight-out vote upon the question of a national referendum. It is precisely what he did before. He intercepted an amendment upon my former proposition, and he has now intercepted another amendment to shirk a straight out vote. I accepted the Chairman's proposal in all confidence.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Since the hon. member thinks that I am endeavouring to put him in a false position, I will withdraw my amendment altogether, and will vote against a national referendum!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[11.5]:
I am sorry that this course has been taken. I think that the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, has made a mistake.

Amendment (by the Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER) by leave withdrawn.

Mr. GLYNN:
By way of personal explanation, I wish to state that the right hon. member, Sir Edward Braddon, feeling unwell, asked me to pair with him on any motion that would have the effect of rescinding the motion proposed by the hon. member, Mr. Symon. I considered that if the right hon. member, Sir Edward Braddon, had been here he would have voted against the adoption of the addition proposed to the clause by the hon. and learned members Mr. Wise; consequently, I considered myself under an obligation to pair on that, which, if I had been present, I would have voted for, while the right hon. member, Sir Edward Braddon, would have voted against it.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[11.6]:
If hon. members reject the words "by a national referendum" I will not be able to move my amendment to insert the word "dual."

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Oh, yes, the right hon. gentleman will; we all understand that!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[11.7]:
I should like to make my position clear. On the present occasion I think that the course proposed to be taken by the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, would have been the best way to get a distinct vote on both questions. The right hon. gentleman has felt himself compelled, by the observations made by the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, to allow that hon. gentleman to proceed with his amendment. I want it distinctly understood we all want it distinctly understood, that although we are not prepared to support the national referendum at the present moment, we maintain the position we put before, that if the dual referendum is not carried, we are bound to support the national referendum.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[11.8]:
Supposing it is carried? I do not quite understand now what the position of the Victorian representatives is. We heard the views of the Premier of Victoria interpreted by the Attorney-General, and we had a threat from the Attorney-General.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Not at all!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Undoubtedly there is no possible way out of it. The Attorney-General of Victoria told us that if the dual referendum were not carried he held himself bound to vote for the national referendum.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Certainly; I said that days ago!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
But the Attorney-General of Victoria did not tell us whether, if the dual referendum were carried, he would feel himself bound to support that right through the Convention, at all times, in all places.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Most certainly!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
At the adjournment-right through?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Most certainly!
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
That is the position in which the hon. and learned gentleman undoubtedly stands.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Yes; that, has been my position all through?

Question so resolved in the negative.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I now desire to insert the words "by a dual referendum." I propose this amendment simply to test the feeling of the Convention as to whether we are to have a dual referendum. I move:

That the words "by a dual referendum" be inserted after the word "referred," line 12,

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[11.13]:

I handed the words "for a national referendum" to the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, because I understood that he desired to deal with the question himself; but with regard to the proposal for a dual referendum, I altogether dissent from the view which was expressed just now that, if this amendment is carried, we can go back to the proposal for the establishment of the national referendum. I do not want members to be fed into voting for the dual referendum under the belief that otherwise we shall be face to face with the national referendum.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales) [11.14]:

I think we are by these divisions gradually coming to the mind of the Convention. I am not going to make any observations upon the matter, because I think that hon. members are fully possessed of the whole question. I am going to oppose the insertion of this provision for a dual referendum, which will make the proceeding, as I understand it, a dissolution of both houses and a dual referendum. I intend to vote against the insertion of the words "by a dual referendum" upon the lines which I have laid down, that, as far as I can see, the best solution of this difficulty will be that if, after a dissolution of one house, the house of representatives, there is no agreement, that then the two houses should sit together, and that a three-fifths majority, should decide. I wish it to be understood that, in voting against the dual referendum, I am prepared, if a majority of hon. members are prepared, to accept the solution I have indicated as upon the whole, perhaps, the most satisfactory to the whole of the interests concerned.

Mr. WISE:

My vote will be given on exactly the same lines!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I wish to say a very few words. The Right Hon. G.H. Reid need not have any doubt as far as Victoria is concerned. So far as the small states are concerned I am sure they will not accept his proposal unless the present ratio between the two houses now in the bill is adhered to. As far as Victoria is concerned I am sure that that will never be agreed to.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[11.17]:

Supposing that the house of representatives should be dissolved, and if, after the election, the disagreement still continues, according to the proposal of the Right Hon. G.H. Reid, the matter is to be referred to both houses sitting together, a certain majority, I presume to decide. I think that is the best solution of the difficulty.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
The present quota to remain?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Yes. I want to know how that proposal will agree with the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Wise, which was adopted a few minutes ago?

An Hon. MEMBER:
That involves the dissolution of both houses!

Mr. WISE:
-

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The Right Hon. G.H. Reid just informed us that it was a dissolution of one house.

An Hon. MEMBER:
No; two houses!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I know exactly what he said!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I can only speak for myself. I have studied the views of hon. members of the Convention in this matter, and I find that it is absolutely impossible to get a dissolution of the two houses. I would have infinitely preferred it myself, but that is not the issue at all.

The CHAIRMAN:
The only question at issue is the dual referendum.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[11.18]:
Hon. members have been endeavouring to make their position clear. Lest my position should be mistaken, and people are sometimes apt to mistake one's position, I wish to state that I never have been in favour, if I could avoid it, of any system of referendum. I prefer the dual referendum to a national referendum in cases in which state rights are involved. But if I can get a better way out of the difficulty which provides for the settlement on constitutional grounds of those questions, and that I find in the proposal put forward by my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, then I think it is most constitutional and right to follow that course. Therefore, I shall record my vote for the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers.

Mr. LYNE:
I should like to know whether the amendment moved by the hon. member, Mr. Wise, is not already passed, providing that in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives alone in the first instance, both houses of parliament may be dissolved simultaneously? I understand that has been already passed. If that is already passed it is useless to say that we have not agreed to a dissolution of both houses. I voted for it, and I did so because it was to bring about a dissolution of both houses simultaneously.

The CHAIRMAN:
I would point out to the hon. member that nothing has really been passed yet.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[11.20]:
Whilst I will support the amendment referred to by the right hon. gentleman, Mr. Reid, whether it applies after the successive dissolution of both houses or whether it applies after the dissolution of one house, still it seems to me that it will be necessary to negative the amendment of the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, as amended by the amendment of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It will come to that!

Mr. SYMON:
I only wish to make clear my position that in voting against the insertion of the word "dual," I do so intending to vote against the proviso altogether, with the view to failing in with the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[11.22]:
I would point out that it is open to every hon. member to vote against every proposal which is put with the view of destroying the effect of the amendment of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner to dissolve both houses. But those who desire to work in the spirit of the determination come to by the Committee will hold to the amendment which we have carried and which involves the dissolution of both houses.

The CHAIRMAN:
I must ask the hon. member to confine himself to the question at present before the Committee-to the dual referendum.

Mr. WISE:
I am pointing out that whatever we may ingraft upon that is a matter for subsequent consideration. I am prepared to go with my right hon. and learned friend, Mr. Reid, in supporting the proposal that the two houses should meet together; but I only desire that to take place after the dissolution of both houses, and if my right hon. friend intends to vote against the amendment now before the Committee in favour of a dual referendum, in order to introduce his proposal for the two houses to meet together, but further proposes to limit that to the single case of a dissolution of the house of representatives only, I shall be found voting against that proposal.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

If this dual referendum proposal is negatived, the thing will stand in this way: First, Mr. Symon's proposal is carried, then there is the alternative of the dual dissolution, then if the deadlock is unsettled the result is that both houses are to deliberate and vote together.

Mr. WISE:

That is the view I desire to see effected, but I do not understand that my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, took that view. I wish it to be understood that in voting against the dual referendum, I only do so for the purpose, afterwards, of ingrafting on the clause a provision for the two houses to meet together which is to be subsequent to the dual dissolution.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[11.24]:

I wish to state the position I take in regard to the dual referendum. If it is proposed for all cases, I shall have to vote against it, because my contention is that it should be confined to cases in which the state interests are really involved, and that the national referendum should be applied to cases where state interests are not involved. But if my right hon. friend Sir George Turner tells me that he is prepared to accept some subsequent provision which will differentiate between the two classes of cases, I shall be happy indeed to support him.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

-

Mr. WISE:

That is another matter altogether!

Sir George Turner) to be inserted, be so inserted-put. The Committee

Question so resolved in the negative.
Amendment (by Mr. CARRUTHERS) proposed:
That the words "to the direct determination of the people as hereinafter provided" be omitted with the view to insert in lieu thereof the following words:--"the members of the two houses deliberating and voting together thereon, and shall be adopted or rejected according to the decision of three-fifths of the members present and voting on the question."

The Hon. J.H. HOWE (South Australia)[11.30]:
I desire to move as an amendment:
That the word "three-fifths" be omitted with a view to the insertion of the word "two-thirds" in lieu thereof.

Mr. LYNE:
Do I understand, if the amendment is carried, it will be added on to the amendment moved by the hon. member, Mr. Wise, to have a simultaneous dissolution of the two houses?

The CHAIRMAN:
Yes.
Mr. LYNE:
So that it will then read that there is to be a simultaneous dissolution of the two houses, and, after that, if there is no agreement, the two houses voting together will decide by a majority of three-fifths or two-thirds, as the case may be.

The CHAIRMAN:
If this amendment is carried, and the amendment is amended as proposed, the state of affairs will be as follows:-There is, first of all, the consecutive dissolution of the hon. member, Mr. Symon; then, in the alternative, there is the dual simultaneous dissolution, and after that comes the question of the two houses sitting together.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[11.32]:
My objection to the suggestion of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, is not so much to the provision—with which I entirely agree—being ingrafted on to a simultaneous dissolution, but to having it ingrafted on a simultaneous dissolution in the form of an alternative which is to be left to the executive ministry of the day to select.

An Hon. MEMBER:
We are going to stick to the simultaneous dissolution!

Mr. SYMON:
I do not say we are not. I strongly object to it, and I also object to Mr. Carruthers' amendment being ingrafted upon it; but I still more object to ingrafting the amendment on the simultaneous dissolution, as an alternative to be chosen by the ministry of the day. Therefore I shall vote against it as added on there, and for it if the hon. member Mr. Carruthers, does as he intimates he intends to do—attaches it as a condition to a consecutive dissolution.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[11.33]:
There is a serious difficulty with regard to this, which I wish to point out. The effect of this will be to allow the two houses, when they meet, to amend money bills.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is a detail!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That is a detail which goes to the root of the whole question. I might be prepared, if I could get nothing else, to accept the meeting of the two houses; but I am not going to accept that if it is going to confer the power to amend money bills. To make it perfectly clear, I propose to add certain words, reserving to myself the right to say which way I will vote. I am not certain which way I will vote as yet. I want this difficulty to be cleared out of the way. I want some words such as these inserted:

Provided that at such joint meeting it shall not be competent to make amendments in a bill which would be amended by the senate.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales) [11.34]:

That difficulty was always present to my mind, and there are other matters of detail which will have to be specified. My idea to-day was simply to get at a general preposition upon which we could all agree, and settle the details afterwards. The hon. member is perfectly right

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

This is a matter of too serious a nature for us to hurry over, because it happens to be now twenty minutes to 12 o’clock!

An Hon. MEMBER:

We may be here till to-morrow morning!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Then let us adjourn!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It seems to me there is no intention on the part of the Convention to indulge in a very long debate to-morrow. There is not one argument on the whole question that has not been thoroughly advanced, and on the understanding that hon. members simply wish to take time to consider this matter before they vote, and that we are not to have another prolonged debate-

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I must go away to-morrow night!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The right hon. gentleman on that account has a special claim upon us not to prolong the debate, and under these circumstances I shall move:

That the Chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[11.37]:

I should like to ask if what we have agreed to tonight, and what it is proposed to discuss to-morrow, will be in print in the morning?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

That will be all right!

Motion agreed to; progress reported.

RETURN.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER laid upon the table in return to an order, on the motion of Dr. Quick, papers relating to the quarantine and postal services.
Convention adjourned at 11.38 p.m.

Finance Committee-Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.
FINANCE COMMITTEE.
The Hon. E. BARTON laid upon the table evidence of E.M.G. Eddy, Esquire, late Railway Commissioner of New South Wales; J. Matheson, Esquire, Commissioner of Railways in Victoria; and A.G. Pendleton, Esquire, Commissioner for Railways in South Australia, before the Finance Committee at its sittings in Adelaide.
Ordered: That the documents be printed.
COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
In Committee (consideration resumed from 20th September, vide page 932):
Clause 56 (Recommendation of money votes).
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales:
Insert new clause to follow clause 56, (vide page 807), upon which the following amendment by Mr. Symon had been agreed to:-
That after the word "If," in the proposed new clause, the following new words be inserted: "the senate reject or fail to pass any proposed law which has passed the house of representatives, or pass the same with amendments with which the house of representatives will not agree, and if the governor-general should dissolve the house of representatives, and if, within six months after the said dissolution the house of representatives by an absolute majority again pass the said proposed law in the same, or substantially the same, form as before, and with substantially the same objects, and the senate again reject or fail to pass the said proposed law, or pass the same with amendments with which the house of representatives will not agree, the governor-general may dissolve the senate.
Upon which Mr. Lyne had moved a further amendment, namely:-
To add to the words inserted "If after a dissolution of both houses of the federal parliament as above provided the subject-matter of the contention that led to such dual dissolution is again passed by the house of representatives and again rejected by the senate such measure shall be referred to the electors of the commonwealth by means of a national referendum, and if resolved in the affirmative shall become law."
Upon which amendment the following amendment (by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner and Mr. Wise) had been agreed to:
To leave out the initial word "If," with a view to insert the following: - "Provided, that in lieu of dissolving the house of representtatives alone in the first instance, both houses of parliament may be dissolved simultaneously; Provided that the senate shall not be dissolved within a period of six months immediately preceding the date of the expiry by effluxion of time of the duration of the house of representatives. And if after such dissolution, the proposed law fails to pass, with or without amendment, the proposed law may be referred to the direct determination of the people as hereinafter provided."

And upon which the Hon. J.H. Carruthers had moved the following amendment:-

To leave out "the direct determination of the people as hereinafter provided," with a view to add "the members of the two houses deliberating and voting together thereon, and shall be adopted or rejected according to the decision of three-fifths of the members present and voting on the question."

Upon which the Hon. J.H. Howe had moved:
That the word "three-fifths" be om itted with a view to insert in lieu thereof the word "two-thirds."

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[10.34]:
As I intimated in a few words yesterday, I intend to support the proposition of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, but I desire to make my position very clear. When the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, was speaking to this suggestion yesterday, I interjected that unless the quota as provided by the bill as it now stands were maintained, the proposal meant nothing more than a sham. The hon. member seemed to think those words rather strong. But I used them in no sense offensively. I still say that, unless the bill as it now stands, is to be taken as the substance upon which this proposition is based, the whole proposal is simply a sham.
Although that interjection was occasioned by what I thought some weakening on the part of my hon. friend in his advocacy of the proposal on that basis, and his speech did denote a little weakening on that ground, I do hope-in fact, I am sure-that the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, if he intended to weaken the basis of the bill, would have said so in his motion.
We are following him loyally upon the clear faith that the proposition is based on the bill as it now stands; otherwise, the thing has no foundation, and in supporting the hon. member we shall simply be led into a trap. But I rely upon the honor and faith of the right hon. the Premier of this colony, and of one of his principal ministers, Mr. Carruthers, who makes this proposition, and who did not indicate, having regard to the way in which it is framed, any alteration of the basis upon which it is founded, and which we have a right to assume is to be maintained. Relying upon their honor in this matter, I have departed from the ranks of the hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, with regard to the dual referendum, which I much prefer. But seeing, as I conceived, in this proposal the more practical measure, I have left his ranks in order to join those of the right hon. the Premier of New South Wales, and those who support the proposal before the Committee. I have done so relying upon their honor in the matter, and if they do not support the basis of the bill as it now stands, and upon which this proposition is founded, I shall consider that I have been entrapped. Up to the present, however, I have no suspicions in the matter. The only indication I have had has been, as I have said, a little weakening by the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, in putting the case yesterday.

An Hon. MEMBER:

I think the hon. member will find that he has been entrapped!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

I should be sorry to make that discovery, and other hon. members for the same reasons would be sorry to find it so. I shall consider it nothing more nor less than a breach of faith to those who have followed the suggestion. However, no indication has been made by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, nor has any been made by the right hon. the Premier of New South Wales in this direction. The only indication we have had of any weakening at all of the part of any hon. member, who supports this proposition came from the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, last night. I am sure, however, that, on further reflection, the hon. member will see that any alteration of the quota would absolutely cut the ground from under this proposition, and the whole thing would be, as I said yesterday, and as I now repeat, with as much emphasis as I am capable of, nothing more nor less than a sham.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria):

As I have already indicated we will make the strongest effort we can to alter the clause. When the clause was passed, I indicated that we regarded it as so seriously affecting the interests of the general movement, at all events in our colony-and I assume it is certainly so regarded in the colony of New South Wales-that I should feel bound to ask the leader of the Convention to recommit the clause hereafter, so that we might have an opportunity of reversing the vote already taken. Hon. members who now propose to adopt this principle must not turn round afterwards and say that they had not had a fair intimation of our intention. It is my intention to do all I can until this bill is finally settled to alter the clause fixing the quota, which, to my mind, improperly limits the representation of the colony of Victoria. I intend, also, to vote against the proposal on other grounds. We have now determined, by a fair majority, that we shall have a double dissolution. As I have pointed out on several occasions, I am willing that another step should be taken after that, but that other step will be required only under the most exceptional circumstances. In nearly all cases the double dissolution will probably settle the matter. But I desire to have some other remedy available in case of failure. Now, to my mind the remedy here proposed is the worst one which has been suggested. The sitting of the two houses together is a course of procedure of which I cannot approve. I have thought the matter over carefully since we separated last night, and I have come to the conclusion that under no circumstances could I support it. We will do our best to limit that which we regard as an evil about to be ingrafted upon the constitution, and having limited it as much as we could, as far as I am concerned I shall vote against this proposal. Of course if we are to go a step further and follow the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, to the end if we are to follow him out to the mass referendum, and if this proposal does not give effect to the proposed law of the federal parliament, then that may be a different matter, but those who are supporting the hon. gentleman's proposal now for a joint meeting of the two houses to decide any question in conflict between them, will, I feel perfectly certain, not support him in the further step which he desires to take of having, in case it fails, the whole matter decided by the people in a national referendum. Of course if hon. members are prepared to go that length, it may to a great extent modify the objections that I have to this proposal; but, I cannot conceive that they are prepared to go that length. I am not going to stop making every effort I possibly can to alter the quota; and I hold myself perfectly free hereafter to tell the people of Victoria that, with that fixed representation, I cannot advise them to accept the bill, and, as I believe that this remedy is worse than the disease, I intend to do everything I can to prevent its being carried.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales)[10.42]:

The right hon. gentleman who has just spoken had my support in regard to his alternative motion yesterday to have a joint dissolution. I told him my views on the matter last Friday, and I religiously adhered to what I then said; but, the Norwegian system not having been alluded to, I feel myself at perfect liberty to vote as I think best on this matter. It seems to me that the Norwegian system, or an adaptation of it, is the most admirable system to settle those matters provided that the proportion is sufficient to safeguard the interests of the states.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Will the hon. gentleman explain the Norwegian system?

Mr. WALKER:

It is proposed that in our federation there shall be 36 members in the senate, and 76 members in the house of representatives, making altogether 112. The right hon. member, Mr. Reid, I believe, gave his adhesion to a three-fifths majority. Now three-fifths of 112 is 68. The hon. member, Mr. Howe, has suggested two-thirds; that means 75. I intend to move an amendment, that instead of three-fifths the proportion shall be three-fourths, which will be 84. I will draw hon. members' attention to the advantage of having three-fourths. As a representative of the colony of New South Wales, I think it my duty when the time comes to conserve the interests of that colony. I am not a provincialist, and I think that my votes have shown that I am not. I look upon federation as above provincialism; but I recognise the fact that there is a great question in which New South Wales is particularly interested. I take her case and apply it to all the other colonies. You will observe that 68 or 75 is less than the total number of the house of representatives, so if a conflict arose between the two houses it would be quite possible for the house of representatives to completely crush the senate. I wish that that should not take place, and therefore, I propose there shall be a three-fourths instead of a three-fifths majority. The result would be that a measure would have to be carried by 84 members of the joint house. I argue in this way: The colony of New South Wales would been titled to 26 members in the lower house, and 6 in the upper house, making altogether 32. Subtracting 32 from 112, leaves 80, and, therefore her interests in the waters of her rivers could not be sacrificed by any possible combination against her. However, irrespective of that, it seems to me that the division such as it is ought never to be so low that one house voting solidly could wipe out the other house altogether. I think that the hon. member, Mr. Holder, said yesterday that this assembly was divided into two parties, or more, on poli

That the amendment be amended by omitting "three-fifths" with a view to insert in lieu thereof "three-fourths."

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

(Victoria)[10.47]: I should like to state very briefly for the information of the Committee what I understand the Norwegian system to be.

Mr. WALKER:

This is only an adaptation of it!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The hon. gentleman did not accept my invitation to explain the Norwegian system to the Committee, therefore the duty devolves upon me to do so. There is no country in the world which has the system now proposed. The Norwegian system is this: There are 114 members of parliament elected all at the same election, all on the same franchise, all in the same way, and all on proportional representation. They meet as one body, and they divide themselves into two parts, one consisting of three-fourths of the whole number as nearly as possible, the other consisting of the remaining one-fourth. The three-fourths constitute one chamber, the other one-fourth constitutes the other chamber, a chamber of revision. The first chamber, speaking generally, originates bills, and sends them to the other chamber. If the two chambers agree, the bill passes; if they do not agree the two meet as one body and a two-thirds majority carries it. What analogy has that to our constitution? I should like hon. members to ask themselves in all seriousness what basis is that for this proposition? I will show hon. gentlemen how utterly inapplicable it is to our constitution. We have a senate based on equal representation with equal representation given as a protection to the smaller colonies, to protect state rights, but up to the present we have religiously maintained proportional representation—proportional representation only in the people's house, the national house. This proposal breaks into that principle. Not only have we been asked to concede equal representation, not only have we been asked to pass a clause fixing the ratio between the two houses, linking the house of equal representation to the house of proportional representation; but we are now asked to carry the principle of equal representation into the very deliberations of the house of representatives. We are asked to allow the two houses to constitute themselves one chamber and to bring all the advantages of equal representation into the joint deliberations of the two bodies. Do hon. members really think that the larger colonies will stand that? I think that hon. members are expecting a great deal too much in thinking that.

An Hon. MEMBER:

It was proposed by a large colony!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I am sorry to say that the hon. member is right. I am sorry to say that it was a large colony that proposed it; but it was another large colony that opposed it, and will oppose it to the end. I do not presume to speak with any degree of authority, far be it from me, but I doubt very much whether the large colony from which it came will support that in the end. However, I would like to emphasise the fact that if it was difficult enough under other circumstances to maintain that provision as to a quota, it is absolutely impossible to do so as matters now stand. I say to hon. members, as I said last night, that there is no hope of carrying these two things conjointly, because it brings into such startling relief the position in which we stand in our colony on the question of equal representation.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If you can carry equal representation you can carry this too!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
My hon. friend knows that that is not correct. We have carried as large a load as we have been able to bear.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Too large a load!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I believe with this addition we shall break down. I have the greatest apprehension of the whole principle of equal representation; and I believe that when this proposal is put before the people of Victoria they will see at once, with a clearer vision than they ever had before, that there is danger in it. That fact has been brought home to me with a vividness I never experienced before. We have given the senate equal representation and the power to amend money bills, we have put limits which are more than the ordinary constitutional limits upon the house of representatives, and we have stopped their ordinary powers in regard to money bills, because it will be unlawful for them to originate certain money bills except under certain conditions; and now in spite of the loyal adhesion which Victoria has given to the smaller colonies, and in spite of our personal endeavours to meet them as far as we can, our advances are rejected, and an effort is made to force this position on us that the senate, which by a large majority of our Legislative Assembly was denied even the power of suggestion, is to combine with the house of representatives to form one house, and to have a still stronger power of suggestion.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, says that he is going to knock out the power of amendment in money bills in the joint sitting!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
He will confine the functions of the combined assembly to the mere determination of the question shall a measure pass!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I quite understand that. I am assuming that there is no power to amend money bills. I am accepting that position. Who can say that the power of the senate to meet and to debate upon these money bills, to argue that for certain reasons they should not pass, is not a much stronger power of suggestion than was given in the money clauses of the bill? This is carrying things just a step too far. We are being pushed beyond all the limits of endurance, and I say, with calmness and regret, that, in my opinion, my hon. friend has carried this matter just a little too far.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The hon. and learned gentleman must allow us the contrary opinion!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Certainly, and I hope that one day my hon. friend will be proved to be right; but I fear very much that he will not. We have nothing left now but to do the best we can for our colony. We have met the smaller colonies in as fair a manner as we could; but I see myself bound, subject to further reflection, to further argument, and to further eventualities, to support, if it can be moved in any way, the national referendum, either now or in the future.

Mr. SYMON:
The hon. member should not sacrifice his convictions to do that!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I have sacrificed my convictions in support of the small colonies to a very large extent.

An Hon. MEMBER:
We do not want favours from anyone!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I believe that if the motion is carried a blow will be given to the federal impulse which it will be difficult to recover from. I trust that, whether the required majority is fixed at two-thirds, or three-fifths, or anything else, the proposal will not be carried. I believe that even if it is three-fifths, and there are five colonies in the union-the smaller states will not accept the proposal, because, if it came to a question of state rights, there would be fifty-nine representatives from the larger colonies, and it would only require fifty-seven votes to carry a measure. That will be worse even than the mass referendum. If the required majority was two-thirds, sixty-three votes would be needed to carry a measure, and we should then be placed in the position stated by the right hon. and learned member, Mr. Reid. He asked us, in language that could not be surpassed for force and emphasis,
"Are we to form a constitution in which the will of 2,500,000 people can be prevented from becoming law by the votes of 600,000 people?"

Mr. SYMON:
Does the hon. and learned member suppose that all the representatives would vote together?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I am not arguing against the views of the hon. and learned member; I am accepting the views which he expressed yesterday. If we provided for a majority of three-fifths there would be less difficulty. It would be consistent with what he said, if five colonies joined the union; but if six colonies joined the union it would not, because it would allow the votes of 1,000,000 people to outweigh those of 2,500,000 people. If we accept the amendment suggested by the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, we shall be in exactly the same position. The wishes of 2,500,000 people may be thwarted by 600,000, and if there are six colonies in the union, it will be worse. Instead of requiring 62 members representing the larger colonies we shall require 75, that is, we shall require 13 more members to carry into effect the wishes of the larger colonies. Are the larger colonies going to endure that? I could understand it if the referendum were to be enforced.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
How does the hon. member make up the 62 members?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Sixty-two includes the 50 representatives of the two larger colonies in the house of representatives said the 12 in the senate.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
Is that with five or with six states in the union?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
With six.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
What does the hon. member call Queensland?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Queensland comes nearer to being a small colony than to being a large colony. She will have a representation of 9 members in the house of representatives and 6 in the senate. South Australia, which is called a small colony, will have 7 representatives in the house of representatives, while Victoria will have 24, and New South Wales 26.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is quite right!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
In twenty years' time the smaller states will stand in a strange position. Whether we decide that the majority shall be three-fifths or two-thirds, they will stand in an awkward position twenty years hence if we allow the two houses to come together in this way. I think there are circumstances in which the larger states will be overborne and circumstances in which the smaller states will be overborne, and the arrangement will be unsatisfactory to every one of us. I presume that in any of the colonies it will be difficult to obtain adhesion to this proposal.

The Hon. J.H. Gordon:
The same might be said of any scheme proposed!

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
No; because this is to come after a double dissolution. We will assume a question of state rights to have arisen, and that the two houses have been sent to their constituents.

The Hon. Sir W.A. Zeal:
We are not going to vote for the double dissolution!

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
The hon. member has voted for it.

The Hon. Sir W.A. Zeal:
No, I have not!

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
It has been voted for.

The Hon. Sir W.A. Zeal:
It has been voted for; but I have not voted for it!

Mr. Symon:
I might remind my hon. and learned friend that the double dissolution has not been carried!

An Hon. Member:
Not the simultaneous dissolution!

Mr. Symon:
No; the amendment of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner has been amended so as to embody that!

An Hon. Member:
It has been provisionally carried!

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
Technically my hon. and learned friend may be right; but I am correct substantially, because the votes that were given, 25 to 20, were, I take it, pronounced in favour of a simultaneous dissolution. Therefore, after that has taken place, even in spite of my hon. friend, Mr. Deakin, and my hon. friend, Mr. Symon's successful demurrer, I think on the facts I am correct. What I want to emphasise is that the two houses coming back after that simultaneous dissolution, members will be compelled to stand at their posts; they will be returned by the express mandate of their respective constituencies, said they will be bound to stand firm. Then they will meet together, and what is the result? Is there to be finality? I doubt it. Even with this proposal, if there were finality, it will only be by an abandonment of their positions by some representatives; it will only be by danger to the colonies, large and small, according to the circumstances that there will be any finality. But from that point of view I would urge my hon. friends not to take the very risky and dangerous step of endeavouring to incorporate such a provision as this in the constitution. It is an utterly foreign scheme, more foreign than any other proposal which has been submitted. The referendum has worked in Switzerland; it has been adopted by millions of English speaking people in America; but this proposal has been pitch-forked into this debate at the eleventh hour without the slightest pretence to analogy, without the slightest pretence to adaptability to our constitution, and I do sincerely hope that the Committee will reject it.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[11.2]:

The hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, no doubt finds himself in a quandary. He has supported equal state representation against his own convictions. He now says that we have gone too far and that the proper time has arrived to retrace his steps. But the hon. member must recollect that only last evening he fathered a proposal to carry equal state representation further than was ever proposed before, that was to carry it not merely into the senate but into a referendum to the people. The hon. member's consistency is most-

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I never proposed to carry it into the house of representatives!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

The hon. member did far more than that. He proposed to have equal state representation so ingrafted on the constitution that the people themselves could never get away from it. Where is the consistency of the hon. member in coming forward to-day and saying that he acted against his convictions in granting equal state rights, and now when a proposal of this character is brought forward, which cuts away the ground from the feet of those who advocate equal state representation, he is going to oppose that proposal? He is going to retrace his steps because the advocates of equal state representation are going too far. No advocate of equal state representation has ever gone so far as have some of the representatives of Victoria. It is an unfortunate thing for the interests of federation that there is this marked difference of opinion between the representatives of the large states as to a principle which is almost universally held by the people whom they represent. The hon. member objects to this proposal because it is a foreign institution. It is no more foreign than the system of federation itself; in fact, our constitution has largely to be built up of foreign ideas. But it does not matter whether the idea is foreign, or whether it belongs to our own country, so long as the principle underlying it is one that can be defended. Does not the hon. member know that Mr. Gladstone and the great liberal party in 1893 proposed in the Home Rule Bill exactly the same principle as we are considering now?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Was it with equal representation?

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

As the hon. member knows, there was no federation there, so that there could be no question of equal representation, and the interjection is no answer.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Oh, yes; that is the point in bringing the two houses together!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

There is less ground for having a conference between homes which are elected as legislative assemblies and legislative councils than is the case where the representatives are supposed to derive their authority from the one fountain head of representation-from the people direct, from manhood suffrage. Surely there is an opportunity then of bringing the representative together, when the very source of their authority is exactly the same, although perhaps the degree is different. I must express my amazement at the opposition which this proposal is meeting from the representatives of Victoria. I tell the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, and those voting with him, that they now have these proposals in black and white before them. They know at this juncture that the proposals before the Committee are part of a series of propositions, the finality of which is arrived at when we have the mass referendum.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Then the hon. member is in favour of the mass referendum?

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

I never shrink from going to the legitimate issue of the principles I hold. Since I became a member of this Convention, I have always carried to a vote and to a test all those cases which involve the principles I advocate. If the majority is against me I bow to the inevitable. But because I am defeated on this or that question, that is no reason why I should abandon my support of what I deem to be a good thing, as far as I can get it, always hoping that a time will come when those who oppose me will go one step further with me, at any rate believing that every stage is better than standing still; that every step forward is a step in the right direction. As long as I can get hon. members to march forward with me, I am willing to march on, and when they will go no further I will not quarrel with them because they have gone as far as they could. The hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, and the Right hon. Sir George Turner, said that this proposal, unless safeguarded, would give power to the senate to amend or interfere with money bills. Now the proposal submitted from the Chair gives no power of amendment of any bill whatsoever. The proposal is that laid down in the Government of Ireland bill, the principle that the two houses shall deliberate and vote together thereon, and shall adopt or reject the bill.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

What was the proposal there about a majority?

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

There was a proposal for decision by a majority, I forget what it was exactly. If the hon. member will be consistent and will move the omission of the word "three-fifths" in my amendment with the object of inserting "a majority," I will vote within. When a man comes close to my views I am quite willing to meet him.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

That proposal would be less objectionable!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

My hon. friend knows that I have not the slightest chance of carrying that. But if the hon. member thinks that that is the proper thing to do, let him be manly and do it and I will stand with him. This explanation ought to satisfy hon. members that there is no danger whatsoever of the senate gaining greater power than it now possesses with regard to money bills, because there is no power of amending any bill whatever in the proposal. My hon. friend suggests that we might arrive at this stage: that after a bill has been passed by the house of representatives, and rejected by the senate, a dissolution occurs, and members go to their constituents. They are not rejected, they are fortified in their views, and are more steadfastly constant to their votes. Does the hon. member want matters to remain at that stage?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

This proposal goes much further. It provides that if a majority in the house of representatives with those in favour of it in the senate are sufficiently large to constitute a three-fifths majority, the bill passes. That is a step in the right direction, instead of a minority of two-fifths of the whole parliament standing in the way of progress and legislation, as the hon. member would have it. You do not need one man to give up his principles. You do not need one man to change his vote. The three-fifths majority may be there, existing from the very first moment of the deadlock being created. The majority may never have been increased or diminished by one man. The hon. member asks us to let things stand as they are. That majority, under the proposal I have submitted, will be all powerful. Is it not much better to move that step forward, that where we have that manifest majority of the representatives of the country, there shall be progress in the work of legislation, rather than that we should stand still, rather than that we should adopt the attitude of children who cannot get all they want, and, therefore, will accept nothing at all, and let the country suffer? As to most of these great crises, the intensity of them will be caused by the fact that an insignificant minority, perhaps, is standing in the way of legislation against the will of the great majority, so that in those cases where parties are equally balanced, where there is only a small majority, you may be sure that public opinion will be behind parties there, and you will have a balance which will hold the people too. It is only in those cases where large majorities exist so as to take the question beyond the realms perhaps of debate that there in any necessity to have a provision to meet a deadlock. Where a three-fifths majority is secured, it will be in those cases were it in more necessary to end the deadlocks than in other cases. We have been asked by my hon. friend, Mr. Gordon, whether there is any guarantee from the Premier of New South Wales and myself whether the quota provisions are to remain. He asks whether the Convention is to accept a guarantee as to these quota provisions remaining. I do not want to mislead the hon. member at all. This proposal is made on the bill as it now stands. I take it that if there is a reconsideration of the context in any one part there must also be a reconsideration of these clauses.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
That is fair!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
Vote against it!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
I shall always be found voting against these provisions; but I recognise in all honor and honesty that the vote now given is given by hon. members on the bill as it stands, and, therefore, if there is a reconsideration of the context in any one part there must be an equal possibility for reconsideration of the context, and consequential amendments may be fairly considered then.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

That is fair!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

If we have six states represented in a conference, we shall have 112 members, and a three-fifths majority will be sixty-seven members. The house of representatives will consist of seventy-six members, so that if there is practically an overwhelming majority, in the house of representatives, with the assistance of the twelve representatives of the two larger states, the chances are all in favour of a settlement of the deadlock. If we have only five states, the chances are all the greater in favour of a settlement of the deadlock, when the interests of the states with the large populations, or the interests of the people themselves, are more largely concerned. I do not know whether my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Wise, will urge any objection on the ground of the possibility of the minority being converted into a majority, as he did yesterday. That argument, hon. members will see, is perfectly untenable; because, as the proposals are now before the Chair, the bill must have passed the house of representatives with a majority twice before it can be considered by this conference, so that the danger of having a minority in the people's house converted into a majority by the assistance of the senate, disappears entirely. These proposals, as they are now in the possession of the chair, provide only for the settlement of a deadlock which arises by the obstruction of the senate. I have always intimated my view that the proposal should be of a mutual character; but I have not had my way in that respect, so that the arguments which were used yesterday against these proposals, an the ground that they may possibly convert the minority of the house of representatives into a majority with the aid of the senators must disappear. My friend, Mr. Walker, has made a proposal to make the majority three-fourths. I will advise him to go further, and provide that they shall be unanimous. Then we shall have the rights of the small states guarded with a vengeance. But I do not suppose that anyone will accept a proposal of that character, which is so manifestly beyond all reason, into serious consideration. With regard to these amendments my hon. friend says they have been sprung upon him. As far as I am concerned, a few days ago the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, quoted a passage from a speech which I delivered in this colony.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

That was all abandoned!
The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

If my hon. and learned friend had quoted a passage further on he would have seen that, in my first address as a candidate for election to this Convention, I advocated exactly this proposal which I am advocating now. In Adelaide I gave notice of a similar series of amendments, and, as the hon. member knows, my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, and myself had to come back to this colony to conduct public business, and, therefore, I was not in my place in Adelaide to put this proposal before the Convention. But immediately we met here I gave notice again, and yesterday morning I submitted this proposal to my hon. and learned friends, Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor, the moment the Convention met. All points of their opposition, it appears to me, fall to the ground. We must have some finality. These proposals will reach finality. They give hon. members who are in favour of the general referendum an opportunity at a later stage to vote for or against that general referendum. They safeguard the rights of the house of representatives with regard to money bills, and they give to the people, if not absolute justices a modicum of justice, which is better than none at all. I ask those who are in favour of granting justice to the people to step forward when they can with those willing to more, and not to refuse allies because those allies will not go to the full length of the proposal which has been put forward.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[11.18]:

We have heard a great deal on the subject of finality. I understand, as regards federation, particularly where state rights are concerned, that for the adoption of any legislation two majorities require to be obtained—a majority in the house of representatives, and a majority in the senate. This does not seem to suit some hon. members, who say, under these circumstances, when we cannot get these majorities we cannot deal with these questions; in short, there is no power in the house of representatives by a majority-to overrule the majority in the senate. I take it that there ought not to be, when state interests are involved. I will go further, and, adopting the argument which has been applied at different times on the floor of this Convention, say, "If you are going to provide under any circumstances for a majority of the house of representatives overruling a majority of the senate, you may as well do it in the first instance, and not indulge in all these various provisions, which will be useless if you let the house of representatives feel that it has the ultimate power of decision." The distinction which I have endeavoured to draw is between the cases in which states rights are involved and the cases in which they are not, and I propose to take the sense of the Committee as to whether we should or should not endeavour to proceed on these scientific lines. You create a senate for the purpose of protecting these states rights; you say to the smaller states particularly, "Do not be afraid to come in; your state rights and interests will be always well guarded by requiring the concurrence of a majority of that senate." If now you are going to say to them, "Well, they shall be guarded for a time, but it is not to be permanent; when there is considerable difference on the subject, although you may have a considerable majority in the senate, the will of the house of representatives should prevail"-I say it is not fair. It seems to me we have not come here for the purpose of discussing a project for federation on those lines. Equal representation has been held out as an inducement. That means equal power—a necessary majority in the senate; and I put it to those who have previously said that if you give the final power of decision to one or other of the houses, and dispense with the necessity of the concurrence of the two, the whole thing, as regards the protection of state interests, is a delusion and a snare. Of course there are a great many who seem to be prepared to make considerable sacrifices for federation, and so am I. At the same time, I hope I shall not depart from any grave principle unnecessarily, and I shall not depart in this Convention from the advocacy of a principle which I championed elsewhere, and which our constituents have a right to expect we will not abandon without previous consultation with them. I, therefore, put it to hon. members, "Are you prepared to give power to the house of representatives to decide this matter in the long run? If you are, you might as well give it at first; but I think it would be very much better if you tried to draw the line between the two classes of cases, and let the national will prevail in national questions, whilst at the same time retaining for the protection of the state the dual majorities when state interests are involved." For that purpose I would propose, at the proper time, to move to refer the matter to a referendum of the people of the commonwealth in the case of national questions, and to a referendum of the people of the commonwealth and a referendum of the people of the states when state interests are involved. I have already indicated the mode in which I would suggest that there might, when occasion arose, be the definition of state interests. I do not propose to trouble the Convention with that matter at this particular time, but I do ask the Convention to say that in these cases we will take logical grounds, and that where state interests are involved we will give, not only in the first instance, but always, the protection of the double majority, whilst we will dispense with it in the cases where state interests are not involved, and ought not to affect national questions. I will ask the hon. member, Mr. Howe, to temporarily withdraw his amendment in order that I may move to strike out the word "the" in the first portion of the amendment, with a view to the insertion of the word "a," which is the first portion of mine, and which will enable us to decide as to whether or not we shall have this provision for a joint sitting, and will give up once and for all the necessity for the dual majorities which are provided for the protection of state right. I think the logical position is the one which I have indicated, and I feel, as the representative of a small state, trying at the same time to do my duty to all, that I have a right to feel strongly that the house of representatives ought not to be allowed to prevail over the senate when state rights are involved; and they also have a right to feel strongly that the will of the smaller populations represented in the senate should not prevail over the popular wish in the house of representatives when state interests are in no way involved.

Mr. LYNE:

The difficulty is to decide which is which!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

There is no doubt about that, but shall we make an attempt to do it?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

How does the hon. member say that state rights will be overridden?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I will show hon. members, and I will prove with arithmetical precision, that the proposal which is now before us is simply a cheap and easy and expeditious means of enabling the house of representatives to override the will of the senate. There is no getting away from it—none whatever.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

That is its great recommendation!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

That is why the hon. member does not like it!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I am really delighted to hear some of my friends who protested, in the heat of the moment, in language somewhat similar to that which I myself am compelled to employ in regard to a national referendum, as probably resulting in the overruling of state interests—the finality desired by some in connection with state interests—the extinction of state interests at the wish of the majority of the people—and who at the same time yield to the seductive eloquence of the Right Hon. Mr. Reid, who said practically, "Oh, no; we will not have anything of the sort"—or, rather, he bows to the majority. He was in a minority which advocated the national referendum, and he suggests something else which, when examined critically as it ought to be, is far more dangerous, and likely to result in the extinction to which I refer, and which has induced a considerable majority of this Convention to say they will not have anything in the shape of a national referendum as applied to all cases. This thing-

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
This what?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON: Thing.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The right hon. gentleman will be classed as a tory soon!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
I was using the word in its mildest sense. This amendment, if it is worth anything, ought to work both ways.

An Hon. MEMBER:
So it will!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
I will prove that it will not. It ought to work for the benefit of the senate as well as the house of representatives-to enable the majority in the senate, by the aid of a minority in the house of representatives, when state interests are concerned, to have, if possible, their way on questions which form the subject of discussion at this joint sitting. What is the position? We will take the case when there are six colonies represented-76 members in the house of representatives, 36 in the senate-112 in all. If you are going to provide for a two-thirds majority, as is suggested by my hon. friend, Mr. Howe, you must have 75 altogether on your side.

An Hon. MEMBER:
No; it is of those present, not a majority

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
They will all be present; there is no doubt about that. You want seventy-five on your side. If they are not there they will pair, so that it will come to the same thing. You require the command of seventy-five. Put it at its very best for the senate seventy-six members altogether, one in the chair, a majority against it. You cannot have more than thirty-seven on the side of the senate, and you are not likely to have anything so close. How are you going to get your seventy-six together in a joint sitting? Why there are only thirty-six members in the senate altogether, and under the best of circumstances, with the senate in a minority, but in a very substantial minority in the house of representatives, and polling the whole of the Senate, you could not get the majority necessary for the affirmation of the views of the senate.

Mr. LYNE:
Hear, hear!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
There is no doubt about that. Take the lot, seventy-three and you are short of your two-thirds.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is right enough!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
Right enough! It is right enough for those who say that the house of representatives ought to have two to one the best of it.

An Hon. MEMBER:
We do not want two-thirds!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
We will take it in another way.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
If the bill does not pass, it does not get its own way!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
But is this thing only going to work one way? If it is intended to be a solution of the difficulty, with the house of representatives as the aggressive party, ought it not to be a fair thing with an equal vote?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
The long and the short of it is this; While we are crying out in pious, political horror against the national referendum in all cases, we are providing with a most cheerful alacrity-some of us, at all events-a means whereby the senate can be-to use a word which has been used in connection with this matter-wiped out with every facility, with an impossibility, as it were, of its coming out on top so far as the affirmation of its views is concerned, and with a certainty that it is to be placed prostrate at the feet of the house of representatives. Now, if we are going to have a thing of this sort, why do we not have it in the first instance? If you mean unification-I think my hon. friend Mr. O'Connor, talked about it before-provide for it simply. What is the good of having a second chamber, when, where state interests are really involved, and the senate should be a permanent force for their preservation, you are going to provide for its final extinction in the simple mode which is commended for our adoption by my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers? I am, of course, prepared to do a great deal in the interests of federation, and after consultation with my constituents, I do not know whether, if you are going to put the power in the house of representatives, I should not be prepared to do it in the first instance without all this round about system suggested for our adoption. But I do not think many of us came here charged with the power, or at least with the duty, of adopting a provision of that description, and, although I cannot help recognising at the present moment that we are dealing with this subject in a tentative way, that it must come on for further consideration, when, I shall hold myself at liberty to give such a vote as after the maturest consideration I may see fit to give, yet at this particular moment I want it to be understood that, In whatever way I do vote, it is not a final but a tentative vote, and that at least I am attempting to discharge what I conceive to be my duty in pointing out the position in which a close analysis of the figures shows the senate must inevitably be placed by a proposal of this kind. Of course, if you only adopt the three-fifths proposition, you have to get 68 members—very much difference. Take, on the other hand, the strongest minority you can possibly have in favour of the senatorial views—37; what have you to get in the senate to carry your way?—31, or all but four of the whole of the senate, exclusive of the gentleman who may happen to be in the chair. What chance would the senate have under circumstances such as those? On the other hand, take the 68. Imagine a certain combination—I do not say it is probable; I hope it is not, but it might arise. Suppose that New South Wales has 26 representatives. We talk about combinations of the larger colonies against the smaller colonies. I have not much fear about that. I am using the figures for the purpose of illustrating my case. If state interests are really at issue let us suppose this case—take the waters of the Murray, a matter to which we attach the most vital importance, and in which state interests are involved—you will have 26 New South Welshmen and 24 Victorians in the house of representatives, with 12 members in the Senate. There you have 62 men whose interests in a matter of this sort would be opposed to the interests of the state through which the river Murray ultimately flows. They have only, in the one case, to get thirteen votes from the other states, for the purpose of enforcing their will against the will of the majority of the states who would join, or at least have been invited to join, this federation under the assurance that the senate—a body specially called into existence for the protection of state interests—should permanently and effectively have that power to protect and guard them, which is most insidiously sapped and taken away by the proposal now before hon. members.
Mr. WALKER:

Three-fourths would be better!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

Three fourths of 112 would be 84. Then the senate, with a minority of 37, has to get 47 out of the senate, which only contains 36 in all, for the purpose of making 84, the number which will secure effect being given to its wishes. We have hitherto proceeded on fair and scientific and logical lines. We have endeavoured to call into existence two bodies—one charged with the representation of national interests, the other to whom is to be particularly confided state guardianship. Let us arm each effectually. Let the one be supreme in national questions. At the same time, when-you are asking the other states to come in, subject to an efficient provision for the protection of state interests, do not let that provision be frittered away in the mode which is now proposed, unless after the most mature consideration. Under these circumstances, I shall move the amendment which I suggested for the purpose of asking the House to stick to the position which it seems to me is only the logical and proper position—that in national questions the national will shall be supreme; but, where state interests are involved, the state shall always be given the protection of the two majorities, one of the house of representatives, and, above all, the majority which is specially called into existence for the protection of those interests—the senate of the federal parliament.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria)[11.38]:

I regret extremely that I cannot see my way to support the proposal of my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers. I think he entirely misconceives the effect it will have in operation if he assumes that it will tend to lessen difficulties, between opposing parties in the commonwealth. I have no idea myself that we shall find states against states at all; but we shall very rapidly find parties against parties in the commonwealth, and our experience of parties has taught us that a substantial majority may exist in one house with a very substantial majority in opposition in another house. If we find parties in that state in the commonwealth a party in the people's or representative house with a substantial majority, and, therefore, justified in the public interest in endeavouring to secure legislative sanction to its will—we may, by bringing down the majority in another house to join the minority in the people's house, prevent for all time the attainment of the wishes of an immense majority of the people of the commonwealth. Now, I think, on the other hand, that the very fair proposal submitted by my right hon. friend, Mr. C.C. Kingston, is one which ought to commend itself to both sections of this Convention. It commends itself to me, who believe that, in every conceivable circumstance, the majority of the people should rule; but it seems to me that it should also commend itself to those who hold that there may arise contingencies in which distinctly state interests are involved, and upon which, therefore, the states have a right to speak as states, without regard to their numerical condition. The suggestion made by the right hon. gentleman provides that, unless a protest be made, unless some objection be taken to any question in dispute, it shall be treated as a national question, and shall be dealt with by a reference to the people by means of a mass referendum; but if, on the other hand, state interests are involved, it requires only one third, a very small number, not of the senate, but of the house of representatives, to say that in their opinion state interests are involved. They are not called upon even to prove the fact to any extent, but there is to be merely an expression of their opinion.

Mr. SYMON:

Does the hon. member think that the two-thirds will submit tamely to that?

Mr. TRENWITH:

If you make the provision in the constitution the two-thirds will have no option.

Mr. SYMON:

Would that not be coercion?

Mr. TRENWITH:

We are aiming to secure a solution of difficulties which may arise between the two houses, and the only objection to a mass referendum which I have heard urged is that state interests may be involved. Now, the proposal of the right hon. the Premier of South Australia does not provide that one-third can demand a national referendum, but that one-third can demand a state referendum, a dual referendum, a referendum to the people as people, and to the states as states, requiring before a decision is arrived at a majority of a dual character. This seems to me to be a complete protection to those who are afraid that state interests may be injured. I think, and I desire to say that, in my opinion, we are under a debt of gratitude to the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, representing as he does one of the numerically smaller states, for his generosity and fairness in this matter. I do think that in the struggle which we have had, in the maze in which we have found ourselves in discussing this question, the right hon. gentleman has presented the only rational and tangible solution of the difficulty of discovering what are national questions, and what are state questions.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
Mr. TRENWITH:

One-half of the population would have to be lawyers!

The giving effect to the proposal of the right hon. the Premier of South Australia would not require that there should be a single lawyer in the house.

Mr. WALKER:

There are only twenty-five here!

Mr. TRENWITH:

There are probably twenty too many, although I am willing to concede that many of our discussions would have been lame and impotent but for the great assistance we have received from legal members of the Convention. I am not one of those who hold that the fact of one's being a lawyer should be a disqualification for any public position, but I agree with a great many others who think that the fact of a man being a lawyer often induces him to take an intensely technical view of public questions. However, that is not the subject under consideration now. I was endeavouring to show that there would be no necessity whatever for a legal knowledge in order to ascertain whether in the opinion of the senators the interests of a state were involved in some question which it was proposed to submit to a referendum. According to the right hon. gentleman's proposal when a dispute arises and becomes so acute that either house demands a referendum then, and not until then will arise the further question of what kind of referendum there should be. If no protest be made there is a reference to all the citizens of the commonwealth as citizens of the commonwealth; but if a protest be made by so inconsiderable a number as one-third of the house of representatives, no matter how the majority may desire a mass vote, a dual referendum will take place, a reference to the people as people, and to the states as states; and unless a majority is obtained under both conditions the will of the senate will prevail, and legislation upon the disputed point will be lost. Now, I put it respectfully to the hon. member, Mr. Symon, and to others who think with him that there is a danger of state interests being injured, that this is a reasonable solution—one which need not frighten a bold democrat like myself, who believe that the people, as a people—that the citizens, as citizens of the commonwealth, should in the last resort decide all disputed points. It need not frighten such as I, nor need it on the other hand, frighten those who believe that a majority representing the larger states might, under certain conditions, overbear and prejudice the interests of the smaller states. Now, I would like to submit to hon. members a thought which was suggested the other day by a conversation which I had with my hon. friend, Sir Graham Berry. We have been talking all the time about the states, the states, the states, and forgetting almost entirely the object with which we came here. We came here representing states to create a nation-to create here, beneath the Southern Cross, a nation, and thereby to secure for the states in the aggregate that respect in the councils of the world which has not been previously secured to them-to give to them a power of acting in concert, of unity of action, to speak with a common voice upon matters in which, in existing circumstances, they cannot so speak. But we have allowed ourselves to forget the nation, slid we have been continually hovering round the states. Now, we should endeavour to lift ourselves out of this position. We should try to consider how we are to make a nation-a nation calculated to secure respect among the nations of the world-how we are to make our people citizens of such a commonwealth as would cause their hearts to beat more rapidly with a feeling of pride engendered by the edge of their new citizenship. We ought not to continuously and assiduous be overing over our own little locality, and forgetting the great object for which we are here. I conclude by impressing upon hon. members that the manner in which we have discussed this question, the length of time we have devoted to it -

An Hon. MEMBER:

Shows the importance of it!

Mr. TRENWITH:

The manner in which the galleries are filled during the time we are discussing this question, and the way in which it is discussed in the press during the time we are discussing it, are all evidences that it may be properly described as the corner-stone of federal possibility; and if we are unable to settle it in a way that will meet with the approval of the people, we shall have been wasting our time, we shall have been using the time we have spent in discussing this bill uselessly and idly, and nothing will result from our efforts. Because of the important character of this particular question I would entreat hon. members to make every possible concession when they can without any sacrifice of principle that they hold dear, and think to be important - to follow the lead so admirably set by my right hon. friend, Mr. Kingston, to forget whether they represent large or small states, and to remember only that they are engaged in building up a nation of which they will be proud, and of which their descendants will be proud in times that are yet to come - a nation that will stand the test of attacks from without, a nation that will meet aggression from abroad with a front sufficiently strong to repel it successfully, a nation that will be free from aggression from within of a violent political character, because of the safeguards, the machinery, and the safety-valve, which have been placed within the Constitution itself.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[11.52]:

It must be a little disappointing to those who were so sanguine last night as to expect that this question would be decided without much further debate, to find to how great a length the discussion is likely to extend. It shows how difficult it is, in a few hours, to decide a question like this, which so closely touches our eternal federal salvation. I, last night, formed a decision adverse to the proposal for the joint sitting of the two houses, and my reflections since then have tended only to confirm that view. I will be as brief as I can, and I certainly will not perorate, or use any words that I can avoid. In the first place, I consider that to carry this proposal would be to place an intolerable strain against the retention of the quota. Every force would be brought to bear, as has been vary properly pointed out by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, to withdraw the concession of the quota which has already been made. My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Gordon, considers that he has a safeguard in the pledges of the right hon. the Premier of New South Wales and the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers. I listened very carefully to what the latter hon. gentleman said, but I did not see that he tied himself up quite so closely to this matter as I should have liked. At the same time I am quite sure that anything those hon. gentlemen have said they will stand by; but, admitting that they will stand by it, even the power and influence of those two hon. gentlemen will not, I think, be sufficient to stem the overwhelming demand which will be made that, if this joint sitting is to take place, the proportion of two to one as between the house of representatives and the senate must be overthrown. But, even supposing that the quota stands, we shall have this state of things: we shall have a debate going on in a chamber in which there are two to one as debaters-two members of the house of representatives to one member of the senate-and this would take place only when feeling had already been accentuated and when an esprit de corps had sprung up on the part of each house. Probably under ordinary circumstances hon. members are right in saying that the members of each chamber would not all vote one way, but I say that there would be a tendency to the formation of a corporate spirit in each house when a prolonged discussion had taken place, and I would not be at all surprised if, after there had been a double dissolution, and the senate had come back confirmed in their opinions, the members of each house voted practically almost solidly on the matter in dispute. We all know the strength of debate, we all know what sort of debaters we shall have in this commonwealth parliament. We have seen a very fair sample of their quality in this Convention, and it is not easy for a minority to stand up against speakers, two to one, of such ponderous power of oratory as we shall be likely to have. I say in all seriousness that I have never listened to such able debate as we have had here. I do not believe that in any part of the world you could find a gathering in which more forcible, logical, and eloquent speeches are made, and I say that it would be a difficult thing for a minority of one or two to stand against such influence. Besides, we should remember that this joint sitting will probably be surrounded by the press, who will take the view of the house of representatives.

