Clause 56 (Recommendation of money votes) agreed to, 541.

New clause by the Assembly of New South Wales: "57 (a.) If either house of parliament shall, in two consecutive sessions of the same parliament, with an interval of at least six weeks between, pass and transmit to the other house for its concurrence therein any proposed law which such other house fails to pass without amendment, within thirty days after receiving the same, in the second session, or within such period passes,

with any amendment not agreed to by the house transmitting the proposed law, the provisions of the following sections of this part shall apply. (b.) The proposed law passed and transmitted in the second session may include an amendment agreed to by both houses in the first session. The house in which the proposed law originated may pass resolution that, in its opinion, the proposed law is of an urgent nature, and may transmit the resolution and the proposed law with any amendments agreed to by both houses up to the time of transmission to the other house, with a request for further consideration. If within thirty days of the transmission of the proposed law as last aforesaid, or if the session shall end before the expiration of such period, then within thirty days of the commencement of the next session of the same parliament, the other house shall not pass the proposed law without amendment, or with such amendment as the house transmitting the same agrees to, the house in which the proposed law originated may resolve that the same be referred to the direct determination of the people. If such last-mentioned resolution is passed, a vote of the electors of the commonwealth as to whether the proposed law, as last transmitted as aforesaid, shall or shall not become law shall be taken, unless in the meantime the House to which it has been transmitted has passed the same. Such vote shall be taken in each state separately, and if the proposed law is affirmed by a majority of the population of the commonwealth, it shall be presented to the governor-general for the royal assent, as if it had been duly passed by both houses of parliament, and on receiving the royal assent it shall become law. If not affirmed as aforesaid the proposed law shall not become law, and shall not be again proposed for a period of at least three years," 541-Amendment by the Right Hon. Sir. John Forrest to omit the first word "If," 708; negatived by 30 to 15, 709. Amendment by Mr. Symon, that after the first word, "If," in the proposed new clause the following words be inserted:- "the senate reject or fail to pass any proposed law which has passed the same with amendments with which the house-of representatives will not agree, and if the governor-general should dissolve the house of representatives and if, within six months after the said dissolution the house of representatives by an absolute majority again pass the said proposed law in the same, or substantially the same, form as before, and with substantially the same objects, and the senate again reject or fail to pass the said proposed law, or pass the same with amendments with which the house of representatives will not agree, the governor-general may dissolve the senate and the house of representatives, and thereupon all the members of both houses of the parliament shall vacate their seats," 710; amendment, on the amendment, by Mr. Walker, to omit the words "and the house of representatives, and thereupon all the members of both houses of the parliament shall vacate their seats," 711; withdrawn, 711; amendment amended by Mr. Symon (by leave) omitting the words "and the house of representatives, and thereupon all the members of both houses of the parliament shall vacate their seats;" amendment, as amended, agreed to by 27 to 22, 738; amendment by Mr.
Lyne to add to the words last agreed to: "If after a dissolution of both houses of the federal parliament as above provided, the subject-matter of the contention that led to such dual dissolution is again passed by the house of representatives, and again rejected by the senate, such measure shall be referred to the electors of the commonwealth by means of a national referendum, and, if resolved in the affirmative, shall become law," 733; amendment on the amendment by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner to omit the first word "If" with the view of inserting the words "provided that in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives the proposed law should be referred to the direct determination of the people, as hereinafter provided," 743; further amendment by Mr. Wise, providing that in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives alone in the first instance, both houses of parliament may be dissolved simultaneously, and if after each dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendments the proposed law may be referred to the direct determination of the people by a referendum, 758; proposed new clause and all amendments suggested for the prevention of deadlocks postponed, 778; reconsidered, 807. Amendment by Mr. Wise proposed: That after the words "house of representatives," in the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's amendment, the following words be inserted:-"I alone in the first instance, both houses of parliament may be dissolved simultaneously: Provided that the senate shall not be dissolved within a period of six months immediately preceding the date of the expiry by effluxion of time of the duration of the house of representatives. And if after each dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendment," 923. Mr. Wise's amendment agreed to by 25 to 20, 924. Question then proposed as follows:-That the following words be inserted in lieu of the word "if":-"Provided that, in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives alone in the first instance, both houses of parliament may be dissolved simultaneously, provided that the senate shall not be dissolved within a period of six months immediately preceding the date of the expiry by effluxion of time of the duration of the house of representatives. And if after such dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendment the proposed law may be referred to the direct determination of the people as hereinafter provided," 924. Amendment by Mr. Lyne:

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL:

That the words "by a national referendum to" be inserted after the word "referred," line 12, 926. Mr. Lyne's amendment negatived by 36 to 10, 928. Amendment by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner: that the words "by a dual referendum" be inserted after the word "referred," line 12, 928. The Right Hon. Sir George Turner's amendment negatived by 27 to 18, 930. Amendment by Hon. J. H. Carruthers: that the words "to the direct determination of the people as hereinafter provided" be omitted with the view to insert in lieu thereof the following words:- "The members of the two houses deliberating and voting together thereon, and shall be adopted or rejected according to the decision of a majority of three-fifths of the members present and voting on the question," 930. Amendment by the Hon. J. H. Howe: That the word "three-fifths" be omitted with the view to insert the word "two-thirds," 931; negatived by 28 to 13, 974.
Amendment by the Right Hon. C. C. Kingston: That the word "the," at the beginning of Hon. J. H. Carruthers' amendment, be omitted with a view to inserting the following words: "A referendum of the people of the commonwealth in the case of national questions and to a referendum of the people of the commonwealth and a referendum of the people of the states when state interests are involved," 967; negatived by 30 to 11, 967. Hon. J. H. Carruthers' amendment agreed to by 29jority of those present and voting to pass a resolution praying the governor-general to refer the proposed law to a general vote of the electors of the commonwealth, and, upon such resolution being presented to the governor-general, he may direct that such vote of the electors be forthwith taken," negatived by 27 to 13, 980. Amendment by the Hon. E. Barton: "That the remaining words of the proposed new clause 57A be struck out," agreed to, 980. New clause, as amended, agreed to 981.

Royal Assent.

Clause 57. "When a proposed law passed by the houses of the parliament is presented to the governor-general for the Queen's assent, he shall declare, according to his discretion, but subject to the provisions of this constitution, either that he assents to it in the Queen's name, or that he withholds assent, or that he reserves the law for the Queen's pleasure to be made known," 779. Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria: Line 5. After "constitution" insert "and to her Majesty's instructions." Amendment negatived; clause agreed to, 779.

Clause 58 (Disallowance by Order in Council of law assented to by governor-general) agreed to, 779.

Clause 59. "A proposed law reserved for the Queen's pleasure shall not have any force unless and until within two years from the day on which it was presented to the governor-general for the Queen's assent the governor-general makes known by speech or message, to each of the houses of the parliament or by proclamation, that it has received the assent of the Queen in Council. An entry of every such speech, message, or proclamation shall be made in the journals of each house," 779. Amendment suggested by the Assembly of South Australia: Line 2, omit "not." Amendment negatived, 782. Amendment suggested by the Council of South Australia negatived: Omit "two years," insert "one year," 782. Clause agreed to, 782.

Chapter II.-The Executive Government.

Clause 60. "The executive power and authority of the commonwealth is vested in the Queen and shall be exercised by the governor-general as the Queen's representative," 782. Amendment by the Right Hon. G. H. Reid: That the word "exercised" be omitted with a view to the insertion of the word "exercisable," agreed to, and clause, as amended, agreed to, 782.

Clause 61. "There shall be a council to aid and advise the governor-general in the government of the commonwealth, and such council shall be styled the federal executive council; and the persons who are to be members of the council shall be from time to time chosen and summoned by the governor-general and sworn as executive councillors, and shall hold office during his pleasure," 782. Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia: After "council," line 1, insert "of six." Amendment negatived, and clause agreed to, 792.

Clause 62 (Application of Provisions referring to governor-general) agreed to, 792.

Clause 63. "For the administration of the executive government of the commonwealth, the governor-general may, from time to time, appoint officers to administer such departments of state of the commonwealth as the governor-general in council may from time to time establish, and such officers shall hold office during the pleasure of the governor-general, and shall be capable of being chosen and of sitting as members of either house of the parliament. Such officers shall be members of the federal executive council, and shall be the Queen's ministers of state for the commonwealth. After the first general election no minister of state shall hold office for a longer period than three calendar months unless he shall be or become a member of one of the houses of the parliament," 792. Amendment suggested by the Assembly of South Australia: Omit "Governor may from time to time appoint," line 3, with a view to insert "parliament may elect." Amendment suggested by the Council of South Australia: Omit first and second paragraphs. Amendments negatived, 793. Amendment suggested by the Assembly of Tasmania: Omit the last paragraph; insert "every minister of state shall, during his tenure of office, have the right of entrance to and audience in both houses of the parliament, but shall not be entitled to vote in either house, unless he has been duly elected a member thereof," negatived by 21 to 14, 799; clause agreed to, 709.

Clause 64. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the number of ministers of state who may sit in either house shall not exceed seven, who shall hold such offices, and by such designation, as the parliament from time to time prescribes, or, in the absence of provision, as the governor-general from time to time directs," 799. Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of Victoria: After "seven," line 4, insert "of whom two at least shall be members of the senate," negatived by 19 to 13, 802. Amendment by the Hon. H. Dobson: That the following words be inserted after the word, "seven," line 4 "of whom one shall be in the senate when there are five ministers, two shall be in the senate when there are more than five ministers," negatived by 20 to 12, 804; clause agreed to, 806.

Clause 65. Until the parliament otherwise provides, there shall be payable to the Queen, out of the consolidated revenue fund of the commonwealth, for the salaries of such officers, the sum of twelve thousand pounds a year," 806. Amendment by the Hon. Dr. Cockburn: That the words "the sum of," line 5, be omitted with the view to the insertion in their place of the words, "a sum not exceeding," agreed to, 806. Amendments suggested by the Council of Tasmania: That the word "twelve" be omitted, negatived, and clause, as amended, agreed to, 806.

Clauses 66 (Appointment of civil servants), 67 (Authority of executive), and 68 (Command of military and naval forces), agreed to, 806.

Clause 69 (Immediate assumption of control of certain departments) postponed, Clause 70 (Powers under existing law to be exercised by governor-general with advice of executive council), 806. Amendment by the Right Hon. G. H. Reid: That after the words "vest in the governor-general with" the words "or without" be inserted, and that after the words "federal executive council" the words "as the case requires" be inserted, agreed to, 807. Clause, as amended, agreed to, 807.

Chapter IV.-Finance and Trade.

DIVISIONS:
Appointment of Drafting Committee, 27.
COMMONWEALTH BILL (In Committee).
Chapter I - The Parliament.
Part I.-General.
Clause 3(Governor-General). Amendments by Council and Assembly, South Australia—that the salary of the Governor-General be, respectively, £8,000 and £7,000 (instead of £10,000, as proposed)—negatived, 254.

Part II-The Senate.
Clause 9 (The Senate). Paragraph 1. Amendment by Council, New South Wales—to omit the provision that the senate should be composed of "six senators for each state," with the view of providing that it should consist of "members representing the states in proportion to their population"—negatived, 355.

Paragraph 2. Amendment by Mr. McMillan—making the Paragraph read as follows:—The senators shall be directly chosen by the people of the state, and until Parliament otherwise determines, as one electorate"—agreed to, 390, 391.

Paragraph 4. Amendment by Assembly, Victoria—providing that, as regards the equal representation of states in the senate, an exception should be made "in the case of new states which after the establishment of the commonwealth are admitted thereto or established thereby upon other terms and conditions"—agreed to, 415.

Paragraph 5. Amendment by Assembly, South Australia—to provide that "The senators shall be elected in all the federated states on the basis of one adult one vote"-negatived, 417. Amendment by Council and Assembly, Tasmania-omitting the words "and if any elector votes more than once he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor"-agreed to, 419.

Clause 15 (Qualifications of member). Amendment by Council, Victoria-to provide that a senator "must be of the full age of 30 years"-negatived, 990.

Part III.-The Home of Representatives.

Clause 24 (Constitution of house of representatives). Amendment by Assembly, New South Wales-to omit the words "as nearly as practicable, there shall be two members of the house of representatives for every one member of the senate "-negatived, 452.

Part IV.-Provisions relating to the houses.

New clause(44A). Proposed by Council and Assembly, Tasmania-"A member of a house of the Parliament of a state shall be incapable of sitting in either house of the parliament of the commonwealth"-negatived, 1011.

Clause 45 (Disqualification of members). Amendment by Mr. Glynn-to provide that the disqualifications mentioned in the clause should be in force "until parliament otherwise provides"-negatived, 1015.

Clause 47 (Disqualifying contractors and persons interested in contracts). Paragraph 3, as amended, that the disqualification to be a member of either house should not extend to a member of an incorporated company, consisting of more than twenty-five persons, an amendment by Mr. Glynn further providing that the member of the company in question must hold less than onetwentieth of the capital of the company -was negatived, 1028.

Clause 48 (Place to become vacant on accepting office of profit). Paragraph 2. Amendment by Council, New South Wales-to omit the paragraph which provides that, until the parliament otherwise determines, no member should, within six months of his ceasing to be one, be qualified or permitted to accept or hold any office the acceptance or holding of which would, under this clause, render a person incapable of being chosen or sitting as a member-agreed to, 1034.

Part V.-Powers of the Parliament.

Clause 52 (Legislative powers of the parliament). Amendment by Assembly, Victoria, adding to sub-clause I (the regulation of trade and commerce), the following words:-"Provided that all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any state or territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival in such state or territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such state or territory, to the same extent and in the same manner as though such liquors or liquids had been produced in such state or territory"-agreed to, 1058.

Sub-clause 5. Amendment by Assembly, South Australia-to add words providing that the power of the federal parliament to legislate in regard to postal, telegraphic, telephonic, and other like services, should be limited to such services "outside the limits of the commonwealth"-negatived, 1069.<

Sub-clause 12. Amendment by Council, South Australia-to provide that the federal parliament, in addition to having power to legislate in reference to "fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits," should have power to legislate in regard to fisheries "in rivers which flow through or in two or more states"-negatived, 1073.

Clause 55 ( Appropriation and tax bills). Amendment by Council, Western Australia -to omit the exception as to laws imposing taxation, sub-clause 1, so that the senate should have equal power with the house of representatives in regard to such laws-negatived, 537.

New Clause (57A) ( For prevention of deadlocks), suggested by Assembly, New South Wales, as follows:- "If either house of parliament shall, in two consecutive sessions of the same parliament, with an interval of at least six weeks between, pass and transmit to the other house for its concurrence therein any proposed law which such other house fails to pass without amendment, within thirty days after receiving the same, in the second session, or within such period passes, with any amendment not agreed to by the house transmitting the proposed law, the provisions of the following sections of this part shall apply." Resolved that the word "if" at the beginning of the paragraph stand part of the clause, 709; amendment by Mr. Symon-"That the following words be inserted in the proposed new clause after the word "if" in line 1:-The senate reject or fail to pass any proposed law which has passed the house of representatives, or pass the same with amendments with which the house of representatives will not agree, and if the governor-general should dissolve the house of representatives, and if, within six months after the said dissolution, the house of representatives by an absolute majority again pass the said proposed law in the same or substantially the same form as before, and with substantially the same objects, and the senate again reject or fail to pass the said proposed law or pass the same with amendments with which the house of representatives will not agree, the governor-general may dissolve the senate" -agreed to, 738; amendment by Mr. Wise on amendment by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner so as to make it read as follows:-Provided that, in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives alone in the first instance, both houses of parliament may be dissolved simultaneously, provided that the senate shall not be dissolved within a period of six months immediately preceding the date of the expiry by effluxion of time of the duration of the house of representatives. And if after such dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendment the proposed law may be referred to the direct determination of the people as hereinafter provided"-agreed to, 924; amendment by Mr. Lynn-to insert, after "referred" in the previous amendment, the words "by a national referendum"-negatived, 928; amendment by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner-to insert, after "referred," the words "by a dual referendum"-negatived, 930; amendment by the Right Hon. C. C. Kingston-to provide for "A referendum of the people of the commonwealth in the case of national questions, and a referendum of the people of the commonwealth and a referendum of the people of the states when state interests are involved"-negatived, 967; amendment by the Hon. J. H. Howe-to omit "three-fifths" and insert "two-thirds" in amendment by the Hon. J. H. Carruthers-negatived, 974; amendment by the Hon. J. H. Carruthers-so as to make the last part of the amendment the Right Hon. Sir George Turner and Mr. Wise read as follows:--"and if, after such dissolution, the proposed law fails to pass, with or without amendment, the proposed law may be referred to the members of the two houses deliberating and voting together thereon, and shall be adopted or rejected according to the decision of three-fifths of the members present and voting on the question-agreed to, 974; question-That the following words be added to Mr. Symon's amendment:-"Provided that in lieu of dissolving the house of representatives alone, in the first instance, both houses of parliament may be dissolved simultaneously. Provided that the senate shall not be dissolved within a period of six months immediately preceding the date of the expiry by effluxion of time of the duration of the house of representatives. And, if after such dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendment, the proposed law may be referred to the members of the two houses deliberating and voting together thereon, and shall be adopted or rejected according to the decision of three-fifths of the members present and voting on the question-resolved in the affirmative, 980.

Chapter II.-The Executive Government.

Clause 63 (Ministers of state). Amendment by Assembly, Tasmania-to omit the words after the first general election no minister of state shall hold office for a longer period than three calendar months, unless he shall be or become a member of one of the houses of parliament," with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "every minister of state shall during his tenure of office have the right of entrance to and audience in both houses of the parliament, but shall not be entitled to vote in either house unless he has been duly elected a member thereof"-negatived, 799.

Election of Delegates - Address to her Majesty the Queen - Standing Orders - Amendments of Legislatures - Suspension of Standing Orders - Hours of Meeting - Official Record of Debates - Draft Constitution - Victorian Delegates - Adjournment.

THE delegates met in the Legislative Assembly Chambers, Sydney, at 12 noon, pursuant to the adjournment of the Convention on 5th May, 1897.

The PRESIDENT took the chair.

ELECTION OF DELEGATES.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia) presented copies of the Government Gazette of Western Australia notifying the election to the Convention of Henry Briggs, M.L.C., Frederick Thomas Crowder, M.L.C., Harry Whittall Venn, M.L.C., and Andrew Harriot Henning, M.L.C.

The CLERK having read the proclamations notifying their election, the delegates signed the roll.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

The PRESIDENT informed the Convention that, agreeably with its resolution at its session in Adelaide, he had the honor to present to her Majesty the Queen, at Windsor Castle, on 7th July, the Convention's address of loyalty and congratulation, and that her Majesty had been graciously pleased to accept the same, and to make the following reply:—

I request you to convey to the members of the Federal Convention, the expression of the sincere gratification with which I receive this, assurance of their loyalty and devotion, and of the warmth of their congratulations on the completion of the sixtieth year of my reign. I have already made known to the Governor of South Australia the deep interest with which I regard the proceedings of the Convention; but I am glad to take this opportunity of offering again my best wishes for the success of its deliberations.

[The delegates received her Majesty's reply to the Convention's address standing in their places.]

Motion (Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:

That her Majesty's reply to the loyal address of this Convention be recorded upon its proceedings.

STANDING ORDERS.

The PRESIDENT informed the Convention that, as its proceedings were guided by the standing orders of the House of Assembly of South Australia, he had caused copies of those orders to be supplied for the information of delegates.

AMENDMENTS OF LEGISLATURES.

The President called upon the senior representatives of the different colonies represented to present the amendments suggested by their respective legislatures in the draft constitution for the consideration of the Convention.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales):

I present a schedule of the amendments in the draft constitution desired by the houses of legislature in New South Wales, and I have the honor to move:

That the amendments be printed.

I submit these amendments, together with a copy of the bill, as required by the statute.

The Hon. Sir P.O. Fysh (Tasmania):

I present a copy of the amendments desired by the houses of legislature of Tasmania.

The President:

I have to make a similar presentation on behalf of South Australia.

The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest (Western Australia):

Under our enabling act it is provided that each House shall nominate some member of the Convention to present its amendments. Accordingly I was nominated by the Legislative Assembly to present the amendments of that House, and my hon. friend, Mr. Hackett, was nominated by the Legislative Council to present their amendments. I beg to present the amendments suggested by the Legislative Assembly.

The Hon. J.W. Hackett (Western Australia):

I beg to present the amendments suggested by the Legislative Council of Western Australia.

The President:

I understand the senior representative of Victoria is absent, and will not be present until to-morrow. I understand the leader of the Convention to move that all the amendments be printed. The motion now is that all the amendments before the House be printed.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDERS.

Motion (Hon. E. Barton) agreed to:

That so much of the standing orders be suspended as will enable certain motions to be made without notice.

HOURS OF MEETING.
Motion (Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:
That, unless otherwise ordered, this Convention do meet daily at 10.30 a.m., Saturdays and Sundays excepted.

OFFICIAL RECORD OF DEBATES.
Motion (Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:
That an official record of the debates of this Convention be made by the "Parliamentary Debates" Staff of New South Wales.

DRAFT CONSTITUTION.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):
I beg to move:
That the consideration in the Committee of the Whole Convention of the draft constitution, as passed prior to the adjournment of 5th May, 1897, together with the suggested amendments which have been forwarded by the various legislatures, be an order of the day for to-morrow, Friday, September 3rd.

I move this motion in order to have it placed as an order of the day on the notice-paper. Of course I do so without prejudice to any steps that may be decided upon before we meet again.

The PRESIDENT:
I understand that the object of the leader of the Convention is not to carry this at once, but to make it an order of the day for to-morrow.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

VICTORIAN DELEGATES.
The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria):
It may not be unknown to members of the Convention that, owing to the necessities of local politics, the Premier of Victoria and his two Ministerial colleagues who are members of the Convention can only arrive here by to-morrow's express. That will not enable them to attend at 10.30 a.m., which has been fixed by the sessional order as the hour of the daily meetings of the Convention. Under these circumstances, I do not think I will be asking an undue concession on the part of the delegates when I suggest that there may be an alteration of the hour of meeting until, say, the hour of noon to-morrow. That is the earliest time it will be possible for them to be present, and any earlier meeting might involve the raising of questions which would have to be delayed, so that the proceedings are not likely to lose by any such concession.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):
I quite appreciate what has been said by my hon. friend, Mr. Deakin. The difficulty perhaps might be met in such a way as to avoid conflicting motions as to procedure if the, President, when he takes the chair at half-past 10 o'clock, adjourns until 12 o'clock noon, so as to allow the hon. member's colleagues to be in their places. I think the Convention would entirely approve of that course.

The PRESIDENT:
If I understand that that is the wish of the Convention, I shall be glad to take the course suggested. It will be necessary for hon. members to be present for the purpose of forming a quorum to enable me to take that course.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia):
I hope that course will not be followed. There would be no conflict between the motion already carried and a motion to adjourn until noon to-morrow. The motion we have agreed to contains the words "unless otherwise ordered."

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):
I will move that the Convention at its rising adjourn until noon to-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):
I beg to move:
That the Convention do now adjourn until 12 noon to-morrow.

I may explain, as regards the motion for the reference of Part IV of the Constitution Bill, relating to finance and trade, to a committee consisting of the Treasurers, I have taken that step, not with a view of prejudging the question of procedure. I think the question as to whether we resolve ourselves at once into Committee of the Whole, or whether we wait until we receive a report on that particular part of the bill, is a matter that can be well considered later on. In putting the notice of motion on the paper, I do not desire to prejudge in any way the proceedings of the Convention. In anything I propose I will be guided as much as possible by the wishes of hon. members.

Question resolved in the affirmative.
Convention adjourned at 12.19 p.m.
Friday 3 September, 1897

The PRESIDENT took the chair at noon.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia):
I wish to ask the Premiers of the various colonies which are represented in the Convention and in the case of South Australia the Treasurer of that colony, whether, for the purpose of helping the deliberations of the Convention, they will lay on the table copies of all reports presented to their respective governments on the question of the finances of the proposed federation, the financial clauses of the draft bill, and the federal control or ownership of the railways? If necessary, sir, I will give, notice of the question.

The PRESIDENT:
Are the Premiers prepared to answer the question at once, or do they desire notice of it to be given?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I think it would be more regular if notice were given of such a question.

Mr. GLYNN:
I give notice of the question for Monday.

SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria):
I desire to present the amendments suggested by the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly of Victoria in regard to the Federal Constitution Bill. I move:
That the document be printed.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales):
I have the honor to present a petition from certain Presbyterians in the town of Orange praying that there may be a recognition of God in the preamble of the constitution, and also that the proceedings of the Federal Parliament may be commenced daily with prayer.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I have a similar petition to present from the Moderator of the Presbyterian Church in South Australia.

Petitions received.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria):
I beg to give notice that at the next meeting I will move:
That a return be laid before this Convention, showing according to the latest available information:
(1.) The population and number of electors in each electoral district for the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales; and
(2.) The population and number of electors in each electoral district for the Legislative Assembly of Victoria.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENTS.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia):
I beg to give notice that in Committee on the bill I will move that the following two clauses be inserted:-

In each state of the commonwealth there shall be a governor, who shall be appointed by the governor-general in council, and shall hold office during the pleasure of the governor-general, but for no longer than six years in any one state at any one time.

All references or communications required by the constitution of any state or otherwise to be made by the governor of the state to the Queen, shall be made through the governor-general as her Majesty's representative in the commonwealth, and the Queen's pleasure shall be made known through him.

The PRESIDENT:
I do not think it will be necessary in all cases for notices of amendments to be given. If they are banded in, they will be printed and appear on the order-paper.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
In some cases it might be more convenient if notice were given orally.

The PRESIDENT:
I do not take the slightest objection to the course which the hon. gentleman has pursued.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The Hon. N.J. BROWN (Tasmania):
Before the notices of motion are proceeded with, I desire, with the permission of hon. members, to make a short personal explanation. In yesterday's Sydney Morning Herald there appears a paragraph beaded "Amendments made by the Tasmanian Parliament." The part of the paragraph to which I refer relates to the vote given by me and two of my colleagues-Mr. Henry and Mr. Lewis-at Adelaide, with regard to the powers of the senate in dealing with money bills. It will be remembered by hon. members who were present at Adelaide that when I announced my intention to give that vote I carefully guarded myself from being committed to adhere to the view I then took on any future occasion. This paragraph, in so far as it conveys an impression that there is any intention on my part to adhere to that course absolutely, or in so far as it conveys the impression that there has been any compact entered into between Mr. Henry, Mr. Lewis, and myself, is quite incorrect. I have the assurance of my hon. friend, Mr. Henry, that, so far as that view is concerned, the paragraph is entirely misleading. There is no compact whatever between that hon. gentleman, Mr. Lewis, and myself in regard to the matter, nor am I committed to adhere to the position I took up in Adelaide.

FINANCIAL CLAUSES OF DRAFT BILL.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales) rose to move:

(1.) That Chapter IV of the draft constitution be referred to a select committee for consideration and report, with power to send for persons and papers.

(2.) That such committee consist of Mr. Reid, Sir George Turner, Mr. Holder, Sir Philip Fysh, and Sir John Forrest.

He said: Hon. members will recollect, that in Adelaide a committee consisting of the Treasurers of the colonies there represented, with the exception of the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, who, I think, had then taken his departure for Western Australia, was appointed for the purpose of considering what should be the financial proposals of the bill. They brought up a report, and the result of their deliberations was included, practically in their own words, in the bill. Since that time there has been a lapse of four months during which criticism by the public and by the press has been abundant, and during which time also the financial clauses have undergone the criticism and been made the subject of suggestions by the various legislatures. Inasmuch as the financial provisions of the bill are probably the most important with which we will have to deal, and inasmuch as they must be dealt with with a very great deal of deliberation-I do not say for a moment that every portion of the bill will not receive great deliberation, but this, perhaps, will be specially entitled to it-it has seemed to me that it would be a wise thing to reappoint this committee. I understand from several gentlemen whose names are mentioned in the motion that they will be prepared, in the event of such committee being appointed, to devote considerable time to it, apart from the time which will necessarily be engaged in our debates. I may mention further that it has been suggested that additions should be made to the committee. Inasmuch as my right hon. friends, Mr. Reid, Sir George Turner, and Sir John Forrest, have been away in England during part of the time which has been spent in criticism and suggestion, it might be wise to add some other members to the committee, perhaps not exceeding one from each colony represented. That is a suggestion which I leave to the wisdom of the Convention, only saying this: If it seems good to the Convention to make these additions I would suggest that in order that the committee may not be so large as to be unwieldy, the additions to it should not exceed one from each colony. If that is the general sense of the Convention I will accept an amendment to my motion for the purpose of carrying out this proposal.

With regard to this motion I cannot approve of it, for this reason: The committee will simply meet to discuss the work which they themselves did some months ago, and, while we are doing that, we shall be doing it in the dark. The majority of us have been away, and I confess that I am not at all acquainted with the proposals which have been made, or the suggestions which have been offered so that a better scheme might be prepared for submission to the Convention. What I would suggest is this: Now that we are assembled here, let us discuss all those proposals. Let us have the benefit of hearing the various views which may be brought forward. Let us take into consideration and try to learn the reasons for the various suggestions which have been made, and, after we have gained the, greatest amount of information possible, then it might be wise to ask the Treasurers of the several colonies to meet together for the purpose of endeavouring to place the various suggestions which will be made here in a form in which they can be submitted afterwards to the Convention. But I feel that if we are to meet, as we will, absolutely in the dark, the work will take us a very long time, and we shall not have the benefit of hearing the views of our colleagues. Therefore, I should prefer to see this matter discussed fully here, and then we should be able to deal with it in a satisfactory manner. If we adopt the proposal submitted, I for one would not be in a position to deal with it in a manner satisfactory to myself or to the Convention. And in regard to this matter, I desire to take the earliest opportunity to point out a great difficulty in which the representatives of the colony of Victoria would be placed. When we adjourned some time ago to the 2nd September we were certainly under the impression that the work to be done at the adjourned Convention could easily be carried through in two or three weeks. We have seen now what has occurred in the various colonies, and the immense number of suggestions which have been made touching the most vital points in the proposed constitution, and we must realise that it will be utterly impossible for this Convention, unless it is prepared to sit for at least a couple of months, to deal with the question in a manner that will be at all satisfactory. We, in Victoria, unfortunately will have in four or five weeks a general election, and it will be utterly impossible for the representatives of Victoria, and especially those who hold ministerial positions, to remain here longer at the outside than some three weeks. I feel perfectly certain that members of the Convention would not desire to discuss and deal with important questions in the absence of the representatives of the colony of Victoria. If we were to deal with this financial matter—seeing the entertainments we are expected to attend in the evenings, and that we shall not be sitting in the evenings—that would probably take us a fortnight to discuss, and by that time we should probably have got to the bottom of all the proposed amendments, and should be in a position to deal with that one important question, which is the most important of the whole. Then I doubt if any members of the Convention are prepared now to deal in a proper way with the various suggestions which have been made. There are varying suggestions from every colony, and I do not think there are many, if any, who are present here to-day who know what those suggestions really mean, or the reasons which have been adduced in the various colonies for their adoption. Those of us who have been away certainly are not in that position. It will be difficult enough for us to find out exactly what has been done in our own colony, and I feel that we ought not to attempt to rush the work through on this occasion. On the last occasion, from circumstances over which we had no control, we bad to rush the work through; but, seeing that we are now about to take the final step, so far an the Convention is concerned, in formulating a constitution which will practically have to last for all time - because it will be very difficult indeed to amend it - we must be prepared to know exactly what we are doing, to see exactly where we are going, and to devote a very large amount of time for the purpose of doing our work properly and satisfactorily. I trust the members of the Convention will give the matter careful consideration - not alone looking at it from the point of view of the difficulty in which the representatives of Victoria are placed, but looking at it also in view of the grave importance of the whole subject. We are not at the present time sufficiently educated with regard to the proposed suggestions to deal with them, and I trust we will endeavour to take up, say, the financial matter, and thresh that out at our leisure, then leaving it to the committee to deal with it hereafter. But with regard to the other important questions I trust we shall not attempt to deal with them hurriedly here and that for the reasons I have given—suit the convenience of the colony of which I am one of the representatives, and to enable us to make ourselves fully acquainted with all the proposed amendments—we will allow the other work of the Convention to stand over until, say, February or March. These are the views I hold. I have thought the matter over carefully. I feel, as I said before, that the Convention ought not to proceed with important matter in the absence of the representatives of the colony of Victoria, and I know we cannot remain here at the outside more than three weeks. Under these circumstances I trust that the representatives present will endeavour to devise some means by which we may be present at all the discussions, and by which all of us may have greater opportunities than we have hitherto bad of ascertaining exactly what the suggestions mean and what we are about to do. I have taken the opportunity of bringing this matter forward so that I might bear the views of representatives of other colonies with regard to the suggestion I have made. Of course, if we are in the minority we shall have to stop and do the beat we can as long as we can, and then we shall have to leave the other matters to be dealt with by the representatives of the other colonies. But I am afraid that will not be satisfactory to us nor satisfactory to those whom we represent, and it may place us in a very difficult position when we come to deal with this bill in either recommending it or otherwise to the people of the colony. Therefore I would throw out the suggestion that we should take the opportunity of endeavouring to thresh out this one question—the financial question—that we then leave that to the committee, adjourn, give them ample time to look fully into the matter, and meet later on, say, in February or March, when we shall be seized of all the various matters and be able to deal with them satisfactorily.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSHER (Tasmania)[12.19]:

I am sure it must come to the representatives present as a great surprise that our right hon. friend who has just resumed his seat should say, after members of the Convention have been considering these subjects since the year 1891, and probably a period long anterior to that, that we are not now, in the year 1897, sufficiently educated on the subjects to give that due attention to them to bring them to a fruition now. I am surprised exceedingly. I should have presumed that those who attended only our former Convention in April last, and who have kept themselves in touch with all that has been written by the press, discussed in our Hansards, and spoken at our firesides, would have been prepared, at any rate, now, to consider every one of the questions, difficult though they may be of solution. Now that we have met, the people of Australia, I believe-certainly may speak for the people of Tasmania; and I have it on record on my passage here that the people of Victoria, also, are looking to this Convention, not to adjourn at an early date, but to continue their sittings until this work shall be completed. Therefore, I am surprised that my right hon. friend from Victoria, who represents a body of people strongly imbued with the federal spirit, be himself also being strongly imbued with that spirit, and having an earnest desire to see the end of this work, should consider it to be his duty now to ask for a considerable delay.

I speak thus, notwithstanding that I am with him, and not at issue with him. It is most important that Victoria should be represented throughout in the Convention, and that we should not deal with any important subject in her absence. I believe, however, that if we are really intending to federate-intending to perfect the measure commenced in 1891, nearly adopted in the present year, admitted generally to have laid the foundation of nine-tenths, at any rate, of the measure which must ultimately be accepted as the Commonwealth Bill-we must proceed to do so without delay. After many interesting discussions, our late, or present parliaments now sitting in session, have submitted to us a very considerable number of amendments. I think we might deal with the greater portion of those amendments in the course of a few hours, and leave the important amendments for that mature consideration which every one of them demands; and I know there are none of them that demand more consideration than those which deal with finance. The financial question has ever been a difficulty—and I am a little surprised to find that some of the parliaments of Australia have considered it to be so great a difficulty that we, who are charged with the solution of it, are to have withdrawn from us the consideration of that solution—that it is to be left to the future; and that it has been said by some of our parliaments that this body, specially elected by the people to solve that and all the other difficult questions of federation, is not capable of doing it, but that they believe that there will be, in the future, a body of men rising up, to be known as the federal executive and federal parliament, who will be able to solve it. I think a goodly number of the representatives present to-day are not at all unlikely to have thrown upon them the responsibility of the solution of this problem in the future, even if this Convention does not solve it. I am going to urge, therefore, whenever I have an opportunity, that we shall undertake the discharge of the duty which is committed to our care, and if we fail to solve the problem satisfactorily there will be ample opportunity—having given to the future commonwealth or executive our solution of the difficulty—for them hereafter, if needs be, to seek an amendment of the constitution in that particular direction. I find, however, that the Premier of Victoria addressed himself to this question of finance, not so much with the idea of dealing with it, as with the idea of putting forward his own proposal with respect to an early adjournment of the Convention. I do not know what early means, but I presume a week means early, and if so, I sincerely hope hon. gentlemen will not be induced to entertain his idea, but that our friends from Victoria will give to us the longest possible time at their disposal. We thought that, coming here, they would give us three weeks of their time. Bearing in mind what took place in April—that for nearly two weeks we were discussing resolutions, and that those resolutions are now disposed of, and that we are no longer likely to have any second reading speeches—let us address ourselves properly to the question.

Hon. MEMBERS:

Hear, hear!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

The response which comes from hon. gentlemen to that remark is an indication to me that we can get on with our work promptly.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

Then let us get on with the work!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

I am very glad to hear my hon. friend say that.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

The hon. gentleman is not giving us the chance!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

Under the circumstances, I will not further prolong my observations. I may say I am not at issue with hon. members. I am satisfied with, and I shall support, the proposal of our leader, Mr. Barton, to the effect that the committee shall not consist merely of the four Treasurers; but that they shall be supported by the addition of at least one other representative of every colony. We shall then find that when the work of the committee comes before us, we shall more readily get on with our proceedings.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[12.25]:

I entirely agree with the suggestion of the hon. member, Mr. Barton, with regard to the desirability—if the Convention thinks fit—of adding to the committee which is to consider the financial question. I feel—and I think my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, will also feel—that there is really no difficulty so far as regards the labours of the proposed Finance Committee are concerned, if we treat that committee, as I understand it is to be treated, as one for the consideration of the financial question. It is not intended, I think, by Mr. Barton, that the Financial Committee when constituted shall immediately proceed to deal with the financial question, unless they are possessed of the necessary material to enable them efficiently to do so. Therefore, I take it, that it will be competent for the committee, when appointed, to either assume their duties at once or to wait until the Convention itself has considered any of the amendments which may have been suggested by the legislatures of the different colonies. My idea is that the Financial Committee will not derive very great assistance from the suggestions of the various legislatures. The provisions embodied in the Draft Commonwealth Bill were dealt with by them, and were subjected to considerable criticism. But, after all, so far as my recollection goes, they were treated with what I may call very short shrift. I think I am correct in stating that, in Victoria, no other provisions were substituted for those provided in the Draft Commonwealth Bill.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is quite wrong; there were several suggestions!