The Hon. J.H. Howe:
Will not the minority have able debaters too?

The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:
No doubt, but they will be only one to two, and we know the importance in debate, where great issues are impending-say in a no confidence debate-of following up a powerful speaker on one side with a powerful speaker on the other side, and it would be a serious matter if we could put up only one powerful speaker against two powerful speakers.

The Hon. E. Barton:
They will be equal!

The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:
They may all have equal speaking value, but there will be two to one against the senate.

The Hon. E. Barton:
But the hon. member surely does not expect thirty-six speeches from members of the senate and seventy-two from members of the other house?

The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:
Judging from what we have seen, I think there will be a tendency in that way. Then you will have the press present, and we all know and feel the power of the press.

Mr. Walker:
This morning for instance!

The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:
Every morning during the last few weeks it is very hard to stand up against a powerful press, and it would be very hard for the senate to stand up against a powerful press that was advocating the views of the house of representatives, to say nothing of the mass meeting of members of parliament that will take place in the environment, which again in a difficult thing to stand up against. With all these influences against it, the senate will be placed at a great disadvantage, and I as one who has stood by the senate, and fought for the senate as a safeguard-

The Hon. J.H. Howe:

Stick to it still!

The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:

And, as a guardian of democracy, I, for one, if this proposal is carried, will take a last loving look at the senate before it disappears into the interior of the chamber of representatives. Now the senate is being gradually chipped into this subordinate position. It has already lost a great deal; but I think this will be its little all. In 1891 there was practically no serious proposal for any machinery by which the senate, when it felt it was doing its duty in standing up against a majority of the population, should be compelled to give in. Even in 1897, a few months ago, in Adelaide, the proposal of the hon. and learned. member, Mr. Wise, was practically scouted; but now he has succeeded beyond his wildest dreams, and a considerable majority has affirmed, the principle of dissolution. I say that that is as far as we ought to go in that direction. This proposal will amount to annihilation, and it will amount to annihilation of the senate at a time when it has returned from its constituents confirmed in its view and satisfied that it is doing nothing wrong in standing by the just rights of the people of the states. As my right hon. friend, the Premier of South Australia, has pointed out, this machinery is only going to work in one way—that is, for the house of representatives and against the senate. The wheels will only revolve in one direction. It will remove deadlocks when they are caused by the senate; but no power on earth could make it move in the other direction to remove a deadlock caused by the house of representatives. This is simply another final and comprehensive means of insuring that the house of representatives, like a spoilt child, shall have its way in the last resort. We hear about the rule of the people. Are not the people of South Australia entitled to be heard? In every word I have said here I have been expressing, not my own views, but the opinions of the majority of the House of Assembly in South Australia. Those who talk about democracy and conservatism will do well to consider that if the views I am expressing are tory and conservative views, the House of Assembly in South Australia is a tory and conservative body, which is ridiculous. I do not believe there exists a more enlightened democracy in the world than the representative house in South Australia.

The Hon. F.W. Holder:

They passed a resolution in favour of the dual referendum!
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

Which I have voted for. We passed an amendment in favour of a dissolution, and I voted for it to save the senate from the charge and penalty of being a conservative body. I have agreed to a dissolution of the senate, because I did not want that body to stand strong against popular opinion, and because I wanted to see it strong only in so far as it was reinforced by popular opinion. But rather than see the proposal before us carried I would see the term of office of the senate reduced to the term of office of the house of representatives. That I do not fear; but I fear to see the senate prevented from acting as it should act, as the bulwark of democracy. As to the parties in the commonwealth being divided into conservative and liberal parties, from any thought and reading I have given to the matter it is the most arrant nonsense possible. America never has been, and is not at the present day, divided into parties of liberals and conservatives. I defy any one to say which is the liberal and which is the conservative party in America to-day. Before the parties in America had become confused, and when they held WA to their original reasons for existence, the party of state rights was acknowledged to be the party of true democracy. The men who stood up for state rights and the protection of home rule and government were men like Thomas Jefferson, and their names have been handed down reverently from parent to child, as those of the guardians of liberty and democracy in America. The men who were called federalists, who went for nationalism as against state rights, men like Hamilton, with all his genius and transcendent power—where are they now? Their names are not household names in America, as are the names of Jefferson and those who worked with him. So it will be here. Unless we have some great civil war, which will confuse all the issues and blur all the party lines in Australia, and which I hope we shall never have, we shall have the same parties here as existed from the first in America. Parties will be clearly defined: there will be those who wish to see local government, home rule, and state entity preserved; and those who wish to see all these safeguards of the liberty of the people blurred, confused, and obliterated in a central government, which will be situated at a place too far distant for the people of Australia ever to be able to ensure effect being given to their views. I thoroughly believe that this last proposal maybe looked upon as, indeed, a proposal for finality. It is a final proposal for the extinction of the senate, of state rights, and of liberty.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[12.5]:

I submit to the hon. member, Dr. Cockburn, that he is, perhaps, just a little premature in pronouncing so splendid a funeral oration upon the senate. It does not appear to me that the senate is in any such imminent danger of extinction or effacement as my hon. friend seems to think. The object we have all had in view during the last few days of debate has been to arrive at some means of securing finality. We have declared by a vote of two to one that some provision should be inserted in the constitution for the prevention of what are called deadlocks. We have agreed upon the principle so far that, amongst others, at any rate, there shall be a dissolution of the senate, either in the shape of a successive dissolution, or, if the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's proviso as it may be amended is added, by way of alternative, a simultaneous dissolution of the house of representatives and the senate. A large number of hon. members say that that is insufficient, that it might possibly leave things where they were. Various proposals have been made with a view to remedying this objection. Amongst them there has been that of the national referendum, which the Convention would not have at any price.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
There has been no regular vote upon it!

Mr. SYMON:
There has been something uncommonly like it then. It was intended to be a straight-out vote. I know the intimation which my hon. friend, doing violence to his convictions, I think, has given, that possibly, if we are not civil and obedient, he will retrace his steps.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
No. What I meant was that we said distinctly that we should vote for that if the other was not carried!

Mr. SYMON:
I know what the hon. and learned member said, and I think that I gave to his utterance the weight to which, under the circumstances, it is entitled. At any rate, for the moment the national referendum has been rejected by the Convention. Then we had a proposal for a dual referendum, which it was admitted would be ineffective; but it was thought that at any rate it would put off the risk of a continual conflict between the houses for a sufficient time to enable graver consideration to be given to the question at issue, and more moderate views to prevail, so that if the referendum had in the long run to be adopted, it would at any rate have effectually preserved the system of identity of states by requiring a majority not only of the people but also of the states. That also was rejected last night. Now we come to the proposal which was indicated by the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, and which has been formally submitted by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers. It seems to me that it, at any rate, holds out a solution in the direction of finality upon questions as to which there may be a difference of opinion. between the two houses of the federal parliament. Of the three schemes to which I have referred, this appears to be the best. It has been suggested by those who have hitherto been very staunch advocates of the national referendum, that it provides, not in substitution, but in succession to a dissolution—which, in my judgment, will be absolutely effectual of itself-simply another safety-valve, which, however it may work, will have the result at any rate of being final. To that extent surely it is an immense advance. I feel that when the opposition to it is very largely from one of the representatives of one of the small states, it cannot be so advantageous to the interests of the senate, or the less populous states, as some members seem to think. The objection of the Right Hon. C.C.

Kingston to this scheme is that it will not afford the protection to the senate and the smaller states that he wishes to afford. The representatives of the larger state of Victoria object to it because it will give too much protection to the senate and the smaller states. So that there is evidently some misapprehension, and between the two there may be considerable merit. Of course you may have criticism of that kind addressed to any scheme that may be submitted to the Convention. Those who believe that there should be something in addition to the dissolution of the two houses, must seek to arrive, if they can, at something which will reach this finality with the least possible mischief. It seems to me that this proposal will reach finality with the least possible mischief. What is more, my belief is that it will very rarely, if ever, be called into operation. I have no such apprehension as has been urged with regard to the required majority. I do not believe in analysing figures, and saying so many figures will make two-thirds, and so many one-third, and that if the vote goes one way you will have the house of representatives dominating the senate, and that if a certain minority vote in another way, you will have the house of representatives dominated by the senate. I do not think that any correct result can be arrived at by such statements. You cannot introduce a mathematical calculation of that kind into the operations of a deliberative body of human beings.

Mr. HIGGINS:
They will not all vote one way—senators and representatives!

Mr. SYMON:
No. Underlying the objection to this scheme on the part of those who are seeking naturally and rightly to protect the rights of the individual states, which I emphatically wish to protect also, there seems to be the contention that there would be those strong lines of demarcation between states and states. I do not believe it. First of all, I believe that in the houses themselves the members will vote according to their individual convictions, and the cases will be infrequent in the last degree in which they will feel bound to vote in a body with regard to any state question or interest. If such a case occurs, and you have the senate and the house of representatives meeting together, you will have a solution of what you call a deadlock. Hon. members seem to forget that you have first a double dissolution either in the shape of a successive or a concurrent dissolution. Will anybody tell me that after that, if the difference still exists, the two houses when they meet together as one assembly, will not be prepared to deal with the matter in a spirit of moderation and fairness? Will anybody tell me that those who meet together on such an occasion will not be actuated by a desire to come to some reasonable conclusion, and will not have their differences and angles rubbed off by the discussion which must take place? I do not entertain the slightest apprehension that, if it should ever be necessary to call such a conference into being with a view of supplying an ultimate rule of finality, there will be any danger either of a combined vote of the small states in the senate seeking to overbear the larger body in the house of representatives, or the larger body in the house of representatives seeking to overbear the smaller body in the senate. At any rate, we are here now doing our best to deal with an exceedingly knotty and difficult question in the interests of all the colonies. Looking at the fact that differences of opinion now exist in all the states and amongst us as individuals composing this assembly, I say we have a constitutional object lesson as to what will happen in our federal parliament and federal conference. The hon. member, Dr. Cockburn, said that to adopt this proposal would be really an if you were treating the house of representatives as a spoilt child, who, in every complaint, was to have his own way. I do not agree with that position at all. It seems to me you are interposing difficulties and obstacles in the way of either house having its own will, without careful consideration and without the lapse of sufficient time for moderate counsels to prevail. By adopting this proposal, ineffective as it may be, open to criticism as it may be, like every other proposal, I believe you are taking at, least one step towards that ultimate finality which you are so anxious to secure. On that ground, at any rate, it is a step to which we might well give our assent. The Right Hon. Sir George Turner said he was quite satisfied with the double dissolution.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:
I did not say quite satisfied. I said that I was satisfied that in the vast majority of cases the double dissolution would answer the purpose.

Mr. Symon:
That is quite sufficient for my argument. I agree with my right hon.
friend that either form of dissolution-

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

No!

Mr. SYMON:

I do not expect the right hon. member to assent to that; but from my point of view either form of dissolution, successive or concurrent, will render any other provision unnecessary. But if my right hon. friend does think that the double dissolution will serve the purpose, where can the objection be from his point of view and the point of view of his colleagues to insert the provision of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, providing for this subsequent conference between the two houses? I am sure my right hon. friends are not actuated by any pique or anything of that kind. They are desirous of accomplishing the object we all have in view. If that object will be accomplished in the majority of cases by a double dissolution or some form of dissolution, there can be no objection to inserting this additional provision asked for by New South Wales.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I would rather have nothing than take it!

Mr. SYMON:

I am afraid that would be acting like the spoilt child that the hon. member, Dr. Cockburn, compared the house of representatives to. Another proposal has been submitted, and I confess it is exceedingly ingenious; but, whilst I consider it is ingenious, I think it would be most mischievous. It involves this: We have decided against the national referendum and against the dual referendum; but this proposal is to embody in the constitution both referendums—the dual and the national. I do not know how we can very well place ourselves in that position, after having rejected each of these in succession. We have said that they were bad separately, but the combination of the two has removed the vice of each, and we now have a most virtuous combination in accepting the two referendums together.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

It is taking the good of each!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Is the hon. member putting it in a fair way?

Mr. SYMON:

I think so. What does it mean to embody the dual and national referendums in the constitution? Does it not involve the acceptance of the dual and the national referendums? If we put in the national referendum apart from the rest of this proposal, it would only apply to the cases to which it was applicable.
No; the national referendum was to apply to all cases; the dual referendum, as proposed, was also to apply to all cases; but in this proposal the national referendum is to apply to national questions, and the dual referendum is to apply to all cases of state rights—each to its appropriate class!

Mr. SYMON:
Then it applies to all the cases to which it is applicable—that is to all the cases, under the constitution, of differences between the two houses. So will the referendum, apply to all the cases under the constitution to which it is applicable—that is, to all the cases of differences between the two houses.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

Mr. SYMON:
No; my hon. friend is leaping before he comes to the stile. Now, what is proposed here? You are to have both referendums under the constitution; but you are not to bring them into application, except in a certain class of cases referable, or supposed to be referable, to each. You an not to allow that to be decided by the executive government, who, I think, would be a better body to decide it, if it were to be decided in that way, than a deliberative assembly, or a proportion of a deliberative assembly; but you leave a certain proportion—it is immaterial whether that proportion is a third or a half—of the house of representatives to decide whether or not a particular question is one affecting national or state interests, and whether or not a dual referendum or a national referendum shall be applied.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
In other words, you allow a small proportion of the smaller states to decide whether they will have it applied to other states!

Mr. SYMON:
You allow a certain proportion, which may be of the smaller states, to decide; and the decision—it will be no decision, it will be influenced by prejudice, by strong feeling for their own particular state. You would introduce elements of discord of the very worst possible kind, and in the very worst possible place where they can be introduced—into the house of representatives.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I thought the hon. and learned member said there would be none of that!

Mr. SYMON:
There would be by this proposal. What we are desirous of doing is to keep it out; but if you are going to hand over the determination whether a particular question shall involve a state interest, or simply a national interest, you ought to hand it over to some body entirely independent and removed from the house of representatives-or the senate, for the matter of that—who would be capable of bringing to bear on it a calm and dispassionate consideration, and solving what would really be, not a question of politics, but a question of law. You could not do such a thing by means of this proposal; it is admitted to be impossible that you can sever national questions from state questions. It is admitted to be impossible, and yet you are going to shift this impossibility on to the shoulders of a proportion of a deliberative body. If hon. members think that that can be conveniently done, or they look forward with pleasure to what the results of it would be, it is not a view which I take. My right hon. friend, Mr. Kingston's, proposal, reminds one of the story of the man who went about selling pills which were good against earthquakes. This proposal would have no effect whatever in stopping inflamed feeling or putting a satisfactory end to a legitimate difference of opinion between the two houses; but it would produce further complications and distraction and bad feeling, every opportunity for the creation of which, it seems to me, we ought, if possible, to avoid. My hon. friend, Mr. Trenwith, says that this was a generous proposal to come from the representatives of the smaller states. When one hears an expression like that one is apt to suspect whether it is going to have the effect of protecting the senate as is suggested. At any rate, as far as I am concerned, looking at all the proposals which have been made, it seems to me that we should do well to support that which has been submitted by the hon.

member, Mr. Carruthers, as, at any rate, although not free from criticism and good ground of criticism, a step towards that, finality which we are anxious to reach. I however, object to its being attached to the alternative proposal embodying the simultaneous dissolu

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That means that you will come back to the original motion you carried, and nothing else!

Mr. SYMON:
No.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Yes, certainly!

Mr. SYMON:
In addition to the proposal of my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
No; because it all forms part of one proposal we had in the bill, and you must vote for or against the lot.

Mr. SYMON:

No. My hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, intimated last evening—I am glad of the interjection, because it enables me to make this clear—that he would move this as an amendment to the proposal of the right hon. gentleman, Sir George Turner, and that if it were not carried in that shape, then he would move it as an addition to my proposal which was carried on Friday.

The CHAIRMAN:

I would point out to the hon. and learned member that that cannot be done. We cannot continue to discuss and rediscuss the same proposals.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

On recommittal!

The CHAIRMAN:

It can be done on the recommittal of the bill.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

That will not be fair to those who will be away!

Mr. SYMON:

At any rate, sir, I am very glad to have got your ruling on that question. My hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, intimated last night that he intended to adopt that course; if it is impracticable we cannot help it. The scheme which he proposes, defective though it may be, is one step at any rate towards that finality which we are all desirous of reaching a finality, at the same time, which some of us at least believe will be abundantly secured by the provision for the dissolution of the senate and of the house of representatives which we have already passed, and which I have no doubt the Convention will finally adopt in some shape or form.

Motion (Hon. J.H. HOWE) negatived:

That the Committee do now divide.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales)[12.28]:

I only want to say a word or two at this stage. My course is going to be a very simple one. I intend to vote against every proposal which may come up after this one is decided for settling a deadlock. I think it would be far better for us to remain where we are. I cannot help thinking, although this proposal was in a sort of tentative shape before the Convention at Adelaide, and has been more or less in the minds of some hon. members during this sitting, it was, to a certain extent, sprung suddenly upon us yesterday. I think it is a very serious thing when the whole trend of the mind of hon. members was in the direction of some kind of referendum to have, in a few hours, an absolutely new proposal put before them, and for us to be asked to give a definite decision upon it. Now, I do not agree with my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon. I think that if there had been some proposal that we had been discussing for days, such as that involving the referendum, or even the proposal of the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, that might have been put in as a tentative thing upon reconsideration; but I think it is a very serious thing for us in a sort of feeling of despair in our debates to come to a certain conclusion in a few hours to be called upon to consider a proposal involving an entirely new departure. I am absolutely against the proposal. I have given it every consideration. I do not think it would work well. And I do not think it would be acceptable to the democracy of the larger colonies. As far as the quota is concerned, if you pass this amendment you must make some provision by which the majority, say, of three-fifths shall go up or go down according to the alteration of the relative strength of the houses. That of course can be done in a certain way, and by a mode mechanical, but at the same time some of those who are inclined to vote for this proposal are absolutely against this hard and fast quota, and I am inclined to believe that the author of that quota has come to the conclusion that it has not so many advantages as he has imagined. I consider myself that it bristles with disadvantages. I also feel that, looking at this matter from a fair and impartial point of view, the decision to which we would come by passing this amendment would put the representatives from Victoria in a very awkward position. There is no doubt that there has been a great effort on their part, as well as on the part of New South Wales, to come to some understanding, which, whilst meeting with the wishes of their own democracy would be fair to the other States; and by a peculiar concurrence of circumstances yesterday, which nobody could foresee, those who were really the advocates of a national referendum became the destroyers of any referendum whatever. Therefore, I say most distinctly, that we have now reached a stage which many never expected, as a solution of this question, and that it is much better that we should remain at this stage, leaving it for the interval to give counsel, judgment, and reflection, and then we will be able to consider all the schemes-not the scheme that may be embodied now in our deliberations, and which would, of course, have an unfair advantage, and which might possibly commit those to it whom the lapse of time might cause to reverse their decision, but who might be inclined, out of a sort of false consistency, to stick to what they had advocated-

Mr. HIGGINS: What is the objection to the scheme from the hon. member's point of view?
Mr. MCMILLAN:
I am not going to discuss it now. I believe, as I say, that it bristles with a great many difficulties.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
Will the hon. member please point them out?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It has this disadvantage, which I have felt in many other matters that have been brought before the Convention—that it is absolutely impossible to see the combinations which may exist between the two houses on certain questions under discussion. I also see that it may give rise, under certain circumstances, to a large amount of corruption to a large amount of wire-pulling; and I also see that a meeting of the two houses, based upon totally different principles, is inconsistent with a federal government. But, as I said before, I would prefer that this matter lay open for calm consideration, and, as far as I am concerned, I am willing, with this as with every other scheme which has been brought forward, to give it the best consideration.
And if I feel that, although it is not exactly the one that I believe in, yet it is the best of the whole, I shall be as ready to subserve my own views to the majority as any one in this Convention. I see there is a difficulty, according to the rules of the Convention, in getting back to the position in which we were stopped at the work of last night. I find that the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Wise, states:
Provided that the senate shall not be dissolved within a period of six months immediately preceding the date of the expiry by effluxion of time of the duration of the house of representatives.
That is really the point to which we have arrived.

Mr. LYNE:
Which point?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The point at which the hon. member introduced his amendment. Unfortunately we have gone further than that as a matter of order, and we have inserted:
And if after such dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendment the proposed law may be referred to the direct determination of the people.
Of course if we negative both of these proposals, then we shall leave in a nonsensical sentence; but I would now appeal to hon. members as a matter of getting through the remainder of our work, and as a means of freeing every member of the Convention from any sense of inconsistency, freeing him from any absolute obligation to any scheme after this interim process—if it is an interim process—I would appeal to hon. members, both on the ground of getting through the remainder of our work, and on the ground of leaving each with a free and open mind for the future discussion, to let well alone, and to stop this deadlock business at the stage we have reached.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia):[12.37]

The procedure we adopted yesterday has placed us, I think, in an unsatisfactory position. I think that, if the course suggested had been followed—that is, of taking a vote as to whether the clause proposed by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, should be rescinded or not—we would have known better where we are than we do at the present time. We have now before us a resolution of the Committee in the form of a clause which was proposed by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, and we have also alternate proposals, carried last night which are altogether the opposite—to that which has already been embodied in the bill by the will of the Convention. I have been all along, as hon. members are aware opposed to simultaneous dissolution, of both houses. But it seems to me that what was agreed to last night practically rescinds the clause already adopted, although I am aware it was moved as an alternative to the procedure under the clause, proposed by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon. I promised the right hon. gentleman, Mr. Reid, that I would support him in the proposal he made that in order to provide efficiently for deadlocks, the house of representatives should, in the first instance, be dissolved, and after its return from the country, if the senate and the house of representatives were still unable to agree, then there should be a reference to both houses sitting together. I am prepared to abide by that promise; but I expect that if I do so, those who made it will also keep faith with me. I think there has been rather an inclination to go away from the proposition which has been made. It seems to me that those who made this proposal are now quite ready to accept the simultaneous dissolution of both houses, and if that be so they cannot, of course, expect that I shall keep faith with them, and vote for the conference which they propose with the simultaneous dissolution provisions tacked on to it. I am very much inclined to agree with the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, that the best course for us to pursue would be to leave the clause proposed by the hon. member, Mr. Symon, in the bill, and to postpone the further discussion to another time.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Wise!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

The amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Wise, is only a piece of a clause. When a clause which embodies the amendment of the hon.
member, Mr. Wise, is put, I intend to vote against it. I do not believe in any alternative in this constitution. The course to be followed should be a clear course; it should be one course, and not two or three courses. I see no necessity for leaving two courses open for any government to follow. Surely it is sufficient that we should embody in clear terms the course that is to be followed under the constitution? I would much rather have Mr. Symon's clause rescinded, and Mr. Wise's clause inserted in its place, than I would allow both of them to remain. I should be very glad if the representatives of New South Wales would adhere to the proposal they made last night—that is, that one house should be dissolved, and that then, if an agreement could not be obtained, the conference should take place. I believe that proposal would meet with the support of a large majority of the members of the Convention. But if these hon. gentlemen are going to run away from the proposal they made, and not keep faith with us, then I shall be obliged to vote against the proposal altogether.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Who is running away?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The proposal made by the right hon. member Mr. Reid, it seems to me, is not, being supported now in the way I expected it would be by that hon. gentleman, and also by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers. I may have misunderstood them; but I should like to have means provided for carrying out the proposal which was made, and then I should be able to vote with them most thoroughly. If, however, the proposal of Mr. Wise is to remain, then I am not prepared to add on anything to it. I disapprove of it altogether,

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[12.44]:
I rose principally when the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, sat down, with a view of objecting to what he suggested. I strongly deprecate the suggestion that we should separate without in some way indicating the best view we can come to with regard to giving finality. I think it is unjust to the public and unjust to the members of parliament in the different colonies who have to advise about it. There is no doubt that, whatever sneers may be indulged in about members of parliament, they have great influence in their constituencies, and we ought to recollect that, if we separate without agreeing to some provision for finality, we shall have all sorts of schemes bandied about from one to the other, and we shall not have anything definite and concrete upon which members of parliament and others can address the public from the platform. It is not correct to treat the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, as entirely novel. It was discussed in Adelaide; it has been discussed in the press, and has often been the subject of debate.

The Hon. E. Barton:

It was proposed, with a slight difference by Mr. O'Connor, and in another form by Mr. Carruthers in Adelaide, and there was a good deal of discussion.

An Hon. Member:

I heard of it twenty-five years ago!

Mr. Higgins:

It is a mistake to think that this thing is rushed. We should show the greatest weakness and incapacity as a Convention if we were to say that this problem is too hard for us to solve, and we ought to put in something to secure finality. But, of course, the hon. member recognises that the double dissolution, although good in its way, will not secure finality.

Mr. McMillan:

There is nothing more simple than to put something in!

Mr. Higgins:

Put something, and the best you can. I intend to vote for the scheme of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, though I should like to amend it in one respect, which I shall presently point out.

Mr. Lyne:

In what direction?

Mr. Higgins:

In the direction of allowing the majority to decide. As to the proposal in its present shape we shall be in a very strange jumble in our voting. The Attorney-General of Victoria has indicated that he thinks the proposal for a joint sitting of both houses would be unfair to the house of representatives and unfair to the people, because they would have sitting with them the representatives of the senate, representing the minority of the people.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:

With equal representation!

Mr. Higgins:

On the other hand, the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, says that we must not have this joint sitting because it is unfair to the senate, and the senate would be wiped out. I understand, then, that these two extremes will vote the same way with different objects-one in order to prevent injustice to the lower house, and the other in order to prevent injustice to the senate.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
Different cases!

Mr. HIGGINS:
There has only been one referendum put before this Convention, and I voted for it. I do not recognise any referendum but a national referendum.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Are there no eggs but hen eggs?

Mr. HIGGINS:
There are goose eggs.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Of course there are!

Mr. HIGGINS:
We shall have a strange medley in our voting at the joint sitting. We shall find those whom we ordinarily conceive to be tories on the same side as those whom we conceive to be liberals. Wrongly, as I think, but rightly as the majority of hon. members here think, we have decided upon allowing each state to be equally represented in one house.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
This is the nearest approach to unequal representation!

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is decided so far as the present sitting of the Convention is concerned. The effect of it is this: you have put the sovereignty in commission, as it were; you have it half in the people and have in the states. You are putting the sovereignty, the ultimate yea or nay, in two bodies, with two inconsistent voices, and the only possible way in which you can secure finality is to get those two voices together in one joint sitting. If in this joint sitting you put these two voices together, you will see what is the ultimate result, and you will at least get finality. Of course I shall hope that, hereafter, before we absolutely pass the constitution, the senate will be so modified as not to include that basis of equal representation which has been alluded to. At the same time, I want to secure finality by some means. There is nothing so bad as leaving it in this state of divided power, and the only way to get finality is to get these two inconsistent sovereign powers together, and see which is the stronger in the end. The amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, is not that there may be an amendment passed by the two houses on their joint sitting, but that the members of the two houses deliberating and voting together shall say whether the proposal should be adopted or rejected according to those present and voting. The amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers-I do not mean the original paper distributed, but the amendment as before the Chair is simply adoption or rejection. The difficulty about amending or suggesting amendments in a money bill, therefore, do not arise. It would be a question of "yea" or "nay." Shall the proposal be adopted or not? As I said yesterday, I agree firmly with the criticism of the hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, that you cannot allow amendments on a joint sitting in the case of a money bill, because you would be giving the senate that which we have taken from them, but upon the mere question of adoption or rejection, when it is remembered that this joint sitting is only to take place after the ordinary constitutional method of appeal to the constituencies—of a dissolution—has occurred, I say that there is little or no danger in simply saying, "Let the two houses sit together, and let us see on the count of heads, which side has the most." I shall hope also that before dealing with the bill at its ultimate stage we may abolish the quota system which compels one senator for every two members of the house of representatives. I shall hope that that will be knocked on the head; but at the same time, I am bound to say this: that if the quota system be retained, a joint sitting is the only reasonable method I can see of arriving at finality. The proposal of the right hon. the Premier of South Australia does not obtain finality. It simply leaves the matter where it was. Assuming that by a resolution of the two houses you come to the conclusion that it is a question which ought to be referred to the states, and if you have a referendum to the states and people, and they do not agree, still there will be no finality. My strong objection to the suggestion is that it does not secure finality. As I said before, I fear that there would be offered too strong a temptation to the opposition to vote that a thing was a states question in order to embarrass the government of the day and to prevent a certain bill from being carried. I shall conclude by moving:

That the word "three-fifths" be omitted.

The CHAIRMAN:
There is already an amendment by the hon. member, Mr. Howe, to strike out those words.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If they be struck out, I intend to move that there be inserted in their place the words "a majority."

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[12.54]:
Whenever I hear any one apologising, I suspect that something is wrong. Now, the hon. member, Dr. Cockburn, apologised for the vote which he gave for the amendment of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon. The hon. member seems to have apologised for having done so on the score that, although setting up a senate with such exceptional powers, he was not really creating a conservative body. I differ from the hon. and learned member, and that is one of the reasons which actuated me in opposing Mr. Symon's amendment, and which will still influence me in that direction. If we set up two houses equal as regards the suffrage, and armed with the same powers, we shall find one body obstructing the work of the other. Now, when the Canadian federation was instituted, it was stated by Lord Elgin, when the proposition was made to establish a senate based on a pretty wide suffrage, that a senate set upon such a basis, and practically as strong as was the lower house, would be a strong body to fight on the side of conservatism. As regards the French Chamber, an attempt was made to sweep its effective power away, to prevent it from exercising the large powers conferred upon it, upon grounds similar to those upon which supporters of the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Symon, rely. I take up this position: That if you endow men of intellectual energy with great powers they will not allow those powers to rust. I rely upon the celebrated dictum of that great master of human nature who said:

He that made us with such large discourse, looking before and after, gave us not this capability and god-like reason to rust unused.

I find in the annals of the "American Academy of Political and Social Science," the following with regard to the case of the French Senate:-

It was maintained, with regard to the first, that the Senate could not justly be asked to act merely as a registering machine in the case of money bills. A house of lords composed of hereditary members, or an upper chamber largely named by the sovereign, might with some reason be required to yield in case of conflict; but the French Senate sprang from universal suffrage, equally with the Chamber of Deputies, even though indirectly, and it could not reasonably be required to efface itself.

I say that the same principle operates here as in France, and that, if you establish two chambers, equal in regard to the basis of representation and invested with the same powers, you will find one chamber obstructing the work of the other, upon the principle suggested by the quotation I have just made; because one chamber will decline to, by inaction, efface itself, and also from the perversity of human nature. Apart, altogether, from the question of a federation, I am strongly opposed to the principle of Mr. Symon's amendment. The hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, urged in opposition to Mr. Carruthers' preposition that there was no analogue in existence to justify its adoption. I fail to see that there is any substantial distinction between the Norwegian scheme and this scheme. In Norway, also, you have the numerical disparity between one house and the other, yet you have two houses joining together.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Originally one house divided into two committees!

Mr. GLYNN:

Originally one house, resolved itself into two committees, the number of one committee being greater than the number of the other. These two committees again merged into one, the disproportion of numbers being still carried out. Therefore, the minority represented on the one side would, to as great an extent as under the amendment before us, be in danger of being out-voted, and the majority might equally find itself to some extent nullified. That might happen under the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, but I think the analogy between the two cases is perfect. You have two committees, different in number, combining into one, and allowing legislation to proceed upon the vote of two-thirds. What is the position as regards Mr. Carruthers' amendment? I do not care whether you take the proportion of three-fifths or two-thirds as the basis of legislation. We will say that there is a total of 112 members, of whom 76 are in the house of representatives. Under the three-fifths proposal the majority required would be 67. There is a fraction, but that will not affect the argument. The two large states will furnish 50 of that number. From the senate there would be 12; so, with the combination, we would get 62 out of the required 67; therefore, we would then have to get 5. To make up 5 there would be a balance of 26 in the house of representatives, and of 24 in the senate - a total of 50. If you take two-thirds, the number required will be 74 to form the necessary majority, and, to get that, we would have, as before, 62 members in the house of representatives, and the senate, who could be called upon by the two large states. So the number to be made up is 12, and, as I have already mentioned in connection with the three-fifths proportion, in the case of the two-thirds, to make up 12 you would have a balance of 50 members - that is 26 in the house of representatives, and 24 in the senate.

[The Chairman left the chair at 1 p.m. The Committee resumed at 2.5 p.m.]

Mr. GLYNN:

Just before the adjournment I was endeavouring to point out to the Committee that no matter what majority you have, three-fifths or two-thirds-

An Hon. MEMBER:
Or three-fourths!

Mr. GLYNN:

I have not gone into the figures as regards a three-fourths majority, for I do not think that the Convention would agree to a three-fourths majority, which would be rather unfair to the larger states. But, whichever may be the majority most likely to be accepted by the Convention, I take it that the large states need have very, little fear that their demands would not receive adequate and just recognition. In the case of three-fifths, the majority to be made up will be 67. As a matter of state interests will by assumption be involved, it is just to take it for granted that an amalgamation of votes will ultimately take place, and by this amalgamation the large states get in the house of representatives 50 votes, and in the senate 12, making a total of 62. Therefore, the balance to be made up, in the case of a three-fifths majority, would be only 5, and, in the case of a two-thirds majority, they would have 62, on the proportions already mentioned, and the number to be made up would be only 12. I say that if the policy, support of which were required by the larger states, were one which could not secure, in a three-fifths majority, a balance of 5 votes, or if in the care of a two-thirds majority, it was one which could not secure a balance of 12 votes, I fail to see how it could be founded on justice, reason, or expediency. In the case of a consolidation of votes, if the policy were one that had the slightest recommendation of justice and expediency, there ought, to be little difficulty on the part of the large states in getting, in one case a balance of 5, and in the other case a balance of 12. I think hon. members will agree with that position; and, therefore, without saying on what grounds the small states would adopt these majorities-looking at the matter purely from the point of view of the fears of some members of the larger states, I say that there is very, little that ought to cause any timidity on their part. That is, on what I may call grounds of mere abstract or a priori consideration as to what would be likely to take place in the voting and as, to the prospects of obtaining the balance to make tip a majority. But look at what takes place in France. As I mentioned last night, on a question arising as to a revision of the constitution, the National Assembly consists of an amalgamation of the two houses for the purpose of voting. The Senate is composed of 300 members, and the Chamber of Deputies, being on a population basis, is composed of a larger number.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

573!

Mr. GLYNN:
Yes, about that number. I know that it is one for every 100,000 of the population. I do not know the exact number of deputies now; but, as the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, has mentioned, the proportion is about 300 to 573. Therefore, on amalgamation there, the same grounds of fear would be capable of being urged that are being put forward here by representatives of the smaller states; and, from another point of view, by representatives of the larger states, if they voted on amalgamation according to the numerical strength of the separate houses. But they do not, and that is the reason why I say that there would be very little difficulty experienced by the larger states in making up the small balance of five or twelve. The assumption of block voting against reason is not justified by experience. I mentioned last night—I think hon. members will excuse me for repeating the figures, because they are exceedingly important; from this point of view—that on matters involving in some cases almost the existence of the Senate, a vote took place on consolidation lines. In 1884, after an agitation that began in 1882, the National Assembly sat for the purpose of considering a proposal made by the Chamber of Deputies to take away the right of the Senate to amend money, bills or to interfere with the budget.

There were several other amendments also referred to the National Assembly for consideration, and although the matter had been agitated for two years, and although the Chamber of Deputies had a very large proportion of votes in the National Assembly, the vote, which was a consolidation vote, was in this way: There were 502 votes for, and 172 against; so you see there the 300 votes of the Senate were not block votes in the National Assembly, and the majority of 502 must have been very largely made up of some of the votes of the very senators whose powers, if not whose existence, were being aimed at by the amendment made in the National Assembly. There was another question which involved the respective rights in constitutional matters of the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate—a vote that was taken in 1875, shortly after the establishment of the Constitution. In that case the vote was 526 to 249, and as the Senate had only a total number of 300 members, some of the senators must have gone over to make up the majority in favour of the proposal which toned down their powers. So I think I am justified in taking up the position that if the amendment proposed by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, is agreed to, instead of the vote being carried out according to the numerical strength of the two houses, it will be a unitarian vote, given, with some allowances for class and state prejudices, on the grounds of common-sense, expediency, and fairness. Therefore, I would support that amendment. Last night I supported the principle of a dual referendum, which, after a dissolution of the two houses, I think would be the best expedient we could adopt. But that has not been accepted, and I am driven back to take up some position in regard to this vote.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

There is the proposal of the Right Hon. Mr. Kingston!

Mr. GLYNN:

I cannot at present see my way to adopt the amendment of the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston. I do not wish to repeat arguments which have been so very well used by hon. members; but I would simply say this, in addition: The proposal of the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, would leave open the possibility of state rights or state interests being continually agitated in the parliament. It is a provision for deadlocks, and wherever any arose the cure sought by the right hon. member to be administered would necessitate the raising of State issues. If we leave matters alone, I believe that state issues will not arise. I believe that we hear of them in this Convention, because we have to be cautious to make provision for possibilities, although they may be exceedingly remote; but in the actual working of the constitution I do not believe that, perhaps, once in thirty years, if ever, a real state issue will arise; and, as I have said, the provision proposed by the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, would necessitate the precipitation or suggestion of state issues, practically, under all circumstances.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

It would keep the sore open!

Mr. GLYNN:

Yes, it would keep the sore open. I do not wish to perpetuate the passions, turmoil, and ferment to which, during the last twenty-four hours, we have unfortunately become too much accustomed; therefore I cannot support that proposal. The only attempt that has been made to separate state issues from federal issues is in the German Constitution. In the German Constitution there is a provision that wherever a matter is not a matter that affects the empire as a whole, but is one that affects state rights or state interests, then only those states which are affected by the question can vote upon it; but, if I am not mistaken, there is either a specification of those matters, or some attempt has been made to indicate what they are in the lines of the constitution itself. But under the amendment of the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston-and this is what would be unfair to the larger states-we should put in the hands of the smaller states—either half or one-third of the whole—the power of suggesting a question as a state issue.
We know that in these matters it would be very hard to differentiate between what is and what is not a state issue, so that the ultimate arbiter would be the passions or prejudices of the representatives, which, upon the assumption that means are required to prevent deadlocks, would be at white heat at the time. I, therefore, cannot support the proposal. The right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, referred to the question of the control of the rivers as questions which might raise a state issue; but you will not raise this state issue in the federal parliament, because we shall settle in the constitution itself the lines upon which the rivers are to be dealt with.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

The constitution might be amended in accordance with clause 121!

Mr. GLYNN:

The deadlock question does not affect that at all; it is altogether separate from it. We shall settle in the constitution once and for all the extent to which there is to be federal control of the great arteries of commerce, including the rivers within the union, and once that question is settled no question of state rights in regard to it will arise between one state and another. I do not think, for instance, that there would be a block vote against South Australia, simply because a system of locking the rivers would give us more trade than we might otherwise get. If that were a state issue, it is not one which would separate the senate from the house of representatives. It would be a question between some of the states in the senate and other states in the senate, or between some of the members of the house of representatives and other members of the house of representatives. It would not give rise to a deadlock by creating a conflict between the two houses, which is the subject with which we are called upon to deal now. I hope that whatever may be the result of the voting on this question it will rather arouse the sense that a compromise has been effected than that a victory has been gained by one side or the other, so that the federal edifice may take its symmetry and its beauty from a harmonious blending of what is reasonable in the opinions of all.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales) [2.18]:

I am not going to address the Committee for more than three minutes, because I feel that anything like a long speech at the present time is quite out of place. I can say with a supreme confidence that the proposal that the two houses should sit together under a three-fifths majority is infinitely better than anything else the Convention is likely to agree upon. We all have our opinions upon this subject, and if we had our own way we should provide different solutions of the difficulty. At the same time we reserve to ourselves the right to reconsider the whole question in the light of further information; but I have no hesitation in saying that I look upon the proposal that the two houses should sit together and decide these matters by a three-fifths majority as absolutely the best we have before us which has any chance of success. The right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, has naturally great attachment for his own little bantling. I generally look at the concluding sentences of documents of this kind first, and the concluding sentence of his suggestion is beautiful.

By the above effect will be secured to the national will in admittedly national questions, while state interests will be fairly guarded.

That is beautiful, and is what we all aim at. But when we look at what the hon. and learned member proposes to carry it out the thing falls to pieces. The right hon. member is in the difficulty in which I was the other day. I said, as he says, let us mark the national questions with a national referendum and the provincial questions with a state right. But if you cannot do that in connection with the subjects dealt with in the bill, how can you possibly do it with any reasonable chance of giving satisfaction in regard to measures which come before the federal parliament? If it cannot be done in genesis it certainly cannot be done in detail. I think that that is obvious. The bad result would be this: that the war between state and national interests would be kept up in perpetuity. Every question that came up in the commonwealth parliament might raise this eternal fight between the two interests. Would not that be the greatest calamity that could happen to the commonwealth?

An Hon. MEMBER:

It would entail it!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

It would keep it alive. Whilst we want to make some provision against deadlocks, if this will enable us to say to the people, "This constitution will work well, and we have put into it something, though in a rough and ready fashion, perhaps, which, if there is a crisis, will settle it," we shall have done pretty well. My right hon. friend puts these alternatives. He allows one-third of the house of representatives to declare that state interests are involved. That means that the representatives of Queensland, Tasmania, South Australia, and Western Australia will have to agree to make a question a state question; or half the representatives of half the states in the house of representatives, that is, two and a half in Western Australia, two and a half in Tasmania, and three and a half in South Australia. If you could divide people up in that way, that would sum up a total of eight and a half votes to decide whether a question was or was not one involving a state interest. In one of the alternative schemes, one half would have to vote solid, and, in the other, eight and a half votes would do. We will all think over this matter during the adjournment; but I think that the course of sitting together will bring deadlocks to an earlier, a less expensive, and a friendlier determination than anything else. There is no doubt, as we know from our experience of conferences between the two houses, that if you bring them together even in the bitterest times, the result is greater friendliness, greater courtesy, and a greater desire for settlement. That has been our local experience, and I confidently believe that, if you place men face to face, and let them thrash a thing out, the effect will probably be to bring the two houses into more amicable relations. We all hope that there will very seldom be any necessity for this. I think that this is the best thing we can do upon the whole. I am absolutely sure, so far as one can be sure of anything, that it is the best we can do. If we can get any light on the matter further on, we shall all agree to act according to our convictions. As to money bills, it was agreed last night that an appropriation bill and a tariff bill should not be submitted to a vote in detail upon every clause. So the conference would run on the lines of the general provisions of the constitution as to money bills or bills which are not money bills. In the case of money bills, the question to be decided would be "That the bill do now pass." In the case of ordinary legislation, I see no reason why, if you bring the two houses together, you should not give them the opportunity of going through the whole measure clause by clause, and making it as good as they could. With regard to money bills, however, it will be seen that measures of that kind cannot be amended; but I have no objection to general measures being open to review by the general public.

The CHAIRMAN:
If the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Howe, is put, the amendment of the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, cannot be put.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
To facilitate matters, and to end discussion, I beg leave to withdraw my amendment.
Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. WALKER:
Under the circumstances, I would ask leave to withdraw my amendment, too.

The CHAIRMAN:
The hon. member's amendment is not before the Committee.
Mr. HIGGINS:
Do I understand that the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Howe, can be put later on?

The CHAIRMAN:
I understand that the hon. member, Mr. Howe, has withdrawn his amendment for the present to enable the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, to move his amendment.
Amendment (by The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON) proposed:
That the word "the," at the beginning of Mr. Carruthers' amendment, be omitted with a view to inserting the following words: "a referendum of the people of the commonwealth in the case of national questions, and to a referendum of the people of the commonwealth and a referendum of the people of the states where state interests are involved."

Mr. SYMON:
This will be a test vote this time!

Hon. MEMBERS:
Hear, hear!
Question-That the word "the" proposed to be left out (Mr. Carruthers' amendment) stand part of the amendment-put. The Committee divided:

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Amendment (by Hon. J.H. Howe) again proposed:
That the word "three-fifths" be omitted from the amendment of Mr. Carruthers, with a view to inserting the word "two-thirds" in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN:
The question is:
That the word proposed to be left out stand part of the question.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
Of course, if that amendment is carried, I absolutely withdraw from this proposal altogether.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:
I desire to ask for the guidance of myself and other hon. members, what will be the effect if we create a blank, seeing that there are two or three proposals—one to insert the word "three-fourths," another to insert "two-thirds," and another to insert a bare majority? Which proposal will be put from the Chair first?

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment which has been first proposed.

The Hon. J.H. Howe (South Australia)[2.31]:
As far as I am individually concerned, I have every faith in the double dissolution. I believe we have been creating a monster in our imaginations that no man who will ever live on the Australian continent will see. It is no wonder, therefore, that we cannot devise any human means to get out of the difficulty. We are trying to find a remedy for a disease that will never exist. That is quite sufficient to account for our failure to bring forward some means which will end this difficulty. However, I should be very sorry to see federation wrecked on that account. That is why I voted with the able and learned Attorney-General of Victoria. I voted with him for the dual referendum in Adelaide, and also at this meeting, but I could see that we were in such a minority that it was useless fighting any longer. Consequently, I am here to compromise matters. What ever my action may be to-day, it is simply to try to secure a compromise where by some method will be placed within the four corners of the constitution of Australia to meet this difficulty which we have been frightening ourselves so much about. I am now placed in a quandary, because the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales, now taking a higher step, intimates that if I carry this amendment, which I consider is a very fair one, and which will work out equitably, he will withdraw from his position, so that the whole fabric we have been trying to erect falls to the ground. I do not like to be threatened or coerced by any man living; but still I put my own feelings on one side in order to bring about true federation. Consequently I withdraw my amendment.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
I do not want the hon. member to withdraw his amendment. I will vote against it!

Mr. Higgins:
I understand that the hon. member has withdrawn his amendment!

The Chairman:
The hon. member cannot withdraw it except with the leave of the Committee.

Mr. Higgins:
I understand that the hon. member proposes to withdraw it with the leave of the Committee!

The Chairman:
Is it the pleasure of the Committee that the Hon. Mr. Howe have leave to withdraw his amendment?

The Hon. Sir P.O. Fysch:
No!

Mr. Higgins:
Then, Sir, I have a prior amendment to move. I wish before the word "three-fifths" is inserted to insert the words "a majority."

The Chairman:
It is too late now. The hon. member can fill up the blank if one is created.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
May I ask, sir, if this is the position: the hon. member, Mr. Howe, has moved an amendment to strike out a certain word, and if that is permitted to be withdrawn, the word will have to remain?

The Chairman:
That has not been permitted.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
The motion is that the word shall be struck out, and those who are for a greater proportion than three-fifths, and also those who are in favour of a less proportion will vote, for their own respective reasons, for creating a blank, some for the purpose of putting in more than three-fifths, and some for the purpose of putting in less.

The CHAIRMAN:
If a blank is created, I will put first of all the question to fill the blank with the word "two-thirds," because that is the first proposal, and then, if that is negatived, I will put the question to insert the words "a majority."

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[2.37]:
I have not spoken on this question before. I did speak on the proposal to which this is an amendment; but I feel the greatest difficulty in coming to a conclusion how to vote at the present stage.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I look upon this as being a mere intermediate condition, having no finality at all, in which we may create a terrible misleading, possibly, of public opinion, for it might be thought we had come to conclusi

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
What does my hon. and learned friend think has been carried?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
We have carried two things.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
That is right!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
We have carried the amendment of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, and the alternative of the double dissolution.
Some Hon. MEMBERS: No!
Other Hon. MEMBERS: Yes!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I think in substance we have. We have had a vote on that identical question, and it has been carried. I do not say I agree to that. My views are pretty strong on this question altogether. I do not think merely as my hon. friend, Mr. Howe, put it, that we are anticipating terror's which will never happen. I will go much further. I will say we are creating the very mischiefs which we are making machinery to prevent, and which would never arise, if, in our studiousness to prevent evil we did not suggest, and by our suggestion compel, its existence. But at the present stage the thing would be carried. I have, said before in this discussion that, rather than see federation fail, I would take the double dissolution and the dual referendum, and I will be found to be true to that view throughout when the time for my decision comes rather than that the cause should fail. But observe the difficulties in which we are placed. On one side we have New South Wales saying, if you do not let us have just what we want, good-bye to federation. We have Victoria telling us with even more eloquence, and certainly with greater fervour—

Mr. SYMON:
And with greater frequency!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
But not with greater frequency than appears to be necessary!
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I do not like to enter into that, because I think there is too great a desire to reiterate their views on the part of a good many hon. members.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Not the lay members!
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
No; but listening to one and another, and anxious for federation, I find if I get it here I lose it there, and if I get it there it is hopeless here. Then we known this is not the final stage.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
If it were the last stage, I should be prepared to come to a conclusion and state boldly what it is; but we know that whatever we do is to be subject to a long ordeal of public criticism, in which there will be an endless number of other suggestions made, and the fat will be in the fire again. All the old business, with the repetitions of the same idea we will have over again, possibly with the addition of fresh suggestions. Under these circumstances, I have, though with great doubt, resolved to vote against any further amendment. I think when we meet next time we shall be able, we must come to some conclusion.

Mr. SOLOMON:
No. We shall have an adjournment for the sake of some other elections!
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I think it will be safest at the present stage to stop where we have gone, to go no further. Of course, I have the least difficulty in doing this, because I disagree with it all. My opinion is so strong that this provision for deadlocks is unnecessary, that I am considerably assisted in the stand I am taking from that conviction; but yet I would not keep to that position, I assure my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Reid, if I thought that the cause of federation was trembling in the balance. But it is not trembling now. We have not reached that stage, so I think as at present advised, I will stand by the amendments which have been carried, and object to any further proposal.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[2.43]:

I think the Committee might as well be alive to the difficulties which surround this question. It is proposed that the majority shall be "three-fifths", and there is a counter-proposition to that, that it shall be "two-thirds." Its withdrawal has been objected to, and now we will have to vote on it unless the objection is withdrawn. The difficulty I wish to point out is this: that if the gentlemen who are in favour of two-thirds vote with certain of my hon. friends who want to destroy this amendment altogether, a blank will be created, and then they will find themselves in a peculiarly difficult position, because they will have to choose between the position that the blank be filled by the word "two-thirds," in which case a large number of supporters of this proposal as it stands will vote against them; and, if the two-thirds proposition is lost, they will have to choose between allowing this matter to be decided by an absolute majority and leaving a complete blank. Either, then, there will be a complete blank or the thing will be decided by an absolute majority, I, therefore, ask hon. members not to take any such course as will lead them into that predicament.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[2.45]:

I would appeal to my hon. friend, Sir Philip Fysh, to allow the hon. member, Mr. Howe, to withdraw his amendment. It seems to me rather hard on that hon. member that he should not be allowed to withdraw it, and if it is withdrawn, my hon. friend, Sir Philip Fysh, may propose something in its place. I, of course, would very much prefer two-thirds to three-fifths. I think it would make the senate stronger. I do not wish to go to a division upon a proposal which the hon. member himself wishes to withdraw. I regret that the Premier of Victoria should take such a strong stand in regard to the matter, and we all know that the decisions to be arrived at here are not absolutely final. I do not agree with the hon. member, Sir John Downer, that, because we are going to meet again, we should not exercise our judgment as regards anything which is brought before us now, for I think that if we exercise our judgement now to the best of our ability, leaving it open to us to alter our opinion before we meet again if we find any good cause to do so, we shall be really assisting federation. Probably when we meet again the matter will be new, and the differences and discussions will be greater than if we exercise our best judgment at the present time. Personally, I prefer the two-thirds, but at the same time, I am quite willing that three-fifths should stand for the present, in order that we may consider the matter between now and when we meet again. I recognise that hon. members here are surrounded by great political pressure. Of course that is absent altogether in my case. Being far removed from the colony which I represent, I am more free to speak on these matters than, perhaps, I should be if I were surrounded by great political pressure, as are the representatives of New South Wales. I thoroughly understand that, and therefore I do not wish to do anything, and I hope I shall not do anything, which will make the pressure greater than it is. I think the best thing to do is to allow the hon. member to withdraw the amendment. There is not such a terrible difference between three-fifths and two-thirds.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

One-fifteenth!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

It is less than seven in a hundred. At any rate we shall be subscribing a principle which can be altered when we meet again. I think we had better allow the three-fifths to stand, and we can discuss the matter in Melbourne or some other place later on.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH (Tasmania):

It appears to me that we have come, so far as this session is concerned, at any rate, to the last resort, and that is the adoption of something like the Norwegian system. Presuming, therefore, that what we are doing to-day will be some guide as to what may be done hereafter, I wish to register my opinion that 74 out of 112 is not too large a majority to maintain. Two-thirds will be 74, and three-fifths will be only 66. But in deference to the generally-expressed desire to avoid any thing like delay, I shall withdraw my objection to the hon. member, Mr. Howe, having leave to withdraw his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN:

I understand that the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, also objects to the withdrawal.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria):

As I mentioned before, I consider that proposal a great blot on the bill, and I am desirous of reducing that blot as much as I possibly can. With that object in view, if this proposal is carried, I am going to propose that there shall be a simple majority—not a majority of two-thirds, three-fourths, or four-fifths. Therefore, I certainly shall support the creating of a blank, with the object of filling up the blank with the words "a majority."
Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[2.50]:
If the standing orders of South Australia will allow me—when the hon. member, Mr. Howe, withdraws his proposal—to move the same proposal again, I will certainly not stand in the way of his wish. But if the standing orders prohibit me from doing it, I must object to the withdrawal. With regard to the question of three-fifths, I desire to say that it will give us no finality. If we have two-thirds, three-fourths, or three-fifths, we make no provision for a case where there is a majority, and where we have not two-thirds or three-fifths. What we want mainly is finality; and, as we are all making sacrifices to obtain it, it might as well to insert the words "a majority." Therefore, if the hon. member, Mr. Howe, has leave to withdraw his amendment, I shall move the omission of the word "two-thirds " with the view to the insertion of "a majority."

The CHAIRMAN:
According to the standing orders of South Australia, if a proposition has been put from the Chair any single member can object to its withdrawal and insist on taking the sense of the House or the Committee as the case might be upon it. If hon. members object to the withdrawal of the proposition of the hon. member, Mr. Howe, it will have to be put. It does not matter whether it is put by the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, or Mr Howe. The hon. member, Mr. Howe, can vote against his own proposition if he likes.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
No, I will not do that!

The CHAIRMAN:
I will put it again: That the hon. member, Mr. Howe, have leave to withdraw his amendment."

Mr. HIGGINS:
I object!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[2.53]:
There is no doubt that, in connection with this vote, there will be a combination of hon. members with extremely different views, and as a result of that combination it is likely, unless we keep our heads cool, that the whole of the proposals will be defeated. The anxiety of the Premier of Victoria is to destroy the proposal in its entirety. He says so in so many words.

[P.972] starts here

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I said I should vote against it at every stage!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

On the other hand, the hon. member Mr. Howe, and those who are working with him, may give their assistance to accomplish a purpose which is far from their aim. They desire to have certain words altered; they desire to have a definite proposal in a modified form. Supposing they unite their forces with those who are manifest and declared destroyers and wreckers of this proposal. They create a blank. Having created a blank they ask for the insertion of the words "a majority." Of course, if there is a combination of forces then to prevent that being carried it will be defeated. Then the proposal is made for the insertion of the word "two-thirds." There is again a division of forces, and t

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Like some of the unholy alliances we had last night!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

Every alliance which aims at not having a straight vote on a straight issue is, to my mind, an unholy one. The Premier of Victoria expressed a desire to destroy the proposal by any means whatever, and he has taken this means of doing it. Let that be understood. It is of no use quibbling about words now. There are those who are in favour of the proposal against the would-be wreckers. With that made clear, we might all vote now in favour of the proposal for the retention of three-fifths.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria)[2.55]:

I rise for the purpose of asking the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat to qualify his remarks, because, although I shall be found voting for the omission of the word "three-fifths," for the purpose of inserting the words "a simple majority," it will be by no means with the object of wrecking the hon. gentleman's proposal. In this I differ from the right hon. gentleman, the Premier of Victoria. I, for one, am endeavouring to follow the consistent course of voting for every scheme that is being proposed for the settlement of deadlocks.

An Hon. MEMBER:

As some others have voted against every scheme!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Exactly; I vote for every scheme. In the different schemes one has preferences. As between the two referendums I prefer the national to the dual referendum, but I vote for both; and in this scheme I prefer a simple majority to a majority of two-thirds, or any larger number. But I look upon the real effective portion of this proposal as not resting on either the referendum or on the joint sitting. If we obtain a simultaneous dissolution, we shall be putting pressure on both chambers to agree without the application of any machinery. We shall prevent the application of that scheme itself, and shall, as I endeavoured to explain at some length yesterday, induce both chambers to settle most of their difficulties in the ordinary constitutional manner. When the test issue is put as to the acceptance or rejection of Mr. Carruthers' proposal, I shall be found voting for it. It is a proposal which has many merits, and, if it were necessary, I should be prepared to defend it. It has less merit than some of the proposals that have been submitted, but more than most. I am entirely in its favour, and assure the hon. member that, in voting as I do, it is with the object of assisting him. I hope to take another opportunity of having a word or two to say to my hon. friend, Dr. Cockburn, whose unhappy misinterpretations of American history are a constant source of provocation, peaceful as I am by disposition. The hon. member will persist in trailing the fragments of his recollection of American history to tempt me-

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

The hon. member threw paving-stones at me!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I wish to point out to the hon. member-I do not know how many times I leave already done so in these various conventions-that the existence of responsible government in this federal constitution, and in these colonies, alters the political position wholly from the position in the United States of America. Party government, as it exists in America, does not and will not exist here. Party government as it exists in Great Britain and in these colonies, will exist here. It will be on the lines of liberal and conservative parties; it cannot be on the lines of republicans and democrats. An executive responsible to the people-responsible to the parliament and to the popular chamber-will necessarily express and be governed by those currents of popular feeling which in America are almost powerless to affect the course of events. There the people only speak every four years; they only speak as a whole at the election of a president, and then they speak only through the party machine. In these colonies they will speak freely and often on the well known lines of division between liberal and conservative.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

Just as we see here, for example!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Unless the hon. member changes his course, I shudder to think which side be will be found on, when we do divide into liberals and conservatives.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[3]:

The position is a somewhat difficult one. There is a considerable section of the Convention opposed to any solution of deadlocks, and by combining with those who are opposed to various particular solutions they can ensure one after the other the defeat of all, and prevent effect being given to what is undoubtedly the wish of the majority of the Convention that some solution should be arrived at. Now, I am not going to be a party to anything of that sort. I think for our own credit, for the sake of federation, we ought to put the thing before the people in as complete a shape as we possibly can; and under these circumstances I shall be no party to any attempt to mutilate a proposal—which emanates from any section of the Convention. I have tried to carry my own views in the matter. I have been beaten, and I have been fairly beaten, and I treat the verdict of this Convention with respect. I hope at some other time to induce the Convention to reverse its decision; but in the interval I am going to do what I can to put before the people of the country and the adjourned Convention some practical scheme for meeting this question of deadlocks. Under these circumstances, I shall not be found opposing at this stage the amendment of my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, and I shall not do anything for the purpose of putting it into an impracticable shape. I shall endeavour honestly to improve it, and I think it will be a substantial improvement to provide that at a joint sitting a majority of those present should decide the question. I will vote in that direction for that simple purpose, and without any desire whatever to injure the amendment. If it is carried in that shape, I shall support it. In any case I shall support its going into the bill for the considera-

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

What about the majority-take the other side?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

If on the other side you provide that a majority should decide, then not only do you give the house of representatives an opportunity, if they can command a majority at that joint sitting, of carrying their way, but you make a similar result possible as regards the senate. And why should you not? Put it in the way proposed, decide the question by a simple majority, and the result may be that by a majority of the senate and a minority of the house of representatives the view of the senate may be carried. Put it in any other way, and you are simply putting into the hands of the house of representatives a weapon for overruling the wishes of the senate. That I do not wish to do. Therefore, I shall be found voting in the way I have indicated. I think I have fairly enough defined my position, and have, at least, said quite sufficient to assure the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, and those who have listened to me, that I cannot, under any circumstances whatever, be classed as a wrecker, or one who desires to do anything but what is fair and square in connection with this bill.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[3.8]:
I do not intend to detain the Committee by speaking upon the amendment I intend now to move. All that I desire is that a vote may be taken upon the proposal. I move:
That the following words be added:--"Provided that if the proposed law be rejected it shall be lawful for a majority of those present and voting to pass a resolution paying the governor-general to refer the proposed law to a general vote of the electors of the commonwealth.

Mr. SYMON:

I rise to order. I do not think we have yet reached a stage at which the amendment the hon. member is submitting can be moved. The hon. member is indicating the course he has in view in the event of the conference not coming to a conclusion in regard to the proposed law. But it has not yet been decided whether this proviso is or is not to be inserted. Would it not be very much better that my hon. friend should deal with the proviso which embodies this amendment of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, and his own?

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

I see reason in the hon. member's argument, and I will not persist with this amendment until the Committee has decided whether the proviso shall or shall not stand.

The CHAIRMAN:

The question before the Committee is, that the amendment proposed by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, as amended by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, and as added to by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, be inserted in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives alone in the first instance, both houses of parliament may be dissolved simultaneously, provided that the senate shall not be dissolved within a period of six months immediately preceding the date of expiry by effluxion of time of the duration of the house of representatives, and if after such dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendment, the proposed law may be referred to the members of the two houses deliberating and voting together thereon, and shall be adopted or rejected according to the decision of three-fifths of the members present and voting on the question.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[3.17]:

I voted for the amendment proposed by the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, as amended by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, and I still should like to do so; but with this further addition to it, providing for the joint meeting of the two houses, I can no longer do so; and, therefore, very reluctantly, I shall have to vote against the whole thing. I should like to say that the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, much as he protests against unholy alliances, without his knowledge, had the benefit of an unholy alliance, and the last vote has been the means of defeating the proposition of the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, and I hope also his own.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[3.18]:

We certainly are in a difficulty over this matter, and I am in the position of having to choose between two evils. One evil is the proposal of my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon, that we should have a dissolution of the house of representatives followed by a dissolution of the senate. The other evil is the joint meeting of the two houses after a joint dissolution. So between the two there comes a joint dissolution. If I vote to prevent the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, from being added, the result will that I shall assist the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, in another evil.

The Hon. A.J. PEACOCK:

That is what it has been done for!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Therefore, the right hon. gentleman will have to go straight!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

He has always done so! The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER: There is a clever loophole in connection with this, because the meeting of the two houses is not made compulsory. As the proposal stands, it is only that the proposed law may be referred, and that will rest, I have no doubt, with the government of the day. There is no one else who could take the necessary steps to refer it. The amendment does not say so in express terms, but the proposal, as I followed it when the Chairman read it, is simply that, after a double dissolution, the question may be referred to a meeting of the two houses; therefore, the government of the day would take very good care that they did not refer it unless they were certain beforehand that they had got the numbers. Although I look upon this as a great blot on the bill, I think that the fact that the referring the question will be in the option of the government, takes to a very great extent the sting out of the proposal; and seeing that I have to choose the less of two evils, I am prepared, without binding myself as to what I will do hereafter, either at the adjourned Convention, or when before the people explaining the bill, I am prepared to accept for the time-being what I consider the less of the two evils, and rather than help my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon-

Mr. SYMON:

I am sorry to hear that!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Rather than help my hon. and learned friend, Mr. SYMON, to get back into a position we have been fighting against four or five days, I intend, with very great reluctance indeed, and somewhat against my own feelings in the matter—and believing that I am doing an injury to federation, but not as great an injury as I would do if I supported my hon. and learned friend, and seeing that this proposal is only tentative, on this occasion I propose to vote with my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[3.19]:
I am indebted to my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, for putting the position so plainly. What we are doing now—and I hope that hon. members will clearly understand it—is this: If we carry this proviso we are affirming the principle of an alternative simultaneous dissolution of both houses, and, therefore, as I am entirely against that course in the event of a dispute between the two houses, I intend to vote against this proviso.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[3.20]:
I should like to ask my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon, whether in voting against this proposal we vote, as I suppose we shall against the whole of the clause—the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, and everything else.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Of course you do!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
All that we have been fighting for the last hour or two goes by the board. While I am very anxious to vote against the proviso, and also against the amendment proposed by the bell. and learned member, Mr. Wise, I should have been very glad to be able to vote with the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, provided that there should be a successive dissolution beforehand, or even a dissolution of one house: but it seems to me that we have got into a difficulty, therefore, I am bound to follow the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, and vote against the whole of the clause we have been trying to pass. I warned my hon. friend that if his amendment were to be tacked on to the proposal of the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, this would be the result. I was assured that it would not—that means would be found of separating that amendment from the proviso proposed by the right hon. member, Sir George Turner; but it seems to me that it is not possible to do that, and I am, therefore, very reluctantly compelled to vote against the whole of the clause.
An Hon. MEMBER:
The proviso?
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
   No; the Chairman is going to put the whole clause, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN:
   I would point out to the right hon. gentleman that the question is to insert the words I have just read in lieu of the word "if" in the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Lyne.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
   That is all the words including the proviso of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers. I should like my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon, to address himself to this point.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[3.23]:
   In answer to my right hon. friend, the position seems to me to be perfectly clear. We have now got the proviso before us completed by the two amendments which have been moved, It was moved originally as a proviso by the right hon. member, Sir George Turner; on that the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, moved an amendment, and on that the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, has moved and carried an amendment. Now the whole proviso, as Sir Richard Baker has intimated, is to be put, and that proviso embodies the principle of an alternative simultaneous dissolution of the two houses. Those in favour of that will, of course, support the proviso. For my part, I shall oppose it; but the position will be that, if the proviso is rejected, the whole of it, with the two amendments, will-unfortunately as to one of them-fall through.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[3.24]:
   I have been watching a nice little scheme being worked out, and now we see the end of it. but I do not intend to be entrapped. Ever since we passed an amendment yesterday in the direction of a simultaneous dissolution, there has been an effort so to overload that with anything and everything as to make it break down of its own weight; and, if we do not take care, hon. members who desire that will probably succeed now. This is a complicated question, and I ask you, sir, is it not possible under the standing orders for you to divide a complicated question and to put the different issues separately?

The CHAIRMAN:
   Hon. members must recollect that the Committee has affirmed every one of these propositions, having affirmed them in the form of additions to the amendment If hon. members had moved them in different forms, and had allowed one proposal to be carried adding something to the clause before they moved another, it would have been simpler; but it is not for the Chairman to dictate how amendments shall be moved.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.26]:

It seems to me to be eminently desirable that we should have an opportunity of dealing with these proposals seriatim in the fresh light of the recent vote. I think it is only fair that the Committee should have an opportunity to say whether it will have the consecutive dissolution with the alternative of the double dissolution, and the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, in addition, or whether it will have only one of these dissolutions, adding the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, to it. Unfortunately, the standing orders are in the way of this being done; but there is a way out of the difficulty, slid that is by moving the Chairman out of the chair to obtain the suspension of the standing orders. I think that rather than have a continuance of this complication, a body like this should suspend the standing orders in order to get matters straight.

An. Hon. MEMBER: I shall object

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Before my hon. friend does that, I would point out that we may lose the great step which we have already made—the double dissolution.

The CHAIRMAN:

May I make a suggestion. We are only now seeking to insert words in lieu of the word. "if" in Mr. Lyne's amendment. If these words are inserted it will be competent for the leader of the Convention to take advantage of, the suspension of the standing orders to rescind the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Symon.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Quite so. We will, deal with; this matter as we ought to deal with it. If we find that the proposal consists of three branches, of which we desire only two, leaving out either the consecutive or the double dissolution, I shall move, the Chairman out of the chair in order to put things straight.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I s

Question—That the words, proposed to be inserted in, place of the word "if" in Mr, Lyne's amendment be so inserted-resolved in the affirmative.

The CHAIRMAN:

We now have to deal with, the remainder of the amendment proposed by the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, which is inconsistent with the previous decision of the Committee, and, therefore, I propose to strike it out as consequential. The question is, that the amendment which now takes the place of Mr. Lyne's amendment, be, inserted, after the word "senate" (line, 180 page 932).

The Hon. E. BARTON:

There are the remaining words of the original amendment suggested, by the Assembly, of New South Wales to be dealt with.!

The CHAIRMAN:

We will come to that by-and-by.

Mr. SYMON:

What are the words proposed to be inserted?

The CHAIRMAN:

It is proposed to insert the following words after the word, "senate" (Mr. Symon's amendment, line 18, page 932):

Provided that in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives alone in the first instance both houses of parliament may be dissolved, simultaneously: Provided that the senate shall not be dissolved within a period of six months immediately preceding the date of the expiry by effluxion of time of the duration of the house of representatives. And if after such dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendment the proposed law may be referred to the members of the two houses deliberating and voting together thereon, and shall be adopted or rejected according to As decision of three-fifths of the members present and voting on the question.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

I understand that the proposal now is the insertion of the complicated amendments proposed by the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, the hon. and learned member Mr. Wise, and the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers. What does the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, now propose to do? I want to give a vote in accordance with my views, and I think that the Convention ought to be able to devise means for carrying out the wishes of its members.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

What I propose is, that, after this matter is dealt with, an opportunity shall be given to hon. members to take such a course as will relieve them of one of the two proposals which precede this—that is to say, to enable them to rescind either the, amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Symon or the amendment of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, so that the taking of a joint vote of the two houses, in the event of a deadlock, will be something which follows upon either a concurrent dissolution or a joint dissolution, as hon. members choose, but so that there shall not be the alternative of both.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Why not?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I intend, to give hon. members an opportunity to vote as they wish to vote, and, without expressing any opinion of my own, I will take such a course as will enable them to do so!

Mr. SYMON:

That is not the point of the hon. and learned member, Dr. Cockburn. His point is this: It is not a question of attaching the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, to a consecutive dissolution, or to a simultaneous dissolution, it is a question of attaching his amendment to anything at all. The objection of the hon. and learned member is not to a consecutive or to a simultaneous dissolution, but to the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers.

An Hon. MEMBER:

That is carried!

Mr. SYMON:

Yes. It would be a useless waste of time to open the whole thing again in that fashion. We might be here for another month. I have not called for a division, and— it is not proposed to call for a division on the question of the proviso. I have stated my objection to it; but, although it is alternative, still, in the view of the majority of hon. members, it is not an undesirable thing that we should have it put, as the Right Hon. Sir George Turner has proposed as an alternative. Seeing that this is all a tentative arrangement, and will be reconsidered and recast hereafter, I am not going to call for a division, although I shall assert my view when the voices are given upon, the insertion of these words.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The Committee has already obtained leave to rescind any amendment that has been carried.

The CHAIRMAN:

No; only one amendment.
The Hon. E. Barton:

That, I think, is the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Symon. Consequently the Committee, without suspending the standing orders, can rescind any portion of that amendment. We cannot do any more than that without suspending the standing orders.

Mr. Symon:

That does not meet the hon. member Dr. Cockburn's difficulty. The Hon. E. Barton: The hon. member Dr. Cockburn's difficulty is that while he may be in favour of one or the other he is not in favour of this.

The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:

I am not in favour of the three things.

The Hon. E. Barton:

I think he voted against the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers.

An Hon. Member:

Yes.

The Hon. E. Barton:

Well, the instructions to the Committee that leave be given to reconsider and rescind do not apply to the hon. member Mr. Carruthers' proposal, but they do to the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Symon. Therefore, unless we move the Chairman out of chair, and get further instructions, we can only rescind the hon. member Mr. Symon's amendment.

The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:

I think we had better do that; it is too serious a matter for any vote to be recorded which is not in accordance with the views of hon. members. I think that somehow or other we, should devise; means to give effect to our wishes. However, I do not wish to stand out in this matter. I only wish to say that I thoroughly disapprove of the addition proposed by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers.

The Chairman:

I think the hon. member ought not to argue that question now.

The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:

I only want to say that I supported the hon. member Mr. Symon, in his proposal for a successive dissolution. I also supported the hon. member Mr. Wise's proposal that there should be an alternative of a simultaneous dissolution, so long as it is not exercised so as to always penalise the senate and never penalise the house of representatives. I want to vote for these two things; but I am put in such a position that I have no opportunity of doing so. I should like to have such an opportunity. But, as it is understood that all our work now is simply preparatory and tentative, although I object to anything I do not approve of getting a prescriptive right of existence, still I suppose there is now no alternative.

Question—That the words proposed to be inserted in paragraph A, after the word "senate," be so inserted—put. The Committee divided:

Ayes, 23; noes, 13; majority, 10.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[3.44]:
I beg to move the addition of the following proviso, and I only desire to have a division of the Committee upon it:

Provided that if the proposed law be rejected it shall be lawful for the majority of those present and voting to pass a resolution praying the governor-general to refer the proposed law to a general vote of the electors of the commonwealth, and upon such resolution being presented to the governor-general he may direct that such general vote of the electors be taken.

If that be carried I shall subsequently move that the minority shall also have the right to claim a general referendum to veto the proposed law.

Mr. SOLOMON:
What generosity!

Question so resolved in the negative.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I move:
That the remaining words of the proposed new clause 57A be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.49]:

Now the question arises as to the procedure of the Committee in dealing with the proposals which are antecedent to the one just adopted. I understand that it is the wish of a number of hon. members to have an opportunity to reconsider those portions in the light of the decision they have come to with reference to a joint vote of the houses.

Hon. MEMBERS:
Let it go!

An Hon. MEMBER:
We will consider it in Melbourne!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Let it be understood that I am only endeavouring to arrive at the general sense of this body. I am perfectly willing to let things stand as they are, at any rate, until our next meeting, which I hope will be in January. As the mouthpiece of hon. members, I should feel myself bound, if I saw that there was a general desire to reconsider these matters at the present stage, to take the necessary steps to bring that into order.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Unless you have another scheme!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
As I do not find that the desire expressed is a general one, I am only too happy to be relieved of that duty.

New clause, as amended, agreed to.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.53]:
I would like to point out to hon. members that time is becoming very precious just now, and that our right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, may have to go away to-night. With regard to a question like the judicature, on which we are pretty well agreed except as to a difference of opinion as to the degree of restriction on the right of appeal, I scarcely think that in the limited time now left we need take much trouble. I would like to ascertain the opinion of hon. members whether it would not be a more desirable thing to take some discussion on the very important question of finance and trade. We know that this matter was considered so important by the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, and others, that, although we appointed a select committee to deal with finance, it nevertheless was thought desirable that we should have a discussion on it, and that discussion took two or three days, and the object of it was not only to evolve the views of hon. members but to let that evolution sink into the minds and hearts of the members of the Finance Committee, who were then, of course, expected diligently to turn over all that had been said to them, and embody all these proposals in some clause. Unfortunately, the arduous nature of the duties of the Convention in which the members of the Finance Committee have participated has prevented them from holding as many meetings as would have been desirable; and inasmuch as these gentlemen have not found it possible to hold so many meetings as would enable them to put propositions before us

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
I am told that they held two meetings!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

We now come back, to a certain extent, to our own resources. I feel very much inclined to move that the whole of Chapter III which relates to the judicature be postponed in order that we may reach the chapter on finance and trade, because I take it that the Convention itself, in debating this matter for three days in the beginning, and the intense desire expressed by hon. members that this, as one of the most important matters before us, should be dealt with as speedily as possible, ought to find now its consequence in some such step as I have suggested. As a member of the Drafting Committee I have brought before my colleagues the necessity of endeavouring to formulate, in some way, the opinions which were expressed with a great deal of warmth and emphasis during the debate on finance. Hon. members will find in their hands a series of proposals as to which I wish only to say this: that they are not to be taken -they are only marked "suggested amendments "-as the evidence of any desire an the part of the Drafting Committee to set themselves up as authorities on finance. I am afraid if I were to do that in my own person, I should speedily cover myself, with ridicule; but these matters which hon. members will find in print are simply an endeavour of the Drafting Committee to put into the form of legal phraseology what seems to be the subject of of very common expression of opinion amongst hon. members; and we thought we might just as well put them into print, in order that hon. members might see what they looked like as clauses, of the bill. That has been the sole object of the Drafting Committee, and I hope they will be absolved completely from any desire toilet themselves up as financial authorities. Having said that, I suggest that the consideration of Chapter III be postponed.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales) [3.56]:

I think it is very well known to the Convention that the Finance Committee was appointed to take these matters into consideration. We met to consider what was best to be done, and we found it impossible to take up this very difficult matter in any systematic fashion whilst these sittings have been held. It was impossible for us to be in the Finance Committee and in this Chamber at the same time. We gave up the attempt, and we came to the conclusion that the following plan of operations would probably lead to the best result:-that the two members representing each colony should give the matter, at the adjournment of the Convention, their best consideration jointly; that each set of two should exchange views with the other members of the committee; and that we should then meet in Melbourne, or at some convenient spot, before the Convention reassembled, and hit upon a scheme, in the light of all our suggestions, which would be in the hands of hon. members some time before the Convention actually reassembled. That is our desire. I would ask, however, whether my right hon. friend is going to Melbourne to-night? Is there any indefiniteness about it?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
None!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Then I would suggest to the hon. member, Mr. Barton, whether it would not add to a sense of incompleteness if we, with an hour to spare, began this subject. No, possible good could be derived from it. One speech only could be heard. We should, indeed, leave a sense of incompleteness if we attempted to deal with a subject of this kind within an hour of the adjournment of the Convention. I would suggest that it would be much better to leave the matter in the hands of the committee. Of course we should all be very glad if we could get on to some extent with the matter, but until the committee report on the clauses in the bill it is perfectly clear that a general discussion will be more or less idle. We have had a general discussion, and the committee have had the benefit of it, and no doubt it will work on the lines suggested by that discussion, but any further general discussion within an hour of separation would, I submit, be futile. I suggest that we should not attempt to begin again until we have some opportunity of beginning and finishing.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales) (3.59):
I quite appreciate the suggestion which has been made; but I do not want to rush the Committee into the consideration of anything which it will not have time to finish. I must express a little difference of opinion from that expressed by the Premier of New South Wales as to our being within an hour of the adjournment of the sittings of the Convention, because I see no reason why the Convention should not go on with its work. The Premier of Victoria is leaving; but I am quite sure he has confidence in his colleagues whom he leaves behind, and that it would he an almost unheard-of thing if we were to say that, because one of our most respected delegates, and one of those whose opinions we most esteem, goes away, we should on that account suspend work. I am sure all the admiration I feel for the Premier of Victoria would not justify me in taking that course, and I do not think he would expect it. I am going to ask the Convention to sit until to-morrow evening to deal with so many matters in the bill as are now left unsettled. When I made a suggestion just now with regard to the question of finance, I did not mean for an instant that I was even going to propose those clauses which have been committed to print. They are not my clauses; they are only a matter of drafting; but I am quite willing to accede to the suggestion, if it is the wish of the Convention, to go on with business other than finance. I hope hon. members will support me in sitting to-morrow.

[P.983] starts here

An Hon. MEMBER:
And to-night?
The Hon. E. BARTON:
And to-night. I will ask hon. members to get as far as they possibly can to solve the financial question in the time at our disposal. I think an attempt to complete it, as has been rightly put by the Premier of New South Wales, would not be creditable to the Convention. I think, however, there is ground, which we have already travelled over, which we can deal with between now and to-morrow evening, and I suggest to hon. members that they follow me in taking that course. Then we could adjourn from to-morrow evening until Friday afternoon. In the meantime, the Drafting Committee, with the help of any legal members who would kindly assist them, would take in hand the numerous amendments which have been made during the present sittings of the Convention, so as to put them in their proper order, and in legal phraseology in the bill. Then I would ask hon. members to meet on Friday afternoon for an hour—it would only be a matter of an hour-to deal with mere formalities, after which the Convention would be adjourned to such place as it will sit in, I hope, in January.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
What about the alternative clauses?
The Hon. E. BARTON:
We shall simply put them in the best drafting phraseology we can, and treat them as the decision of the Convention so far. I hope hon. members will follow we in the suggestion I have made. Under these circumstances, I do not propose to go on with the discussion on finance. The clauses which have been referred to have been circulated and that, I think, is enough for present purposes.
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
When shall we decide when we shall meet again?
The Hon. E. BARTON:
I do not see why we should not decide that to-morrow afternoon.
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
Or before the Premier of Victoria goes away!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
Hon. members will see that that is not a question we can decide in Committee. I see no objection, however, to the House resuming now and discussing that question, and then we can adjourn until the evening sitting.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[4.4]:

I would suggest that there is a considerable portion of Part II, relating to the senate, which we might complete. It is awkward to have these disjointed portions of the bill dealt with. We might deal with that and also with the provisions applicable to both houses and the powers of the parliament. I particularly refer to the powers of the parliament, because I understand that some of my colleagues, as we all do, take strong views on one or two points which have been elucidated during the present session, although not finally concluded. It would be well if we could have the assistance of our friends from Victoria, certainly on one of those matters—for example, that relating to the navigability of the river Murray.

The CHAIRMAN:

The Committee have already postponed those clauses until after the consideration of the other clauses. We cannot go back; we must go forward. Do I understand the leader of the Convention to move that Part III be postponed?

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.5]:

That has not been done yet. I propose to report progress in order that the matter of the adjourned meeting be dealt with before the Premier of Victoria leaves. I think the best plan would be to move that the Chairman leave the chair, and ask leave to sit again at a later period of the day. I understand—and my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, will correct me if I am wrong—that it would be a desirable thing, with reference to the exigencies of the various governments, that there should be some quiet conversation between the various Premiers before we decide the question as to where and when we are to sit. I take it that my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, before he goes, would like to exchange views with the other Premiers who are present. If that is so, I would move that the Chairman leave the chair for a quarter of an hour, and then the House, can resume, and we can deal with the question.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[4.6]:

I do not know that there is any necessity for the course the hon. member has suggested. Unless my right hon. friends desire it, I do not desire it. There seems to be a general wish among members that the next meeting of the Convention should be held in Melbourne.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Hear, hear!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
And, although I would not stand in the way of any other colony having the honor, as I did not stand in the way of New South Wales having the honor on this occasion, of course, if it is the general desire, I would not attempt to oppose the wish of the Convention. In regard to meeting in January, I think that would be a very bad time. If we are to meet in Melbourne, I think we should meet in March.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I should have very great difficulty in attending!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Most of us will be busy in our parliaments until the latter end of December; besides, in January we shall have very trying weather.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Not as bad as February!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That would prevent us from getting on with our work as rapidly as we might desire; and, if the meeting were postponed until March, I think it would be found advantageous. However, if that would not be convenient to my hon. and learned friend, I should be prepared to agree that the Convention should meet some time towards the latter end of January.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
It would be far better to fix a time concurrent with most of the parliamentary vacations—say, about the middle of January.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I will not stand in the way of the hon. and learned member's suggestion if it is deemed most convenient!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
After what the Right Hon. Sir George Turner has said, I do not think it is necessary to have any suspension of the sitting to give the various Premiers an opportunity of discussion, and I shall simply move:
That the Chairman leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again at a later hour of the day.

Motion agreed to; progress reported.

NEXT MEETING OF THE CONVENTION.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.9]:
What does my right hon. friend say to meeting on the 18th January? That will be Tuesday. It will enable the delegates from New South Wales and from South Australia to leave on the Monday, if necessary, so that they will save a day.

Mr. WALKER:

We must remember that we expect the colony of Queensland to be represented, and that the Premier of that colony will not be back until the 4th October, and it may take some time to get the necessary bill through parliament.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It will not take four months.

Mr. SYMON:

In South Australia it took four hours!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It is a question between the 18th and the 25th January, and I think the 18th would be the better date.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I do not object if that is the wish of the majority; but, personally, I should prefer some time in March.

Motion (by the Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:

That the standing orders be suspended to enable a motion to be made without notice.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It has been suggested that as there will have to be a short sitting on Friday, the motion had better be made in this form:

That this Convention, at its rising on Friday next, stand adjourned until 12 o'clock, noon, on Tuesday, the 18th January, and that the Convention do then meet in Parliament House, Melbourne.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

The delegates from Western Australia cannot get there conveniently on the Tuesday!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Well, say Thursday, the 20th January. Before the motion is put, I must point out that there must necessarily be a quorum here on Friday, or else the consequences will not be very pleasant. If there happens not to be a quorum, the Convention must stand adjourned from day to day.

An Hon. MEMBER:

If we pass this motion?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The question would even then arise under the standing orders whether the Convention would not have to be adjourned from day to day; so that I impress upon hon. members that if I place Friday in the present motion, it must be on the understanding that we form a quorum on that day. A meeting on Friday will, I assure hon. members, be necessary, because nobody wishes to see the bill left with amendments which have been put in more homely phraseology than is appropriate in a statute. Therefore, the Drafting Committee will require to have a spare day, say, Thursday, to bring matters into ordinary form, and then we shall ask the Convention to pass the bill through Committee in the ordinary way. I propose that the Convention should sit tomorrow, but not on Thursday. I beg to move the motion, in its amended form, as follows:-

That this Convention, at its rising on Friday next, stand adjourned until 12 o'clock, noon, on Thursday, the 20th January, and that the sittings of the Convention be then held in Parliament House, Melbourne.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[4.15]:

I cannot help thinking that the leader of the Convention is proposing that we should meet at rather too early a date. It may be a very convenient date for gentlemen of the legal profession, who will then be in their ordinary long vacation; but, for my own part, it would be most inconvenient for me to return to the work of this Convention at so early a date. I have been away from Western Australia nearly the whole of the year, and Christmas will be the very earliest date at which our local Parliament can be expected to conclude its work. If this resolution is adhered to, we shall have to leave the colony immediately after Parliament has concluded its labours and pass a month or six weeks in Melbourne. I should much prefer to see a date fixed one month later.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

The right hon. gentleman will be in better training in January!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

It is all very well for those who are in Melbourne or in Tasmania; but we have to come a long way. It takes us a week to get here, and while we are here we are altogether away from our work.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

January is holiday time generally, is it not?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I do not think so.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It is more holiday time than is any other month in the year!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

As I have pointed out, as soon as our Parliament is over we shall have to come to Melbourne to this Convention. However, I shall not move any amendment to the proposal; but if the date were fixed a month later it would be more convenient to many of us.
The Hon. J.H. HOWE (South Australia)[4.17]:
I should like to have a word to say with regard to the position of the Western Australian delegates. I should like to be clear as to whether, if we assemble again on the 20th January, that date will be an obstacle to the Western Australian delegates coming to Melbourne.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I do not think that will be so; we shall have to try and be there.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In committee:

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.20]:
I think our best course of procedure, now that we have settled the matter of our next meeting, will be to take the bill in its regular order, and, as a matter of technical procedure, to enable that to be done it will be necessary to postpone the remaining clauses. That will bring us, I think, to clause 5, and from that point we can go straight on with the remaining clauses of the bill. I therefore move:

That the remaining clauses of the bill and the schedule be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

Clause 5. The term "the states" shall be taken to mean such of the colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the province of South Australia, as for the time being form part of the commonwealth, and such colonies or states as may hereafter be admitted into or established by the commonwealth, and each of such parts of the commonwealth shall be hereafter designated a "state."

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales:
Add at the end of clause "Original states shall be taken to mean such states as form part of the dominion at the date of its establishment. New states shall be taken to mean such states as may thereafter be admitted into or constituted by the dominion."

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia)[4.23]:
To avoid the possibility of any question arising with reference to the boundary of the province of South Australia—that is, whether it would include, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, the Northern Territory which is provisionally annexed to it—I move:

That there be inserted after the word "Australia," line 5, the words "including the Northern Territory of South Australia,"

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Is that part now technically South Australian territory?

Mr. SOLOMON:
That is rather a difficult question to answer. Under letters patent under her Majesty's hand the Territory latitude northward during the pleasure of her Majesty. A question in future might arise whether electors in that portion of the province had a right to a voice in the affairs of the commonwealth—that is to say, whether that portion which is provisionally annexed really was a portion of the province. To avoid any such question arising, I move the amendment I have indicated.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment (Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:

That the amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales be amended by omitting the words "New states shall be taken to mean such states as may thereafter be admitted into or constituted by the commonwealth."

Amendment of Legislative Council, New South Wales, as amended, agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Repeal of 48 and 49 Victoria, Chapter 60) agreed to.

CHAPTER I.-THE PARLIAMENT.

Part I. General.

Clause 6 (Governor-General to fix time and places for holding session of parliament. Power of dissolution of house of representatives. First session of parliament).

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.26]:

This clause was postponed pending dealing with clauses about conflicts between the two houses; but nothing has been done by the Committee, I think, to prevent this clause from being passed in its original shape.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10, paragraph 1. The parliament of the commonwealth may make laws prescribing a uniform manner of choosing the senators. Subject to such laws, if any, the parliament of each state may determine the time, place, and manner of choosing the senators for that state.

Amendment suggested by Legislative Council and Assembly of Tasmania:

Omit "The parliament of the commonwealth may make laws prescribing a uniform manner of choosing the senators. Subject to such laws if any"

Amendment suggested by, Legislative Assembly of Victoria:

After "prescribing" insert "the times, places, and"

The CHAIRMAN:
The first amendment suggested in paragraph 1 is by Tasmania -to omit the words "the parliament of the commonwealth may make laws prescribing a uniform manner of choosing the senators. Subject to such laws if any." But, inasmuch as Victoria has suggested the insertion of the words "the times, places, and," after the word "prescribing," I will, in order to enable the amendment suggested by Victoria to be placed before the Committee, put the question to leave out the first line of the paragraph, as a test of the amendment suggested by Tasmania.

Question-That the words proposed to, be left out stand part of the question-resolved in the affirmative.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[4.28]:

Clause 10 as it now stands is practically a transcript of the American provision. The reason why the provision was framed that way in the American Constitution, and I think - the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, will no doubt correct me if I am wrong - the reason why it was also framed in that way by the 1891 Convention, was that as the senators were to be appointed by the state parliaments, the place of choosing them should be as each state parliament might determine, and the time of doing so should be whenever that parliament chose to decide upon.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

A little more than that. We thought, I think, in dealing with the matter before, that it was advisable that the parliament of the state should determine the time and place for elections as it would have a better knowledge of local affairs, whereas the parliament of the commonwealth might make laws as to the system on which the elections should take place.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The manner of choosing the senators was as to whether the two houses should sit together or separately, and so on; and the Congress has made laws in that regard on two separate occasions; but we have now provided that there shall be a dissolution of the senate, and I think, especially in regard to that, it will be right, and will harmonise with what we have done, to say that the parliament of each state may determine the time, place, and manner of choosing the senators; but, above all that, the parliament of the commonwealth may make laws prescribing the time and place and manner of choosing. They have power under this to prescribe a uniform manner, so that if the parliament think fit the manner of choosing, whether by ballot or otherwise, may be determined by the federal parliament.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

If you make the amendment read "the time and place and a uniform manner," I will not raise any objection to it. It will then fit in with the remainder of the clause.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Leave that to the Drafting Committee.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Then, I will accept that.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria agreed to.

Clause 10, paragraph 2. Until such determination, and unless the parliament of the commonwealth otherwise provides, the laws in force in the several states for the time-being, relating to the following matters, namely: The manner of conducting elections for the more numerous house of the parliament of the state, the proceedings at such elections, returning officers, the periods during which elections maybe continued, and offences against the laws regulating such elections shall, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections in the several states of senators.

Amendment suggested by Legislative Council and Assembly of Tasmania:
After "determination" omit "and unless the parliament of the commonwealth otherwise provides."

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.35]:
I do not see the reason for leaving out these words. I think they ought to be left in, for otherwise, for all time, unless there happens to be a referendum upon the proposed amendment of the constitution, the parliament of the commonwealth will not have power to provide in respect of these matters, which it may be very necessary to provide for in case of some emergency.

Amendment negatived.

The CHAIRMAN:
There is a further amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of Western Australia, to transpose the words of senators, "to stand after the word "elections." This is a mere matter of drafting, and I will make the alteration as a consequent amendment.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.36]:
I think it would be advisable to add to the clause the words:
So long as the senators are directly chosen by the people of the state as one electorate.

We inserted in the second paragraph of clause 9 the words "until parliament otherwise determines," and inasmuch as power is given to parliament to alter the system of choosing the senators by the people of the state voting as one electorate, I think it would be wise to add to this clause the words I have suggested.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Is not the clause clear as it stands?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Well, it is a mere matter of drafting. I will not propose any amendment.
Paragraph 2, agreed to.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[4.38]:
I should like an explanation from one of the representatives of Tasmania as to why these words were struck out?

The CHAIRMAN:
We have dealt with that question; the hon. member cannot go back.

Mr. GLYNN:
The position seems to me to be this: that, inasmuch as the parliament of the commonwealth is limited to making provision as to the manner of choosing the senators, and the fixing of the time and place remains with the state parliaments-

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
That has been altered!
Clause, as amended, agreed to.
Clause 11 (Failure of a state to choose members not to prevent business) agreed to.
Clause 12 (Issue of writs).

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[4.39]:
It has been suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria that this clause be omitted, but the amendment was consequential upon another provision which has been negatived.
Clause agreed to.
Clause 13 (Retirement of members).

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[4.40]:
I took objection to the first paragraph of this clause in Adelaide, and I cannot allow it to pass now without protesting against it. I fail to see the reason for sending the senate to the electors in two parts. I cannot see why the principle of municipal elections should be applied to the election of such a body as the senate. The idea is, I believe, to dilute the senate occasionally with public opinion, upon the assumption that it will get a little out of touch with the opinion of the constituencies; but I think that a far better expedient would be to dissolve the whole body. You are not going to bring the senate into touch with public opinion merely by sending half its members back to the constituencies. I think the proper thing would be to send all the senators back at once. If the clause is passed as it stands, half of the members of the senate will be more in touch with public opinion than the other half, and that I think is not desirable.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[4.41]:

I would like to suggest to the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, that this would be a good place, when he comes to consider the drafting of the bill, to provide for rotation in connection with the dissolution of the senate.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Yes.

The CHAIRMAN:

The Legislative Assembly of New South Wales and the Legislative Council of Tasmania have proposed the omission of the second paragraph of the clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 14. If the place of a senator becomes vacant before the expiration of his term of service the houses of parliament of the state he represented shall, sitting and voting together, choose a person to fill the vacancy until the expiration of the term or until the election of a successor as hereinafter provided whichever first happens. And if the houses of parliament of the state are in recess at the time when the vacancy occurs the governor of the state, with the advice of the executive council thereof, may appoint a person to fill the vacancy until the beginning of the next session of the parliament of the state or until the election of a successor, whichever first happens.

The CHAIRMAN:

It has been suggested by the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania that after the word "until" line 13, the words "the expiration of fourteen days after" should be inserted.

Mr. GLYNN:

The objection to this amendment is that you leave it to a member of parliament, whose place is to be filled up, to help in determining who is to be his successor. A member appointed during the recess would be sitting for fourteen days, and he would have a voice in determining who was to succeed him.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

That will not help him!

Mr. GLYNN:
It is rather inconsistent with parliamentary procedure. Amendment suggested by the Parliament of Tasmania agreed to.
Clause, as amended, agreed to.
Clause 15. The qualifications of a senator shall be those of a member of the house of representatives.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of Victoria:
Add at the end of clause, with the exception that he must be of the full age of 30 years."

Amendment suggested by the Council and Assembly of Tasmania:
Add at the end of clause "Except that no person shall be senator who shall not have attained the age of 25 years."

The CHAIRMAN:
I will put the amendment of the Victorian Council first; then, if the representatives of Tasmania, or any other hon. member, wish to alter that, they can move an amendment.

Question-That the words of the Victorian amendment be added-put. The Committee divided:
Ayes, 4; noes, 29; majority, 25.
AYES.

Question so resolved in the negative.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

I have no intention of moving any amendment. I do not desire to see any age fixed for members of the senate.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 16, 17, and 18 agreed to.

Clause 19. The place of a senator shall become vacant if for two consecutive months of any session of the parliament he, without the permission of the senate, entered on its journals, fails to attend the senate.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania:

After "for," line 2, omit "two consecutive months of." Insert "thirty consecutive sitting days in."

Amendment negatived; clause agreed to.

Clause 20. Upon the happening of a vacancy in the senate, the president, or if there is no president, or if the president is absent from the commonwealth the governor-general shall forthwith notify the same to the governor of the state in the representation of which the vacancy has happened.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[4.55]:

I would suggest to the hon. and learned member, Mr Barton, whether it would not be advisable to, provide that a motion shall be carried in the, House declaring that a vacancy has occurred. Under clauses 45 and 46, under certain circumstances-either through a disqualification arising, or from a crime having been committed-the seat is declared to be vacant. Who is to inform the president of the fact?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Clauses 45 and 46 relate to disqualifications!

Mr. GLYNN:

Clause 20 deals with the question of a vacancy having occurred. This vacancy may occur under clause 46 by a member having been adjudicated a bankrupt or having been convicted of a felony, and the question is: how is the knowledge of that disqualification having arisen to be brought before the parliament or the president? The usual method, I think, is that the declaration of a vacancy having occurred is made by a motion in the house itself. Clause 49 provides that, on a vacancy happening, if the person declared to be incapable of sitting does sit, he is liable to a certain penalty; but it does not go to the length of saying that if a vacancy occurs the penalty is to be inflicted. We may be in this position that a man by having been adjudicated a bankrupt or convicted of a felony, his seat may be vacated, but the penalty for taking his seat would not be imposed upon him, and the knowledge of the vacancy having occurred is left to haphazard.
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Suppose parliament does not sit for some months!
Mr. GLYNN:
There is no harm in allowing the seat to be vacant if parliament is not sitting.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
This clause provides for the communication of a vacancy to the governor of the state in case of it occurring!
Mr. GLYNN:
What I suggest is that an addition be made, that on a vacancy happening a resolution ought to be passed in the, parliament declaring that fact, because otherwise the president will not know whether the seat is or is not vacated. He cannot know whether a man has been adjudicated a bankrupt or whether he has been convicted of a felony.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):[4.59]:
The Gazette tells him that, and the practice, no doubt, will be precisely the same as obtains in all the legislatures at present. On the happening of the insolvency of a member, a communication is made by the registrar or judge in bankruptcy to the Speaker or President, telling him of the vacancy.
Mr. GLYNN:
In most places a resolution is carried!
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The coming candidate will look after that!
Clause agreed to.
Clause 21. Until the parliament otherwise provides, any question respecting the qualification of a senator, or a vacancy in the Senate, shall be determined by the senate.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and House of Assembly, Tasmania:
Line 3, after "senate" insert "or any question of a disputed election relating to the senate,"
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):[5]:
This suggestion raises the question that hon. members seemed to have a strong opinion about in Adelaide—that is to say, whether a disputed election shall be determined, by the federal court or a court exercising federal jurisdiction. It is simply a question whether hon. members have changed their minds since then. This clause has relation to clause 50, which provides that:
Until the parliament otherwise provides, all questions of disputed elections arising in the senate or the house of representatives shall be determined by a federal court or a court exercising federal jurisdiction.

As my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Higgins, has pointed out, clause 50 does not provide for that period during which a vacancy, may take place before the federal parliament has an opportunity to legislate on the subject, and the question is really whether it is worth while to provide for the period during which the possibility may occur. I do not know whether it ought to be provided for, perhaps it ought; but I think that may be left in the hands of the Drafting Committee, and be dealt with on recommittal. I will take a note of it.

Amendment, negatived; clause agreed to.

Clause 22. The presence of at least one-third of the whole number of senators shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the senate for the exercise of its powers

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[5-2]:

This clause fixes the quorum, of the senate at one-third. I admit that one-third is a reasonable number when there, are only thirty or thirty-six senators; but suppose the number of the senators is increased, one-third may be too many, if the states are split up. Suppose, for instance, there are sixty senators, I think, twenty are too many to require for the purpose of making a quorum.

An Hon. MEMBER:

No!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I can only speak from my experience in our House. The quorum of our House, consisting of ninety-five members, is twenty members. I feel that it would be very inconvenient, in some cases if the House were to meet and to be stopped because they could not get more than twenty members together.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The hon. member would not let the senate legislate with less than ten members present?

Mr. HIGGINS:

So long as you have only thirty or thirty-six senators, ten or twelve maybe a reasonable number; but

I want to insert at the beginning of the clause the words "until the parliament otherwise provides," in order to give parliament the power to alter the quorum if necessary.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
I think parliament ought to have power to provide for the case of a quorum. I will accept the amendment.
Amendment (Mr. HIGGINS) agreed to:
That the words "Until the parliament otherwise decides" be inserted at the beginning of the clause.
Clause, as amended, agreed to.
Clause 23 (Voting in senate) agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN:
The next clause to be dealt with is postponed clause 32.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Before we pass clause 24, I wish to ask the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, when he proposes to recommit this clause which relates to the constitution of the house of representatives?
The Hon. E. BARTON:
As soon as we reach the recommittal stage!
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The Hon. E. BARTON:
There will be a recommittal stage at this sitting; but that will only possibly be for drafting. I think it would be better to leave this for the January sitting, because then my right hon. friend will have an opportunity to deal with it.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That will suit me better!
Clause 32. A member of the senate shall not be capable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of the house of representatives.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of Tasmania:
Omit the clause.
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[5.4]:
I believe my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Lewis, whom I do not see in his place, drew attention to this clause. If I recollect aright, his point was that a member of the house of representatives was not capable of being a member of the senate.
The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
The suggestion is that the clause be omitted!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I do not think it ought to be omitted.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
The Tasmanian suggestion is that a man should be a member of both houses of the same parliament!
The Hon. H. DOBSON:
   It is to omit this clause, because, I think, it should come in a later place!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
   I think the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, said to my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Lewis, that he would put this clause in the portion of the bill relating to both houses.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
   What is the clause later on with which this clause is connected?

The CHAIRMAN:
   I would point out that there is nothing in the bill to prevent a man from being chosen against his will.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[5.5]:
   I would suggest that a man may be chosen, being absent from the colony, without knowing, about it. In his absence some of his friends may elect him.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   There is no harm done!
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
   But, according to this clause, be is incapable of being chosen. I think we had better say that be should not be capable of sitting.
The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
   I think the matter is generally dealt with by the electoral law. Therefore, we might as well leave it!
The Hon. C.H. GRANT:
   I would point out that the clause does not provide that a member of the house of representatives shall not sit as a member of the senate!
The Hon. H. DOBSON (Tasmania)[5.6]:
   That matter is dealt with by clause 44A. There are two clauses which prevent hon. members from sitting in the states legislatures as well as in the commonwealth parliament. The Attorney-General of Tasmania moved the omission of clause 32, because he thought the matter came under the provisions relating to both houses. I think we had better omit the clause now, and deal with the matter when we come to clause 44A.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
   I think it would be better to deal with the clause as suggested by the colony of Tasmania. I will assent to that course.
Clause negatived.

Clause 43. Until the parliament otherwise provides, any question respecting the qualification of a member or a vacancy in the house of representatives shall be determined by the house.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of Tasmania negatived:

After "representatives" insert "or any question of a disputed election relating to that house."

Clause agreed to.

Clause 44. Until the parliament otherwise provides, each member, whether of the senate or of the house of representatives, shall receive an allowance for his services of four hundred pounds a year, to be reckoned from the day on which he takes his seat.

Suggested amendment by the Legislative Council of South Australia and the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of Tasmania:

Omit "four" insert "three."

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[5.8]:

I hope the suggested amendment will not be agreed to. I shall only repeat now, in a few words, the contention I made when the Convention sat in Adelaide: that if the salary is made too low it will result in either men of independent means or men to whom the salary itself is sufficient inducement to leave their colonies becoming members of the federal parliament. Whilst in both these classes we may have able and desirable representatives, I think it would be a mistake that the character of the representatives should be confined, as it will to a large extent be confined if the salary is made too small, to those two classes of the community.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[5.9]:

I would suggest that it would not be conducive to obtaining the service of the best men in the parliament of the commonwealth if the salary were made equal to that of members of one of the state parliaments. The salary, for instance, in the Parliament of New South Wales, is £300, and membership does not involve absence from the colony during the session. In the case of most of the colonies, however, after the commonwealth is established, membership will involve absence from home during the whole of the session. Under such circumstances, the competition is relatively less in the case of the commonwealth than in the case of the states.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[5.10]:

I think £400 per annum is little enough to pay to representatives who come from distant colonies. I think, however, some distinction should be made.
Hon. MEMBERS:
No, no!
The Hon. S. FRASER:
It is done in other countries.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[5.11]:
The salary, if one were absolutely dependent upon it, does not seem very large. At the same time, I do not suppose we expect those who are chosen to be members of the senate and the house of representatives will be altogether dependent on the emoluments they receive as members.
The Hon. S. FRASER:
Many may be!
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I do not think so. It is more an honorarium than a salary; otherwise we should not find the distinguished persons who now occupy seats in the local legislatures willing to accept positions.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
We should either give a man nothing, or make it worth his while to attend!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
It seems to me that if the £400 per annum is to be considered as a salary, it is altogether inadequate. If, on the other hand, it is to be considered an honorarium, it is too large. We must not altogether get rid of the idea that there is some patriotism in the people, and that they desire to give their best services to the state without looking at the matter from an £ s. d. point of view. I am afraid that, when we have formed the federal parliament, we shall find that those who have businesses which require their constant attention will not be able to leave them in order to attend. No doubt those who live close to the seat of government will be able to go by train from Melbourne or Sydney to attend to their parliamentary duties, returning now and again to look after their ordinary business; but what about these living in colonies which are far distant? Take the case of Western Australia. How, for instance, will members of the legal profession be able to leave their place of business and take part in the government of the country? They will not be able to do it. Unless they are men of some means, or have no business to attend to, they will not be able to leave their homes-especially will they be unable to take office. Their businesses would be ruined whilst they were a thousand, or a couple of thousand miles away. I hope we shall find that those who are willing to become members of the federal parliament will be persons who are able to devote some time to their duties. For that reason I do not look very much at the amount of the emolument to be given. It is either too little, or it is quite enough. I do not feel inclined to move that it be reduced, or to support its reduction. At the same time I think £300 a year would be quite sufficient. But I take it that the persons who will become members of the senate, or house of representatives will not be persons who are altogether dependent upon this small honorarium. If there are no persons on this continent willing to give up some time without much reward to the service of the state, then I take it we are far from being ready to take upon ourselves the responsibilities of this federal government. If we expect that this small amount of £400 a year will be a sufficient inducement to persons to give their services, and, if they have nothing else but this, I think we shall have very indigent persons as members of both houses of parliament. No one would say that any of the gentlemen I see around me would leave their businesses, and go away to the federal parliament, and that £400 a year would recompense them for the loss they would sustain. That is not thought of for a moment. The actual loss they would sustain, if they had businesses to attend to in their own colony, instead of being represented by £400, would amount to several times more than that. I hope we shall not for a moment think that the persons who are to be members of the senate and house of representatives will be persons who will depend altogether upon the small amount named in this bill. If it were so, all I can say is, the amount seems to me inadequate.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[5.19]:

I take it that our great object in electing two houses of parliament as representatives of the people is to see that the people are represented. It is impossible, having regard to the immense area of the continent, that the people can be adequately represented if the choice is restricted by want of means on the part of would-be representatives, and I think the only doubt in this matter is whether £400 is enough.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

That is twice as much as the amount paid in Canada!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It is perfectly plain that anything less than £400 would be a farce. If there was a proposal to increase the amount, it might be a matter for Consideration; but we ought not to hesitate to retain at least £400 a year.

Question-That the word "four" proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause -agreed to.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria:
Omit "on which he takes his seat," insert of his election."

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[5.21]:

If we say that the honorarium shall be reckoned from the day on which the member takes his seat, it may be very hard indeed on the members of the house of representatives. The house might not be sitting at the time of an election. Indeed, it might be the case with a member of the senate. A vacancy might occur, a member might be elected, and might have to commence his services and perform all the duties of his position and get none of its emoluments. If we were to adopt the amendment suggested by Victoria, and omit the words "on which he takes his seat," inserting the words "of his election," there would be a difficulty in the case of the senate; because the date of the election of the senators is previous to the 1st of January, so that by omitting these words you might be paying two people at the same time. I would suggest to the Drafting Committee that they should adopt some such words as these "from the day on which his services commence." That would apply in the case of a member of the house of representatives to the day of his election, and in a case of a senator to the date from which his services were actually reckoned.

Mr. SYMON:

Does not a senator begin

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

A senator is elected in the year preceding the 1st of January, and his predecessor, so to speak, retains his office until the expiration of the year.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[5.23]:

I would point out to the hon. and learned member that his suggestion does not go quite far enough. Under clause 13 the services of the first senator, or the senators of the first parliament, commence from the January preceding the date of his election. So that if the suggestion of the hon. and learned member is carried out we shall be paying a man for time he does not serve.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It is the date on which the law deems his services to have commenced!

Mr. GLYNN:

Does not the hon. and learned member know that under clause 13, in the case of the senators of the first parliament, instead of their services dating from the January succeeding the election, they date from the January preceding the election; so that if you say that the payment shall date from the commencement of their services, in such general terms, you will be paving the first senators for time they never served. I would suggest that the clause should be amended in this way:

That after the words "on which he takes his seat" we should add the words "in the case of a senator, the commencement of his services."