Mr. SYMON:
I understand that in one instance the provisions included in the Draft Commonwealth Bill, as they left the Adelaide Convention, were struck out, and no complete scheme was inserted in their place for dealing with the financial question. Therefore, I am sure that the appointment of the committee now, simply as a finance committee, will not create any of the difficulties suggested by the Premier of Victoria. It will be left to the committee to settle the question with the materials before them. Under those circumstances, I shall support the proposal; but with the concurrence of the Convention I shall seek to add additional names. I hope hon. members will believe me when I say that I shall not mention those additional names with any idea of suggesting that they are superior in financial knowledge or capacity to the already suggested members of the committee. My opinion is that the financial question is one of the most difficult, one of the most troublesome—the hardest nut to crack—in the path of a scheme for a federal constitution. It constitutes the bargain that is to be entered upon by the different states. When I recollect that the original committee was a very large one, that it dealt very exhaustively with the whole of the subject, and that its proposals were considered by the Convention in Adelaide to be insufficient, and when I recollect that that was followed by the smaller committee of the various Treasurers, then I think it would be well that we should have on this committee some additional help—some new blood—with the view of dealing, not with the proposals as they were originally framed, but with the suggestions of the different parliaments. I, therefore, suggest that there shall be added to the committee the names of Mr. J. Henry (Tasmania), Mr. P.M. Glynn (South Australia), Mr. W. McMillan (New South Wales), and Mr. J.T. Walker (New South Wales).

An Hon. MEMBER:
Dr. Quick for Victoria!

Another Hon. MEMBER:
Western Australia!

Mr. SYMON:
I do not like to make any invidious suggestions with regard to Victoria.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Would it not be wise to leave that matter to the Treasurers who are appointed to the committee to name colleagues?

Mr. SYMON:
I am perfectly willing. Whichever is the better course, I am perfectly willing to adopt it. I would very much rather not make any nomination, but leave the matter as my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Barton, suggests. I do feel that there ought to be some additional members on the Finance Committee, with the view, if possible, of arriving at a final and satisfactory solution of this very difficult question. I should like to say a few words in regard to the second part of my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner's speech in which he shadowed forth the possibility of an adjournment with only part of our work done. It would be absurd to think of our going through our labours or attempting to complete them without the presence of the representatives of Victoria. We must all feel that. Therefore it is our bounden duty—if it were not, in addition to that, a satisfaction to us—to do everything in our power to meet the wishes and convenience of my right hon. friend and the other representatives of Victoria; at the same time, I do hope that we shall not, at any rate at this early stage, either contemplate or put into shape any proposal for an adjournment. I think that the solution of the whole question is that offered by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner himself. Let us stay here and do the very best we can in the time at our disposal, and, if the necessities of the case should render an adjournment unavoidable, th

The PRESIDENT:
I ask the hon. member if he moves an amendment, and, if so, would he kindly let me have it in the shape he desires?

Mr. SYMON:
No; I yield to the suggestion of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):
May I make a suggestion? It is that each delegation should select whom it considers the most desirable member to add to the Finance Committee, and, when that has been done, I shall be prepared to amend the motion so as to cover that selection.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Why not select two?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
It would make the committee too large.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[12.34]:
I am sorry that I cannot agree with all that my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, said. I think that we should get to work. When the time arrives when we have to adjourn or prorogue, that will be the proper time to say whether our work is or is not completed.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
This discussion of an adjournment is not in order.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
No. I would urge that we should get to work and see what can be done in the meantime.

The PRESIDENT:
It has been suggested that the discussion now proceeding is not in order. I think it is in order, because the suggestion is that instead of going on with the business we should adjourn. Under these circumstances I should not be justified in ruling the discussion out of order.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[12.35]:
That is not the position I desire to take up at the present time. What I suggested was that we should go on discussing this financial matter, and let the Convention put before those who may form the Finance Committee various views in connection with the matter. I thought that that would probably occupy us for a fortnight, and that, having spent a fortnight profitably on that work, we could very easily adjourn, knowing that we had laid the foundation of some good work. The committee would have ample time at their disposal afterward to discuss the whole matter, and when the adjourned Convention met some months hence we would have the proposals of the committee before us, and would be able to work in the light of fuller knowledge. I do not desire to adjourn now. I have no wish at all that the Convention should adjourn; but I do say that the committee when they meet will be working in the dark unless they know the views of the various representatives here.

The PRESIDENT:

After the statement made by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, I ask hon. members to adhere more closely to the subject before them.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales) [12.37]:

I rise to offer a few remarks in regard to the motion of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton. I think that there cannot be two opinions as to whether we should have a larger Finance Committee than the five Treasurers; but, with regard to the composition of the committee, I hold very strong views. We have already had committees appointed by delegations. The first intimation I had that I had been appointed a member of the Judiciary Committee was through the newspapers.

Mr. SYMON:

That was a great compliment!

Mr. WALKER:

I look upon it as a compliment, and I admit that it was courteous on the part of the chairman and other hon. members of the committee to consider, as they did, any little suggestions that the only laymen on the committee—the Chief Secretary of Victoria and I—had to offer. I recognise that it was an honor to be on that committee; but I was not sent into this Convention to take part specially in the proceedings of a judiciary committee. I am, I fear, incompetent to offer suggestions worthy of being listened to by that committee. However, my object is not to speak of any grievance, if I have any, but to suggest that the additional members of the committee should be elected by ballot of the Whole House, because the system of allowing delegations to appoint members is, in my opinion, a provincial system, whereas we should encourage a federal spirit. We came here as representatives of different colonies; but, once here, we are all on the same level, and we should appoint on special committees those hon. members who have special qualifications. Personally, I have interests in all the colonies, except Tasmania; therefore, my sympathies are not confined to any one colony. I do trust that, if we appoint additional members to the Finance Committee, we will recognise the fact that all the Treasurers ought to be on it, but that the additional members should be elected by a ballot of the Whole House.

The PRESIDENT:

Does the hon. representative move an amendment?

Mr. WALKER:

No. I merely make the suggestion that the additional members should be elected by the whole Convention, irrespective of which colony they come from.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[12.39]:

I have listened attentively to what has been said by our right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, and I express my regret that he should find himself in the position he does in regard to pressing matters which will require his attention in his own colony in a short time. I myself, as a representative of Western Australia, was in a similar position when the Convention met at Adelaide; but I do not intend to mete out to him as little sympathy as he extended to me at that time. All my endeavours to elicit the sympathy of hon. members fell very flat, and, as they all know, the representatives of Western Australia had to go away and leave the Convention to deal with the bill in their absence. Of course, I recognise fully at once that the absence of the representatives of Western Australia was not nearly so important a matter as the absence of the representatives of Victoria would be. I recognise that for us to continue our deliberations without the presence of the representatives from Victoria would not be at all what we should desire. But, if the representatives from Victoria will pardon me for concurring in the suggestion of Mr. Symon, I think the best course for us to pursue is to go on with the bill now, and I am sure that when the time comes beyond which the representatives of Victoria find it impossible to remain, they will not appeal in vain to the Convention to meet their wishes in every possible way. I think we shall do well if we go on with the consideration of the amendments suggested by the various legislatures at once. With regard to the financial question, while I am quite of opinion that the appointment of a committee of Treasurers and some other members would be very useful and desirable, I think that before that committee meets these gentlemen would like—at all events, speaking for myself, I should like—to hear the views of the members of the Convention in regard to the suggestions which have been made by the various legislatures.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

That is a matter the members of the committee could regulate for themselves!
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The only way in which we could regulate it would be to postpone our meetings, or, at any rate, our decisions, until we have heard the observations of the members of the Convention in regard to these suggestions. For my own part, at the present time I do not know what suggestions have been made. I have not even seen the suggestions. We shall have to consider them, however, and we must hear what other members of the Convention have to say in regard to them. As I said before, I quite sympathise with the representatives from Victoria, though I do not think that at Adelaide they sympathised with me to the same extent.
The Hon. A.J. PEACOCK:
Did I not second the motion there?
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Not only do I sympathise with the representatives from Victoria, but when the time comes I shall be willing to assist them in every way possible. I do not think, however, that it would be wise for us to begin this business with the intention of not completing it. My opinion is that we should do as much as we can, and, if we find that we cannot finish the work before the time arrives when the delegates from Victoria will have to return, we can then consider the question of an adjournment. I am sure that upon this matter the members of the Convention will be willing and anxious to meet their wishes in every way possible.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[12.43]:
I intend to move the addition of the following words to the motion:-

That it be an instruction to the committee to have the evidence given by experts or statisticians to the committee printed, and that copies of such evidence and of any statistics or reports furnished to the committee be laid on the table of the Convention.

I never could see what good object was served by the secrecy in which the committees conducted their deliberations at Adelaide. The true precedent in this matter was set to us by the Convention itself in having its deliberations published in the full light of day, hon. members being of opinion that our judgments upon circumstances are likely to be clearer when they are not formed in secret. It is a strange thing that copies, of the evidence taken at Adelaide by the principal committee-the Finance Committee-have never been supplied to the members of the Convention. We were asked to accept the conclusions drawn by members of that committee without examining the premises upon which they were based. I submit, however, that it is a very difficult matter to arrive at correct conclusions without having an opportunity to consider the evidence on which those conclusions ought to be based. If there is one thing more than another which approximates to certainty in regard to the work of the Convention it is that neither of the sets of clauses which contain the solution suggested by the Finance Committee and the Committee of Treasurers could be accepted as they stand. The first solution which was brought forward by the committee was practically stillborn.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Not stillborn!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
That was not the fault of the committee; it was the fault of the Convention!

Mr. GLYNN:
I do not know whose fault it was; but this is the time to give the necessary directions. The upshot of the committee's deliberations was that when their conclusions were sent to the Convention the clauses which they had framed could not be accepted. The first set of clauses were practically stillborn, or rather, their mortality was soon settled by the shafts of criticism directed against them by the members of the Convention. The second set of clauses suggested, notwithstanding their ingenuity, were not such that we could accept them as a solution of the difficulty. They have been keenly criticised by the press and by the members of the Convention and of the various legislatures, and the conclusion all have come to is that these clauses cannot be accepted as a solution of the matter, or be embodied as part of the ultimate constitution regulating the financial affairs of the commonwealth. I think that the fullest information should be given to the members of the Convention by allowing the publication of the evidence as the sittings of the committee take place. In this way we may hope to obtain the co-operation of the members of the Convention, of the outside public, of the press, and of the members of the various parliaments. In this way we may get a solution which, if not perfect, will be based upon a recommendation generally regarded as the best obtainable.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I would suggest that the amendment first suggested should be put before that motion proposed which would come at the end of the resolution, and I propose to move it in this form:

That the following words be added to the motion:- "That another representative of each colony shall be chosen by the representatives thereof."
Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria):

It appears to me that there is a good deal of misapprehension in regard to the suggestion thrown out by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner. It seems to me that he dissents from the motion submitted by the leader of the Convention that a committee should now be appointed to prepare a financial scheme for submission to the Convention on the ground that the members named to form the committee have all of them, except the hon. member, Mr. Holder, been absent from the colonies during the period in which important discussions have been taking place in the various parliaments and in the press. The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest has, it seems to me, added valuable testimony as to the wisdom of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's objection. He has pointed out that he is utterly ignorant of what has taken place in the colonies since our last sitting at Adelaide.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I said that I was ignorant of the suggestions which have been made by the various legislatures!

Mr. TRENWITH:

Yes, exactly. While I indorse as heartily as any person can the desirability of expedition in connection with our labours, I feel that we want something more. We want the assurance that we shall have ample time to do thoroughly the work we have undertaken. The misfortune of the work which has been done so far is that it was done under the high pressure of a knowledge that we must adjourn at a certain time, and not be able to meet again for the purpose for which we were then sitting. We are not in that position now. We have whatever time we choose to take, if arrangements can be made by which the time can be taken at a season convenient to the various colonies. The Right Hon. Sir George Turner has pointed out that it is impossible for the delegates from Victoria to remain here now more than three weeks; but it is not necessary to conclude our labours in three weeks, or in three years, if the interests of federation would be jeopardised thereby. It is, however, necessary to do this work effectively, to do it so thoroughly, so completely and well, that when submitted to the people of Australia it will be adopted. We should lose that certainty of ultimate success which would result from complete and well-done work if we were to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member, Mr. Symon, of hurrying as much as we can now.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

There was no suggestion to hurry!

Mr. SYMON:
I did not say that we should hurry!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Why debate the matter at all?

Mr. TRENWITH:
Because it hinges upon the resolution before us.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Not at all!

Mr. TRENWITH:
The resolution is that the financial question be relegated to a committee at once. The suggestion of my right hon. friend, the Premier of Victoria, is that the question should be first discussed by the whole Convention in Committee, and that it should be subsequently referred to the Finance Committee for report.

Mr. GLYNN:
There is no objection to the appointment of the Finance Committee now!

Mr. TRENWITH:
No; but it does seem to me that very sufficient reasons have been given why the Finance Committee, when appointed, should have the advantage of a discussion in the full Convention upon the broad general principles of finance in order that they may learn from the delegates here, in a better way than they could do by reading the Hansard reports of the various parliaments, what has been said and done in the respective colonies, and also the general character of the criticism which has been advanced upon the work of the Convention. The assumption, however, that the delegates from Victoria require an adjournment at so early a period as one week, as suggested by one hon. member, arises from a misapprehension. We have no idea that we should do anything but sit here and, as industriously as we can, although not hurriedly, discuss and consider the matter for three weeks at any rate; for we think we can devote that time to the work, and we feel that we can, and ought to do that which we have to do thoroughly and properly.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales) 12.54):
It seems to me that the time has come when we should get practically to business. The question is—are the Treasurers of the colonies who have all the information in their hands, and who fill a particular position in connection with finance to be formed into a committee of investigation which can carry on its work at any time during the sittings of this Convention so as to be useful in affording information, and in consulting together as to the general work before us? It does not follow that even if this Committee is appointed we should not deal with these financial clauses in the ordinary way, or that the committee should report to the Convention until they have had the benefit of any debate which may take place in the full committee. It seems to me that the main object of the committee of five Treasurers is that every possible statistical information bearing upon this great subject may be put in such a clear and concise form that those who are dealing with the question of finance as it relates to what has been termed the bargain between the colonies will know exactly what they are doing. We were at great difficulty in the Finance Committee in connection with the Convention in Adelaide in getting clear and reliable information. There was a want of definiteness in the statistical work which I hope will not be repeated now. It would be better I think under all the circumstances to carry this motion in its original form, and, then, if this committee of Treasurers desires to have others added to its body, or desires to examine other peculiar experts, as they may be considered, they can do so. The great difficulty in connection with the last Finance Committee lay in its numbers. Personally, I should prefer to see the the original motion carried. As far as I myself am concerned, I may tell my hon. friend, Mr. Walker, that, if it does come to a question of one delegate being appointed from each colony, there will be no difficulty about his inclusion in the committee.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[12.56]:

The motion which has been made by the leader of the Convention has taken me rather by surprise. I had no knowledge of it until I heard of it yesterday. The hon. member proposes to revert to the system which was carried out in South Australia of electing committees, for the purpose of really doing the work of the Convention. Now, having been a member of the Finance Committee in South Australia, I must say that I do not look with much favour upon the proposal made by the hon. member. If we look to the result of the Finance Committee appointed on the last occasion, I do not think it will be found that much benefit was derived from it. If we go a little further, and look at the result of the committee of Treasurers, I think we shall find still less benefit.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The hon. member will admit that the subject is a difficult one?

Mr. LYNE:

I admit that.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The hon. member himself was a member of the Finance Committee!

Mr. LYNE:

I have already said that I was. As far as the present committee are concerned, if, as the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, suggested, my hon. friend, Mr. Walker, is anxious to be a member of the committee, he certainly will have my vote. Having regard to my experience in connection with the last Finance Committee, I have not the slightest desire to be on the committee which it is now proposed to appoint. If the business of this committee is to be conducted as the business of the last committee was conducted, that is, in secret, I do not think it will be productive of any good at all. I certainly agree with the hon. member, Mr. Glynn, in thinking that a huge mistake was made in South Australia in conducting the business of this committee in secret. It would assist us in educating—if I may use the term—the public mind to have the deliberations of the committee in public, and, if its appointment be agreed to, I hope the mover of the amendment will press his proposal, and will obtain the consent of the Convention, if possible, to having the deliberations of the committee, not only in public, but also published. At the present time we are having submitted to the public only little scraps and bits of the evidence taken by the Finance Committee in Adelaide on various important matters. I thought then that the whole of the evidence taken should have been submitted to the public. It would have had considerable effect, I am satisfied, in guiding the public mind in a determination as to what should be done at the present time, and it would also have guided the minds of members of the Convention who had not the privilege of hearing the evidence given.

Mr. SOLOMON:
There was no evidence except that of the Railway Commissioners!

Mr. LYNE:
But why was it not published?

Mr. SOLOMON:
It was published!

Mr. LYNE:
We heard nothing about it in New South Wales until the publication of some of it in one of the newspapers a short time ago.

[The President left the chair at 1 p.m. The Convention resumed its sitting at 2 p.m.]

Mr. LYNE:
With regard to the appointment of this committee, I should like the hon. member, Mr. Barton, to explain what the committee is really intended to do—if it is intended to conduct its discussions and obtain its evidence in secrecy, and simply bring up a bald report to this Convention, or if it is for the purpose of guiding the decision of this Convention on the all-important question of the finances of the commonwealth. If the latter is the object, probably there may be some wisdom in appointing the committee. But, as I said at the outset, I am opposed, to a very large extent, to the appointment of a committee of this kind on the present occasion. The question of finance is, no doubt, one of vast importance, and, in the past, it has been one of the great difficulties we have had to contend with; but I do not agree with the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, that it is the most important question this Convention has to deal with. It is one that can be dealt with, and, probably, satisfactorily, in the future. The greatest question we have to deal with is that of equal state rights, and not the question of finance, because the financial question may adjust itself in a few years, whereas the difficulties of the question of state rights may increase in the course of time. With regard to the adjournment suggested by the Premier of Victoria, if we agree to an adjournment in three weeks time, what will happen at the next meeting of the Convention? The next meeting will probably take place just before the elections in New South Wales, and then we shall have to adjourn for those elections. Some other matter may also crop up to cause further delay and adjournment. While I should certainly like to fall in with any proposal to accommodate the Victorian representatives, I would point out that the dissolution in that colony takes place on the 4th of next month. I suppose the seats of all the gentlemen present are so safe that they do not want to go amongst their electors very much, and it would be better for them to wait until the 4th of next month, or thereabouts, and then I suppose they will have three or four weeks before the election takes place. They will thus have ample, time to consult their constituents.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Will the hon. member Stump the country for us?
Mr. LYNE:
If hon. gentlemen are in favour of the policy I advocate, I will be glad to do so. They are, however, quite capable of doing that for themselves. I was rather amused by the few remarks that fell from the Premier of Western Australia about the short shrift he got in South Australia. Why, the business of the Convention was turned topsy-turvy to meet the desires of the hon. gentleman. To oblige him we gave prior consideration to several clauses at the end of the bill. We all felt that we should give every facility to those hon. gentlemen who came so far to attend the Convention, and we did so. I think on that occasion the Western Australian representatives wanted to go away because an election was about to take place there. If you take it step by step, you will find that the best thing we can do on the present occasion is to carry out the suggestion made by several members of the Convention, and particularly, I think, by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, to discuss with r

Mr. SYMON:

And efficiently!

Mr. LYNE:

And discuss the suggestions made to us by the various parliaments. That is one of the great objections to appointing a committee which is to sit in secret. It would be really, throwing the whole of the suggestions of the parliament into a pool, and they would not receive full discussion in the light of day, which suggestions coming from such important bodies as the legislatures ought to receive at the hands of this Convention. I hope that those recommendations will receive proper consideration at the hands of the Convention. I trust the learned members of this Convention will restrain themselves a little, and to a greater extent than they did in South Australia, because we might reasonably say that the learned members of this Convention occupied most of the time in the discussions. I think we could get through a great deal of work in three or four weeks. I believe that if we devote ourselves heartily to the work, in four weeks time from now, we shall be very near the end of the discussion. I sincerely trust we shall not be called upon to agree to another adjournment, and that before we separate we shall have something licked into shape which we shall be able to submit to the people of the country.

The Hon. Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia)[2.8]:

I do not think the proceedings of the Convention will be helped very much by adjourning at the earliest possible moment. It is rather a pity that there is any necessity to discuss the matter, because I take it that it prevents us from going on with very important business. I do not know what these proposals are which the Right Hon. Sir George Turner referred to as being before us. There have been many proposals in the newspapers, but I know of no proposals that have been before the Convention. If we examine the parliamentary records, we shall find very few proposals. They are generally objections to the present proposals rather than suggestions as to any possible way out of the difficulty. I am entirely in favour of the appointment of the committee which has been moved. At all events, they can bring up in some form the proposals that are in the air, but which are not before us. On, the other hand, if we leave the question to chance, for each hon. gentleman to ventilate some particular well or ill-considered scheme be may have in his mind, I agree with the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, that we shall take many months before we even arrive at what it is we are talking about, and before we know substantially what we have to consider. We have come here after an adjournment, having practically undertaken to the whole of Australia that we shall settle this question before we adjourn. We adjourned before out of consideration for certain hon. gentlemen, who thought that they had a duty to perform, and I agree that it was a duty. But when the Convention consented to that adjournment it was on the distinct understanding that when they returned the Convention should meet again, and the question should be finally determined. To adjourn again, and to keep the matter dangling before the public, would be simply to lend assistance to the adversaries of the great cause, and to justify them in thinking that though earnestness was in our words, it was not in our hearts. I distinctly object to the suggestion that we should have an adjournment unless it is inevitable. I also protest against my right hon. friend's statement that the proceedings in Adelaide were hurried. We worked very hard; we sat very long hours. Men do not always work any the worse for having to work hard, and at great pressure men are capable of doing much greater things than when they are working in a mere dilettante fashion, when they can adjourn from time to time and from place to place. I hope we shall act regardless of our own time and convenience, and will study in every way we can reasonably the cause which we have to support, and the duty which we owe to ourselves and those whom we represent. I hope we shall sit, not merely every day, but every night, if necessary, so as to ensure the fullest consideration. I utterly disagree with the suggestion that if we do that the result must be that our resolutions will be less well considered than if we take more time about them, and bring our energies to them in a more intermittent manner. I think if we proceed with a whole-heartedness to do the work, not to scamp it—perhaps in three weeks we may do it well enough, and even this great financial question might be found not so very difficult to deal with as some hon. members who wish the matter not to be hurried seem to anticipate. As far as I sat here listening to the debate, I hope the result will be an endeavour on the part of every member of the Convention to do all be possibly can to satisfy the whole continent of Australia that we are here with a whole-heartedness and determination to carry out this work before we adjourn, unless indeed it be found to be impossible.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales):

I was under the impression, Sir, that the motion before the Convention was the appointment of a committee; but listening to the debate one would imagine that the question was the adjournment of, the Convention. With all respect to those who say that there was no hurry in Adelaide, I am one of those who believe that there was a great deal of hurry in Adelaide, for the Premiers had to go away to England, and many of the New South Wales representatives had to come back here to meet their own Parliament. What we have to consider, and to give a great deal of consideration to, is the question of public sentiment. It must not go abroad that anything done by this Convention was done in a hurry or without due consideration, otherwise whatever conclusions we may come to we shall be charged with having come to those conclusions hurriedly, and without sufficient consideration. We do not want the enemies of federation to be able to say that, under any circumstances or under any conditions, we did not give ample and due consideration to any suggestion which had been made by the various parliaments. But at the same time, I think no one will question the advisability of the motion made to refer these matters to a select committee; and will it not be time enough when the necessity arises to consider the question of adjournment? I am one of those who believe that every consideration should be shown to those members who, through no fault of their own, may be called away, as was shown to the Western Australian representatives, who were allowed to take a certain part of the bill by reason of the fact that they had to leave early. I confess I was not one of those who gave them that consideration; but, nevertheless, the Convention as a whole did. When the time comes we should consider the reasons for an adjournment; but at present I think we are wasting time in discussing that question.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales)[2.15], in reply:

In deference to the suggestion which has been made I wrote down the following words as an amendment to the second paragraph of the motion:-

And one other representative of each colony to be chosen by the representatives thereof."

The time for amending the motion has passed, unless hon. members express their concurrence in this amendment in such a way that I can ask Mr. President, by concurrence, to add it to the motion. Of course, if I find any expression of opinion from hon. members against that I will leave the motion as it stands.

Hon. MEMBERS:

Add it!

The Hon. E. Barton:

As that seems to be the general view, I would ask, Sir, that the motion be amended by adding the words:

and one other representative of each colony to be chosen by the representatives thereof.
Motion, by leave, so amended.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I do not wish to detain the Convention at any length. My right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, seems to think that if this select committee were to begin their labours early they would be working in the dark. Not only are there two of the gentlemen named who have been in the colonies all the time, but the other members whose names are to be added have remained in the colonies for the whole time, so that seven out of ten members of the committee will have had all the opportunities which are available for knowing what has been said and written on the subject of federal finance. In addition to that, there will be in the hands of hon. members to-morrow a tabulated statement of all the amendments suggested by the various legislatures made out in such a form that the sequence of them in the clauses will be seen at a glance, and the Finance Committee thereby, with that information before them, will know at once, and in a very easy form, exactly what has been done by the various legislatures. That, I think, will also meet the view of my right hon. friend, Sir John Forrest, who said that we have not seen the suggestions of the various legislatures. They have now all been laid on the table, and although some of them arrived rather late, they will be all embodied in a tabulated statement which will be in the hands of hon. members to-morrow. I quite agree, with the hon. member, Mr. Trenwith, in deprecating anything like hurry; but I do not think while we decline to hurry we are therefore bound to take such a course as will bang up the proceedings of this Convention for several months. I think the common-sense of that matter was really put by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, that is, let us do our work industriously, determinedly, not with any hurry, but in such a way as to show that we are not paltering with the matter, and if we then find that three weeks is insufficient for this work, if we find at the end of three weeks that there is an absolute necessity for our friends from Victoria, to leave, then will be time enough for us to consider the question of adjournment. In answer to what my hon. friend, Mr. Lyne, has said about the secrecy of select committees, I would like to point out to him that the object of the committee is not finally to decide anything; that the whole purpose of a select committee of this kind is to formulate proposals for discussion; and, therefore, that publicity which would accompany any debate, the object of which is to come to a final determination, is not necessary in a case of a select committee, while it is absolutely necessary in the case of the debate which follows. There is no one member of this Convention who desires, I take it, that our proceedings should be conducted with closed doors, but when there is a necessity for negotiations and discussion between hon. members constituting a select committee for the purpose of arriving not at a conclusion but at some proposal to be laid before the Convention until they finish their labours the whole of that matter is in a state of flux. These matters are mere suggestions or proposals, and it is not until they come before us in the shape of a report by the committee that the Convention can deal with them by way of final decision. That is the time when, of course, the public will naturally expect to be present, and there is not one member of this Convention who would for an instant deny their right to be present. That discussion can take place between the members of the committee without the necessity of having a press report of their proceedings is to me such an obvious thing that I think reflection demonstrates to us that we cannot adopt a proceeding of that kind in any way. If we are to leave the proceedings of the select committee open to reporting by the press at every stage of their proceedings, the result would be that there would be such accounts and such criticisms taking place on the various stages of that discussion as would tend, not to enlighten but to mislead the public mind, and as would tend to cause the members of the public to come to a conclusion upon the intentions and the work of that committee which would not be the real conclusion to be gathered from their final work.

Mr. GLYNN:
The amendment does not suggest that!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I was not referring to the amendment of the hon. gentleman, but was replying to certain remarks made by Mr. Lyne. I understood that the objection to any select committee proceedings at all was because the whole of this discussion should take place in public, and I was pointing out the difficulty of that course. I should like to say also that, with a Convention of fifty members discussing a matter which really belongs to financial experts, there is much greater difficulty in coming to a sound conclusion without having some proposals formulated by those experts than there would be if we had their suggestions before us in a concrete form. I am not of the opinion that there was any undue hurry about this matter in Adelaide. The Finance Committee, no doubt, found this a very difficult nut to crack; but that committee sat for about ten days, and the other committee who revised their labours - the Committee of Treasurers - sat for several days in addition.

Hon. MEMBERS:

   No!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
They sat for two or three days from the time they were appointed.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
During odd hours!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I think Mr. Holder will bear me out that it was some days from the time he made the suggestion that they should sit together for this purpose and the date when they presented the clauses which were afterwards laid before the Convention. No doubt those clauses commended themselves to the Convention more rapidly for the reason that they were at that time the best proposals put before them. Because they have received some criticism since, it does not follow that even now they may not emerge from the fire of criticism in this Convention not very much modified. All I have to say about it is this: that not being skilled in finance, I prefer to leave the formulation of proposals to those who know more about these matters than I do, I hope that none of the remarks I have made were uncalled for, and I trust that my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, will find as we go on with our discussions that there is a general spirit in the Convention to avoid any undue waste of time and delay. I am quite sure we shall all co-operate to that end, that none of us will make speeches which we consider unnecessary; that while there are matters for due discussion, that discussion will be to the point, and that our labours will be directed to the doing of good work, because the very best work in the world can sometimes be done without any unnecessary delay. If we avoid unnecessary delay, and at the same time apply our best faculties to the work we have before us-and it may be of course that in doing that we shall have to forego some of the festivities intended for us-if we act in that way there is then a chance of our completing our work in the three weeks, and if we fail to do that I am quite sure every consideration will be extended to my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, and those who accompany him.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolved: (1) That Chapter IV of the Draft Constitution be referred to a select committee for consideration and report, with power to send for persons and papers.

(2) That such committee consist of Mr. Reid, Mr. George Turner, Mr. Holder, Sir Philip Fysh, and Sir John Forrest, and one other representative of each colony, to be chosen by the representatives thereof.

(3) That it be an instruction to the committee to have the evidence given by experts or statisticians to the committee printed, and copies of such evidence and of any statistics or reports furnished to the committee, be laid
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales) rose to move:

That Sir John Downer, Mr. R.E. O'Connor, and the mover be reappointed a drafting committee.

He said: It will be clear to hon. members that there will be a considerable necessity for drafting as we go on with the various proposals and suggestions that will be before us, including the proposals which have been made by the various legislatures, and it can scarcely be expected of any of us that amendments we shall adopt in the course of debate will exactly be in the strict form in which we should like to see them in the bill. It is therefore advisable for us to have the assistance of a committee. I have mentioned the names of the previous Drafting Committee in this motion, because I think, from what I have heard from various quarters, that the Convention is fairly satisfied with the way in which they performed their duties. It has been suggested to me that additional names might be added. The members of the Drafting Committee, I am sure, would welcome assistance; but the only question is whether, when you have a committee consisting of four or five members, the work of that committee would be shortened by the addition of other gentlemen engaged in such a work as drafting. Whatever is done in that regard, it must be at once understood, will not be viewed with the slightest jealousy by any member of the Drafting Committee.

Mr. JAMES (Western Australia):

This Drafting Committee, I understand, was appointed by the Constitutional Committee, in April last. This is the first opportunity the Convention, as a whole, have had of dealing with the question, and I venture to think that this committee, by being enlarged, will be considerably strengthened. I do not for one moment desire to take up a position which would suggest that members of this Convention are competent to criticise in detail the drafting of the 1897 bill. But the impression produced on my mind is that the drafting is not an improvement on the drafting of the 1891 bill. It does not appear to me to be so clear cut as the bill of 1891 was. For that reason I think it would be advisable that there should be some new minds on this committee, not only for the purpose of giving us, perhaps, a better bill, but also for the purpose of saving, not the time of the Drafting Committee, but the time of the Convention. In this, the last stage of the bill, the eminent lawyers, we have in the Convention will feel that their names will be, to a large extent, bound up with the drafting of the bill, although they themselves are not on the Drafting Committee. They will feel therefore bound to deal with these details more than they did at our meeting in April last. Hon. members will no doubt remember that several objections were taken then, some of which were argued at length, and most of them were left to the Drafting Committee to settle. If we have members of the Convention who are well qualified to take a position on the Drafting Committee, discussing all these details in the Convention, we shall have the time of the Convention considerably taken up in that way. It is far better that these matters should be discussed across a table by members of a committee than that they should be discussed here in open Convention. In common with the rest of the Western Australian delegates I left early on the last occasion. I think when we left in April last we had simply dealt with the question of money bills. If I remember rightly, we had a very long argument, almost at the first section brought before the Convention, on a mere question of draftsmanship. Such arguments are likely to be increased considerably unless we have on the Drafting Committee those men, who by virtue of their attainments, are entitled to be there, and who, feeling that their names and reputation are bound up with the draftsmanship of the bill, will consider that they are bound to take every objection which strikes them as being a good objection against any defect of draftsmanship. With that object I desire to move as an amendment:

That the following names be added to the motion:- "The President, Mr.
Symon, and Mr. Isaacs."

Amendment proposed.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS (Tasmania)[2.30]:
I do not think we can improve on the proposal before the Convention.
We shall do more harm than good by enlarging the committee. I think it would be best to leave the matter in the bands of the gentlemen named in the motion.

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER (South Australia)[2.31]:
I join with my friend from Tasmania in submitting that the smaller the Drafting Committee the better, and the more expeditiously will it do its work. I am perfectly certain there is not one member of the Convention who will venture to object to the three names suggested. In yourself, Mr.
President, Mr. Symon, and Mr. Isaacs we have three of the most qualified men in Australia so far as draftsmanship is concerned. But that is not the question. The question is, "Is it advisable to make the Drafting Committee too large?" We are all under great obligation to the Drafting Committee who acted in South Australia. Their work was most arduous. They not only had to take a leading part in the debates of the Convention itself, but they had to work all through the night almost, in some instances; and the fact that the bill is not drafted in, perhaps, the best possible manner, is not due to any fault on their part, but is due to the fact that the Convention itself made alterations in their drafting. In every bill which comes before any legislature, when amendments are moved in Committee, and those amendments are not finally submitted to the draftsman of the bill, defects will occur; and the defects which occur in this bill, I take it, are due, not to any fault or want of ability on the part of the Drafting Committee, but to those circumstances to which I have referred, which rendered it impossible for them to review their own work. I do not wish to make any remark which can possibly be construed into a want of appreciation of your great talents as a draftsman, Mr. President, and of the undoubted ability of Mr. Symon and Mr. Isaacs in that respect; but I do think it will be a mistake to make the Drafting Committee too large.

The PRESIDENT:

May I be permitted, as my name has been mentioned, to say that I think the old Drafting Committee are entitled to our hearty thanks, our loyal support, our generous aid; and whether or not I have the honor of being officially associated with them, they can command my humble services in any capacity.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales) [2.34]:

No one has a higher feeling than I have of the efficiency of tile work of the gentlemen who composed the Drafting Committee in Adelaide, and I am very glad to see that we shall have a chance of enjoying the benefit of their labours now. Now that we are approaching a final settlement of this measure, it is, to my mind, a matter of the very greatest importance that we should strengthen this committee. I absolutely believe that the inclusion of the names suggested will be it wise step. I absolutely believe it will strengthen the hands of our three friends who have had this burden cast upon them, and that the results in the end will be more satisfactory to them and to us; and if we can hope for the benefit of the services of the three gentlemen named, I, for one, will most cordially and heartily support the amendment which has been moved.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[2.35]:

As I am one of the gentlemen whose names have been mentioned, I desire to say that, in this and in all other matters, I am only too willing to give my services to the Convention, and I feel extremely obliged for the remarks which have been made by some of my hon. friends. At the same time I cannot help thinking that three is quite large enough a number for the Drafting Committee, and I think we should act wisely in not augmenting that number. Those hon. gentlemen have had a great deal of trouble in doing the work they have done, and they know that they can confidently rely on the assistance of every member of the Convention at any time and in any manner they desire. Therefore, I think, having the fullest regard for the undoubtedly strong arguments which have been urged on one side, the balance of convenience and advisability will be not to increase the number of the Drafting Committee beyond three.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON (Tasmania)[2.37]:
I think it is impossible to close our eyes to the fact that the appointment of any additional members of the Drafting Committee will seem something like a slur upon the existing committee.

Hon. MEMBERS:
No, no!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It is not a personal matter!

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
I will put it that it will convey the idea that we regard as necessary a further strengthening of the committee, and I think none of us would desire to convey that idea. I am informed on the best authority that Sir Reginald Frederick Palgrave, clerk of the British House of Commons, has expressed the highest sense of the statesmanship and draftsmanship of the bill as it has been prepared. The great bulk of the work of drafting has been completed-completed, we must all admit, with most excellent results; and whilst those gentlemen who have been mentioned as additional members of the committee would no doubt add to the strength of any committee chosen for that particular purpose, they have told us that they are quite prepared to give their assistance wherever may be called for in the preparation or completion of the draft bill. I hope we shall continue to support the more limited committee which has done its work so well, and which is the most convenient committee as to numbers we could very well have.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE (South Australia)[2.39]:
I agree entirely with the last speaker. I think, so far as I am able to judge as a layman, that the bill drafted in Adelaide is as plain as it possibly can be. One may read it as he runs. I do not think the worthy representative from Western Australia has done that credit to the draftsmen of the bill which they deserve. I am quite willing to believe that the hon. gentleman is a judge in regard to that upon which be has expressed his opinion. I recognise that he is the leader of the bar in the colony from which he comes, and which he ably represents; but, at the same time, I do not think he told us that the bill could bear any comparison, for its clearness and distinctness, with the bill of 1891. I have heard opinions passed by eminent men, and I have also read them in the public prints, to the effect that the bill, as drafted by the Adelaide Convention, is a decided improvement on the bill of 1891, and small credit would it be to those who had the benefit of the earlier work if they could not have perfected it. I have heard that the hon. member has had certain promises of support.