That would be the January succeeding the date of his election, and I think also the date when the term of office of the old senator would expire, so that there would be no overlapping. Then I should add the words "and in the case of a member of the house of representatives, from the day of his election." In the case of the first election of the senate the allowance should be reckoned from the date of the election. That would be right as regards the first senators, because the date of their election would also be the date on which their real services commenced, though theoretically the date of their services would be from the January preceding.

The CHAIRMAN:

There are some new clauses proposed by South Australia and Tasmania to follow clause 44, and I shall first put clause 44 to the Committee.
Clause 44 agreed to.
New clause to follow clause 44 suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia:
No member of the senate or house of representatives whilst in receipt, out of the general revenue, of any official Wary or annual sum shall be entitled to receive any such payment as aforesaid, except in so far as such payment may exceed the amount of such official salary or annual sum.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
I would suggest that we should not pass this proposed new clause. It is a mere matter of legislation for the commonwealth to consider.
Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[5.25]:
I think it would be very undesirable to agree to this proposal. It is very unlikely that any minister would refuse to deduct from his official salary the salary he receives as a member of the house of representatives. Besides that, if any provision of the kind be necessary, it will be competent for the federal parliament to pass it. There is no need to put the provision in this constitution.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[5.26]:
What I want to know is whether it will be competent for a minister to receive a salary as a member of the house of representatives in addition to the emolument attached to his ministerial office? I should say that he ought not to receive the two remunerations, and that is in accord with our present practice.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[5.27]:
This is not a matter to be provided against in the constitution. We may rely upon the parliaments of the different colonies to provide against the receipt of the two salaries by their members while members of the commonwealth parliament, and the parliament of the commonwealth will make a similar provision in regard to its own officers.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

But this provision does not refer to states!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It maybe the case in a state or in the commonwealth. In any, case there is a competent authority to make the provision, and there is no need to put it in the constitution.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

All that I desired to emphasise was my opposition to a member receiving the salary of a minister and at the same time the salary of a member of the commonwealth parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[5.29]:

If the words "until the parliament otherwise provides" are used it will permit each member to receive a salary of £400 a year, and the commonwealth would then be able to provide that members are not to receive that salary in addition to an official salary.

New clause negatived.

New clause proposed by the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of Tasmania:

44A. A member of a house of the parliament of a state shall be incapable of sitting in either house of the parliament of the commonwealth.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON (Tasmania)[5.30]:

We had a long discussion upon this question in Adelaide, and it was decided without division that members of the various states parliaments should be eligible to be elected members of the commonwealth parliament. Surely that is a just and proper course to take. Why should the electors be debarred in their choice of representatives from choosing members of the local parliaments if those members be disposed to undertake the responsibility and toil of representing them alike in the commonwealth parliament and in the state parliament? Beyond that, there are many reasons why this course should be taken. The effect of the clause would be to very seriously restrict the choice of representatives.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[5.31]:

Although I do not wish to make this proposal the subject of a long discussion, I may say that I have always been of opinion that some such provision should be in our constitution. Of course there are reasons to be urged both ways. But I take it that the very fact that a member of parliament, both of the state and of the commonwealth, would have a divided interest, is a strong reason against his being a member of both parliaments. "No man can serve two masters; either he will love the one and hate the other," and so on. I believe that there is likely to be, on the part of a member of both the local and commonwealth parliaments, either too strong an adherence to the interests of the state to the neglect of his duty to and the interests of the commonwealth, or, on the other hand, such a strong adherence to the interests of the commonwealth as would prejudice the state of which he is a member. It is all very well for the hon. member opposite to shake his head as if that were a very doubtful proposition. It may be; but I think it is rather a strong one. I think it is extremely likely that you will have that conflict of interest arising. I do not know of any body of laws in which provision is made for a man to be allowed to hold two positions in regard to which the course of duty of one office would be incompatible with the course of his duty in the other.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
There are a good many novel provisions in this bill!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Because it is a new constitution. But there is no need to insert novelties which are a negation of the course usually followed in these matters. Take a member of the state parliament who is in the ministry, and who is also a member of the commonwealth parliament. Suppose he accepts an invitation to become a minister of the commonwealth. Could there be a more incompatible position?

An Hon. MEMBER:
He could not give the necessary time to the two offices!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
There are plenty of men who would work twenty-four hours to get two salaries, or who would draw two salaries and do work for one.

An Hon. MEMBER:
He cannot be in two places at one and the same time!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
He can, to this extent. The result of a provision of this kind is almost certain to be this: that the parliament of the commonwealth will not sit at the same time as do the parliaments of the states. That will afford an opportunity to hon. members to trot off from one parliament to the other, from one ministerial office to the other, and to draw both salaries. If there has been one thing more than another which has excited a good deal of opposition among those I have heard discussing this matter, it has been the opportunity afforded to persons who belong to both parliaments to draw two salaries. I have heard that denounced as gross bribery and corruption. I do not agree with that proposition. I think it is a wrongful and insulting way in which to view the matter, as it is also an imputation, to some extent, against the Convention. But I mention it to show that there is a strong feeling upon the subject. I believe we shall not be doing any good by multiplying opportunities of this kind. It is all very well to say that every man whom the people elect is a patriot. All of us have direful experience to the contrary, and I think we had better act on that experience.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[5.34]:

I think this is rather a strange proposition to submit to this Convention, seeing that nine-tenths of its members are members of local parliaments. It amounts to a statement that provincial patriotism is inconsistent with national patriotism, that loyalty to the state, and loyalty to the nation, cannot be expected from the same individual; that, in point of fact, we are creating a body that will be in a state of constant opposition to the various state parliaments. I say that nothing of the sort is the case. I would not be a party to the creation of such a thing. I should rather think that we were calling into existence a body which may be expected to do good work in the interests of both the nation and the provinces. Otherwise I would not support it. What is the position? We can form some idea upon the subject from hon. members who have been returned to this Convention to-day. But there is no doubt that in the natural order of things you will have great difficulty in securing representatives to attend the sittings of the federal parliament in another colony if, by a constitutional provision on the subject, you permanently exclude all your local politicians who have served you well from being in the federal parliament. We should not do anything of that sort?

Mr. HIGGINS:

We want men of experience in the federal parliament in the first instance!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

We want men of experience there at all times. We want men who have served the state in the smaller arena, and that they should be able to continue their services there as long as their doing so is consistent with the public interest, and at the same time we want to utilise their services in the higher sphere. Why should we declare that the two things are utterly inconsistent? I do not believe they are. I believe that in the greatest matter of all with which provincial politicians have had to deal in this Convention, there has been a proper loyalty exhibited both to the state and to the nation-loyalty which, is strong now, and will be strong at all times. I should be very sorry to think the reverse were the case. Leave the matter to the parliament of the commonwealth if you like—leave it to the electors of the commonwealth, or the electors of the states. If they think that the two offices cannot be properly held by one individual at the same time, they will have the power to say so, and deal with the question when it arises; but to lay down within the four corners of this constitution, as if we were the people, and wisdom would die with us that no man who has the confidence of a provincial constituency, and is returned as a member of the local parliament, shall have liberty, even if the federal electors so desire, to serve the federation in the parliament of the commonwealth, seems to me to be a monstrous proposition. Let us leave the matter to those who can decide it from time to time by their votes as they deem fit. Let us not, local politicians as we all are, in framing a federal constitution, do anything which might be suggested as an affirmation of the monstrous proposition that loyalty to any state of the federation, and loyalty to the Australian nation, are inconsistent things which cannot be expected from the same individual.

An Hon. MEMBER: Very great difficulties!

The Hon. S. FRASER: Very great difficulties. More especially in the first parliament would it be necessary to have men of experience; and men who are held in high esteem by the constituencies should be eligible for seats in it.

Mr. SYMON: They would be eligible. This provision would not prevent their being elected; it merely says that if elected they shall not hold the two offices!

The Hon. S. FRASER: Men holding certainties are not likely to give up those certainties.

Mr. SYMON: They are not asked to give them up until the other is made a certainty!

The Hon. S. FRASER: That removes part of my objection certainly.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR: They are not to come under this provision until they have been elected and have a right to sit in the federal parliament!

The Hon. S. FRASER: They will be capable of being elected whilst holding the other position.
Mr. SYMON:
Certainly!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I agree with the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston. I do not think that the commonwealth interests and the state interests will clash. I see no reason why they should, and the federal parliament can deal with this matter if it is found to be a drawback.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[5.39]:
Clauses similar to these were first embodied in the bill of 1891. I have always thought it was a great pity that they were struck out. I do not think that we need talk about duties clashing; but we all admit that in a federation there is a balance of power between the central authority and the local authority, and I do not think that any man should be in both pans of the scales at the same time. But, quite apart from that question, as a matter of convenience I think it is most objectionable that a member of the local legislature should also be a member of the federal parliament. We do not want to degrade the local legislatures more than we can help. We do not want their convenience to depend on the federal parliament; but that is bound to be the result if we allow a member to occupy the dual position.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
The local parliaments would be mere shire councils then!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
They would be bound to become so. A man elected to the federal parliament would be a prominent politician in his own state, and will have influence in his own parliament, and yet if members occupy dual positions the sittings of the local parliament will have to be made to depend on the meetings of the commonwealth parliament, and the local parliament will have to be adjourned because Mr. so and so has to go to Sydney, Melbourne, or elsewhere to attend the meetings of the commonwealth parliament. You will degrade the position of the local parliaments altogether. Do we not see the inconvenience here of members of this Convention having parliamentary duties to attend to in their own provinces? Do we not see that we have to get through our work by a certain time, because hon. members here are also members of the local legislatures, and the work must be got through or not done at all by a certain time in order to allow them to attend to those other duties? I say that the position, viewed from either side, is intolerable. The commonwealth parliament and the state parliaments must be distinct as far as their personnel is concerned, otherwise we shall constantly have the commonwealth parliament asked to adjourn in order that the members of the local parliament may go and attend to their duties in the local parliament, or, what would be just as bad, we shall have the local parliaments asked to adjourn their business in order that members there may go and attend the sittings of the commonwealth parliament.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[5.41]:

There is another reason that weighs against this pluralism—that is, that members of the federal parliament who were eminent in their local parliaments would be governed in the federal parliament, I am afraid, to a large extent by party interests—not by consideration for the interests of the whole country, but by consideration for the interests of the party with which they were associated in the local parliament. If I may judge from public movements, I am not sure that we have not seen something in that direction in this Convention. If any members of the federal parliament were tied by the strings of local politics, that would be a distinct disadvantage to the federal parliament.

The Hon. H. DOBSON (Tasmania)[5.42]:

My reason for urging the adoption of the amendment of the Tasmanian Parliament, which is simply a transcript of the provision of the 1891 bill, is that, as I submit in all humility, it is impossible for any politician, I do not care who, to do his duty to the electors both in the state parliament and in the federal parliament. I would not allow him to act in the two capacities. My short experience of political life has taught me that he could not by any possibility do his duty.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Is this the place to determine that for all time? The Hon. H. DOBSON: I think it is. I am sure that the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, intends to rise for the purpose of pointing out that this is a matter that should be left to the electors. I desire to anticipate the hon. member, and, with every deference, I differ from my right hon. friend Mr. Kingston, and say that this is a matter in which we are in a far better position to judge than any electors would be. The electors-men by the hundreds and thousands—do not know exactly what it is to be a member of parliament; they do not know the work that you have to perform, the thought and reading that you have to undertake, to write your principles or ideas on the statute-book; and if you were to ask them to vote for a popular man for election to both parliaments, they would do it without being in the slightest degree able to judge whether that man's brain or time would enable him to serve the commonwealth and the state also. I know from my own short experience that a man could not do it. You can skim just over the surface of things; you can go to your local parliament and make a speech, and then rush away to the federal parliament and make another great oration; but if you wish to advance legislation, and to take part in the progress of your country, and take up the thousand and one ideas that are worth consideration, and must be dealt with in a statesmanlike manner, with continuity, with perseverance, I say it is absolutely useless to expect you to give your best in both capacities. When the federal parliament first meet they will take months to pass all the bills necessary to bring into force a judicature and other things. They will take months to pass a tariff bill. For one or two years they will have to do everything—the high court will have almost nothing to do—and during that time you will have the very best men from every local parliament, if you do not pass this clause, leaving his own state to look after itself whilst he is away trying to make his name in the commonwealth parliament. If he succeeds in one parliament, he will absolutely and positively neglect his duty in the other. I again differ from the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, when he says that it will limit the choice of the electors. The idea of an ultra-democrat talking like that! A member of the federal parliament is to be provided with a neat little salary of £400 a year, free passes, and all sorts of privileges, and no doubt one of the nicest clubs in the commonwealth will be the new parliament. Does the right hon. member suppose that the democracy of federated Australia will let this parliament be without men? The men will come, some of them with new ideas—men not content to go in the old ruts; and it will be a good thing. So far from limiting the choice of the people, it will widen it. The electors will have to go outside for other men. I hope that the Committee will adopt the amendment, which is taken from the bill of 1891.

[The Chairman left the chair at 5.47 p.m. The Committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.]

Mr. Higgins (Victoria): The proposed new clause is, in short, a prohibition against anyone who is a member of a state parliament sitting as a member of the commonwealth parliament.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs: It does not prevent such a person from being elected!

Mr. Higgins: I am not superfining: I am speaking of its substance. I am dealing with the broad question: Ought a man who has a seat in the states parliament to be prohibited from sitting in the commonwealth parliament? The hon. member, Mr. Dobson, has intimated that he knew what I was going to say—that I was going to say, "Leave it to the electors." I was going to say something else. I was going to say, "Leave it to the federal parliament." think that it will be a great hindrance to the proper working of the federal parliament at its inception if the men who have had most experience in the working of the state parliaments are prohibited from being in the federal parliament.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
They will not be prohibited!

Mr. HIGGINS:
The proposal is to prohibit them.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
No; but they must give up their seats in the state parliaments if they desire to sit in the federal parliament. They must make a choice!

Mr. HIGGINS:
They are prohibited from sitting in the local parliaments while they have a seat in the federal parliament. I feel that if you enact that provision as an absolute prohibition, you must face a grave dilemma. You have either to deprive the local parliaments of the men who are their natural leaders, or you have to deprive the federal parliament of the experience of the best qualified men in Australia, the men most acquainted with the working of parliamentary institutions. Are we to inflict the serious dislocation which this would involve upon the local parliaments; are we to deprive them of their best talent, or are we to deprive the federal parliament at its inception, when the greatest difficulties will face the members of the federal parliament, of the men of light and leading who have been used to the affairs of state in the local parliaments? There is also this to be considered: There is no doubt that men used as ministers or members to the affairs of the local parliaments may be hampered in the work of the federal parliament by having to attend the state parliaments. Of course, the first answer is that that is for the electors; still, there is no doubt that there will be injury inflicted upon one or other of the parliaments by a member having to attend to his other duties. Under the circumstances, I would suggest that the best plan is at the inception of this constitution to have no absolute prohibition, but to allow a free hand to the electors; at the same time to allow a free hand to the federal parliament to impose a disqualification upon men becoming members of the commonwealth parliament. I am not at all sure whether it is not competent for the federal parliament under the bill as it stands to impose a disqualification of this sort. Section 15 says the qualifications of a senator are to be those of a member of the house of representatives. Section 31 says "until the parliament otherwise provides the qualification of a member of the house of representatives shall be as follows":-I take it that under these words it would be competent for the federal parliament to make provision for the qualification of a member of the house of represent atives to be that he is not a member of one of the state houses. That is a matter for the Drafting Committee. As we have passed section 31, I do not propose an amendment. I simply intimate that, in my opinion it is worth consideration whether, under section 31, it is not competent for the federal parliament to enact that one of the qualifications of a member of either house shall be that he does not hold office in any other colonial parliament. There must be a serious dislocation with regard to the time of the leading men of the state parliament being spent in the parliament of the commonwealth; there must be inconvenience; but that can be got over if it be found that the duties of a member of a state

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[7.40]:

I think that this is a very open question. There are many arguments on both sides as to whether it is advisable to prevent members of state parliaments from being members of the federal parliament.

But I think we should take a wrong course in irrevocably, or practically irrevocably, fixing our ideas in the constitution. I would point out for hon. members' consideration how great the advantage has been to this Convention to have members of state parliaments here, and more particularly-of course, excluding myself, members of governments. If it be ultimately thought improper-and I am not going to express any opinion one way or the other about it-that members of local parliaments shall have seats in the state parliaments, there are three modes of preventing it. The first is that the federal parliament may so enact; the next is that the state parliament may so enact; and the third, and, perhaps, the most effectual mode of prevention, is that the electors themselves may decline to elect a man. As we have these three modes of prevention, why should we fear the future in this respect? Why should we determine beforehand what shall or shall not be done in this respect in the federation? It may be that the state may consider that its interests will be best served by sending to the senate some of its most experienced parliamentarians; and, as we have heard over and over again that the selection of a senator is essentially a matter of state concern, why should we not leave it to the state, subject to the paramount provision of the federal parliament in that respect, to decide whether it should send as a senator, or as all its senators, the men who have won the confidence of the local electors, and who still retain that confidence? It seems to me to be a matter which can easily be resolved by one or other of these three modes, and I think, therefore, that we should stand by the bill in this respect, and not adopt the proposal which has been made by our friends from the Tasmanian Parliament.
The CHAIRMAN:
Before anyone else addresses the Committee, I would suggest that, perhaps, this may be taken as a test division on several amendments. The Legislative Council of South Australia has suggested substantially the same thing, as hon. members will see on page 25 of the schedule, and the Legislative Council of New South Wales has also suggested the same thing, namely, that no person shall be a member of both the state parliament and the federal parliament. I take it that this will be a test division on all these three suggestions.

Hon. MEMBERS:
Hear, hear! The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[7.43]: I have had varying opinions on this subject, as I expect a good many hon. members have had at different times. On the balance of convenience, I think that the paragraph had better be omitted. At all events, we should not lay down any such rule as is suggested. That must be left to be worked out in the future. It must be left to the federal parliament to put a limitation on the choice of the electors if necessary. At present, I can see manifest reasons why that course should be taken. I will suppose-and I think it is not an unfair supposition-that all the present Premiers, if they continue in office, are elected to the first federal parliament-

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I will suppose that all the attorney-generals-and I am quite sure that my hon. friend will be attorney-general-will be elected.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I am afraid that, under the bill as it stands, ministers in state parliaments will be prevented from being elected to the federal parliament!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
It must be!

Mr. SYMON:
It would be a very inconvenient thing to have them in the federal parliament.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
That might be so; I am not so sure even about, that.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
Does not the hon. member think that any house could stagger along with advantage without them?
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I do not think it is probable, under the circumstances, that the same gentlemen will remain premiers and members of the federal parliament. I think there will be incidental difficulties. The question is whether, in the initiation of this matter, we want to impose limitations which might have the effect of preventing the electors selecting the men who best know the subject matter with which they have to deal. We have not such a large area of selection at the present time as we may hope to have. It is quite impossible to resist that knowledge, however we may try to deceive ourselves. There may be most excellent men out of parliament; we have several here at present. At the same time, the men who have chosen to sacrifice their own personal concerns to attend to political affairs are, as a general rule, better acquainted with them than those who come in capriciously, and when it may happen to suit them. I do not think it would be a good or a wise thing, at the beginning of the initiation of this scheme, to propose a limitation upon the electors which will have the effect of preventing them from selecting as their members the men who have chosen to make politics their study, and the men who may be more peculiarly capable of assisting them in any questions that have to be determined. I do not mention this with any positiveness; I mention it as my opinion—which has been, as I say, a changing one—with the greatest possible diffidence; but I think on the whole it would be better to begin without a limitation. It will be better to say, if we put anything in, "until parliament otherwise provides.'

Then, in the course of events, as we find that the commonwealth advances, as we hope, and are fairly confident it will, the time may come when we shall have a better area of selection, and when it might be expedient to alter and limit the choice of the electors. That, time alone will prove. But at the initiation of these proceedings, to begin by penalising a man in his own colony in a way as a condition of enabling him to be a member of the commonwealth parliament, will be to compel the electors to make a choice between their own home concerns, which, after all, ought to be their dearest property, and the welfare of the commonwealth, which, dear as it may be, ought, after all, to be a secondary consideration. I think it will be wiser if we leave this provision exactly as it stands, with an alteration, if alteration is needed—and I am not sure it is not—which will enable a limitation to be imposed by parliament if, in the course of time, it is found advisable.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[7.49]:
There is no doubt that this is, as has been said, a very open question, and it is one which is surrounded with more or less difficulties from the points of view to which attention has already been called. Whilst I entirely agree with the principle of the clause which is sought to be introduced into the constitution, I confess that I am impressed a good deal with the suggestion made by the Attorney-General of Victoria, as to the existence of a power—if it does exist—in the federal parliament to impose this disqualification at a later period. I am satisfied myself that the principle sought to be enforced by the clause under discussion is the right one. I should like to point out, first of all, that it is no limitation, as some hon. members seem to think, upon the choice of the electors.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The effective choice Mr. SYMON: It is no limitation upon the choice or upon the effective choice of the electors—that is to say, the holding of a seat in the state parliament is no disqualification for election. The electors will select the men of most experience in politics, the men in whom they have most confidence, and the federal parliament, even in the inception of its proceedings, will enjoy the same benefits and advantages from the experience of those who may be elected, as though this clause had never been introduced. The limitation is not upon the choice of electors; the limitation is upon the choice of the elected. The limitation is upon the choice of the elected whether he will serve, not God or Mammon, but whether he will serve the nation in the federal parliament, or whether he will confine his ambition to the local concerns of the state to which he belongs.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
That is hair splitting!

Mr. SYMON:
How can it be? It is said that it is a limit upon the choice of the electors. The electors do not want to select their ministers in the local parliaments, and send them on to the federal parliament—not necessarily; there is no limitation. The foundation of the contention is that your local electors will wish to send local ministers into the federal parliament. If they did, then I should support a prohibition—I do not say in the first instance; I feel the weight of the argument in that respect—I should support a prohibition of ministers of the state being sent to the federal parliament. I believe it would be a most mischievous thing to do. It would tend to introduce local politics into the federal parliament, or to lead men from the states to subordinate, in many respects, federal matters to the exigencies of their local politics. What have we had here? I admit we could not have had a better example than we have had here of the desirability of a choice, and the necessity of experience. We have had the most experienced men from the parliaments. Everybody acknowledges that. We have had the most experienced ministers-men who have held office for years, and who are full of political knowledge and political experience. But it has been suggested over and over again here—notably by my hon. friend on the other side who is against this clause—that the ministers in this colony are over-weighted by the pressure of public opinion and so on, and that in some respects, at any rate, with regard to questions that have come up for discussion, their views are more or less tinged with the atmosphere of the local politics in which they live. I am putting these considerations to hon. members, admitting, as I do, the difficulty of the question. Is that a desirable thing to exist in connection with the federal parliament? I say it is not; and, more than that, when it is suggested that a man will be competent, I do not think he can be competent to undertake the duties of both the local and the federal parliaments. To my mind it is impossible for him to discharge the duties of both satisfactorily. I think that the federal parliament and its duties will be adequate for the ambition of any man in Australia, and that, so far as the elected are concerned, however their ambition may be satisfied with the existing local condition of things, it will have a wider field and a higher object than perhaps their minds have hitherto conceived. I believe their presence in the federal parliament will fill their highest ambition; and, on the other hand, the duties they have to discharge will occupy all their attention and absorb all their energies, to an extent which will be inconsistent with the discharge of those other duties which appertain to the office they hold in the local parliament of the particular state. I do not assent to the way in which the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, has put it—that it is a prohibition; it is nothing of the kind. It does not limit the choice of the electors; it does not impose any prohibition upon them; that I think is apparent.

Mr. HIGGINS:
But members of local parliaments will not stand!

Mr. SYMON:
Does the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, say that be will not stand? If so, I hope he will reconsider his decision, because that would be one of the greatest losses the federal parliaments could sustain.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
A member could not be elected to the position; he could not sit!

Mr. SYMON:
Does my hon. friend mean that the electors cannot elect him?
The Hon. S. FRASER:
   I am referring to the provisions of the local acts

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
   -

Mr. SYMON:
   That is exactly what we want to prevent.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
   You will prevent the effective choice of the electors!

Mr. SYMON:
   You limit the choice of the member; but you do not limit the choice of the electors. The elected has to, say whether he will prefer the federal parliament with its wider scope of interest and duty to the local parliament with its narrower scope.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   Why cannot he serve both?

Mr. SYMON:
   I do not see how he can. Take, for instance, a minister in Western Australia. Our right hon. friend, the Premier of Western Australia, as we all know, is monarch of all he surveys; he, can bear no brother near the throne.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
   Like Alexander, he is sighing for new worlds to conquer!

Mr. SYMON:
   I do not think my right, hon. friend would be in a position to do, much conquering, if, while controlling the destinies of the great colony of which he is premier, he had to come all the way.

over to the federal capital to discharge his parliamentary duties there. We know my hon. friend's capacities are unbounded; but I am afraid they would be unequal to that task. The point is whether you are going to limit the choice of the men who are elected of which body they will be a member, leaving it to the electors to say whether they prefer those who have had experience in the local legislature, as of course they naturally would, to discharge the duties intrusted to them in the commonwealth parliament. I understood the hon. member to say just now that he would not stand.

Mr. HIGGINS:
   I did not say so!

Mr. SYMON:
   If the hon. member wishes to convey that, I do hope he will reconsider the position; but if it did occur to the hon. member or to any other hon.
member not to do so, the effect would be that the state would have the benefit of services which would otherwise go to the federal parliament. There is another phase of the matter to which I would like to call attention. There is an ineradicable objection on the part of the people to pluralities whether in political or ecclesiastical matters.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Then they will not elect the members!
Mr. SYMON:
I do not know. However, the principle is well understood, and I think it might very well be ingrafted upon the constitution, in so far as it is a principle. But there is another point involved, and it is this: that throughout the whole of these colonies there is a great objection on the part of unreasoning and uninstructed persons against the federation at all, on the ground that it is going to create a lot of offices, and permit what some persons who are in the habit of using language more expressive than refined would call a game of grab. They say that the federal system will simply create place and pay, and when you have pay in the local parliament, and superadded to that the pay of the federal parliament, the people of this country, when they come to understand those conditions, would not assent to it. If it be a good principle, why should we not have the credit of putting it in the constitution? Why leave it to the people to say, "These men want to grab at these things"?

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is sound logic—it is a good principle!
Mr. SYMON:
Put it in. I have already said that I admit the difficulties from the point of view of expediency, and possibly, when my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, points out the remedy which he has incidentally suggested, it may be sufficient. But what I want hon. members to consider is whether it is not well for us not to say, "Let the electors reject the men who are already in the local parliament, and who become candidates for the federal parliament." But let us put it in as a principle, let us have the credit of saying that there shall be no plurality of offices so far as we can prevent it in connection with this constitution.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Why should you prevent the plurality of ministers?
Mr. SYMON:
I do not see, except that the mischief, if there were mischief, would be greater in degree in that case than in the case of the local parliaments. If the principle applies to the one, it applies equally to the other.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

-

Mr. SYMON:

You act on the principle. Surely the right hon. gentleman would not support the opinion that it is desirable that ministers of the state parliaments should be ministers of the federal parliament.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

It is not practicable!

Mr. SYMON:

I do not think that it is practicable; but if it is neither practicable nor right in principle, we ought to exclude it.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

I did not say that it was not right in principle!

Mr. SYMON:

But I say that if it is not practicable, and if some of us think it is not right in principle, we ought to exclude it. At any rate, I admit the practical difficulties which surround it on every side, and that there is considerable force in the contention that has been urged in regard to many other provisions, and the possible difficulties in connection with the establishment of the commonwealth, and in connection with the first parliament, it seems to me that the balance still is entirely in favour of embodying the principle in the constitution, and in supporting the amendment which is now under consideration.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[8.3]:

I should like to say, without detaining hon. members, that having spoken on this matter, and having expressed the strong opinion that there ought to be some limitation that would prohibit any person from being a member of the state parliament and at the same time a member of the commonwealth parliament, I adhere to that opinion, but nevertheless that I have been convinced by the arguments I have heard that this matter is not a subject for incorporation in a document of this kind. I have all along been protesting both at Adelaide and here-particularly at Adelaide-against the idea of this Convention attempting to legislate for the people of the commonwealth, whose interests we shall best consult by giving them the instrument of legislation and letting them make their own laws. Simply in accordance with that principle it is that I withdraw my opposition to the idea gentlemen being allowed to be members of the two parliaments at the same time. But I think it is an altogether improper thing that a man should be a member of both parliaments, and I think that it will tend to make the members of the federal parliament delegates of the state parliaments. After all it is a matter of internal polity for the commonwealth, and it is for the commonwealth to govern its internal polity itself. Just in the same way as I object to subsequent provisions, because I consider that they place limitations on the commonwealth parliament, I am prepared to give way on this matter. After all I think that the views that I or any other hon. member may hold as to what it is right for the commonwealth to do are matters for us to urge at the proper time, and that is after the commonwealth has been constituted.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[8.9]:

I am extremely sorry to hear the defection of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, from the principles which he laid down with so much strength, and in which I followed him so heartily.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I adhere to the principles! The Hon. J.H. GORDON: I differ entirely from the position which the hon. and learned gentleman now assumes when he says that this is not a matter for us to decide, but a matter to be decided by the federal parliament or the states parliament, as the case may be. The proposition of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, which is supported by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, to leave the matter to those parliaments is a piece of simplicity. We are the people to decide this matter, and not those who will be distinctly and directly interested in it.
Unless the federal parliament, and all the states parliaments in future are going to be composed of angels, unless they are going to be above all questions of self-interest and I have never known a parliament that was-they are not the parties who should settle the question. How often has it been attempted in our local parliaments to lessen the number of members and to lower their salaries, with the result that, after a long and arduous fight, the proposal has generally been defeated? So that to leave it to the federal parliament, on the one hand, and to the states parliament, on the other, to limit the opportunities of their members, argues a simplicity on the part of hon. members who advise it which surprises me, after having observed their astuteness in regard to other matters. The illustration of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, seems to me to be against the proposition. We have in this Convention able men who have done, and who are doing, good service in the parliaments of their own colonies; but that, to my mind, shows the undesirability of having the same men in both the federal and the states parliament. We are engaged here in fighting a battle for our own colonies.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The representatives of the small states seem to be!
The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
Well, I will make that concession to the hon. member; he has been fighting the battle of the whole world. To a large extent, we have all been fighting for the interests of our own colonies. But we want men in the federal parliament who are detached as much as possible from local interests. Hon. members here have one eye upon the proceedings of the Convention and the other eye upon their local parliaments.
The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
How does the hon. gentleman propose to detach the members of the federal parliament from the interests of their local parliaments?
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Will a candidate tell his electors that he is going to regard the interests of the whole of the commonwealth as much as he will regard theirs?
The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
No; but he will not be in the federal parliament to advocate local interests and considerations. He will, of course, have a natural leaning towards his own state; but members of the federal parliament should be detached as much as possible from local interests, and not be directly involved in their advocacy, which would be the result if we had ministers and great party leaders in the federal parliament. The argument that this matter should be left to the federal parliament, I have, I think, disposed of, and the argument that it should be left to the electors is, in my opinion, an unsound one. A member of a local parliament in seeking election to the federal parliament would have the advantage of political machinery behind him; he would have the advantages given to him by his position, and he would have a considerable start over an ordinary candidate. The argument of the hon. member, Sir John Downer, has in it a spice of egotism which, while justified in his own case, I think the most modest of us will do well not to adopt. He says, in effect, "We are the people of light and leading. Take away the members of the state parliament and you have nothing left but I dust and ashes." I differ from that view. There are as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it. I am bold enough to say that if we wiped out the whole of this Convention, Australia might suffer; but it would still roll on in its proper place in the Cosmos. There is really nothing in the argument that the states cannot get along-to use some hon. member's phrase-without their men of light and leading. I do not know that we constitute the whole of the ranks of the elect. A system of plurality will taint federal politics with local interests beyond the point at which they should be influenced in that way. It will create monopolists of those who are at pr was understood to say that eight out of the ten members representing New South Wales in the Convention were members of either house of the local parliament. If they were to be excluded, he did not know, as a practical man, where they could get the remaining twenty-four to properly represent the colony in the commonwealth parliament.
Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[8.11]

Mr. SYMON:

Does not the hon. member want to reduce the number of members in the local parliament?

Mr. WISE:

Undoubtedly; but in South Australia there is a plethora of admirable candidates. We all hope to see the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, in the federal parliament; but I cannot imagine the South Australian Parliament without that hon. member in it. No doubt, many hon. members will feel the same with regard to other colonies of which they have more knowledge than I have. As a practical question, the best course would be to leave the matter, as the hon. member, Mr. Barton, has suggested, to work itself out under the guidance of experience, and let the federal parliament determine from time to time what is the best course. The logical conclusion of the argument advanced by the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, namely, that there is a danger of local interests warping men's judgment when they come into the federal parliament would be that we should elect only foreigners to the federal parliament.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

That would be a reductio ad absurdum!

Mr. WISE:

Of course; but that would be the logical conclusion from the argument. I will support the suggestion of the hon. member, Mr. Barton.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[8.15]:

I support the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Barton, Whatever virtue there may be in the future in the proposition now placed before us by the hon. member, Mr. Symon, and others, I think that in the beginning, at any rate, it would be much better for us to leave this matter to be dealt with by the federal parliament. There can be no doubt in the mind of any one that in the smaller states, at any rate, there are not too many public men who would desire to become members of the senate or house of representatives. We desire to build up these two institutions, at any rate, in the early days in a way that will reflect credit upon the work that we shall have completed. I am sure it is the desire of everyone that the men who will become the first members of the senate and the house of representatives shall be selected from those most experienced in public life, and those who are most able in the various governments and legislatures. If we exclude every public man from taking a part in the government of the various colonies; if we say to him you shall at once decide whether you shall give up your connection with the politics of the colony you belong to, or whether you shall take part in the federal government, I think it will have an injurious effect on the early days of the federal constitution. I believe we have difficulties enough ahead of us without making any more, and we may be assured of this: that both the states and the commonwealth will be able to take care of their own business in this respect. They will be able to regulate this matter. They will soon find out whether it is desirable or expedient that persons holding office in the parliaments or governments of the various states shall also hold seats in the federal parliament, and the federal parliament itself will also take care that it shall be fitly represented, and if it finds that the plan adopted is undesirable will place restrictions upon it. When we look round this Chamber and notice that every person here, almost without exception, represents the popular people of his own colony in its parliament; when we look back to the Convention of 1891, and remember that every single delegate, I think without exception, was a member of the parliament of the colony he came from, I think we will take a very strong step if we say that not one of these persons who were there in 1891, and who are here to day, shall be a member of the federal parliament, unless he decides at once whether he will throw in his lot and take a part in the federal government, and altogether sever his connection with the local parliament. I think it is unnecessary for us to decide that question. It will be much better for us to leave it to time to settle it. I can at once understand the objections which have been raised to members occupying a place in both houses; but I think that them objections may be fairly left to the future to settle. They will settle themselves. I think if we frame this constitution in this respect in a way which will leave it to the electors, which will leave it to the local parliament, and which will leave it to the federal parliament, if need be, to settle this matter, it will be far better than for us to settle it at the present time. As for the small matter referred to by someone—I forget who it was—members receiving double pay, I think that is unworthy of our notice. Surely that may be arranged by the local parliament or by the federal parliament. They can easily make some regulation or condition as to whether persons who occupy places in both legislatures shall receive double emoluments. The thing is altogether too small for us to deal with at the present time. As to the proposition or suggestion that there is an objection amongst the people of the various colonies to persons holding many offices, that is a matter, too, which will be under their own control, which they will be able to settle for themselves. I have never heard any objection of the sort myself. I have never heard it suggested that persons will try to obtain places in the local parliament and also in the federal parliament with the object of obtaining double pay. I think it is not very likely to occur, and in any case it can easily be restricted. Whatever may be our ideas as to what is best in the future, the best course for us to pursue now is to place as little restriction as possible upon any one in regard to whether he shall be a member of one parliament or another.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS (Tasmania):

It is not likely that in an assembly like this the proposition of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, will be carried. This assembly reminds me of a number of individuals seated round the festive board drinking to the toast of "our noble selves." We are all interested in this matter, and we are all going to vote for our "noble selves," because most of us expect to be returned to the federal parliament, and if not to that to some other. It has been argued that many of those who will be returned to the federal parliament will be men holding positions in the local parliament; consequently they will be strongly impressed with the idea that they should keep possession of the parliamentary benches, and should rule the whole of the continent. There can be no doubt that the position taken up by the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, is the correct one; but it will have no weight here. I am not going to attempt to argue the matter, because I look upon the result as a foregone conclusion. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, has altered his view, which was the correct one, to suit the circumstances of the present arrangement.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I did not know that!

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

No, the hon. and learned member did not know it, What is the idea? To carry out this little arrangement amongst ourselves. There is scarcely a man present who does not an-

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
I am nearly persuaded to vote for it! The Hon. A. DOUGLAS: I do not care whether the hon. member does or does not vote for it, because he will be in the minority. We are to have ministers from various colonies in the federation. Hon. members speak about the premiers in the local parliaments being in the federal parliament. I should like to know how many premiers there are here now, who were here in 1891?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Ministers in the local parliaments will not be able to hold seats in the federal parliament. They will not, at any rate, be ministers in the federal parliament!

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

Cannot they serve two masters in a proper manner? Of course they can. They can travel here from one colony, and they can go back again. I do not, however, desire to keep up the argument any longer, as it is only a case of so much "talkee-talkee," as we used to say in Victoria in the early days.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The hon. member has been in Victoria, then?

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

It so happens that I know more of the colony than the hon. member does, although he would lead the people of New South Wales to suppose that he is the only man in Victoria who knows anything about it. The proposal of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, and the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, is the most truthful, honorable, and straightforward.

Question so resolved in the negative.
New clause, suggested by the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of Tasmania:

44b. A member of either house of the parliament of the commonwealth shall be incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of the other house of the parliament.
New clause agreed to.

Clause 45. Any person:

I. Who has taken an oath or made a declaration or acknowledgment of allegiance, obedience, or adherence, to a foreign power, or has done any act whereby he has become a subject or a citizen, or entitled to the rights or privileges of a subject or a citizen, of a foreign power: or

II. Who is an undischarged bankrupt or insolvent, or a public defaulter; or

III. Who is attainted of treason, or convicted of felony or of any infamous crime: shall be incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of the senate or of the house of representatives until the disability is removed by a grant or a discharge, or the expiration or remission of the sentence, or a pardon, or release, or otherwise.

Suggested amendment by Legislative Assembly of New South Wales:
Omit "II. Who is an undischarged bankrupt or insolvent or a public defaulter; or"

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[8.33]:
Before the Committee proceeds to consider the amendment which has been suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, I would suggest that we make an alteration in the first portion of the clause by adding the words to the effect that these disqualifications shall operate until the federal parliament otherwise provides.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Does the hon. member contemplate the federal parliament making provision exempting a man who has taken the oath of allegiance to a foreign power?
Mr. GLYNN:

This provision is really temporary. It is to cover the gap between the adoption of the constitution and the passing of special legislation by the federal parliament. I would ask hon. members also to consider the effect of sub-clauses II and III. For instance, the meaning of the term "bankrupt" itself may change. It may be very different twenty years hence from what it now is. Then there is the word "felony." As Sir Samuel Griffith has pointed out, the meaning of the word "felony" is changing considerably. In some colonies felony is comparatively a light offence; in other colonies it is a heavy offence. In New Zealand felony is practically unknown to the federal law. Changes similar to that which have taken place in New Zealand in regard to the meaning of the word may take place in other colonies, and if you leave the clause as it stands you will put it in the power of the states parliaments to either extend or diminish the qualification by making a change in the meaning of "felony." I say that this is a matter for the federal parliament, and that it ought not to be fixed perpetually in the constitution. Again, as regards the construction of the clause itself, I would draw the attention of the Drafting Committee to another matter. The hon. member, Mr. Barton, has referred to the taking of an oath or declaration of allegiance. The first part of the clause, it will be seen, does not read with the latter part of it. For instance, it says, "Any person who has taken an oath or made a declaration or acknowledgment of allegiance, obedience, or adherence to a foreign power." The clause then goes on to say that the person shall be incapable of being chosen or sitting as a member of the senate or of the house of representatives until the disability is removed. But, once a man takes an oath of this kind, you cannot remove the disability because a thing is done. The amendment required is purely a drafting amendment. The way in which the matter should be put would be, until the removal of the disqualification caused by the taking of the oath. That is the evident intent of the clause; but the wording of the clause is altogether different. I think this is a matter that ought to be left to the federal parliament, and I think that the words I suggest should be adopted.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[8.36]:

I am unable to see that it would be a good thing to limit this clause in the way suggested by my hon. friend, Mr. Glynn, who has said that this is a matter that should be left to the federal parliament. This happens to be just one of those matters which are included in the constitution of every one of the colonies. All the colonial constitutions provide for such matters as these, and it is perhaps right that they should provide for them, for even in the first parliament it would be rather a strange thing to find persons who had taken oaths of allegiance to foreign powers, who were undischarged...
bankrupts or insolvents, or who had been recently attainted of crime, or convicted of felony or infamous crime. Unless you have provisions of this kind, it is quite possible that somebody might take a violent affection for a gaol-bird, and put him into parliament. We do not want that sort of thing. It is one thing not to put limitations on the ordinary freedom of the citizens of the commonwealth. It is another thing to provide against the defilement of parliament; and this would be the case as regards the 3rd sub-clause, whilst in the case of the 2nd sub-clause it would be the admission into parliament of persons who had not purged themselves of certain disabilities, while in the case of the first sub-clause it would be the entry of persons into parliament whose very conditions would suggest that their interests were quite different from those of the citizens of the country. Persons who have taken the oath of allegiance to a foreign power are not to be classed in the same category as citizens of the country for the purpose of joining in legislation.

An Hon. MEMBER:
And not to be trusted?
The Hon. E. BARTON:
Not to be trusted, prima facie!
Mr. GLYNN:
That is not one of my points!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
If the definition of a point is a thing of no magnitude, it is not a point because it is larger. These limitations having been put in all constitutions of the Australian colonies, and having worked well, and prevented the entry of undesirable persons into parliament, they may well be continued in the constitution we are now framing. They are not limitations of the freedom of the electors. It is scarcely to be supposed that, except by inadvertence or accident, the electors would vote for such a person; but it is quite possible that the electors of the commonwealth, not knowing that certain persons had taken the oath of allegiance to a foreign power or had become attainted of some crime, or become bankrupt or insolvent-it is quite on the cards that such persons would stand for election for the commonwealth parliament, and the electors might choose them, not knowing who they were. That is not at all an improbable supposition. Such a thing has happened, and it is a kind of thing which the electors are to be protected against, because it is a state of things the electors themselves could not provide against. They might be taken in warily; they might be caught in a trap. This is not merely a case of preserving the freedom of the electors, but of preventing them from being imposed upon by persons who otherwise might creep into parliament, perhaps, in some cases, persons who were insidious enemies of the commonwealth, and in other cases persons who had been attainted of crime, or who were under other conditions of which they should rid themselves before they offered themselves for election to any legislative assembly. I submit that on the whole it is very desirable to avoid making the alteration suggested by the hon. member, Mr. Glynn; and while I am speaking, I think I might say that, although it is far less objectionable, it would be desirable also not to accept the amendment that has been suggested by the Legislative Assembly of this colony.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

Is it not a fact that in all our constitution acts power is reserved to the local parliaments to alter them, and they have altered them in this respect?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The disqualification in regard to bankruptcy and insolvency still remains in the electoral law of New South Wales; so that our electoral law has followed the constitution in that respect.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia): I think that the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, has not put the case quite fairly. I agree with what he said as to the necessity of imposing this disqualification; but I think it should be only temporary, and that the federal parliament should have power, if it wishes to do so, to remove it. The principle of federalism is to have as short a constitution as possible, leaving as much as possible to the federal parliament. I ask the Committee to adopt the amendment. That will allow this disqualification to attach to people who are returned in violation of the law until the federal parliament in its wisdom thinks fit to alter or to repeal it. As the hon. and learned member has spoken strongly upon this point, I will refer him to what Sir Samuel Griffith says upon it. This is the view he takes. Referring to section 45 he says:

This section—which is not altered from the draft of 1891—needs verbal amendment. The words "until," &c., at the end are not applicable to the whole of the cases mentioned. The word "felony" also is, it is suggested, an inappropriate one. Apart from the fact that the word no longer bears any definite descriptive meaning, the use of it has the effect of making the disqualification in question dependent upon state law. In New Zealand, the term is no longer used in criminal law, and it may be disused in other colonies. Moreover, the same offences are felonies in some colonies and misdemeanours in others. In all, I believe, manslaughter by negligence is felony.
On this point I submit three alternative suggestions:

1. To leave the imposition of disqualifications to the federal parliament; That is my suggestion, covering the gap in the meantime by a provision in the constitution -

2. To establish disqualifications until this parliament otherwise provides;

3. To substitute for "felony" words to the effect following: - "An offence of such a nature that by the law of the state of which he is a representative a person convicted of it is liable to undergo penal servitude or imprisonment with hard labour for a term of three years."

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I have the proposed amendment of Sir Samuel Griffith before me, and it reads somewhat differently. I am prepared to accept it.

Mr. GLYNN:

That is a question of detail. The amendment is suggested by Sir Samuel Griffith to obtain uniformity of interpretation. In some of the colonies the term "felony" includes exceedingly light offences, while in other colonies a crime of considerable magnitude must be committed before one becomes guilty of a felony. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, referred to the fact that a similar provision was embodied in some, I think he said in all of the colonial constitutions. But he omitted to say that these constitutions can be easily amended. In most of them an amendment can be made, if it is carried by a two-thirds majority of the houses, and a resolution is passed asking for the royal assent to it. These constitutions can be more easily amended than the draft bill before us. Then, too, they were passed on the inception of constitutional government in Australia. The constitution of South Australia was passed in 1855, and the constitution of New South Wales and Victoria are of about the same date. I think, the fact that we have similar provisions in our constitutions should not determine our decision in regard to this matter. I move:

That the words "Until parliament otherwise provides" be inserted at the beginning of the clause.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[8.45]:

If any clause is wanted in the bill, I think it is this clause, with a very slight modification as to the word "felony." That, of course, might be slightly altered to suit local requirements.

The CHAIRMAN:

I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the 1st paragraph.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

I think the 1st paragraph is absolutely necessary. A foreigner might get into our parliament, and sell our defence secrets to a foreign power. We must look forward to the time when we will be a powerful nation, or even now when we are weak it is still more desirable that we should be in safe keeping within ourselves. Such a clause is in force in every, country. Would a foreign country allow a Britisher to go into its parliament? There would not be the slightest chance, and their laws will scarcely allow a foreigner to travel through their country.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS (Tasmania) (8.47):
I cannot see why there should be any objection to this proposal. All that we are asked to do here is to affirm a law already in our constitution, and that the general parliament should have the power of altering it in any shape or way it may choose. We are bound to trust the federal parliament.

An Hon. MEMBER:
They can alter it under clause 131!

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
Yes; but they would have to go through a great many formalities.

The CHAIRMAN:
The hon. member must confine his remarks to the first paragraph, unless he wishes to propose an amendment to insert the words "until parliament otherwise provides."

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
I am in favour of putting in these words, because it will create no difficulty whatever. We should give the parliament power to alter it afterwards if they saw a necessity for doing so. We may be sure they will not make any ridiculous alteration. It is astonishing how many objections are brought forward when it is proposed to give the federal parliament any power. First of all, we are told that we are not to bind the future parliament; but as soon as we wish to give them more freedom in dealing with any matter, we are told that

Paragraph 1 agreed to.
Clause 45, paragraph II. Who is an undischarged bankrupt or insolvent, or a public defaulter;- or Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales:
Omit paragraph II.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[8.55]:
I propose to ask the Committee to agree to the suggested amendment of the New South Wales legislature. None of the constitutions of the various Australian colonies provide that a man who is an undischarged bankrupt, an insolvent, or public defaulter, shall, during the whole period of his bankruptcy or insolvency remain out of public life. The constitution of the South Australian legislature has no provision of the kind.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
He forfeits his seat!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
He forfeits his seat. The next clause in the draft bill-clause 46-provides for the forfeiture of the seat. That brings the federal law in a line with the law of the various colonies, and that I hold is quite sufficient. Why should men who, through some misfortune, are compelled to take advantage of the insolvency or bankruptcy laws, he kept out of public life until they can get their certificate of discharge?
Because they can get it at once if their bankruptcy is honest!
The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
My hon. friend knows they cannot.
Mr. WISE:
They can get it in this colony within three weeks or a month!
The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
It is easy to talk like that, but it is not so easy in practice to do it. If any one contested their discharge and demanded an examination of one thing or another, he could retard the granting of the certificate for months. What is more likely than that, in the strife of politics, we should have some one keeping some leading public man out of political life by keeping his affairs before the Insolvency Court? In framing this constitution has there been any great, demand on the part of the Australian people that we should go beyond the constitutions under which responsible government owes its existence? Has there been any evidence whatever that this law has injured the rights and privileges of citizens? We know of instances in which those who have devoted themselves to the profession of politics-some of our greatest statesmen have had to live a life of poverty. They have neglected their own affairs in attending to the affairs of the country, and they have thus impoverished themselves. In many instances, public men have had to seek the protection of the Bankruptcy Court. Not the slightest suspicion has been cast upon their conduct of public affairs, and time after time the electors have returned them to their seats in parliament without any injury to public business. It has never been urged in those instances that the public have suffered. Surely it is sufficient that we should provide that the seat shall be forfeited. The public are sure to know the circumstances of a man's insolvency. Under our law the election in such a case cannot take place until twenty-one days. I cannot imagine an election taking place at an earlier period, especially if you have to provide for elections all over the continent. There will be ample time for the public to know of a man's insolvency and the causes which led up to it. Surely the electors themselves can be trusted to say whether a man ought or ought not to be returned. Apart from that, if hon. members will look at the clause, they will see that a man may be an habitual drunkard; he may have been convicted of misdemeanour time after time; he may be a thief or a criminal; but he is not, however, disqualified from a seat in parliament unless he is a felon. I hope the Committee will agree to the New South Wales amendment, especially having regard to the fact that, under the next clause, the disqualification which exists in, all the Australian colonies under the constitutions is still provided for, and no attempt is made to eliminate it.
Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[9]:
I hope the amendment of the New South Wales legislature will not be carried. Poverty is no shame, and should be no disqualification. But unquestionably where a man fails in his own business, it is prima facie, until explained, an admission of inability to conduct the affairs of other people.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Not at all!

Mr. WISE:
I quite admit that in many cases an explanation easily gets rid of the disqualification; but, prima facie, you would not trust the management of your own private affairs to a man who had failed, unless he was able to give an explanation of his failure. I do not think we ought to ask that the affairs of the nation should be intrusted to such a man, unless he is able to give an explanation.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
Would you keep the seat vacant for him until he could explain?

Mr. WISE:
That is a matter which might be left to the commonwealth, who will have power to make general laws relating to bankruptcy and insolvency. All that is provided here is, that when a man finds himself in a position of inability to meet his creditors, he shall explain to the proper tribunal that he has been forced into that position by misfortune. In this colony, in Victoria, and in Queensland I do not know what the law is in the other colonies—if a man has been forced into bankruptcy by misfortune, he can obtain his certificate in a very short space of time.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
If there is an opposing creditor?

Mr. WISE:
Why is there an opposing creditor? Unless from pure malice, he is an opposing creditor because he believes, rightly or wrongly, that he has been defrauded or cheated. It is unquestionably true that in this colony many of the men to whom we owe most are men who have had to seek the protection of the Bankruptcy Court; but it is equally true that there have been frequent scandals from men becoming bankrupt, and making use of their bankruptcy as a ground for re-election, appealing to the sympathy of electors, to some of whom, possibly, they owe money—

Mr. WALKER:
I have known it happen over and over again!

Mr. WISE:
Appealing to the sympathy of the electors, and asking them to return them, not on their merits, but because they are unfortunate. I do not think such a display of sympathy is to the advantage of the public interest, and it appears to me, seeing that the failure to meet obligations involves ruin to those persons who suffer loss through that failure, it is only just that the man should be called upon to explain publicly what were the reasons which reduced him to that unfortunate position.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

Does the hon. and learned member notice that under this provision a man can be a thief, and yet not be disqualified!

An Hon. MEMBER:

Yes, he is disqualified!

Mr. WISE:

I think he is. I quite agree that if the laws of the different colonies prevent a man from obtaining a certificate within a reasonable time, the commonwealth, which will have power to pass laws dealing with bankruptcy or insolvency, may introduce a clause giving a man an opportunity of clearing himself at the earliest occasion. But I protest against the idea that a man who has failed to meet his obligations—though I do not, by any means, regard it as the highest proof of public virtue that a man pays 20s. in the £; many men who pay 20s. in the £ are rogues. At the same time we have to deal with facts as they are, and under existing circumstances it is prima facie a confession or admission of incapacity, at the least, if a man fails in his business obligations, and he should, therefore, I think, be called upon to explain what the causes of his failure were before he is intrusted with the high duties of legislation.

The Hon. H. DOBSON (Tasmania) [9.4]:

I hope we shall discuss this matter, if we are going to discuss it at any length, upon a broad principle, and that we shall put on one side the local experiences of our worthy friend, Mr. Carruthers. I quite agree with the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, that any man who has become bankrupt can get his discharge, if he is worthy of it, in a very short space of time. A discharge is generally withheld for two reasons. First of all, because a bankrupt has probably been guilty of something of a fraudulent character, in which case he ought not to be allowed so sit in parliament; and, secondly, because he has been guilty of extravagant speculation, creating a loss to his creditors—because he has been a jubilee plunger; an ordinary democratic plunger or a conservative plunger, if you like—money has caused a loss to his creditors, possibly his butcher and baker—for these two reasons sometimes a discharge has been withheld; but does any one contend that if for the least guilty reason, because he has been guilty of speculation which has caused a loss to honest traders, it is withheld, that it is any hardship to that man that he should endure the slight punishment of standing out of political life until he has obtained his discharge? Surely that is a fair penalty which he should be made to pay? If one might refer for a moment to local experiences, I think I could name a certain local legislator who was declared bankrupt, who forfeited his seat, and who went before the electors a few days afterwards and won his seat back again. For years that man remained an undischarged bankrupt in the legislature, and it was said—I do not say whether it was true or false—that he incurred debt after debt among a body of traders-grocers, butchers, bakers, without any reasonable probability of being able to pay them. Is it right that such a man should sit at the table of the federal parliament to make laws for us? I say, no. He may not be guilty of anything very dreadful, but he is guilty of a wrong. He has wronged petty tradesmen, he has caused a lose to them, and he ought to be punished in some way.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):[9.7]

Something has been said about the law of the various colonies. There is no doubt about the law of this colony upon the point. Both the Electoral Act and the Constitution Act refer to this disqualification. The Electoral Act says:

Every holder of

Then, in regard to the vacation of seats, the Constitution Act provides, among other things, that a seat shall become vacant if a member shall become bankrupt or an insolvent debtor within the meaning of the laws in force within the said colony relating to bankrupts or insolvent debtors.

That is the law as far as it exists in New South Wales but matters go, further in England apparently, for I find the following in Anson's "Law and Custom of the Constitution." The author says:

Bankruptcy is a disqualification for election, and, should it befall a person already elected, it incapacitates him from sitting and voting. The disqualification can be removed by the annulment of the adjudication in bankruptcy, or by a grant of discharge, accompanied by a certificate that the bankruptcy was not caused by misconduct.

This matter goes so far that it relates equally to the House of Lords, for the author says:

A further limitation on the powers of the Crown must be noted in the case of bankrupt peers. The Bankruptcy Act of 1883 disqualifies them from sitting and voting; but an unrepealed clause of the Bankruptcy Disqualification Act, 1871, provides that a "writ of summons shall not be issued to any peer for the time disqualified from sitting or voting in the House of Lords."

So that the disqualification applies even to a peer. Now, I take it there is no great hardship in this matter. It has been well pointed out already that if a person becomes bankrupt or insolvent under circumstances which do not imply any dishonesty on his part, there is no difficulty about his obtaining his discharge.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

The election may be over in the meantime!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It may be over, and it may be also that cases will occur here and there in which a provision of this kind may operate with some hardship. But we are dealing with the protection of the commonwealth, and we ought not to leave the commonwealth unprotected in a very important matter simply because some person may at some time suffer a hardship. The question is, what is the interest of the state? We know that the safety of the state is the highest law, and is it to the interest of the state to allow all these matters to be left open, in order that in occasional cases some hardship may not exist? That is not the way in which we ought to deal with the matter. Unless I am mistaken, our line is to see that the general interest of the state is, so far as is possible in a constitution, without undue limitations, protected, even though in cases here and there some hardship may be created. If we depart from that line, then the probability is that we allow interests of the state to suffer materially, simply because somebody may at some time or other, of which we know nothing, and under circumstances of which we know nothing, be subjected to a hardship.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

Would it not be sufficient if you were to provide that any person who has been refused his discharge shall be incapable of being elected or sitting?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I do not think so.

Mr. SYMON:

Supposing that he were elected, in a week or two he might have to vacate his seat again?

An Hon. MEMBER:

Suppose he never applied for his discharge? The Hon. E. BARTON: I do not think that would meet the case; and I think we are on safer ground if we let these matters stand as they are. I do not wish to take up any stand of blind conservatism. This is not a matter of conservatism, but of looking after the interests of the commonwealth, and nothing else, and I take it that we are to weigh those two things in the balance—the possibility during a long track of time of some hardship occurring to some innocent person, and, on the other hand, the very great probability that, without some such provision, there will be danger to the commonwealth; and if we do that, we can make only one answer.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[9.12]:

I should like to follow the same lines as the hon. member who has just sat down. The Victorian Constitution Act Amendment, Act of 1890 provides—first as to the Legislative Councillors, that, amongst other persons, no person who has been attainted of any treason, on convicted of any felony or infamous offence, within any part of her Majesty's dominions, or who is an uncertificated bankrupt or insolvent, shall be capable of being elected or continue to be a member of the Council; and, as to the Legislative Assembly, the same act provides, in the 125th section: No person, being an uncertificated bankrupt or insolvent, shall be capable of being elected a member of the Legislative Assembly; and, if he is so elected, the act goes on to say that his election shall be void. I think it is perfectly plain that the highest concern that we have in this matter, as we have to choose between the inconvenience of a private individual and the safety of the public, is to look after the safety of the public. If a man becomes insolvent, either compulsorily or voluntarily, he is under the control of a court immediately.
He is liable to be called up for examination; his conduct is liable to be inquired into, and if the court should find him guilty of any improper conduct, he may be subjected to punishment more or less severe. Surely a person under a cloud for the time-being ought to stand aside until his conduct has been thoroughly cleared—in the interests of public morality he ought to keep a stain off the highest court of the country. Surely it is his duty to stand aside, and if so, it is for us to see that the law is made perfectly clear to, if necessary, compel him to do so.

Paragraph 2 agreed to.

III. Is attainted of treason or convicted of felony or of any infamous crime:

his place shall thereupon become vacant.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

An amendment to this paragraph has been suggested by Sir Samuel Griffith, to which the hon. member, Mr. Dobson, has already referred, and I should like to mention it. It may be that the Committee will think that it is superior to the present provision, and the matter goes a little beyond mere drafting. That is why I think I am bound to mention it at once.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Does the hon. and learned member propose to adopt the words?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The words in the clause are:
Who is attainted of treason or convicted of felony or any infamous crime.
Sir Samuel Griffith has endeavoured to make the matter a little more specific, and the Committee will judge whether it is desirable to adopt his suggestion, which is, that in place of the words "felony or any infamous crime," we should insert the following words:-

Any offence of such a nature that by the law of the state of which he is a representative, the person convicted of it is liable to undergo deprivation of liberty for a term of three years.

If we are not going to leave the definition of felony or infamous crime to a conception we may have of it at different times, there is something definite here laid down as to liability to sentence which would make a disqualification. I have not risen for the purpose of supporting the suggested amendment; but I think it highly necessary that in a case of this kind such an amendment should be laid before the Committee.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

The Hon. E. BARTON:
A great many people have asked me that question, and I have asked the question myself. The right hon. member will remember the story of the speaker who said, "If the hon. member continues his conduct I shall have to name him." To that the member replied, "What then, Mr. Speaker?" and the Speaker had to confess that he did not know.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I take it that the term "public" defaulter covers more cases than that. It must cover cases in which persons who have given no opportunity for the law to act upon them are still liable to its penalties. That would be the position of a person who absconded. A public defaulter might also be a person who as an accountant to the Treasury, was in default.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Or a man who had not paid his land-tax!
Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[9.17]:

The phraseology of this clause is almost the same as that used in the Constitution of Canada, which was drafted by an Imperial draftsman in 1865 or 1866. The Victorian act also contains a very similar provision:

Provided that no person who shall have been attainted of any treason or convicted of any felony or infamous crime in any part of her Majesty's dominions shall be capable of being elected a member of the said assembly.

I admit that the words in the clause are not so definite as we should like; but it would be better not to depart from them without very good reason. Especially would it be well not to insist upon the three years' conviction. Many a man who gets two years is as big a rogue as the man who gets three years.

Mr. WISE:

In New South Wales the distinction between felony and misdemeanour depends upon the length of imprisonment to which the offender is liable!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think it will be better to adhere to the provision in the clause. In doing so we shall be adhering to the provisions of the constitutions of Canada and of Victoria, and, I believe, New South Wales.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[9.19]:

I would direct the attention of hon. members to the proposed amendment of Sir Samuel Griffith. I must confess that I do not think we should adopt it as it stands.

It says:

An offence of such a nature as by the law of the state-
Why not also an offence against the federal law?

Mr. SYMON:

There will be no criminal offences under the federal law, except offences against the federal government!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

A man might commit a crime under the federal law, and he should be equally disqualified.

Mr. SYMON:

Surely the hon. and learned member would not admit such a man to the federal parliament!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

There will be no criminal offences under this constitution!
There may be criminal offences incidental to the constitution. For instance, there might be a customs declaration amounting to perjury. Why it should not apply, to any penalty, or to any misdemeanour which is of an infamous nature, I cannot imagine.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Surely it does!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
No; these are the words:
By the laws of the state of which he is a representative he is not capable of being chosen or elected.
The idea might be right, but it require
The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[9.21]:
I trust the Drafting Committee will not fail to exercise a liberal discretion in striking out words which they do not understand, and that they will put in words which can be understood by persons commonly acquainted with the English language.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
The words "public defaulter" are used to define a certain class of defaulter!
The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
I know something is meant, but it would be infinitely better if we know precisely what is meant. There are these terms "public defaulter" and also "infamous crime." Other expressions should be used more readily "understanded of the people." The Drafting Committee might reconsider paragraph 3.
Mr. WALKER:
I understand the hon. member, Mr. Barton, thinks that the Drafting Committee will accept Sir Samuel Griffith's suggestion!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
They will deal with it!
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[9-23]:
I would direct the attention of the hon. member, Mr. Barton, to the words "until the disability is removed by a grant of a discharge." I would suggest that those words should be left out, because there is a possibility of removal of a disability by annulment or adjudication in some of the colonies, in which case there would be no grant of a discharge. Then there might be a composition or an arrangement entered into.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
That would be a reason, not for leaving out the words, but for adding others!
Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia): In the Constitution Act of Western Australia, which is the most recent, it is provided that no person shall be qualified for a seat in the Legislative Council or Legislative Assembly if he be an uncertificated bankrupt, or a debtor who has made a deed of arrangement, or who, in any part of her Majesty's dominions, has been attainted or convicted of treason or felony. That is wider than the provision now proposed, because it makes no provision for a man who purges his offence with regard to treason or felony.

Mr. SYMON: Does not the hon. member believe that it ought to be so?

Sir JOHN FORREST: I am not expressing an opinion about that; but I say that there is nothing unreasonable in the proposal contained in this bill. In Victoria, I believe, there is the same provision as I have quoted with regard to Western Australia. This matter was discussed in 1891, and provisions were inserted. I think there was a division, and the question was decided by a large majority. I cannot agree with the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, in thinking that a person who has become insolvent-

The CHAIRMAN: I will ask the hon. member not to refer to questions of insolvency.

Sir JOHN FORREST: I would only point out the present provision is much more liberal than that contained in the constitution most recently granted, and it is more liberal than the provision in the Victorian act. We cannot go very wrong in accepting this.

Question-That paragraph 3 stand part of the clause-resolved in the affirmative.

Clause 46 (Place to become vacant on happening of certain disqualifications) agreed to.

Clause 47 (paragraph 2). Any person, being a member of the senate or of the house of representatives, who, in the manner or to the extent forbidden in this section, undertakes, executes, holds, enjoys, or continues to hold, or enjoy, any such agreement, shall thereupon vacate his place.

Sir E. BARTON (New South Wales): There is a slight amendment I should like to make here, which I think would be an improvement. It has been suggested by Sir Samuel Griffith that after the word "agreement," to make the clause more binding, and I think, perhaps, it is desirable, we should insert the words, "from any part or share of it, or any benefit or emolument arising from it." I move:

That the paragraph be amended by the insertion after the word "agreement," line 6, of the following words:-"or any part or share of it, or any benefit or emolument arising from it."

Amendment agreed to; paragraph, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 47 (paragraph 3). But this section does not extend to any agreement made, entered into, or accepted by, an incorporated company consisting of more than twenty persons, if the agreement is made, entered into, or accepted, for the general benefit of the company.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[9.27]:

I think that an addition ought to be made to this paragraph, so as to prevent persons who hold, perhaps, one-third or one-half the capital of a company from being still entitled to sit in parliament. We know perfectly well that the disqualification which is intended to apply to an individual is very often got rid of by that person floating his business into a company and retaining perhaps five-sixths of the capital. That is an evasion of this provision which I do not think ought to be allowed to continue. If it is put in the constitution it will be very hard to get rid of it. I would suggest that some limitation be put on the extent of the capital of the company which a particular individual can hold.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

How can you draw a hard and fast line of that kind?

Mr. GLYNN:

Of course it is very difficult to draw a hard and fast line. On the other hand I think it is a monstrous injustice that a man may float his private business into a company with a capital perhaps £500,000, hold himself £400,000 worth of that capital, and be entitled to sit in parliament, notwithstanding this provision. It is making fish of one a fowl of another.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

There is another side to that!

Mr. GLYNN:

There are generally two sides to a question, and I am discussing the right side. I would suggest whether we ought not to add to the paragraph these words:

And the person holds law than one-twentieth of the capital of the company.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

That is absurd!
Mr. GLYNN:

Does the hon. member think, then, that a person should be disqualified from being concerned in an agreement from which he has a benefit of, perhaps, £20,000 as a private individual, and if he floats that into a company and retains £17,000 out of the £20,000 interest he can still sit in parliament?—or does he think that a man in a colossal concern, or brewery, of the value of £200,000, can float it into a company and retain £150,000 worth of capital, and still maintain his seat in the house, while the man who enters into an agreement with the commonwealth amounting altogether to £1,000, is disqualified to sit in parliament? I think the thing is monstrous. We know perfectly well that in some of the state legislatures persons who control enormous firms which have entered into contracts with the respective states still retain, under the guise of simply being directors of a company, their seats in parliament. I think that that ought to be prevented. At all events, I shall test the feeling of the Committee on the point by proposing the addition of the words I read to the paragraph.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[9.29]:

Before my hon. and learned friend moves his amendment, I want to substitute the word "twenty-five" for the word "twenty," in line 4 of the paragraph. The object of the clause is to prevent individuals making a personal profit out of their public positions; and, following the general exemption, the clause goes on to say that the prohibition is not to extend to an agreement made by an incorporated company consisting of more than twenty persons, if the agreement is made for the general benefit of the company. In Victoria, by recent legislation, there is what is called a proprietary company—that is to say, a private individual having a business may incorporate his company. It is really a private concern or firm, and as long as it does not exceed twenty-five shareholders, he can have many of the benefits and escape a good many of the liabilities of incorporated companies.

Mr. GLYNN:

How does it prevent dummying?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It does not prevent it; I want to guard against it. They are called companies, but they are really, in the majority of cases at all events, private concerns.

Mr. WALKER:

One-man companies!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

They are really one-man companies. I can understand the case of a person in Victoria who is a member of the federal parliament, who would escape if the word "twenty" remains, by floating his business into a proprietary company not exceeding twenty-five persons. He would be able to contract with the Government, and have no disability. If we extend it to twenty-five persons it covers every other colony and Victoria as well.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[9.32]:

There is no virtue in numbers. I do not object to twenty-five; I only say there is no more virtue in twenty-five than in twenty. A man may have thousands and tens of thousands of pounds in a company of twenty-five, twenty-six, or thirty, or more persons, and he may have a very small interest indeed in a company of twenty. That, however, would not in the slightest degree influence me one way or the other. It is impossible to draw the line. A man may be the proprietor of a paper company. He may not be able to sell one shilling's worth of paper to the Government, and yet his interest may be infinitesimally small. If we fix the number at twenty-five instead of twenty, it may be on a par with our colonial acts. If we go the full length, we ought to exclude bank shareholders who deal with the Crown through the departments. We cannot draw a hard and fast line in cases like this. If we did, the result would be all kinds of complications.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[9.34]:

I hope we shall amend the clause so as to make the provision something real, instead of the sham and farce it is under existing legislation. I think we can provide against abuse of the provision which occurs every day in connection with colonial legislatures. At present we have in various colonial constitutions this exemption in favour of incorporated companies. What is the result? A private individual who is a representative cannot sell a bag of flour to a government. He cannot, if he is in parliament, contract for the insertion of advertisements in the newspaper of which he is the proprietor, although there may not be more than £5 or a few shillings involved. On the other hand, if the business is big enough to warrant him in floating it into a company, although he practically retains the whole interest himself, he can engage in business arrangements with the government involving hundreds and thousands of pounds. I know of cases in our own legislature, I make no complaint of the action of those who have been concerned in the formation of these companies. I believe they have done good work which has profited the government, and they have every reason to be proud. But I say that the thing in its present condition is absolutely indefensible. We are "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel." Hundreds of thousands of pounds in connections with government work go into the pockets, properly, of government contractors who are members of parliament, who are protected through the formation of their businesses into limited companies. Now, ought that to be so? Surely we cannot justify the continuance of a thing of that sort. Knowing the way in which it is abused, is it not honest either to strike out all limitation, or, at the least, to provide so that the existing condition of affairs shall not be continued, when you catch the smaller man who is not worth catching, and let the big one go free whose operations ought to be dealt with? Under these circumstances, I shall be found supporting the amendment moved by my hon. friend, Mr. Glynn, or any other amendment which will make the thing a substantial reality and not a delusion and a snare. I understand the hon. member, Mr. Glynn, proposes that where there is a substantial interest retained by the member of parliament in

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

It proposes to take away the benefit of this exemption from companies in which a member of parliament holds a substantial interest-say one-twentieth of the whole concern. I should be prepared to go for the striking out altogether of this exemption.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

So would I!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

If the hon. gentleman will take the sense of the Convention on the point-

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

The right hon. gentleman would make the limitation more stringent; I would make it less stringent!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

The hon. member would allow all these arrangements between the member of parliament and the federal government to go on, of course taking some care that they were made public. I am not at present prepared to do that, though certainly that position would be much more logical than penalising the private individual, and exempting the public company - striking at the small transactions, and winking at the large ones. I should like to see the exemption in favour of a company struck out, and, if anything of that sort is moved, I shall be found supporting it.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Suppose the federal government keeps some money at a bank, what about the shareholders of the banking company?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

You cannot define the nature of the transactions; but it seems to me that it is just as possible to make arrangements which you ought not to make with banking companies as with other companies - arrangements in connection with the handling of money and the depositing of public cash. No doubt arrangements may be made profitable to the state and profitable to the bank; but I think it is a pity that huge transactions of this sort should be going on when any member of parliament is interested in them to any considerable extent. You would not allow it if it were the case of a member of parliament who was the sole proprietor of a business trading in his own name. Why then should you allow it when it is done through the medium of a company in which the member of parliament may retain, practically, the whole of the interest? Under these circumstances, if there be an opportunity - I do not propose to move in the matter myself - to strike out the whole of the exemption in favour of an incorporated company, I shall support the proposal. I would support anything which would have the tendency, which I believe the amendment of my friend, Mr. Glynn, will have - that of limiting these exemptions, and preventing persons from doing indirectly, through the medium of an organisation, that which they cannot do directly. That which by the general provisions of this clause is intended to be prohibited in the case of private individuals ought to be in all cases prohibited when members of parliament are substantially concerned.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[9.41]:

I think it inexpedient to allow members of parliament to have any contractual relations which might suggest to any one that their position might be impure. But all these precautions which have been taken from time to time arose when things were not done in the broad light of day in the way in which they now are. Nowadays everybody knows something more about every one else's business, unfortunately, than he does about his own. I think it is scarcely necessary that, with the great publicity which we enjoy through the medium of the press, and of which we are all so proud, the publicity which is given to the concerns of all of us, that we should surround ourselves with precautions which operate as a limitation upon the operations of the government rather than produce as a result, the purity of members. As a matter of fact a coach and four can be driven through this act of parliament, as it can be through all acts of parliament with similar provisions. In making any provision of this kind, you add to the original offence the further offence of duplicity, in that persons do their dirty work through other persons. There is some nominal contractor who is put up - the real motive power being concealed. And so things will go on, and your acts of parliament will become a perfect sham in their working. They will prevent no dishonesty and will become objects of scorn to the whole community. Now, I say that, at a time when we had not so much publicity, when it was thought good enough to look after one's own affairs, and not to bother so much about the affairs of other persons -

An Hon. MEMBER:
   Good old times!

[P.1026] starts here

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
   I expect that they had their demerits, but I think they had their merits too. But when this flashlight is always about us, and when everyone sees everything that everyone else is doing publicly - I make that qualification - what is the good of putting into an act of parliament provisions intended to produce purity, and which can only have the effect of producing fraud and deception? I have said in our own House that I think the time has almost come when we should do away with all these provisions. If the matter is looked at honestly and fairly, we limit the power of the Government to make the contrast best in their own interests. If they cannot do that, then persons who want to contract with the Government are careful of any contractual relations they have with them. The thing is not done in their name, but it is done in the name of some one else, and as we know, as the Premier of South Australia knows, and he agrees with me to a great extent, in what I am saying, I am sure-as we all know, these things are done, and will be done.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
   I, do not think they are done to any great extent. That certainly is not the case in our colony, and I know a good deal about it.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
   There it may be from companies.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
   Not at all!

Mr. SYMON:
   It is not worth talking about!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
   I do not think there is anything at all in it. I think that you might remove the provision and do no harm, or that you might keep it in and do no good. But I agree with the hon. member, Mr. Fraser, entirely, in saying "that whether you make the number 20 or 25, it does not make much, difference.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
   It makes no difference at all!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
   It is a perfect farce to think you make any difference by a limitation of that kind. Neither do I think that the amendment suggested by the hon. member, Mr. Glynn, will make any difference. I do not care whether it is or is not carried. I am satisfied that the clause should stand, but I would be better satisfied if it were struck out, for I think that when we have reached a condition of advancement we should not make provisions which, under the guise of preventing frauds, would limit the powers of the government, and prevent them from making contracts which would be most beneficial to them, except at the expense of driving their contractors to underhand proceedings, which are against the law and injurious to the community.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[9.47]:

In the case of large shareholders, such as the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, has mentioned, who have no control of the management, it would be absurd to make them liable to penalties in this manner. A man who was a very large shareholder might be a member of parliament, and he might have nothing whatever to do with the management of the company, he being neither a director nor an official of the company. Of course he would not have in the least degree control over its affairs, and in that case it would be absurd simply because he had a large interest in it to make him amenable to this law. But in the case of private persons who are supplying the departments of the government, they, through the various means at their disposal, could influence heads of departments and others who took delivery of goods, and it would be very wrong to open a door of that kind to them.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[9.48]:

I think that if we were to adopt the exclusion of the clause as suggested by the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, we should be interfering with a large class of distinctly honest transactions. If we were to leave out this clause it would mean that supposing that I happened to be holding five shares in a hardware company, and it came to be known that that hardware company had sold some fencing wire to any department of the commonwealth I should have to vacate my seat. That is going to an extreme; but at the same time it should be remembered that the one-man companies are often the source of great abuse. I have heard of some cases where a company consisting of one man has been able to get very good contracts from the government whom he supported for the time being. There is one feature in all these one-man companies that may enable you to reach such fellows—that is, that in the one-man company the man who really gets the profits is the managing director or general manager, and he has always got his thumb on the operations of the company, so I think it would be possible to make a limitation on this clause to the effect that it is not to apply to any agreement made and entered into by any incorporated company consisting of more than twenty persons, if entered into for the general benefit of the company, and if the member of the senate or the house of representatives is not a director or manager or official of the company. These companies cannot be carried on for a man's particular benefit unless there is a provision in the articles that he has control of their operations, or unless he is general manager or advising director.

An Hon. MEMBER:

What is the English law?

Mr. HIGGINS:

The English law, apart from express statutes, gives us no protection. There is a broader aspect of this question, and that is, ought we not to give to the federal parliament the power as fraud multiplies to multiply the provisions against it? We cannot make adequate provision in the constitution; but there is no reason why the federal parliament should not be allowed to add to these disqualifications. In clause 31 we say until the parliament otherwise provides the disqualifications of a member of the house of representatives shall be as follows.

I think, therefore, we should make it clear that the federal parliament should have the right to provide a new disqualification.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

It will not have that right unless we give it to them expressly!

Mr. HIGGINS:

We ought to give them the right, and I think it is a question for the Drafting Committee to consider whether the clauses, as they stand, allow it. to them. I think that they do; but if they do not we ought to see that this power is given to them. We ought not to define in the constitution what kinds of fraud and misdoing should prevent a man from holding a seat. As we are agreed upon this subject I think the leader of the Convention might make a note of it, and ask the Drafting Committee to see that power is given to the Federal Parliament.

Amendment (the Hon. I.A. ISAACS) agreed to.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[9.54]:

I move:

That the following words be added to the clause: -"and the person holds less than one-twentieth of the capital of the company."

I dare say the drafting of this amendment could be improved, but I wish to have the principle affirmed. The practical effect of the amendment will be that if a man holds less than £1,000 worth of shares in a company whose capital is £20,000, or if he holds less than £5,000 worth of shares in a company whose capital is £100,000, he may sit; if he holds more he cannot.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[9.55]:
The twentieth of £10,000 would-be only £500, but the twentieth of a millon would be an immense sum, so that the provision would be inconsistent and absurd.

Mr. GLYNN:
Will the hon. member accept one-tenth?

The Hon. S. FRASER:
No fractional amount will make sense of the clause, because it all depends upon what sum has to be divided. To make sense of it you must state the amount in pounds sterling.

Mr. SYMON:
If a man wants to evade it he can easily do so!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
If a man has nothing to do with the management of a company it does not matter what interest he has.

Question-That the words proposed by Mr. Glynn be added to the clause-put. The Committee divided: Ayes, 7; noes, 26; majority, 19.

Question so resolved in the negative.
Paragraph, as amended, agreed to.
Clause 47 (paragraph 4). Any person being a member of the senate or of the house of representatives who, directly or indirectly, accepts or receives any fee or honorarium for work done or services rendered by him for or on behalf of the commonwealth, whilst sitting as such member, shall thereupon vacate his place.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales:
Omit the paragraph.
Amendment negatived; paragraph agreed to; clause, as amended, agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN:
I will not put the proposed new clauses suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia-47A and 47B-because there are questions involved in those clauses which have already been decided.
Clause 48 (paragraph 1). If a member of the senate or of the house of Representatives accepts any office of profit under the Crown, not being one of the offices of state held during the pleasure of the governor-general, and the holders of which are by this constitution declared to be capable of being chosen and of sitting as members of either house of the parliament, or accepts any pension payable out of any of the revenues of the commonwealth during the pleasure of the Crown, his place shall thereupon become vacant, and no person holding any such office, except as aforesaid, or holding or enjoying any such pension, shall be capable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of either house of the parliament.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria:
Line 3, after "office," insert "except that of a justice of the high court."

Mr. WISE:
Would it not be preferable, sir, to put first the amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales- to omit the second paragraph because it includes the less amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria? If the paragraph is struck out-

The CHAIRMAN:
If it is decided that the words shall stand, we can put it. This amendment comes first. We cannot amend the paragraph if the Committee decide that these words shall stand. The object is to permit of a member of parliament acting as a justice of the high court.
The Hon. E. BARTON:

If the amendment is agreed to it will make the clause read as follows:-

If a member of the senate or of the house of representatives accepts any office-except that of a justice of the high court-of profit under the Crown.

It seems to me a very strange and clumsy proposal. It seems that if a person accepts any office of profit under the Crown his seat will become vacant; but if he accepts the office of a justice of the high court he shall still hold his seat. I think that must be a mistake-an inadvertence.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[10.6]:

Apart altogether from the question of the phraseology of the clause, which can be altered by the Drafting Committee, what is meant can be easily understood, and I am strongly opposed to it. I do not see for what reason there, should be an exception in favour of a gentleman who is chosen as the justice of the high court, and no exception made in favour of gentlemen who are chosen to other offices.

Mr. WISE:

The proper course is to strike out the second paragraph altogether; that is what is intended!

Mr. HIGGINS:

The first paragraph is all right, and it ought to apply to judges!

Mr. WISE:

Exactly; negative the amendment!

Amendment negatived; paragraph 1 agreed to.

Clause 48 (paragraph 2). Until the parliament otherwise provides, no person, being a member, or within six months of his ceasing to be a member, shall be qualified or permitted to accept or hold any office the acceptance or holding of which would, under this section, render a person incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales:

That paragraph 2 be omitted.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.7]:

I am in favour of the amendment of the Legislative Council of New South Wales. We had considerable debate about this matter in Adelaide, and we had a narrow division. I think some of those who voted in that division afterwards regretted their vote. I do not wish to reiterate the strong arguments which were used against this provision in Adelaide. It is enough to say that it is a kind of provision which leads to the doing indirectly of that which it forbids to be done directly, it is not a desirable thing to insert in any constitution, simply because it is a matter of legislation, and a matter for which the commonwealth has to provide itself. Will hon. members recollect that we refused to insert the suggested new clause of the Tasmanian Parliament to the effect that a member of a house of the parliament of a state should be incapable of sitting in either house of the parliament of the commonwealth, and that the ground of our refusal was that it was not our province to encumber the constitution with a body of laws for the commonwealth, which certainly ought to be more competent than we to make laws for itself? When we remember that that was the reason why we refused to insert a provision of that kind, how much more strongly does such a reason apply here? The other case was one in which there might be some show or reason for saying that it was a constitutional provision. Who can say, however, that this is anything else but a mere matter of law—a mere matter of deciding in what way the commonwealth should deal with the, position of its own members in relation to the acceptance of a certain office. One can understand that a person accepting an office of profit under the Crown should vacate his seat; but to say that no person being a member, or within six months of his ceasing to be a member, should be qualified or permitted to accept or hold any office, the acceptance of or holding of which would render him incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member, means this: The disqualification which would attach to him as a member is prolonged against him after he ceases to be a member. Now that cannot be a question relating to the constitution. It is not a constitutional provision at all. It may find its place in the body of laws the commonwealth may make, and it may be that the commonwealth should make a law on the subject. But if it be granted that it is necessary, as well as right, that the commonwealth should make a law on the subject, that is not the slightest reason for putting it in the constitution.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Is it not the law in some of the colonies now?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Yes, they have made laws on the subject. What I say is that it may be a proper thing for the commonwealth to make a law on the subject, but that is no reason why we should make a law to bind the commonwealth on the subject. We ought to get rid of encumbering provisions of this sort. If the commonwealth chooses to legislate on the subject, let it, but it is not for us to compel it to do so.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia):

I think the provision is one which ought to, stand. There is no relation between this question and the question we discussed and settled with regard to dual membership—membership in the federal house and membership in the state house. In that case there was no question of the purity of parliament; the purity of the motives animating the members of the federal parliament could not arise. But this is a question directly affecting the purity of parliament. The only fault I have to find is that the interregnum of six months is too short, I think it ought to be twelve months.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Make it ten years!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

There is reason in all things, and I think twelve months a reasonable period. I think in all the colonies this provision prevails.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

No!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

In nearly all the colonies, and in all the colonies that have had long experience of responsible government.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Does it exist in South Australia?

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Yes, not by statute but by resolution of the House, and I think the right hon. gentleman will find that it will be desirable to have a similar law in the colony of Western Australia. It is a most wholesome provision, and the reasons for it are patent to every body. During the first session of parliament the commonwealth cannot exercise any control whatever, over the actions of the government, and as I said before, the only fault I have to find is that the inter-regnum is too short.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia) [10.14]:

I can see that this provision might act injuriously. Some of the very best men whom you might require to fill high public offices might be members of parliament, and under this clause the area of selection would be restricted. My experience has not been very great, but it has been sufficient to show me that a government has no great desire to give their friends in parliament public positions, as by doing so they would weaken their support.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

But they could bribe thei

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I do not think we need make this provision at the present time. If the federal parliament likes to make the provision, let it do so. I think that, especially in the early days of the commonwealth, it would be unwise to restrict the area of selection especially in regard to judicial offices. I do not want to say anything in favour of legal members of parliament; they can generally do far more than take care of themselves; but it occurs to me that some of the most experienced and able lawyers in these colonies are to be found in members of parliament. No one will deny that, and in the early days of the commonwealth I should be sorry to see this clause find a place in the constitution. As time goes on it may be found necessary; if so, the federal parliament can legislate as may be found desirable.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[10.16]:

I am inclined to move that the words "or within six months of ceasing to be a member" be struck out. If members wish to strike out the whole paragraph they can do so.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Strike it out altogether!

Mr. GLYNN:

If that be the wish of the Convention I will not make any proposal, but I would say this: that in the opening of a commonwealth parliament it is not likely that any member of the ministry would be bribed out of it, and in the filling of a judicial office the government would not be likely to go to members of the opposition.

Th Hon. E. BARTON: That is just where they would go!

Mr. GLYNN:

I was about to say that at the opening of the parliament for twelve months or two years it is not likely that there would be any opposition or government party. The opposition, therefore, would not exist from which any choice could be made.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[10.17]:

I voted in favour of this clause last time, and no subject has given me greater trouble in deciding how to vote this time than has this particular clause. What I feel is this: that the object is to prevent political appointments. At the same time the danger is infinitesimal as compared with the advantage of having a free selection; and that is where I feel myself in a difficulty. I voted last time in favour of this provision, because I said to myself, "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander," and if you apply this rule in Victoria to all officials other than judges and the Agent-General I see no reason why it should not be applied also to these latter officials under the commonwealth. It ought to be applied altogether or not at all. I said to myself, "If you apply this to a man who is an expert draftsman, or to a, surveyor who has been in parliament, it ought to apply to any other functionaries whatever. I cannot draw any line. If you can draw, any line between the two classes I will give way." I felt in that difficulty; but I have come to this conclusion: that it ought not to apply to any official, because the chances of log-rolling are so infinitesimal. Is it likely, as the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest said, that the government would give a good billet to one of its supporters and get him out of the house? I could understand a government giving a billet to a person in consideration of future services; but when you are dealing with past services it is quite a different matter.

An Hon. MEMBER:
They might want to get rid of a dangerous opponent!

Mr. HIGGINS:
It has been said, in the case of the Victorian parliament, that a certain gentleman was made Agent-General, because he was a dangerous opponent; but I would ask the hon. gentleman, Mr. Holder, whether the danger of that occurring is so great that we ought in this constitution to provide against it, having regard to the way in which you hamper the selection on the part of the government?

Mr. WALKER:
It will drive good men out of parliament!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I do not think it will. Honestly, I think that when it comes to a mere question of chance one way or the other, a man who wants to serve his country will do so in spite of this clause, no matter what may happen. I was anxious to hear further argument on the clause before dealing with it. As matters at present stand, I must say that the inconveni-[Page 1032] starts here
ces are so great to my mind as to over-ride a possible corrupt case, and, therefore, that I shall vote against the clause.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia) (10.21):
I did not intend to repeat what I said at Adelaide; but it appears to be necessary to point out one or two things. The object of those who support the clause is to prevent parliament from being made a stepping-stone to some permanent government office, and that we should prevent parliament being made such a stepping-stone is, I think, very necessary. I think it is better to remove even the possibility of mischief rather than to grieve afterwards when mischief has been done, because we cannot cure it. I want to put this point in answer to the argument of the hon. and learned leader of the Convention, which seemed to be a very weighty argument. He said,
"Why not leave the matter to parliament? Was there, under ordinary circumstances, any reason for such a step as we propose to take?" Under ordinary circumstances, I think that parliament might very well be left to take care of itself in this matter, and under ordinary circumstances, I would be content to leave Parliament to pass such legislation dealing with this question as it thought fit; but, as I put it in Adelaide, I now put before hon. members this consideration: Almost immediately the commonwealth comes into existence, there will have to be appointed four justices of the high court, a chief justice, an agent-general, and—if we retain, as I hope we shall, the clause providing for an inter-state commission on railways-three or four officials, making nine or ten persons, who will receive very high salaries and occupy very important offices; and I think the fact that, before any legislation can be passed by the commonwealth parliament, there will be those nine or ten offices to fill, demands some action at our hands that would prevent parliament from being made a stepping-stone; and I hope that we shall not be unwilling to take that action now the opportunity presents itself to us. I hope the Committee will determine to keep within the four corners of the bill the clause that was inserted at Adelaide on this question.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)[10.24]:

(New South Wales)[10.24]: There is one view of this matter which appears to have been lost sight of in this argument—that is, the interest of the public itself. It is all very well to say that we should not make parliament a stepping-stone to these offices; but suppose that it is in the interest of the country that these appointments should be conferred on particular men who happen to be in parliament, are the hands of the commonwealth to be tied so that it shall not have the opportunity of appointing the best men simply because they happen to be in parliament? An answer to that argument may be, we are so afraid to trust parliament, so afraid to trust the ministry for the time-being, so afraid to trust those distinguished men who maybe appointed to some professional office, either judicial or engineering office, or some office of that kind, that we must embed in this constitution a provision which may probably, in time to come, narrow the selection of the best men for high public offices. That is a supposition that public criticism, the capacity for smelling out jobs, the ingenuity which is displayed in discovering any possible corruption that exists in regard to any great appointment, will not exist in the commonwealth parliament as it does here. It cannot be supposed for a moment that if there is any corruption in regard to the appointment of a high public officer, such as the commissioner for railways, or a judicial officer, it would not be exposed, and the ministry which made it held up to opprobrium. If the person most fitted for the office happens to be in parliament, why should he not, in the interests of the public, be appointed, even though he may be the supporter, or a dangerous and inconvenient opponent, of a party? The main consideration is surely the public interest, and considering the large trust which we are placing in the federal parliament, and the enormous powers which we have given them in every direction, we may fairly allow them to administer these matters subject to the criticism of an opposition, and under the eyes of the press and public. It is to this criticism that we must look for the maintenance of the purity of parliament.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Is there not a provision of this kind in all the constitutions?
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
No. That, to my mind, would be no reason why it should be placed in this constitution. There is no such provision in the New South Wales law.
Mr. LYNE:
I think that a resolution was passed by the Assembly on the subject, though I am not certain. I think it was passed after the late Sir Henry Parkes appointed Mr. Thompson to a position.
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Such a resolution may have been passed; but I do not remember it. It is no argument in favour of this provision that one house passed a resolution which no subsequent parliament thought of sufficient importance to embody in an enactment.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
Such a resolution could only govern the house that passed it!
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Yes, of course. It is the interests of the public which we have to consider in this matter. If we wish to leave the selection of these high officers as unfettered as possible, we should trust the federal parliament, and leave it to the ordinary operations of the criticism of the opposition and of the press to see that purity is observed in these matters. I think that provision is unworthy, of the constitution, unnecessary, and against the public interest.
The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[10.29]:
I am perfectly satisfied that the executive of a new commonwealth would never commence its career by appointing incapable men. Therefore, there is no necessity for the clause. I could easily name men against whom no colony could make the slightest objection. The sphere of selection is very wide, because there are so many men in the six colonies to choose from.
The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[10.30]:

Although there is a great deal in favour of the suggestion that this should be left to the federal parliament to deal with as they please, the clause is only of a tentative character. It says that until the parliament otherwise provides this shall be the rule. Now, what is the position? That during the first session of parliament, before in the natural order of things the federal parliament will be called upon to deal with general questions, a large amount of patronage will require to be exercised, much more than at any other stage of the federal history, because, of course, the various departments and establishments will have to be set up. All that this clause says is that at that period, when this protection is most required, unless the federal parliament provides otherwise that shall be the rule. If they do not provide otherwise, they can do as they please. But if we err at all it is on the side of safety, throwing around the proceedings of the federal executive a certain safeguard which can be removed at the pleasure of parliament. But until removed it will prevail for the good of the community.

Question so resolved in the negative. Paragraph agreed to; clause, as amended, agreed to.
The CHAIRMAN: The next suggestion is made by the Legislative Council of New South Wales; but, inasmuch as it involves a question already decided by the Committee, I will not put it. It is a suggestion to insert a new clause after clause 48.

Clause 49. If any person by this constitution declared to be incapable of sitting in the senate or the house of representatives, or disqualified or prohibited from accepting or holding any office, site as a member of either house, or accepts or holds such office, he shall, for every day on which he sits or holds such office, be liable to pay the sum of one hundred pounds to any person who may sue for it in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria)[10.37]:
I desire to draw attention to the provision which the clause makes for a penalty. At an earlier stage of the bill a provision providing for a penalty for a breach of the law against plural voting was said to be a blot on the bill, and was struck out. In this clause, not only is an offence created, but a penalty is also created in the constitution. If the Committee was right in striking out the penalty against plural voting, I apprehend that this penalty should also be struck out and the clause be reconstructed, providing for a simple prohibition against doing certain acts; because if the rule is good in the case I mentioned I think it ought to be applied all round.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.38]:
I quite appreciate what my hon. and learned friend has said, and practically it comes to this: we have not thought it well in this constitution to make penal provisions, and therefore, with regard to the one man one vote question, we have left out the words about a misdemeanour, and the words of punishment that follow it. Having done that I think it is quite consistent that we should leave matters of penalties to be provided for by the laws of the commonwealth. I quite accept the suggestion of my hon. friend; but as we will be adjourning in two minutes I will ask him to leave the matter to the Drafting Committee. I will make a suggestion to the Drafting Committee to reduce this clause to a simple prohibition, so that the law of the commonwealth may provide a penalty afterwards.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 50. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, all questions of disputed elections arising in the senate or the house of representatives shall be determined by a federal court or a court exercising federal jurisdiction

The CHAIRMAN:

On this clause two amendments are suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales; but inasmuch as they relate to a matter already decided, namely, the question of federal dominion, I will not put them. The Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, the House of Assembly of South Australia, and the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of Tasmania also suggest that the clause should be left out. It involves the same question as has been decided.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.40]:

In that case I would ask the Committee to leave the clause standing for the present, as it is intimately connected with clauses 21 and 43, and I think also with clause 32. The Drafting Committee were asked to take the clauses into consideration together, which they mean to do. We shall deal with it probably in some form on Friday afternoon.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 51. The senate and the house of representatives may each of them from time to time adopt standing rules and orders as to the following matters:

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[10.41]:

Would it be better to strike out the word "standing" so that we may adopt "rules and orders"? I do not know how far the insertion of the word "standing" might cause a limitation. If we omit the word we shall provide for the adoption of sessional orders, or standing orders, or any other kind of rules and orders. The Hon. E. BARTON: I think the word might as well be omitted; there will still be the same power or more.

Amendment (Hon. I.A. ISAACS) agreed to:

That the word "standing" be omitted. Clause, as amended, agreed to.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.42]:

I move:

That the Chairman leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again to-morrow.

I may state that tomorrow we shall have to deal with clauses 52 and 53. From that point—with the exception of clause 69 we have dealt with all the intervening clauses until after the end of Chapter II. Our next work, after dealing with clauses 52 and 53, will be with Chapter III relating to the federal judicature.

Motion agreed to; progress reported.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill-Darling and Murray Rivers-Adjournment.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
In Committee (consideration resumed from 21st September, vide page 1035):
Clause 52. The parliament shall, subject to the provisions of this constitution, have full power and authority to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the commonwealth, with respect to all or any of the matters following, that is to say:-
1. The regulation of trade and commerce with other countries, and among the several states;
2. Customs and excise and bounties, but so that duties of customs and excise and bounties shall be uniform throughout the commonwealth, and that no tax or duty shall be imposed on any goods exported from one state to another;

The exercise within the commonwealth, at the request or with the concurrence of the parliaments of all the states concerned, of any legislative powers which can at the establishment of this constitution be exercised only by the Parliament of the United Kingdom or by the Federal Council of Australasia;

Amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of Tasmania:
Omit the words "for the peace, order, and good government of the
This is an amendment which was made in the legislature of Tasmania at the instance of the Hon. A.I. Clark. That gentleman has furnished these reasons for the amendment, and, perhaps, in justice to him, I ought to read them:

These words are copied from the several acts of the Imperial Parliament providing for the establishment of legislatures in the various Australian colonies, and are perfectly appropriate when used in reference to the establishment of the legislature which is to possess plenary legislative powers, and have unlimited jurisdiction on all questions relating to the protection of life and property, and the enforcement of contractual rights of every kind; but it is very doubtful if they ought to find a place in connection with the definition and delegation of limited legislative powers which do not include matters relating to the daily protection of life and property, or to enforcement of private rights and obligations in general. It is true that they find a place in the 91st section of the British North America Act, which establishes a federal convention for Canada; but the primary object of that act is to limit the powers and jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, and to vest the residuum of legislative authority in the Dominion of Canada in the federal parliament. The words in question may, therefore, fitly find a place in that act, and they were relied upon in the case of "The Attorney-General of Canada versus the Attorney-General of Ontario, which was decided by the Privy Council last year[L.R.A.C. 1896]> to uphold the act of the Dominion Parliament, which had been challenged on the ground that it had encroached upon the domain of the provincial legislatures. That decision, in its effect, appears to me to be, an argument against the insertion of the words in question in connection with the definition and delegation of the legislative powers of the parliament of the commonwealth, because they might, in some unforeseen and unexpected controversy, afford ground for an argument in favour of the jurisdiction of the parliament of the commonwealth in matters which the several states might claim to be wholly within their own legislative powers. It cannot be contended that they are required for the purpose of giving the parliament of the commonwealth full power to legislate with regard to all the subjects mentioned in the sub-sections of section 52; and, if they are not required for that purpose, they must inevitably encourage the contention that they are inserted for some additional purpose. But, if their insertion in not intended to add in any way to the powers of parliament, in relation to the matters mentioned in the sub-sections of section 52, then they violate the canon of drafting, which requires that no unnecessary words should be used in giving expression to the intention of the legislature. They are very properly inserted in section 53, because that section confers upon the parliament of the commonwealth plenary and exclusive powers in regard to the several matters mentioned in the sub-section of that section. But their presence in section 52 tends to create a resemblance in the scope of the powers conferred by the two sections, whereas it would be much more desirable to make the difference in the purport of each section as apparent and emphatic as possible.

I have read these reasons through very carefully, and I have been unable to discover that any of the evils which my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Clark, fears may be expected from leaving these words as they are. The powers are powers of legislation for the peace, order, and good government of the commonwealth in respect of the matters specified. No construction in the world could confer any powers beyond the ambit of those specified.

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS (Tasmania)[10.35]:

I should like to submit for the consideration of the leader of the Convention the question whether the words which the legislature of Tasmania have proposed to omit might not raise the question whether legislation of the federal parliament was in every instance for the peace, order, and good government of the commonwealth. Take, for instance, navigation laws. Might it not be contended that certain navigation laws were not for the peace, order, and good government of the commonwealth, and might there not be litigation upon the point? We are giving very full powers to the parliament of the commonwealth, and might we not very well leave it to them to decide whether their legislation was for the peace, order, and good government of the commonwealth? Surely that is sufficient, without our saying definitely that their legislation should be for the peace, order, and good government of the commonwealth. I hope the leader of the Convention will give the matter full consideration with a view to seeing whether these words are not surplusage, and whether, therefore, they had better not be left out of the bill altogether.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The suggestion of the hon. member will be considered by the Drafting Committee.

Amendment negatived.

Sub-clause 1. The regulation of trade and commerce with other countries and among the several states.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria:

Add at end of sub-clause "Provided that all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any state or territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall upon arrival in such state or territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such state or territory to the same extent and in the same manner, as though such liquors or liquids had been produced in such state or territory."

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria)[10.39]:

This is a proposition which has been accepted in substance by all the legislatures, as the leader of the Convention will observe. It is different in form in our case, because it was thought advisable that the provision should be practically identical with that in the American act, to which reference is made in the margin, the celebrated Wilson act. I lay no stress upon the form. The Committee may regard the proposition as identical with those submitted in the other colonies. I shall be quite content if the Drafting Committee will take the matter into consideration as to which is the superior shape in which to embody the proposal. This amendment is not sought with a view to any extension of the powers of the states, but is proposed to secure the retention of a power which every colony at present enjoys—which every colony, apparently, desires to con-

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[10.41]:

I should like to draw the attention of the Committee to the reason for the necessity of inserting such words if the Committee are desirous that a state shall have the power of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within its own boundaries. There is one great difference—I might almost call it in this respect a fundamental difference—between the Constitution of the United States and our constitution as we propose to make it. In the United States there is, as we know, free-trade between the states. But that can be stopped at any moment by Congress. Congress has absolute power tomorrow to impose duties even as between the states. In the constitution as we propose to make it, the commonwealth parliament is not to have that power. Now, the question arises in this way in regard to the sale of intoxicants: a state in America has no power itself to impose any duties, or to put any trammels upon inter-state commerce. Consequently, even in the case of intoxicating liquors that are brought from another state or from abroad, a state can impose no restriction upon the sale or commercial intercourse in regard to those liquors so long as they are retained in their original packages, and in the hands of the original importers. In the case of Leisey versus Hardin decided in 1889 by the United States courts, it was held that a state had no such power. That decision gave rise to great dissatisfaction, and Congress, by passing the Wilson act of 1890, made a law almost in the words proposed by the legislature of Victoria.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

We only omitted three words, I think!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Yes, in substance it is the same. The matter coming on for decision again in the case of re Rahrer in 1890 the Supreme Court of the United States held that Congress having power to impose those restrictions in regard to inter-state commerce, and having legislated in that direction, it was perfectly competent to do so. If we do not put in similar words, a subsequent clause 89, saying that inter-state commerce shall be absolutely free, would prevent even the commonwealth parliament from making such a provision as is now suggested. Therefore it is necessary, if we retain clause 89, to insert in the constitution itself some provision such as we now suggest.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Would your amendment enable a state to prohibit the importation of liquors into that state?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No. It would enable the state to make the same law, in regard to imported liquors, as it makes in regard to liquors produced within its own boundaries, that is all. It would not allow the state to make distinctions between liquors produced within its own limits and liquors imported from abroad. They are put on the same footing; there is no preferential law. In the United States a state could say, in regard to its own liquors, without the intervention of Congress, "We will not allow the production or the sale of any liquor produced within the state," because that would not interfere with inter-state commerce. But a state could not make a law prohibiting the introduction and sale within its own limits of liquor imported from abroad so long as it remained in the original packages and in the hands of the original importers, and Congress passed a law—the Wilson act—applying to liquor that was imported the same provisions as applied to liquor made in the state.

Mr. WALKER:

Would such a provision make people compulsorily total abstainers in some states?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Not necessarily. It would allow the state to put imported liquor on exactly the same footing as liquor made within its own territory.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The greatest difficulty seems to be that you put the finances of the commonwealth into the hands of any state.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The same difficulty will arise in regard to excise duty on liquor produced within the state itself.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It would!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)[10.46]:

I think we had better leave the clause as it is. I am aware of the decisions to which the hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, has referred, and I think they go to this extent: A state is not allowed to prohibit the introduction of liquor to places within its own boundaries, because prohibition of that kind would interfere with the free course of trade.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Unless it imposes a similar prohibition on its own liquors under the power conferred by the Wilson act!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Exactly. But I am dealing with the question apart from the Wilson act, because, as I understand it, the American Constitution stands very much in the same position, without the Wilson act, as our proposed constitution does.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No; there is the distinction that Congress has the power, and we would not have the power!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

I will deal with that by-and-by. But, apart from the provision as to freedom of trade, the Constitution of the United States is in exactly the same position in regard to this question as our proposed constitution is. The American decisions before the Wilson act went to this extent: A state could not prohibit the introduction of liquor brought from outside, and it could not prohibit the sale in the original packages of liquor brought from outside. But there would be nothing whatever to prevent a state from making such laws as it thinks fit for regulating the sale of liquor in the ordinary way by retail within its own boundaries. For instance, there would be nothing to prevent any state from adapting a local option law—an extension of the local option law such as we have here now. According to the American decisions, a state would have a perfect right to prohibit or to regulate in any way the sale of liquor by retail within its own boundaries, that is to say, it could for instance pass a local option law.
The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

No, not in the original packages certainly; but it would allow a local option such as we have here now; that is to say, it would place in the hands of a particular division of the territory power to say whether public houses should or should not exist in that part of the territory. It could regulate the sale of liquors by imposing a very heavy license fee; it could do anything that amounted to a regulation of the sale so long as it did not prohibit a dealing with the original packages. Now, it appears to me, that if you give power of that kind to a state you quite sufficiently provide for any differences there might be between the laws of the different states, and you give full scope to any view there may be in the minds of the majority of the community with regard to the dealing with the consumption of intoxicating liquors.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The Supreme Court held that the state legislation could not insist on the law to forbid the sale of liquor imported in original packages, and to sell without license!

That may be so; but, to deal with the thing practically, you will hardly have such a thing as the importation of liquor in single bottles. For instance, if a case of brandy is imported, immediately bulk is broken the regulation of the sale comes within the powers of the states. It appears to me that we should not embody in the constitution a provision enabling the prohibition of the introduction of liquor to be made by a state to a greater extent than would be possible if we left it to the ordinary exercise of its freedom. Why should this particular class of goods be treated differently from any other? The amendment says:

Intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any state or territory.

There are a number of other liquors and goods of different kinds which, if properly used, might be just as deleterious to the public health as this class of goods, and why should we embody in the constitution particular legislation in regard to these matters? There may be some drugs of a poisonous character in regard to which the states will be obliged to legislate. We know that, at the present time, there is in most of the states very stringent legislation regulating the sale of poison. The state takes under its control trade of that kind for very obvious reasons. If the amendment were to apply to the sale of liquors, there would be stronger reasons for giving the states particular powers to deal with the sale of poisons. There is no reason in the world why any particular article, the sale of which the state may at anytime think fit to regulate within its own boundaries, should be dealt with in the constitution differently from other articles. We ought also to remember that round the liquor question there has always arisen a great deal of social and political controversy, and why should we, in the inception of the constitution, arouse all these diverse and conflicting interests, which an attempt to deal with this question always arouses in local politics, and will arouse in federal politics. I do not mean to say that if it were necessary to deal with the question we should not deal with it; but it is not necessary to deal with it. The proposal is to deal with the matter in a different way from any other kind of trade. It is also pointed out that the carrying of the amendment might put the finances of the commonwealth in a very serious position. We all know that narcotics and intoxicating liquors form the basis of a very large portion of the tariff in the different colonies, and there is no doubt that the federal tariff will be very largely drawn from this source. If you put it into the power of a state to absolutely prohibit the introduction of articles of this kind, you put it in the power of that state to interfere to a very large extent with the revenue of the commonwealth.

Mr. SOLOMON:

The amendment would not interfere with the introduction of liquor into a state!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

The explanation of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, was that the effect of the amendment would be to give a state power which it does not possess under the constitution as it stands, namely, to absolutely prohibit the introduction of liquor into its territory.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Only if it made the same laws with regard to the liquor made within its own borders. A state could not give itself an advantage over other states!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Of course. The amendment would give a state the right to absolutely prohibit the introduction of liquor. Under the constitution as it stands, however, a state would have the fullest power to regulate this traffic. We should not deal specially with a particular class of goods, nor should we give the states any larger powers in regard to the liquor trade than they would have in regard to other kinds of trade. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, stated that in the United States the federal government had power to deal with this matter; but, whatever there may be in his contention, this is a power which should not be dealt with in the constitution. If it could be done, it should be handed over to the federal legislature.

[P.1041] starts here

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
That is the only way to do it!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
The only thing that prevents the federal government from dealing with the question in this way is the prohibition which may be implied from the clause relating generally to freedom of trade—clause 89. I have always thought that the words in that clause are very much too general. It was pointed out in Adelaide, and having thought over the matter since, I have come round to the view, that we should state our meaning there more definitely. There is nothing more dangerous in the constitution than vague general words, the meaning of which we do not at present know ourselves. We ought to be very careful not to leave anything in the constitution which may be seized upon by-and-by to wrest its meaning to something different from what we intended. It seems to me that the clause as it stands is the only bar to legislation of the type of the Wilson act being carried out by the federal parliament, but the better way would be to so amend the clause as to expressly give the federal

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The only way to do that will be to strike out clause 89!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
No. An amendment has been suggested which would make the clause read in this way:

So soon as uniform duties of customs have been imposed by the parliament, the free course of trade and commerce between different parts of the commonwealth is not to be restricted or interfered with by any taxes, charges, or imposts.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
That will be very dangerous!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Inasmuch as the former section, 89, is the only reason why parliament itself should not deal with it, the better way would be to amend clause 89, so as to ensure that the parliament of the commonwealth shall have this power.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
That would not get rid of this difficulty!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I think so!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
No; because licenses would be a charge or a tax on the sale of liquor, and that would still prevent a state requiring the vendor of liquor imported from another state to have a license!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

That can be dealt with. I am now only dealing with the suggested amendment, to show that there is some way of meeting the difficulty. There will be no difficulty in arriving at some amendment of section 89 that will make it perfectly clear that the commonwealth parliament will have power by-and-by to make a law to authorise the states to deal in any way they think fit with the liquor traffic within their own boundaries. It would be better to negative the amendment, and leave the matter to be dealt with in clause 89.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria)[11.3]:

Having only moved formally the amendment, I would now ask leave to say a word or two in reply to the criticisms of the hon. member. I quite coincide with his contention, that it is very undesirable to raise in this constitution any question which divides public opinion. I am cordially with the hon. member there; but it is on this account that I have submitted this amendment, because the constitution without this amendment will raise the strongest feeling among a very large section of the population who are amongst the most active politically, and whose antagonism to this measure it; to be deprecated. At present the colonies have absolute power to deal with any liquor imported into the state as they have absolute power over any liquor produced in the state. My amendment is very carefully drawn, so as not to give to the federal parliament any portion of that power which the states at present possess, yet not to bias any parliament either for or against the liquor traffic, but to leave each state, so far as its liquor traffic is concerned, as autonomous as it is at present. It provides the one safeguard that this power shall not be capable of being used for protectionist purposes; enacting that it shall be illegal to deal with imported liquor except on exactly the same terms as with the liquor manufactured in the country. Getting rid, therefore, of the whole question of protection and free-trade, you retain to the states by this proviso the power they now have to settle in each state the liquor question for themselves. That does not raise any issue. By this clause we raise the antagonism of neither one section or the other-the temperance party nor the other party.