Mr. JAMES:

Nothing of the sort

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

Well, then, I have been incorrectly informed. I beg the hon. member's pardon. I was going to remind the hon. member that, if he were to take a few more hon. members into his confidence before amendments were sprung upon this Assembly it would, perhaps, facilitate business. Although I hail from South Australia, I recognise that the amendment means that South Australia will have three members on the Drafting Committee—that is, half the number. We all admit their ability, and I am glad we do; in fact, over the length and breadth of Australia they are recognised as eminent men in their profession. I, as a representative of South Australia, would regard it as a great compliment if those gentlemen were elected; but, as the hon. member, Sir Richard Baker, has

The Hon. H. DOBSON (Tasmania)[2.41):

I hope that this will be the last time during the sittings of this Convention that, when a suggestion is made to strengthen a committee or to help forward the most important work that we have in hand, hon. members will be charged with having a want of confidence in others. I think that anything of that kind is altogether to be deprecated. We want to do our work in the best possible way, and I am one of those who agree with the hon. member, Mr. James, that the Drafting Committee can be strengthened, and that, when the whole thing is over, the committee will thank us for having added to their number, and that the Convention also will thank us for having done so. I think that it is an idle waste of time to discuss this matter. We all have the greatest possible confidence in the Drafting Committee who served us in Adelaide. I think we were all astonished at the marvellous way in which they put into shape the ideas—even the inconsistent ideas—which we gave them. I suggest that we should add to the Drafting Committee for this reason alone: If the Drafting Committee, consisting of three members, sit at the table drafting every clause and every amendment, I take it that you want at least two other members to receive from them their draft as they settle it, and to go through the bill line by line, separately and by themselves, to see if they can find mistakes in it; and I will undertake to say that they will find mistakes in it—perhaps only one or two trivial mistakes—which hon. members, devoting hours to it, will, perhaps, not perceive, but which those hon. gentlemen, devoting their fresh minds to it, will see.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
A mistake of one word might make it read ridiculously!
The Hon. H. DOBSON:
That is true. The Drafting Committee have borne the heat and burden of the day. I suggest that you, Sir, should be added to the committee, and that the two other hon. members should keep themselves in reserve to take from the committee the sheets as they complete them, and go through them with infinite pains, in a separate room, to see if they can find any mistake. Every lawyer knows that when a mistake is made in a deed or an act it is, in two out of three cases, done when making an alteration. You make an amendment and do not see the effect of it on some clause perhaps ten pages off. For that reason, I think that the Drafting Committee might be assisted in their labours by the addition of two or three hon. members.
Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[2.44]:
As my name has been associated with this amendment, may I be permitted to say a few words? I rather deplore the effort which seems to have been made to create some kind of personal feeling, or some sort of personal irritation in relation to a matter with which every one of us is concerned—to see that the best is done for the object we have in view. If I thought, for one moment, that the object of the mover of the amendment was to cast any reflection on the old Drafting Committee, or to deplore in the slightest degree the able and splendid work which they did for us in Adelaide, I should immediately desire leave to intimate the withdrawal of my name. But I do not view it in that way at all. I was not aware until I heard my name mentioned by the hon. member who moved the amendment that it was intended to increase the strength of the Drafting Committee in the way suggested, nor that my name was to be associated with it in any way whatever, and I think that that fact may be accepted as a testimony that my hon. friend from Western Australia certainly did not act in collusion, if I may so express it, with any of the lawyers whose names have been mentioned. I will only say this further: I do not, believe that in any assembly in the world, or in any body of the profession, you would be able to find three men of greater capacity for the work which they undertook than the three members of the Drafting Committee selected in Adelaide. That is my deliberate opinion, and, although I also feel that it is undesirable to make comparisons, I do not agree with my hon. friend who moved the amendment that the result of their labours will not bear comparison with the bill of 1891. I think, in all humility, quite the opposite. But that is not the point. The point is, whether our labours will be brought to a better issue, and more easily and readily, by strengthening the Drafting Committee. I am not going to argue either in favour of or against it; but I will recall to the recollection of the Convention the fact that, in Adelaide, after we had come together in Committee of the whole, a number of suggestions were made—my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, made some, and other hon. members made others, and they were met by the remark, "Oh, these are mere drafting amendments, and it is hardly worth while taking up the time of the Committee upon them." I think that—I do not say for certain, but possibly—the enlargement of the Drafting Committee might prevent that result. I do not know whether it would or would not. But, at any rate, I may say that I have the most implicit confidence in the Drafting Committee as already constituted. Their work does them and the Convention infinite credit. My hon. friend who moved the amendment did so, as I thought, with the most perfect courtesy, although he expressed his own individual opinion upon one or two matters, and I think it is our duty—at least, I feel it to be my duty, as one of those whose names have been mentioned—to submit myself to the general opinion of the Convention, and whether the committee is or is not enlarged and strengthened, I shall always be delighted, as it is my duty, to lend every assistance to those gentlemen, whoever they may be, who constitute the Drafting Committee, and to be of whatever service I can in making the bill of such a character that it will redound to our credit in the shape of a measure so framed that he who runs may read.

Mr. CLARKE (Tasmania) [2.49]:

It was stated by my right hon. friend, the Premier of Tasmania, that if we were to increase the number of the members of the Drafting Committee we should cast a slur upon them, and be showing them discourtesy. I should like to point out that we have just increased the number of members who have to consider Chapter IV of the draft constitution. No member of the Convention ventured to suggest that we were casting a slur upon the members of that committee when we increased its number from five to ten.

An Hon. MEMBER:

There were originally twenty members on the Finance Committee, and the number has been reduced to ten!
Mr. CLARKE:

The Finance Committee originally consisted of twenty members, but was reduced to five at Adelaide. We remitted the consideration of the financial question to a committee consisting of the Treasurers of all the colonies, and, so far as I am aware, none of the colonies has more than one Treasurer. To-day we increased the number of the committee to ten. Inasmuch as no member of the Convention considered that in agreeing to that amendment we were showing discourtesy to the Treasurers of the different colonies, I do not think it is right to suggest now that if we increase the number of the Drafting Committee we shall be showing discourtesy to the three able gentlemen who formed that committee in Adelaide. I should like to say that I always considered it a misfortune that you, Mr. President, were not selected as one of the Drafting Committee at Adelaide, because your labours in connection with the bill of 1891 eminently fitted you to act on that committee. With regard to the Attorney-General of Victoria, I regret that there was not a single delegate from Victoria appointed to the Drafting Committee at Adelaide. I think that was a great mistake, and the learned Attorney-General of Victoria showed us, by his able criticism of the bill as drafted in Adelaide, how competent he is to form a member of the Drafting Committee. I therefore think that the inclusion of his name will add strength to the committee. With regard to the other gentleman whose name has been mentioned—Mr. Symon—I should like to say that he was chairman of the Judiciary Committee and is responsible for the drafting of all the clauses in the bill which relate to the judiciary. These clauses have been criticised rather severely by no less an authority than Sir Samuel Griffith, and I think it would be an advantage to the Convention if Mr. Symon's name were added to the list of the committee in order that he might show why these clauses should stand in the form in which they are at present. I support the addition to the committee of the gentlemen who have been named, and, but for the argument that we should not make the committee too large, I should like to see upon it another representative from Victoria. Before I sit down, I should like to refer to a remark of the hon. member, Mr. Howe, who deprecated the action of the hon. member, Mr. James, in springing the amendment upon the Convention without first submitting it to other hon. members. I do not know that there is a rule binding members of the Convention to show their amendments to Mr. Howe or to anyone else, to secure their approval before moving them. I consider that Mr. James acted correctly in not submitting his amendment to Mr. Howe. As
Mr. James is one of the youngest members of the Convention, and as I am another very young member, I wish to say that, throughout the sittings of the Convention, I shall retain to myself full authority to submit any amendment without showing it to any other hon. member.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[2.53]:

As I undertook to second the amendment, I should like to say, in order to remove any impression that this is a caucus movement, that I believe that I am the only member of the Convention to whom Mr. James has spoken upon this matter, and lie is certainly the only member to whom I have spoken of it. If there is an impression that this motion is going to be generally supported, I can assure hon. members that it will be supported because it appeals to the appreciation of the Convention that there should be some addition to the number of the Drafting Committee—not because of any doubt as to the ability of the gentlemen who formed the committee at Adelaide, and whose arduous labours have been fully appreciated by every member of the Convention, and by every colonial legislature.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Still that doubt is implied!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

I do not think that it is implied. If I thought that the slightest suggestion of a reflection upon the members of the Drafting Committee were implied in this proposal to increase the number of the committee, I would ask leave sit my hon. friend, Mr. James, to withdraw my promise to support him. I do not think that there is. I do not think that there is an idea in the minds of any member of the Convention which could be construed into an imputation upon the Drafting Committee, whose labours have been well described by Mr. Symon as most admirable; but I am sure that hon. members will see that it is proper that, at any rate, a representative from the great colony of Victoria should be a member of the committee, especially since among the Victorian representatives there is so eminent a member of the bar as Mr. Isaacs. Your own qualifications, Mr. President, as has been very well put by Mr. Clarke, and your labours in connection with the bill of 1891, apart from your general reputation as a draftsman, certainly entitle you to be one of the Drafting Committee. The name of Mr. Symon can only strengthen any committee that has to deal with legal work. I appeal to members of the Drafting Committee to take my assurance—and I believe that I can speak for every member of the Convention—that there is not the slightest suggestion of a reflection implied.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I have nothing to say in regard to the discussion which has taken place, except that those hon. gentlemen who were associated with me in the drafting of the bill at Adelaide will, as a matter of delicacy, abstain from voting, as I shall.

Question-That the words proposed to to be added (Mr. James' amendment) be so added-put. The Convention divided:

Original question resolved in the affirmative.

RETURNS: POPULATION, REVENUE, &c.
Ordered (on motion by Mr. WALKER): That the following returns be prepared and laid on the table:-

(1.) Population of each colony on 30th June, 1897.
(2.) Revenue for customs and excise for the year ending 30th June, 1897, showing separately the receipts from intoxicants and narcotics.
(3.) Revenue received during year ending 30th June, 1897, under the other branches proposed to be transferred to the commonwealth.

(4.) Expenditure in each colony during year ending 30th June, 1897, under each branch proposed to be transferred to the commonwealth.

(5.) Approximate value of properties to be transferred to the commonwealth.

The returns to include, and to show separately, the figures of each colony represented at this Convention, with the totals also, and the figures for Queensland finally added. Expenditure to be taken from the estimates if exact figures are not available. If the population or any other figures are not available, estimates to be made. The returns to be completed as quickly as possible.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.4]:

I move:

That the President do now leave the chair, and that the Convention resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to reconsider the Commonwealth Bill, together with the amendments suggested by the various legislatures.

In making this motion, I think hon. members will agree with me that, inasmuch as a properly tabulated statement of the suggested amendments is not yet in their hands we should not, in the absence of that document, make very much progress this afternoon. I suggest, therefore, that we should simply go into Committee pro forma, and wait until Monday before proceeding with the reconsideration of the bill. All information as to the suggested amendments will then be in our hands. I am sure I can rely upon hon. members to give their utmost attention to the amendments in the time available between now and our next meeting, in which event the course now taken will be a saving instead of a loss of time. I would ask hon. members to consider another question, that is, in view of the difficult position, in one sense, occupied by the Victorian delegation in having so limited a time at their disposal, whether it might not—I do not say it would—be a desirable thing for the Committee to proceed at once with the more important questions involved in the bill, that is to say, such questions as representation in the senate, the money powers of the houses, the questions of railways and rivers, and so on. It occurred to me that it would, perhaps, be a fair concession to make to my hon. friends from Victoria to deal with these principal matters first, and then to take up the other clauses which are less important, in the hope that we might have made such progress by the end of three weeks as would enable them to see that the clauses left for discussion would be merely those which were not the subjects of any suggested amendments. If we can arrive at that position, so much the better; if not, then the question must be seriously considered whether we should adjourn, and if so, for how long. It is with a view of consulting the convenience of hon. gentlemen from Victoria that I throw out this suggestion.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria): [3.7]

In seconding the motion,

I would say that if it be my hon. friend's desire to consult the views of the representatives of Victoria, he will deal first with the most important of all questions, that of finance; for there can be no doubt that the whole matter will rest upon this Convention devising some financial scheme which will be acceptable to all the colonies.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It is necessary to appoint a select committee to deal with the financial clauses, and if we deal with them in the full Committee, what will be the position of the select committee?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I think the probabilities are that there will be so many suggestions made by hon. gentlemen relating to the question of finance that we shall not be able in the Convention to pick out the best one from among them, whereas the Finance Committee, having all the necessary information, and having the advantage of the views of representatives as expressed in the Committee of the Convention, may be able to pick out one, or to adopt a mixture of two or more of the schemes which might prove satisfactory.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Do I understand that the right hon. gentleman would prefer a discussion upon these clauses in the full Committee of the Convention without any conclusion on the part of the select committee?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Personally, I undoubtedly would. There can be only the one representative from each colony, in addition to its Treasurer, upon this Finance Committee; and I am sure there is more than one member of each delegation who considers that he has a scheme which is perfect in itself. Therefore, I certainly would like to hear the views of every representative who has any suggestion to put before us which may help us out of the difficulty. I think the proper course would be to have a discussion upon the financial question before the Finance Committee proceed to formulate any definite conclusion. I would also like the leader of the Convention to say, whether he proposes that we should sit at night. We have received a large number of invitations to entertainments, and want to know whether we are to accept these invitations, or to say that, in consequence of our duties here occupying our time, we shall be unable to do so. As far as I am personally concerned, I feel very strongly that when a body of men come together for the purpose of doing work, if they are to have a great portion of their time taken up by attending entertainments, they cannot give their minds to what they have to do. When we have a spare evening the members of each delegation would like to have an opportunity of quietly talking over matters, and of thinking over what we ought to do next day when we meet. If the hon. member proposes to sit at night I shall be glad to support him. That course might, perhaps, enable the representatives of Victoria to get out of the difficulty which we now see staring us in the face. Whatever may be done I would ask my hon. friend to consider whether it would not be advisable on Monday to let it be understood that we shall have a discussion on the whole financial question, and then when other matters, perhaps not so important, are being discussed by the Convention, members of the Finance Committee may be able to meet and formulate some scheme.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales): I shall give my best consideration to the suggestion made by the right hon. gentleman. If there is any way of facilitating the views of the hon. member I shall be very glad to do so.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

In Committee:

Clause 1 (Short title).

The CHAIRMAN: Before I put this clause I think it would perhaps be a fitting time to inform the Committee what procedure it is intended to adopt. Of course, every member of the Committee is aware that this is not an ordinary bill, and that the suggested amendments made by the various legislatures of the different colonies are not ordinary amendments. We sit here in pursuance of the provisions of an act of Parliament of New South Wales called the Federal Enabling Act. By that measure it is the duty of this Convention to consider the suggested amendments made by the various legislatures. It, therefore, seems to me as a matter of law that we are bound to consider those suggestions. I consequently propose to put the various suggestions made by the local legislatures, without motion by any member of the Committee, and to put them in the order of sequence in which they come in each clause. That will prevent the necessity of members asking leave to withdraw amendments which they have proposed in order that prior amendments may be moved. Of course, as we have to reconsider the whole bill, it will be competent for any member of the Committee to move any amendments even though they have not been suggested by any of the local legislatures, or to move amendments on the amendments which have been suggested by such legislatures. This general rule, however, namely, that all these suggested amendments must be put, will be subject, to certain limitations-those limitations which standing orders and common-sense alike provide. There are three cases which may arise when I shall feel it my duty not to put the suggestions made by the local legislatures. Supposing the same or substantially the same amendments have been suggested by two or more legislatures. If one of these is carried it will not be necessary to put the others. If one of these is negatived it will not be possible to put the others, because of the rule which prevents the Committee at one and the same stage arriving at irreconcilable conclusions; so that hon. members when they take any course as to whether they will or will not adopt a suggestion which is practically identical with that made by another legislature, must bear in mind that they are settling that question, at all events as far as this Committee in its present stage is concerned. There is another case that will arise; that is, where some suggestion has been adopted, an irreconcilable suggestion which is identically the opposite of it cannot be considered. With these limitations, I propose, subject to any instructions given by this Convention, to put in the order in which they arise the suggestions made by the various parliaments. A schedule will be presented to this Convention on Monday next, in which these suggestions will be printed in their order of sequence, which I think will facilitate the proceedings.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[3.16]:

Do I understand that we are not to get the amendments until Monday next?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I think hon. members will have them to-morrow morning. There may be typographical corrections. If so they will be redistributed!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I hope we shall get them as early as possible. There is another matter I should like to mention with regard to the discussion of these amendments. Are we to be limited to the particular amendment which you, sir, put from the Chair, because, as you mentioned, there may be other amendments, either similar or the opposite of what may be submitted? If we are to follow strict rules, and not be allowed to refer to anything but the particular amendment, put from the Chair, we may be shut out from discussing the whole question. I would therefore suggest that as we are not sitting in the ordinary way, great latitude should be afforded to the representatives, and that, when we are dealing with a particular suggestion, we shall have liberty to refer to other suggestions dealing with the same subject. That, I think, will facilitate the business and prevent confusion arising later on. I suggest this for consideration, so that we may give every opportunity to representatives to discuss the whole question which may be raised by one particular amendment.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.18]:

I take it that the right hon. member's suggestion is obviously the right one, because it would be extremely difficult for us to discuss the suggested amendments by any parliament unless we could give reasons, for instance, why we preferred another suggestion, and in order to do that we should be able to compare one with another. There is another question which I suppose will arise, and might be referred to. I am not sure whether it was not dealt with by you, sir, in your remarks. We are not confined to the suggestions of the legislatures, because it is the statutory duty of the Convention to reconsider the bill itself, and we must go over every line. Under these circumstances, I think it would be the duty of an hon. member, if he wishes to propose an amendment in a clause between two suggested amendments, not to wait until those two amendments are dealt with, but to propose it at the proper time as it occurs in the bill. In fact, I think that is the substance of what you, sir, stated.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia) (3.19):

For the convenience of hon. members, I think it would be better to put the suggested amendments after the clause that it is proposed to amend. The clause of the bill sought to be amended should be printed first, and following that should be the suggested amendments of the various legislatures.

The Hon. N.J. BROWN (Tasmania)[3.20]:

There is one point as to which considerable difference of opinion has been expressed in the various parliaments, namely, whether the suggestions made by the legislature of a colony—that is, the suggestions agreed to by both houses of a legislature—are alone to be taken, or whether those agreed to by each house of each parliament, are to be considered? As regards the suggestions coming from the Tasmanian Parliament, sir, you will perceive that the suggestions which have been agreed to by both houses appear in one schedule, and those agreed to by each house separately are placed in another schedule.

The CHAIRMAN:

I have been asked four questions which I will answer in order of sequence. With reference to the question of the Right hon. Sir George Turner, in my opinion the fullest, freest, most ample discussion ought to be allowed on these suggestions. The members of the Committee ought to be allowed to consider the suggestions in groups, if I may so express it. I feel sure that every member of the Convention is of opinion that the utmost deference should be paid to each suggestion of the legislature of each colony, and in order to give effect to that, I think the views expressed by the Right hon. Sir George Turner should be adopted by me as Chairman of the Committee. In reference to the question of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, I think I have already indicated that if any hon. member has an amendment to move, apart from the suggestions of the legislatures, he ought to move that amendment in its proper place, either before the first suggestion or between two suggestions, as the case may be. As regards the question of the hon. member, Mr. Brown, I cannot take upon myself the responsibility of drawing any distinction between suggestions made by two houses of a legislature and suggestions made by one house. I think it would be an invidious thing to penalise those colonies where they have not had time to obtain a conference between the two houses; and therefore I will not make any difference whatever between suggestions which have been concurred in by two legislative bodies and suggestions made by one legislative body.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[3.23]:
I do not think, sir, you have given a reply to my question!

The CHAIRMAN:
That is a matter with which I have nothing to do.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
Is it within the power of the Convention to ask you to do it? I think it would be a great convenience if it were done.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
Ask the leader of the Convention!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
I would ask the leader of the Convention if he would arrange, for the convenience of hon. members, that each clause should be placed in conjunction with the suggested amendments. It will save hon. members a great deal of trouble, for they will be able to hold one paper in their hand instead of having to hold a number of papers, and to refer from one to the other. It may involve a little extra printing; but I think the convenience it will afford to hon. members will be more than sufficient to counterbalance the other consideration.
An Hon. MEMBER:
   Interleaved!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
   I do not care whether they are interleaved or placed alongside one another, or whether the clauses sought to be amended are placed at the head of the suggested amendments.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
   Will that not take a long time to get ready?

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
   I do not think it will take more than a few minutes, because all that you have to do is to put at the head of each group of amendments the clauses sought to be amended. It will not take more than a few minutes to prepare it, and it will save hours of work for each member of the Convention.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.25]:
   This process which is recommended, would certainly take some time. Hon. members may rest assured that there is no disposition to spare the printer for the purpose of the Convention; but the form in which it was proposed to table these amendments was before some of us yesterday afternoon, including the President and the Chairman. The number of the clause was given in the margin, and then there were columns showing in their proper order, so that the eye could take them in at a glance, the amendments of the legislatures, and whether they were suggested by one house or two. It was conceived then that to have the bill in one's hands, and to have the tabulated statement before one also, with a reference to the number of the clause, would obviate all difficulty of reference, and on comparison it seemed so to those who considered it, and I think hon. members will find it so. They will have these things before them tomorrow, and if it is discovered that there is any difficulty of reference in that way, I will do my utmost to see if a fresh print cannot be made with the clauses in the margin.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
   If the leader of the Convention will allow me, I will hand to him a paper which shows the practice adopted in Tasmania, and in which there is no interleaving.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
   That was considered, and it was found that it would be utterly impracticable with the number of amendments made by the different houses to put them in that form. There would be no possibility of making a convenient handy print in that way. As it is, the paper will be somewhat bulky, but I hope hon. members will find it as convenient as possible. If any inconvenience should arise, I will do my utmost to see it rectified.
Progress reported.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.27]:

It has been suggested to me that it will be convenient if the hon. member at the head of the representatives of each colony will state the name of the hon. member who is to assist the Treasurer on the Finance Committee. I understand that Sir James Lee-Steere has been selected by the Western Australian representatives, Sir Edward Braddon by the Tasmanian representatives, and Mr. Solomon by the South Australian representatives. I understand also that Mr. Walker will assist on behalf of New South Wales. It only remains now for our friends from Victoria to declare theirs.
The PRESIDENT:
I understand that it is the wish of the Convention that those names should be added to the Finance Committee.
Convention adjourned at 3.28 p.m.

Petitions - Report of Statistician's Department, New South Wales

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITIONS.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia) presented a petition from the Adelaide Ministerial Association, praying for its recognition of God in the Constitution of the Commonwealth.

Petition received.

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER (South Australia):

I have the honor to present a petition to which twenty-seven signatures are attached. Inasmuch as the petition asks the Convention not to agree to certain suggestions made by the Legislature of South Australia, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not in any way identify myself with the opinions expressed. I move:

That the petition be received, and read.

Motion agreed to.

The CLERK read the petition as follows:

To the Honorable the President and Members of the Australasian Federal Convention in session assembled:

The petition of the undersigned on behalf of the Australasian National League (in South Australia) humbly sheweth:

That your petitioners are of opinion that provision should be made in the preamble of the Commonwealth Bill for the recognition of Almighty God as the Supreme Ruler and the source of all law and authority.

That your petitioners are of opinion that the power of the federal parliament to impose direct taxation should be limited so as to provide that such taxation should only be imposed in the event of foreign war.

That your petitioners are of opinion that the right of appeal by litigants from the decision of the Australasian courts to her Majesty-in-Council should still be retained.

That your petitioners are of opinion that the control and regulation of the river Murray, and the use of the waters thereof by the federal parliament, should be extended so as to include all navigable rivers within the commonwealth and the tributaries thereof.

That your petitioners are of opinion that the suggestion of the South Australian House of Assembly that the qualification of electors for the senate, and the house of representatives should be in each of the states, one adult one vote should not be agreed to.

That your petitioners are of opinion that the suggestion of the South Australian House of Assembly that the powers of the federal parliament in reference to postal, telegraphic, telephonic and other like services should be limited to "outside the limits of the commonwealth," should not be agreed to.

Your petitioners therefore humbly pray that such amendments may be made in the Commonwealth Bill during the present session of the Convention as will give effect to the prayer of your petitioners,

REPORT OF STATISTICIAN'S DEPARTMENT, NEW SOUTH WALES.

Mr. Higgins (Victoria):
I desire to ask a question without notice. I understand that there is a report extant of the Statistician's Department of New South Wales with regard to financial matters, and I wish to know if it will be made available to members of the Convention? I understand there is a similar report in Victoria, and that there is no objection to its production.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales):
I received a copy of "Notes on Federal Finance," and I think the paper has been distributed to hon. members. A number of hon. members have received copies, though some of the reports distributed may have miscarried. The matter will be inquired into, and I have no doubt the hon. member will receive a copy of the report referred to.

FEDERAL FINANCE.

Mr. Glynn (South Australia):
I beg to ask the Premiers of the colonies represented in the Convention, and, in the case of South Australia, the hon. the Treasurer, Mr. Holder, whether, for the purpose of helping the deliberations of the Convention, they will lay upon the table copies of all reports presented to, their respective governments on the question of the finances of the proposed federation, the financial clauses of the draft bill, federal control or ownership of the railways. Since I gave notice of this question, some of the papers have been presented to the members of the Convention.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
I do not think there will be any objection on the part of any of the Premiers to lay upon the table any documents of the character named, which are not confidential.
The PRESIDENT:
Do any of the other Premiers desire to say anything in reply to the question?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria):
I agree with the reply of Mr. Reid.

The Hon. W. MOORE (Tasmania):
As far as the Premier of Tasmania is concerned, I think there will be no objection.

POPULATION AND ELECTORAL RETURNS.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria) rose to move:
That a return be laid before this Convention showing, according to the latest available information,— (1.) The population and number of electors in each electoral district for the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales; and
(2.) The population and number of electors in each electoral district for the Legislative Assembly of Victoria.

He said: I would ask that the Premier of New South Wales should make this information available as early as convenient, because to be of any use it will be required in connection with the debate on the representation of the states, which will come on, apparently, very early.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It will be done at once!

Question resolved in the affirmative.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee:
Clause 1.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.37]:
Objection was made at the last sitting by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner that inasmuch as the financial question presented the greatest difficulties with which we should have to deal at this adjourned sitting-or at any rate it was arguable that it presented as many difficulties as any other—a discussion should be taken first on the financial clauses for the information not only of members of the Convention, but also of the select committee on finance. Such hon. members as have mentioned the matter to me since that time, appear strongly to approve of the suggestion, and I need not say, as far as I am concerned, that if it would facilitate business and meet with the convenience of hon. members, it has on that ground every reason in its favour. If, therefore, it will be a means of facilitating the consideration of this very important question, I shall have no objection to move the postponement of clauses from 1 to 88. That would include the requirement of a uniform tariff within two years, the requirement that there should be free-trade within the commonwealth, the basis of distribution before the uniform tariff is imposed, and the basis of distribution afterwards. We could then discuss the clauses from 88 to 93, inclusive, as a whole without being restricted in any way. Of course, in moving the postponement of clauses from 1 to 88, I shall ask that clauses like clause 84 shall, for the present, at any rate, be accepted as necessary provisions in any federal commonwealth—that is to say, that the federation should have to collect the customs revenue, and that there should be freedom of intercourse between the various parts of the commonwealth. Therefore, if the clauses I have mentioned—say, from 88 inclusive—afford us a sufficient basis for the discussion desired, I would ask that the prior clauses be postponed. I take it that you, Mr. Chairman, in view of the kind of discussion which is suggested, will not ask for a vote upon any of those clauses at present, or upon any amendments which may be proposed, but will leave all suggestions in regard to them for future consideration. I move:

That the consideration of the clauses, 1 to 87 inclusive, be postponed.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Will the hon. and learned member invite a discussion on clause 88 or clause 89?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I will invite it discussion on the bunch of clauses commencing with clause 88. Let there be one discussion.

Motion agreed to.

Clause 88. Uniform duties of customs shall be imposed within two years after the establishment, of the commonwealth.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I understand there is some intention on the part of the several Colonial Treasurers to make a short statement to the committee as to the position assumed by the legislatures of their respective colonies with regard to these clauses. That would be a very convenient way of opening the discussion.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales):

As the Colonial Treasurer of the colony of New South Wales, I have to make a very short statement of the nature of the amendments suggested by the two houses of our legislature. It is understood that in making this statement we do not propose to indulge in any comment or argument; but simply to give the Convention, in the shortest possible form, the substance of the suggestions which have been made. In order to do that I must go back to clause 84, which vents exclusive power in the parliament of the commonwealth to impose custom duties and duties of excise, and to grant bounties after the passing of a uniform tariff. I have to state that the Legislative Council of this colony suggests the omission of that clause. With regard to clause 86, which provides that property used in connection with state services taken over by the commonwealth, should vest in the commonwealth subject to certain provisions as to valuation and payment, both houses of this legislature suggest its omission. I may make the remark, however, that I believe that was done simply in order that some other clause of a similar character and more fully considered, should be introduced. Clause 88 provides that uniform duties of customs should be imposed within two years after the establishment of the commonwealth. Both houses suggest the omission of that clause. With regard to clause 89, which provides for free-trade amongst the federated colonies after the imposition of a uniform tariff, the Legislative Assembly suggests an amendment preserving to each federated state the power of regulating the liquor and opium traffic in accordance with the laws of the states as to the sale of such articles. The Legislative Council suggests the omission of clause 90, which provides for the keeping of accounts of the revenue and expenditure of the commonwealth, and of what is due to the states. Both houses suggest the omission of clause 91, which places limits on federal expenditure during the first three years. Clause 92 provides for the first five years of a uniform tariff, a scheme for the distribution of the surplus, and stipulates that each state should, for those five years, keep back each year at least as much as during the year preceding the imposition of uniform duties. The Legislative Council suggests the omission of that clause; but the Legislative Assembly suggests the omission of certain words and the insertion of other words, leaving the parliament of

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria) [10.48]:

With regard to the colony of Victoria, no suggestions respecting financial matters have been made by the Legislative Council. The Legislative Assembly suggests, with regard to clause 84, that we should strike out the words, and to grant bounties upon the production or export of goods.

There are consequential amendments throughout that clause. They suggest that clause 92 should be omitted altogether. I understand the reason of that is that they do not agree with the scheme, but they have not suggested any other. Then they propose a new clause (A) after clause 93, to the effect that where any goods have been imported into a state before the imposition of the uniform duties are, during the first year of uniform duties, exported into any other state, we should authorise the collection on such exportation of the amount of the difference between the duty chargeable on such goods before the imposition of uniform duties in the state from which they are exported, and the duty chargeable on such goods before the imposition of uniform duties in the state into which they are imported, or the uniform duty, whichever shall be less. Those are the only amendments suggested by the Parliament of Victoria.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[10.50]:

The only amendment proposed by the South Australian Parliament in these clauses is to the effect that liberty should be given to regulate the opium and alcoholic imports of trade within the states. The recommendations are precisely similar to those made upon the same subject by the colony of New South Wales. All the other clauses of the Commonwealth Bill were passed as printed.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria):

I have been somewhat misled by an error in the printing of this document. On page 49 hon. members will see under the heading "Tasmania":

That the following resolution be sent to the Federal Convention as a suggestion:"That in the opinion of the Legislative Council of Victoria the finance and trade proposals of the Commonwealth Bill require further inquiry and consideration."

I did not notice that until my hon. friend, Mr. Fraser, pointed it out to me.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYS (Tasmania)[10.51]:

I regret that I was not in my place earlier in the morning. I understand that the intention is that the Treasurer of each colony or state shall briefly announce the amendments which that state has proposed in respect to the financial provisions of the Commonwealth Bill. If that be the case, my statement may be exceedingly brief. The purpose of the amendment suggested by the Tasmanian legislature with respect to finance is, first of all, to secure the taking over of the whole of the debts of the various states by the commonwealth. It starts on the assumption that the minimum of the debts of the whole of the colonies, or of each of the states separately, is £40 per head, and it is assumed that all amounts beyond the £40 per head shall be taken over in a separate form. For the whole of the debts the interest is to be paid by the federal executive or parliament; but for such sum as each state is indebted in excess of the £40 per head, each state shall give to the commonwealth debentures or bonds. To give an example, Tasmania at the present time is indebted £47 per head. It will, then, need to give to the federal executive bonds to the extent of £7 per head of its population, and such bonds will be redeemed, as I will proceed to state. The whole of the interest, as I have already said, is to be paid by the commonwealth or federal executive. But that portion of the interest which relates to the excess of the debt over £40 per head is to be borne separately by the state so indebted. Tasmania, therefore, in giving bonds for £7 per bond, will be responsible to the commonwealth for the interest on that £7 per head. But with respect to the excess of £40-I am following up the example of Tasmania only, and leaving the representatives to apply it to each of their own states separately-as the population increases, taking a census year by year, it is proposed that the amount of debt shall be cancelled. So that, ultimately, the commonwealth will have acquired the whole of the debts of the various states, and the various states will be relieved entirely. Now, it may be said, of course, that this may appear at first to be very much to the advantage of those who are most indebted. But I would like representatives to bear in mind that directly we have established the commonwealth it is presumed that we shall be working for the common weal, and that the revenue from customs will be divided per capita. If that revenue be revenue belonging to the states per capita, then, as the population of the various states increases, they will be contributing more and more year by year to the commonwealth, and so meet the extra expenditure incurred for interest upon their extra debt. I presume that that is all the statement that is required of me now. I understand that there will be other amendments with respect to these various proposals; but they will come hereafter, and I shall, therefore, reserve any elaboration of my remarks on this subject for the proper and more convenient season.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[10.57]:

The amendments made by the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of Western Australia in regard to these clauses now under notice-clauses 88 and 98-were not very numerous, although, I have no doubt, they will require a good deal more consideration than we were able to give them during the short time at our disposal. Both the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly suggested that clause 88 should be struck out, and that in clause 89 the words in the third line, "throughout the commonwealth" be struck out and the words, "between the states" be inserted. The reason for that was that it was thought that the words "throughout the commonwealth" were too wide, and might relate to many things to be done by the state itself-in regard to licenses, &c.-and that the words "between the states" seemed to be quite wide enough, and to carry out what the Convention desired. An addition was made to clause 89 with regard to opium and alcohol, similar to that proposed and carried by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales. That was added to the clause by the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia; it was not dealt with by the Legislative Council. Clause 90 was amended by adding the word "excise" after the word "customs," so that the clause should read

Until uniform duties of customs and excise have been imposed, and for five years afterwards.

Clause 91 was struck out by both Council and Assembly. In regard to clause 92, the same alterations were proposed by both the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly. Sub-clauses I to V were struck out, and it was suggested that the clause should be made to read:

During the first five years after uniform duties of customs have been imposed the amount to be paid to each state shall not be less than the amount returned to each state during the year last before the imposition of such duties.

In clause 93 the words numbers of their people as shown by the latest statistics of the commonwealth

were struck out, and the words amount of revenue contributed to the commonwealth

inserted. That amendment provides that the distribution among the several colonies month by month shall be proportionate to the amount of revenue contributed to the commonwealth. Clause 98 was amended so as to make it obligatory upon the federal parliament to take over a proportion of the public debt of the states as it existed at the time of the commonwealth to the extent of £60 per head of the adult males residing in each state. Of course, £60 was put down in order that the matter might be discussed; but the principle there laid down was one that met with the approval of the Legislative Assembly. With regard to this matter, there was no suggestion by the Legislative Council. The word "ratable" in the third line from the bottom of the page was struck out, and in the last line but one the words "adult males" were omitted. The principle of the clause, as we amended it, is that the federal parliament shall be compelled to take over the debts of the colonies in a fixed proportion per head of the adult males in each state. Those were all the important amendments suggested by the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I think that hon. members who wish to address themselves in a broad way to the question of finance will have an opportunity to do so now before the Finance Committee commences its practical sittings.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales):[11.4]

Although it was only this morning that I understood that we were to devote ourselves to the question of finance in the first part of our sittings, I recognise that as most of the Premiers of the colonies are also the Treasurers of those colonies, and as they have only just returned from England and have had a mass of duties to perform since, it is scarcely fair that we should call upon them at the earlier stage of this debate. I do not intend to make anything in the way of a second reading speech, because I am sure that the object which we now have in view is to be as practical as possible. Neither do I intend to address myself, with the short time I have had for preparation whilst sitting here, to any matters of mere verbal alteration. I shall confine my remarks to a few of the absolutely salient and vital questions which, if they could be settled upon some satisfactory foundation, all the others ultimately would find themselves in their proper places. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that all the difficulties which have arisen in regard to this question of finance have arisen out of the character of the different policies into which the various colonies have drifted, owing to their separation from one another. Of course, this applies more especially to the strong line of fiscal antagonism between New South Wales and all the rest of Australia. But beside that there is another very salient fact in the finance of New South Wales, which differentiates it from the other colonies; in other words, our land revenue. If hon. members will turn to that very valuable book of Mr. Coghlan's called the "Seven Colonies of Australia" they will find on page 383 a statement of the relative position of the different colonies as regards their land revenue. They will find that New South Wales receives from every source land revenue equal to £1 11s. 7d. per head; Victoria, 6s. 11d.; Queensland, £1 4s. 1d.; South Australia, 12s. 5d.; Western Australia, £1 10s. 5d.; Tasmania, 6s. 5d.; New Zealand, 8s. 5d.

Mr. GLYNN:
Have you the proportion received as rent separate from sales?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Yes.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Mr. MCMILLAN:
In New South Wales it is about half and half. Roughly speaking, our total land revenue is about £2,000,000, of which £1,160,000 comes from land sales, and the rest from pastoral rents, &c. The exact amount received from auction and other classes of sales during the years 1895-6 was £1,158,235, and from occupation, &c., of Crown land, £859,96l.
There are scarcely any auction sales now!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I take it that the main subdivision of land revenue is that which comes from alienation, either in the payment of instalments on conditional purchases or by auction sales, which last amount, as the right hon. gentleman says is very small now.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Mr. MCMILLAN:

No. Although this remains to some extent a diminishing quantity, it is one of the items. Two-thirds of our land is still unalienated, and for practical purposes there is no reason to suppose that because of the increased value of our lands, and increased occupation, we shall not, for years to come, have a large advantage in our land revenue over all the other colonies. The other colony which differentiates itself in many respects, because of its youth and the abnormal character of its transactions—I say nothing of those who govern it—is Western Australia. You will find its land revenue, its railway revenue, and some of its other sources of income, to a certain extent of an abnormal character. This brings us to the absolute root question of colonial finance. I honestly confess that I have tried to weigh this question in the scales. I have tried to concoct to the best of my ability scheme after scheme which might prevent us from having to face an unpleasant fact—the necessity of insuring under some scheme or other, at any rate for a limited period, some security for the different Treasurers when we come together, and give up our customs duties to the federal parliament. I feel, of course, that in dealing with this question, besides these differentiations between the colonies, we are also dealing with an absolutely unknown quantity in a uniform tariff. It is all well enough for people to talk and speculate upon that tariff but I say most decidedly that when we—those who will represent the colonies—come together in the federal parliament, when, instead of looking at this question from each particular local standpoint, we look upon it as a united Australia, then in the union of the conflicting classes of interests as arising out of one tariff instead of several, it is impossible to say what the character of that tariff will be. Now, without attempting to prophesy, but simply as a mode of throwing light on the subject, my own opinion is that when we come together we shall have to agree upon some broad revenue-producing tariff which will bring in a certain volume of revenue, and the great question whether these colonies are to live under a free-trade or protective system must, from the peculiar mode in which we differentiate, be left for some years to come. You might have a variety of tariffs, under different circumstances. You might have either a moderate protective tariff or all round ad valorem duties, some of which would be protective in their incidence, and some of which would not. I may, at once say, in order to make clear my view on the question, that I believe no sensible man will think for one moment that revenue for the first few years of the federal commonwealth will be raised in any way except through the customs. I know that is a great admission on my part, and on the part-if he agrees with it-of the right hon. gentleman at the head of the New South Wales Government.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
I certainly do not agree with it!