An Hon. MEMBER:

If you leave it out you will!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

If we insert this proviso we leave things exactly as they are; but if we leave the draft constitution as it is, we make a serious alteration, by depriving the states of a power they now possess in the interests of one particular party. That is to say, the states at present have a power of restriction which could be used in the interests of temperance. The draft constitution, by taking away that power, diminishes that power of the states, and is certain to rouse the antagonism of the temperance party.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

What is to prevent the federal parliament giving them that power?

Mr. WALKER:

Will you not bring in a disturbing element with regard to federal finance?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

My amendment, instead of introducing a question of discord, provides for leaving the states exactly as they are; it will leave the temperance party and the liquor party exactly as they are. Now I will come to the second point raised by the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor. Why, then, not leave this question to the federal parliament? Because the transfer to the federal parliament would be a deprivation of the states of their rights with regard to this particular question, and those are rights which certain states specially cherish. This question differs very much in each state. In every colony there is a temperance party and an opposing party, and the strength of parties, as well as the character of our several liquor laws, varies greatly. In Tasmania, as I understand, there is no manufacture of spirits. In Victoria and New South Wales there is a considerable manufacture of ardent spirits, and the question of the control of that manufacture is entirely in their hands. In other colonies there is, in a greater degree than in Tasmania, the question of wine production. Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, are large wine-producing countries, and have very large interests in that direction. That fact has an important bearing on the question. The proposal to remit the whole of the liquor question to the federal legislature while an immense improvement on the draft bill, does demand from the several states a concession of their power which they are very unlikely to grant. It is certainly the next best proposition to my own, but it is not equal to it. The states would realise that it is much more desirable to regulate their own traffic as they please

instead of handing over to this great body the power of saying whether or not this authority shall be given back to a particular state. Then there is the third objection with regard to the finances. The revenue objection would in future have much greater effect than now. It is quite right that we should consider the financial question now, and we have to do so; but if the federal government have the sole power of legislating on the liquor question, of course it would be very loth to return to any state this power, if it saw prohibition approaching in that state, because that power might be exercised greatly to the detriment of the federal finances. Consequently, those who look forward to restriction of the liquor traffic must be unwilling to see this power transferred to the federal parliament.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Would there be any difficulty in the way of any state enacting a law to deal with the retail disposal of liquor?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I think there would be always this difficulty: There are no laws more difficult to administer than liquor laws, because while one party in the community strongly supports them, the other portion of the community do not believe that they are conscientiously bound to obey them. In fact, they regard them as an interference with liberty, and do not regard a breach of the liquor laws in the same way as they regard offences against other laws. Any loophole will be taken advantage of, and the cost to any state of administering any restrictive measure in regard to the liquor traffic would be immensely increased if there was any such loophole left as this suggestion implies. Of course the real question, which the leader of the Convention looks at from the broadest point of view, is the financial question. That is, or may be, a serious question. Of course here we deal with possibilities; we do not deal with probabilities. As one who endeavours to keep abreast of information in regard to the liquor trade in all the colonies, I may state that any prospect of prohibition in any of the colonies of Australasia appears to me to be at present extremely remote. It is not within our ken as practical politicians in any of the colonies.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

We ought to provide for it, ought we not?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

So far as I can judge, the temperance party in Victoria is at least as powerful as the temperance party in any colony, and the temperance party in Victoria, even at present, is not only unable to carry prohibition, but it has been unable to defeat measures which have been taken to extend the wine industry, and thus increase the production of intoxicating liquors. Consequently, although the possibility is one to be considered, it is not one of any immediate imminence. If any colony is converted to that way of thinking, it is not likely to be for a long time yet.

Mr. LYNE:

In this colony it is at the present time one of the burning questions!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

It is a burning question with us in that sense-in the sense that it is essentially a chief question. But so far as one can judge, the interests rallied against the temperance party, especially the wine-producing interests, which are extending, and the interests of those who are locally engaged in brewing and distilling-producing beer and spirits are powerful, and, in the case of the wine industry, represent growing interests on the other side. It would be very difficult, indeed, to carry prohibition in any state in which a considerable portion of the population are engaged in the growing of produce for the purpose of its manufacture into liquor. In the state of Maine, in America, where prohibition has been adopted, no such production is possible, no such difficulties have been encountered.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The temperance party in Victoria is alarmed at the experience of the temperance party in America, which shows that enactment in the way of the prohibition of the sale of liquor is unconstitutional.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

That is so. But the hon. member will notice that the position is somewhat different. Practically, all these colonies can be and are likely to be wine producing, and the creation of that great industry is an argument for those who consider that if any further temperance restrictions are likely to be imposed they are scarcely likely to take the form of prohibition. I do not wish to labour the issue. My answer to the financial difficulty is briefly this: that it has been confronted in the United States. The state of Maine is practically a prohibition state. There are also one or two prohibition states in the west. Altogether some half-dozen of them have so greatly restricted the traffic as to be capable of being referred to as prohibition states; and yet, so far as I have been able to follow it, the question of revenue has not prevailed in the United States as against the question of principle. Prohibition is an important step, and might lead to a readjustment of the federal taxation, not necessarily so; but I fail to see why a prohibition which is practically remote, and which has been encountered and its difficulties solved in the United States, notwithstanding the question of revenue, should operate as a bar to our allowing the states to retain to themselves all the powers in this connection which they at present possess. Important as the question of revenue is, it must yield to the convictions and principles of the great body of the electors. Under those circumstances, the extremely temperate and able criticisms which the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, has offered in regard to this proposal have not affected me so fully as his arguments usually do. I submit that, in accepting the amendment, and in leaving the liquor traffic for determination in each state, according to its own principles or political action, we shall be acting wisely for the federation, and in the interests of the federal constitution, which must be submitted to the whole body of the electors.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid (New South Wales) [11.15]:

I think this is one of those subjects to which the public attach very great importance, and upon which we are not likely, on the present occasion, to come to a final determination. I notice that the division in Adelaide was so close that there was simply a difference of one in regard to dealing with matters of this kind.

The Hon. A. Deakin:

And since then it has been recommended by every legislature!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Yes; but that does not affect the remark I am about to make. In view of the close division on that occasion; in view of the fact that the Convention will meet under widely different circumstances at the same time, I admit, this difficulty: that under the bill there will probably be a right of free invitation of intoxicating drinks into a colony from another colony, although, at the same time, there will be a power in that colony to pass laws to prevent the consumption of those drinks.

The Hon. A. Deakin:

More or less power to prevent!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

I quite see the difficulty, and I think it is one that perhaps ought to be dealt with, and from that point of view I admit my original remark fails, because I think we must all admit in spite of the close division in Adelaide, that it was always the intention to leave to the different communities their powers of regulating the consumption of intoxicating liquors. I admit that remark disposes of my preliminary remarks as to whether this should or should not be looked upon as a matter of serious discussion. I think we can treat it really, not as a matter of that kind, but as a matter for the insertion of words in clause 89, which will make it perfectly clear that we are not taking away from the states any of their rights in dealing with intoxicating liquors. But what those words should be would be a matter for very serious consideration. No doubt our friends on the Drafting Committee will settle that difficulty, and will probably settle it as experienced statesmen, so that nothing in the clause is to be taken to affect the powers of the states with reference to their expressing the very words we mean. Instead of general words because general words would be very dangerous, I think, in a case of that kind—it would be better to insert precise words showing exactly what we intend. If we insert such words as "taxes, rates, and imposts," we do not know what meaning may be afterwards twisted into them. My intention is a precise one, and I think the Drafting Committee will be able to put it in precise words. Therefore, I think we might let this matter drop at present, with the understanding that words will be inserted in clause 89 by the Drafting Committee, making the matter clear. I think that will save any further discussion, and there will be no necessity to take a vote now. If it were seriously proposed by any one in this Convention to limit the rights of the different colonies in the important matter of the liquor traffic, it would amount to a new departure altogether, and a new departure of such a serious nature that I do not think we are prepared to discuss it.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
No one advocates that!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
No; I am sure they do not. Therefore, I do not see any great gravity in the discussion. We all admit that the states are to preserve this right. If they are to preserve this right, it is a mere matter of drafting to see that it is recognised in some part of the bill. We may well, without any division, let the matter stand over until the Drafting Committee insert words somewhere which will raise the point. Then it will be for those who wish to limit the hitherto understood rights of the states to govern their own liquor traffic, to incur the responsibility of such an innovation, to show reasons to the Convention why we should introduce it.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[11.20]:
I see the difficulty of this matter quite as much as my right hon. friend who has just spoken, but I think he will find that the difficulty is just as great in the hands of the Drafting Committee as in the hands of this Committee.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It could bring the question up in a better form!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
No one wants to restrict the States in their right to deal with the consumption of intoxicating liquors. The difficulty that arises is this: if we give them the right of practically taxing the importation of intoxicating liquors—for that is what it may come to—there will probably be a serious derangement of the federal finance. On the other hand, short of doing that, it is very difficult to see how the full rights we want to secure to them can be exercised. That is a difficulty not only of drafting, but a difficulty that may, well tax the energies and ingenuity of the Convention itself. I quite agree with my right hon. friend who has just spoken that it would be well not to take anything like a decision upon this matter at the present meeting. We have to meet again in Melbourne, and this is a matter which is worth ample discussion, because I think it will be only upon that discussion—that anything will be evolved which will give the Drafting Committee a reasonable guide as to the manner in which the Convention thinks this matter can be solved. One cannot repeat too often, perhaps, that it seems impossible, to overrate the difficulty of settling it in such a way as is just and fair to the federal finance, and at the same time does not in any way impair the rights of the several states. I think the difficulty is much greater here than in America.
The state in America is one in forty-six, and not one in six, as we propose.
The effect of that is that the proportion in which the federal parliament can be deranged or disturbed by the action of a state with reference to matters of this kind is very much smaller than the proportion in which the federal finance would be disturbed by the action of any one of the three or four states out of the proposed union. So that the question becomes a much more serious one in its financial relations than it would be in America. I am going to ask the Committee to negative them amendments pro forma on the perfect understanding, in the first instance, that the Drafting Committee will do what it can to overcome the difficulty; but, apart from that, on the perfect understanding that this question will be fully discussed and dealt with at the meeting in Melbourne. On that understanding I think we might pass on.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[11.25]:

The hon. and learned member will make a very serious mistake if he asks the Convention to negative this! proposal in order that the matter may be reconsidered later on. Federation has quite enough enemies, without creating: any more. We should not allow a division to be taken, or a course to be adopted, which will only give strength to the opponents of federation.
This matter is looked upon as a matter of morals against money. Men hold very strong opinions on the subject, and I feel quite sure that if this amendment is rejected, people will not look to the motives which led to its rejection; they will not analyse the speech of the hon. and learned member, and take it that the rejection is merely one to gain time, and to give the Drafting Committee an opportunity to do their work; but they will look upon it as a principle, and you will place in active opposition to the scheme of federation the whole of the temperance parties in the various colonies.
Now, can we afford to do that? We are not asking here to impose any system of local option or prohibition in the constitution. We are simply asking to maintain that liberty of the subject and of the state which they already enjoy. The argument against that is that the federal state must have money. On the other hand, the advocates of this amendment say that morals stand above money; that the states have the right to pass laws which they believe will have a good moral effect upon the community. I ask the hon. and learned member, so that his motives may not be mistaken, so that the work of the Convention may not be mistaken, not to postpone a decision on this question, but to affirm the principle, and, having done so, leave the Drafting Committee, during the next few months, to prepare for our next meeting in Melbourne a clause which will practically give effect to the proposition carried, and safeguard those interests which they deem should be safeguarded. I hope, therefore, the Committee will affirm the principle which has been recommended by every one of the parliaments. We should be flouting the parliaments and the people if we now refused their request to consider this matter, and we should be putting ourselves in a false position if we negatived a provision which I believe is in accord with the principles of a large majority of the Convention itself.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[11.27]:

I rose at an earlier stage to speak on this matter, but afterwards the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, put so very ably some of the points I was thinking about, that I deemed it unnecessary for me to say a word. However, there are two suggestions now made with which I wish to deal. The first is that this proposal should be negatived, so that the whole matter may be left to the Drafting Committee to prepare a clause giving practical effect to what is suggested here. If I understand the work that the Drafting Committee is likely to do, it is to give effect not to propositions which we negative, but to propositions which we carry, and if, after we negative this, the Drafting Committee bring up a proposal giving effect to it, I shall be personally very much surprised.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It is the same course that is taken when you recommite a bill for the purpose of making an amendment. You then negative the proposal at the beginning, not because you are opposed to it, but because you want to pass on to other matters in the bill, intending afterwards to recommite it.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

I understand that we are to have a sort of formal meeting on Friday to consider the draftsman's amendments, at which it will only be necessary to have a quorum; but, if the draftsman's amendments are going to consist in some cases of propositions we have negatived, propositions in direct antagonism to large votes in the Convention, then I think we shall want much more than a quorum on Friday, and that we shall have much more than a few hours' formal work to do.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

This is more than a question of draftsmanship. It is a question for the Convention; and it is a question with which, as it is composed at present, and with the time at its disposal, the Convention cannot fairly deal.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

With the first remark of the leader of the Convention I thoroughly agree, and I was proceeding to argue that it was not a question for the Drafting Committee at all. That was the first suggestion made to us—that it should be left to the Drafting Committee. The other suggestion is that we should leave it to the Drafting Committee, and that we should negative the whole thing, and leave it to the Melbourne sitting. Is that a proper way to treat the various proposals that have been made as suggestions to this Convention?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

That was done in regard to other things, because it was impossible to get through the bill at this meeting!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

I think we had better close at once if we are going to do that in regard to anything in which there is a dispute.

An Hon. MEMBER:

If hon. gentlemen would not talk, we would soon settle these matters!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

That would be a very simple method!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

If we are going to consider nothing but matters about which there is no difference of opinion, we had all better sit still, and let the Chairman put clause by clause, and the sooner we get to the end the better, and about half an hour will do it. But I understand we are going to consider, as fairly and as fully as we can, all matters that come before us, so as to leave the bill in the most perfect form in which we are capable of putting it at the present time; and, as we have a large number of members present—nearly the whole of the Convention, though there are a few notable absentees—I think, out of mere courtesy to the parliaments which have sent these suggestions, out of a due regard to what is required at our hands by these parliaments and the electors, we should do our best to settle the question. What do we gain by postponing the whole matter to Melbourne? If we leave the proposal for reconsideration at Melbourne, the least we can do is to leave it unprejudiced now. Not to put in this amendment is to prejudice the whole case. In the first place, we prejudice the case by rejecting the amendment; in the next place we prejudice the case by, as the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, put it, changing altogether the present provisions in the local law. If we leave it to Melbourne, let us leave things precisely as they are to-day.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

That is the proper course!

The Hon. F.W. Holder:

I do not think we have a right to postpone the matter unless we leave things precisely as they are to-day, and we leave things precisely as they are to-day by carrying the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Deakin. If we do not carry that amendment, we shall have done this in the eyes of the public, and in the eyes of the temperance people, who, throughout the colonies, are very much interested in the matter, and are watching us very closely—we shall have put up several greater barriers than were there before between these people and the accomplishment of an object which they see just ahead, but which I quite agree with the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, is further off than they think. Do not let us alienate their sympathies and make them antifederationists, by the erection of barriers which do not exist today. Why not leave the whole matter in the position in which it now occupies, in which every state is unhampered, in doing what it will? I hope that the Convention, recognising we shall have another opportunity to deal with the question, will out of respect to public sentiment, which is very strong, carry the amendment, in which case we shall leave the question without that prejudice which the negativing of the amendment would lead to.

Mr. Walker (New South Wales)[11.32]:

If this matter goes to a division I shall vote for the amendment, but I think it is only fair to let our temperance friends understand that as the revenue will be considerably affected by the absence of the duties collectable in any state on spirits that state must be prepared, when the time comes for the per capita distribution of revenue, to accept less than the other states, or to make up the difference in some other direction. I think, with the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, that this is a moral question, and I recognise that morality is above cash.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Hear, hear. From a banker that is a very large admission!

Mr. Solomon (South Australia)[11.34]:

Really I do not see if the suggestion of the right hon. the Premier of New South Wales is to be carried out what more we want to do now than pass everything pro forma, and leave matters over to be dealt with in Melbourne.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID: Or stop!

Mr. SOLOMON:
If, whenever we come across a difficult question, a question concerning which the public are looking to have some idea of the opinion of the Convention, to be discussed in the interval between now and the next meeting, we are going to avoid the subject, we shall do as much harm and, perhaps, more to the cause of federation than we could possibly do by discussing it now fully and fairly. As to the point at issue, having listened to the arguments of previous speakers, I fail to find in one of them a necessity for this amendment. We are dealing now with sub-clause 1 of clause 52. That sub-clause simply gives power to the federal parliament to regulate trade and commerce with other countries, and among the several states. What on earth has that clause to do with the question of whether a state may enact prohibitive laws as to the liquor traffic within its own boundaries?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
A good deal!

Mr. SOLOMON:
It appears to me that this is the wrong place in which to deal with the subject.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
That might be!

Mr. SOLOMON:
There is a proposal in clause 89, the clause dealing with uniform duties of customs that:

So soon as uniform duties of customs have been imposed trade and intercourse throughout the commonwealth, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free.

In this clause we have an amendment suggested by two of the colonies, stipulating that although trade and intercourse shall be free throughout the commonwealth each individual state shall have the right to enact laws preventing the introduction of liquor over its boundaries. That is the right place in which to deal with this question. I fail to see that this sub-clause, which deals merely with trade and commerce of other countries and between the states, has anything to do with the amendment suggested by the legislature of Victoria. This clause has nothing whatever to do with the right of the state to restrict the sale of or to regulate the manner in which liquor shall be sold within its own boundaries. I suggest that the proper course is to negative the amendment proposed by the legislature of Victoria and to deal with the whole question when we get to clause 89, where we can have a much fuller discussion upon it, not only in regard to the right of the states to prohibit the importation of liquor within their boundaries, but as to the responsibility which will be thrown upon the other states by the fact of any individual state prohibiting the introduction of goods which will produce such an important portion of their customs revenue. I will not discuss that question now; but I suggest that the proper place at which to take this general debate would be on clause 89. Our best course would be now to negative the amendment of the legislature of Victoria, leaving it to hon. members to propose some amendment in clause 89 which will carry out that which they desire.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria)[11.38]:

The last speaker, I believe, is one of the strong advocates of state rights in this Convention. He will remember that the other day the right hon. the Premier of New South Wales challenged the advocates of state rights to define those rights, to put in the bill such rights as they claimed were state rights, and in this very clause 52. Now, I would remind the hon. member, and other hon. members who are interested in obtaining, as far as possible, the right of the states to local self-government, that the question involved in the amendment submitted by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, is one of very great importance indeed. For my part, I think it is one of those state rights which ought to be put in the bill, and not left in any doubt whatever.

Mr. SOLOMON:

Hear, hear; but this is not the right place for it!

Dr. QUICK:

The question whether this is the right or wrong place is a minor question. The question we are dealing with now, and with which we ought, to deal, is whether this state right is to be put into the bill? I shall support the amendment. I do not think the objection raised by the hon. member, Mr. Barton, the revenue objection-is of sufficient importance to justify the rejection, of the amendment, and I will point out the reason why. It is not for one moment suggested that we should take away from the, states the right of imposing liquor laws. Each state will have the right to pass a liquor law—a law for the regulation of liquor. Each state has that right preserved to it under its existing constitution; it consequently has the power reserved to it of reducing the revenue of the commonwealth.
Mr. SOLOMON:
Then where is the necessity for the amendment?

Dr. QUICK:
The second question is, whether the state shall have the additional right of regulating the importation of liquor. I submit that if a state has the right to regulate the sale of liquors produced within its own territory, it also ought to have the right to regulate the sale of liquors imported from other countries.

Mr. SOLOMON:
So they have at the present time!

Dr. QUICK:
No; I do not think they have. I think it is necessary for this amendment to be passed to give the states that right, for, as has already been pointed out, this bill provides that trade and commerce between the various states shall be absolutely free, and this clause is in conflict with that provision, consequently something must be put in to modify, the extreme words " absolutely free."

Mr. SOLOMON:
That is the clause I say it ought to be inserted in!

Dr. QUICK:
I understand that the hon. member, Mr. Solomon, is only arguing that this is the wrong place to put it in that is a minor question; it does not matter whether the amendment is put in here or in clause 89.

Mr. SOLOMON:
There are several other suggested amendments which will come in clause 89!

Dr. QUICK:
That is a matter for the Drafting Committee. I think that this question is one that ought to be considered from a general public federal point of view rather than from a revenue point of view. Serious consequences might follow, as has been suggested by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton; but, in my opinion, the question of local self-government is of more importance than the revenue question, and I believe that there are a large number of people in the states who, if they thought they were going to be deprived of the right of regulating the internal liquor traffic of their states, would vote against a constitution that would deprive them of that right of local self-government. Therefore, I contend that that right ought to be secured and placed beyond all doubt, and it can only be secured, and placed beyond all doubt by providing for it in this constitution bill; therefore, I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[11.42]:
I think this question is a more difficult one than some of the members seem to think. The case of Leisey versus Hardin, decided in America, has shown the necessity of our dealing with this question, because the decision in that case was: that the sale of intoxicating liquors in the original packages in the state was unconstitutional and void. The object of this amendment is to get rid of the effect of that decision.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

There have been later decisions in cases in which the Wilson act was challenged, and that act was upheld. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that it provides a solution of the difficulty.

Mr. GLYNN:

It shows the necessity of making such a provision as the one now suggested; but if that be put in, we shall still be faced with a difficulty out of which we should not ask the Drafting Committee to get us, for it would impose almost a superhuman task on the Drafting Committee to say what amendments are really necessary in this clause. I say this because there have been several decisions from 1885 down to last year on this question under the Canadian act, and we shall be bound by those decisions, because some of them are Privy Council decisions-at the same time, I would remark that the provisions of the Canadian act are not exactly the same. They are for the regulation of trade and commerce, not between states and states, but with other countries; nevertheless, if hon. members read them they will find this-

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

In Canada the central government retains the residue of powers; here they do not!

Mr. GLYNN:

I understand that. One of the grounds of the decision is that a license which amounted, practically, to a prohibition of sale was void-that the residue of powers remained with the central government, and that the local legislatures were limited to such powers as they got by express delegation. But beyond that, there were other grounds: that they had no such power, because it was an interference with the powers of direct taxation conferred on the central government. The upshot of the decision in Canada is that a license that amounts to a prohibition of sale is illegal. I merely mention this for the purpose of showing that you cannot, without considering, this in conjunction with the American cases, say what ought to be done, because clause 89 must be read in conjunction with the sub-clause before us. That is an addition to our difficulty. It does not exist in the case of Canada, and I say, therefore, that we ought to pass this amendment, and ought also to accept the suggestion of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, and postpone the further consideration of the matter until we meet in Melbourne, because if hon. gentlemen will look through a synopsis of the cases to be found in Wheeler's "Confederation of Canada," published only last year, they will come to the conclusion that it is exceedingly difficult to frame such an amendment of this clause as will place beyond all doubt the question whether the power of prohibition by the states of the sale of intoxicating liquor within their boundaries is preserved.

The Hon. H. DOBSON (Tasmania)[11-45]:

I hope that the Committee will agree to the amendment suggested by Victoria, and which has been supported by the hon. and learned mem

The Hon. E. BARTON:

There is no reason why we should not sit five or six weeks, or even longer, in Melbourne!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

I think that we shall get very tired if we sit five or six weeks in Melbourne during the hot summer weather. We are doing our work so well that we shall probably not have to sit so long as that in Melbourne; but, of course, we shall sit there longer if necessary. This question is so important and complicated that I think the Drafting Committee ought to have a little more instruction the question of prohibition. It appears to me that those people in all our states who have quite as earnest convictions on this matter as some of our friends have on the question of deadlocks, will not be satisfied if they think the federal constitution is to put a stop to their getting a measure of prohibition. I presume that a zealous teetotaller is always looking forward to the time when he will convert his fellowmen, and win success, and get a measure of prohibition, and, in my opinion, our constitution will have a very great blot upon it unless we do, apart from the question of revenue, provide some means to enable the states to prohibit the importation of liquor, and I think it would help a solution of the matter very much if the constitution at the same time said that a colony like South Australia or Victoria, which is a wine-producing colony, shall not have that important industry taken away from it, but shall be able to manufacture wine, beer, ale, or spirits, but for export only. So I really think the Drafting Committee have to face an important question, not simply that of the carrying of this amendment, which is a very simple matter. They have to consider the question of providing for the question of prohibition, and, at the same time, for providing for the protection of the natural industries of South Australia.
and Victoria, and making the sale of what they produce in harmony with the prohibition law of any state.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[11-47]:

I shall vote for this addition to the bill. In the province of Nova Scotia, in the Dominion of Canada, there is prohibition, and I think it is only right that each colony should have the power to regulate its own internal affairs.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL (Victoria)[11.48]:

I am in favour of this amendment. I would be willing to follow the advice of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, had not a very important provision been passed by the Committee last night in regard to the appointment of people to high positions, which I shall oppose most strenuously when it comes on for consideration again.

The CHAIRMAN:

The hon. gentleman cannot discuss that matter now.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

I seldom address the Committee, and I think that I might be allowed a little latitude in explaining why I am going to vote as I shall on this occasion. I do not think that any hon. member will impute to me that I have taken up too much time, It has been my continual study throughout the sittings of this Convention not to repeat myself. I am sorry that while I was absent last night the clause to which I have referred was passed. In the present instance I shall vote for the amendment.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales) [11.49]:

Since it is evident that a serious vote must be given on this matter, I wish to add a word or two to what I have already said. In the first place, it is clear that under the provision that all the powers that are not expressly given to the federation are reserved to the states, the power of regulating the consumption of intoxicating liquors is reserved to each state.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Quite so!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Therefore, the question about customs revenue is irrelevant. That is a question of the power that already belongs to the state, it is not a question we can consider at all. The constitution is so framed that these colonies will have the power to do what they like in reference to the consumption of intoxicating drinks within their own boundaries. Therefore, the revenue question is out of court. It is an incident of what we are doing. The value of these observations is that they direct the attention of the Finance Committee to a state of things which must be specially provided for.
Putting aside the revenue matter, as a matter for the Finance Committee to deal with, we have simply to face the proposition that we must make the constitution clear upon that point about which there is no real doubt as to our intentions. Under these circumstances, although I would prefer the matter to be made clear in another clause, as there is going to be a division upon the merits of the case, I shall vote for the insertion of the words.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales)[11.51]:

I intend to vote against the amendment. The question of the customs revenue cannot be lightly disposed of, because as the matter stands now, the state has power to deal with the consumption of liquor within its borders. Under the constitution as it stands, it would be in the same position as the state of Iowa with regard to the law which it passed, that is to say, it might not be able to deal with the importation and sale of original packages, but would still have entire right to control consumption. There may be a great difference between the two powers, and it would make a great difference to the customs revenue-a difference which I do not think we can ignore. With regard to the general merits of the question, I think it would be unwise and impolitic to specially enlarge the powers of the states in dealing with the sale of one class of goods, while their powers are limited with regard to the sale of every other class of goods in relation to the condition of internal politics. If the subject of a sale is anything apart from intoxicating liquors-it may be a poison, or one of a thousand other things-while the state can deal with its sale and consumption within its borders, it cannot prohibit its importation if the commonwealth is to regulate trade and commerce. If you are to take away this power of regulating trade and commerce from the commonwealth in respect to one class of articles, it would be logical to take it away in respect to others.
Imagine the state of chaos which that would produce. You would have given the commonwealth a nominal power to deal with the regulation of trade and commerce; but with the other hand you would have taken it away. If you take it away in regard to this large class of subjects you might take it away with regard to all subjects.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:

There is no power in the commonwealth parliament to deal with this matter, though there is in the federal parliament of the United States!

The Hon. E. Barton:

There is power to regulate trade and commerce, though clause 89 stands somewhat in the way, and I propose to amend that clause so as to prevent the commonwealth parliament from being denuded of the powers it would otherwise have. To give the states power to deal with the importation of a class of goods which are the foundation of the customs revenue in all the colonies, would be an anomalous position to set up. If this power is given in respect to the consumption of alcoholic liquors, you may as well grant it in respect to everything else, and then what becomes of the regulation of trade and commerce by the commonwealth? I suggest that clause 89 should be amended in some such way as will leave the commonwealth in its proper position as the regulator of trade and commerce. Let the states be allowed to deal with the consumption of intoxicating liquors; but do not let them interfere with the trade and commerce of the commonwealth. It does not correctly state the position to say that, by carrying the amendment, you put matters in the position in which they are to-day. Under the commonwealth matters cannot be in the position in which they are to-day. There must be these alterations which are necessitated by the solidification of the states for some purposes, one of which is to give power to the commonwealth to regulate trade and commerce so as to prevent its being hampered by the individual act of anyone state. It is against all principle, and impolitic, to impose a disqualification with regard to this class of goods, which you do not impose with regard to other classes of goods. It would be much more logical to allow the commonwealth to legislate upon the consumption of alcoholic liquors; but that is a power which, I take it, the states will not surrender. In that case, let them be satisfied with the power to deal with the consumption of alcoholic liquors, which they can deal with effectively. Do not let them ask power to control the action of the commonwealth in respect to one of the most essential powers of the commonwealth. If this power is to be given up in regard to one class of goods, let it be given up in regard to all; but, if it is to be retained at all, let it be retained in regard to all.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

It is only in regard to intoxicants that a question of principle arises!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I know that a great many people think that it is against morality to consume alcoholic liquor, while others are actuated by the idea, "I cannot drink, therefore you must not." I am not going to discuss those parts of the question. I want to leave the liquor question as a matter of internal state regulation out of consideration altogether. What I suggest is that the power to regulate consumption which the states possess today, and would possess under the commonwealth, will enable them to do effectually what is wanted. If you give them the power to prohibit importation, this may happen: Goods destined for transit from state A to state C may in some moment of fanaticism be prevented from passing through state B, and thus dealings between state A and state C may be rendered impossible, or else

[P.1054] starts here
very inconvenient, because of the long round about deviation which would be required. Such a state of things would set at nought the powers of the commonwealth to regulate trade. I submit that this cannot, and ought not to be allowed, and that we shall act wisely in negativing the amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales)[11.57]:

I hope that in discussing this matter our views in regard to the liquor traffic will be carefully excluded. I do not know how this question has been dealt with in other parts of the world; but I can see that by giving the states power to forbid the import of liquor you have an absolute abnegation of intercolonial free-trade. We know very well that in dealing with the customs, if you have an ad valorem duty upon only one article, it leads to a wholesale system of espionage, delay, and inconvenience. I fail to see how you can give power to the states to prevent the importation of liquor unless you give them full power over the means of transit, over their borders. Although an affidavit might be given that there was no spirit on board, a train might be stopped on the border while a search was made under the reasonable belief that there was liquor on board. You might have the whole of the border trade of a state interfered with in that way by the officers of the state. Such a state of things would lead indirectly to the re-erection of what would be practically custom-houses on the border. A vital principle connected with federation from the national and commercial point of view is that it will give absolutely free intercourse between the states. Let the states who want to prevent the consumption of intoxicating liquor within their borders provide that all spirits shall go into public bonds. We can make the selling of spirits a matter for the states to regulate.

An Hon. MEMBER:

That is all we ask!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Let the states have power to deal with the consumption of intoxicating liquors within their borders; but do not give them a general power to ransack every means of communication across their borders. No doubt great misconstruction will be placed upon the vote which is to be given upon this question. I am anxious that every state should have its own autonomy. I am very anxious that the liquor traffic should be regulated on purely democratic local option principles. At the same time, I think that by doing it as attempted it might be a great blow at intercolonial free-trade.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[12]:

I think the observations of the hon. member, Mr. Barton, and the hon.
member, Mr. McMillan, were impelled by views of the Tasmanian and Western Australian amendments. But I would like my hon. friend, Mr. Barton, to see whether he cannot vote for the Victorian proposition, which does not seem to be open to the animadversions he has passed on the others. The difference is essential. I quite agree with my hon. friend that the power of the states to regulate the importation—that is to say, the traffic in the sense of conveyance—is a very different matter from the sale of liquor within the state to the people of the state. We have never attempted in our amendment to interfere with the importation or the transit. Our amendment is as follows:-

Add at the end of sub-clause I "Provided that all ferment.

Mr. SOLOMON:

Is that necessary at all? Is there any portion of this bill which gives over the power of the states to the commonwealth to regulate the traffic in liquor inside the boundaries of the states?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Yes, in clause 52. The American decisions are very much in point; but the Canadian decisions do not apply at all. Clause 52, when it confers on the commonwealth parliament power to deal with and regulate commerce between states, impliedly by that excludes the states from making any regulations with regard to inter-state commerce, otherwise they might throw everything into disorder.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

But not traffic within their own boundaries?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No; but the United States decisions are that it is still inter-state commerce, so long as the subject of that commerce remains in the hands of the original importer, and in an unbroken package.

Mr. SYMON:

What you want to do is to regulate the consumption. That is not interfered with!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

As soon as the liquor comes into a state, and goes into consumption or use in the state itself, the state shall have the same power to make regulations with regard to that use or consumption as it can with regard to liquor in its own territory.

Mr. SYMON:

Where is there anything in the constitution to take that power away?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I pointed out earlier in the day that clause 52, subclause I, prevents a state from making any regulation with regard to importation. It remains interstate commerce until the package is broken. Under the decisions of the United States courts, until 1890, when an act of Congress was passed, it was actually held that a state could not insist upon licenses being held for the sale of liquor that still remained in the hands of the original importers and in unbroken packages. It still remained inter-state commerce.

Mr. SYMON:
That is an extraordinary decision!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
It maybe extraordinary at first sight; but the reasons, when looked at, are understandable. Anything else would stop inter-state commerce. Then a bill was passed to enable this difficulty to be got over. When we come to clause 89, providing for absolute freedom of trade, it prevents even the commonwealth parliament from cutting that down. It is necessary to put that in the constitution. In any case, I think this is a fair and reasonable proposal. Looking at it, not as a question of money, but as a question of morality, and in order to disarm a great amount of antagonism that would undoubtedly meet this constitution if we negatived this proposal, it is only right and fair to put this in.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Leaving it to the Drafting Committee to find the proper place to put it?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Yes.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON (Tasmania)[12.7]:
If the hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, is correct, the proposed amendment from Victoria should be altered, so that instead of "or remaining therein" it should read and remaining therein." As the amendment now stands, directly any liquor is imported within the borders of the state, or it may be imported only to pass through, it becomes liable to the laws of that state, and those laws might involve the destruction of the liquor.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Only to the same extent as liquor produced in that state!

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
It might be that the state law would prohibit the export of any liquor or its manufacture.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
That is a point for the Drafting Committee!

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[12.8]:
I have tried to understand this matter, but my lay mind is unable to understand the position even now. I take it that this Commonwealth Bill is intended to give to the federal parliament power to deal with the importation all round our boundaries of spirits and wines. My desire is to give a vote which will allow the state parliament to deal with the sale of liquor in that state, and to regulate the sale.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The amendment will allow that!

Mr. LYNE:
Or what is commonly known as the question of local option. I know of nothing in this bill at the present time which will prevent the states parliament from dealing with any liquor that may be imported into a state, and which remains there. I was under the impression that no matter how much liquor was imported into a state, that liquor would be dealt with as if it were manufactured in the state.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Not unless you pass this amendment!

Mr. LYNE:
The leader of the Convention and the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, have both taken a line of argument to show that this will interfere very much with the customs duties on the various borders. Suppose that in New South Wales the local optionists prohibited the manufacture of wine, whiskey, or other Spirits.

Mr. SYMON:
That would only be done by the prohibitionists!

Mr. LYNE:
A great many would do so at the present time. In Victoria they manufacture wine and brandy, and they manufacture other spirits. Would we have to keep customs officers along the border in order to ascertain what spirits come into this colony from Victoria?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Possibly!

Mr. LYNE:
According to the arguments of the hon. member, Mr. Barton, and the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, if you pass this amendment you must know all the spirits that come from Victoria, to New South Wales for all time, in order that the sale of those spirits can be regulated by the state laws. If that is so and I do not wish to be misunderstood in the vote I shall give on the question-I shall certainly vote against the proposal.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
This proposal will only make spirits coming from Victoria capable of being dealt with in the same manner as you have decided to deal with your own spirits!

Mr. LYNE:
How are we to keep a record of them? How are we to check them?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
You do not need to check them at all. All liquor would be treated the same wherever it came from!

Mr. LYNE:
Does the hon. member mean to tell me that there is any provision in the constitution which will prevent them being dealt with in the same manner?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Yes; the American decision shows it!

Mr. LYNE:
If that is so I should be quite prepared to vote for the amendment; but I want the Drafting Committee to make it absolutely clear that there shall be no check on free interchange across the borders between one state and another. If that is done I am quite prepared to accept the amendment, provided that the legal interpretation is correct.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
What is wanted by the amendment is to give certain powers of dealing with the sale as well as the consumption. The states at present have every power of dealing with the consumption of alcoholic liquors, and the constitution will give them every power. What is asked for here is that, inasmuch as they might have to deal with the importation, there shall be a power which will enable them to deal with the sale of goods in the package in which they are imported into the state.

Mr. LYNE:
Yes. The leader of the Convention says it is desirable to give the state power to prevent the importation. I do not want to give the state that power.

Mr. SYMON:
But this would do it!

Mr. LYNE:
One leading barrister on one side says it will do it, and another leading barrister on the other side says it will not. I do not think that, as between states, anything of this kind should take place.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
If the hon. member crossed the border, they would ransack his baggage, and see if he had any spirits in it!

Mr. LYNE:
I do not think that, as between states, that should be done. I wish it to be clearly understood that we are not voting against leaving to the state the power of dealing with the regulation and the consumption of spirits inside the colony. I want to give a vote which will prevent the possibility of a state interfering with the importation, through the customs, of spirits. When it comes into the state, let the state have the control and the sale of it, but nothing further.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[12.14]:

With all due deference to the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, it seems to me that the amendment goes very much further than is intended, and the difficulty present in the mind of the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, is a real and substantial one. Undoubtedly the power which will be reserved to the state under the amendment would be a power which might be exercised to prevent all importation of liquor into the state. The position is this: that the state is to have the same power of dealing with imported liquor as with liquor manufactured within its own boundaries. That is clear, and, of course, on the face of it, there will be no difficulty; but the state will have the power of prohibiting the manufacture of liquor within its own boundaries, and of prohibiting the sale. The result under the amendment will be that it will have the power of prohibiting importation.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

We all agree to that!

Mr. SYMON:

If the Committee intend that shall be the result, so far so good; but if we adopt that course, and give this power of absolute prohibition to the state - a prohibition of sale which will be equivalent to a prohibition of importation-we give to the state the power of cutting away the whole of the customs duties arising-from the importation of those particular articles. That would disarrange and dislocate the whole of our fiscal policy. That, surely, cannot be the intention of the Committee for one moment.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Where are state rights now?

Mr. SYMON:

The state rights are ample. The national power which is handed over is the power of controlling the customs revenue. If we hand over that which lies at the very basis of the federal system we band over that power. That we have agreed to give. That is a state right which we have surrendered; but if we surrender it with the one hand much as we value the rights of the states, we do not want to go through the extreme farce of taking it back with the other; and that is

The Hon. E. BARTON:
That is mere consumption!

Mr. SYMON:
Yes, consumption. Then it should be left entirely unrestricted, and that of course does not affect the substratum of all our federal system, namely, the control of customs and excise.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Without this amendment it would be so under the bill!

Mr. SYMON:
That is what I venture to think; but if the desire of the Convention is to hand over to the state the power of abolishing the importation, manufacture, as well as the consumption of all liquor in the state, we ought to do it with our eyes open. I am not in favour of that, for the reason, as I say, that it cuts away the whole of the power of the national government over the federal customs in respect of that particular and prolific source of revenue. Without going into the question of the different views as to the consumption or use of alcoholic liquors, it is essential that power should be preserved to the respective states. The proposal, however, is going a great deal too far if it is to have the effect of retaining in the states the power of withdrawing from the federal government a very large portion of their revenue.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[12.19]:
I understand the effect of the American decision is this: that if we retain the bill in its present shape we cannot prohibit the sale within a state by an importer of alcoholic liquor in the original package.

Mr. SYMON:
Why should we?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Or even to require a license for the sale!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
Thus the position is this: that the state in South Australia could legislate to prevent a winegrower selling to a third party a cask of wine of his own manufacture; but if that cask of wine were imported from another colony he could sell it without restriction. The position is monstrous, and I shall vote for the amendment.

Question-That the words (Victorian amendment) proposed to be inserted be so inserted-put. The Committee divided:

Ayes, 28; noes, 11; majority, 17.

AYES.
Abbott, Sir Joseph Higgins, H.B.
Berry, Sir G. Holder, F.W.
Briggs, H. Howe, J.H.
Question so resolved in the affirmative. The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[12.25]: I wish to refer to a question of considerable importance that has been discussed before, but for which, so far, no provision has been made. I want to put in these words:

And the parliament may provide for the prohibition of the introduction of vegetable and animal diseases from one state to another.

This is very important to all the colonies, and it is important in a great degree to the colony of New South Wales. I do not want to take up time, but I should like to have these words inserted as an instruction to the Drafting Committee. At present the different colonies have these powers; but when the commonwealth comes into existence, under the clause relating to the equality of trade, any regulation or law made to this effect will be null and void. I would ask the representatives of all the colonies, what would that mean? We have at present unfortunately, decimating the herds of an adjoining colony, a disease known as "tick fever," which the people of New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia proper, do not mean to allow to be admitted within their borders.

Mr. HIGGINS: You want to prevent the stock from coming in!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
We want the federal parliament to have that power if it pleases. Under this bill it will not have that power.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Why is it not sufficient to let the state protect itself?

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
I do not think this Committee is favourable to giving the state that power.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
It has got it, as to disease from abroad!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
No, it has not. I would be glad if the hon. and learned member could point out where the state has that power.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
If the hon. member will look at clause 106, which is one adopted from the American Constitution, he will see that it provides:

After uniform duties of customs have been imposed, a state shall not levy any impost or charge on imports or exports, except such as may be necessary for executing the inspection laws of the state.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
That does not go as far as prohibition!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
I thought the hon. and learned member would probably allude to that clause, and I think he will see that it only gives the power of inspection, and the power to charge fees for inspection, and does not give the power to prohibit.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
There will be power on the part of a state to prohibit!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
There will not be such a power, because any law made by a State, or even by the commonwealth parliament, which may have the effect of derogating from the freedom of trade or commerce will be absolutely null and void. A law prohibiting the passing of cattle over the border of Queensland into New South Wales will, to a great extent, interfere with freedom of trade. A law prohibiting the introduction of vines into South Australia, where we have no phylloxera, and where we mean to keep free from that scourge, would be interfering undoubtedly with freedom of commerce.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The leader of the Convention has said that he intends to amend clause 89!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
As long as I have an undertaking that the leader of the Convention will,
in any clause he may choose to name, provide for the placing of this very necessary power in the hands of the federal parliament, I am satisfied. I would rather see the power in the hands of the states, and in Adelaide I tried to get that brought about, but the Constitutional Committee were against me.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
I think the states would be the best authority!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
I endeavoured to enforce that view as a member of the Constitutional Committee in Adelaide, but I failed to do so. It was pointed out to me that if the power were left in the hands of a state it might use it in such a way as not only to protect itself from disease, but to derogate from freedom of trade and commerce, and to set up protection for certain producers within its own boundaries.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I intend when we reach clause 89 to move an amendment which may possibly satisfy the hon. member. Would it not be well to take the discussion upon that clause?

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
We have discussed, and arrived at a decision upon, the matter which has just been under consideration, and I do not see why we should not now arrive at a decision upon this question. It is a matter of vital concern to New South Wales. This colony does not want tick fever, and there must be some power to prohibit its introduction into the colony, by giving this power to the commonwealth parliament or to the state parliaments. If we do not adopt some means of preventing the ravages of disease, not only the stock owners of New South Wales, but the owners of the dairy herds of Victoria, and the vignerons and fruit-growers of South Australia will be found resisting federation, no matter what its advantages may be, feeling, as they might, that federation would be not only an opportunity for the introduction of freedom of trade but for the spread of disease. We should have my right hon. friend, Sir John Forrest, also protesting—and we know that he has taken measures which are, if anything, too stringent, to protect Western Australia from these pests; we know that he is keenly sensitive in these matters, from a desire to keep his colony free from disease. I wish to save a repetition of the debate, and, therefore, I would suggest that words should be inserted in this clause. They will be an intimation to the Drafting Committee to insert suitable words in any clause they may think proper. The words I propose to insert are to this effect:

And the parliament may provide for the prohibition of the introduction of vegetable or animal disease from one state to another.
The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[12.34]:

With regard to tick and other diseases, it will undoubtedly be the first duty of the commonwealth parliament to localise any disease of the kind.
In South America they have localised the tick, and in Queensland it is now localised. In Queensland they will not allow cattle to travel south of a certain parallel; and if Queensland can localise a disease, would not the dominion parliament be also likely to take a similar course if it were found that any plague of the kind were not localised?
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

I am proposing now to give power to do that!
The Hon. S. FRASER:

The time is now when the tick scare is passed and gone. Inoculation is pretty well known to have been a complete success, so that, as far as that particular disease is concerned, there need be no great alarm. Queensland is much more in advance in the matter than was Texas, where they had the plague for a hundred years. In Queensland Dr. Hunt and others have been taking steps to guard against the spread of the disease, and they have been eminently successful.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[12.36]

leave it to the state parliaments instead of to the commonwealth parliament to deal with this matter. I am rather under the impression that the states would know best to what extent the introduction of disease would affect them. The commonwealth parliament will have to deal not with local but with national interests, and I think it would be better, therefore, to leave this matter in the hands of the individual states.
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

When I made that proposal in Adelaide it was pointed out that the states might misuse the power!
The Hon. E. BARTON:

If the power exists at all it should exist in the hands of the state subject to its being annulled if it be found that the regulations made are merely a cover for fiscal change, and are not for the bond fide purpose of excluding a disease.
The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

I should be very much better pleased, if the leader of the Convention will assist me in the matter, to see this power placed in the hands of the state parliaments!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
The Drafting Committee will have time to-morrow to deal with various matters, and I think we shall be able then to frame a clause which can be considered by the Convention on Friday, dealing with the hon. members suggestion.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

I merely wished to save time now. I feel that the common-sense of the Convention will insist that some power of the kind should be given to some authority in the commonwealth.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[12.38]:

Surely the states have not taken from them the right to pass such measures as would be necessary for the health of their citizens and their flocks and herds. I think it would be monstrous to say that this constitution extended, so as to prohibit that which is peculiarly a state interest, from being adequately protected.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[12.39]:

As I shall not be here after today, I should like to say as to this matter that, no doubt, the leader of the Convention, and my hon. friends who are associated with him upon the Drafting Committee, will give consideration to the question whether it is necessary and advisable to put in special words as to the states' right to do a certain thing of this kind, that is, by way of specifying it in this instance, and omitting the specification of a thousand and one other instances of equal importance. I think that we should frame our constitution carefully, so as not to take away the rights of the states in such a matter as this. My hon. friends will also bear in mind the immense power that, in the United States Constitution, there is still residing in the states over such a case as this, under what are known as police powers. Under those police powers the states have, as has been held by the highest tribunal of the United States, the fullest means of protecting the lives, the health, the safety, and the comfort of their residents, so long as they do not entrench upon the specific powers given to the United States Central Government, for the benefit of the general community. It has always power to draw the line between the two, and a great number of decisions have been given, and it is admitted that the Supreme Court of the United States has held the balance fairly. Questions have arisen from time to time as to how far the states have exceeded their powers when they have excluded paupers, criminals, and goods, and every time the courts have strenuously upheld the rights of the states to do it, so long as they do that in honest and bona fide protection of their own citizens; but, wherever their actions went beyond that, and entrenched on the inter-state commerce provisions of the constitution entrenched upon the provisions that applied to the national government—the court has not failed to put down its strong hand, and insisted that the statute of the state was unconstitutional, and in that way has held the balance fairly. So long as that is done, while giving the commonwealth parliament the fullest power to protect the national interests, I think there will be no difficulty in the state protecting its own individual interests the same as the states of the United States do now.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)[12.42]:

It may be interesting for the hon. and learned member, Dr. Cockburn, to hear this very concise statement of the law of the United States, which would be exactly applicable to this proposed constitution, and very much on the lines that the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, has just stated. I am citing from a well-known book, Ordronaux's "Constitutional Legislation." At page 296 he says this:

By, parity of reason addressed to the protection of the public health, states may exercise their police powers to the extent of prohibiting both persons and animals, when labouring under contagious diseases, from entering their territory. They may pass any sanitary laws deemed necessary for this purpose, and enforce them by appropriate regulations. It is upon this reserved right of self-protection that quarantines are permitted to interfere with the freedom of commerce and of human intercourse. But this power is not without its limitations, and its exercise must be restricted to directly impending dangers to health, and not to those who are only contingent and remote. Hence, while diseased persons or diseased animals, and those presumably so from contact with infected bodies or localities, may be prevented from entering a state, any general law of exclusion, measured by months, or operating in such a way as to become a barrier to commerce or travel, would be a regulation of commerce forbidden by the constitution. Such a statute being more than a quarantine regulation, transcends the legitimate powers of a state.

So it is quite clear that all the powers are left in the state, which are necessary for the preservation of the health of the inhabitants and of the property by the state. Those powers would include power to deal with such diseases in the vegetable world as the hon. and learned member; Dr. Cockburn, has spoken of, and also with animal diseases. It was suggested in Adelaide that these powers might be used in such a way as to have a protective influence in favour of certain states.

Mr. SYMON:

That would be in conflict with the constitution!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

I was going to point that out. There are a number of decisions in America, as has been pointed out by my hon. and learned friend, in which on that very ground or similar grounds it has been held that the law, not being a bona fide exercise of the police powers, is not within the powers of the state. Of course, there is another question behind all that, which I think is a very important one, that is, considering the immense traffic, say, in cattle, that there is right across this continent, the infrequency of habitation, and the difficulties of enforcing the quarantine laws from state to state, whether such a disease, for instance, as the tick disease should be dealt with by the authority of the commonwealth instead of by the states themselves. It is a very important question, and there are many difficulties in the way of its being dealt with by the federal authority. One of the chief of them is, I think, the impossibility of the federal authority administering an act of that kind without having an enormous array of officials and immense expenditure. As we all know, there are in each colony laws-affecting contagious diseases of cattle or sheep, and they are all administered by local bodies, The machinery and administration are simple, and the laws are cheaply worked in the various districts themselves. But if you place them under the federal movement, to be operated by federal officers, you render an immense machinery necessary to carry out the very simple objects which are carried out by the local bodies at the present time. It appears to me that the balance of reason is in favour of leaving things as they are, leaving power in the states to deal with all those matters that come under the head of police powers in the United States, the infection of animals, the infection of vegetables, the introduction of, animal and vegetable diseases. There is ample power to deal with them, and I think that the matter might be left in that way.

The CHAIRMAN:

I would point out that there is no question of quarantine or quarantine regulations before the Committee.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[12.47]:

I think we should renew this debate at some future period. In reply to the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, I may say that I am not at all sure that our proposed constitution does not go further in reference-to free-trade between the states than the American Constitution does, and therefore, it might require some further provision in view of the very strong words which it contains, although such a provision might not be necessary in America. Words simply prohibiting the introduction of actual disease would not be sufficient. I admit that the decision which has been quoted relates also to anything that has been in contact with any disease in anyway. But it would be necessary in many cases actually to prohibit the introduction of all cattle and all vegetables of a certain character. If Queensland were to relax her local quarantine regulations, it might be necessary for the adjoining colony to prohibit a single hoof of cattle from crossing the border, and this might be held to be an absolute derogation from freedom of trade, unless there were special provision in the constitution dealing with it. It might be necessary for South Australia to prevent the importation of any portion of a vine, and this might be said to seriously derogate from freedom of trade between the colonies. I ask the Drafting Committee to be exceedingly careful in the matter. I think the power does not exist, and I am sure that it should exist for otherwise we should find that the opposition to this constitution bill, if it is assumed that there is no such power given, would be of a very fierce and vehement character.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[12.49]:

I think that I can reassure the hon. and learned member to some extent. He has raised an important point, and I do not think that we should reserve these important points until we meet in Melbourne, but should settle them now if we can do so.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

In how many weeks? We have not finished one provision in two and a half hours!

Mr. HIGGINS:

But this is one of the most important parts of the bill. I think it is our duty, not to have tentative solutions, but to make the best solution we can, and I feel, now that this question has been raised, it is our duty to devote ourselves to it. The hon. member is quite right in saying that the proposed bill goes further in the direction of providing for free intercourse and freedom of trade between the states than does the American Constitution. It goes much further.

An Hon. MEMBER:

By reason of the general words in clause 89. It is proposed to eliminate those words!

Mr. HIGGINS:

Yes; I made a note of that. It is perfectly clear that under the American Constitution a state can make a law preventing the sale within its own borders of animals having any disease, and to prevent the introduction of such animals, into its territory.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
There is no doubt about that!

Mr. HIGGINS:

The hon. and learned member is quite right in saying that if clause 89 remains as it is the states of the Australasian commonwealth will have no such power. A good example of the application of this law in America is given at page 104 of Baker's "Annotated Constitution of the United States":

The statute of Minnesota approved April 16th, 1889, entitled "An act for the protection of the public health, by providing for inspection, before slaughtering of cattle, sheep, and swine designed for slaughter for human food" is unconstitutional and void in so far as it requires, as a condition of sales in Minnesota of fresh beef, veal, mutton, lamb, or pork for human food, that the animals from which such meats are taken shall have been inspected in that state before being slaughtered. The inspection thus provided for is of such a character, or is burdened with such conditions, as will prevent the introduction into the state of sound meats, the product of animals slaughtered in other states.

To make an inspection law was prima facie within the powers of the state of Minnesota; but the state legislature went beyond its powers in enacting an act which provided for an inspection of such a character as to interfere with the sale in Minnesota of meat brought from other states. Under the bill, as it stands, measures to prevent the introduction of tick will be beyond the powers of the states to enact. Under the American Constitution, full power is given to provide against the introduction of tick into a state; but if in preventing the introduction of tick or other disease, an undue interference with the course of trade is created, which protects one state against the other states, the courts will interfere, and say

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[12.53]:

I intimated a little earlier - I do not know that the hon. and learned member, Dr. Cockburn, heard me—that I intended to make clause 89 read in this way:

So soon as uniform duties of customs have been imposed, trade and intercourse throughout the commonwealth is not to be restricted or interfered with by any taxes, charges, or imposts.

If this amendment is made, the matter maybe considered in connection with clause 99, which provides that:

All powers which at the establishment of the commonwealth are vested in the parliaments of the several colonies, and which are not by this constitution exclusively vested in the parliament of the commonwealth, or withdrawn from the parliaments of the several states, are reserved to, and shall remain vested in, the parliaments of the states respectively.

At the present time this power exists in all the states; but if the amendments I have suggested be carried the prohibition of the importation of diseased animals or plants will not be a matter of taxes, charges, or impost. Therefore, the power to prevent the introduction of diseases would still remain with the states, except in so far as any state law was found to be an intentional derogation from the freedom of trade. I think that if we amend clause 89 in the way I suggest the object of the hon. and learned member, Dr. Cockburn, will be met; but if it is not met I will undertake to deal with the matter in any way that he suggests.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
I am quite satisfied!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[12.56]:
Will the hon. and learned member also take note in this connection of the concluding words of clause 95? That clause must be brought into accord with clause 89 as amended. I would also point out with regard to the word "country" that some little difference of opinion may arise as to the meaning of that word. The sub-clause relates to "countries" and to "states." "States" we know are such parts of Australia as are within the commonwealth. If any colony stands out it may be a little doubtful whether it will be a "country." Would Queensland, if it stood out, be a "country"?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
A territory would be either a state of the commonwealth, or another country!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The word "country" might mean an independent state.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I will keep the matter in mind, though I fancy it is all right!

Sub-clause 1 agreed to.

Sub-clause 2. Customs and excise and bounties, but so that duties of customs and excise and bounties shall be uniform throughout the commonwealth, and that no tax or duty shall be imposed on any goods exported from one state to another:

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales:
To leave out the words "Customs and excise and bounties, but."

The Hon. E. BARTON:
It was intended by this amendment to make subclauses 1 and 2 read together in this way:

The regulation of trade and commerce with other countries, and among the several states; so that duties of customs and excise and bounties shall be uniform throughout the commonwealth, and that no tax or duty shall be imposed on any goods exported from one state to another.

The object was to confine the regulation of trade and commerce to the enforcement of uniformity in duties. That was one reason; but I am bound to say that there was another reason. It was stated by one or more gentlemen concerned in the amendment, that it was the preliminary step to the prevention of the commonwealth having anything to do with the collection of customs duties.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[2.2]:

I wish to draw attention to the very important question of excise. A very valuable report has been drawn up in Victoria by an Accountants Committee, composed of gentlemen of considerable experience and recognised worth, namely, the Secretary for Trade and Customs, Dr. Wollaston; Deputy Commissioner of Taxes, Mr. Bruford; Accountant of the Treasury, Mr. S.T. Allen; Acting Accountant, Post and Telegraph Department, Mr. Cumming; Assistant Government Statist, Mr. Fenton. At the request of the Government they drew up a report which will be found valuable, in connection with the financial proposals generally. On this particular clause there is a very full reference to the meaning of the word excise." At the present day the word excise " has a very much wider meaning than we intend in this bill. It includes in England all auctioneers' licenses, gun licenses, licenses of various descriptions, taxes on carriages.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Does it not include those by definition?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I do not think so. What we intend by excise would be covered by the definition in this report, "a duty chargeable on the manufacture and production of commodities." The word is variously defined in standard dictionaries. We should give attention to this matter, so as not to be carried further than we intend to go. In modern times, excise is used as a very wide term.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

In the American Constitution do they not use the words "customs and excise"?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I do not think so in this sense. They get all their powers under the heading "regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the several states."
The Hon. E. BARTON:

May I refer the hon. member to the second part of the first paragraph of section 8 of the United States Constitution, in which it is provided that duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States. It is quite clear that the word "excises" is used there in the sense of excise on the manufacture of commodities. It has been held all along that it does not interfere with the regulation of trade by way of licenses by the states.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The word "excise" has a different meaning I am sure. It is called in some work "internal revenue." The word "excise," as used in the American Constitution at that time, would probably have a very different meaning from what we now understand by it. I should like to direct the hon. member's attention to the latter part of the sub-clause. After stating that the customs, excise, and bounties should be in the competency of the federal parliament, and providing for uniformity, it goes on to say, "and that no tax or duty shall be imposed on any goods exported from one state to another." A little difficulty exists in the minds of some people as to what relation that bears to customs, excise, and bounties. It would be worth considering whether it should be placed under that provision at all. In the United States it is under another department altogether and has a different relation. The provision there is in section 9 of article 1, sub-clause 5. That sub-clause is included among the powers which are denied to the United States; that is to say, powers which are expressly kept back from the federal parliament, and it is intended to say to them, "While you have in general terms plenary powers as to commerce between the various states and between the states and other countries, yet you must not put on an export duty in respect of any goods exported from a state, no matter to what place the exportation goes. Putting the provision in this place may be the means of giving it a different meaning. First of all, it is limited to goods exported from one state to another, so that it would be open to put an export duty on goods going, say, from South Australia to England or to any other place not being in the commonwealth.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Would that be objectionable?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

An export duty could not be imposed on goods coming from one state and not on the same goods coming from another state.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

An export duty would not, I take it, be customs. It would hardly be excise, and it would not be a bounty. I will not be here to-morrow, and perhaps I may be permitted to draw attention to clause 106. That clause would not under the decisions of the United States courts, apply to any exports or imports between states. It applies solely to imports and exports as between the commonwealth and foreign countries. It is important to remember that. In connection, too, with what the hon member, Dr. Cockburn, said this morning, it would hardly apply to meet the case he wanted as between the colonies; but under a well known decision of the United States courts it is restricted to the case of imports from abroad.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

How will that limit the construction so that it will apply only to exports to foreign countries, and not to a state?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The history of the case to which I refer was gone into by a learned judge-Justice Miller. He said that the reason of it was this: that a state was not to be allowed to levy any charge upon goods coming into the commonwealth from abroad, except for the purpose of executing the inspection laws of the state; that it was part and parcel of the United States Constitution; that in no case should a state have the right to put a duty on as between itself and any other states; but it had a right to protect itself from imports from foreign countries, so far as was necessary to execute its police powers. He went into the history of the whole matter. It would take up too much time to go through it now; but I will give my hon. and learned friend the name of the case and the reference, and he will find from the judgment that the whole matter is dealt with in a masterly manner, historically, and legally.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Will the hon. member point out any objection to a state being allowed to impose an export duty on its own products, so long as between the states the interchange on that product is free?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

There is no case that I know of where the state would be allowed to impose an export duty.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Is there any reason why it should not be so?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It would interfere with the commerce as between the commonwealth and other countries, or between the state and other states, and the object of the Commonwealth Bill here, as of the United States Constitution there, in respect of trade and commerce, is to have uniformity of trade as soon as that trade ceases to be confined to the limits of the particular state. In relation to other countries the United States is one. In relation to the other states, no state is to get a preference; therefore, it is, in fact, according to the constitution itself, and according to the decisions, undoubted law that as long as the state commerce is internal no one has a right to say that it shall not be under the control of the state. As soon as it ceases to be confined to the state itself it then comes under the general supervision of the national government.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

It would take away the power to make commercial treaties if one state had a right to impose an export duty!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Yes. I have made these observations because it seemed to me important to bear the matter in mind.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[2.17]:

I am very much obliged to the hon. member for pointing out these matters. The first part of his remark, taken in connection with the able paper which has been written by the hon. gentleman whom he named, will, I think be a great assistance to the Convention. As far as the drafting matter is concerned I think we may promise that we will see if there is an necessity

In the earliest English excise ordinances, introduced by Pym, in 1643, the excise duty imposed was on the manufacture of commodities; but since that date, there have been constant additions to the taxable list.

That is illustrated by references to the cases in English legislation, in which the name of "excise" has been applied, even to such cases as licenses granted to auctioneers. The paper goes on to say:

Although in Great Britain the original meaning of the word is being restored to that which it bore in Pyms ordinance-and the substitution of Inland Revenue Commissioners for Excise Commissioners is evidence of this-yet the meaning is not sufficiently certain to allow of the word standing without a definition, and we would suggest that it should be defined as follows: "Excise' shall mean the duty chargeable on the manufacture and production of commodities."

They go on to show that, in all the tables they use, they have adopted that meaning. I am rather under the impression that, looking at the interpretations which have been given to excise in the sense in which that term is used in the Constitution of the United States-and we know that the meaning given to it has been such as not to interfere with the regulation of their own internal concerns by the states on such matters as the granting of licenses to hawkers, auctioneers, and so on-I am rather of the opinion that the use of the word as it occurs in this bill will be held to carry with it the same meaning; but, if on consideration we find there is any doubt about that, I think it will be a comparatively easy matter to provide for it. I quite recognise the force of the remarks of the hon. member with regard to clause 106.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:

I may mention that the cases to which I refer are those of Woodruff versus Parham (8 Wall 123), and Brown versus Houston (114 U.S. Ref.). The first case is the one, if I remember rightly, in which Justice Miller delivered judgments showing the whole of the reasons.

Amendment negatived; sub-clause 2 agreed to.

Sub-clause 3. Raising money by any other mode or system of taxation; but so that all such taxation shall be uniform throughout the commonwealth.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales:

That sub-clause 3 be omitted.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales)[2.19]:

This is another matter in which the Legislative Council of New South Wales were under the impression that too much revenue-raising power would be given to the commonwealth, and that the result would be over-taxation. I urged, without avail, that, if the commonwealth had to raise a certain amount of money, if it had not the right to raise it by other sources of revenue than customs, it would still raise the same amount, and the aggregate of taxation would be the same, but that argument did not prevail.

Amendment negatived; sub-clause 3 agreed to.

Sub-clause 4 (Borrowing money on the public credit of the commonwealth) agreed to.

Sub-clause 5. Postal, telegraphic, telephonic, and other like services.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia:

At end of sub-clause add, "outside the limits of the commonwealth."

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia:

At end of sub-clause add, "outside the limits of any state."

The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest (Western Australia)[2.21]:

The reason why this proposal came from the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia was that there seemed to be a general opinion that postal and telegraph matters inside the colony could be better managed by the local government than by the federal government, especially at the present time, and for many years to come. I do not mean to say that if we were a settled country, with all our telegraph lines built, or the main portion of them, there would be any necessity for this proposal. But, seeing that these colonies are only in their infancy, and that their post and telegraph systems are part of the social life of the community, it seemed to us that to intrust to a far away authority the building of telegraph lines and the extension of postal services, would be most vexatious. When we wanted to build a line of telegraph for a distance of 10 or 12 miles, or to establish a new post-office, perhaps only a dozen miles away from an existing post office, it would be obviously inconvenient to have to communicate with the central government. It seemed to us that to intrust local requirements of that kind what might be called every day occurrences to a far away authority would be vexatious, and lead to a great deal of friction. Although there may, perhaps, be some objection to this proposal, still, I feel sure that in all the colonies, and especially in the colony I represent, there is a very strong feeling that we should not hand over the local post and telegraph services to the control of the commonwealth. We quite admit that it is of national importance that there should be a federal union in regard to the post and telegraph services, and, as a matter of fact, such a union now exists. As far as the commonwealth is concerned, it is not necessary to have a federal government in order to federalise the post and telegraph services, because they are federalised at the present time. There is a thorough understanding, not only between these colonies, but throughout the whole of the British Empire, and indeed I may say throughout the world, in regard to the post and telegraph services. Everyone knows of the Postal Union, and I think every one of the colonies is now embraced in that union. So that there would be no advantage in a federal control of the post and telegraph services, because in this respect we are already federalised. But while we are federalised, and have all the advantages of federal Union in regard to postal matters, money orders, and all things appertaining to that service, still we have complete control over our own telegraph system, the building of telegraphs, and the arrangement of our postal services. For my part, I see no reason why the present system should not continue, as it works exceedingly well, and there is no friction between the colonies with regard to postal matters. They have conferences now and again to arrange matters, and I see no reason why the present system should not continue, instead of the service being handed over to the federal government. There maybe reasons why it should be part of the federal machinery. If that is the case, the only course open to us is to ask that the federal government shall have power only outside the limits of the commonwealth, and should have no authority within the states, with regard to these matters.

amendment) be so added-put. The Committee divided:

      Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia:
      Transpose words "military" and "naval."
      The Hon. E. BARTON:
      This is a matter, I think, which it would be well to leave to the Drafting Committee.
      Sub-clause agreed to.
      Sub-clause 8 agreed to.
      Sub-clause 9. Ocean beacons and buoys, and ocean lighthouses and lightships.
      Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania:
      Omit "ocean," wherever occurring.
      The Hon. N.J. BROWN (Tasmania)[2.32]:
      The reasons given, I believe, for omitting the word "ocean" were placed before the Tasmanian legislature by a nautical gentleman who has taken part in several conferences on lighthouses and other matters under the control of the Marine Board. He pointed out that it was absolutely impossible to define what was an ocean light and what was not.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I presume the word "ocean" is used to make a distinction between ocean and river beacons!

The Hon. N.J. BROWN:
The gentleman to whom I refer, a member of the Marine Board at Hobart, said that he had come to the conclusion, which I have mentioned, as the result of the experience of the board—that often what was from one point of view a river beacon or light was from another point of view an ocean light, and vice versa. He said that if it were intended to place all these matters under the control of the federal authority, as he presumed it was, he recommended strongly for the reasons I have given that the word "ocean" should be struck out. I do not profess to have any technical knowledge of the subject. I simply state the reasons which were advanced for striking out the word.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[2.34]:
I think this amendment is quite right. We hope to see some of our navigable rivers, if not the whole of them, under the control of the Commonwealth, and the clause as it stands would limit too strictly the definition. The commonwealth would not be able to interfere with some small buoy or beacon on some out of the way stream unless the stream was under its control, and if the stream were under its control it would be necessary that it should have control of buoys and beacons.

The Hon. J. HENRY (Tasmania)[2.35]:
I think this amendment deserves some consideration. I very much regret that the right hon. the Premier of New South Wales did not comply with my suggestion that the report of a commission of marine experts dealing with this question, which was presented some three or four years ago, should be laid upon the table. In that report the marine experts say that they experienced the greatest difficulty in distinguishing between what were ocean lights and what were harbour lights. As to buoys and beacons, I fail to see why the federal government should have control over buoys and beacons at all. I am not aware of any ocean buoys and beacons. All that I am acquainted with are confined to harbours.

Mr. SOLOMON:
No, take Torres Straits!

The Hon. J. HENRY:
Are they ocean beacons?

Mr. SOLOMON:

Yes!

The Hon. J. HENRY:

I was not aware of that. There is a number of beacons in Port Philip, which may be regarded as an inland sea, and it would be most difficult in that case to distinguish them from ocean beacons. The commission to which I refer found it so difficult to distinguish between ocean and harbour lights that they gave the thing up in despair.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

When was their report presented?

The Hon. J. HENRY:

Some three or four years ago, I understand. The report was not printed; but I think the papers are available in this colony. A similar difficulty to that experienced by this commission of experts may be experienced by the federal parliament when they come to inquire into what are ocean and what are harbour lights, and also as to what are ocean buoys and beacons. If there be any ocean beacons in Torres Straits, the federal parliament might have control of them; but if you take the ordinary buoys and beacons in Port Phillip, for instance, which is an inland sea, they should be under the control of the local marine authorities. I think it would be better to strike out the word "ocean" altogether, and to allow the federal parliament to take over the control of all lighthouses. It is obvious that buoys and beacons can be best managed and controlled by the local marine authorities. I forget what the figures were; but I think it was found that there were 200 or 300 lighthouses in regard to which the commission was unable to distinguish and separate harbour from ocean lights.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS (Tasmania)[2.38]:

I am afraid the same difficulty will arise if you strike out the word "ocean." Ocean buoys and beacons are properly in the hands of the federal government; but it is not intended that their control shall apply to harbours. In Tasmania, we have some navigable rivers. At the heads are what may be termed ocean lights; but, if you take the Tamar from beginning to end of the 30 or 40 miles of river, you will find a number of buoys and beacons. There is one almost every half mile or mile, and it seems absurd that these should be handed over to the federal government. On the other hand, ocean lights are easily defined. On going up Port Phillip Bay, you find buoys and beacons in all directions, and surely they are not to be put under the federal government? They should be under the local harbour trust. The gentleman at whose instance this Amendment has been made—who profess to be a navigator has had some little difficulty in connection with these matters in connection with the Marine Board. These are really local matters, and can only be effectually managed by the local harbour trust. This question was well considered by a portion of the Tasmanian Parliament, who could not agree with the suggestion made by the Legislative Assembly. I hope that the word "ocean" will not be struck out.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[2.41]:

The insertion of the word "ocean" is intended to preserve the line of demarcation that generally exists between federal powers and state powers, the commonwealth being intrusted with matters that are external, and matters of internal regulation, being intrusted to the several states. I take it that an ocean light is such a light as enables a ship to find her way on the ocean when she is trying to make port. We are leaving the control of, and the revenue from, services connected with this matter in the hands of the states. Any dues that may be collected for the use of their harbours belong to them, and the same as regards the rivers, and it is out of that revenue that they can make provision by way of setting up beacons for guidance by day or night, and lights for night. The proper source of revenue from which to use these provisions for the lighting of harbours and rivers are the dues derived for the use of the harbours and rivers, and as these remain in the hands of the states, it is right that the states should undertake the slight burden of lighting, as a matter of internal concern, its harbours and rivers, whilst the external provision for enabling the commerce of the commonwealth to reach the commonwealth is a matter of regulation that may fairly be left to the commonwealth. I do not think that with lines of demarcation of that kind there will be any serious difficulty in saying what an ocean light or what a harbour light is. The difficulty that now arises is because experts in this, as in everything else, are in the habit of running away from a common-sense view of matters.

Amendment negatived; sub-clause 9 agreed to.

Sub-clause 10-Astronomical and meteorological observations-agreed to.

Sub-clause 11. Quarantine.

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR (New South Wales)[2.43]:

I think there is a matter connected with this clause which deserves consideration. In the first place, we ought to be clear in our minds what we intend to, cover by the word "quarantine" The word "quarantine" in its original meaning no doubt applied only to the quarantine of ships—the quarantine of forty days required under the old laws for the purification of a ship from disease. But I think the meaning of quarantine has gradually, extended much beyond that, and the word is now applied to an enclosure to prevent diseases that have been contracted on board ship from spreading to the land. It means general powers of isolation in all cases. I think we ought, in the first place, to decide whether we intend to interfere with the general health powers which the states now possess, and ought, perhaps, to retain, or only with those matters which are generally spoken of as marine quarantine. The question is whether we should give power to the commonwealth under any circumstances to legislate in regard to those matters that belong to the care of the public health in the different states?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

They would not do that, unless they thought that the health of other states was concerned!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

This is one of those cases in which we should first of all decide on a policy, and then make a definite provision. As to what the policy should be, it appears to me that the commonwealth power should extend only to those matters that affect the health of the commonwealth from outside. Therefore I am prepared to move:

That the word "quarantine" be omitted with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "public health in relation to infection or contagion from outside the commonwealth."

I will point out one reason why a provision of that kind is necessary. Supposing that all the colonies were not included in the federation, you might have smallpox, or some other contagious disease, in one colony which was not in the federation, and along the whole line of the boundary it would be necessary to make exactly similar provisions to those which would have to be made at the seaports. Now, under the head of "quarantine" I doubt very much whether such a power would be included; whereas if you say that the power is to be over matters connected with the "public health in relation to infection or contagion from outside the commonwealth," you state accurately what you mean." It appears to me that those words cover every possible case you want to deal with, and would make a line of demarcation between diseases that arose or spread within the states themselves which is a matter that ought to be dealt with by the health authorities of each state -and diseases that arose outside, which undoubtedly could be dealt with properly only by one authority for the whole commonwealth. In the first place, as far as policy is concerned, that is a matter for the Committee to decide. If hon. members decide as to policy, then how it is to be expressed is more or less a matter of drafting. But if the matter is considered worthy of consideration, I will move the insertion of the words I have suggested.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[2.48]:

I hope that the hon. and learned member will not move an amendment to that effect. I think that the meaning of the word "quarantine" is pretty well known. There is no doubt that leaving the sub-clause as it is preserves to every state the power that it now has to make laws in relation to all such subjects. It does not vest an exclusive power in the commonwealth to pass such laws. The state can pass its own law, and alter it as it pleases; but I think it is well to do as was done in the Canadian act in that respect-to give a power which the commonwealth might, in case of emergency, employ for the sake of the general health power to make a law respecting quarantine, as it is generally understood, so as to preserve all the ports of the commonwealth, not only from infection from abroad, but also from the danger of any infection which might have reached one port of the commonwealth spreading to the rest of the commonwealth. I think that there is no great harm in retaining the word "quarantine," and that, if we were to eliminate this word, the day might come when we would very much regret having done so.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

The subclause as it stands now provides for the quarantine of animals.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I believe it would include the quarantine of animals if those animals when slaughtered would go into consumption as food, and might thereby affect the public health.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

What about the quarantine of dogs?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I think that the federal parliament should have the power to deal with this matter if it thinks fit to do so, While the states might be left to protect themselves, surely, no harm would be done if we enabled the federal parliament to do more than any state could do, that is, give protection to the whole commonwealth.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON (Tasmania)[2.52]:

At the present time an arrangement has been come to by the joint action of the various colonies in regard to the quarantine of animals. The inspectors of stock meet from time to time, and agree to regulations which are afterwards enforced by their various governments.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

But any one of the colonies may at any time withdraw from the compact!
The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
Yes. Of course it is not desirable that any colony should withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN:
Does the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, intend to move an amendment?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
No. I see that there is sufficient reason for leaving the words in the clause. I drew attention to the matter because I thought it was worthy of consideration, and when we meet again perhaps some improvement may be suggested.

Sub-clause 11 agreed to.
Sub-clause 12 (Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits).
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia:
Add "and in rivers which flow through or in two or more states."

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[2.55]:
The argument which was used in support of the suggested amendment was that no coherent or consistent control of fisheries in a river could be exercised by any one state where that river ran through two or more states.

Question-That the words proposed to be added be so added--put. The Committee divided:

Question so resolved in the negative.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[2.58]:

I should like to suggest to the Drafting Committee that they might consider a couple of points in connection with this sub-clause. The first is the substitution of the word "Australasia" for the word "Australia." "Australasia" is the term generally employed throughout the bill. The other point, which is more important, is that some provision might be inserted defining the term "Australasian waters." I do not know if the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, is satisfied in his own mind as to what meaning would be attached to the term. I think that there was some provision in connection with the Federal Council by which, under an imperial order, these waters were defined; and legislation was adopted by the colony of Western Australia and Queensland in [P.1074] starts here the exercise of powers conferred on the council in regard to these matters. The clause applies only to matters beyond territorial limits, which increases the difficulty.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[2.59]:

This is a matter of very great difficulty, and it may be that it will have to be provided for by a definition. However, the subject will come under the consideration of the Drafting Committee, and I hope some more concise provision may be determined upon. The existing provision seems to me a possible source of confusion.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia)[3]:

Is the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, aware what the international law is with regard to these fisheries? I mention it specially because in the northern portion of Australia, when pearling boats proceed from Thursday Island and Port Darwin to the coasts of New Guinea and Macassar, the Dutch men-of-war interfere with vessels outside an 8 or 10 miles limit of the coast. I would ask attention to be given to the question as to what should be the limit of Australasian control in adjacent waters, and information might be obtained as to the exercise of authority by those foreign nations in the waters adjacent to their coasts.

Sub-clause 12 agreed to.

Sub-clauses 13 and 14 agreed to.

Sub-clause 15. Banking, the incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, and the Legislative Council of Tasmania:

After "banking" insert "excluding state banking not extending beyond the limits of the state concerned."
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, and the Legislative Council of South Australia:
After "banking" insert "excluding state banks."

The CHAIRMAN:
0n this sub clause the Assembly of New South Wales, the Assembly of Victoria, the Council of South Australia, and the Council of Tasmania, have suggested amendments which, although not in the same words, are practically identical.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[3.2]:
I trust the Committee will agree to the amendment suggested by four parliaments of five of the colonies. If hon. members will look at sub-clause 16 with regard to insurance, it will be found that the draft bill provides for insurance, excluding state insurance not extending beyond the limits of the state concerned. So that in the next sub-clause, the principle which is being contended for in the proposed amendment is practically conceded. We know that state banking is coming into favour in the Australasian colonies.
It is not proposed to interfere with federal control of state banking when it goes beyond the limits of the state concerned. It seems to me to be purely a matter of state concern when the banking is limited to the state. As the proposal has been suggested by four colonies I shall content myself with supporting the amendment, and I shall call for a division upon it.

The CHAIRMAN:
Perhaps I ought to point out that there is a substantial difference between the suggestions of the Victorian and South Australian Parliaments, on the one hand, and those of New South Wales and Tasmania, on the other In the one case, state banks are excluded simply; in the other, state banks are excluded when they do not extend beyond the limits of the states concerned. I will put the question in this form:
That the following words be inserted after the word "banking,"
"excluding state banking.
If that is carried, the remaining words may be inserted.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[3.6]:
We have in our colony what we call an agricultural bank, established for the purpose of encouraging the cultivation and improvement of the land, and to make advances to farmers. Would that be regarded as a state bank?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Is it a Government bank?
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Yes; under a statute.
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Then, it is a state bank!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
We might say, banks that advance the moneys of the state!'
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I am sure no one wants to interfere with these local institutions established for state purposes only.
Mr. WALKER:
I would suggest that we should ask the Drafting Committee to carry out a suggestion made by Sir Samuel Griffith with regard to state banking!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
The Drafting Committee will consider that!
The Hon. C.H. GRANT
was understood to say that he hoped the Committee would accept the proposed amendment. State banking, was one of the most important matters that the individual states could deal with. He hoped the Committee would give the states a free hand, as far as possible, in dealing with their own banks.
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[3.8]:
Unless we have a definition of the words "state bank" there will be a great deal of trouble. In no country in the world is there a real state bank. The Bank of France is not a real state bank. The directorate, whose appointment is partly controlled by the government, exercise certain rights under charter. They can issue notes, and they have other privileges. The German bank is not a state bank. It has certain privileges, and enters into contracts with the government, and it is regulated by act of parliament. We know the Bank of England is not a state bank. It has the exclusive right to issue notes within a certain distance of London, the issue being regulated by charter. It has certain other rights including the transaction of government business. I examined the constitution of all the banks in 1891 in connection with the establishment of a state bank, and I found that there was not in the world an institution that could be called purely a state bank. The bank in South Australia is not a state bank. It is simply established under an act of parliament, for the purpose of acting as a medium between borrowers and lenders. The government has some control over the board, and eventually the mortgage bonds are guaranteed by the government. It is not a state bank, because the state receives no profit. Considering that there has been no purely state bank established, if we put these words, a "state bank," into the constitution, it will be inferred that we intend to include these imperfect government banks, which are a cross between an ordinary bank and a state bank. If we leave the clause as it stands, we shall be led into all sorts of difficulties and possible litigation.

Mr. SYMON:

The difficulty might be got over by leaving out the words proposed to be inserted, and by adding at the end of the sub clause the words that it shall not apply to any banking operations carried on by the state.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Suppose they issue paper money?

Mr. SYMON:

We might provide that it shall not apply to any banking operations carried on by the state except the issue of paper money.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Amendment agreed to.

Question-That the words "not extending beyond the limits of the states concerned" be inserted-resolved in the affirmative.

Sub-clause 15, as amended, agreed to.

Sub-clause 16. Insurance, excluding state insurance not extending beyond the limits of the state concerned.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales:

Before "Insurance" first occurring insert "Assurance and and."

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.12]:

The reason that this amendment was proposed was because of a doubt entertained by the gentleman who moved it as to whether "assurance" was not the proper term to apply to policies upon lives. I do not know that there is very much in it. We know that the ordinary application of the term "assurance" is to life insurance, and the ordinary application of the term "insurance" is to fire and marine insurance. At the same time, I have not any doubt in my own mind that the word as originally used covers the whole case.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales:

Omit "excluding state insurance not extending beyond the limits of the state concerned."

Amendment negatived.

Sub-clause 16 agreed to.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[3.13]:

I should like to remind hon. members that in Adelaide I moved the insertion of a clause as to conciliation and arbitration in connection with industrial pursuits. I do not intend to push that matter now. I think it is desirable to avoid contentious matter as much as possible, but I wish to intimate that at the adjourned meeting in Melbourne it is my intention to make an effort to enable the federal parliament to establish councils of conciliation and arbitration with regard to industrial pursuits which are not confined to any one colony.

Sub-clauses 17 and 18 agreed to.

Sub-clause 19 (Bankruptcy and insolvency).

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, and by the Legislative Council of Tasmania:

After "insolvency" insert "and lunacy."

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[3.15]:

I do not see how that can be allowed to pass unless we also hand over to the federal parliament the control of the lunatic asylums.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

And the hospitals!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

And the hospitals. The control of lunacy necessarily includes the accommodation for lunatics. Unless the buildings are handed over to the federal parliament, I fail to see how that authority can exercise any power over the inmates thereof.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[3.16]:

This proposal is not one to give exclusive right to the federal parliament in regard to lunacy matters at all. It is only a proposal to empower the federal parliament, where it becomes a matter of federal concern, to legislate in regard to lunacy. Hon. members—especially those who have held executive office—know that the lunacy question is on

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[3.17]:

I think the question of a lunatic coming from one state to another is a matter for the states themselves. When I had the honor of being Chief Secretary we had great trouble with lunatics coming from New South Wales to South Australia. It was a constant source of irritation between the officials of the two colonies. I am bound to say that I think my friends are looking at the matter from an exceedingly provincial point of view. I admit that the colony of New South Wales made a fair arrangement, by which there was a small charge, involving no profit to South Australia. We took care of their lunatics, cured them, and sent them back, and, for all I know, some of them may have become members of parliament.
The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
That shows it is a federal matter!

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR (New South Wales)[3.18]:
We ought to be careful not to load the commonwealth with any more duties than are absolutely necessary. Although it is quite true that this power is permissive, you will always find that if once power is given to the commonwealth to legislate on a particular question, there will be continual pressure brought to bear on the commonwealth to exercise that power. The moment the commonwealth exercises the power, the states must retire from that field of legislation. I quite agree with the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, that it is impossible to deal with the question of lunacy apart from the question of the cure and control of lunatics, and also the law relating to the disposal of the property of lunatics in the different states. It seems to me to be entirely a matter of state concern. I am quite aware that, in the interchange of lunatics up to the present time, New South Wales perhaps has not got the best of the bargain. But that, it appears to me, is a small matter compared with the inadvisability of loading up the commonwealth unnecessarily with the powers which must be involved in taking charge of this particular department of administration.

Amendment negatived; sub-clause 19 agreed to.
Sub-clauses 20, 21, and 22 agreed to. Sub-clause 23 (Marriage and divorce).
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia:
Omit the sub-clause.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania:
Omit the sub-clause; insert, "The status in other states of the commonwealth of persons married or divorced in any state."

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[3.22]:
There is a very strong opinion in South Australia, and I believe it is shared by a considerable number of the electors of the proposed commonwealth, that this subclause ought not to be kept in.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
The hon. member voted for it in Adelaide!

Mr. GLYNN:
I am representing the opinions of others rather than my own. There is a very strong objection in the province of South Australia to bring down the notion of the dissolubility of the marriage tie to the level to which it has come in some of the other colonies. In 1892, the legislature of New South Wales passed an amending divorce bill, by which the possibility of getting divorce was rendered exceedingly easy. That was followed in Victoria in 1893 by an act under which a man can get a divorce practically for habitual drunkenness, which might be defined as drunkenness evidenced by a series of convictions during six months, desertion for three years, and a certain amount of cruelty. If we take the period from 1886 to 1890, before these divorce laws were enacted in New South Wales and Victoria, we find that the number of divorces in New South Wales was 210; in Victoria, 124; in Queensland, 26; in South Australia, 23; in Western Australia, 8; in Tasmania, 15. Between 1891 and 1894, instead of there being 210 divorces in New South Wales, in that period there were 841; in Victoria, 356, as against 124; and as regards the other colonies which stick to the old notions of marriage in Queensland, 22 as against 26; in South Australia, 25 as against 23; in Western Australia, 8 as against 7; and in Tasmania an increase from 15 to 17. If you come to 1894, the figures will show the difference of opinion on this point in the various colonies In 1894, there were 369 divorces in New South Wales, 87 divorces in Victoria, only 6 divorces in Queensland, 5 divorces in South Australia, 1 divorce in Western Australia, and 5 divorces in Tasmania.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

These laws were introduced for the purpose of separating people who were not suited to each other!

Mr. GLYNN:

No matter what may have been the intention in passing the laws, I would point out that there has been an enormous increase in the number of divorces, consequent on the enactment of those laws in Victoria; and New South Wales; that the people in South Australia and several other colonies are pretty, well satisfied with the obligation of the marriage-tie which at present exist. I would also point out, if the question of morality and respectability is concerned at all, that with the exception of the United States, Denmark, and Switzerland, Australia, taking an average of the lot, is in the unenviable position of having the highest rate for divorces in the civilised world.

Mr. WISE:

They get married so much quicker!

Mr. GLYNN:

The statistics, do not hear the hon. member out, because Coghlan shows that the number of marriages, according to population, is not-so much greater.

Mr. WISE:

I said "quicker"!

Mr. GLYNN:
The hon. member's grammar is not correct, so that I will not say any more on that point. The position I take is this: that very many persons in South Australia object to the notion of the marital tie being dragged down to the level of New South Wales. I do not wish, to be offensive; but I make that observation because there is a very strong opinion on the subject in South Australia. The chances are that the wishes of the house of representatives, which will represent the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria, will be those which will pass the legislation. The number of representatives in the house of representatives will be very much greater for the larger colonies than for the smaller colonies. The number which will represent the smaller colonies, or one or two of them, at all events in the Senate, will scarcely have the power to stay legislation if it be insisted on in the house of representatives. On the whole, I think, as there is not very much benefit to be gained by an assimilation of the laws relating to divorce, we ought to strike out the sub-clause. It can only relate to divorce, because it has been decided in Canada that the uniformity of the solemnisation of marriage is not affected by the provision relating to marriage and divorce. You have to leave out the subject of marriage whether you like it or not, but you need not include the subject of divorce unless you please.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[3.28]:

I think we ought to avoid, as far as possible, introducing into the constitution anything which is likely to cause a difference between the commonwealth, and the states, and this is emphatically one of these subject's about which stronger differences of opinion may prevail in one part of the continent than those which prevail in the other, and if they, do arise they are differences of opinion which no amount of argument is likely to alter because they are based on sentiment and tradition. In a very able paper which has been circulated by Mr. A.I. Clark, and which most members of the Convention have seen, he calls attention to the impracticability in Canada of carrying into effect the corresponding provision in the British North America Act. It is quite true that we do not have here the great differences of sentiment in a matter of this kind which exist between the Catholic provinces and the Protestant provinces of Canada. We may have similar differences of sentiment, perhaps on a smaller scale; and in all social questions such, for instance, as marriage, each community might be allowed to legislate according to its own ideas of right and wrong, always preserving such supreme control on behalf of the commonwealth as is necessary to prevent scandals from people having one status in one state, and another status in another state. I submit that the whole of the objections which have been raised, very forcibly, by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Glynn, in which I concur, will be met by striking out the words "marriage and divorce," and adopting the amendment suggested by the Parliament of Tasmania. That will enable each colony to recognise the laws as to marriage and divorce that may, be passed by any other colony-to recognise the judgment of the divorce court and the validity of the marriage. We may look forward to the time when those colonies will be split up. Take an illustration: Suppose we were to have a settlement composed largely of Germans or Italians, or a settlement, composed largely of Anglicans, or of Catholics, or, at any rate, in which either of these denominations largely preponderated. In New Zealand one of the provinces for many years was composed almost exclusively Of Anglicans, and another of Scotch Presbyterians, and we know that the ideas of those communities on the subject of divorce would be as wide apart as the poles.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Would not the amendment favour the formation of such communities?

Mr. WISE:
I dare say it would. But is there any solid advantage to be gained by taking away from the states the right of making their own laws on this particular subject. Should we not be raising difficulties that are endless without gaining special advantage? If there is a common sentiment all over the community, there is no subject upon which that common sentiment will make itself felt in the legislature of the state more than in a matter so closely affecting the social life as marriage and divorce. Uniformity-if there is any desire for uniformity-will come naturally and speedily by itself, whereas any attempt to enforce uniformity, where there is no, desire for uniformity, may lead to great difficulties. Seeing that there is no advantage to be gained by retaining the sub-clause, while there is a risk of disadvantages, I propose that we should strike it out, and adopt the amendment of the parliament of Tasmania.

The Hon. C.H. GRANT (Tasmania)[3.33]:
It appears to me that the amendment of the subsection agreed to by both houses of the legislature of Tasmania, as more clearly defining what is intended by the use of the words, "marriage and divorce," should be agreed to. The words as they stand are too general. But I do not suppose it is proposed to use them to a greater extent than in the amendment. Each state has its own marriage laws. They are not uniform, and it would be better for the present to leave the exceedingly important question of the marriage law to each state. But it might be provided that the federal parliament, having the assent of the states, should eventually; have the power to evolve an uniform law of marriage. As regards divorce and the status of the parties affected under the present laws, there cannot be a doubt but that uniformity of proceeding would be advantageous throughout the states, the law being framed on that of the colony that gives the greatest facilities for granting divorce, whenever reasonable cause can be shown therefore. Since the law only recognises marriages as civil contracts or partnerships, it would seem intolerable that when the partners can prove the impossibility of their maintaining friendly relations, they should be compelled by law to make a semblance of doing so, and both lives be in effect wasted. For the present the amendment proposed under which the status of parties married or divorced could be made uniform throughout the states would appear to provide for all requirements.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)[3.34]:

The amendment does not cover the same ground as the sub-clause. It covers only part of it, and if the sub-clause is to contain the words proposed, there will be no necessity for it. What is meant by "the status in other states of the commonwealth"? It simply means, as far as marriage is concerned

Mr. SYMON:

A scandal!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Persons who according to the law of the state in which they reside, would have no chance of being divorced, may become domiciled in another state by living there a certain time, and then, according to the laws of that state, may obtain divorce for reasons which, in their own state, would have been ludicrous as a ground of divorce.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

In some cases they may be divorced without a domicile!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Yes; but, in any case, either party to a marriage, by coming under the laws of another state, may obtain a divorce under circumstances which would not justify the divorce if he or she had remained in the original state. All these circumstances seem to me to point to the conclusion that, unless we wish to repeat in these communities the condition of things which has obtained in America, it is necessary to provide for uniformity in the law of divorce, and holding the views I do on this question, I hope that the result of a uniform law of divorce will be something considerably better than the existing state of things—of which my hon. friend, Mr. Glynn, complained that it will be a law which will represent the average sentiment of the whole community, and, after all, in matters of this kind, if we get the average sense of the community over whom the laws are to operate, we cannot very much complain.

If there is one subject more than another which should remain in the bill in its present form, it is the subsection with which we are now dealing.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[3.38]:

I entirely agree with what my hon. and learned friend, Mr. O'Connor, has just said. I would ask hon. members to recollect the view we have taken about the condition of the English law with respect to marriage with a deceased wife's sister. I think every colony has petitioned the English Parliament on that subject. I know that when we were at home in 1887, we all agreed in making a particular request to the Imperial Government to bring in an act to prevent the unpleasant and anomalous condition of the laws by which people married in the colonies, when they reached England, were not married. We only have to remember the attitude we took when we were unanimous amongst ourselves against the mother country, which has a different line of legislation, to understand that we ought to do that amongst ourselves which we wanted England to do towards us. What subject is more fitted for general legislation? In what subject do we want a universal law more than that dealing with the most sacred relations that concern not merely the individuals who are parties to the contract, or whatever you please to call it, but also those who are to come afterwards? Any one who seriously considers the social feelings of pain and grief, and worry and trouble caused by a differentiation of the laws of the colonies, as between themselves, on this most vital subject, must agree that something ought to be done to prevent the anomaly continuing. As the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, has said, we in the profession know what takes place. If a divorce cannot be obtained in Adelaide, we tell them to go somewhere else, and they go and acquire a domicile there. I am not ashamed to have been one to tell them that. If they-acquire domicile, the divorce will be good enough; but in some cases they get divorce without acquiring domicile, and the result would be, if the matter came to be questioned, that the divorce would not be a divorce at all.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The court has to be satisfied that there is a domicile!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

But if there were no genuine domicile, there would be no divorce. There is another reason against the existence of different laws in different colonies. The arguments, as far as I can see, are altogether one way. I can understand the position of those who say there should not be divorce from any cause at all; but all that is past and gone, and we will not allow the domination of any church to interfere with these relations. And now that the whole of the British dominions have recognised that there should be divorce for certain causes, it becomes very important that, in all English-speaking communities, we should have the law uniform, as far as we can.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
This is only that the federal parliament shall have the power!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
It is a highly proper power, and it will probably be exercised at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. WISE:
They will get into trouble very quickly if they do exercise it!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
In my opinion they will get into trouble if they do not.

Mr. WISE:
Why put in what will be a source of strife?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I do not think it will create the slightest trouble. I do not believe the cause of federation will lose a vote through it. I do not believe any man here or elsewhere will vote against federation on account of this subclause being put into the bill. I think it is a necessary one, and that it is more a matter for federal control than are many other things which are contained in the bill.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[3.44]:
In England, Ireland, and Scotland there are three different laws as to divorce. There is none in Ireland; there is divorce under certain conditions in England, and under different conditions in Scotland. I think that tells largely against the position taken up by the Hon. Sir John Downer,

Sub-clause 23 agreed to.

Sub-clause 24. Parental rights and the custody and guardianship of infants.

The CHAIRMAN:
The Legislative Assemblies of New South Wales and South Australia, and the Legislative Council of Tasmania, have suggested that this sub-clause be omitted.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE (South Australia)[3.45]:
I move:
That the following words be added to the sub-clause:-"also invalid and old age pensions."

This is a matter to which I have given a good deal of thought. If I could see my way clear to say that it was purely a state matter, I would not trouble the Convention with it. I mentioned the subject in Adelaide, and since then I have read a great deal of literature on the Subject, and I have come to the conclusion that if there be one thing more than another which it should be within the power of the commonwealth to make provision for it is old age. It is a question which has occupied, and is occupying the attention of the foremost statesmen of the world.

The CHAIRMAN:

The hon. member had better make his amendment the subject of a distinct sub-clause, it has no relation to the sub-clause before us.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

I will bow to the suggestion of the Chairman.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales):[3.46]

I hope the Committee will strike out this sub clause. It is proposed by the legislative assemblies of New South Wales and South Australia, and by the Council and Assembly of Tasmania, that the sub-clause should be omitted. I can apply no better arguments than those which the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, used just now with reference to lunacy. The hon. and learned member said that where a permissive power was given there was pressure brought to bear for the exercise of that power, and that when it was exercised in one direction pressure was brought to bear that it might be exercised to the fullest extent. Applying that argument to lunacy, if we had this power exercised at all, we should find strong arguments used for the taking over of our lunatic asylums. If the power in this sub-clause were exercised at all, a strong argument would be offered for the state taking over the whole of the benevolent institutions of the various colonies which have to deal with children, and they would become federal institutions. If you do that you must do what the hon. member, Mr. Howe, proposes. If you interfere with the children in these institutions you will have to take over the institutions for the infirm and the old. Now, there is a decided objection in this colony to any federal interference with what the people conceive to be matters most sacred in the family. We have in this colony a law modelled upon the English law dealing with the custody of children and with parental rights. That question of parental rights is one which opens up a very large range of questions. We may have all sorts of interference between parents and their children under a proposal of this character. The state laws, up to the present, have been perfectly effective to deal with this question, and I think the argument of hon. members against applying federal action to lunacy apply equally well against federal action in this matter. I shall apply those arguments now in my vote.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales): This may not be a matter of as great importance as are some of the other matters in the clause, but I think it is worth consideration. I will put it to my hon. friend that if the commonwealth are empowered to legislate on the subject of marriage and divorce without having the power to legislate as to the children, the issue of the marriage, this complication may arise—that the judge, having to pronounce a decree of divorce or of judicial separation, and having also to deal with the question of the custody of infants, if the commonwealth cannot legislate in regard to both subjects, will administer one law with respect to the issue relating to divorce, whilst the consequent portion of the decree dealing with the custody of the children will have to be under a totally different and varying law.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS: Why not add the words "in relation to divorce"?

The Hon. E. BARTON: If the subclause can be amended in the direction which the hon. and learned member suggests, my objection will have disappeared, and there will be a reasonable consistency in the law. I think the difficulty might be overcome by inserting before the words "parental rights" the word "also," and at the end of the sub-clause the words "in relation thereto."

Mr. SYMON (South Australia): Is it worth while to deal with the matter in that way? If you give the federal parliament power in relation to marriage generally and divorce generally, then anything that concerns parental rights and the custody and guardianship of infants is connected with either one or the other. It seems to me that if you intrust the federal authority with the power of dealing with marriage and divorce, which involves everything relating to the highest earthly ties—that of marriage—it ought, consequent on that, also to regulate the custody of infants. It does not involve what the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, seems to think is in the minds of many who see some objection to this—that it might empower the federal authority to interfere with domestic relations in some mysterious manner so as to reduce children to a position of slavery. This is a control that seems to me to be consequent upon marriage, and which might come into operation, perhaps, in relation to all matters of divorce; but it is not confined to matters of divorce, and might depend simply on marriage when the question of divorce does not arise. It will, perhaps, be better to leave the sub-clause as it is and consider the matter further later on.<

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Before the hon. and learned gentleman sits down he will, perhaps, deal with what I forgot, namely, a suggestion from the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, that if this power were granted it would involve the probability of the commonwealth having to take over the control of the institutions?

Mr. SYMON:
I did not think that the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, seriously meant that.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
That argument was successfully used against me in regard to lunatics!

Mr. SYMON:
I am sure that the hon. member will be able to successfully dispose of it when it is next used against him. It would be just as reasonable to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member, Mr. Howe, and say that the federal authority are to take control of all institutions for the care of the aged and infirm. I think that hon. members will, on consideration, see that there is no parallel between the cases, and, that as this affects one part of the relationship of the citizens to the commonwealth, it ought fairly to be under a uniform law and under federal control.

The Hon. C.H. GRANT (Tasmania):
I think that the words as they stand, "custody and guardianship of infants," are rather too wide. It seems to me that these words, without any qualification, would apply to destitute children. It would be better for the state authorities to control the custody and guardianship of infants, because they are immediately on the spot. They have opportunities of inquiring into the relationship of the children and their parents, and into their condition if they are destitute and neglected. Therefore, I think it is advisable to omit those words, and allow the sub-clause to remain as proposed to be amended by the leader of the Convention.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia):
I think it would be better to leave the sub-clause as it is. I can understand that it will be a very good thing for each state to make its own laws with respect to parental rights and the custody and guardianship of children; but supposing that the children went into another state, and were thus taken away from the law of which the previous state approved, and came under the law of another state which had altogether a different method of dealing with such matters, and under which the parent was not able to again get the custody of his child, or the guardian was not able to again get the custody of an infant, what could he do? He could not proceed under his own law. His own law might be good enough, but the person that he wanted to proceed against would be out of the jurisdiction of his state.

Mr. SYMON:
And the order would not have any force!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
The order would not have any force. The result would be that, however good his own law was, he would be unable to enforce it because the law of the other state was of a varying character.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
Sub-clause 26 provides for that!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
That is only an evidence clause, and will not have the slightest effect in this matter.

Mr. SYMON:
The hon. and learned gentleman's point is a point of jurisdiction!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Yes; and it has nothing whatever to do with that. The order would be good enough as a record of the action of the court in the first-named state, but it would not be a record of the court in the other state; nor would it make the law of the other state subsidiary to the law of the state which contained that record.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
Does the hon. and learned member read the word "recognition" as meaning proof?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
It is no more than recognition; it means what it says. The word is plain enough.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
Look at sub-clause 25, which says:
The service and execution throughout the commonwealth of the civil and criminal process, and judgments of the courts of the states.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
But it must be in respect of a matter over which the court has jurisdiction.

Mr. SYMON:
Suppose you change the domicile!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
That will not operate to give jurisdiction. I think that when we have given the most sacred of all relations-the, relation of marriage-over to the commonwealth, and very properly, it follows, as a matter of course, that we must do this. Parental rights-that is all we propose to give to the commonwealth. The commonwealth parliament can make a definition and pass a uniform law.

Mr. SYMON:
That is incident to the marriage law!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
It comes from the marriage law, and ought to flow as a corollary. It is a corollary as far as marriage is concerned.

---

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
It would not necessarily follow the law of husband and wife!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
We are only talking about parental rights; that is the right of the parent over the child!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
If the hon. and learned member is willing to hand over the rights, why not the obligations?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
If the hon. member would like them added I have no objection; but if the hon. gentleman wants to exclude them, I cannot see that any difficulty need arise. So far as I know, the laws of all the colonies are exactly the same in respect to the matters mentioned here, and there is very little probability of their being any different, so far as parental rights and the custody and guardianship of infants are concerned. We want to prevent the possibility of any difference, that is all, and to give the federal parliament power to legislate on the subject if they please. I can see difficulties that might arise in the enforcement of state laws through the child or infant being taken away from the custody of its parent or guardian, and being out of the jurisdiction of the court of the state in which the parent or guardian resides, and I think it is necessary to have one uniform law on this matter as well as in regard to marriage and divorce.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[3.59]:
I think we are quarrelling about terms and not about substance. I believe that the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, agrees with almost everyone of us that as regards parental rights and the custody and guardianship of children so far as divorce is concerned, power should be given to the commonwealth; but this clause goes much further and includes the whole region of, parental rights and the custody and guardianship of children.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Put in the words "and in relation thereto" before "parental rights"!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
That will cover the whole ground. All our acts relating to the custody and guardianship of children have relation to parental rights.

Mr. SYMON:

Suppose a child is deserted?

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

That suspends the parental custody; but the parental liability remains. I think that the amendment suggested by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, covers the whole ground.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I move:

That the figures "24" be omitted with a view to the insertion of the words "and in relation thereto."

This will confine the operation of the subclause to the rights and obligations arising out of divorce suits. The other matters to which attention has been directed will be considered by the Drafting Committee.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[4.3]:

I would point out that if we are going to deal with the service and process of writs in regard to this matter in one state when the parent resides in another, it will be just as well for the Drafting Committee to consider the aspect of the case in relation to deserted wives. If the amendment of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, is carried, I think we might leave the matter to the Drafting Committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Sub-clause 24, as amended, agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN:

The hon. member, Mr. Howe, can now move his proposed new sub-clause.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE (Western Australia)[4.4]:

I consider that it is the duty of the commonwealth, rather than of the states, to undertake the work of providing for the invalid and aged poor of the commonwealth. The matter was dealt with in Adelaide, when some of the leading legal members of the Convention took the position that the question was more a state question than a commonwealth question. Since then I have considered it carefully, and the more I have read and thought over it, the more I am convinced that this work should be undertaken by the commonwealth. I consider that no more important question than this could occupy the attention of the Convention. The question is one which is now occupying the attention of all the learned and able statesmen of Europe. Great philanthropists all over the world are trying to find a solution for this dreadful calamity. In every civilised community we find men who have given their best mental and physical labour to the state becoming, in their declining years, through no fault of their own, a burden to their friends, who cannot afford to maintain them, or entering charitable institutions, and finally finding a pauper's grave.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Does not this matter stand in the same category as state banking and state insurance?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The adoption of the hon. member's amendment might seriously perplex the Finance Committee!

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
The German Empire has adopted the system of providing invalid and old-age pensions. In Germany it is compulsory for those in fixed employment, and for employers, to contribute to a fund which is subsidised by the Government. Then when a man comes on the fund he does not come upon it as with us a man comes upon the charitable institutions of the country. He can hold up his head among his fellow-men. This law prevents a man who has fulfilled all the obligations of citizen, husband, and father from becoming a pauper in his declining days.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Is not this purely a state matter?

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
If I thought so I would not bother the Convention about it. The people who would benefit most by such a provision are a moving population. They are engaged in seeking work all over Australia, and are constantly going to those places, which, for the time being, are more prosperous than other places. Our labouring classes will be a nomadic race for a considerable time to come. If the state took this matter in hand, and made payments compulsory, it could not follow a contributor to the fund from one state to another. The duty is one which can only be performed by the federal authority. At the present time there are no fewer than 12,000,000 of people in Germany perhaps, are not able to keep them, but that the commonwealth shall provide the means from this fund to which they have contributed whereby they can live. I hope the Convention will agree to these words being inserted. I am sure that if they do so, the federal parliament will be able to formulate a scheme whereby my object can be achieved, and thereby crown itself with glory. I am sure hon. members have read the literature of the subject, and no one can do so without coming to the conclusion that it is a blot, and one that should be removed as speedily as possible from all civilised communities.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[4.11]:

I know that the hon. member, Mr. Howe, has taken a very deep interest in this matter for a considerable time, and that he feels most warmly and properly with regard to it. I should be delighted to do anything in my power to assist him. If he goes to a division I shall be found recording my vote with him, because, although there may be some force in the argument that the matter is one more likely to be dealt with satisfactorily by the state authority, still, at the same time I do not understand that the hon. member proposes to deprive the state authority of the power of dealing with it if it so desires. On the contrary, he proposes to insert this amongst the list of concurrent powers both of the commonwealth and of the state, so that either may deal with it, and there is no fear whatever that one would desire to exercise that power to the prejudice of the other. No doubt also the federated authority will be armed with greater power for giving effect to anything it may desire, for the reasons which my hon. friend and colleague has pointed out. At the same time I am inclined to think that it is now a little late in the history of our Sydney sittings to deal with the question satisfactorily, and I put it to the hon. member whether it would not be better not to press it to a division just now when we will not have an opportunity of discussing it as fully as we otherwise might and as its importance deserves, but rather reserve it, as another question has been reserved, for final decision in Melbourne.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

I did that at the last sitting!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I simply suggest it to the hon. member for his consideration. If he goes to a division I will vote with him. At the same time, I suggest the alternative course with every desire to assist him in the accomplishment of what he wishes, and he can rely upon me at all times to do so.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales) [4.14]:

I hope the course suggested will be adopted by the hon. member, because it will not prejudice the adoption of the proposal. If it had been suggested as an amendment by any of the parliaments, it might prejudice it. But he can bring it up as a proposition of his own in Melbourne. It is altogether too important a question to deal with now.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

I gave up my right to deal with the question at Adelaide

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

The hon. member may have given up his right in order to deal with it at the final sitting, but this is not the final sitting. This is a very large question, and it is embarrassed by a number of considerations. For instance, the different colonies have already a number of subjects of legislation which come very close to this. If the commonwealth and the states are thrown into collision on this matter I do not think it would help the object in view; between the two stools it might come to nothing. For instance, in a state there might be a very advanced state of things; everything might be ripe for legislation. What a grand excuse it would be for a government to urge, "Oh, this matter is in the commonwealth constitution. Let us wait till the commonwealth takes the matter in hand." In that way the benefits of the system might be deferred indefinitely, whereas in some of the different colonies it might rapidly ripen. As far as I can see, this bill does not contain anything which impinges on this subject of old age pensions, whereas the powers of the states, do contain a number of things in the same category. It is questionable whether we should take up a movement of this sort in connection with a strictly limited federation.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Could we deal with the subject except in connection with charitable institutions generally?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

That might be so, but I cannot speak positively without full consideration. The hon. member can see from the appearance of the Convention that this is not a favourable time to suggest any new thing, however good it my be.