Mr. McMillan:

To a certain extent we are put in this position: We have to say to our people that the process of federation involves an alteration to some extent in our fiscal system. I want to be still more clear. I am dealing with this question now on the understanding that we come to some conclusion before this Convention rises, because, having come to the last stage of our operations, I consider that it is only fair to the Convention, that it is only fair to the people of this country, that having thrashed this thing out, we should come to what is the only reasonable conclusion, allowing them to decide for themselves in the full light of day whether or not union is acceptable under those conditions. There is no use in going -and I absolutely object to go-before my constituents as a member of this Convention to tell them that it is possible by some jugglery, by some means or other of which no one can conceive at present, seeing that there are four or five of the colonies whose fiscal systems are based on large customs duties, to unite as one out of these several colonies without having to alter to a certain extent our fiscal system.

Hon. Members:
Hear, hear!

Mr. McMillan:

I think it is far better in the earlier years of this federation, in the first clash of controversy, when this country may feel that it is overweighted by the opinions of the other colonies-it is far better for us to say to them now what they may expect, than for them to say to us afterwards, "You led us astray." I come then absolutely to what I consider the kernel of this arrangement. In the clauses that have been placed before us at the previous sittings of the Convention I see nothing that can be found fault with, speaking generally, up to the end of clause 92 without including the sub-sections. I am speaking now of the mode of getting at the surplus revenue - in regard to matters which we have thrashed out previously. When we give over this great machinery of revenue-the customs, and when the federal government take credit for the expenditure on the services which are relegated to them, I take it for granted that we all assume there must be a large surplus. The question then arises how that surplus is to be dealt with. I may say that it is my present opinion-although, of course, I am open to alter it, if anyone can show me an improved scheme-that for five years after the commonwealth has produced a uniform tariff a certain aggregate amount based upon twelve months of the old tariff should be guaranteed to them for that period.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

In what proportion?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

When this question was debated in the Finance Committee at first the word "aggregate" was left out. Now it was very clear that New South Wales, with a tariff producing about £1,400,000, through the absolute sweeping away of all protective and other duties, and with that tariff brought into competition with the tariff of Victoria, yielding nearly £2,000,000, if the surplus for five years were divided upon the actual facts of the case, would be unfairly treated, because hon. members will see this: that whatever the uniform tariff is, we have to come in with it. Supposing that when the uniform tariff came into operation, the revenue from New South Wales was £2,000,000, instead of under her present tariff, £1,400,000, if we had to take the surplus on the basis of £1,400,000, we should be robbed, practically, by the other colonies. I think that is very clear. Therefore, the word "aggregate" was introduced so that New South Wales should be brought in equitably with the new tariff, and while she did not ask more than her neighbours, she got her proper distribution on an equitable basis.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

What about Western Australia?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I am quite willing to confess that there has been no scheme yet in which it has been possible to reconcile the equities of the case with the peculiar position and conditions of Western Australia,

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

Except interstate accounts!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

That is what I wish to avoid.
An Hon. MEMBER:
It is the only safe and equitable plan!

Another Hon. MEMBER:
The provision of the 1891 bill was all right!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I come now to the question of dealing with the surplus in the future. I have said that I believe every hon. member in this Convention, no matter what his fiscal views may be, will agree with me that the uniform tariff is all absolutely unknown quantity, therefore we are in the first place trying to do work which is legislation in this Convention, and, in the second place, we are trying to legislate upon an unknown quantity. From my point of view, and of course I speak only for myself, I do not think-and I do not suppose that even the right hon. gentleman at the head of the New South Wales Government will doubt my free-trade principles.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Hear, hear!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Speaking for myself I say now-and I want to lose no time-that I have come absolutely to this conclusion, that this is the sacrifice of New South Wales; although I believe that even with that sacrifice, and with the hope of converting these peoples from fiscal folly to righteousness in the future, there will be probably a free-trade Australia in a shorter time than some persons imagine. But we have to do this, and I say most distinctly that if you trust this great federal parliament with a thousand and one things, if you trust it with the greatest power of taxation you can possibly conceive, if you trust it with all your rights and liberties, with all your international relations, and absolutely with your political existence, it is folly to attempt to say that you will not trust it to equitably agree upon financial matters. Now, you must recollect this, that by the modus operandi which we adopt in this bill, by declaring that a certain surplus shall be distributed during a short period-and it is only a short period-you establish a nexus be-between the provincial and central government. As you hear a great many people talk, and by their questions you might almost imagine that it was proposed that we should band over our affairs to a foreign kingdom; whereas we are handing over our affairs exactly to ourselves. Will anybody tell me that there will not be some kind of provincial check, because each of us will have to go back if we are in that parliament to our own provinces to be elected by them? There will be the same machinery, the same check, the same exercise of public opinion upon that central government as there is upon the governments represented here now. It is an absolute negation of the whole principle of federation and trust in each other for us to stop short of handing over that power to the federal government.

Mr. LYNE:

How would you redistribute the surplus?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I do not think there would be any difficulty about redistributing the surplus. But the question of per capita distribution, which we fix in this bill after a certain period, commits us to too much. It is attempting to prophesy what will be the condition of these colonies under the federation, and what will be the policy of the Federal Parliament. I should be quite willing to leave all that for the ultimate determination of the Federal Parliament, because there may be great changes. We do hope now, although we are meeting here in this Convention, each watching closely and jealously the interests of his own province, that when this parliament does meet, and has been in operation for five years, a great many of the geographical lines which we now consider to be so necessary will, in their practical effect, be swept out of existence, and that while we will be still a federation, we shall have all the strength and concentration of union. Now I come to another proposal which has been made for the covering up of this surplus. It has been said by prudent economists and politicians that it is an unwise thing to place in the hands of this Parliament any surplus whatever—that you will give them a means of extravagance which will land the provincial Treasurers in debt and difficulty. There, again, we have at once the assumption that the federal parliament is not to be trusted. I want to point out this—that, even if you get a batch of debts, or a railway revenue, and put it up against that surplus, you do not touch the difficulty at all. Even supposing you believe that the railways should be given over, under certain conditions, to the federal government, it does not touch the difficulty in any way whatever. There is one scheme which might meet it; but that is surrounded at the present time by enormous, and, to my mind, insuperable difficulties. If the advocates of that scheme will pardon me for saying so, these gentlemen are very anxious to give over our railways to federal control, not, perhaps, because it is the right principle, but because it gets rid of the financial difficulty from their point of view. But I want them to keep clearly before their minds that we have not merely to pass a constitution which may be suitable to our own views, but we have to pass a constitution which will be accepted by the people of the different colonies. If you intrude into that constitution any things which are not absolutely necessary, which will weight it with responsibility, and give rise to differences of opinion in the different colonies, and give a handle to anti-federationists, you may blow the whole scheme into atoms. Let us inquire for a moment, as a matter of enlightenment, what is the scheme of those gentlemen who want to federate the railways. The scheme is that you should give over your railways—I am speaking at any rate of one scheme—to the federal parliament, and give that parliament the exclusive management. But they do not propose to vest these railways absolutely, they do not propose to say to the federal government, "Take over all our liabilities and we will give you our assets." Nothing of the kind. They propose to keep up a system of bookkeeping by which the interest will be charged to the different colonies on the capital debt of the respective railways, by which all the losses will be charged to the different colonies. They thus give up the management of the railways but keep the responsibility. Who ever heard of such a principle? If you give up the management you must give away the responsibility. What do we mean by vesting the railways? Simply this: That whatever the arrangement it must be a complete and final transaction. These railways, the moment they are given over to the central administration, must cease to have anything to do with the different colonies. How could we do that? If the scheme is to capitalise the railways on the returns now exhibited, which may be in abnormal times, Victoria, as compared with New South Wales, would have to write off, probably, £8,000,000 of debt. Is Victoria pre

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I do not think that would be the result!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I am simply arguing it in that way. I am not going to speak of the normal results of years to come. I am simply stating what the problem would be for a convention like this if we tackle it at all. If I were in the place of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner—if he will pardon me for assuming that for a moment—I would say to New South Wales, "You were down to 2 1/2 per cent on your capital some years ago. By wise administration you have raised it now, and practically the railways are paying interest on the debt.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Last year they more than paid interest!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Your method of keeping accounts is different from ours. Ours now pay 3 per cent.!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I would be justified in going on to my "we hope to do the same thing under improved administration." Furthermore; the Premier of Victoria might be justified in saying, "While you get this railway system of ours into your hands, which we are already improving, and which, at the end of five years, will pay 3½ per cent, on the debt, are we going to write off that sum of money while you will have an absolute monopoly and a magnificent asset which we could probably sell in Europe for the full amount of the debt." Is that a question that could be dealt with in this Convention? I hold that it is a question for the future. I would not say for a moment that it would not be a wise thing for a, federal treasurer, when he got all the power in his hands, when this question is looked upon as a truly federal question, when all these petty jealousies are destroyed—I do not mean to say for a moment that it would not be a great stroke of policy and of statesmanship to say, "It does not matter what the capital account is, we will take over all the railways and take the liabilities with them." But we cannot do that here. Who is going to propose a scheme at the present time to take over these railways, and to take over all the capital debts exactly as they stand at the present moment? Furthermore, while from my own, which I take to be a business point of view, and from an administrative point of view, I should like to see all these discordant elements under one strong hand, still I doubt very much whether, at the present period of our history, we are ripe for such a union. The only two colonies nearly ripe for this operation are Victoria and New South Wales. Queensland, with the exception of her grand trunk line, has absolutely an isolated system. Western Australia has an isolated system, and so has Tasmania; and there is not a very great length of line even in South Australia. Therefore, I say, in the first place, that it is absolute folly, from my point of view, to risk the acceptance of this constitution by loading it with unnecessary things. I say, in the next place, to ask New South Wales, or any other colony, to give over practically the management and control of that great asset, and to take all the responsibility of the results, and keep all the liabilities, is an absolutely unbusinesslike proceeding. With regard to the debts—and I am only dealing with the salient facts—I hold in the same way that if they are to be dealt with at all they must be dealt with on broad federal lines, and it will only be when you have your federal parliament in operation for a certain period, at any rate when you have the central machinery, and when the federal treasurer in that Government is a great negotiator with all the other governments for some equitable arrangement that we will be able to do what will be substantially equitable. I feel that we may spend months and months in this Convention over these intricate questions, and get no nearer to a solution of them than in the beginning. Therefore, to sum up, I am of opinion that we ought simply to propose some plan for guaranteeing for the first five years—it will not be a long period in the life of this new nation—a certain amount which will prevent the dislocation of the provincial finances, and all this matter of debt, all this matter of railways we ought to leave absolutely and entirely in the hands of the federal parliament. I am not sure that it is a wise thing to make this clause, with regard to the debts, so sweeping as to give full power to the federal parliament to act without the consent of the states. I cannot at all make up my mind that it is a fair or righteous thing to put a drastic clause in the bill by which it will be compulsory whether the states like it or not to give over the debts.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN: Are you afraid of being robbed of your debts?

Mr. MCMILLAN: No; but there are certain conditions, certain principles, on which you should take them over. This bill provides simply that the Parliament may take them over. It says nothing about the consent of the states.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER: -

Mr. MCMILLAN: That may be; but you must recollect that this is, after all, purely a matter of local concern. The debt of any colony is not essentially a matter of vital concern to the federal parliament. What I want to do is to prevent anything which is essentially local from being absolutely mandatory in this constitution bill with regard to its being dealt with by the federal parliament. It practically amounts to this: that you have to arrange about your debts, if I take it rightly, if the scheme were proposed, although it seems to me that there is some omission there, because one colony may be able to bear a certain arrangement of a financial character which may press more heavily on another. These, I think, are the principal points that we have to deal with in this financial matter. There is only one thing I would like to say a word or two about, and that is the inter-state commission with regard to the railways. I want to point out to hon. members, especially to the representatives of New South Wales, what great difficulties and trouble may arise if, while we do not vest the railways absolutely, we allow a certain power in the federal parliament to deal with our rates as they think well.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN: Can we not discuss that question separately?

Mr. MCMILLAN: I think the interstate commission is a very important point. The inter-state commission comes under the observations I have been making with regard to, I will not say a foreign element, an outside element attempting to interfere in the administration where the responsibility exists elsewhere.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

It can only affect state finances, not federal finance!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

We have a system of railway management in which there are what are called differential rates, and, if this bill remains as it is, I take it that in almost every matter coming under that general clause as to the equality of trade that the inter-state commission can practically dictate the mode of regulating rates.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Did the hon. member agree with Mr. Barton? Because I know there is a reserve power in my hon. friend which is edifying and which I would like to get out of him. We all agree as to what are called absolutely preferential rates. We all agree that two sets of rates are preferential. We all agree that the rate now levied by Victoria on goods coming into that colony from New South Wales, in which she gives a preference to outsiders over her own people, is a preferential rate. We all agree that a rate which has been levied by our people, say, from Wagga Wagga to Albury, at a greater rate per mile than from Sydney to a similar distance up country, in order to prevent trade from going to the Victorian border, is a preferential rate. But when we open up the great class of differential rates, which were originally and which in certain localities now have never had any regard to the other colonies, but are simply based on the principle of giving a helping hand to the people in the far interior of a country which has no navigable rivers, and for whose benefit these railways were constructed; if, because trade happens to trend towards another border, the whole of these differential rates are to be dislocated, and our people are not merely diverted from our markets but are also handicapped in rates for the sake of this federal connection, then I say, if that is to be the province of the interstate commission, it opens out a very large and very important question for the people of New South Wales. I would make one or two other observations in which I feel I shall not be at one with, at any rate, the legal members of the convention. I know that, by the reading of a certain clause in the Constitution of the United States, the federal parliament has got this control over private lines and has instituted an inter-state commission, because the principle is that it absolutely interferes with equality of trade.
Whether I am right or whether I am wrong, I do not for one moment consider that the question of warfare and competition in railway rates has any analogy whatever with customs duties on the different borders.

SEVERAL Hon. MEMBERS: Oh!

Mr. McMILLAN:

They are analogous up to a point. But the people whom I am answering say if you leave your present system of railway rates you may as well not have intercolonial free-trade at all. I do not believe there is any such strict analogy, and although I am not a lawyer, and have not investigated the question, I doubt very much whether it is not a great straining of the American Constitution to have the procedure which at present exists.

Mr. GLYNN:

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Mr. McMILLAN:

My hon. friend says that a differential rate is no infraction of free-trade; but you come to a point when the question is whether a rate is differential or preferential, and that is exactly the point where we have got from our provincial standpoint at present, where we have to safeguard the people of New South Wales, who have spent such enormous sums in the construction of railways.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The inter-state commission will represent the states!

Another Hon. MEMBER:

Mr. McMILLAN:

That is not an analogous position to that which we are dealing with now. We take up this position as a matter of business: that if we give up our railways at all we want to get rid of the whole responsibility; but if these railways, at any rate from my point of view, are not absolutely vested so that we get rid of responsibility, and put them on a par with everything else that we give over absolutely—my hon. friend will see the difference between dealing with a thing that you retain in its connection with the provincial government and dealing with a thing that you give over for ever to the central government, because you must recollect that everything that you leave as a matter of friction between the border line of duties, between the line where the state government comes in and the central government comes in-you leave as the seeds of trouble in the future. Therefore, it is to my mind inequitable and unbusinesslike to attempt to work this great asset, and at the same time to give over to the federal government the power of intermeddling and dealing with the railways in such a way as if they practically belonged to the commonwealth.

Mr. GLYNN:
According to the latest reports, the very power that we are giving they are asking for in America.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Who are asking for it?

An Hon. MEMBER:
Writers in the American States!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
There is no analogy between the two positions. In America the railways are privately owned. There are a great many people who would destroy everything that belongs to private individuals. We are dealing now with our state assets, which stand practically in the same position with regard to this federal compact as our land or court-houses, and thousands of other things that we retain to ourselves; and it is no derogation of the principle of federation - it is not in any way distrusting the federal parliament-if on this question we retain the control of our railways. There is no improper conflicting interest affected between the provinces and the central government that may lead to trouble in the future.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Are you willing to stop differential rates where they become preferential?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The hon. member is asking me a question upon which, if I wanted to decide, I would retain his special counsel to answer it. That is just the thing which it is impossible to decide. I have with some temerity opened this debate. I have tried to go straight to my views, whatever they may be worth, in order to make the discussion as practical as possible. I think that upon those matters on which I have dwelt we have the kernel of the whole difficulty, and as far as I am concerned, I see the only simple solution of it, and if that solution is now arrived at I am willing to trust the future federation of Australia to do justice to all the provinces.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria)[11.45]:
If the hon. member who has just resumed his seat spoke with diffidence on this question, practised a financier as he is in his own calling, and an ex-Treasurer for many years of this great colony, with how much more diffidence must I address myself to it, claiming no such experience either inside or outside of Parliament! It is only because I feel that when this discussion, as it possibly may, passes into the hands of the financial experts present, it may become too intricate that I am impelled to offer a few simple observations thus early. The hon. member, Mr. McMillan, has dealt with questions which though they affect the financial issue—and, indeed, what proposals in the bill do not affect the financial issue?—appear to me to unnecessarily enlarge the scope of the financial problem now submitted to us.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

If the hon. member could have subdivided his remarks, we should have been more readily able to follow one question at a time through a prolonged discussion to its conclusion than when we have the three or four great subjects which he has broached, and which if dealt with by each speaker cannot lead us to the same clear results. For instance, an inter-state commission may have undoubtedly an influence on federal finance, and it must have an influence upon provincial finances; but the question of its utility has no relation to our present problem. I should hope that the difficulty relating to the establishment of such a body, or the neglect to establish it might be postponed. At all events, I will pass on with a single sentence or two of reference. The hon. member draws a distinction, or desires to draw a distinction, between differential and preferential rates, but I hold that such a distinction is one which depends wholly upon anti-federal conditions. It is a distinction which has no meaning apart from state boundaries. If the railways are dealt with on federal principles, why should not the rates for the same distance from any one point to another be in a general way the same over all Australia?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Will the hon. member allow me to explain? My argument in that direction was based on the proposal to take over the control of the railways, but not to take them over absolutely. Once the railways are vested the differential rates would disappear.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I quite understand that. The point is that the hon. member discusses the inter-state commission from a state standpoint. He says there are clauses in the bill under which, irrespective of an inter-state commission, preferential rates will disappear. There will no longer be power for either Victoria or New South Wales to offer any advantage to goods coming over their railways because they are brought from other colonies and from long distances. If the hon. member looks at it a moment he will see that there need be no difference between differential rates and preferential rates, except that state boundaries intervene in the one case and not in the other. The hon. member says it means giving outsiders an advantage over the people in your own colony. But that argument might apply to cases in which an advantage is given to people in your own colony who send goods long distances over those who send them short distances. A preferential rate might be deemed a federal rate, because it is giving people outside the colony advantages that you give to people going long distances in your own colony. I do not put that forward as a full statement of the case. To me it is distinctly a better statement of the case, and a fuller statement than that urged by those who draw such a broad distinction between preferential and differential rates on professedly federal lines. We charge one rate for the first 100 miles, a lower for the second 100 miles, and a lower still for the third 100 miles, and so on. It is just as true to say that we give to a person living 300 miles off advantages over a person living 100 miles away as to say we give a person living 500 or 600 miles away in another colony still greater advantages than those who live at a lesser distance. The principle is exactly the same. The longer the distance the lower the charge. What I wish to point out is that, providing the same rate of reduction in charges is observed, there is nothing necessarily anti-federal in the existence of preferential rates. Therefore, I pass this part of the question by with the simple statement that when we come to consider the establishment of an inter-state commission I, for one, will not fall in with the contention that necessarily preferential rates are anti-federal. They may be or they may not be. It all depends upon whether they are adjusted in accordance with the scale of differential rates that you adopt in your own colony. If they are, they appear absolutely unobjectionable; but if they go beyond that they may be objectionable. Neither do I propose to detain the Committee by a discussion as to the taking over of the railways as a whole. I have already made a confession of faith on that subject, which is, that it appears to me essential to the full and perfect federal government of these colonies, that such important agencies as the railways should be taken over by the federal authorities. We are in this country, unfortunately, not possessed of the advantages of the United States of America, traversed as that country is by magnificent streams which afford natural highways for its people. Our railways in the future will have to serve, in a sense, for streams as well as for railways. They will be practically our only great means of intercommunication, and it appears to me, for reasons which I urged at the prior meeting of the Convention, that under these circumstances federation will not be complete, will not be able to conserve those common interests of the whole of the people of Australasia—for which purpose I understand a federal government is to be created—it will not be able to conserve them or develop them, as it must and should do, without the control of the railways. That, however, I also regard as not necessarily bound up with the financial question. I am quite with the hon. member in declining to indorse the contention that, because we find ourselves under certain embarrassments as regards a financial settlement, we should throw in the railways as a make-weight on one side or the other. If it be proposed that the railways should be federalised, it must be a proposal on its own merits, and because it would be in the common interests of the whole of the people of Australia, and not simply to help us out of the financial difficulty. For that reason I propose to put such a suggestion aside. The one matter to which I desire to direct attention is the principal financial problem by which we are faced. I am perfectly aware that on this subject destructive criticism is easy, and the fact that it is easy is evidenced by the number of legislative bodies throughout Australia who have contented themselves by striking out the financial provisions, without substituting any clauses of their own. This problem appears to me to resolve itself into the discussion of two principal points. The first, alluded to by Mr. McMillan, was how to provide for the transfer to the federal government of the customs revenues of all the colonies within the federation without utterly dislocating their systems of financial administration and taxation. That is the first problem. The second problem, and one which seems to me to occupy quite a different ground, and to be, to a certain extent, a problem of our own creation, is on what plan or principle should any surplus retained by the federal government after discharging its own expenditure, paying the cost of the departments it has taken over, and the cost of any other undertakings which it might see fit to carry out-on what principle should it distribute the surplus supposed to necessarily result to it from the imposition of the federal tariff? Now I say, in the first instance, that there is no necessity for a surplus ever existing—or a surplus of any magnitude—by the action of the federal parliament; and certainly it cannot exist unless the federal parliament so desires. Whether the federal government of the future adopts a protectionist or a free-trade policy, it is perfectly within its competence to so adjust its tariff as merely to provide sufficient revenue for its own current expenses, or the federal parliament may if it pleases spend all that it receives. It is not essential, therefore, that under any tariff which the federal government may adopt there should be a surplus of overwhelming magnitude.

Mr. GLYNN:

What about the current purposes of the states?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Mr. GLYNN:

We shall be taking away revenue from the states at the same time!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I pointed out that there were only two aspects of the financial problem which we are immediately and at this stage obliged to face. The first of these I said related to its effect upon the states, and the second was as to the distribution of the surplus. I am now speaking of the distribution of the surplus, and I say that so far as the federal government is concerned, looking at the question wholly from a federal aspect, there is no certainty of any notable surplus.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

That would be inconceivable in our present conditions. It would be absurd!

Mr. LYNE:

Absolutely!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Not inconceivable, because the hon. member is putting such a case!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

It is neither inconceivable, nor, with all deference, is it absurd, as I will presently endeavour to show. But perhaps it would clear the way if I dealt first with the immediate problem of the effect of the transfer of the several provincial customs revenues to the federal government, and asked hon. members to consider what evidently their minds, judging from their interjections, are much exercised about-to consider how that is to lie done without undue dislocation of the local revenues. This question, of course, list been approached from a great variety of standpoints. I would concede with Mr. McMillan, that the very first condition in considering the financial proposals is that the state treasuries should not be subject to a revolution-that there should be an undertaking and a guarantee upon which state treasurers should be able to proceed. I would go further than the hon. member did, and probably further than the hon. member would be prepared to go. In my opinion, that guarantee on behalf of the states ought to cover the whole of the revenue of which they would be deprived by the introduction of the federal system of government. Federal government might be, and in my opinion ought to be, introduced with a guarantee to each colony of the return to it of the sums it at present receives from the sources which the federal government takes over, of course deducting the cost of the departments which the provincial governments at present pay in order to obtain the revenue; and I would make that guarantee obtain, not for five or twenty years, but for all time.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Suppose some of the services taken over show a loss?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The customs revenues will increase!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I will reply first to the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, and say that in assessing this fixed payment I would not limit the data to any particular year. It would, probably, be beat to take the net result of the last five or ten years. If there had been a loss over the whole of the five years, or on the average, then the colony would not be entitled to receive anything, because of parting with that service. Allowance, of course, could be made for exceptional circumstances in any colony, so long as the sum is fixed. I make this suggestion in view of a further proposal hereafter; but at this stage hon. members will see that, if it be competent and possible, as surely it is-we are competent to do it, and it is possible-this would at once relieve the state treasurers of all anxiety for the next few years, because they might safely reckon that, having an ascertained and certain sum placed to their credit by the federal government, there would be no dislocation of the local finances.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

They would make a profit out of federation!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

They could scarcely make a profit, because the states would only receive their average profit during the last five or ten years; as they have received that profit in the past, in my opinion, they are entitled to receive it in the future.

Mr. GLYNN:

Western Australia might object to that arrangement!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

So far as Western Australia is concerned, I believe some special arrangement will in the end have to be made in regard to that particular colony to do justice to its great growth, and, at the same time, to avoid doing injustice to the other colonies. But, putting aside Western Australia, I see no difficulty in giving effect to the plan. Then, in answer to the Premier of Victoria, who says that the customs revenue in the future will yield increase, I say, undoubtedly it will. The natural growth of population, the increased prosperity which we all anticipate in the different colonies after their union, the more rapid development of their natural resources, the greater expansion of intercolonial trade—all these will in the end react upon the external customs and internal excise so as to produce a greater and greater revenue. Then, I come to the next point which I wish to submit to the Convention, and it is, that, in regard to that growth, we should follow the suggestion of Mr. McMillan, and trust absolutely to the federal parliament to distribute or expend it. It appears to me that this is not an evasion of any duty we are called upon to fulfil, because, in the first instance, the admitted failure, or, if not failure, the admitted fallibility of every scheme which has yet been proposed for returning surpluses to the different states is of itself an argument that all the best financial intelligence does not find the problem soluble. Indeed, almost the whole of the proposals of the financial experts—right down to, that admirable paper from the Assistant Government Statistician of New South Wales which has been placed in our hands—the whole of them, from Sir Samuel Griffith's first criticism of the proposals of 1891 down to the proposal which was placed by the Convention in the Adelaide draft bill, and even Mr. Nash's—very effective articles are vitiated by a fundamental and transparent fallacy.
That fundamental and transparent fallacy has been the acceptance of a forecast as to, the earnings of a uniform tariff, based upon the imports of goods into different colonies under different tariffs, and upon the wild, utterly indefensible assumption that, no matter what tariff may be imposed in the future as the uniform tariff of federated Australia, exactly the same quantities of goods would continue to be brought into those colonies. I need not develop this argument—it was indicated at Adelaide; I called attention to it at the time, and it has been very elaborately discussed here by Mr. Pulsford in the Upper House, by Mr. Ashton in the Lower House, and by several other members whose speeches I have had the privilege of reading in the New South Wales Debates, and in those of other colonies.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Does the hon. member say that under a uniform tariff the contributions per head would be pretty nearly the same in all the colonies?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I will come to that in a moment. I say so, with one or two reservations, which I think will be admitted by all persons.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Add ad valorem duties to our tariff, would Victoria get quite as much per head?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I will not contradict the right hon. gentleman on that

[P.51] starts here
subject, if he is granting that by our tariff we have raised up local industries of such magnitude that their production would necessarily decrease our customs returns from import duties on those articles. If he admits that, I am with him. To that extent, I admit that New South Wales, not possessing the industries which we possess, would import more goods.

Mr. McMillan: Most of us took these figures as approximate!

The Hon. A. Deakin: But I think they are not even approximate. We, in Victoria, have, perhaps, had more experience of tariff changes than most of the colonies, and nothing can be more absurd than to endeavour to convince us that they have not been followed in each instance—where the change really was a change—by a great difference in the importation of goods. As we have lowered certain duties, goods from abroad have flowed in. As we have raised them, they have ceased to come in. We have seen every alteration of the tariff followed by an alteration in regard to the import of the goods affected by it, and I assume the experience of the other colonies is the same.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid: That is so, only your cripples would get stronger if they lived on us a bit!

The Hon. A. Deakin: Certainly, if we have any cripples we shall only be too glad that they should get stronger; but it is not of cripples that the right hon. gentleman is afraid; it is the strong whose competition he fears.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid: And yet we have local all our borders free for two years!

The Hon. A. Deakin: New South Wales has been most generous, and I trust will always remain so. On that score the right hon. gentleman and myself will not dispute. I have been led away from the statement that this was a transparent fallacy, and that so far we have no ground which would enable us to predict what an unknown tariff will produce. We can only—as the Premier of New South Wales, with his customary quickness, at once saw—approach the problem from another side and that is in regard to the question of consumption. Then again, in that respect, consumption does not mean all consumption. It means the consumption of goods which either pay excise or customs. The paper of the Assistant Statistician of New South Wales, admirable as it is, fails to draw that distinction, since it speaks of the consumption and the spending power of the different colonies, ignoring the fact that some of the colonies, having deliberately and expressly adopted a protective tariff in order to develop their industries, and therefore to produce and consume their own goods, do not necessarily consume less because they import less, or pay less excise. The question of consumption, so far as we can test it by customs and excise, only relates to goods that pay excise within the colony, and goods imported from abroad. Limiting it to that, and again taking Western Australia as, not a shocking, but an admirable, example, we find in that colony a population of 70 per cent of males. It is the habit of the male species to consume more narcotics and stimulants than the female. I am informed that between one-third and one-half of the customs revenue of these colonies is raised from narcotics and stimulants. We can understand, therefore, that the overflowing treasury of Western Australia is very largely due to the simple fact of the abnormal number of males in that colony, not to speak of the abnormal quantity of stimulants and narcotics consumed by them.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Federation will cure that! The Hon. A. DEAKIN: Time will cure it. The new woman is not to be excluded from Western Australia any more than from any other colony. There is no doubt that the sex inequality which at present exists will, in course of time, be removed by purely natural causes. I understand that the Premier of Western Australia signalled, amongst many other achievements, his visit to the mother country by importing a certain number of females in order to make up for the deficiency which at present exists. Putting aside Western Australia, as separated by its present circumstances, and having some familiarity as a visitor with the rest of the colonies, it appears to me to be hard to lay the finger upon any particular cause in any particular colony which would make any great difference in the consumption of dutiable goods in that colony. I assume that the proportion of total abstainers and non-smokers is about the same in one colony as in another. Putting that aside, regarding the circumstances of the life of the people, the manner in which they live, and the appearance of their cities and country districts, I for one can discover nothing which should make any marked difference in the consumption per head. It seems to me that the only variations which really exist in the consumption per head throughout Australia arise from the fact that these are rapidly growing and expanding colonies, that all their conditions are changing, and as all their conditions are changing with great rapidity from year to year, necessarily there are some variations in consumption. But all these differences are temporary; they are all local; they all tend to disappear; and the probability is that at no distant date they will disappear altogether. Putting aside Western Australia, it appears to me that the consumption of dutiable goods would be about the same all over Australia.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

From the first?

The Hon. A. Deakin:

Not quite from the first; it takes time. The settlement and the development of great territories takes time, and during that time there will be, as I say, variations.

The Hon. E. Barton:

Will it take longer than five years?

The Hon. A. Deakin:

It may; but I should doubt whether it would take a decade.

Mr. Glynn:

There is a great deal of difference between the proceeds from the liquor traffic in the different colonies!

The Hon. A. Deakin:

There is, because in one colony people may largely drink whiskey and in another locally grown wine.

Mr. Solomon:

It may be a question of climate. The hon. member wants a little experience of Western Australian weather to know what thirst means!

The Hon. A. Deakin:

If hon. members have followed me thus far, I will now revert to the position to which that brings me. Why should we be so afflicted by the fear of trusting the federal parliament with any possible surplus we may gain—why should we be so afflicted when we consider the possible disposal of the surplus by the federal parliament any more than we should be afflicted by the possible disposal of that surplus when paid over to the several provincial parliaments? What reason have we to fear any greater extravagance on the part of the federal parliament than on the part of the provincial parliaments if the surplus were paid to them? It would come to them in the same fashion as it would come to the federal parliament, and save and except that it might be supposed that the federal parliament would be encouraged to extravagance, because it could abnormally increase the departments that had been banded over to it, and study their interests regardless of expense, so as to band back as little as possible to the provincial parliaments—if that be put aside, we have no more need to fear the disposal of the surplus by the federal parliament than by the provincial parliaments.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:

In the federal parliament there would be a surplus: not in the provincial parliaments?
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

With all deference to the right hon. gentleman, I say that would be a surplus in both. The treasurer of a state would not be justified in previously disposing of the share of the surplus that was to come to him from the federal parliament. He would not know exactly-perhaps not within a considerable margin -what it was going to be. It would therefore come to him as a surplus, and he would have the same opportunities for spending it extravagantly as the federal treasurer would.

Mr. LYNE:

How would the hon. member arrive at the fixed sum to be returned to each colony?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Broadly by taking the last five or ten years' net profits which that particular colony has gained by the services in question.

Mr. LYNE:

Out of the customs and excise?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Customs

Mr. LYNE:

And would you take into account the direct taxes, too? For if you do not take into account direct taxation, New South Wales will be placed in an unfair position, if you take into account the customs duties in New South Wales the last two years.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Not so unfair as the hon. members seems to suppose, because the present tariff in New South Wales is not Imposed as a tariff to lose revenue, but to gain revenue. You do not measure the gain from your customs duties by their height. Raise them above a certain height, and the returns will begin to diminish. The duties of the present New South Wales tariff are, I understand, adjusted to bring in the largest possible amount of revenue from those sources.

Mr. LYNE:

They have fallen from £2,000,000 to £1,000,000!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

We get £1,500,000 from seven or eight articles, instead of £2,000,000 from a large number of articles!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I shall leave the Premier of New South Wales to reply to that.

Mr. LYNE:
He cannot reply to it!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

If, as I understand would be the case, a period of ten years were taken, that would include the customs returns of New South Wales during a period when some degree of protection, at all events, was in operation; so that would be provided for.

Mr. LYNE:

Take it for the years 1893 1894, and 1895; that would be quite different!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Those are the worst years for Victoria, but they would necessarily be included in a quinquennial period, and still more in a decennial period. My ideas are probably crude; but I have tried in a simple way to go to the root of the matter as it presents itself to me. The difficulties with which we are surrounded in regard to the surplus can be best settled by trusting the federal parliament to dispose of the surplus. It may be a great deal longer than hon. members anticipate before the federal parliament will have a surplus. The federal parliament, for instance, may take over the customs and excise department, and by the necessities of the case may require to raise a certain amount of revenue; but it may not necessarily require to raise more than that amount, and if it discovered that the tariff which it had adopted was bringing in more revenue than was absolutely necessary, it would always be possible to adjust it, just as it would if it found that particular items were bringing in less revenue than was needed. It is not to be supposed that the federal parliament would be capable of passing a tariff as it were in the dark, and on mere anticipation, and that, on finding that it was pouring into its treasury much more than it needed, and was imposing greater burdens on the people than were necessary, it would continue it simply because it had been passed. The federal parliament would be capable of adjusting the tariff as required, and of determining how much revenue it should receive every year, and how it should be disposed of.

Mr. HIGGINS:

How long is the guarantee to last?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

The fixed amount is to be paid to the states for all time, and no other amount is to be paid to them except the federal parliament direct; but it may so direct. If in the future the members of the federal parliament are of the same opinion as many hon. members here appear to be, or have been—that, if there were a surplus, it should be returned to the states—there will be nothing to prevent its carrying out the design to arrange for further annual payments to the states as states.
The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Is not that absolutely necessary in the present condition of things?
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

We might arrange, for the payment of a fixed amount to the states for the first five or ten years. After that, the federal parliament would consider the situation each year, and would look at the circumstances of the time, and if it thought that it was desirable to make a return to the states as states, it could do so. But the people of Australia will be the constituents of the federal parliament -the states as, states will not be the constituents of the federal parliament, except in so far as they are defined in the second chamber; the people of Australia will be the constituents of the federal parliament, and if the federal parliament can see its way to benefit the people of Australia in the expenditure of that money, no matter in what direction, the federal parliament will be competent to undertake that expenditure. It can spend that money directly, instead of voting it to the states for them to spend it as states. The future members of the federal parliament will be perfectly free, either to spend any surplus for the benefit of the people of Australia, or to hand it over to the states, and say to them, "Spend it in this proportion as you may think best for your people."
The Hon. E. BARTON:

If they may spend it for the benefit of the people, you must give them objects on which they may spend it!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

That will follow, but I will not discuss it now. I believe that the federal parliament will take over the whole of the railways with the responsibility of opening up new territory by means of railway communication, and if so the federal parliament is not likely to have an enormous surplus to trouble them. If I have made hon. members understand the one or two points that I have tried to put simply before them, I have succeeded in my endeavour. I would only remind hon. members that at the formation of the United States of America exactly what I am now suggesting was done. The United States took over the debts of the old confederation.
The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

The figures were nothing like ours!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Nothing whatever like ours. But, the United States took over the debts, such as they were, of the old confederation-they took over the war debt-and in return the federal government took absolutely the whole of the customs and excise. Of course it may be urged, and it is true that in later years great extravagance has been shown in the expenditure of the surplus derived from customs and excise in the United States; but I do not think that you defend yourself from extravagance by simply giving money to the state parliaments to be extravagant with, instead of leaving it with the federal parliament. I think that one is as likely to be extravagant as the other.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

State control is more direct and effective than federal control!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I do not think that it would be in this instance. Because, in this matter of expenditure, in so far as it is federal expenditure, there will be no states as states. There will be no state feeling in connection with it. If there is an expenditure at Dubbo, Dubbo will rejoice, and the rest of New South Wales will care little about the matter. If there is an expenditure at Goulburn, Goulburn will be satisfied, and the rest of New South Wales will have nothing to say. It will be a question, not of state interest against state interest, but of conflicting local interests. Each locality will look after its own interests, and the states as states will neither be injured nor benefited. The electors of Australia will decide. Certain localities, which it will appear to the federal parliament desirable to make the subjects of expenditure, will be benefited. In my opinion, one great advantage of this proposal is that it would tend to lessen the bargaining, the dealing, the chaffering on federal matters, between the states.

The Right Hon. Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Would that be so? What about Canada?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Canada has adopted the very plan i am objecting to, making payments from the federal government per capita to the states as states. That circumstance has caused continual dissension in Canada, and at the present time is causing demands for a revision of the terms, and for more liberal payments from the federal government to the states. The payments, take this form in Canada, because there is apparently no other means-or if there be another means it has not been adopted-by which the federal government could meet the needs of the people of the states without dealing with them through the states-could meet them directly as I am now suggesting. It appears to me that if the United States plan is adopted the federal government of the future is more likely to act for and deal with the peoples of the states as people of the commonwealth than with the states as states. Anything which tends to reduce the friction between the states and their governments, and the federal government and its executive, appears to me to make for progress and peace. Any system that tends to leave the federal expenditure just as it now is in all our colonies a question between the constituents and their representative is to be preferred. The majority of the representatives have not in any colony, taking administration over a term of years, been known to do injustice to any part of their, domain. Why then should we suppose that a federal assembly will be found any more blind to the wants of its constituents, in whatever part of the continent they may reside? What reason have we to suppose that the least populated parts of the continent will not receive the same amount of consideration as the most populated parts? In Victoria more money has been expended upon the least populous parts of the colony, where the representatives are fewest, than in the most populous and influential districts; and I believe that that is probably true of the other colonies, and would be true of the federal parliament. That parliament would be composed of members as patriotic as those of any of the provincial assemblies. It would represent the taxpayers of all Australia, and its members would not look at the artificial dividing lines which it is the purpose of this Convention to abolish.

Mr. LYNE:
If the hon. and learned member's argument means anything, it means the destruction of the states and the establishment of unification!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Not in the least degree. You will have the states as states, with all the powers secured to them in this measure, and with every other power which is not expressly given to the central government. What I am proposing does not in the slightest degree affect the clauses of the measure defining the federal powers to which the hon. member has already agreed; but it would allow the federal parliament to say whether it would deal with its surplus revenue directly, or hand it over to the states.

Mr. LYNE:
That would destroy the states!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Not at all. It would allow the federal parliament to decide whether it would spend its surplus through the states or give it directly to the people instead of confining its expenditure to the states. The people themselves would decide.

Mr. LYNE:
That would mean the destruction of the states!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
If the hon. member thinks that the states in the future are to be dependent upon the proportion of the surplus they will receive from the central government, all I can say is that his proposal would place the several states in a position of dependance upon the central government, which would make them so much more subordinate and less powerful.

Mr. LYNE:
Not if you fixed the sum to be returned. Will the hon. member tell me how the states are to get revenue at all if we take away the power of levying customs duties, and do not return to them a certain sum of money each month?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
But we do. We return the fixed sum of which I have spoken. I say that they should get that fixed amount for all time. They are to get that sum, and they know that they are to get it. They get it, as the hon. member might say, out of customs and excise. They get as much more too as the people may choose to give themselves through their channel instead of through the federal channel. I do not propose to deal with the question of taking over the debts of the colonies, because, although that is a financial question, it is a different financial question from that which I am now considering. But in my opinion the fixed sum to be given to the states year by year could take no more acceptable, or definite, or desirable shape than by the assumption of such a part of each of the state debts as the interest upon which would be equivalent to the payment to be made to the states. I add that to the proposal I have just been urging. We should make the spheres of state and federal finance as distinct as they can be made. That has been done in America, and Mr. Bryce has called especial notice to the fact that in those spheres most separated in America, where there has been no overlapping of state functions and federal functions, there has been the least friction and the least disadvantage. By the means I suggest you cut the connection between state and federal finance, subject always to the power of the federal parliament at any time, on being moved by its constituents, to make any grants to the state parliaments, and, if they are of the opinion of the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, to follow the course which he desires. But it is of advantage to separate as far as possible the spheres of state and federal finance, to make a fixed arrangement for the taking over of the customs and excise duties by the federal parliament, and then to trust the federal parliament. As the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, has said, you trust the federal parliament in a hundred and one cases. They are to be trusted in the future to decide upon what measures they think best for the commonwealth and the people; and why should this matter be taken from their control, instead of its being left to be dealt with after fuller research and wider knowledge than can be obtained in this Convention but which is sure to be enjoyed in the federal parliament!

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales)[12.29]:

I am one of those who consider that the accomplishment of federation is much more important than rigid adherence to a fiscal policy, and that it is much more easy to draft a theoretical constitution upon paper than, to manufacture one which will be equitable and acceptable to the whole of the colonies. In my opinion the main principle in a satisfactory financial scheme would be that each state should get back directly or indirectly what it contributes, less a per capita proportion of the federal expenses. I am glad to see that our Western Australian friends, judging by what I have read in the newspapers, take up a somewhat similar stand. I am aware that, amongst others, the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, objects to what he calls the book-keeping system. I do not object to it if it means doing that which is equitable and right. I admit, however, that it is desirable that it should only last for a certain time—probably for only five years—after the uniform tariff comes into vogue. At the end of that period we should have, I trust, sufficient information as to the average annual contribution from each colony to enable us to what I call capitalise the discrepancies; but if preferred it might be arranged that the respective colonies should get so much less or so much more per annum than their share of the revenue upon a mere per capita basis. In fact, our so-called prudent federationists are not far wrong in saying that the principle upon which federation should be accomplished is that each colony should pay only a per capita proportion of the expense. I do not however expect to get much assistance from them, as they look upon me as a federationist at any price. As to the difficulties to be overcome, it was proposed in the first session of the Convention that the aggregate amount to be returned to the states should be equal to the aggregate amount from customs for the year prior to the uniformity of tariff. I dissent from that idea. Intercolonial duties give us something like £1,000,000 a year, and it seems to me that if the consumers have not to pay those duties they will have the equivalent in their pockets, and it is therefore not unreasonable to suppose that each colony should make up in the best way it can its loss upon the duties. We, in New South Wales, do not want anything beyond the federal tariff, because that will give us more income than we receive from the old tariff.

The Hon. A.J. PEACOCK:

How are we going to get it?

Mr. WALKER:

If you receive less your per capita proportion will be less.

The Hon. A.J. PEACOCK:

If the amount is not obtained from customs, how would the hon. member raise it?

Mr. WALKER:

I think we shall have to raise it by direct taxation. But upon this point I will quote the words of a member of the Victorian House of Assembly. I have not the pleasure of knowing the hon. member; but I have been struck with his common-sense views upon some subjects. The hon. member to whom I refer is Mr. Fink.

The Hon. A.J. PEACOCK:

He supports the Government. He's all right!

Mr. WALKER:

He says:

The task of readjusting tariff rates on fair lines would not be difficult. It must not be forgotten that the £1,000,000 of intercolonial duties would not really be lost. They would remain with the people, and would practically operate as an industrial and commercial incentive to the continent. Now, before I sit down I want to make one or two observations on the industrial effects of intercolonial free-trade, because after all, what we have heard upon it lately has been mere abstract or general statement. But I really think that if the matter is studied we shall see that intercolonial free-trade, judging the future by the past, and judging this country by others similarly situated, will not be the realisation of a mere sentimental idea, but the greatest boon that any legislature could confer upon a community.

Mr. Styles, who is also a man of generous federal instincts-

The Hon. A.J. PEACOCK:

Another Government supporter!

Mr. WALKER:

He says:

If we are to have a commonwealth parliament we must trust it. The man who has not full confidence in the commonwealth parliament should vote against this bill, and against every other step in the direction of federation. But the commonwealth parliament, I apprehend, will be composed probably of a good many members of this Chamber and of other well-known public men throughout Australia. We are not aware that they do anything wrong now; and I do not see why, because they become members of the commonwealth parliament, they should be expected to do anything wrong then. Instead of saying to that parliament, "You shall do this, and you shall do that," I would lay down general lines with reference to these, and other matters. How do we know what will happen in the course of three or four years after the uniform duties come in?
With regard to the book-keeping principle, we provide for book-keeping during the first two years; and I think a similar system might be carried on for the five years. I do not know how we can prophesy what the incidence of the tariff will be when we do not know what the tariff is to be. We can only judge from the present tariffs what the incidence possibly may be. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, said the experience of Victoria was that the higher the customs duties the smaller the consumption of goods.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:
Not the smaller the consumption of goods, but the smaller the imports!

Mr. Walker:
As regards the draft bill, it seems to me to be a radical mistake to arrange for intercolonial free-trade during the first year of the uniform duties. That year will, in the case of New South Wales, at all events, be a bad year upon which to commence our average, because in the last year of the present tariffs naturally merchants and others will send in, through free-trade New South Wales, all the goods they can in order to escape the higher duties of the ensuing year.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:
New South Wales, can prevent that easily!

Mr. Walker:
I say, that we ought to take the second, not the first year as the basis of calculation in making our average. I dissent absolutely from the idea of a sliding scale. It is inequitable, and it is generally acknowledged that it is so, so that I need not enlarge upon that branch of the question. I have already said that I look to the accomplishment of federation as being of more importance than adhesion to fiscal policy. We, free-traders, however, are willing to recognise that certain concessions must be made, that certain give-and-take principles must actuate us in this matter. Although I am a free-trader, I am not so ardent a free-trader as those who advocate no customs duties at all. My impression is that we must recognise that our policy for many years to come will be one of revenue tariff, including, possibly, duties with a slight tendency to protection. I should like, however, to see that question met by a system of bounties which would come to an end within a certain time.

The Hon. E. Barton:
The hon. member likes spending money instead of getting it!

Mr. Walker:
Mr. Nash has suggested that each state should retain the duties upon stimulants and narcotics, and that the other duties could be divided upon a per capita basis. I do not think we have sufficient statistics to enable us to say whether that would or would not be a good arrangement. Sir Samuel Griffith suggested that the whole question should be left to the federal parliament. I look upon that as a pis aller. If we cannot do better we shall have to adopt that course. On that subject I will quote from what will be recognised as an authority on such a subject—the Australasian Insurance and Banking Record.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Who wrote it?

Mr. WALKER:
I did not. That journal says:

Another suggested mode of getting over the difficulty is to remit the whole question of federal finance to the parliament of the commonwealth, giving it a free hand. A more unbusiness-like proposal can hardly be conceived. It is equivalent to asking several men to sign a deed of partnership in blank and to settle the terms of partnership afterwards, and the terms are to be settled, it is to be presumed, by members of parliament of like calibre to the members of the convention, who have made such a dismal failure of the fiscal sections of the Federation Bill. The colonies are, however, hardly likely to enter into partnership without clearly settling the terms first.

So say I for one. In the case of South Australia, which derives considerable profit from the post and telegraph department, some special arrangement will have to be made. I do not say that it should last for all time, but an allowance of so much for the first year, so much for the next year, and so on till the fifth year would have to be made in a case like that. Again, in a case like that of Tasmania, which must have a larger revenue than a uniform tariff will give, there will be a loss for some time, and that might be made a charge on the federal government, because otherwise the tariff would have to be raised to an enormous amount to give Tasmania what she requires on a per capita basis. It would be much better to subsidise temporarily a state in that position than to take the course of unduly raising the tariff. If we could get Tasmania into line with the continent, the continent could afford to have a much lighter tariff than otherwise would be the case.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is to give Tasmania a bonus!

Mr. WALKER:
A bonus or subsidy. I am not going to weary the Committee by going fully into the question of the railways. The hon. member, Mr. McMillan, has referred to various schemes. He referred to one which was drafted at the Bathurst Convention. I may say that I recognise that this, Convention will not accept that scheme. At the last session, so far as I could judge from the votes, thirty-six members were against taking over the railways, so that it would be a waste of time to advocate it. I never did advocate a clear purchasing out of the railways; I advocated federation of the railways which would have left each state full permission to have its own differential rates, so that, the idea of New South Wales being robbed, as some people seem to suppose would be the case, never entered my mind. I would take all reasonable precautions against such a thing occurring. With regard to the consolidation of the debts, I have something to say. Under any system of federal finance it is evident that there will be, nominally, a large surplus, that is to say, the customs receipts will be largely in excess of the federal government expenditure. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, has in general terms said that he was inclined to think that the surplus going to each state might take the form of the federal government paying so much interest on behalf of that state, and taking over, therefore, so much of the debt. Of course right through I have been a believer in the conversion and the consolidation of the debts, if it can be done without perpetrating a wrong. I am aware that you cannot have a federation of the railways at the present time; but is there any good reason why we should not take steps to have the debts converted and consolidated I putting it briefly this way: We shall suppose that there is an income from customs, if Queensland comes in, of about £6,300,000 a year, or about £1 15s. per head. That will not be sufficient in some people's view. If we take off £1,300,000 for the expenses of the federal government, that will leave a surplus of £5,000,000. New South Wales, on a population basis, would be entitled, I presume, to about one-third of that amount. The interest of the debt of New South Wales is about £2,300,000 a year. Her share of the surplus would be £1,650,000 a year or thereabouts. The difference between what would be necessary to pay the whole of the interest on the New South Wales public debt and the surplus would be something like £650,000 a year. Why should not New South Wales, or any other colony, after hypothecating a portion of its net railway income go to the federal government, and say, "Our share of the federal surplus plus this amount of our railway income will be sufficient to enable you to pay the whole of the interest on our debt"?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The amount of interest payable would be reduced after consolidation!

Mr. WALKER:

No doubt that would be the case. For instance, in this supposed year £650,000 would be required by New South Wales to enable her to pay the balance of interest on her debt. That would be half the net railway income for the year. After consolidating the debts, however, the amount of interest would be so much less, and New South Wales would only have to be asked for sufficient of her railway income to make up the difference. On this subject of the consolidation of the debts I am not relying merely on my own judgment. I wrote to a gentleman in London who is recognised as a high authority—that is Mr. David George—who has had thirty-five years' banking experience in London, and is at present manager there of the Bank of New South Wales. He has had a good deal to do in days gone by with the negotiation of loans, and he has consequently acquired extensive practical experience. His letter is an admirable one, and I will read it. He says:

Consolidation of colonial debts.

Referring to your letter of 1st February, we have now considered the subject of your inquiry, and, perhaps, the best plan would be to take the different points in your letter and answer them seriatim.

First, as to the idea of substituting "Australasian consols" as an interminable stock for the various colonial debentures and stocks.

We think the idea in a very good one, and if it could be carried out, we believe the result would be a considerable saving. But it is difficult to see how the debts of the various colonies could be consolidated until federation, on satisfactory lines, has been accomplished. It seems to us that until the colonies have obtained federation, and the federal government has full power over the railways and customs to enable it to provide for the service of the debt, it will not be possible to secure consolidation; but if you are successful in federating the colonies, we think consolidation of the debts will follow as a necessary corollary.

Federation will be incomplete without consolidation of the debts.

I think that voices the sentiments of every man here.

Secondly, as to whether the consolidated stock idea could be brought into practical operation in such a way that the various debentures and stocks could be merged in time in the consolidated account,—

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

"In time"!

Mr. WALKER:

I quite agree with the hon. member. I am not one of those who want to rush like a bull at a china shop, and to get things done right off.
We think this could be done; but by this process it would take a long time before all the various debts were consolidated, and for so long the benefits anticipated from consolidation would be delayed. It would also be a rather difficult matter to arrange, and we doubt if it would prove satisfactory. It would create an anomalous state of affairs to have only the loans as they mature brought into the consolidated stock as a debt of the federal government, leaving the outstanding loans as debts of the different colonies who contracted them to remain intact until their maturity the same as at present, except, we suppose, that their management would be in the hands of the federal government-

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

No one would suggest that, surely!

Mr. WALKER:

No.

Thirdly, as to bringing about a consolidation into Australasian console at once of all the various debts of the colonies.

This we believe to be the best plan; but in order to carry it out a large conversion scheme would have to be introduced. The whole question depends upon terms—that is to say, the quid pro quo that would be offered to the holders of the different stocks to induce them to exchange their present securities into stock of the consolidated fund-

An Hon. MEMBER:

What is the quid pro quo?

Mr. WALKER:

He shows you now-

This, of course, will be a difficult and delicate matter to arrange, and it will require to be placed in the hands of actuarial experts of great experience and skill to ascertain the relative values of the different loans of the separate colonies to a single interminable consolidated inscribed stock, and the most influential medium will have to be employed to launch the scheme, and to find an opportune time for the purpose. The varying dates of maturity, and rates of interest, and the feeling existing here as to the position which the different colonies afford as security for their loans, would all have to be taken in account. Present holders cannot be compelled to exchange their securities, and, therefore, sufficiently liberal terms will have to be offered to induce the great bulk of them to fall in with a conversion scheme. The different merits and values of the loans of the various colonies will make it difficult to ascertain an all round satisfactory basis of exchange. Holders, for instance, of New South Wales securities, owing to their superior credit, will require a greater inducement to exchange their present holdings, while it may suit holders of Victorian, South Australian, and Tasmanian stocks to accept a security of a federated Australia much more readily.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

South Australia is a long way ahead of the others!

Mr. WALKER:

As an illustration of this, to give the present quotation of the three Australian 3 per cent. inscribed stocks, namely:- New South Wales, 3 per cent., 1935, 101 1/8-3/8; Western Australia, 3 per cent., 1915-35, 99-1/4; South Australia, 3 per cent., 1916-26, 98 1/2-3/4-

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

They were expecting a loan then!

Mr. WALKER:

Fourthly, as to the rate of interest upon which such a conversion should be based,-

We certainly think that the best rate would be 3 percent. This we believe would be the most practical basis upon which the debt could be consolidated. A lower rate we fear would simply cause any scheme to result in failure, therefore we would certainly recommend a 3 per cent. inscribed stock, and we believe that in course of time it would go to a premium. If the whole of the debts were consolidated into one stock, it would make a very big market on our Stock Exchange, and would cause larger dealings, and attract more public attention, and become a more favourite investment.

Fifthly, as to whether such a consolidated inscribed 3 per cent. stock would be likely to be placed upon the list of "trustees' securities,"-

This is a very important matter, and I dare say the Premier of Victoria could tell us that it is not at all an easy thing to get any stock put on that list.

We very much doubt if this could be done unless the federal government consented to give the Chancellor of the Exchequer—that is the British Government-control over the borrowing powers.

I told him that they would never do that.

The idea seems to be that the home Government would not authorise any stock to be placed on the privileged list of trustees' securities unless they had some power over it. But apart from this, many people by will authorise their trustees and executors to hold colonial stocks, and if a satisfactory scheme of federation could be carried through and all the debts consolidated into one stock, and some satisfactory restrictions made as to borrowing and good provision made for paying off the debt, we believe a great many more investors in colonial securities would by will authorise their executors to hold the new stock as trust funds. Most regrettable as it is, since 1893 the relative credit of the colonies has materially suffered in the estimation of British investors, and difficult as it would have been before then to have obtained an act of parliament creating colonial loans trustees' stocks, the difficulty is greater now, and the prospect much more remote. But with good and economical management by a federal government, and some finality in borrowing, there is no doubt the present feeling will pass away, and the stock of the federation become more and more as time goes on a stock which will be authorized in wills to be held by trustees. There is a continual tendency to do this with good stocks outside the privileged list owing to the returns from trustees' stocks being now so small.

Sixthly, as to whether inscribed stock or debentures would be the better form in which the consolidated debt could be issued,—

We have no hesitation in saying that inscribed stock would, beyond question, be preferable.

Owing to the risks of fire and robbery this form of security is now most favoured by the investing public, and it is the only form of stock likely to be held by trustees. Our opinion differs from Sir Samuel Montague's as regards colonial bonds. From our own experience we are quite sure that a comparatively small amount of the present bonds are held by people on the Continent. They are not dealt in on the Continental exchanges, and it would be obviously impossible to issue two forms, namely, bonds and stock; but in the event of a better security being required for borrowing or other purposes there will be no difficulty in arranging for the issue as in the case of consols of bearer's certificates with coupons attached, and which can be reinscribed when so desired by the holder.

We have seen Mr. Rose, the senior of Messrs. Hinton, Clarke, & Co., our stock-brokers, and he entirely agrees with our opinions expressed above.

I am sorry to be obliged to read such a long letter; but it is a very important one. My impression is that the fears of many persons that federation is going to be an additional expense will be largely removed if they are assured that we shall save by the consolidation of the debts, as much as the extra expenditure will be in founding the federal government.

[The Chairman left the chair at 1 p.m. The Committee resumed at 2 p.m.)

Mr. WALKER:

I desire at this point to elucidate the remark which I made with regard to bounties. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, asked how these would be provided for. Of course, the idea is that the customs duties will produce a sufficient income out of which to pay, if the federal parliament so desire it, certain bounties where it is decided to grant bounties. That is all on that point. My hon. friend, Mr. Holder, seems to think that I am against the principle, so-called, of a sliding scale. It is not the principle so much that I object to as the application of the principle. I think five years far too short a time within which to expect each colony to come into line as to customs contributions.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   How long would you give?

Mr. WALKER:
   I do not desire to follow that up at all. I would leave that to the federal parliament. Probably ten years would be likely to be a sufficient time.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
   Five years was accepted its it compromise!

Mr. WALKER:
   I do not think it would suit New South Wales, Western Australia, or Queensland. I am very certain it would not.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   What does the hon. member propose!

Mr. WALKER:
   I propose to capitalise the discrepancies at the end of five years if the commonwealth parliament so desires. I will show what I mean by capitalising discrepancies. At the end of five years, the commonwealth parliament will have sufficient data to go upon to say what has been the average contribution according to the population of each state.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
   That is, if they keep accounts during the five years!

Mr. WALKER:
   I am presuming that we shall keep accounts. But where a state contributes in excess of the average contribution per head, such annual excess on an average of four or five years may be determined, and shall be capitalized, say, at thirty years' purchase, and the commonwealth shall issue its funded stock for the amount so ascertained, or -relieve the state of a similar amount of its public debt at the current market value of the stock, provided that where the state contributes less than the average contribution per head, such annual deficiency on an average of four or five years shall also be capitalised at thirty years' purchase, and the state issue its funded stock for the amount so ascertained. The course will be that in the one case an annual subsidy will be granted, that is to say, for the surplus due to one state, and the money should come out of the consolidated fund, before the annual per capita distribution, and in the other case the amount will be retained by the federal government, out of the surplus otherwise payable to the state.
The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
   At what rate would you capitalise?
Mr. WALKER:
   I say thirty years. It ought to be thirty-three and one-third years, but that is a matter of detail.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   Will the state receive the money in cash in the meantime?
Mr. WALKER:
   That also is a matter which depends upon whether you we going to consolidate the debts. If you consolidate the debts the state will not get so much cash back, but, will get the interest paid for an equivalent amount. I see my hon. friend, Mr. Henry, will follow me and, perhaps, out we up on this matter; but I trust that I have the courage of my convictions.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   Do I understand you to say that, if they gave a state too much, you would expect it to refund by capitalisation?
Mr. WALKER:
   No. Under the bookkeeping principle every state will get back what it pays in, less a per capita proportion towards the federation government expenses.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   No sliding scale!
Mr. WALKER:
   No; I am not going in for a sliding scale at all. With regard to statistics during those four or five years, I know that many hon. members object to the book-keeping principle. I combat that view as follows:-I think there is a great misapprehension with regard to the difficulty. To begin with, each state has already its statistical department. Goods crossing the border will not require to be examined by the customs officials after the institution of intercolonial free-trade. Neither importers nor exporters, if so disposed, will have any object to gain by furnishing false returns to the government.
All that will be required will be for the exporters to prepare invoices is triplicate—one copy for the customs department in their own state, one for the house to whom the goods are consigned, and one to be sent by the importing house after they have received the goods to the customs department in their state. The invoice will show the value of the goods and the amount of the duty paid. The remainder will be merely book-keeping is the customs department. There will be no border customs officers, consequently there will be no vexatious examination of goods.

An Hon. MEMBER:
You would trust to the importers to send the returns!

Mr. WALKER:
They would have no object in telling lies, and it is only for five years. Then the trouble comes in with regard to the retail goods. This is where the great trouble, does come in. To get over that I propose this: during the two years during which the present customs duties are going on, and in the first year of the uniform duties we shall have certain data which will enable us from that time forth to say approximately that the broken bulk goods crossing the border are so much, and they will, not improbably, continue much the same in future as in the past. The federal government, from the statistics obtained during the three previous years—that is, two years of the present customs duties, and one year of the uniform duties—would, no doubt, have a fairly good idea of the course of trade across the border, and could arrange a system to allow drawbacks by lump sums between the colonies for locally manufactured articles and for broken bulk imported goods. That, would enable retailers to send goods across the border without any statistics. We should only have statistics of the wholesale goods. I have already said that I think it lo a great mistake to lay down hard and fast lines of expenditure.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Why do you capitalise on an average of four years?

Mr. WALKER:
I am not tied to four years. I do not care whether it is four or five years; but I argue In this way: It is proposed to have five years' uniform duties. I think the first year will not, be a good year for statistical purposes, because it would be affected by the over-importation of the previous year into New South Wales. So that for statistical purposes—that is to ascertain the average contribution in an ordinary time—I would take the second, third, fourth, and fifth years. I am not wedded to four years or to five years. If you are going to have a sliding scale, I think it would be better to take fifteen years or even twenty years. On this matter I think the views of the Convention are in touch with those of Sir Samuel Griffith, who says:

Is this too great a responsibility to be entrusted to the federal parliament?

That is the final settlement of the discrepancy.

That body will have more information, more time at its disposal, and more real sense of immediate responsibility, than a convention can have. Moreover, its mistakes can be corrected, while those of the Convention cannot, without serious trouble, delay, and danger.

I am one of those who thoroughly believe in the principle of federation. I am prepared to support any moderate scheme by which we can come together. Just one word more with regard to the railways. Although I think it is impracticable to have an amalgamation of the railways at present, or even a federation of the railways -I distinguish between the two—there are certain things that I think the federal government, as such, ought to take in hand. There is the unification of the gauges. I think that is a matter the expense of which ought to be defrayed by the federal government. Then there may be certain strategic railways—possibly to connect South Australia with Western Australia, or the northern end of the South Australian line with Port Darwin. I trust sufficient power will be given in the federal constitution to enable the federal government, when they think the time has come, to take in hand these great national undertakings. I do not for a moment think we should be justified, from a free-trade point of view at all events, in guaranteeing that each of the states shall get back as much income for so many years as it received the year before the institution of the uniform tariff. The reason why I cannot agree to that is this: that it practically means that in the colony of New South Wales we should have to submit to enormous customs duties—that is to say, judging by the remarks made by the Acting Government Statistician. This gentleman contrasts the consequences of a uniform tariff upon the different colonies. The figures he gives are so extraordinary that I may be excused for quoting them.

An Hon. MEMBER:

It is purely assumption!

Mr. WALKER:

I admit that. He says:

As the results stand, however, they show that on the basis of population at the close of the year 1896, the New South Wales tariff, as it will exist in July, 1897, will probably yield to the commonwealth the sum of £3,517,000; the Victorian tariff, the sum of £6,260,000; the South Australian tariff, £5,975,000; the Western Australian tariff, £4,712,000; and the Tasmanian tariff, £7,429,000; allowance being made for the freedom of intercolonial trade.

It would be very much better if the federal government had power, if need be, to subsidise Tasmania than that New South Wales should have to submit to a tariff which would bring in £7,429,000 as against even the Victorian tariff yielding £6,260,000. Surely we ought to empower the federal government to give subsidies, because federation is a national matter. I do not wish to speak otherwise than in a complimentary manner of our Tasmanian friends; but I hope there would be on their part no false pride to prevent them, if need be, accepting a subsidy for a short time, to bring all the colonies to the same level. One word more with regard to free-trade. A member of the Legislative Council in this colony has been twitting me that, as a free-trader, I am going to give away New South Wales. He thought he made a very good point against me by drawing my attention to the fact that at the time, of the union of England and Scotland, England was a protectionist country and Scotland was a free-trade country, and he said, "There you are! A free-trade country like Scotland went into partnership with a protectionist country like England, and it had to become practically protectionist." My reply to that is "Yes, but, as time went on, the truths of free-trade permeated England so much that to-day we have free-trade in Great Britain." I trust we shall also have Queensland with us before we close our work.

The Hon. J. HENRY (Tasmania)[2.16]:

In rising to address myself to this important question, I think it is well that I should say that in my opinion the financial question as embodied in this bill was not debated at the Adelaide Convention. It is within the memory of every lion. member that the Right Hon. G.H. Reid got up in the Convention and addressed himself to the question, and that before sitting down he proposed that the four Treasurers should meet and prepare a scheme to be submitted for the approval of the Convention. That was done; and, as the Premiers were going away, we all thought it was quite hopeless to enter upon the task of discussing the financial proposals until this meeting of the Convention. I think it is only right to say that.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

We only looked upon it as tentative!

The Hon. J. HENRY:

Quite so. A considerable minority, of whom I was one, who were strongly opposed to the whole of the scheme, kept their mouths shut, waiting for this opportunity. Otherwise it is undoubted that the whole scheme would have been discussed at length, and the views of the minority would have been put before the Convention and before the public. I regret to think that, after the lapse of some four months, and after the discussion that has taken place on the scheme proposed in this bill—that is the book-keeping portion—an hon. member of this Convention should stand up and still declare himself a pronounced supporter of that scheme. I notice however, that the ground is somewhat shifted, and it is contended that it would not be fair in the interests of New South Wales to adopt the first year of the sliding scale. I especially noticed that my hon. friend, Mr. McMillan, whose able and admirable address I listened to with great attention, was also still wedded to the five years. While professing his readiness to trust implicitly to the federal parliament, r the first five years.

Mr. McMillan:

I would trust them, but I do not think the other colonies would. It was in deference to the other colonies that I took that view!

The Hon. J. Henry:

I am very glad to hear the hon. gentleman say so, as it will save much trouble. However, I feel that it becomes my duty to express the very strong opinions I hold against the proposed system of book-keeping. I hold that the proposal to keep accounts of the customs duties collected by the several states for a period of five years is anti-federal in spirit, inequitable, and in my judgment, unworkable.

Mr. Walker:

Will the hon. gentleman explain how it is inequitable?

The Hon. J. Henry:

The hon. member has himself admitted its inequality by abandoning the proposal as regards the first year. If the Right Hon. Sir George Turner can carry his memory back to within twenty-four hours after the scheme was proposed—if all the pomp and ceremony through which he has recently passed has not put it out of his mind—he will recollect distinctly that I pointed out the difficulty of the position, and that Mr. McMillan and myself, as commercial men, both saw that when the astute member for New South Wales, the Right Hon. G.H. Reid, thought he made a splendid bargain for his colony, he really made the greatest mistake a man possibly could make in the interests of his colony. I do not think I need refer much further to the inequality, because it is admitted on all hands. I was pleased to read the admirable article by Mr. Nash, which exposed the whole thing so clearly, and which was entirely in accord with my views, expressed within twenty-four hours of the proposal being made. I fear to enter at length upon this book-keeping question lest I might weary hon. members; but I have given the question a good deal of consideration, and I regret to find that my hon. colleague, Sir Philip Fysh, has been carried away by the figures, and has adopted the view that in the interests of New South Wales and fair play book-keeping will be necessary. It will be my duty to endeavour to show that those figures were founded on a fallacy. What is the common idea in connection with this business? It is proposed, as regards trade, that we should be one people. What is the corollary to that? In my judgment that we should have one common purse to which the revenue should flow, and that out of that common purse the whole of the charges in connection with federation should be paid. It is urged that the state of the finances of a colony like New South Wales on the one hand, and Western Australia on the other, is such that that would be inequitable. I grant that so far as Western Australia is concerned, to federate on a mere per capita distribution of any surplus would not be just to that colony, and that some special provision will require to be made if the conditions are the same hereafter as they are now. The point I wish to make is this: that for all time there must be a difference in the wealth of the several colonies, and it is in proportion to the wealth and population of the respective colonies that their proper contributions through customs and excise will be. That is inevitable. Are we to attempt, in a constitution bill, to provide for the inevitable changes in the future in regard to the increase or decrease of wealth in any particular colony? If we intend to federate the rich and the poor must come in alike. The richer colonies must be prepared to take the poorer colonies along with them, or there will be no true federation. With reference to Western Australia, let us go back to 1891, to see the changes which are inevitable in the future in regard to any of the colonies—changes which we cannot possibly foresee. Let us take a retrospective view of the history of Western Australia, going back to 1891 when the convention bill was framed.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That was before the gold!
The Hon. J. HENRY:
I admit it was, but that is the point to which I wish to draw attention. Who could then foresee the position of Western Australia? I wish to point to the great object lesson we have in Western Australia, to show the possible changes which may be lying ahead of us, and which we cannot foresee, and to show how impossible it is, in a constitution bill, in view of those changes, to provide for perfect equity in connection with the financial question. Who could possibly foresee what the condition of Western Australia would have been to-day? I think it would be instructive to inquire into the causes of her present prosperity. It has been stated today that one of the causes is the excess of males in the population. There is no doubt that is one important factor, but there is also another important factor in her prosperity. Western Australia is now posing through a similar experience to that through which many other colonies have passed. She is having a boom period. What is causing the large increase in her customs revenue, independent altogether of her male population? It is the large amount of privately borrowed money which is being poured into the colony for the development of her mines, and the public borrowing as well. The money comes in in the shape of goods, and under the customs tariff there is a very considerable toll levied as the borrowed money flows into the country. That is the obvious reason of her present abnormal prosperity and of the increase in her customs revenue. The question naturally arises, how long is this going to last? Of course she is stocked up very heavily now. Loads of mining machinery, building material, furniture, and so on, are being poured into this new country, and there is no doubt that for some time, with a great output of gold, there is great prosperity before her. But before we have a uniform tariff who can foretell what changes may take place in the revenue of Western Australia? I merely point to this as an illustration.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Is she going down, do you think?

The Hon. J. HENRY:
I do not say that. I have no doubt Western Australia will pass through the same experience as other colonies having passed through. She will have its period of fall. She cannot go on borrowing money for ever. I point to this fact as showing how difficult it is, in a constitution bill, to provide for all the changes lying ahead of us in these colonies. The proposal to keep accounts of all the goods passing between the several colonies seems to me to be a parochial idea.

Mr. WALKER:
Oh!

The Hon. J. HENRY:
It appears to me that the proposal to keep accounts of what the different colonies consume is very parochial. I know that, so far as the colony of Tasmania is concerned, different sections of the community contribute very differently to customs revenue. We might as well, in that colony, divide the country into parishes and find out what our west coast, which is a considerable mining centre, and where there is a considerable excess of males, contributes relatively to any of the cities or agricultural districts. The idea is anti-federal in spirit; that is how it presents itself to my mind. I know what has led to this. Those of us who were engaged on the Finance Committee know what led to the introduction of this book-keeping idea. It was the fear that New South Wales was going to make great sacrifices by a per capita distribution of surplus, and that the only way New South Wales could have justice done to it, relatively to the colony of Victoria, was to have this book-keeping system carried out, so that each colony should know exactly what customs' duties it paid. The whole of this is founded on certain figures published by Mr. Coghlan, and I have no hesitation in saying, after a study of the subject, and after having had the assistance of our able statistician, Mr. Johnston, that they are founded on fallacy.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I quite agree with the hon. member—absolute fallacy!

The Hon. J. HENRY:
I hope I shall demonstrate the fallacy before sitting down. In the first place, Mr. Coghlan—and I notice that the figures are repeated in the "Notes on Federal Finance" which have been placed in our hands—founds his estimate on the imports of Victoria and New South Wales for three particular years—1893, 1894, 1895. What are the facts? We are all familiar with that terrible period of depression from which—I think I am justified in saying it—Victoria especially suffered during 1893-94. Prior to that we all know the abnormal excess of imports over exports in the colony of Victoria, which surprised and astonished so many. They had gone on during their boom period just as our Western Australian friends are having their boom period now—they had imported heavily, and when the collapse came, Victoria was heavily stocked with building material and all the commodities used by the wealthier classes. We all know the terrible suffering that the wealthier classes in Victoria were called upon to endure when the collapse came. They had not the power to purchase the goods they had been accustomed to buy, the country was heavily stocked, and for a considerable period people were working to run down their stocks. I believe, without going into statistics, that that is a correct statement of the position.

Mr. HIGGINS:
They were importing £24,000,000, and exporting £12,000,000 worth!

The Hon. J. HENRY:
Yes; before that there is no doubt that the country was heavily stocked, and I do not think that New South Wales at the same time was in a like disastrous position; therefore, to take the imports of the two great colonies for that period is not a safe method of arriving at a just conclusion as to the purchasing power of the, people. Besides, I hold that, under a uniform tariff, the whole of the trade relations of those two colonies, and of all the colonies, will be entirely changed. I am not at all in accord with the view put forth by my hon. friend, Mr. Deakin, that in consequence of the strides that Victoria has made in certain manufactures she will not contribute as much under a uniform tariff as New South Wales would. I take it that if the hon. and learned member will traverse the case very closely he will find, in all probability, that what suits the Victorian consumer will, under a uniform tariff, suit the New South Wales consumer. Should not the manufactures of Victoria, if they suit the Victorian consumer, also find consumers across the New South Wales border? In my judgment it will be found, with a uniform tariff, that goods from New South Wales will flow into Victoria and goods from Victoria will flow into New South Wales. What are we federating for but to secure larger markets and freer intercourse among the people? I do not see that Victoria would contribute less to the customs revenue in consequence of her manufactures. I believe that it is one of the fallacies contained in this paper.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I was merely answering the Right Hon. G.H. Reid's interjection in regard to protection.