The CHAIRMAN:

There is a suggestion on the subject from the Council of South Australia.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

In that case it may be necessary to deal with it. We might deal with it in some way now on the understanding that it will be fully considered in Melbourne.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.19]:

A much more comprehensive suggestion has been made, which I indorse. It is now 4.20, and the Convention is not going to sit to-morrow. It will only meet on Friday to incorporate in the bill amendments which have been rendered necessary. I regard it as hopeless to now get through all the bill. If we deal only with matters of course we shall not be able to do more than get through this clause, clause 53, and postponed clause 69. Then we shall have dealt with the whole of the bill up to clause 70. I suggest that there should be an understanding that the consideration of the bill should be renewed in Melbourne at clause 71, on the understanding that any part which we do not consider now shall be taken up at once in Melbourne. I am only pointing this out to show the hon. member, Mr. Howe, that his position will be only the same as that of anybody else if he accepts the suggestion which has been made. My, proposal will be this: that we take the rest of the bill simply pro forma so as to get the bill printed with the amendments. We will recommit the bill pro forma on Friday and incorporate the amendments as far as we have gone. As to the rest it will be a complete understanding that we reconsider the bill in Melbourne at the point where we left off. Then the adoption of the report would be followed by a motion for recommittal with regard to every portion of the bill which we have not touched, and also with regard to every portion which Queensland wants reopened.

The Hon. J.H. Gordon:
Or any member of the Convention!

The Hon. E. Barton:
Or any member of the Convention-at any rate with regard to all those points which Queensland wants reopened, and all which we have not touched. The reason I suggest this is that the printer must be got to work to-night, and we cannot let the printer have the bill, so far as we have gone, unless we adjourn before tea.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
Does not the hon. and learned member intend to sit tonight?

The Hon. E. Barton:
I think it would be advisable to adjourn before tea; otherwise the Drafting Committee would not be able to deal with the bill to-morrow. As far as I can see it is essential that this suggestion of mine should be adopted. I make it in the interests of the bill and of hon. members. The hon. member, Mr. Howe, will see that I am not endeavouring to shelve his amendment, but am only asking that we should stop at the present point our practical work, and let us all be treated alike as to what follows in Melbourne. If we, pro forma take the other clauses of the bill, it is only to enable the printer to get to work, also to enable the Drafting Committee to get to work tomorrow, and to enable any drafting amendments to be dealt with on Friday.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
Then this matter will come on again in its proper place in Melbourne?

The Hon. E. Barton:
Yes, we shall begin at this very point in Melbourne. The adoption of the report Will be an order of the day for our first day's meeting in Melbourne, and I undertake to recommit the measure then for everything that is required.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
If the clauses which we have not dealt with are passed pro forma, can we consider suggestions of the different parliaments? Is it not a statutory obligation that we should consider them?

The CHAIRMAN:
We are bound to consider the suggestions of the various parliaments!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Yes; but that statutory obligation is fulfilled if we consider them in Melbourne. Of course I can quite see one objection to which this course is open, and that is that there might be some supposition that we have taken all the rest of the bill in globo, finally. But I think that that can be met by the very nature of the procedure we are undertaking, and by the proceedings of the Convention, which show that we are simply not concluding the work, but breaking it off, so as not to waste any further time. If the suggestion I make is not adopted, hon. members will see the difficulties which arise. I shall to-day or to-morrow have to move that we report progress, and ask leave to sit again on the 20th January. The result of that proceeding would be not only that the Drafting Committee cannot meet to put the amendments in the shape in which the Convention would like them to be, but we cannot have the bill printed for the purpose of circulation in the country, and for the purpose of people understanding really what has been done. I therefore throw out the suggestion for hon. members to consider, especially in view of the fact that to finish the bill now is hopeless; and apart from that, we all understand for ourselves that it is intended to finish it in Melbourne.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Suppose we place an asterisk against the clauses which have not been dealt with?

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[4.24]:
The leader of the Convention suggests the circulation of the bill in the various colonies. If it is in circulation at all it ought to be circulated, not only with asterisks to show what clauses have not been considered, but with the actual suggestions of the various legislatures opposite each clause.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
That I shall certainly agree to!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
Then subject to that I shall support the hon. and learned member, because we are now coming to matters which it will take hours to settle.

The CHAIRMAN:
I was going to suggest that if the leader of the Convention moves that I report that the Committee has agreed to certain clauses, and has not considered certain others, then the bill can be printed with the clauses which we have agreed to as amended, and the other clauses can be printed as they originally stood.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.25]:
Then there would be no opportunity for the Drafting Committee to do what the Convention wants them to do.

The CHAIRMAN:
I feel I am under a statutory obligation to put all the amendments suggested; by the various parliaments, and if I put the clauses I shall put the amendments.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Can it be managed in this way: Take the course you, sir, have suggested. With regard to the work of the Drafting Committee I will move on Friday that we reconsider certain clauses. Then we can report progress and ask leave to sit again on the 20th January.

The CHAIRMAN:
Yes

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Then we will take that course. The question remains with hon. members, seeing that we cannot finish the bill whether it would not be wise, under the circumstances, to adjourn now.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Cannot we deal with the judiciary clauses?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I think there is only one which will cause any trouble.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Might I suggest that we should not stop in the middle of a clause. I think it would be as well to finish clause 52!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The debate on the rivers question will occupy six or eight hours.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
And we shall have to fight it over again in Melbourne.
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[4.27]:

Of course we have to bow to the pressure of circumstances. May I say one word to my hon. friends on the Drafting Committee in relation to clause 52? In the United States Constitution power is given to the commonwealth to legislate in very wide terms. The question will be constantly arising whether the commonwealth parliament has power to legislate on any particular matter. There is no doubt whatever that they are to be restricted by the powers expressed or implied in the constitution bill. We have not got exactly any precedent quite analogous. We have gone very near to the United States Constitution, but I should like to point out how the same words used in a different relation may lead to very different results. In our bill, clause 52 provides that the parliament may have full power and authority to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the commonwealth, with respect to all or any of the matters following. It then winds up with the sub-clause:

Any matters necessary for, or incidental to, the carrying, into execution of the foregoing powers-

They are specifically mentioned:

or of any other powers vested by this constitution in the parliament or the executive government of the commonwealth or in any department or officer thereof.

It seems to me that if you want to legislate in regard to the judiciary, you might be met with some difficulty. There is a power given, but it is very limited; it is to do specific things. My hon. and learned friend may be able to find that power.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Look at clauses 76, 77, and 78!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I am not sure they go far enough. I would also point out that in section 8, subsection 18, of the first article of the American Constitution, the Congress has power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Now, the word "government" there has a very large signification. It means the whole of the legislative, judicial, and executive departments of the government, and any officer and any department thereof. A departmental officer in the United States means an officer of the whole government, which is a much wider signification than the other. A question has arisen in my mind in two or three places throughout this bill whether the parliament has power to make laws in certain cases—not in two or three cases, but in very numerous cases; and a question may arrive as to whether the last sub-clause of clause 52 in wide enough in that respect. There are many provisions in relation to the parliament which do not consist of power is vested in the parliament.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
All these in clause 52 are in the parliament!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
But there are many provisions of the bill in relation to the parliament which are not powers vested in the parliament.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Does the hon. member mean to say that they are mere permissions?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Permissions given, and also provisions made in respect of the parliament, or one single house of the parliament. I think it would be well if the wording were made so as to prevent any question from arising in the future as to the power of the commonwealth parliament to legislate in respect of every one of the subjects which are confided to the commonwealth as a whole.

Motion (by Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:
That the Chairman do leave the chair, and report that the Committee have considered all the clauses up to and inclusive of clause 70, except subsection 25 to 37 of clause 52, and clause 53 and clause 69; and that they have not considered the remaining clauses, the schedule, the preamble, and the title of the bill, and that the Committee have leave to sit again on Friday.

Resolution reported; leave granted.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I think I shall be in order in moving that the bill, as recast by the Drafting Committee, be printed.

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:
Perhaps it will be better to have the bill printed with the present amendments!

Motion (the Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:
That the bill be printed with the present amendments.

DARLING AND MURRAY RIVERS.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I wish to lay on the table a plan which has been handed to me by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Glynn, of the Darling and Murray rivers, showing the flood and low water levels, and the effect on trade of the rise and fall of the rivers. I move:
    That the document be printed.
    Question resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.37]:
    Before I move the adjournment of the Convention I would like to ascertain the wish of hon. members. It will be recollected that, at Adelaide when the committees were sitting, the Convention met each day pro forma, so that it might be able to consider any matter of particular importance which might crop up. Perhaps hon. members may desire that the Convention should meet pro forma to-morrow at half-past 10 o'clock, and adjourn till Friday.

Hon. MEMBERS:
    Hear, hear!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
    As hon. members concur, I would ask them to make a quorum for that purpose at 10.30 tomorrow. I move:
    That the Convention do now adjourn.

Dr. QUICK:
    I wish to draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that no definite answer has yet been sent to Queensland in response to the letter and telegram from the Chief Secretary, Sir Horace Tozer.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
    I sent first a telegram to say that the telegram had been received by the members of the Convention with great gratification, and that we all hope to be able to shake hands with ten representatives of Queensland when the Convention meets again. I sent a further telegram to inform Sir Horace Tozer, immediately it was done, that the Convention had decided to adjourn on Friday next to the 20th January at Parliament House, Melbourne. Perhaps that will be considered an intimation to Sir Horace Tozer, because a formal intimation had already been made by the President of the practical intention of the Convention, which has since been carried out.

[P.1092] starts here

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[4.40]:
    I quite agree with the hon. and learned member, Dr. Quick, that we ought to send a reply from the Convention. Of course, the weight that would attach to the reply of the leader of the Convention would be undoubted; but I think that a letter or a telegram addressed to this Convention demands some reply by, resolution adopted by the Convention. I hope that even now the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, will see his way clear to submit a resolution which will be a formal reply to the telegram and letter received.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I will take that into consideration, and possibly, move a resolution on Friday.

The PRESIDENT:
I need hardly say that the telegram and letter addressed to the President have, in accordance with the wish of the Convention, been duly acknowledged. With regard to the resolution now suggested, it will be competent to give notice to-morrow of a resolution for Friday.

Question resolved in the affirmative.
Convention adjourned at 4.41 p.m.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Dr. QUICK gave notice that tomorrow he would move:

That there be laid upon the table a copy of the report of the late conference of colonial premiers with the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

The Hon. E. BARTON gave notice that to-morrow he would move the following motions:-

That it be an instruction to the Committee of the Whole on the Commonwealth Bill that they have power to reconsider all clauses already considered before considering the clauses not yet considered; and that the standing orders be suspended to enable the Committee so to do.

That this Convention desires to express its gratification at the announcement contained in the Hon. Sir Horace Tozer's communication, and its fervent hope that representatives of the people of Queensland will take part in its adjourned deliberations.

PLAN.

Motion (Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:

That the Clerk be authorised to return to Mr. Glynn the plan laid upon the table yesterday so soon as it has been lithographed and copies thereof circulated.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.33]:

I desire to move without notice a purely formal motion relating to the business of the Convention, namely:-

That this Convention at its rising to-day do adjourn until to-morrow afternoon at half-past 2 o'clock.

I think that that will be a convenient time at which to meet. I do not think that there will be more than an hour's work for hon. members to do.
Question resolved in the affirmative.
Convention adjourned at 10.34 a.m.
PETITIONS.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS presented a petition from the Grand Lodge of New South Wales of the Independent Order of Good Templars praying that provision may be made in the federal constitution to preserve to each state the right to prevent the importation of intoxicating liquors and opium.

The petition was received.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF HOSPITALITY.

OFFICERS OF CONVENTION.

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER (South Australia)[2.31]:

Before the business of the day is called on, I should like, Mr. President, on behalf of the visitors to this colony, to thank the Government and the people of New South Wales for the gracious manner in which they have received us, and for the splendid hospitality with which they have entertained us. We have had two great difficulties to contend with while we have been here. The one was to know which of the numerous invitations which have been showered upon us we should accept, and the other to reconcile with the performance of our duties the attendance at a great many of the entertainments which we have been able to accept. I feel sure that there is no member of the Convention who will not leave the colony deeply impressed with the manner in which we have been received and treated. I may, perhaps, add a word or two in reference to the officials of the Convention, who by their aid and assistance have lightened our duties so far as they possibly could; and it would not be proper for me to sit down without giving my meed of thanks and acknowledgment to the Hansard Staff for the splendid manner in which they have performed their duties. It has been perfectly marvellous that, after a long debate extending in some cases nearly up to midnight, we should have received before we met again next morning splendid reports of the speeches which had been made-reports which, in most cases, required no alterations at all, and which in many cases were, perhaps, improvements upon the speeches which had been made. I do not think it necessary to say more than to again voice the opinions of every member of the Convention in acknowledging our thanks to the Government and people of New South Wales.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH (Tasmania)[2.34]:

Lest there should be any lack of response from the other colonies to the very fitting observations which the hon. and learned member, Sir Richard Baker, has offered upon behalf of the visiting representatives, I rise, in the absence of the Right Hon. Sir Edward Braddon, to offer my cordial concurrence in everything which the hon. and learned member has said, and, on behalf of Tasmania, to emphasise, if possible, his remarks. I know of no colony in the group which is so desirous of extending a hospitable welcome to the friends who visit it from time to time than is New South Wales-unless it be Tasmania. I am exceedingly sorry that I am not likely to see our friends in Tasmania at the coming session of the Convention; but we shall look forward with the greatest desire for an opportunity to occur at some time or other when I trust that the great pleasures which we have enjoyed under the capital climatic influences of this season of the year in New South Wales may be repeated wherever we go, and particularly in the island to which I belong. I cordially indorse what has been said by the hon. and learned member, Sir Richard Baker, and would like, if it were possible, to add thereto.

*The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria)[2.35]:

In the absence of the Premier of Victoria, I have pleasure in heartily indorsing the opinions which the more distant colonies have already expressed. We who are next-door neighbours of this magnificent colony are naturally most familiar with the unstinted hospitality which is at all times extended to visitors to New South Wales; but in this case, familiarity, instead of producing its customary and proverbial results, only increases our desire to enjoy it still more frequently.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[2.36]:

I am very glad indeed, on behalf of Western Australia, to accord our best thanks to the Government and people of New South Wales for the very generous hospitality which they have extended to us. We had an opportunity before this, in 1891, of knowing the hospitality that New South Wales extends to the representatives of other colonies on occasions of this kind. My only regret is that we who come from the far off colony of Western Australia have so many opportunities of partaking of the hospitality of New South Wales, and other colonies, and but very little opportunity indeed of returning that hospitality. I only hope that the time is not far off when we in Western Australia may have an opportunity of showing to the representatives of these eastern colonies that we reciprocate in every way their kindness, and we hope to be able to show them, as far as our opportunities and means go, that we shall be very pleased to do all we can to make their visit to our colony enjoyable. I do not say these words as meaning only an occasion of this kind; but if any of the delegates who are here come to that far-off colony which I represent, and let me know that they are coming, I shall be glad to show them any attention that I possibly can. I have very much pleasure in giving my accord and that of my colleagues to the very kind and suitable expressions used by the hon.
member, Sir Richard Baker.

The Hon. J.N. BRUNKER (New South Wales)[2.38]:

In the absence of the Premier, I accept with gratitude the kind expressions of opinion by the representatives of the various colonies to the Government and people of New South Wales. I can assure you, sir, that it has been a source of great pleasure and satisfaction not only to contribute as largely as possible to the comfort and happiness of our visitors, but also, if possible, with a view to reciprocating the kind treatment which the representatives of New South Wales received at the hands of the South Australian Government. It has not only been a source, of pleasure to us to receive our friends with the utmost cordiality, but that feeling is partaken of by the great majority of the people of New South Wales, who, I am sure, have received an important lesson from the educational tendency of the debates and the eloquent speeches to which we have listened from the representatives ' of the other colonies during the time we have been engaged in considering the important subject which we have been discussing within the last two or three weeks. I thank the hon. member, Sir Richard Baker, for the kind terms in which he expressed himself; and also the representatives of the other colonies, and I can only assure hon.
members that, if it is our pleasure to meet them here again, they will be welcomed with as much hospitality as it has afforded us great pleasure to be able to extend to them on this occasion.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales)[2.39]:

As the head of the Hansard Staff, I return, on their behalf, my sincere thanks for the kind manner in which Sir Richard Baker spoke of that body.
The Hansard Staff of the Parliament of New South Wales is one of which every member of that body is proud, and there is no person in this community more proud of that Hansard Staff and of the officers of the Legislative Assembly than I am. On behalf of the Hansard
Staff, I may say that from the chief downwards every man is actuated by a desire to do his best to carry out the duties of his office.

INSTRUCTION TO COMMITTEE.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[2.41] rose to move:

That it be an instruction to the Committee of the Whole on the Commonwealth Bill that they have power to reconsider all clauses already considered before considering the clauses not yet considered, and that the standing orders be suspended to enable the Committee so to do.

He said: I will ask leave presently to amend the motion in one particular. Hon. members will recollect that it was for the purpose of carrying out their desires with reference to drafting amendments necessary in the bill that the Convention allowed the Drafting Committee the whole of yesterday and part of to-day, in order to bring the bill into the form in which, as far as we could judge, the Convention desired it to be. I will ask leave to amend the motion by inserting after the words "clauses not yet considered" the words "and to accept the suggested amendments of the Drafting Committee by one resolution." I do not propose to make that course an instruction to the Committee in the sense that they are to do it, but simply to enable the Committee to facilitate their own business in such a way as they may please. Hon. members will find from the print of these amendments, which will be here in a minute or two, that they are confined to dealing with the amendments which the Committee themselves have made, except in the few points of drafting, but that in addition to matters covered by that expression, there is one matter and one only in which, though the Convention has not made a distinct amendment, an amendment has been made by the Drafting Committee, and it is in the clauses dealing with disqualification for electing or sitting of members. Hon. members will find that by clauses 45 and 46 persons attainted of treason or convicted of felony or other infamous crime are excluded from election and from sitting. In that respect the Drafting Committee had to gather the intention of the Convention. There was a general view expressed that the words "felony or other infamous crime" were too indefinite to remain in the bill, and, therefore, the Drafting Committee had to gather the sense of the debate, which was that these matters should be regulated by some term of punishment applicable to the offence, and all that they, have done in that respect, had been to leave out the words "felony or of any infamous crime" and to insert the following words:

Any offence punishable under the law of the commonwealth or of a state, by imprisonment for three years or longer.

That is the only substantial amendment which the Convention will find has been implanted in the amendments by the Drafting Committee, and that was done in accordance with what they conceived to be the general sense of the Convention during the debate, and according to a suggestion made by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, which seemed to me to meet with great acceptance, so that I think it will be considered that, they have not taken a liberty there in any sense. This provision, if accepted, will remain in the bill simply to be dealt with at our meeting in Melbourne. With reference to the clauses about deadlocks, all that there has been any opportunity of doing has been to shorten them as much as possible consistent with fully expressing the meaning of the amendments carried. I think hon. members will find, after this Convention, that these provisions will need some amendment to bring them more into consistency with each other. It was not the work of the Drafting Committee to bring them into consistency with each other; but simply to express the intentions of the Convention, and that they have faithfully adhered to. I will ask leave to amend the motion in this way, in order that if the Committee so choose they may, after the statement I have made, accept the amendments in globo, knowing, of course, that they will be all open to be dealt with when we meet in Melbourne. I ask leave to amend the motion by inserting after the words "clauses not yet considered" the words "and to accept the suggested amendments of the Drafting Committee by one resolution."

Some hon. members may wonder why the preamble, and other parts of the bill which excited discussion, have not been amended by the Drafting Committee. It was no part of their business to go beyond the point which the Committee itself had reached in the bill, so that hon. members will not find any amendment suggested in any clause beyond clause 7. The preamble being the last thing to be considered in the bill-until we came to the title-the Committee could not touch it; but recognising the strong feeling which exists amongst some members of the Convention that there should be some recognition of the power and wisdom of the Almighty, and invoking His assistance, there will be an amendment prepared which may be used in Melbourne, if necessary.

Amendment, by leave, amended.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[2.48]:

There is nothing to show which clauses have been amended and which have not. The Hon. E. BARTON: Yes; that is shown!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I mean it is not shown in the bill itself; there are no asterisks or anything of that kind. I should be the last to raise any difficulty in the way of, or to show any want of appreciation, of the work of the Drafting Committee, because I recognise most fully that our deepest thanks are due to these gentlemen for the great care and trouble, and the amount of study and time they have devoted to its very important work. I am sure that nothing but our best thanks are due to them. Nevertheless, I must say, in regard to the amendment in clause 45 just referred to by the leader of the Convention, that it seems to me that, seeing that we are to meet again, it would be just as well if we left the clause in the bill as framed in Adelaide. I do not exactly understand what the effect of the words will be. It seems to me that no one wants persons who are suffering a term of imprisonment eligible to be members of the commonwealth parliament. I take it that the person who has received a sentence of two years for some infamous offence is still eligible, without having purged the whole of his offence by serving the whole of his time, to be a member of the parliament.

The Hon. E. Barton:
In a case of that kind he is punishable by the term of three years, or perhaps longer, by the law of all the colonies. The matter is not regulated by the amount of punishment awarded but by the amount to which he was liable.

The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest:
I have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that if he has received a sentence of two years imprisonment he is as bad, or almost as bad, as the man who has received a sentence of three years' imprisonment. I think we ought to guard our parliament against gentlemen of that character, and it appears to be clear now that a man sentenced to three years' imprisonment may serve any time less than three years-

The Hon. E. Barton:
Oh no! Perhaps the right hon. gentleman will allow me to explain. The liability to punishment regulates matters. A man might commit an offence for which he was liable to three years' imprisonment or more. The court might treat him with leniency, and he might be sentenced to less than three years' imprisonment. But, nevertheless, he would by the operation of this clause, be excluded from being eligible or from sitting, inasmuch as the offence itself entailed a liability to punishment to that extent; so that, even if he had served less than the three years mentioned in the bill, he would still be excluded so long as his offence was in such a category that he could be punished to that extent.

The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest:
I take it that when a prisoner is released, the disability is removed, and be would be eligible.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
Yes, that is right!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I cannot see any force in that—that if a man receives a sentence of three years' imprisonment, and serves two years, be is still eligible.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The law supposes that he would have atoned for his offence when he had served two years!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I should not like to see gentlemen of that character sitting in Parliament.

The PRESIDENT:
It would probably be more convenient to discuss this matter in Committee. The question now is, that when the Committee have the amendments before them, they shall have power to dispose of them all by one motion, if it is deemed fit to do so.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[2.52]:
I have not had time to look through these amendments, and I think it would be useless to attempt to analyse them at the present time. We have the assurance of the leader of the Convention, on behalf of the Drafting Committee, that there is nothing new excepting what the hon. and learned gentleman referred to; but what I rose particularly for was to ask the leader of the Convention whether any report has been received from the Finance Committee, and whether any suggestions have been made with reference to the financial proposals, and, if not, whether the financial question simply rests where it was before, the bill being the same as when it, left the hands of the Convention at Adelaide, and the whole matter is to be considered when the Convention meets in Melbourne?

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[2.53]:
The position is this: The Committee have not gone beyond clause 70. The finance clauses proper are from 90 to 93, and therefore the Committee have of course not touched them, nor, consequently, could the Drafting Committee in any way touch them, and the whole of the financial provisions remain to be considered in Melbourne. All the Drafting Committee have been able to do has been to circulate some clauses, carrying out what they gathered to be the wish of a considerable number of hon. members during the debate. But it is a mere matter of drafting, and does not bind hon. members down to anything. Those clauses are mere suggestions, and in the meantime the clauses agreed to at Adelaide remain in the bill, subject to being dealt with at Melbourne. In reply to the question asked by the hon. member as to the meeting of the Finance Committee, I may state that the Finance Committee did meet, and they resolved that for the present the proper course was that the two representatives of each colony on that committee should communicate with each other, and prepare memoranda which should be exchanged before the meeting of the Convention in Melbourne, and that, if possible, the Finance Committee should meet before the Convention meets in Melbourne and deliberate on the suggestions that they may make to the Convention.

Question resolved in the affirmative. COMMUNICATION FROM QUEENSLAND.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[2.55] rose to move:

That this Convention desires to express its gratification at the announcement contained in the Hon. Sir Horace Tozer's communication, and its fervent hope that representatives of the people of Queensland will take part in its adjourned deliberations.

He said: This is a motion that requires very little speech to commend it. Everyone knows the ardent desire which the representatives of all the colonies now engaged in this work have that Queensland should take part in our deliberations, and the feeling we all entertain that while we may make an effective and powerful federation without Queensland, there can be none that is complete without her. Our opinion on this matter has been often enough expressed in debate. Those debates have reached our friends in Queensland, and I think they are well assured not only of the feeling of the members of the Convention, but of the public feeling throughout the colonies. I have not only an ardent hope but a profound conviction that that cordial feeling which the other colonies entertain for the colony of Queensland, and the prospect of the benefits which will arise to that colony from joining in the federation—which without the slightest doubt I believe will before long be accomplished—will induce Queensland to take part in our deliberations at Melbourne.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales)[2.58]:

I am one of those who believe that, sooner or later, Queensland will be one of the largest of the Australian states, and I am one who will rejoice immensely if the Queensland legislature can see its way to send representatives to this Convention. But I am not one of those who have the slightest sympathy with the Queensland Government in the manner in which they have dealt with this question. We were told in Adelaide that if, by any means, there was a possibility of postponing the ultimate determination of the Convention, we should have Queensland with us. The Government of Queensland have, on two occasions, made very vague attempts to be represented in this Convention, attempts by which they failed to give the people of Queensland an opportunity of sending representatives to the Convention. I hope-speaking as a representative of New South Wales that we shall have, at our next meeting, representatives from Queensland, chosen by the people of Queensland. I hope that the opportunity, which has never yet been given to the people of Queensland as a people, to send representatives to the Convention will be afforded them. The Government took such methods as made it quite clear from the beginning that there could be no representation of that colony. As I said before, we were told in Adelaide that if by any possibility there could be an adjourned meeting of the Convention we should have Queensland represented at that adjourned meeting. We all know too well, and we all, I am sure, regret deeply, as federationists, the manner in which the Government have proposed to deal with this question in Queensland; and I am only speaking now in the hope that some warning may go to the Queensland Government to prevent them from attempting again what they have already twice attempted, and twice failed in doing, that is, to send representatives to this Convention not chosen by the people of Queensland.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

There are representatives here who were not chosen by the people!

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

The people of Queensland have never had an opportunity of sending representatives to the Convention.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Neither have those of Western Australia. That is not our business!

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

It is our business. I object to these laudatory congratulations which we ourselves must feel are insincere. I do not think the Queensland Government are to he thanked at all for their proposal to send representatives to the adjourned meeting of the Convention. But if they can learn a lesson from the past then it will be a very good thing that the adjournment of the Convention to Melbourne has been agreed to, and that, we shall have a third opportunity of considering the question. I am speaking now only with the earnest hope that a great colony like Queensland will be represented in the Convention, and I join with my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Barton, in saying that there can be no Australian federation with Queensland standing out. At the same time I am not going to praise the Queensland Government for a telegram announcing that they are going to come to the next meeting of the Convention.

Mr. GLYNN:

It does not praise them it expresses our gratification!
The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

It says that the Convention "desires to express its gratification." What does that mean? There is no gratification to me. There can be no gratification when we know what has been done in the past. Let the Queensland Government do what the governments of the other colonies have done, and I have no doubt there will be representation at our next meeting. I have no desire to do anything which will prevent the representation of Queensland at the next meeting of the Convention.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

The hon. member now is doing his best to prevent it!

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

No. I am doing my best to bring them here by a note of warning to the Queensland Government that there is no use in further trifling with the question. They have twice sent messages to the Convention.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The motion before the Convention only expresses gratification at the announcement contained in the letter of Sir Horace Tozer!

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

Well, I feel no gratification about it, because I doubt its sincerity. We were told the same thing in Adelaide. The telegram, which was sent from Queensland then was received by the members of the Convention with cheers. I at the time expressed the opinion that Queensland would not be represented at this session, and I express the opinion now that if the matter rests with the Government of Queensland, that colony will not be represented at the next adjournment of the Convention.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

We are not asked to express our gratification at the action of the Queensland Government, but with the announcement contained in the letter.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

Well, I am not gratified with the announcement.

Dr. QUICK:

The hon. member is singular!

I may be singular, but I am truthful and sincere.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

We are sincere, whether the Queensland Government are so or not!

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I want to see Queensland represented, and no one will rejoice more than I shall if Queensland is represented here. I look upon Queensland as the colony possessing the greatest resources in Australia, and sooner or later it must be a powerful component of federated Australia. I earnestly hope that Queensland will be with us at our next meeting; but, at the same time, I must express my doubts as to the sincerity of the Government of that colony.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON (Tasmania)[3.2]:

I do not think that hon. members of the Convention can entertain any doubt as to the advisability of expressing our deep gratification at the hope now presented to us that Queensland will be represented at the next meeting of the Convention. I do not think that any uncertainty or hesitancy upon the part of the Queensland Government—if there has been such uncertainty or hesitancy—should influence us at this moment. We are dealing now, not so much with the Government as with the people of Queensland, from whom, or from whose representatives, as I understand it, this new movement in regard to the representation of the colony here has arisen. For my own part, whatever may be my opinion as to the past action of the Queensland Government, I shall cordially join in the course which is now proposed to us.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria)[3.3]:

I have great pleasure in supporting the motion, and in joining in the sentiment of gratification at the announcement contained in the communication of Sir Horace Tozer, which is expressed in the motion before us. I should be very sorry indeed to utter a single jarring note upon the present occasion, and I am quite sure that the hon. member, Sir Joseph Abbott, had no intention whatever to do so in the statement which he has just made. People at a distance can hardly form a correct or an adequate idea of the local difficulties with which the Government of Queensland may have had to contend in dealing with this question. When I visited Brisbane less than a couple of years ago, I waited on the Right Hon. Sir Hugh Nelson in connection with this movement, and from the statement he made to me then I was led to believe that he was thoroughly sound upon the federal question, and desired to do all he possibly could to forward it. There may be, and there have been, local difficulties in the way of the Government, both from their own supporters as well as from the Opposition, which have led to delay in the representation of Queensland at the Convention; but I think that, notwithstanding this delay, we ought to hold out the hand of welcome without stint and without qualification. I think that we are all delighted to find that by a resolution of her Legislative Assembly, Queensland has determined to be represented, not by a nominated delegation, not by a delegation chosen by the legislature of Queensland; but by representatives elected by the whole people. I feel confident that in the representatives elected by the people of Queensland at large we shall have a strong representation, which will be able to place before this Convention at its adjourned meeting at Melbourne views and considerations which will be of great weight, and which will be of great assistance in helping this Convention to place the finishing touches upon this federal constitution. We have every reason to be pleased. I concur in the view so often expressed by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, that no federation will be perfect unless the whole of Australia is represented in the federation, and unless the whole of Australia is able to confirm the constitution. If the whole of Australia is represented at this final sitting, we shall have all the stronger hope of arriving at an ultimate decision, which we will be able to recommend to our respective colonies.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[3.6]:

The importance of Queensland to the federation could not be painted in stronger terms than those used by the Hon. Sir Joseph Abbott. Therefore, we cannot do less than express our gratification that the colony which is great, and which in the opinion of the Hon. Sir Joseph Abbott will be the greatest, has through its people's house pledged its national faith to be represented at the adjourned meeting of the Convention. It is from that point of view, recognising at once the importance of the subject, that I readily support this motion.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales)[3.7]:

As an old Queenslander, it affords me the greatest pleasure to hear that we may expect Queensland to be with us at the adjourned meeting. Only this morn-allowed to say that the Government of Queensland have had very good reasons, which are not known to hon. gentlemen, for the apparent delay which has occurred since the meeting that we held in Adelaide. The understanding then was, on behalf of Sir Hugh Nelson and Sir Horace Tozer, that the Parliament would be content to have representatives chosen as follows by itself: Namely, two from the Upper House, three from the Opposition, and five from the Ministerial side of the Lower House. Ministers had every reason to suppose that that proposition would be accepted by the Assembly, and they therefore did not call Parliament together so early as they otherwise would have done. When the Assembly met it turned out that there was a coalition against the proposal to send representatives elected by Parliament, and then Sir Horace Tozer regretted that the Government had not called Parliament together earlier. It was impossible at that late period in the session to appeal to the people in time to be with us. I am quite sure that Sir Horace Tozer and others would have been quite satisfied to do that if they had not, as they thought, the assurance of Parliament in the previous session that it would elect representatives. I am sure there is no desire, and never has been, on the part of the Government of Queensland to treat us otherwise than courteously. I am glad to see the growing spirit of brotherhood among all the colonies on this question of federation, and I shall be both pained and surprised if Queensland is not represented by ten as able men as a delegation as we have had the pleasure of meeting here.

The Hon. J.N. BRUNKER (New South Wales)[3.10]:

Without entering into any details, I, as an Australian, am exceedingly gratified to assent to the proposition which has been submitted by our worthy leader. I hail it as, another link in that connection which I am sure we all so much desire, that is, that Queensland shall be associated with us in any constitution which is framed for the federation of these great colonies. Queensland has been for so long associated with New South Wales that we all recognise her greatness, and her magnificent resources, and wish her every prosperity. I also concur with the opinion which has been expressed, that without Queensland this federation would be incomplete. I therefore hope that at our next meeting she maybe fully represented. I am sure that we shall all extend the hand of welcome to her representatives who come to take part in the formation of that great federation which we hope to see established in Australasia.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[3.11]:

I simply rise to express my entire concurrence with the proposal made by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Barton. I am sure that it will be a great gain to all of us to have Queensland represented in this Convention, and every one, I think, will allow that a federation which excludes Queensland from it will not be the federation that we are all looking forward to. We have had opportunities to judge of the public men of Queensland here in 1891 and on other occasions, and, speaking for myself, I never had an opportunity to work with men who took a greater interest in all that appertains to the welfare of the Australian continent, and I shall be very, glad indeed if, in the concluding sitting of the Convention, we shall have the privilege of being associated with the public men of Queensland. I cordially concur with this motion, which, I think, is very opportune, and altogether desirable. I regretted, however, to hear the speech of the hon. member, Sir Joseph Abbott:

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

The hon. member should rejoice!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I really think the hon. member could not have thought of what he was saying when he made those observations, when he took upon himself to warn the people of Queensland. I have no doubt that the people of Queensland are quite capable of looking after their own business without any warning from the hon. gentleman or from any one else. To apply the expression "warning" to a great country is, I think, altogether improper. I am sure that my hon. friend will not like the expressions he used in regard to that colony when he sees them in print.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

Yes, he will!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

If the hon. member does approve of the words he used, all that I can say is that I think he stands alone in this Convention. I do not think that this is the time for us to warn one another or to threaten. This is a time when we should show good feeling and mutual respect in every way. We do not know, not being in Queensland, the difficulties which the Government have had to encounter there. It is all very well for hon. members who are now safe in their seats in this Convention to make little of the difficulties which have surrounded the Queensland Government in dealing with this question. I have no doubt that they have had great difficulties to contend with.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

They had no greater difficulties than other governments!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Perhaps if the course had to be followed in some of these colonies at the present time, the difficulties would not be so small as they were when we dealt with them. At any rate, I am not one who will make any observations which will in any way reflect on the Government of Queensland, because I think it is a matter which is entirely within their own jurisdiction, and I feel quite certain that all they have done they can fully justify. I have very much pleasure in according my support to the motion.

The Hon. H. DOBSON (Tasmania)[3.14]:

I think we shall all be very glad to learn whether our hon. leader has any intimation from Queensland as to whether the dates which have been fixed will suit the Queensland delegates? We have already had two sittings of this Convention, and on each occasion I regret to say we fixed a date which did not allow us time to finish our very important work, and as we have left, most unwise I think, a very great deal of work to be settled in Melbourne, it is most important that we should fix a date which is equally convenient to everybody, particularly to our Queensland friends, whom we all wish to welcome at the next sitting of the Convention.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.15], in reply:

I should like to remind my hon. friend, Sir Joseph Abbott, that the resolution passed by the Legislative Assembly of Queensland was:

That in the opinion of this House the Acting Chief Secretary should request the Australasian Federal Convention now sitting in Sydney not to conclude its work until Queensland has an opportunity of being represented at that Convention by representatives directly appointed by the electors of the colony.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

That may postpone action indefinitely!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Queensland may postpone action indefinitely; but I take it that the Convention will regard this resolution as the strongest bona fide expression of intention on the part of the representative House in Brisbane to be represented at the adjourned sittings of the Convention. I take it that that body would not have requested the Convention not to adjourn its work—that is to say, not to conclude its work—until they had an opportunity of being represented, unless there had been a direct intention on their part to be represented, as they have put it, by representatives directly appointed by the electors of the colony.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Hear, hear; that is the point!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

That is to say, appointed in the same way as representatives of four of the colonies have been appointed, and as no doubt, had circumstances been different the representatives of the fifth of the colonies would have been appointed. There is the strength, as it appears to me, of this intimation: first, that the request would not be made unless the intention to be represented was strong and, next, that that intention is fully explained in the concluding words of the motion referring to representations by direct appointment by the electors of the colony. That direct appointment by the electors of the colony is the method which has not had its part in either of the bills hitherto introduced by the Government of Queensland. It is a new departure on their part and one which brings them into line with the remainder of the colonies, and one which, I believe, we will find has given their representatives when they elect them, the greatest force possible in deliberations of this kind. Therefore, I think that we ought to be gratified at such an announcement, both as an expression of the intention and as an expression as to the way in which that intention is to be carried out. I think there is, on all these points, a distinct departure from anything hitherto done by Queensland, and that is the real reason for our gratification.

The Hon. J.N. BRUNKER:
That resolution was affirmed by a large vote of the Assembly!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
As the hon. member reminds me, the resolution was affirmed by, I think a vote of 38 to 12.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Counting the pairs?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Yes, I suppose, counting the pairs. I have been asked a question by the hon. member, Mr. Dobson, as to whether any communication has been received by Queensland approving of the date fixed for the Adjourned meeting of the Convention, or suggesting that the date should be altered. As soon as the resolution—or at least within an hour or two, afterwards—was arrived at to the effect that the adjourned sittings should begin in Melbourne on the 20th January, I telegraphed the fact to Sir Horace Tozer, and as I have had no reply from him expressing any dissatisfaction, nor as I understand has any one else, I take it that Queensland is not dissatisfied with the fixing of that date. I hope that the resolution will be carried unanimously.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT:
I desire to lay on the table the reply which has been sent to Queensland pursuant to the direction of the Convention.

Motion (the Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:
RETURN OF PLAN.

Resolved (on motion Hon. E. BARTON):
That the Clerk of the Convention be authorised to return to Mr. Glynn the original plan, laid on the table on Wednesday, September 22nd, showing the levels of the Murray and Darling Rivers, &c.

CONFERENCE OF COLONIAL PREMIERS.
Dr. QUICK (Victoria)[3.19] rose to move:
That there laid before this Convention a copy of the report of the late conference of Colonial Premiers with the right hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies.

He said: This report contains very valuable expressions of opinion by the right hon. the Secretary of State, and they will probably be of great interest and use at the adjourned sitting of the Convention.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
In Committee (consideration resumed from 22nd September, vide page 1091):
Motion (Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:
That the consideration of the remainder of clause 52 be further postponed.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.21]:
The Committee have power to reconsider all clauses already considered before considering the clauses not yet considered; but I propose to take a course which may perhaps satisfy hon. members at this stage. I think that I shall have the sense of the Committee with me in moving:
That the Committee do now agree to the suggested amendments of the Drafting Committee.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[3.22]:
I wish to call the attention of the Drafting Committee to one matter which has struck me. I notice that an expression which was used in the clause relating to deadlocks has been altered in one particular which may or may not be of importance. It is as regards the first part of the provision.

An Hon. MEMBER:
What is the number of the amendment?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
Amendment 32, page 5. The form in which it was passed, I think on the motion of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, provided that if the senate should fail to pass a proposed law, and if the governor-general should dissolve the house of representatives, and if within six months after the dissolution, the house of representatives, by a certain majority, should pass that law again, then certain consequences should ensue. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, expressly struck out the words in the amendment, as originally proposed, "on that account," referring to the dissolution, and there was nothing which necessarily connected the dissolution with the original trouble. All that was provided, so I took it, was that after the trouble there should be a dissolution which would enable the sense of the country to be taken.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
That is so in the bill now!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
There is one word there which was not in the amendment originally carried by us.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
"Thereupon"!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
Yes; if the governor-general should "thereupon" dissolve the house—that is, on the dispute. Certainly it was not so expressed in the amendment as originally carried.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
That is not in the bill!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
It is not in the bill.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
That is the recommendation of the Drafting Committee, I understand!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Our interpretation of the meaning of the Convention!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
In the bill as reported on September 22nd, as amended in Committee, the word "thereupon" does not occur. I am not expressing my opinion finally on the matter.

[P.1105] starts here

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
It's all right!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
I do not always see eye to eye in these matters with the right hon. member, Sir John Forrest, and something which would recommend itself to him might not recommend itself to me. I simply call the attention of the Drafting Committee to the word "thereupon," and I suggest that it to some extent might be construed, or it might be argued that it should be construed, to restore the clause to the shape in which it was originally proposed with the words "on that account" in it, and which was not acceptable to the House. I commend the matter to the further consideration of the Drafting Committee, and at the right time, which I do not consider to be the present, I shall have a further opportunity of referring to it.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria) [3.26]:

I notice that in amendment 5, Chapter 1, clause 13, in the clause as printed, the Drafting Committee suggest the following words for adoption:-

After the senate first meets and after each first meeting of the senate following a dissolution thereof the senate shall by lot divide the senators chosen for each state as soon as may be into two classes as nearly equal in number as practicable.

The dissolution of what was originally a continuous body necessitates provision for what is to take place after the dissolution. I was somewhat interested to learn the view the Drafting Committee would take as to the redistribution of seats, or the redistribution of terms. It struck me that the best way to redistribute the terms upon re-election would not be by lot, as upon the first election to the federal parliament, but that the new senators should be divided into two classes, according to their position on the poll.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

That would be a matter for the Convention, and one with which the Drafting Committee could not deal!

Dr. QUICK:

On the amendment being made providing for a dissolution of the senate, there was a hiatus in the bill, and the Drafting Committee has suggested that provision should be made in the direction of choice by lot, to determine the order of subsequent retirement of senators.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Those words remain in the clause all the time!

Dr. QUICK:

Those words have reference to the first determination by lot; but the amendment made by the Convention made no provision-

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It was for a continuous dealing with the matter!

Dr. QUICK:

I would suggest that the Drafting Committee should take this into consideration—whether upon a dissolution of the senate in the case of a deadlock, instead of the seats being distributed by lot—that is, by chance or by accident—the principle should be adopted of redistributing the seats, or the term of the seats, according to the position in which the returned senators stand upon the poll. In that case the senators who had gained apparently the highest esteem of the electors would have the longest term of office, and that would be an advantage to which they would be reasonably entitled, rather than that it should be left to a matter of chance or lot.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
That principle should apply equally to the first election!

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.28]:

This was a matter with which the Drafting Committee could not deal. We found that the principle of the division of the senate into classes was determination by lot. We had to leave that in the bill as it stood, because it was not for us to make any substantial amendment. Therefore, we retain the principle, merely providing for the case of a dissolution of the senate. It will be for the Convention, if they agree with my hon. and learned friend, to amend this provision in Mel-

[P.1106] starts here
bourne. As my hon. and learned friend, Mr. O'Connor, has pointed out, if the division is to be according to the position on the polls after a dissolution, then the two classes should be so divided in the first instance also. It was a more important question than the Drafting Committee could decide, and one for the Convention alone, whether that alteration should be made. As to the suggestion thrown out by the right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, the use of the word "thereupon" arises from this consideration: In the amendment as originally framed in the Convention the words, as he correctly says "on that account" occurred. These words were struck out, The Drafting Committee presumed that they we

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria)[3.31]:

The word "thereupon" meets with the objection that it is capable of more than one interpretation. If in Melbourne we come to decide, as the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, has suggested, that this dissolution should follow within a reasonable time we had better may so, or clearly express whatever else we mean. The word "thereupon" creates ambiguity and we had better avoid it. With regard to the question of choosing the senators by lot, the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, is aware that I entertained a strong opinion in Adelaide against the adoption of any such method, unless no equally good means could be devised. I have always thought that one of the means which might be chosen is to fix the terms of members in the order in which they are placed at the poll. That, however, is a, matter which will be properly open to discussion when we meet again.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[3.32]:
The explanation given by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, rather confirms me in the objection which I take to the use of this expression. I should like to remind hon. members that when the amendment was recommended to our notice it was said to be based upon the provision made by South Australia, and it was made to more closely resemble it by striking out the words "on that account." The South Australian provision was that if there were a dispute between the two houses, and after a general election had taken place, that dispute was repeated in the next parliament, certain consequences should ensure. The words used in South Australia are "after a general election." Here a different expression is being used. We speak of "a dissolution," and that word is being emphasised by the use of the word "thereupon," which the more I think of it, the more I feel disposed to consider a grave mistake. It altogether alters the position, which should be that if the house of assembly, having submitted to a general election-I do not care whether it is after a dissolution, or after the expiry of parliament by effluxion of time-comes back and renews a dispute with the senate, the power of sending the senate to its constituents to ascertain whether the newly elected house of assembly faithfully represents the popular view, shall be exercisable. I think it is a pity that we should have departed from the South Australian provision. It would have been better to speak of "general elections"; but those words were not used in the amendment which was moved. I trust that when we finally deal with this clause we shall more closely approach the provision in South Australia, and shall omit the word "thereupon," which appears to authorise an interpretation with which some may sympathise, but to which I strongly object.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Motion (by Hon. E. BARTON) proposed:
That the Chairman do now leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again on the 20th January.

Dr. QUICK:

The Hon. E. BARTON:
As soon as the President takes the chair, I shall move that the bill be printed, embodying the amendments up to date. It will be in the hands of the Government Printer tonight, and hon. members will receive copies of it as quickly as they can be distributed.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Will a note be placed against the clauses which have yet to be considered?
The Hon. E. BARTON:
I will make a note that the amendments so far made in the bill are only up to clause 70, or that Clauses 71 to 121 have not yet been considered.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
An asterisk might be placed against those clauses!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
So long as we know that we start from clause 70 we do not want an asterisk.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria)[3.35]:
If I may offer a suggestion, it would be that in addition to distributing these copies of the bill in a few days, the leader of the Convention might have another copy prepared which would show the amendments made at this sitting of the Convention in different type-erased type for portions struck out and larger type for words inserted. It would be an immense convenience.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The bill as it is will be distributed as quickly as possible. I will take steps to have the other portions gone through, which will meet the Right Hon.
Sir John Forrest's suggestion, and a second distribution of the bill printed in the same way as the Parliamentary Drafts. man in Victoria arranged it.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Exactly, and in that bill the wish of the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest could be met by placing an asterisk against the clauses, or by adopting some other method, to show which clauses have been considered here and which have not.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
There will be a note to explain what has been done; it is a mere matter of detail!

Question resolved in the affirmative.
Progress reported and leave obtained to sit again on the 20th January next.

ADJOURNMENT.

PRESIDENT-CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES-LEADER OF CONVENTION-CLERK.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.38"] rose to move:
That this Convention do now adjourn.

He said: I should like to express my acknowledgments, in the first place, generally, for the courtesy and forbearance with which hon. members have treated me

[P.1108] starts here
throughout the deliberations of this Convention. Of course, while on the one hand, every one will acknowledge it is no easy task to keep every thing going with the accuracy and order that is necessary for properly piloting a bill of this kind; on the other hand, it must be obvious to us all and especially to me, that anything in the way of impatience on one side or the other is apt to throw things very much out of their proper gear. For my part, I can say that the patience and kindliness with which every suggestion I have made for the conduct of business has been received by hon. members has deeply impressed me, and that I owe them my warmest gratitude for their kind cooperation, exhibited in such an extremely courteous and generous manner. I have nothing more than that to say, except that I trust the same feeling of approximation which has characterised this session of the Convention, and the marked growth in federal feeling since our deliberations in Adelaide, will continue and expand during our deliberations in Melbourne. If it does so, and so long as we adhere—as I am sure we shall—to that which we consider just to the several colonies entering into this union, as long as we adhere to that principle, then the more the feeling I allude to grows, the more certain will the conviction be, not only amongst ourselves, but out of doors, that in this present movement the federal principle will find its consummation in a great statute which will bind the colonies together for ever.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria)[3.40]:

I have one sentence to say, and that is on behalf, I am sure, of the whole of the Convention. If its leader has reason to speak in the generous terms which he has employed of the courtesy and consideration which have been shown to him, we certainly cannot have surpassed, if we have equalled, the courtesy and consideration which he has shown to us.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[3.41]:

The sentiments expressed by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, were those which I myself had intended to express. We owe a great deal more to our hon. and learned friend, Mr. Barton, than he has been so good as to say he owes to us. I feel under a deep debt of obligation to him for the way in which he has thrown himself into, this matter. When we recollect the hard work he has performed, and the many questions which he has always so courteously answered, I am sure that we must all feel that in him we have had a guide, philosopher, and friend, and one who has taken a a great deal of trouble to keep us all well posted on this matter. I am sure we will all separate feeling that we are better friends, if that be possible, than we were when we commenced our labours. I regret that we have to meet again, because it will be an inconvenience to many of us. At the same time, it will be a great pleasure to us all, I am sure, to meet again and continue the work we have been engaged on now for so long. We will reassemble, perhaps, with a greater determination than ever to try to meet one another's views as far as possible, and to keep our eyes upon the main object we have in view. I feel sure that when we do meet the timidity of these colonies having the larger populations in regard to the smaller ones will have somewhat disappeared. They will have no fear, I am sure, as they to some extent had during this session, that the smaller colonies will, even if they had the power, any inclination to do them any, injury.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
We fear most while the hon. member is here!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I am sure that the smaller colonies having a smaller population will approach the subject with as generous a feeling as it is. possible for us to do. What we will try, to do is to have confidence in the constitution which we are framing. For my own part, and I have often expressed the same sentiments in Committee, I have no fear myself that the larger populations will ever do an injustice to the smaller, or that the smaller, even if they had the power, will ever desire to do any injustice to the larger. One hope I think I may express—it is a general observation not applicable to any particular colony—and it is that this matter of federation will be kept away as far as possible from party politics In the smaller colonies as well as the larger ones. If the leaders of parties in the various colonies strive to make this a party measure, and to take advantage of any of its provisions for party purposes, a very great deal of difficulty and danger will occur. I would again express my thanks to our friend, Mr. Barton, and also to the Drafting Committee, to whom we are under a deep obligation. I would also like to express to you, sir, and to the Chairman of Committees, our thanks for the manner in which you each performed your arduous duties. In regard to our friend, Sir Richard Baker, I could not help thinking to myself many times during this session it was a fortunate thing for me that I had not gained such a reputation for knowledge of parliamentary procedure as to place me in the Chairmanship of Committees, because it seemed to me that his labours were almost continuous and very difficult. Both you, sir, and the Chairman of Committees may be assured that while you have our greatest respect you also have our sincere thanks.

[[P.1109] starts here

The Hon. J.N. BRUNKER (New South Wales)[3.45]:
I would like to add another word of praise. I am sure that the tact, energy, and ability displayed by our worthy leader in dealing with one of the most delicate matters with which he could possibly have to deal—the framing of a constitution—are worthy of our highest commendation. When we remember that, this is simply a work of patriotism, I feel sure that the labour which has been involved is not only appreciated by the members of the Convention but by the people of Australasia.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON (Tasmania)[3.46]:

I indorse most cordially, and to the fullest extent, all that, has fallen from previous speakers by way of thanks to the leader of the Convention, to his colleagues on the Drafting Committee, to the President, and to the Chairman of Committees. But for the fact—that we still look forward, and with great hope and pleasure, to having you, Mr. President, with us still further, enjoying the value of, your services, and for the final time I hope, I would say more than I am

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER (South Australia)[3.47]:

I am exceedingly obliged to the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest for the kindly remarks he has made concerning myself, and I can assure the members of the Convention that any assistance I may have given in the carrying out of this great work has been given most cordially. The labours of the Chairman of the Committee are sometimes tiresome, but on this occasion they have been greatly lightened by the courtesy of the members towards the Chair, by the manner in which they always fell in with any suggestions made for the orderly carrying out of business; and more especially is that so in reference to the leader of the Convention. I am perfectly certain it would have been impossible for us to have found any one who could have carried out those great and onerous duties in a more capable manner than has been done by our leader. That is the opinion, I am sure, not only of this Convention, but of the people of this great Australian continent. I hope that when we meet again we may finally consummate this work, that the constitution which will be, adopted will be a constitution founded on justice and equity; that it will be one which will be acceptable to the people of all the colonies; and that it will crown the edifice which we have been so laboriously constructing during the last six or seven years.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.49]:

I should be very ungrateful if I did not say one word of thanks to hon. members for the praise which they have heaped upon me, and which I fear I so little deserve. It is a labour of love to me to do anything in my power to help forward the consummation of the union of Australia. I do not know what my temperament may be in other respects, but I think I always find that the harder the work is, in connection with this subject, at any rate, the more ready am I to undertake it. There is a stimulus in a movement of this kind which is mostly absent from other public movements. It is not because it is surrounded by mere questions of sentiment—although sentiment is one of the most powerful agents in all politics—but because the realisation of the material benefits which may and will be derived from it by every colony concerned, presses so upon the mind that he would be indolent and dull-witted indeed who could not, in the realisation of all the greatness of those returns for any labour that he may undertake, find a satisfaction in his work which no other work could give him. Being in a position which, I suppose, has given me exceptional opportunities of observation, I join very heartily in the praise that has been bestowed upon my hon. and learned friend, Sir Richard Baker, for his great tact, great promptitude, and great discrimination as Chairman of Committees. As an old Speaker, I can say that I do not think that I have ever seen a more thoroughly quick-witted, and a more thoroughly skilful and considerate Chairman. Let me add that, although the time has not yet come for votes of thanks, we must all express our sense of the valuable and learned services which, for the second time, have been rendered by one of the most able authorities on parliamentary law and practice in the colonies—I mean the Clerk of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT:

Before putting the resolution, I should like to say that I indorse most heartily every word of congratulation that has been uttered in regard to those who occupy positions on the floor of the House, and that we have every reason, indeed, to be proud of the courtesy and capacity—the magnificent capacity—with which our leader has, during this session and the last, conducted the great work of Australian federation towards what I believe will shortly be the goal of its accomplishment. My position officially on this occasion has been little other than an honorable sinecure; but I should like to say that I yield to none in my admiration of the untiring zeal and magnificent ability with which our Chairman of Committees has performed the arduous duties attaching to his position.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT:

This Convention stands adjourned until Thursday, the 20th day of January next, at 12 o'clock, noon, when it will meet at Parliament Houses, in Melbourne.

Convention adjourned at 3.54 p.m.