The Hon. J. HENRY:

I was going to point out in connection with this question that in all probability, seeing that the future federal tariff would not be likely to be so high as the present Victorian tariff, Victoria would import goods which she does not import now. I think that is a reasonable supposition. However, what we want to get at in considering the question as to the relative contribution by the several colonies, is the purchasing power of the people of the several colonies, and I say that is governed by the wealth of the colonies. In proportion as one colony is richer than another so will it contribute more to the customs and excise revenue. As I have already said, I consulted our very able statistician, Mr. Johnston, and I asked him to get out, on some better principle than Mr. Coghlan's, what the probable relative contribution by the people of each colony would be, and I think that hon. members will be interested in knowing the method which Mr. Johnston adopted in getting it out, and the results. The method which he adopted was this: He took seven articles - tea, coffee, sugar, tobacco, spirits, wine, and beer - and made a very elaborate and careful analysis of the quantity consumed per head in each colony. This is merely the method which our statistician adopted for measuring the purchasing power of the people.
An Hon. MEMBER:
A very good method, too!

The Hon. J. HENRY:
What are the results? I may state that these articles cover 52 per cent. of the entire customs and excise duties. The statistician took the precise quantities consumed in each colony according to the import returns, and he also took the rates in Tasmania. Hon. members will see that it does not matter what particular rates were taken—that would not affect the question—but the interesting point is that, with the Tasmanian rates, and the precise quantities consumed in each colony—and each colony of course being calculated at the same rate—the following is the result:- New South Wales would contribute £1 18s. 7d.; Victoria, £1 18s.; Queensland, £1 17s.; South Australia, £1 12s. 4d.; and Western Australia, £2 17s. I may state that those are the quantities imported into the several colonies.

Mr. GLYNN:
That makes Queensland have it bigger purchasing power than New South Wales!

The Hon. J. HENRY:
No; Queensland, £1 17s., and New South Wales, £1 18s. 7d. Now I come back to Mr. Coghlan's figures in the paper which has just been given to us.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
They are not the figures of Mr. Coghlan, but of the Acting Statistician!

The Hon. J. HENRY:
The statement is based on Mr. Coghlan's figures.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Spirits alone were £2 10s. per head with us last year!

The Hon. J. HENRY:
This is only a method adopted for getting at the purchasing power, not the contribution of each colony. We are asked to believe, in the statement just laid before us, that New South Wales, under a uniform tariff, would contribute £2 3s. 9d., and Victoria £1 6s. 7d.

Mr. SOLOMON:
Does that not show that that method of ascertaining the purchasing power is fallacious?

The Hon. J. HENRY:
That is the whole of my argument. I am endeavouring to demonstrate the fallacy of this paper. Our common-sense revolts at it. What is the difference in the wage-earning power of the two great colonies? Will any one endeavour to persuade me with figures like those that there is a difference of 17s. 2d. per head? The thing bears on the face of it its own refutation. I think that the figures which I have just submitted demonstrate very conclusively that the tables which have been placed in our hands in "Notes on Federal Finance," by the Acting-Government Statistician in New South Wales, are entirely fallacious.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

The facts of the importation are absolutely correct!

The Hon. J. Henry:

I am not disputing them. The right hon. gentleman has not been here during the whole of my speech or he would have known what my arguments were. I have no intention of going over them again; but I have demonstrated that the method of getting at the purchasing power of the people under the tariff of 1893, 1894, 1895, is fallacious.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

The method is right, but the application is wrong!

The Hon. J. Henry:

The application is wrong. I am sure that no one would admit more readily than the right hon. gentleman that when you get a difference of 17s. 2d. per head of the population between the purchasing power of Victoria and New South Wales the figures are thoroughly unreliable; and when I saw them I felt disposed to cast the whole of the papers aside. While I am dealing with this matter I think I might call attention to a very erroneous statement made in these papers. I do so because I know that there are wreckers about, who are desirous of defeating federation, and it is possible that when the question comes to be discussed in the several colonies they will use this as: an authoritative statement of one of the results of federation. This is the statement to which I refer:

Within the limits imposed by the bill for the first three years, the net cost of the federal authority, after making an allowance for the expenditure of which the states will be relieved, may reach little short of £6,000,000 in the aggregate, while the loss of revenue by intercolonial free-trade may involve the provincial governments in a further deficiency of £450,000.

As a matter of fact, the several state parliaments will have entirely thrown over their tariffs, and there will be no such thing under the bill as intercolonial free-trade until we have a uniform tariff. The Right Hon. G.R. Reid must know that very well. But put this statement before the public, and circulate it amongst the colonies that there is going to be a loss under a system of intercolonial free-trade-

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Surely there will be a contraction in the customs revenue?

The Hon. J. Henry:

Yes, when we have a uniform tariff; but this applies to a period prior to the introduction of that tariff. The man who wrote this statement did not understand what he was writing. I have said that I believe that the book-keeping system will be unworkable, and I will endeavour to show in a few words what is in my mind in regard to it. I see here two veteran politicians, the Hon. Sir Graham Berry and the Hon. Adye Douglas, both of whom have had some experience in attempting to make reciprocity treaties. But the difficulties which have arisen in attempting to arrange reciprocity treaties will arise under the book-keeping system in passing goods from one colony to another. Of course, it is obvious that you must find out, when a parcel of goods passes from Victoria to New South Wales, or from New South Wales to Victoria, what portion is colonial product and what has paid duty, because there will have to be a debit and a credit entry. If the goods are passing from Victoria to New South Wales, Victoria will have to be debited with the amount of duty, and New South Wales will have to be credited with that amount. There will have to be a debit and a credit entry for every parcel of goods passing between the two colonies. I will assume that £1,000 worth of clothing is sent from Victoria to New South Wales. The clothing, we will say, is made of Victorian tweed, which, of course, is a colonial product. But there are also the buttons, the twine, the lining, and other material to be accounted for. These articles, in all probability, would have paid duty, and it would be necessary to find out what their value was, so that Victoria might be debited with the duty which she had paid upon them, and that New South Wales might be credited with the same amount. The whole system of book-keeping would be so full of difficulties that I think the common-sense of the Convention will say that we should have none of it.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Would the hon. member have no book-keeping for the two years before the uniform tariff?

The Hon. J. HENRY:
I am speaking entirely of the period of the uniform tariff. The book-keeping for the period before the uniform tariff comes into operation is simple, because provision is made in the bill that the customs revenue from the several states, whatever it may be, less the proportion per capita of the new expenditure of all the states, shall be debited to their accounts.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
We do not want to say per capita. We shall know the actual expenditure of each colony!

[P.71] starts here

The Hon. J. HENRY:
Yes; but I am talking about the new machinery. Each colony will share the new expenditure.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
They will do that. Each state will pay its own share!

The Hon. J. HENRY:
Each state will pay its own share upon a per capita basis.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Not upon a per capita basis!

The Hon. J. HENRY:
It has been suggested by Sir Samuel Griffith that the states should have power to impose special customs duties subsidiary to those imposed by the federal government. I think the hon. member, Mr. Walker, also made that suggestion.

Mr. WALKER:
I did not say anything about it!

The Hon. J. HENRY:
It was suggested to me that the hon. member was in favour of some such arrangement. I can scarcely imagine a states custom-house and a federal custom house alongside each other. However, that is one of the alternative proposals, and I think it has only to be mentioned to be disregarded.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
It is like the plan of the Irishman, who made a big hole through the fence to enable the hens to come into the yard, and a little hole to allow the chickens to get through!

The Hon. J. HENRY:
Yes. We should have to say on what articles the federal government should levy duties, and on what articles the states should be allowed to levy duties. If the states were allowed to levy upon any particular article, they might levy a double duty. Now, I come to the question of dealing with the state debts. I should like to say something about the proposal of Tasmania, which was shortly described by the hon. member, Sir Philip Fysh, this morning. Of course, many of us hold the opinion that when we part with the right to levy customs duties, it will be imperative that the federal government shall, take over the obligations of the states, because, otherwise, we shall not be able to get on. Tasmania, by the amendments which hon. members will see in the bill, proposes that, to start with, the federal government should take over an equal, amount of debt from each colony.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Absolutely?

The Hon. J. HENRY:
Per capita, taking the colony with the least amount of indebtedness per head as the basis.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

The Hon. J. HENRY:

I understand from the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest that Western Australia has suggested an amendment, using the word "adults" instead of the words "per capita." That, no doubt is a point worth considering; but I wish now to explain the Tasmanian proposal. It is this: In the first instance, the federal government shall take over the responsibility for the debts of all the colonies; but it shall only relieve each colony of an equal amount, assuming that that is the lowest amount that any colony owes. Take the case of Victoria, for example. I think I am right in saying that the indebtedness of Victoria is about £40 per head of population. That would mean that the federal government would relieve the, several states of £40 per head of their public debt, and that the balance, the difference between the £40, and whatever the debt might be would be a liability on the part of the state. Now, under the amendment of our Attorney-General, Mr. A.I. Clark, whose absence from this Convention I certainly regret, it is proposed to have a census every five years. I am not in accord with him in that respect. I think the adjustment should take place annually. But the principle is there; it is elastic; and it accommodates itself to all changes. According to the increase of population so would the federal government cancel the obligation. Mr. Clark proposes that bonds should be given. I do not think there is any necessity for bonds.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Hear, hear!

The Hon. J. HENRY:

It is simply an obligation on the part of the state, and of course the necessary power could be given to levy such duties or taxes as might be necessary. When the proper time comes I hope the Convention will give that scheme due consideration. It is, as I have said, elastic; it accommodates itself to all possible changes in the future, and it is thoroughly equitable.

Mr. HIGGINS:

What about the differing rates of interest?

The Hon. J. HENRY:

We are bound in the amendment to 3½ per cent.; but I do not think there is such a great difference in the rates in the several states that we need go into fractional amounts. At all events I have not thought closely upon that branch of the subject. I do not regard the plan as providing thoroughly for the whole of our debt, but it has a great deal to commend it. We should still have to trust to the federal government to set the state finances right. No man has been more pronounced in this Convention than I have been for insisting that there should be some definite obligation upon the federal government to keep the state finances right. I have in season and out of season advocated that; but I suppose I shall have now to modify my views in this respect, having regard to the enormous difficulties that lie in front of us in drafting a scheme that will work equitably under all the changing conditions of the future. I say that the federal treasury, the federal executive, the federal parliament, assisted by the ablest men among the heads of departments, will be the right men to deal with this financial question as the circumstances arise in each year. I have pointed to the history of Western Australia. We do not know what changes may be in the future for any of us. I know that the colony in the representation of which I have the honor to share has a great future before it. We have, according to reliable statistics, comparatively undeveloped mines in which there are £30,000,000 of ore in sight. That being so, we are justified in anticipating a great increase in our mining population, and this increased population, as contributors to the customs, will in due course place us alongside the other colonies. We cannot enter a federation if the incidence of our taxation is so changed as to largely increase our direct and decrease our indirect taxation. But I should feel justified in going back to my fellow-colonists, and saying that I would trust the future federal parliament implicitly. Whether we have federation now or at some future time, the federal parliament will be made up of men who know the financial as well as the other requirements of the several states. Next to the great question of free-trade and protection which will have to be fought out, the paramount question to be considered will be the preservation of the state treasuries, and I, for my part, would be disposed to leave the whole question, with entire confidence, to the federal parliament.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[2.55]:

I am very glad that on this occasion the Convention is considering this question, not in Committee, but publicly—in the light of day. I am sure the fact of our consideration of the matter in Adelaide in secret robbed our determinations of much of that weight which otherwise might have attached to them. Persons have said tome concerning the matter, "We see your conclusions; but as we do not know the paths by which you arrived at them, we are unable to say whether or not the conclusions are justified; and therefore we cannot say whether or not we can accept them." On this occasion I hope that, not only shall we arrive at a right conclusion, but that the pathway along which we travel will be made so clear that others outside will be able to note the way and follow us in it. I am taking this afternoon a very easy role-one which has been followed by many ever since, in 1891, the financial proposals referring to federation were first formed. It is easy to criticise other people's work; it is easy to pull down, to find fault, to pick holes; it is not so easy, by any manner of means, to construct a scheme with which other persons cannot find fault. I infer that the purpose of this debate at the present stage is rather to clear away schemes which will not run, to remove theories against which there are serious objections, rather than to set up theories of our own. Therefore, I do not propose to conclude with any definite statement of a scheme to take the place of the schemes we have; but I shall endeavour to show, for the sake of those present, as well as for the sake of those outside, some of the strong objections that can be taken to some, if not to all of the various plans which have been suggested. In dealing with Part IV of the bill, I think we are dealing with those provisions which have to do with the very essence of federation. If we wish to establish a tariff of customs duties, we must recognise that without uniform customs there can be no true federation. A federation, including States which maintained between them a customs warfare would be no federation. Then comes the question of the railways. I quite agreed with my hon. friend, the Secretary for Lands of this colony, Mr. Carruthers, when he said in Adelaide that it was useless to do away with the strife between the customs-houses if we were merely to transfer that strife to the railway-stations. I take, as I took emphatically in Adelaide, this ground-that unless our federation will serve not merely to abolish the customs-house strife, but will also end the railway tariff strife, it will not be a federation worthy of us, or worthy of the countries we wish to federate. I think it is of equal importance that we should abolish cut-throat railway rates as that we should abolish rival border customs duties. The hon. member, Mr. Deakin, this morning thought that there was too much made of what he spoke of as preferential railway rates. Now I am somewhat with him as to the point he made with regard to differential rates growing into preferential rates. It undoubtedly must be admitted that what is a differential rate in a colony applied outside that colony may or may not be a preferential rate. But in many cases it would be, I think, an advantage that we should lay down the line, and say that such a rate should be tolerated as might be a differential rate applied beyond the borders of the colony on the same basis and on the same principle as applies within the colony. But so soon as you depart from these principles, and, either to bring trade into a colony or to prevent trade going from one colony to another, you adopt a principle which you would never adopt within your own borders, I think we come to a class of rates which we must absolutely prohibit, or our federation will not be worthy of the name. There is another question included in this chapter which cannot be left out of sight—that is, in relation to the rivers, Reference was also made by the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, to the fact that in many cases our rivers take the place of railways. Where we have not had waterways we have had to maintain our railways as methods of communication between state and state, and district and district. But we have some waterways, and they are as essential to us as our railways are, and the freedom of trade and intercourse over them and along them is as essential to federation as is the freedom of intercourse over our railway lines. I refer specially, of course, to the rivers Murray and Darling. Along those rivers, from the furthest point away from their mouth, where navigation begins, right down to the mouth of the Murray itself, it is to my mind of the first importance, if we are to have real freedom of trade at all—if our freedom of intercourse between part and part of the great commonwealth is to be real and true—it is of the first importance that we should say we shall tolerate no interference with those principles which, rightly applied, will secure equality of trade over all those rivers. We cannot have equality of trade over those rivers—we cannot make that use of them which the commonwealth is entitled to make—unless we see that the riparian rights are fully guarded. Of what use is it to us in South Australia to have within our borders both banks and a large portion of the lower Murray unless we have the water flowing between those banks? What is the advantage to us of the possession of the lower waters of the Murray which ought to come to us, if higher up, by means of locks or irrigation works, large quantities of water are taken away, and the river when it comes within our borders ceases to be navigable? As the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, says, we have the bottle but not the liquor, and not many of us care much for the bottle without the liquor.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

We are supplying you with the liquor all the time!

The Hon. F.W. Holder:

I dare say New South Wales would not do it if she could help it. I think it is characteristic of New South Wales to give nothing away that she can keep her hands upon.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Broken Hill!

The Hon. F.W. Holder:
For a very long time we have been striving to enforce in South Australia our riparian rights-to obtain some recognition of those rights to which if we were private persons we should undoubtedly be entitled. I take it that the position between South Australia and New South Wales is parallel to the relation which would subsist, if New South Wales were a private landowner and South Australia were also a private landowner.

We should then have the right to demand that a certain and proper flow of water should come to us. We, as private landowners, would then see that our rights in this respect were not trenched upon. That is all South Australia has sought; that is all South Australia desires to assert in future. But what was the position taken up at the late session of this Convention at Adelaide with reference to the Murray waters? The colony of New South Wales would not, in any sense, permit the control of the Darling waters passing to the federation, because both banks of the river were in New South Wales. When, however, we came to deal with the lower Murray, where both banks are in South Australia, it was maintained that quite a different principle must prevail. Federal control must never come in when both banks belong to New South Wales; but when both banks belong to South Australia federal control must prevail. It may happen that the wolf will obstruct free navigation, and yet we are not to complain. The unfortunate lamb down stream from the wolf was said to be guilty of fouling the water to the detriment of the wolf, and, therefore, it had to pay the penalty of death. Poor South Australia which is down stream with reference to geographical position compared with New South Wales, must give up all her riparian rights to the commonwealth; but New South Wales up stream, which has the power of doing damage and may do it, would not give up any of her riparian rights to the commonwealth. Let us have fair play in this matter, which does not merely affect the rivers which I am now dealing with, but which affects freedom of intercourse and trade between state and state, and between part and part of the commonwealth. Let us have fair play in this matter. Either let us have all parts of this navigable stream within federal control-and no one will then complain—or else let us see that South Australia is left untouched in her right and authority over the water of the Lower Murray. With regard to the concession to her of all her riparian rights, do not hand over to the federal authority powers properly belonging to South Australia.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Did the hon. member mention the Lachlan River?

The Hon. F.W. Holder:
So far as the Lachlan River is navigable precisely the same argument will apply, and I am very much obliged to the right hon. gentleman for calling my attention to the fact, I am simply pointing out that whatever is done customs, railways, and rivers must be taken together. Unless we consider and take them together all through this constitution, we shall not fully secure that freedom of trade and commerce which I assume we ought to secure in a federal constitution. Passing from these things more definitely to the financial question involved in our consideration, the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, said this morning that it mattered not to the federal authority whether there was a surplus or not.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I said it was not essential to the federal governments!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

In one sense the hon. member is right; in another he is quite wrong. Seeing that it is essential to the federal government that the state shall prosper, it is essential to the federal government that where it has taken over from the states their chief engine of taxation, it shall have something to return to them from the proceeds of that engine. It seems to me that a federation in which the federal authority is not interested in the solvency and prosperity of the states is such a thing as we ought not to consider for a moment. In fact our first duty to-day is, and I think I can go further and say that the first duty of the federal parliament of the future will be, to conserve the, interests of the states. What are we doing to-day? We represent not some idea, some conception of federation; we represent the individual units of the population which makes up Australia. In all our deliberations, we conceive as far as, we can what will be the beat for those individual units on which the prosperity of the whole mass will be built up, and the prosperity of the separate persons forming the mass. So it will be in the federal parliament. The prosperity and strength of the federal authority will depend upon the prosperity and strength of each individual state comprising that federation. Therefore I do not apologise for placing in the very forefront of my remarks a plea for the necessity of securing the strength and prosperity of every stater to be in this commonwealth. I deprecate what I am going to state being set aside as parochial. I object to its being said that what I am about to state savours of parochialism or anything of that kind. That is the kind of argument used. But I take my ground again where I took it before on this fact: that in my view the success of federation itself must depend on the success of every state in it, and, therefore, in arguing for the strength and financial stability of the states, I am arguing, not for, that which is parochial, but for that which is essential to the success and strength of, the commonwealth itself.
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
The success of the people of the states as well as the success of the state governments!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I think what I said carried me right back to the personal units forming the states. We may begin with the individual units on which the, states rest, and then take the state units on which the commonwealth rests, and, wherever we stand for the moment whatever we argue from, of course the individual unit must be that which is at the back of everything in our thoughts. Now, the question is raised by some, shall we have a surplus or shall we not? I think the question answers itself. We must have a surplus, or else the states of the federation cannot carry on. Let us look for a moment at their position to-day. In most of them there is not only the indirect taxation which is proposed to be handed over to the commonwealth, but also some direct taxation, and in most of them just about up to the measure of their capacity to carry it. I do not know any state, unless, indeed, it be this wealthy splendid state in which we are assembled to-day, which can afford any very considerable addition to its present burden.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Queensland!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Queensland might afford some. Besides those two states I do not know any other which can afford any very considerable addition to its present taxation.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Victoria has no land-value tax yet!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Victoria has a land-tax.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is not a land-value tax, and it only yields £120,000!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I know it is not a very large sum; but I do not think my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, if he were the Victorian Treasurer, would be free to propose any very considerable addition to the direct taxation of that colony. I am wanting to point out that when the states have handed over to the federation, as it is proposed they should, all their power of customs and excise taxation, unless there can be returned to them a sum very closely approximating to the sum which they realise from those sources, they will be not only prospectively but at once in very serious straits. I have spoken to most of those who are here, I think all, on the question, and I do not know a Treasurer or a budding Treasurer who would be willing to go back to his colony and advocate any system of federation which did not provide for the return of practically the whole of the sum now collected from customs and excise to the state from the federal authority. It has been said that we need have no surplus, that we can provide for a proportion of the debts to be taken over. I noticed with interest the very practical remarks which my hon. friend, Mr. Henry, made on this question. The Tasmanian Parliament propose that a certain proportion of the debts should be taken over, and I think the hon. member mentioned £40 per head. The average interest on our public debt to day is 4 per cent. I believe. Taking over £40 per head of the public debts of all the colonies would mean taking over an obligation amounting to £1 12s. per head of the population.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

It is not only the insufficiency, it is the inequity I want to point out. How would that proposal work out? Under any conceivable new tariff the people of New South Wales would, at least for some years, contribute a great deal more than £1 12s. per head of the population. And under almost any conceivable tariff, Western Australia would contribute an immensely larger sum, for some time to come. Tasmania, certainly, would, for some years to come, contribute a less sum than £1 12s. per head of its population from any conceivable tariff of the commonwealth. What is the position? The position is this: that we are asking that a return shall be made to the states equal per head over the whole commonwealth, while the contributions of the states are very unequal. We shall be asking New South Wales to contribute perhaps £2 per head of its population, and to receive back only £1 12s. per head; Tasmania to contribute perhaps 25s. per head, and to receive back 32s. per head. I do not mention South Australia, because it is almost at the point of average for the whole of the colonies in respect of customs and excise duties.

The probability is that whatever plan be adopted South Australia will neither suffer much loss nor realise much gain. South Australia is not far from the mean line. But if the basis of £1 12s. per head be adopted, that is more than South Australia is contributing per head through customs and excise. Therefore, while it would be a nice little arrangement for South Australia, and might put £60,000 or £70,000 a year into our pockets, some one else would have to find that sum. New South Wales and Western Australia would doubtless be the kindly parties.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

We do not want any such position. South Australia wants her own, if she can get it. She is going to get as near to her own as she can; but she does not want one penny belonging to anyone else. I think I may say the same for Tasmania. We all of us want our own, no more and no less. That being so, it is apparent at once that neither £40 per head, nor any other amount per head, equal over the whole commonwealth will do. You appear to wipe out the surplus, but you do not wipe it out at all. You simply provide that there shall be a return equal per head over the whole population at once throughout the commonwealth. Suppose it were proposed that at once a per capita distribution of the surplus should take place, would that be accepted? Do not even the representatives of Tasmania themselves argue against the inequity of such a proposal? Is it not apparent to us all, whatever may be possible in the future, that when things have settled down, and the new tariff has been some years in operation, it is simply out of the question that we should begin right away with an equal per capita distribution, which is what this scheme of taking over it certain proportion of the debts amounts to if you go to bedrock in considering it. Now there have been various other schemes suggested for dealing with the surplus—and I am taking it for grant ed that we must have a surplus for the reason I have mentioned—and among them is a suggestion that we should have a book-keeping system. I thoroughly agree with every word the hon.
member, Mr. Henry, said as to the undesirability, impracticability, and half a dozen other things of this book-keeping system. To my mind, one of the strongest recommendations, if not the strongest, of federation is the removal of border custom-houses. How are you going to remove them if you are going to keep up the bookkeeping system? As long as you have your book-keeping system, as long as you are taking these accounts strictly between colony and colony, you must maintain your border custom-houses, your border customs officers, and practically all your border customs restrictions. I have had some little experience of this system, and I am going to repeat what I said in Adelaide, not publicly, but to the Finance Committee. In South Australia for some years we have striven to keep accounts very strictly between ourselves and the Northern Territory, which in a sense is not of us, although it belongs to us. Part of the book-keeping necessary has been a discrimination between duty paying goods and free goods passing over the border or arriving by sea. The task has been a practically impossible one. It has involved a scrutiny of goods, it has involved delays, it has involved in other ways all the difficulties of a hostile tariff, and this impossibility of its correct application has become apparent again and again. You have shipments of goods which may include dutiable goods of different kinds in one article. You may have shipments including some dutiable goods and some that are free. There may be South Australian tweeds which are not dutiable, or you may have English tweeds, or some other tweeds. The difficulty is to find out the origin of them. You may find out the origin of one part of a shipment, but you may have a difficulty in finding out the origin of another part, and it would not be certain whether the goods were dutiable or not. If we are going to have that system carried on, not between South Australia and the Northern Territory, but between these great colonies with their huge trade and intercourse, we shall have something that will be irksome in the extreme, which will be unsatisfactory in the extreme, and which will break down of its own weight as it ought to do.

Mr. WALKER:
What about collecting statistics?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
We shall, of course, try to get all the statistics that we can with regard to trade and commerce; but such statistics as will be required for a system of book-keeping between all the colonies, will, I hope, not be sanctioned by this or any other Convention. If we are going to have a book-keeping system for twenty years, let us postpone federation for that time. If we are going to have this system of book-keeping for five years it amounts to postponing the benefits of federation for another five years. In South Australia, when preparing the financial scheme, we very reluctantly, as the only way of dealing with the matter, after much shrinking from it, adopted the scheme which provided for book-keeping for one year, and we thought that that was a great deal to tolerate, and I am sure that we ought not to tolerate even that. Now, I come to another scheme which has been suggested for dealing with the difficulty; that is, returning to the states the amount of revenue that they contribute, less a per capita contribution to the cost of federal government. There is a difficulty here to which I will call attention, not because I do not think that any one has mentioned it, but because I desire to freshen hon. members' memories. It has been suggested that any surplus in the hands of the federal government shall be handed back to the states after a reduction per capita to meet expenditure. I want to point out the difficulty of that being carried out unless you have a bookkeeping system. Suppose that there is a surplus of £5,000,000 and the federal authority has to determine where it arose, whence it came. Without a book-keeping system they cannot tell. I defy any federal treasurer or statistician if there is a surplus of £5,000,000 to say where it arose. Shipments of goods come into places like Sydney, and are sent away, finding ultimate consumption in other places. There are distributing centres like Melbourne where goods come to and are scattered far and wide. When we have uniform duties, and the duties are paid at the port of shipment, those places will become distributing centres. Sydney will be a distributing centre, not only for its own state, but also for Queensland and other states. Melbourne will become a distributing centre, and goods paying duty in Melbourne will be sent to Tasmania, South Australia, Western Australia, and elsewhere. Who is to say where they are ultimately consumed, and yet it is where they are ultimately consumed that the duty belongs? How is it possible to find out to which state the duty belongs?

An Hon. MEMBER:

You will have to ear-mark it all the time!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

Of course the hon. member understands that that would be quite impossible. If we are not going to have a system of book-keeping we must set aside as impracticable the scheme in the bill of 1891. Of course there the provision was simply that until a uniform tariff came into operation, book-keeping should be carried on. But a scheme was proposed by which revenue was to be received and then paid back to the various states after the deduction of the amount for federal expenditure. I say that that is impossible unless you have some principle laid down by which you will determine the proportion in which you will make the return to each separate state of the commonwealth. Then we have the proposal which was made by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, this morning, to return to every state a fixed sum which maybe based on the last five or ten years, or may be arrived at in some other way, paying every state a certain fixed sum in perpetuity. I will refer to the case of South Australia, to give an illustration as to how this would work. Put down our present customs and excise duties at £600,000 a year. There is a small profit in the Post Office, but that would be swallowed up by losses on other departments. it might fairly be assumed that if South Australia received a grant from the federal authority of £600,000 a year in perpetuity, she ought to be satisfied. But the defect in the scheme is this: that, whilst for the present it would be all right, what about the future? Is South Australia going to remain for ever the size that she is to-day? As the population increases, the cost of police and other local administration which have to be paid out of the state revenues will increase too.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

The proposal is to give that much at least, and as much more its the federal parliament may determine!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

I will come to that. I am pointing out the weakness of the system which the hon. and learned member proposed this morning so far as regards the grant of a fixed sum based upon present factor. We want elasticity, we want a provision for the growth which we expect in all our states in the early future, and the very serious defect of Mr. Deakin's proposal is that it does not provide for it. The hon. and learned member said that this fixed sum would be a minimum, that the federal parliament would give not only that but as much more as it could afford. You may make us this guarantee of £600,000 a year, but we want a further guarantee. Why not make a guarantee of so much per head of the population as the £600,000 represents, and as population increases let the amount of the guarantee be carried on with the increase of the population? If you do that you will be providing what would be a fair and equitable system.

Mr. TRENWITH:

It is the same principle in another form!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

It is suggested that we should not trust the federal parliament up to a certain amount; but beyond that we should trust them altogether. I think the two positions are inconsistent. I would rather trust the federal parliament out and out from the first penny, or else I think they cannot be trusted with regard to the balance over £600,000. I would rather trust them all through and give them a free hand. They are not aliens or strangers-we should trust them out-and-out. Or if we must have guarantees at their hands, let us take a guarantee that will be worth something, not only now, but ten, twenty, or thirty years hence. There is one other system, and that is the unfortunate sliding scale, which found its way into the Adelaide bill, and which has had short shrift since that time. That sliding scale was a child of misfortune-misfortune in that it was laid before the Convention and accepted on the faith of those who recommended it; never discussed, never explained-thrown into a cold world, without anybody to be father to it, and it has never had a show from that time to this. I am quite sure that had the Premier of New South Wales, when he tabled the scheme, explained it, as he can explain schemes-put the facts clearly before the public, as be can do-the public would have understood it; and if they had understood it, very much of the antagonism to it that has sprung up would have been avoided.
Most of the antagonism to it arises from absolute misunderstanding and misconception. As to the principle of the sliding scale, it appears to me there can be no possible fault found with it. As to its application, I shall deal with that later on. The suggestion was to take the actual facts for one year after the coming into operation of the uniform tariff. Well, if we take the facts we cannot be very far wrong there. That was only for one year.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The wrong year!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Possibly it may have been the wrong year; but that does not alter the correctness of the principle of the sliding scale. The first thing was to find out the facts for the first year. Let it be any other test year-only this trouble comes in: If you make it the second, instead of the first year, you have to keep the accounts between the, colonies for two years, instead of one, and that makes it considerably worse. It was simply for the sake of avoiding this book-keeping that some people are so fond of, that it was proposed that the test should be the first year, and the first year only. Then came another question: If we are to take the first year, or make a test year, are we to understand that the time will come when, practically, all over the commonwealth, the per capita contribution through customs and excise will be equal? I do not think we are far wrong in assuming that such a time will come. There are special circumstances in Western Australia today; there are circumstances of a special character which must prevail in New South Wales for some time after the coming into operation of the uniform tariff. No one can question this. But, surely, in a period-I am not going to say how long it will be-

Mr. WALKER:
Twenty-five years!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I am inclined to think the period will not be twenty-five years. I am of opinion it will not take twenty-five years for things to settle down and for equality to establish itself. At the beginning my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, strongly took the position that ten years was the shortest possible period which would see an equilibrium established, and perhaps he was right. It was as a concession to other colonies-chiefly Victoria-that the reduction was made from ten to five years.
An Hon. MEMBER:
Why Victoria?
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Because the representatives of Victoria held that the sooner the per capita principle came into operation the better. They would like to have seen the per capita principle in operation at once. They deemed it would suit them-naturally.

An Hon. MEMBER:
I do not think they looked at it from that point of view!
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
They never have!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
No, never. It matters not where we put this per capita point—whether we put it at five years or ten years—there must be between the first year—the year of test—and this per capita point, wherever it comes, a gradual approximation of all the divergent colonies to the mean point. It must be so. If it comes within five years, the sliding scale set out in this bill is right. If it takes ten years to come, then all we have to do is to make the period ten years, let the lines approach a little more slowly, and still it is right. The principle of the sliding scale cannot by any possibility be wrong. But do as we may, determine if we like that there shall be a certain fixed subsidy paid for so many years—five or ten, say—what then? Are we going to have an absolute collapse then? It seems to me, above all other things, what we want to avoid in connection with the finances of the federation is convulsion. Let us pass from stage to stage easily-step by step, up or down, whatever it may be; and let us have no convulsions. Convulsions, however they arise, in all financial matters, are a serious damage to the state in which they occur.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Under that scheme you still leave five years as the per capita basis—the parliament to decide!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
But the scheme in the bill contemplated that the inequalities should adjust themselves in five years, and therefore that the distribution should be on a per capita basis.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
You leave the amount absolutely open. You must trust the parliament then?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

Yes; but the principle which is to guide them in their distribution is that, an equal amount per head being assumed to be collected in each colony, an equal amount per head would have to be distributed to each colony. The principle of the sliding scale being the only one to avoid these convulsions, the only one which will bring the colonies which are above the average gradually and by a slow course down to the average-the only one which will bring the colonies that are far below the average by slow degrees up to it-must be right, and must be wise. The only points for discussion are as to the year of test, and as to the length of the time during which the sliding scale shall apply-whether it shall be for five, seven, or ten years, or any other period. These are points open to discussion; but, as to the value and fairness of the sliding scale, it seems to me there can be no question. However, all these are matters of very considerable difficulty, and in all of them we are dealing with questions with which we are not face to face. We are trying to leap over the stile before we come to it. While most of the words of Sir Samuel Griffith are words of wisdom, I do not think those he used with reference to the finances of the commonwealth are words of such wisdom as he is accustomed to exhibit. Are we or are we not justified in trusting the federal parliament? There are two or three reasons why we should trust them. In the first place, they will have the facts and figures before them-we have not. They will know what the result of the tariff is-we do not. They will know the special conditions that prevail at that time. Which of us can say what they will be? Reference has already been made to the extraordinary and unexpected developments in South Australia during the last three or four years. Who shall say where the next development will be? It may be in New South Wales, it may be in Tasmania-who is to say? We know that the prospects of the mining industry in Tasmania were, perhaps, never so bright before as they are now, and, that being so, it may be that Tasmania will be the place which next will boom, and where the next extraordinary growth and development will take place. There is another part of the commonwealth-a part that is too often forgotten, though it ought not to be, for we have one here who is a special representative of it in the local Parliament-a part less known than Tasmania, and with a smaller population. I refer to the northern territory of South Australia. It may be that these new developments, these advances by leaps and bounds, will next be seen there, and, if that be so, then it will be Northern Australia, and not Western Australia, where these special alterations will come about. That being the case, as we cannot foresee these things, cannot measure them, cannot forecast what their nature or direction will be, is it wise for us to attempt to leap this stile before we come to it? It seems to me that there is a great deal indeed to be said for leaving this matter to the federal parliament to be dealt with. There are one or two reservations I wish to make. If, instead of our having taken the financial problem first, we had taken the constitutional problem first—if, this afternoon, we knew what would be the constitution of the senate, what its relations to the house of representatives, I should be prepared personally to make a very clear utterance as to whether I would or would not trust the coming federal parliament; but as that question is not settled I cannot say whether I will or will not trust it. At least, however, I say this: Given a constitution of both houses of the federal parliament, which is fair to the larger states and to the smaller ones, then I am prepared to trust this matter, as I trust many other matters of very great importance, to the coming federal parliament, believing it can and will, with the knowledge and information which it will possess, do fairly by all the states within the commonwealth. If one thing more than another were necessary to induce me to trust the coming parliament, it is this: that we have with us in the position of absolutely requiring large and generous treatment at the hands of the federal authority in the matter of finance, the great colony of Victoria. I say it without any reflection on Victoria; I say it as simply the utterance of an undoubted fact, that Victoria can as little afford, as can any of the smaller states afford, to lose a very large portion of its revenue. Therefore the smaller states may feel secure, seeing that they have with them in their difficulties, the great colony of Victoria. They are safe in taking the same side as it will have to take, and in being sure that the treatment which will be meted out to them, will be fair and liberal. I end this part of my speech by stating what I stated at the beginning—that I have rather sought to show reasons why the various schemes suggested would not do than to set up any new scheme of my own. I have said what I have said with a view to saving time. If I have shown that any scheme over which much time might have been spent will not do, and that there are radical difficulties which make it impossible to accept it—if I have thus saved debate I have saved time. I now come to a word or two on the important question of the debts and economies which may be practised by the federal authority. If it could be shown that the federal authority could make any large savings, that it could by any means at all economise to the extent of the loss of revenue through intercolonial free-trade, and the cost of the new machinery of federation, the way would, indeed, be easy. I want to refer to one fact bearing on this point. It has been said that the loss through intercolonial free-trade would be over £1,000,000 per annum.
Without Queensland this loss would be very much diminished. I hope Queensland will come in, but should Queensland stay out, it will reduce by practically one-half the loss on intercolonial free-trade, and make so much smaller the difficulty. with which I am going to deal. We will assume, for the moment, that Queensland will come in, and that the amounts to be made up are, roundly, £1,000,000 loss of revenue through intercolonial free-trade-lost to the states, but gained to the people, who will not have to pay the duty-and about £300,000 for the new machinery, or a total of £1,300,000 a year. If it were possible to show to the electors, who will have to vote on this question ultimately, that the federal authority could make a saving of that amount, our way would be easy. Can it be so shown? I am not in favour of the railways being taken over by the federal authority. Many of the railways have been constructed with a view, not to direct but to indirect return-with a view to the value they give the Crown lands through which they pass; and the traffic is maintained on them, not because of the profit arising from them, but because by means of that traffic the profitable occupation of large areas of country is made possible. If the railways were to pass into the hands of some federal authority, I can conceive at once that lines such as these would be little used. Naturally a federal authority, having no local interest in the Crown lands, having no interest in the development of local industries, would run the lines upon commercial principles. Where the trains paid they would be run as frequently as they paid, and where they did not pay they would be run as infrequently as possible. That will not suit us. I do not think it will suit any of the states that the lines should be run on those principles. I do not admit, therefore, that any saving can be held out before the eyes of our constituents resulting from anything to be done with the railways; but I do believe that very large savings can accrue, as time goes on, from the proper handling of our public debts. but if we are to obtain these advantages, we must move with very great judgment. A declaration that, on the coming into being of the commonwealth, all these debts shall be assumed by the commonwealth, would be an act of the utmost folly. Can I illustrate that? I am amazed that there is any necessity for illustration; and yet, when I read some of the articles in the newspapers, when I hear some people talking, it really does appear to me to be necessary that some illustration should be given of the folly of the suggestion to which I have referred. Let the illustration be this: Here are five persons who have a fairly good commercial standing, whose paper is regarded as being good - perhaps not quite gilt-edged, but good enough; and to them comes another of the highest possible standing, whose name is good enough, not only for the five together, but for far beyond that. This one with his huge security, comes to the others and at once takes over all their liabilities. Do not hon. members see that he has made a present of an enormous advantage to the holders of the securities of the five persons? The paper was worth so much when the individual security of the five persons alone was behind it, but now that the security not only of the five but of the greater power is behind it, the paper is worth so much more.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
At the same rate of interest!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Interest is one thing, security is another. I believe that if a federal loan were offered, better terms could be got for it than for any state loan. What does that mean? Undoubtedly, it means that the credit of the commonwealth will be better than the credit of any individual state in it.

An Hon. MEMBER:
How would the state be injured?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
The state would certainly be injured. Surely the hon. member sees my point.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
Surely the hon. member sees the point that the interest must come down!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The hon. member means in case of conversion!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Certainly. The point is so clear that I thought the mere statement of it would convince everybody of the force of the argument. We have in these colonies a certain public debt today. Behind it there is only the security of the individual colonies who incurred the debt; but if, by some act of the Imperial Parliament, there were placed behind the whole of this debt-every million of it-not merely the state security, which is behind it to-day, but the commonwealth security, we should give an enormous advantage to the holders of the securities.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
But it would be only if you wanted to convert. If the loans expired it would not affect it at all.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I will take an example again. Our South Australian 3 per cents. to-day stand at about 101-a little more, I think. If the federal authority came into being with such a provision in the constitution as that which I have heard argued for, at once the federal security would be behind the South Australian loan, and that South Australian stock would go up in the London market from 101, to what-103, 104? And do you not see that the very moment that that takes place, a bonus of 3 or 4 per cent. is given to the present bond and stock holders?

An Hon. MEMBER:
How does it affect the loans you want to convert during currency?
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
We lose enormously.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
Not unless you want to carry out a conversion scheme!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
But we do want to carry a conversion scheme through. I am showing that the state stocks in the London market would go up 3 or 4 per cent. directly the commonwealth security came behind it, and that that bonus would be a present that we should give for nothing on earth to the bond and stock holders. To give it to them for nothing would be the greatest folly of which any sane man could be guilty. I want to retain that bonus for the people, and I say that it must be retained for them, and that getting hold of that bonus is about the best plan I can suggest for paying the expenses of the federation, and the best argument for recommending federation to the people. How are you going to get hold of it for the people? Not by putting, in the bill to be passed by the Imperial Parliament a provision which gives away the whole position for nothing-a provision that from and after the passing of the act the commonwealth shall be responsible for the states debts-nothing of the kind. I started by saying that articles in the newspapers suggested that we should give away this enormous advantage which we should certainly keep in our own hands-that we should give away this bonus for nothing.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
It is said that if you take over the debts without the assets they represent, the enhanced credit which the commonwealth would otherwise give to the states would not accrue. I mention this because it has been the subject of great discussion in the Parliament here. That is what is urged. I do not hold that view, but I want my hon. friend to deal with it.
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
My own opinion is that the British bondholder looks much more to the number of people behind the debt, and to the prosperity of the colony, than to the purposes for which the money is to be spent.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
That is the answer I made!
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

And that so long as we do not borrow too largely it does not much matter whether railways or other assets are behind the debt. The stockholders will look at the tax-paying capacity of the people, and not at the assets. I hope that we shall take care to guard ourselves by providing that the commonwealth may take over the loans of the states—that we may place the federal security behind them—but will so leave the matter that, in every case, we may give the federal security if, and only if, those who hold our bonds and stock will offer to make it worth our while to give them a larger security than we have now to offer. If we do that, we shall be able to go a long way towards paying all the expenses of this federation without putting any increased burden on the people, and without loss of revenue to the states. I hope, however, that we shall be very careful to provide that there shall be no rushing of this matter, for the nearer we come to the dates of expiry of these loans—to the dates when they will fall in by effluxion of time—the better the terms we can make with those who hold our bonds and stocks; and, therefore, while this is a matter which must be left entirely to the federal government and to the federal treasurer, we should provide in the financial clauses of the bill in such a way as to let the people see that we are keeping in our hands all the power we can with the view of exploiting all these debts in their favour and interest.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Is the hon. member in favour of the states being required to give their consent to the taking over of their loans?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

I agree with the hon. member that there ought to be a provision requiring the consent of the parliament of each state to any transfer of its loans, for otherwise the federal authority, at a time when the state was able to make very advantageous terms itself, might step in and take over its public debt, and might obtain for the commonwealth treasury an advantage which by right belonged to the state treasury. For that and other reasons, I think the local authorities ought in every case to give their consent to any portion of the debt for which they are responsible being taken out of their hands. In some cases the premium might fairly belong to the local authority, and in such cases they ought to have a right to retain it. There are many other points of great interest one might touch upon in connection with the financial position of the commonwealth; but at this stage I am not going to take up any more of hon. members' time. I have already taken up a good deal more time than I intended to take up when I rose to speak, but I have been led on by interjections and by the interest I take in the subject. I only hope that, if I have taken a long time, I have solved some difficulties which other hon. members may have felt, and which they themselves might have spent some time in discussing hereafter. I thank hon. members heartily for the kindly way in which they have listened to me.

The Hon. Sir JAMES LEE-STEERE (Western Australia)[3.58]:

I think it is necessary that one of the representatives of Western Australia should rise now to state why it is we find some difficulty in accepting the financial provisions of the bill as agreed to in the Convention at Adelaide. We have been taunted by some saying that Western Australia does not want federation. We certainly cannot see our way to enter the commonwealth parliament under the present financial clauses of the bill. I think that every member of the Convention is aware of that fact. We were not present in the Adelaide session at the time these financial clauses were discussed there-they were brought forward after the Western Australian delegates had left Adelaide to return to Western Australia-and, therefore, hon. members cannot say that we are at all responsible for the financial provisions which were placed in the bill at Adelaide. I do not altogether agree with some hon. members, who say that the statistics prepared by the statisticians of the different colonies are fallacious. Perhaps they are not in accordance with the wishes or ideas of some hon. members, because they place their colonies in a position they do not like to see them placed in. But considering that the statistists of New South Wales, Tasmania, and Western Australia all agree pretty well as to the amount which Western Australia would lose, I cannot think that their statements are incorrect.

An Hon. MEMBER:

-The Hon. Sir JAMES LEE-STEERE:

That may be the case, but I do not think their statements are incorrect. In the first place we should stand very unfairly in relation to the other colonies if we gave up the amount of customs duties which we should have to give up. Our customs duties in the last financial year amounted to £7 15s. per head of the population, while I think the average amount received by the rest of the Australasian colonies was only about £2 per head. Thus it will be seen at once in what a disadvantageous position we should be placed by giving up this amount of customs duties. I know that it is said that in Western Australia we are in an abnormal position. Perhaps we are; but in my opinion this abnormal position will continue for some considerable time yet. I do not acknowledge that these are boom times in Western Australia, if by a boom time is meant a time which does not last long, and is followed by depression. I say that the present condition of Western Australia, which is owing to the increased production of gold there, will continue for a long while.

An Hon. MEMBER:
But the customs revenue will fall off, because Western Australia will establish manufactories of her own.
The Hon. Sir JAMES LEE-STEERE:
It will be many years before we do, and it will be a bad day for the rest of Australia when we establish manufactories there.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Western Australia taxes manufactures pretty highly!
The Hon. Sir JAMES LEE-STEERE:
I do not know that that is so. With the exception of the New South Wales tariff, the tariff of Western Australia is considerably lower than that of the other colonies.
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
But it is heaviest upon Australian goods!
The Right Hon. Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
They have preferential rates in favour of foreign goods!
The Hon. Sir JAMES LEE-STEERE:
I hope the time will soon come when we shall not want to import so largely from the other colonies. I think hon. members will be rather surprised when I tell them that, of the total importations of Western Australia, which are valued at £6,493,000, £3,000,086 worth is the product of Australasia. The figures seem to me enormous; but I suppose that they are perfectly correct, because they are taken from the report of the Collector.

An Hon. MEMBER:
There must be special conditions for Western Australia!
The Hon. Sir JAMES LEE-STEERE:
I do not know what those special conditions may be; but unless they are more favourable than the provisions contained in the bill, I cannot see any prospect of our recommending that our colony should join the federation. Our own statist has put the case very plainly, I think, and if hon. members will bear with me I will read what he says.
The conclusion I have come to is that in order to be able to unite with the other colonies in a federation on the basis of the draft constitution, without risk of serious detriment to its financial interests, it would be necessary that the annual expenditure per head of this colony, particularly in public works (apart from that out of borrowed money), should be considerably curtailed, or that the colony should be prepared to impose a land, income, or other direct tax, so as to provide the funds requisite to meet the liabilities attendant upon federation. That the colony should defer the matter until the colony has developed its resources to such an extent as to be practically independent of outside supplies for the ordinary articles of consumption, that is, until the customs revenue per head assumes a normal rate, appears to be a reasonable course, unless the draft constitution is so modified as to equitably provide for the special condition of this colony when federated.

What would be the use of our going back and telling the people that if we entered into federation we should have to impose direct taxation or to reduce our public works expenditure? It is not likely that they would be in favour of federation under those conditions. In order to develop our colony, we are obliged, and for some years we shall be obliged, to expend large sums upon public works. Is it likely that the people of Western Australia will agree to give up to the federal government a large part of the money that is now spent in that way, or that they will approve of the imposition of direct taxation? I am certain that none of the representatives from the other colonies think that Western Australia would consider those favourable Conditions under which to enter the federation. I am pointing out to hon. members the difficulties under which we labour in regard to this matter. I do not consider myself a financier, and, therefore, I am not able to say what are the provisions which would be just and would bear equally upon all the colonies; but I have no doubt that the members of the select committee appointed to consider the question will be able to devise some plan. I am sure that we are just as anxious to enter into federation as the other colonies are, so long as we can be sure that we shall not be great losers thereby.

I am very much afraid, after the speeches which we have listened to today, that we are not coming nearer to the solution of the financial problem. I have been waiting in the hope that the representative of some colony like New South Wales or whose representatives must dominate the Convention in connection with a subject of this nature, would give us some idea as to the arrangement that would be acceptable to themselves, because they are hardly likely to accept any proposal coming from the smaller colonies.
Therefore, with some deference, I have held back. I am induced to rise now because of some of the observations of the hon member, Mr. Holder. I listened with great interest to his admirable address. There was the true federal ring throughout it, and I wish I could believe that New South Wales, moving on the lines indicated in his speech, is prepared to make whatever personal or state sacrifices are necessary with the one object in view of becoming part of a federated people. If we found New South Wales and Victoria moving upon such lines as those to which Mr. Holder referred, I am sure that the financial difficulty would be swept away, because in entering into this contract we should no longer be seeking to make a commercial bargain; we should be treating each other as part and parcel of a great state where the whole revenue might at first go into one pocket, and then be distributed ratably. I find that already my observations are causing my friends below me who represent New South Wales to smile. I am fully aware that a great difficulty of the whole problem is that we shall be as separate states subscribing to what will be the commonwealth fund sums of revenue which are disproportionate, and here I should like to dwell upon a statement which has been before us to-day-upon figures which we considered at an earlier convention, figures which have moved my mind over and over again, and from which I have never been able to sever the connection—I allude to those figures which Mr. Coghlan, the Government Statistician in New South Wales, published. Upon these I placed great reliance, because, in common with all, we know Mr. Coghlan's capacity, we know his determination to arrive at a solid foundation of truth, and for the three years to which he has referred I believe he has stated accurately the statistics of the colonies. If statistics be worth anything they should be considered in a matter of this kind. I am fully aware that in taking the years 1893, 1894, and 1895, Mr. Coghlan may have taken a period which so far as Victoria is concerned, shows her at her worst. Those of us who have followed the progress of imports, associated with a lower tariff than is necessary in connection with a policy of protection, must arrive at the conclusion that the higher the rate of duty the smaller will be the volume of goods imported. I have read two admirable papers by Mr. Pulsford, a gentleman resident in New South Wales. I referred in Adelaide to one of these papers which, with others, was exhibited to those of us who were associated with the Finance Committee. Allusion was made to the fact that while New South Wales imported a large value of ready-made articles, Victoria only imported for the same purposes of her people the raw material, there being £1,000,000 per annum. imported in the three years, year by year, by New South Wales and £750,000 imported by Victoria. The larger sum in the case of New South Wales was not a disparity which to my mind, indicated any serious error. Mr. Pulsford called attention to the fact that whereas in one article only in New South Wales, that of soda crystals, she imported all she required, Victoria imported none, the soda crystals being all manufactured upon the spot. I will carry the matter further, and say that while in New South Wales, as I believe, the great portion of the wearing apparel of the people, certainly of the masses, is imported ready-made, there is imported into Victoria only the material. In connection with the article of wearing apparel, textile fabrics only, that would represent a much larger value than any of us suppose. But passing away from this particular article, I come to those articles which are most revenue-bearing, and to which my hon. friend, Mr. Henry, has referred. And while he was perfectly correct in dealing with these figures from one point of view, there is yet another concerning which I feel it my duty to express myself with respect to the figures, although I may differ from the hon. member's conclusions. He appeared to overlook the fact that in dealing with the important articles of duty he gave to us-namely, sugar, tea, coffee, tobacco, spirits, and beer-he gave to us 53 per cent. of the whole of our imports. We may have in them a thorough indication as to the consuming power of the people, and we find that in a given year-1895-a year in which we began to return to the prosperity we enjoyed in years gone by-I pass over years 1891, 1892, 1893, and 1894, in which many of us were in adversity, and I come to the Year 1895-when, at any rate, the sun was beginning to shine upon us-we were realising a fair customs revenue. In that year we find a disparity between New South Wales with £1 18s. 7d. per head, and South Australia with £1 12s. 4d. per head on these articles, of 6s. 5d. per head, or one-fifth of the whole revenue in respect of these particular articles. There was that quantity less consumed in South Australia than was consumed in New South Wales. Now, what is the conclusion? That the consuming power of the people of South Australia was less, by reason of the fact that they had not so many miners, or so many shearers or so many persons engaged in manufactures as were in the colony of New South Wales. And we find that, so far as Tasmania is concerned, the disparity between £1 1s. 2d. per head as compared with the £1 18s. 7d. per head in New South Wales. These figures, therefore, cannot fairly be used with as an argument to show that there is throughout Australia the same consuming power in every state. Neither do I think the figures can be used with any fairness to indicate that we shall presently come-those of us who are poor-into the wealth-giving conditions of those who are richer. It may be true-I trust it is-that Tasmania is very gradually, and only gradually, perhaps at present more quickly-coming to the front. We are increasing our mining población, and there can be little doubt that each year Tasmania will be seen to so increase her £1 1s. 2d. per head as to approximate more closely to the rates of her neighbours.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Where are those figures taken from?
The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
They are figures compiled by Mr. R.M. Johnston, who will be regarded in Australia as a statistician of equal ability to Mr. Coghlan. I am quite satisfied that Mr. R.M. Johnston as an actuary and statistician is acknowledged throughout the whole of Australia, and I might say, throughout the whole statistical world, as a man in whose figures much reliance can be placed. The figures are taken for the whole of the colonies for the year 1895. Therefore we must admit at the commencement that there is a different consuming power between the colonies at the present time. I quite agree, however, that the positions at present, while they fairly indicate the spending power, and also the earning power of the people, may not last. Western Australia has given us an instance during the last few years of great change. In Tasmania a customs revenue of less than 12 per head in 1894 will rise in the present year to £2 7s. 6d. per head of the population. This does not reach the total realised by New South Wales, and we want to see whether in connection with the federal movement, New South Wales is prepared to receive the other colonies on the principle of equal partnership. If New South Wales will remove that difficulty the financial problem can be readily overcome; but if New South Wales wants to make a bargain with the neighbouring states, we have come to the conclusion-at which I myself arrived long, long since-that there is no other way in which we can equitably distribute the funds of the commonwealth except under an inter-state keeping of accounts. Now, almost all who have spoken on that subject deprecate any idea of keeping inter-state accounts, and have alluded to the immense difficulties that arise in connection therewith. I have never seen any difficulty, and the financial problem has been under my observation since 1891.

An Hon. MEMBER:
What about the cost?
The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
The bill of 1891, after the Financial Committee had sat, embodied the conclusion that there should be a state keeping of accounts for a certain period. The Finance Committee of April last, after sitting seven days, with twenty members present, composed of Treasurers and past Treasurers, had to arrive at the conclusion that there was no equitable method of distribution except by the keeping of accounts. If there be any state which desires to get away from this inter-state keeping of accounts, it is time that it should announce itself, and let us know what the problem is to be. The public, the press, members here and elsewhere, and in our various parliaments, have all been exercising destructive criticism upon the work of that Finance Committee. Although there has been plenty of this destructive criticism, we have heard of no construction yet, except by those men who have asserted the opinion that the solution of the problem is in the keeping of accounts. They have committed themselves, and have shown what the results will be. For instance, the hon. member, Mr. Holder, to-day instead of coming to the point and telling us the solution, what did be tell us? He arrived at the same conclusion as almost every other speaker, that we must remit this matter to the federal parliament. I do not know what there is behind. When I see so many with possible dissolutions staring them in the face avoiding this subject, and preparing to shunt the difficulty on to some body to be brought into existence by this bill, I often ask myself the question why it is they cannot face the difficulty now? If they would only face the difficulty for five years and let us agree that the keeping of accounts shall he for five years only, and that upon the basis so established you will have given to the federal executive an opportunity of gauging the future possibilities, we may accomplish something. But surely this Convention will not meet again now and dissolve without having inserted in the bill some proposal with respect to federal finance. To leave the whole matter open to the future is to say that you do not know how to deal with the difficulty, and that so far as finance in concerned we must trust to the future. £50,000 a year is as much to Tasmania as £300,000 a year is to New South Wales. I very much doubt whether any colony, be the amount £50,000 or £300,000, will be justified in going into the federation when it does not know whether its position would be that of a bankrupt state or not. The hon. member, Mr. Holder, reminded us of that at the last meeting, and pointed out how important it was to the whole of us that we should, at any rate up to a certain period, know what the revenues of our own country are to be. Treasurers now have to anticipate revenues for a year or eighteen months ahead, but how can a treasurer give any estimate of the revenue of the year that is to follow unless there is secured to him some definite proportion of the customs revenue to be handed over? It is, therefore, of importance that there should be some provision made in the bill to return to the states something like a proportion of that which they contribute, or instead that there should be one of the responsibilities of the various states taken over by the commonwealth, and thus relieve them. I would suggest that, while we do not wish the federal executive to be in possession of any large surplus, we may obviate such a possibility by casting on the federal executive the responsibility of paying the whole of the interest upon our debts. It is much more simple to deal with the whole than to begin to talk about parts. We talk about £40 per capita as being the proportion that may be taken over, leaving it for Tasmania to give bonds to be responsible for £7 per head of her debt, while Queensland would be responsible for £16, and the other colonies the same in proportion. Why not at once throw the responsibility of the whole of the interest upon the federal executive, and let the federal executive charge against each state the total amount of interest which it expends on its behalf? It comes to the same thing, but it will deal with one debt. You will then have a debt of Australasia, instead of having a separate debt for the commonwealth, and separate debts for the states. This leads me to an observation by the hon. member, Mr. Holder, which I should like to challenge. He was very clear in his intention of deprecating before this Convention the purpose of announcing to the world that the debts of the several states of Australasia were to be taken over, and form a responsibility of the commonwealth. Now, our present bill uses the term "may." That term was used advisedly on the assumption that the treasurer of the future, having such a power without being called upon to secure the cooperation of any separate state might, when the opportunity occurred, and it will occur, consolidate and unify the whole of the debts of Australasia. But I would add that I have no objection to the word "Shall." I do not see the serious difficulty which the hon. member recognises-a difficulty which I remember an hon. member on the other side, Sir William Zeal, alluded to on a former occasion, when I was speaking-a difficulty which is evidently in the minds of many here to-day, namely, that you are raising the value of your securities against yourselves. Now, that is just what I rise to controvert. Will anybody tell me that a bill of Rothschild for £100, bearing 3 per cent. interest, will be worth more than £100 a week hence if I get Peabody & Co., of New York, to put upon the back of it their names? Therefore will anybody tell me that the bonds of Australasia worth £110, and bearing 31/2 per cent. interest, will be worth any more when you obtain the joint and several guarantees of all the separate states? I would ask those who believe so, what is it gives value to the bond?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Why are the bonds of the different colonies at different prices to-day?

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
The bonds of the different colonies are not at such different prices as to warrant such a conclusion. The bonds of the whole of the colonies in 1892 fell down to less than 80. They all rose until, in May of last year, they were as nearly as possible on a par with each other, or within 1 per cent. of with each other. They have risen or fallen in proportion to the value of, money in the English money-market. My observation with respect to the hon. member, Mr. Holder, is that it is not the guarantee which you put upon the back of that bond which gives it value, but, seeing that the value and the security is already good-seeing that a 3½ per cent. Australian bond is worth £110 now-if you put the names of all the other Australian colonies behind it, It will be worth no more, because it is wholly upon the rate of interest that it depends.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
And the security!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
I started off with that fact, that if it be a Rothschild bond, you cannot improve on the security. If the rate is £3 per cent.-it will only produce £3 per annum, and an inscribed Australian bond will produce £3 per cent. if it is a 3 per cent. stock. If it runs up to £150 then your rate, of interest is reduced to £2.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
English censors are much lower than that!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
If then the rate of interest on its face value be reduced to £2, so much the better for Australia, because a low rate of interest is what we require. Therefore to assume that because we are going to back the bills of the states they are going to rise in some very important degree is a great mistake. They may rise to a small extent for one reason only: they may get into the preferent list for the investment of trust funds, and seeing the enormous amount of trust funds which cannot find investment in Imperial consols -which are reduced to £400,000,000 now -directly you can get Australasian debentures or stocks put into the preferent list, so soon may we expect the prices to rise; and they will rise, whether the stock belongs to separate states or represents the consolidated debt of Australasia. The price of money at home it is which varies the value of your stocks.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Why are British consols a better price than on our stock?
The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

I might almost answer the question with another; how comes it that whereas we were paying 6 per cent. for our stocks in years gone by we have now got them down to a rate which is equal to about £2 10s., because I think if we work out £110 for our 3 1/2 percents., we will find that it reduces them to about £3.

The Hon. C.H. GRANT:

One is a home stock and the other is a foreign stock!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

There are all sorts of differences. We have year by year been consolidating ourselves; we have become a people on whom the world is placing more and more reliance. I believe every year we live, as we develop our population, as we show a stern determination to maintain our credit, as we show an ability to pay our way, and particularly as we develop our mines from time to time, so we shall have the value of our stocks increased, and gradually we are drawing them nearer and nearer to the value of European stocks. Australian stocks, last May, were of more value, judging by the rate of interest which they were realising, than American stocks, and of more value than any of the stocks of Europe, except English stocks.

Mr. HIGGINS:

That is because there is no enterprise!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

No, it arises from a combination of two circumstances. The withdrawal of Imperial consols by reason of investments to the extent of £200,000,000 by Government officers in England leaves only about £400,000,000 of Imperial consols to work upon for the public generally. It arises also from the fact that money was very low in England-less than 1 per cent-while we were paying 3 1/2 per cent. face-value, or equivalent to about 3 per cent. on the market value. While money kept so low as that, our stocks must go up.

They will not be lower for another reason: that we are year by year becoming more and more a consolidated people, and every year of our lives now, after the fifty years of our free institutions we have enjoyed, is bringing us more and more credit before the English investing public. So soon as you consolidate stocks and unify them as to value with one rate of interest, and possibly make them an interminable security, with power to the commonwealth to renew or pay them within thirty, forty, or fifty years, so soon shall we begin to realise the advantages to which our friend, Mr. Walker, has drawn attention. I was very pleased to discover that my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, on his return from England lately, was able to tell the press that the time is fast approaching when the conversion of Australian stocks must be carried out. I was pleased to know that it confirmed the letter which Mr. David George had sent to our friend, Mr.
Walker, and it also confirmed other letters of equally important financial authorities which I am pleased to receive from time to time. The time is rapidly approaching, and but for our hope of an early federated Australia some of the colonies, although they may be small, would have moved in the direction of consolidation before this, and directly you do so move I believe you will get your money at 2 3/4 per cent., and then you will save not a few hundred thousands, but £2,000,000 per annum by way of economy. If you only allow, £1,000,000 by way of saving through the consolidation of your debts you certainly will then have secured a sufficient sum of money in the commonwealth to have rectified any differences which may occur in connection with the various states we represent. But we are, at the present moment, in difficulties as to our next movement, and we, as the smaller colonies, ask those whose influence must guide this Convention to consider that even though they may today be collecting revenue per head per annum in excess of that which is collected by the smaller states, we are all moving on in the same prosperity. No one knows which colony in five years will be to the front. It is very certain, therefore, that directly you have a uniform tariff, you will immediately begin to level down these disparities, that the value of the imports into Victoria will very largely increase, and we shall have no longer the disparity existing between the figures which Mr. Coghlan has given us, and the figures which we will realise under the uniform tariff; for directly we have that uniform tariff-I have no doubt that it must be a revenue-giving tariff-the return of goods imported into the colony will be increased and enhanced in value very considerably. I have been watching the result of manufactures in our small way in Tasmania. I have discovered that the small mills which we have put up have completely thrown out of gear the imports on which the Treasurers have been in the habit of depending; so much so, that I may mention two articles. Blankets and flannels ten years ago were largely imported-most of those which were used in the colony were im-
[P.93] starts here
ported; but now blankets have wholly fallen out of our import list, and flannels nearly so, and I may say so partly with respect to boots and shoes.
The value of these imports has fallen 40 per cent., and we know that the value has fallen in this particular instance, not by reason of the reduction of their intrinsic worth in Europe, but by reason of our local manufactures.
The intrinsic value of goods, of course, has considerably fallen off, but that affected equally Victoria and New South Wales. And when we have a uniform tariff established through the whole of Australasia we shall each be taking advantage of the ground from which we are now kept. We will have free-trade running throughout the whole, and no one can predict the immense advantages which we shall all realise. I sincerely hope that one of these larger colonies will give to us some indication of the purpose they have in view, because simply to discuss these measures, and to point out what the difficulties are, is not leading us to their solution. We all of us know the difficulties. Will any one put before us some substantial scheme which we can lay hold of? I venture to say that the best scheme, and that which is likely to be most useful to us, would be to take the whole of the expenditure and the revenue of any period which you may name—I would say so soon as uniform duties of customs are imposed and to make a return per capita to the people.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

I am aware that Western Australia cannot come in at present. As suggested by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, special arrangements would have to be made with Western Australia for the present; but as far as the other colonies are concerned, even including Queensland, it must be immensely beneficial. By dividing the total revenue from customs and excise per head of the population, there will be a credit in account for the amount due, and having taken over the whole of the responsibilities by way of debt, let there be charged to it the whole of the interest that is paid for that particular state. The result, according to such figures as have been put before me will be that when uniform duties are imposed we shall come out with this advantage: That the smaller state that does not consume so much whiskey and tobacco would get the advantage of New South Wales, which consumes the most. Queensland consumes a great deal more whiskey than we do in Tasmania. I think the proportion is as 6 gills to 4. Queensland, when they begin to entertain the question of federation, will be induced to federate by reason of intercolonial free-trade. Directly we give Queensland a free market or a preferential market for her sugar, so surely shall we establish in that land a permanent product of that which will be so enormously beneficial to her as to realise almost £1,000,000 per annum. of export. But we need not lose the whole of the million to which the hon. member, Mr. Holder, referred when we have intercolonial free-trade. Surely Queensland will not expect us to give up entirely our excise duty upon sugar? I have always taken care to guard my opinion. I express it so that Queensland may

An Hon. MEMBER:
Will Queensland come in on those terms?
The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
If she gets a preferential rate of £3 excise as against £5 duty she will sweep the markets, and give to us in the next five years, according to Sir Hugh Nelson's figures, 170,000 tons of sugar all grown in Queensland. She would have an entire monopoly of all the markets of Australasia for sugar. That would be an immense benefit to her.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That depends upon beet sugar!
The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
Beet has been reducing the price of sugar very considerably; but, notwithstanding that, Queensland now and for a few years past has always been able to meet the constantly reduced price of sugar, whether it came from the Mauritius or elsewhere. We do not get beet sugar in the colonies.

An Hon. MEMBER:
We do!
The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
A small quantity of beet sugar known as Dutch crushed, loaf sugar. The sugar consumed in the colonies is Mauritius sugar made from cane. We are not likely to import beet sugar. Queensland will consider it her interest to join the federation if fair terms are made in connection with the proposal before us. I hesitated to rise because I felt that it is beating the air. We are waiting for the Right Hon. Sir George Reid and the Right Hon. Sir George Turner. These are the gentlemen who must tell us what the-fiscal policy is to be. We are entirely dependent upon them, and unfortunately we are dependent upon the exigencies of political life.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[4.45]:
I do not rise to speak on this question. We have heard some very good speeches and some long ones. I think it would be very reasonable now to adjourn. I would ask the leader of the Convention, the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, whether lie will consent to an adjournment until tomorrow morning?

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.46]:
Under the circumstances, I think it is right that progress should be reported now, having in view the very great gravity of the subject, and also the very great assistance which I think will arise to the Convention, and to the members of the Finance Committee from some of the speeches which have been made, which, if I may say so, denote a distinct advance in federal tendency, and also a very keen appreciation of the value of the criticism, written and verbal, that has taken place since the last meeting of the Convention,

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.47] rose to move:

That this House do now adjourn.

He said: A suggestion was made by Sir George Turner yesterday in reference to the extra parliamentary programme that has been designed for the delegates. I think that is a matter which deserves consideration. I have had some conversation with the Premier of New South Wales on the subject, and, without undertaking to express any opinion whatever, I should like to say that I think there is a general desire on the part of hon. members that there should be no extension that can be avoided of festivities, at any rate beyond the present week, in order that after the present, week the Convention may be enabled to sit at night as well as by day. I do not forget that next week there are two occasions on which hon. members will no doubt desire not to sit. I need not mention those, but with those exceptions I take it that after this week it will be the general desire of hon. members to sit every night.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria)[4.49]:

I rise with great diffidence to say that there was a very strong feeling in Adelaide against night sittings, and they should be avoided. This is not the time to discuss it, but there are some of us who will only consent to them as a last resort.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

We sit at night elsewhere!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

No. I heartily concur with what my hon. and learned friend has said, and for my part am quite willing to forego all festivities. But night sittings are not calculated to produce that class of work that I should like to see in this Constitution.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I do not know!

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Convention adjourned at 4.51 p.m.
Commonwealth of Australia Bill - Leave of Absence.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.
COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
In Committee (consideration resumed from 6th September, vide page 94):
Clause 88. Uniform duties of customs shall be imposed within two years after the establishment of the commonwealth.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia:
In line 1, after "customs," to insert "and excise."
Question-That the words "and excise" be inserted-proposed.
Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[10.34]:
At the present time, it seems to me that no lengthy speeches need be made upon the question before the Convention. As I stated when the committee was appointed, I disagreed entirely with the action then taken, namely-to appoint the committee and debate the financial question in the Convention, subsequently allowing the question to go to the committee, and then having another debate after it makes its report. It certainly seems to me that by doing that we shall have two debates when one would have answered all purposes. For that reason, I do not intend to take up any length of time on this matter; but I cannot allow the occasion to pass without referring to some of the very able speeches made yesterday. I think the tone and the matter of the speeches delivered yesterday was of the highest character; and although I do not agree in many respects with the sentiments uttered by some of those who made them, still I must of necessity admit that they were very able. I notice that an able writer in the press this morning states, after giving the figures in reference to customs and excise as between the different colonies, that nothing more can be said, and the matter must be dropped from that standpoint. I should not refer to this matter, but the writer in question, Mr. Nash, of the Daily Telegraph, is one of the ablest financial writers we have in this colony, and I notice that he says that:

If New South Wales required even one-half of that extra million to be made good to her, the customs and excise taxation would still exceed £7,500,000. We regard the deadlock disclosed by these figures as complete and irremovable.

If we have come to that stage of the question, I should like to know what is the next course to pursue I do not, however, agree with that writer, able as he is. I certainly think that the first proposal which emanated from the Finance Committee in South Australia was the best which has been made up to the present time. True, the Convention did not approve of what was done, and referred the matter to another committee of Treasurers. I heard Mr. Holder—the South Australian Treasurer—in the able speech he delivered yesterday, say that if the sliding scale, which was brought up by the Treasurers, had been taken hold of by the present Premier of New South Wales, and had been spoken to in the manner in which that right hon. gentleman can speak in regard to figures, an entirely different complexion would have been placed upon it from the complexion which has been placed upon it by those who have had to learn it for themselves, and by the press. I certainly think the sliding scale, as submitted by the Treasurers, would never suit New South Wales. We should lose under that proposal, gloss it as we will, and we should contribute to the other colonies something like £800,000 or £900,000 a year. Surely New South Wales is not quite so blind to her own interests as to submit a proposal of that kind.

The Hon. Sir P.O. Fysh:

The hon. member forgets how much New South

Wales would gain by the distribution of her expenditure. She would gain half as much as she would lose by that course only!

Mr. Lyne:

I must differ from the hon. member, because in that respect I think we should lose also. The hon. member may think otherwise, but I must be allowed to differ from his ideas. I think that under that proposal New South Wales would in every way lose considerably. Therefore, its far its that proposal is concerned, I admit, with the writer of this article, that it must be placed absolutely and for all time on one side. With regard to the proposal made by the Finance Committee, after a very great deal of discussion, and after the insertion of the word to which Mr. McMillan referred yesterday—the word "aggregate" its far as the estimate and the distribution of the customs and excise were concerned—I understood that that word had a great deal fuller meaning than it seemed to me Mr. McMillan gave to it yesterday. I should like to state what I conceive to be the meaning of that word; and I think it was I who had the privilege of moving its insertion. Before that word was inserted, the proposal was open to much the same objection as was the sliding scale of the Treasurers. But the word "aggregate" was intended for this purpose: that we should take the aggregate returns from all the colonies and pool them, and divide the total sum by the population.
Mr. WALKER:
Including direct taxation!

Mr. LYNE:
No; but the customs and excise. Divide that by the total population, and on that get an aggregate amount of customs and excise for each individual throughout the whole commonwealth.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I said nothing about that!

Mr. LYNE:
I said it at the time, and I understood from the chairman of the Finance Committee when the word "aggregate" was inserted, that that was to be the effect of it, because we had some difficulty in inserting two or three words to make my intention clear. If that were done, the effect would be this: Supposing that there is a total collection of £6,000,000 per annum from all the colonies, and supposing that the population is 4,000,000, it would leave the sum of 30s. per head, applicable to each unit of the population. That would be the minimum that should be returned of the excess obtained by the federal treasurer from the various states.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
But that per capita distribution would exactly bring about the same thing!

Mr. LYNE:
I do not think it would. I may say that, as far as I am personally concerned, I altogether object to the system of book-keeping which was proposed, and which was strongly supported by the hon. member, Sir Philip Fysh, and by other hon. gentlemen. I regard the position we are in in this way: If we are to have federation, let us have it-let us have intercolonial free-trade-but, if you keep up a system of book-keeping on your borders for five years or,-as was suggested by the Premier of New South Wales in the Finance Committee-for ten years, you might very nearly as well keep up your customs duties, for all the trouble and irritation that would take place. We must, if it is possible to do so, arrive at some-it may not be accurate distribution, but at some reasonable distribution, of the surplus that is likely to be obtained from the various colonies by the treasurer of the commonwealth, and I take it that the first idea-which, I think, emanated from the hon. member, Mr. McMillan-that you must, by some rough and ready method, fix some hard and fast sum-it may not be exactly accurate-to be returned to each state-had a great deal in it to commend itself to hon. members of the Convention; but I think the idea of the Finance Committee in South Australia was the better one-that is, as I have said, to fix a certain sum per head of the population to be returned. I heard gentlemen yesterday state-in opposition very largely to what I heard them state on a previous occasion—that they were almost prepared to leave everything in connection with finance to the federal parliament. If hon. members are prepared to leave everything to the federal parliament, surely they might leave everything beyond a minimum of, say, 30s., or whatever it comes to, per head of the population, to be distributed as nearly approximately as they can possibly find out to the amount raised in each colony. It will have to be raised through the various customs entries, not intercolonial, but on the seaboard. I think that if something of that kind could be arrived at, and if we were to allow some power, borne privilege, and some determination to the federal parliament as regards the balance of the surplus to be returned, we might come to some conclusion; but I do not think that it would be wise to leave absolutely the whole arrangement of this scheme to the federal parliament after the matter has gone away from this Convention. Are we to declare that we ourselves are impotent to come to any conclusion on this question? I take it that in the federal parliament there will not be abler men than are to be found here—abler financiers, and gentlemen competent to final with matters of this kind.

Mr. SOLOMON:
They will have a very much freer hand!

Mr. LYNE:
They would have a very much freer hand, I grant; they would have a much freer hand to do injustice as well as justice.

An Hon. MEMBER:
And a knowledge of the circumstances of the hour, which we have not!

Mr. LYNE:
They would have that also, if you gave them the power of distributing beyond a certain minimum; but I take it that every colony, and probably most of all New South Wales, must see to it that there is some return from the federal treasury to the various state treasuries.

An Hon. MEMBER:
If we trust them for £1 we can trust them for £2!

Mr. LYNE:
I think that the state treasurers would be in a much safer position if they knew that they were to receive a certain sum back from the federal government. I cannot close my eyes to the fact that the whole, or nearly the whole, of the trouble on this question is caused by the present fiscal policy of New South Wales. I do not wish to drag into this debate any fiscal issue;
but I say that, with our fiscal policy of the years 1893, 1894, and 1895—even with a 10 or 15 per cent. tariff—we could come much nearer to this question in a much shorter time than we can on the, present occasion. If hon. gentlemen will look at the figures that have been submitted by our Statistician, and by his assistant since he has been away, they will see that the whole trouble is based on the absence of any reliable or approximate information in regard to importations into New South Wales, to be brought here under a uniform tariff of customs duties. I, therefore, think that our trouble at the present moment is attributable to a large extent—almost wholly—to the fact that we have not such a fiscal policy, to some extent, as they have in the other colonies, How are we going to get over that difficulty? We proposed at the Adelaide Convention to go back to the years 1893, 1894, and 1895. We took those years to get over the difficulty to which I am referring. In those years we had a low tariff in the shape of 10 or 15 per cent., but under that tariff we had a certain customs revenue, which brought us a little nearer to the position the other colonies are in at the present time, and therefore at Adelaide we at once took those particular years to try and assimilate the returns that had to be made and the amounts that would be

collected from the various states. I altogether cast on one side the idea-so assiduously put forward by our Statistician, and I think also by the Premier of New South Wales—that if you take as the basis all the importations into this colony under our free-trade tariff, and put on the top of that basis the tariff of Victoria, or of any of the other colonies, you will get a certain result. That, it must be patent to every hon. gentleman, is an absurdity. As the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, very rightly said yesterday, as in Victoria, with the increase of duties and with the decrease of duties, the rise and the fall of the importations was marked, so it would be in New South Wales.
With an increase of duties under a uniform tariff, we would have a decrease of importations, and probably an increase of the local manufactures in our colony, which was also referred to by the hon.
member, Mr. Deakin, yesterday, when he pointed out that the consumption of the people was perhaps not less in Victoria than in New South Wales, but that the result of a protective tariff decreased the importations, and increased the local manufactures, which fact was not taken into account at all. Under those circumstances, with an alteration in our tariff, we would necessarily have such a result, and, instead of getting over £3,000,000 return in this colony, as suggested by some of the figures that I have seen—£1,000,000, or £1,500,000, or £1,250,000 more than any other colony—that would probably be brought down to the sum which we in New South Wales received in 1893, when, I think, we obtained about £2,500,000 or £2,600,000 through the customs. That was before the effect of the 10 per cent. duty was felt in this colony. Our importations during 1894 and 1895 decreased to about £2,100,000, mainly because of the manufacturing which was induced in our own colony. With the application of a reasonable tariff - and I do not wish it to be imagined that the tariff under the federal union would be a prohibitive one - our imports would decrease, and probably, with our present population, we should obtain somewhere about £2,500,000 a year through the customs. On these figures we must base our calculations if we are going to come nearer to federation at the present time. I say that there is no insurmountable difficulty to be got over in meeting the other colonies. For these reasons, I think that the statement made in the paper to which I have referred, is absolutely erroneous. I go further than that, and I say that I do not think this colony will allow this important question, which so vitally affects the financial interests of the community, to be left entirely to the federal parliament. I am satisfied that this colony, if it accepts any constitution bill at all, will require the laying down of some definite lines, at any rate so far as the minimum return to be obtained. I was pleased to hear the statement made by my hon. friend, Mr. McMillan, on this question yesterday. We all know that he is a freetrader, just as everyone in this colony knows that I am a protectionist. But Mr. McMillan recognises that there will be, and can be, no union without a uniform customs tariff - I believe a very strongly protectionist tariff. He stated yesterday that that tariff must be fair, and that this colony, together with the other colonies, must accept it. So far as that goes, I think that the people of this colony would be quite prepared to take such a tariff, whatever it might be, and to leave it to the federal parliament to deal with finally. Some of the extreme free-traders do not, and would not, agree to anything of the kind; but that such a thing must come there can be no doubt. If anything so absurd should take place that it did not come, what would be the result? The result must be that, without your customs tariff, the whole of your revenue, or nearly the whole of it, must be raised by direct taxation. The states would have the power to raise revenue in that way, and the commonwealth finances would at any rate have to be supplemented by direct taxation. But I ask any hon. gentleman if in his sane senses he believes that the people of these communities would agree to wipe away all customs duties except such as are in force in New South Wales at the present time, and to apply direct taxation in two or three different forms. I one reason why I feel that we should come to some decision upon the minimum to be returned is that if the states do not get a return from the federal treasurer, each state will be crippled to a very large extent in carrying out its local work. I may be permitted to say to the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, that one part of his speech was not quite so strong as the rest of it, and that was where he said, "Let the federal parliament deal directly with the expenditure of the surplus." He instanced Dubbo and Goulburn as two places where the federal parliament might expend money directly without allowing it to filter through the bands of the state. I interjected at the time that that was approaching unification, and I think it would be, because if you are going to destroy your states by taking away the money they should receive, and put them in such a position that they cannot raise revenue, except by direct taxation of a very heavy character, you must bring them so low that we might as well have unification, everything being managed directly by the commonwealth government and the system of shires and boroughs being extended all over the continent. I think that the proposition of the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, to expend money upon ordinary work in the shape of roads and bridges -

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I did not mean that. I did not suppose that the federal parliament would spend money upon objects outside its powers under the Commonwealth Bill. The federal parliament takes over certain departments, and must expend money upon them. It might build a post-office at Dubbo or at Goulburn.

Mr. LYNE:

Yes; but the hon. member cannot think that all the surplus revenue of the commonwealth would be absorbed in the building of post-offices.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Of course not!

Mr. LYNE:

That only brings me down to the bed-rock of the argument which I was using, that the surplus should be returned to the states, and that the distribution of the money coming originally from customs duties should be made by the Treasurers of the various states. What I say is that a minimum of something like 30s. per head should be fixed. I do not fear the trouble which is anticipated as to what will take place in the immediate future.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

It is the Canadian practice to return so much a head!

Mr. LYNE:

Yes; but even with the Canadian practice, as was stated by the hon. member yesterday, there is trouble, because the Treasurers want more than the minimum. How much more would that trouble arise if the commonwealth treasurer was not called upon to return anything at all? I can only offer the suggestion that a minimum of something like 30s. a head should be fixed. That would not take a high tariff to raise.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Suppose a minimum is fixed according to the customs receipts instead of at so much a head!

Mr. LYNE:

I have not analysed that idea; but the moment you perfect your commonwealth arrangements you lose all your intercolonial trade. We may obtain a great deal from Victoria during the first few years after the establishment of the commonwealth. At the present time, nearly, the whole of the machinery which is used in our southern and south-western districts comes from Victoria. I was at Wagga Wagga the other day, and one of the leading agents there told me that, with the exception of one plough which had been obtained from Hudson Brothers, nearly the whole of the machinery obtained this season in the south-western district had been manufactured in Victoria. The south-western portion of this colony is deluged with Victorian manufactures not only with Victorian machinery, but with other manufactures as well. I cannot see how you could arrange matters if you simply kept a record of the imports from outside. Otherwise the idea of the right hon. member might very reasonably be carried out. I think that it will be patent to him that there would be trouble in that respect. The trouble would be in the same direction as has been anticipated for the system returning so much per head. The probability is that New South Wales would import, it great deal more during the first five or ten years than any of the other colonies, and that we should not get a full return from that. I do not wish to reason in this particular direction; but I hope that the Finance Committee will take the matter into consideration, and that they will not leave the provisions in the bill in the state in which they are at the present moment. There is one matter to which I desire to refer, and that is a statement which fell from the lips of the hon. member, Mr. Holder, yesterday. He stated yesterday that he would be prepared to leave this whole question to the federal parliament if he knew how the commonwealth was going to be constituted; in other words, if he knew whether we were going to have equal state rights. That is what he must have had in his mind at the time. He regretted that the discussion upon state rights had not taken place before this discussion took place. The hon.

gentleman said still further as a reason for that, that he knew that the Victorian finances were much in the same straits as were those of the smaller colonies, and that, therefore, those colonies could depend upon Victoria's assistance in seeing justice done. Now, I took particular notice of the statement made by the hon. member, which means that it does not matter about New South Wales, so long as the other southern colonies get Victoria to help them in the matter of equal state rights. A number of hon. gentlemen stated at a previous meeting of this Convention that there was nothing in equal state rights; but surely there is something in it when we find such a statement as that to which I have referred emanating from such a high authority as is the hon. member. I regret that the clauses dealing with equal state rights were not considered before these clauses were considered, because New South Wales would then have known what she was to expect if that question were to be dealt with as it is dealt with by the bill at the present time. I cannot indorse the idea that it would be a wise thing to leave this matter entirely to be dealt with by the federal government. I am of an entirely different opinion. This colony has more to lose than have all the other Australian colonies put together upon this and upon every other question. I have always been in favour of dealing with the question of state representation upon a population basis; and before there is any commonwealth it will have to be dealt with on that basis.

The CHAIRMAN:

I think the hon. member is wandering away from the financial clauses.

Mr. LYNE:

The hon. member, Mr. Holder, was permitted to refer to the same question yesterday!

The CHAIRMAN:

The hon. member referred to it, but he did not discuss it.

Mr. LYNE:

I do not desire to discuss the matter. I simply quote the reference made to it by the hon. member, and I may perhaps be permitted still further to refer to that portion of the hon. member, Mr. Holder's, speech regarding the inter-state commission, and the powers of that commission, especially with regard to the waters of the Murray and the Darling and their tributaries. The hon. member spoke on behalf of South Australia when he said he did not wish New South Wales to have the power to divert water from the heads of these streams so that they in South Australia would have the bottle without the liquid. Now, there is no desire on the part of New South Wales to deprive these rivers of any water which would prevent the Murray in South Australia from being navigable. At the same time New South Wales must stand by her own interests. The question is intimately bound up with the development of this country. With the hot dry tract of country which we have in the western plains New South Wales can never agree to allow any authority whatever to deprive her of the right to use the waters of the Darling for irrigation and other kindred purposes. The hon.
member should just as readily trust New South Wales with the head waters of the Murray as he could trust Victoria in dealing with this financial question.
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I would trust the federation!
Mr. LYNE:
The hon. member is prepared to trust all the other colonies but this one colony, because he knows that it is this colony which, on account of her large population, has such a great deal to lose.
The Hon. Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
Will the hon. member point out what New South Wales really would lose?
Mr. LYNE:
What does she gain? I have not heard it stated what she will gain. The only thing I have heard stated is that in the future she will be one of a united band of Australian colonies.
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
With her immense resources she has more to gain than, perhaps, any other colony!
Mr. LYNE:
It is true that we have immense resources in coal and iron. We have the key of the position, and before we give up the key we must see that we are not put into an unfair position.
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
The key is of no use without the lock!
Mr. LYNE:
If the hon. member means by the lock a market for our coal, it will not be any greater under federation than it is at the present time. But I do not want to be drawn into these side discussions. I cannot see where in the first few years we shall gain at all. As to our having a larger area, I think the other colonies will have a larger area when they get hold of New South Wales instead of New South Wales having expansion in the other colonies. We know that a great deal of produce comes from the south into New South Wales. If that be so at the present time, it will continue to be so under a federation. There is a great market in New South Wales for South Australia and also for Western Australia - if she has anything to produce apart from gold - and also for Tasmania. At present we have nothing to send to any one of these colonies, and I want to know, therefore, where the great advantage to New South Wales will come in under a federation?

An Hon. MEMBER:
What about coal?
Mr. LYNE:
We send that at the present time. Victoria does not impose a duty upon coal.

An Hon. MEMBER:
But Tasmania does!
Mr. LYNE:
Tasmania has her own coal, and plenty of it, too. If I were a resident of Tasmania at the present time, I should be against federation altogether, as is the hon. member, Mr. Douglas. I do not see what Tasmania will gain by federation. She has the Sydney market at the present time, and she will have it in the future.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Does the hon. member say that she will always have the Sydney market?
Mr. LYNE:
I hope not. Make no mistake about it, if we had even the duties which we had a few years back, Victoria and the other colonies would be far more anxious for federation than they are at the present time, whether they obtained equal state rights or not.

The CHAIRMAN:
Is the hon. member of opinion that a discussion upon the policy of protection is in order upon this clause?
Mr. LYNE:
I think it is intimately related to the financial question generally; but I admit that I was drawn off the trend of my observations by the interjections of hon. members opposite. I did not desire to go into this question as deeply as I have done, although I admit that as far as this colony and the commonwealth is concerned the whole trouble in arriving at a basis is brought about by the fact that we are a free-trade colony, whereas all the other colonies are protectionist. A few words and I will not detain the Committee long -as to the proposed inter-state commission. I listened carefully to what was said by the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, and I think he did not quite strike the mark when he said that differential rates must remain while preferential rates were taken away. I agree that it is very difficult to distinguish which is a preferential and which is a differential railway rate. If there is to be an inter-state commission the logical result must be to take a point in Victoria, and to have a long-distance rate charged on the railways from that point right into New South Wales; and in the same way you could take a point in New South Wales, and make those long-distance rates apply to the railways running, say, to Hay, Bourke, or any other part of the colony. If you are going to make the alteration at all, you cannot have an arrangement by which there can be a low rate from the Victorian border to Melbourne and a high rate from the Victorian border to Hay, whilst from Sydney you have a low rate all the way through. If you have anything of that kind, the inter-state commission and its powers must fall short of what is intended. So far as I am concerned, at the present I am not in favour of any inter-state commission. I am only stating what will be the result of such a commission. It must be to give as much latitude to merchants in Melbourne to send goods into New South Wales and to take New South Wales produce to Melbourne as is given in the case of Sydney merchants. If you, by calling one rate a preferential rate, and another a differential rate, try to break up and interfere with the arrangement, you will burst up the idea of an inter-state commission. I take it that at the present time the colonies are not prepared to band over their railways to a federal parliament. Although the hon. member, Mr. Walker, and the hon. member, Mr. Wise, and one or two others are in favour of that proposal, I take it that the Convention as a whole is not in favour of it, and I do not think the interstate commission will be agreed to, because you might as well hand over your railways to the federal government as appoint an inter-state commission as far as the interests of this or any other colony are concerned. The inter-state commission, I take it, is for the purpose of seeing that there is no rate of any kind imposed that will interfere with the ordinary ebb and flow of trade from one port to another, or from one colony to another. Therefore, you might just as well hand over your railways to the commonwealth as to an inter-state commission.

Mr. SYMON:
Will the hon. member hand over the New South Wales railways!

Mr. LYNE:
I am opposed to it. I am simply pointing out what the effect of the appointment of such a commission must be, not as the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, said, to still allow a differential, but not a preferential rate. The effect of an interstate commission must be to give the same privilege to any importer in Melbourne as is given to any importer in Sydney. You might just as well hand over your railways to the commonwealth to be dealt with as it chooses, with rates assimilated all over the colonies, as to hand them over to an inter-state commission.

Mr. SYMON:
We will accept that alternative!

Mr. LYNE:
I dare say the hon. member will, but I am not prepared to yield it.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
It is only for the federal parliament to deal with them!

Mr. LYNE:
I know that it is only for the federal parliament; but we want to know what the federal parliament is likely to be, what its powers are to be, what are to be the mode of election and the powers of the senate. I agree very much with the hon. member, Mr. Holder, and I should like to know how the senate is to be elected before I can speak with freedom as to what I will hand over to the federal parliament. I am almost inclined to think that if the senate were constituted as I desire it to be, I might even be prepared to hand over the railways and perhaps the debts as well to the commonwealth. But that will not be the case if the senate is to be constituted as is desired by the hon. member, Mr. Holder, and his colleagues, also by the members from Tasmania, and perhaps Victoria. I am not quite sure about Victoria.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Does the hon. member know what the next New South Wales Parliament will be like?

Mr. LYNE:
I have an idea and a hope as to what it will be; but, of course, I can, not speak with any degree of certainty. No doubt the hon. member can speak with is great degree of certainty as to what the coming parliament will be like in Victoria. No doubt he and his friends now behind him will be returned.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
The parliament will be just what the electors make it!

Mr. LYNE:
That is what I want the senate of the federal parliament to be.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
But the hon. member will not leave anything to parliament to do!

Mr. LYNE:
That is not the case. If I knew that the senate would be composed in the manner I desire, I am almost inclined to say that I would hand over a great many additional powers to the federal parliament besides those I am prepared to hand over at present. It is not seriously, proposed to hand over the debts or the railways to the federal parliament; but what we do want is some reasonable scheme-I do not say a scientific scheme but one that will meet with a response from all the colonies, so that the Treasurers will be able, in the various state parliaments, to know each year what they are likely to obtain, and how far their treasuries are likely to be augmented by the return they are to get from the federal government, so that they will not be left on a sandbank, so that they will not be left high and dry by the federal government saying, "We will only raise so much from customs and excise," or nothing at all. The state parliaments would then be driven into such a position that their principal method of raising revenue having been taken from them, they would have to depend upon direct taxation from one end of a state to the other. At the present time the people of this country will not stand anything of the kind. If I can form any idea of the feeling of the people of the other colonies, and, I believe, of New South Wales at the present time, it is that there should be a reasonable uniform tariff imposed by the commonwealth parliament, from which, to a large extent, must be obtained money to carry on public works and pay interest on the debts. That directs my attention to a proposal made by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner. He desired, and rightly so, that the commonwealth should be called upon to pay nearly the whole, if not the whole, of the interest on the debts. What was the object of that? It was to ensure the commonwealth raising a certain sum of money through the customs, or in some other way which would relieve the various state parliaments, and leave them their railway revenue or whatever other revenue they raised to meet the expense of the ordinary administration of the states governments. That proposal was only another way of getting at what I am attempting to suggest should be done now, that is, getting a certain sum of money that must be returned to each of the state parliaments for the purpose of enabling them to carry on their administration. The hon. member put it in this way: that the payment of the interest on the debts, but not the debts themselves, should be taken over by the commonwealth and paid out of the commonwealth revenue. I am quite in favour of that proposal. That is a very reasonable way of meeting the difficulty. I unhesitatingly say that before we arrive at any recommendation at all, we must arrive at the conclusion that there shall be a minimum returned, not only to the New South Wales Government, but to all the states of the commonwealth.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[11.18]:

I think hon. members will agree that the desire of the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, to have the surplus returned to the states, on a scientific principle, is impossible.
Mr. LYNE:

I do not say that we should have a scientific principle!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

We have had various very able persons who have devoted themselves to the consideration of the proposals made, who have all satisfied themselves as to the conclusions they have arrived at, and they all disagree with each other. I think it is only fair to them to say that most of us disagree with all of them. So that after a very careful consideration of the scientific principles out of which this financial problem is to be evolved, I think we have come to the conclusion that the true note was sounded by the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, yesterday, when he said we have to trust the new parliament. We can establish no scientific basis. We are giving life and death powers of infinite importance to this body we are constituting; a body, as he says, consisting of ourselves, not consisting of strangers, who will work together in love and amity, and not as the colonies have from time to time worked-against each other rather than on friendly terms. They have got to be trusted some day, and cannot we trust them at once? The discussion which has taken place since the meeting of the Federal Convention has brought me to identically the same conclusion as was expressed by my hon. friends, Mr. McMillan and Mr. Holder. I think in substance we have to trust the federal parliament. There maybe, as was suggested by the last speaker, an interval during which there should be a minimum guarantee. I do not know that that would be difficult. It would be consoling to the public, and consoling to any treasurers, and there is this to be said in favour of it, that we do not know exactly how this will work out. The new parliament and the executive that controls the federation will have to find out how the thing works, and what is best to do. They will all need experience, and they themselves will, of course, need education to some extent, and it might be well, therefore, from that point of view, that there should be a guarantee of a minimum referring to some special year, which I would not object to being computed on a per capita basis in the way which was suggested by my hon. friend, Mr. Lyne. I do not think it will make much difference. I think, if anything of the kind were in the constitution, the results would be identical; but it certainly would be a recommendation of the measure to the people, and would give them encouragement to support it, which they very much need at the present time. Now, as to the fears of the disregard of the views of New South Wales, which the hon. gentlemen referred to, I am sure there is not one who disregards the views of any others. There is no colony that is not regardful of the views of every other colony. We have to consider how this federation will work out. Supposing the government of the commonwealth were handed over to the gentlemen who are here now, would we immediately set about to try to do each other injustice? Would the friendly feeling existing between us be destroyed in a moment? Would every principle of right and justice which we pride ourselves on possessing be suddenly dispersed, because we have a duty to the whole of Australia instead of a duty to particular states? I am sure that these things have only to be thought of by reasonable decent men to be repudiated at once as childish and absurd. The longer I dwell on this clause, and think of it, the more I feel inclined to give the most perfect trust to the gentlemen who will have to conduct the business of this commonwealth. As to taking over the railways and debts I do not think it is necessary to say anything about that at the present time. The whole difficulty at present is this question of the surplus. But it will not be a surplus for any time. One of the provisions in the bill enables parliament to take over debts. It is manifestly inexpedient to endeavour to make the dealing of the debts a condition of the constitution. It would increase the difficulty of the executive of the commonwealth in making terms in respect of long loans which will not expire for some time, and the same arguments which were used by my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, with reference to the railways will apply with equal force to this question of the debts, the same arguments by which he showed conclusively that it would be inexpedient to provide that this matter must be left to the commonwealth and not made a condition of the constitution will apply with equal force to the debts. But still it is not contemplated that this surplus will continue. It is not expected that the parliament of the commonwealth will not relieve the states of some of their burdens so as to prevent this difficulty as to a surplus. The surplus I look upon as a mere bogey. It is a matter which will disappear very soon after the parliament is established; it will disappear by being applied to the wants of the people by whom it was created.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

By the federal parliament. Taking over the debts, for instance, which was the precise point I was suggesting.

An Hon. MEMBER:

While the debts diminish the income will increase!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
So it will. I look upon it that it would be a wise thing to have, I do not say a permanent guarantee, like my hon. friend, Mr. Deakin, suggested, but an interim guarantee for five or ten years-I should think five years would be enough-based on the customs revenue at the time of the commonwealth, or at some other time which may be agreed upon. There would be no danger in the guarantee-there would be great confidence to the general public if that were given. Now as to the basis on which the return shall be made I feel very much with my right hon. friend, Sir John Forrest, the difficulties in the way of Western Australia joining the federation if the scheme adopted at the last meeting of the Convention were carried out. Perhaps they would have disappeared to a large extent, but at all events it was clear that Western Australia, I will not my in its abnormal state, in its state of extraordinary prosperity, would suffer to a very much larger extent, than would the other colonies, and possibly suffer so much that it would be impossible that she should join. Supposing the provision in the bill of 1891 were carried out, I should think that there would be no difficulty at all with Western Australia. Supposing the return were according to contribution, Western Australia, I imagine, would find no difficulty at all in joining the federation; and abstractedly that is the fair principle too go on, no doubt.

Mr. SOLOMON: There is no difficulty in doing that with regard to Western Australia, for there is no border!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER: There are difficulties in doing any of those things; but returning according to contribution would be, after all, as easy a method as any. I believe that after a while returning according to population would bring about the same results. But if we returned according to contribution we would be doing something which is abstractedly the fairest, and we should ensure Western Australia joining the federation. I do not think that this is the time to make long speeches, and, therefore, I am not going to say more now. I think the tone in which this discussion was started by the representative of New South Wales, Mr. McMillan, and which has been followed by all the other speakers-the speech of my hon. friend, Mr. Lyne, was, after all, very much in the same direction, although with some divergences-I think that good note which was sounded will run through this Convention, and that this financial difficulty, which seemed to be the stumbling block in our way, may be said almost to be removed, because we are all beginning more and more to understand that to trust the commonwealth when established is the only possible method which can be adopted, and that there can be no scientific basis on which the contribution can be established and continued.

We have all listened with pleasure to the speeches which have been delivered in regard to this very important matter, and I think we must all have come to the conclusion that the question we have to deal with is one so difficult that it is almost, if not altogether, impossible for us to place in thin bill in precise words a scheme which will be equitable and fair to all the colonies. From what I have heard, there seems to be a greater inclination at the present time to place reliance upon the parliament of the commonwealth than was felt by any of us-at any rate I speak for myself-at the former meeting of the Convention. The reason of that no doubt is that we feel that the parliament of the commonwealth would be in a far better position than we are, would have more information, more facts at its disposal than we have at the present time. The colony I have the honor to represent is, unfortunately, in a peculiar position in regard to this matter, and I am prepared to admit at once that the colony of New South Wales is also in a peculiar position. Our circumstances are not the same as those of the other colonies. In New South Wales there is a free-trade policy at the present time which, as Mr. Lyne has told us, makes it more difficult in preparing any scheme to bring that colony into line with the other colonies. In our own case, the great prosperity, as Sir John Downer has put it, of Western Australia during the last two years has given to us a very much larger revenue per head from customs than that received in the other colonies. On behalf of Western Australia, I must acknowledge the very friendly spirit in which this matter has been approached, as it affects us. There seems to be a disposition all round to mete out what is equitable and fair to us and to every other colony. We are in a peculiar position in other ways. We are isolated. We have no means of communication except by sea. We are a long way off. As I have often said before, we might as well be an island in the Indian Ocean as regards intercourse with these colonies, because something like 1,000 miles of unoccupied country separates us from the rest of Australia. We have few products, I am sorry to say, to export to these colonies at the present time. Therefore, the advantage to us of a free-trade policy would not be so great as it would be to these colonies, who now have to pay duty on the goods they send to us. In our case, we have at present little to send to the other colonies. Owing to the large introduction of population into the colony and the development of our mining industry, we do not at present, and are not likely for some time to come to be able to, produce sufficient for our own people. We have, however, one product in regard to which we would gain an advantage, which we should be able to export to these colonies, and which we are not able to send at the present time owing to the protective tariff. I refer to timber. Western Australia is noted for its timber; and we should, no doubt, be able to avail ourselves of the markets of these colonies to a far larger extent than we do at present. Then, again, we contribute about £7 per head of the population on account of customs-at any rate we did for the last financial year ending 30th June; whereas, I think, in these colonies the average does not exceed £2 per head. Therefore, Western Australia contributes through the customs £5 per head more than any of the other colonies. Then, again, the total imports of that colony last year were valued at £6,500,000. Of those imports about £3,000,000 came from these colonies, and if we estimate the quantity dutiable at £2,000,000-because we have a large free list-hon. members will at once see that £2,000,000 worth of products would be admitted without duty into Western Australia which now have to pay duty. That is a very important matter to us, because it would probably reduce our customs revenue by a half at one fell swoop.

An Hon. MEMBER:
It would help to bring you into line with the other colonies!
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
It would no doubt, but we should lose the money.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Put the duties on something else!
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The hon. gentleman says we can put it on something else. I know that is often said; but, perhaps, when the hon. member speaks he will tell us what we can put it on. I am well aware, as has been stated by other hon. members, that if a community does not pay the duty they have the money in their pockets. The only way-as was suggested when I made an interjection to that effect during the debate- is by direct taxation. Well, in Western Australia we have no direct taxation at the present time, and I do not think I should like to go before my people and tell them that we were going to give away our customs duties for the purposes of the commonwealth; that they would be largely reduced-reduced by one-half, at any rate-and the difference would be made up by direct taxation. We know what direct taxation means. It means taxing one portion of the community and letting the other portion go free. I have not yet heard of any system of taxation in these colonies which is applicable to every person in the colony.
other than that which is usual by duties through the customs. So that hon. members will see that we are in a difficulty in that respect too. I have not had time to give that amount of attention to these financial clauses that some hon. members have done. I freely admit that. But from the little attention I have been able to bestow upon the subject I have come to the conclusion that the proposals of 1891, with a little modification which I will point out to hon. members shortly, are far more equitable and far more simple than the proposals made in Adelaide. I am somewhat at a loss to know what objection can be raised to the proposals made in the draft bill of 1891. They seem to me, with a few alterations, to be altogether equitable, and, from my point of view, satisfactory not only to Western Australia, but to every other colony in the group. What we desire to aim at, I think—at any rate, that is my idea, and I think it ought to be the idea of everyone else—is to give back to every state the money it contributes, less the cost of collecting the duties and its share of the expenditure of the commonwealth on a per capita basis.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

How are you going to find out where the duties arise?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

What does the hon. gentleman mean by arise"?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

The duty arises where the goods are consumed!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

There may be a difficulty in that respect, but that is what we want to do. I am sure no colony wants to receive more than it is entitled to receive or wants to get any advantage out of this transaction. All we desire is that we shall get our own money back. If that money does not come back to us in the form of a contribution, it should come back to us in other ways-by, I hope, our obligations, or the whole or some portion of our public debt, being removed. I take it that the bill of 1891 does this. I am aware it has been criticised by some persons, and that it has been proved that losses will occur in some cases, and gains in others. I take it, however, that a little alteration in the wording of the clause will altogether prevent that. Mr. Lyne seemed to think that we are in as good a position now to deal with this question as the parliament of the commonwealth will be. I do not think that we are. In the first place, the parliament of the commonwealth would have some years' experience. Book-keeping, I think, would have to take place for some time, at any rate—whether short or long—and they would have that experience to guide them; and they will be nearer to the time when a decision is required than we are. We have to decide upon facts as they are now. We have to decide what will be equitable and right some years hence, whereas the parliament of the commonwealth will be able to decide, with the facts before them, close up to the time when the decision has to be made. In regard to the proposal that a certain sum per head should be guaranteed by the several states -

Mr. LYNE:
That would be a minimum!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Yes, a minimum. It se

Mr. LYNE:
I think every one is agreed that Western Australia must be dealt with differently!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
It means that New South Wales, Victoria, Tasmania, and South Australia would be guaranteed—if the amount claimed by Mr. Lyne were fixed in the bill—almost the amount of their present contributions, whereas Western Australia would be left in the cold.

Mr. LYNE:
I think we are all agree that Western Australia must be dealt with differently!

An Hon. MEMBER:
There might be a minimum in each colony!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Of 30s. per head was what was stated. South Australia would be guaranteed the whole of her customs revenue at any rate, and Victoria would also be practically guaranteed the whole. The figures I have show that the contribution per head is—I am referring to a year or two ago—Victoria, £1 13s.; New South Wales, £2; Tasmania, £2; South Australia, 30s.; and Western Australia, for last year, £7 15s. Thus it seems to me that whilst it would be very satisfactory that all the colonies should be guaranteed an amount practically equal to their contributions, if any suggestion of the kind is to find a place in the bill, the more equitable plan would be to guarantee to each of the colonies a sum equal to the amount received the year before the establishment of uniform duties. That would be absolutely fair to everyone.

Mr. LYNE:
The right hon. gentleman is fighting very hard for Western Australia!
An Hon. MEMBER:
Let each colony take a year which suits it best!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Hon. members may laugh; but it seems to me that there is nothing whatever to laugh at. We may take one year or three years-an average of two or three years and guarantee each colony an amount equal to that average. I do not suppose that any one does not believe that the average would not be exceeded as time goes on. As these colonies progress the amount would be a mere bagatelle; but if we wish to give securities to the Treasurers of the various colonies-and it is an important matter, and deserves serious consideration, seeing that they have large obligations which have to be met-I think the proposal made by the Legislative Assembly and Legislative Council of Western Australia, that there be a guarantee for the various colonies of an amount based upon the average of the preceding two or three years prior to the establishment of uniform duties, a very reasonable one. It seems to me to be a far more equitable plan than the one proposed by Mr. Lyne.

Mr. LYNE:
That was not the proposal I made!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I understood that it was a fixed amount, applicable to every colony.

Mr. LYNE:
No, excepting Western Australia, as a minimum only, and to extend over a series of years!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Instead of fixing a minimum we might fix the actual figures.

Mr. LYNE:
But that would involve book-keeping for a number of years!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I do not think so. There would be the past as well as the future to consider. should like to say one word with regard to public debts. There can be no doubt that it will be a serious matter for all the states if the customs revenue is taken away from them for the purposes of the commonwealth, and the only real means of obtaining funds is removed from them. It will be a serious matter if the debts are still to remain in the hands of the states governments, and the states remain altogether responsible for them. It seems to me we shall find ourselves in a difficulty if we let go the revenue from the customs and the power of raising money from customs, and still have to find large amounts of interest which we have to pay year by year. I was certainly in favour when I came to the Convention of the parliament taking over the whole, or a certain portion, of the public debts. I should like that to be done now. I must say I have been largely influenced by the remarks of Mr. Holder yesterday. If what he states could be assured—that we would have additional security given to our stock by having the federal commonwealth behind it—I think it is a matter in regard to which we must pause before we provide in a bill that a debt should be taken over at once. I am not so certain myself that what he believes will take place will occur. I believe that the security offered by the Australian governments at the present time is considered by those who lend us money to be excellent; and if that is so, any additional security will not increase the price. I speak from memory—I may be corrected if I am wrong—but I believe the value of inscribed stock in Western Australia at the present time is as good as the inscribed stock of Canada. Mr. Holder, perhaps, will tell me whether I am right.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

The 3 percent. stock?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Yes; the 3 per cent. stock of Western Australia is as good to-day, or was a short time ago—and it ought to be better today, inasmuch as things have improved as the inscribed stock of Canada. A few months ago the Western Australian Government placed a loan on the British market of something like £1,000,000 at 3 per cent. It was the first 3 per cent. loan we had ever placed there, and it realised £100 16s. 10d. That was by far the best price that any Australian loan has ever realised. Has Canada, with its four or five millions of people, its immense territory, and its federal government, been able to obtain money at a better price than Western Australia, with a small population, but with a large area, certainly, has been able to obtain it? If it has, then there is something in the argument of my hon. friend, Mr. Holder. Of course, our ideas tend in the same direction as the hon. member's. We all think that, with the dominion behind us, our credit should be better than it is under existing circumstances; but the fact remains that at the present time the credit of Canada is not very much better than that of Western Australia.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It is much better in Canada now than it was in the provinces before they federated!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

That is not the point, I think. I can say a good deal in favour of the great colony of New South Wales; but even with its population of more than 1,000,000, and with its great resources, I take it that, as a borrower, its credit has not been better than that of the colony I represent. I do not think that New South Wales has ever floated a 3 per cent. loan for £100 16s. 10d.
per cent.; but, if it has, my argument is that the security of all these colonies being considered good, it cannot be very much better; that those who lend us money are satisfied that the security is good, and that we shall be able to pay the interest as it becomes due, and be able to repay the principal when it becomes due; and, if it is, I do not think that any little additional security on a good document will increase the price. If that is the case-and hon. members will think that out for themselves -then I say that it is our bounden duty at the present time to take over

The Hon. S. FRASER:
But increase of competition for the stock would raise the price!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Has it done so?

An Hon. MEMBER:
Not if the security is as good already as anybody could desire!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Then I say that it is our bounden duty to provide in this bill that the surplus, instead of being returned, shall be applied to the payment of the interest on the public debt, and that a proportion of the public debt of Australia shall be taken over on some equitable basis. Then I think that the number of adult males of the colony would be a fair basis. I think that we should not hesitate to place in the bill a provision that the commonwealth should be bound to take over a, proportion of the public debt of each state-of course each state being responsible to the commonwealth for the interest or the sinking fund, as the case might be-for all expenses in connection with it. The conclusion I have arrived at on this matter is that the proposals of 1891, with some modifications before I sit down I will read the modifications I propose-should be the basis upon which we should deal with the financial portions of this bill. It may be necessary-I only throw this out as a suggestion; but it has occurred to me that until parliament should otherwise prescribe there should be a statutory commission of two or three persons appointed to deal with the finances, and to approve of the distribution. There will be difficulties in the way, no doubt. Those difficulties must be overcome. I do not suppose that you would be able to get the exact figures-it is not likely that, with a system of inter-colonial free-trade, it would be possible to get the exact figures, and that the amount of duty that belonged to each state could be ascertained.
We know very well it could not be; but, still, we will have to make an approximation, and do the best we can, and I think that, if we provide that there shall be a Statutory commission until parliament otherwise prescribed, it might be the means of giving satisfaction to the different colonies, and make them more willing to go into the federal commonwealth. It has been suggested by several hon. members that Western Australia should have some special terms. I do not know that we want any special terms. I think that, if the plan I have suggested were carried out, it would be equitable and fair to all—that is, that we should be guaranteed a certain amount, based upon the revenue that we were producing from customs prior to the establishment of uniform duties.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Will not that be reduced in your colony in a few years' time?
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I do not think it will. I think that as the trade of the colony expands the amount will be very much larger. If we were to stand still and do nothing, and not go beyond our present development, the amount might perhaps decrease; but increase of trade must result in an increased amount being received from customs.

Mr. LYNE:
But would not the amount per head decrease?
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I do not know. The same argument that applies to others will apply to us, I suppose.

Mr. LYNE:
We are on the increase!
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I can deal only with the facts and figures before me. I do not know that we shall increase ten times.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Not in drinking power, surely!
The Hon. S. FRASER:
It was the same in Victoria in the gold-digging days, and it will disappear in Western Australia as it did there!
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I am not here to foretell what will take place. I am certainly not here to foretell that we shall be less prosperous than we are at the present time.

An Hon. MEMBER:
You might be in a great deal better position, and still your revenue from customs might become less!
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
If it is fair to all the other colonies, why should it be unfair to us?

An Hon. MEMBER:
Because your conditions are abnormal!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The revenue has been increasing for many years. I do not know what the hon.
member calls abnormal. I have been over six years in office, and every year there has been an increase, and I do not think that we shall go down all at once. At any rate, I see no reason why it should be so. It will be difficult for hon. members to convince me or the people of Western Australia that we should be treated in a different way from any other colony. We do not want any special terms. We only wish to be treated in the same way; and if the proposal that has been made by the hon. member, Mr. Lyne—that we should be assured of the customs we are receiving or have received the last two or three years or the last year, for some years ahead, say ten, and all the other colonies should be assured in the same way—is agreed to, I think we will go a long way towards meeting on an eQUITABLE basis. The alterations in the clause of the 1891 bill which I would suggest are very few. The first would read as follows:

The contribution of revenue by each state to the commonwealth shall be applied in the first instance in the payment of the actual costs, charges, and expenses incidental to the collection of such revenue, and next in payment of the expenditure of the commonwealth, which shall be charged to the several states in the proportion which the numbers of their people bear to the total population of the commonwealth, and the surplus shall, until uniform duties of customs have been imposed, and for five years afterwards, be returned to each of the several states or parts of the commonwealth.

I then insert sub-clauses I, II, and III of clause 9.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
In what proportion would the return be made?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The amount of the surplus contributed by each state would be returned to that state.

Mr. TRENWITH:
The right hon. member says, "shall be charged according to population."
Suppose the expenditure for services in one colony is very much higher than the expenditure in the other colonies?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
We say shall be charged to the several states in the proportion the number of their people bear to the total population of the commonwealth, and the surplus shall, until uniform duties of customs have been imposed, and for five years afterwards, be returned to each of the several states or parts of the commonwealth.

We then propose to insert sub-clauses I, II, and III of clause 9 of the bill of 1891, and to add these words:
  After the first five years after uniform duties of customs have been imposed, unless parliament otherwise provides, such surplus shall continue to be returned to the several states or parts of the commonwealth in the same manner as near as can be ascertained, and such returns shall, as far as possible, be made monthly.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
  That is as nearly as possible the 1891 arrangement!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
  Yes.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
  What is the difference between it and the 1891 arrangement?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
  In the 1891 bill the contributions from the various states were all lumped together. We propose that the contributions of each state shall be kept separate.

An Hon. MEMBER:
  How are we going to find out what it is?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
  It will be very easy to do that, if we have uniform duties of customs. The colonies must do the best they can until parliament otherwise provides.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)[12.2]:
  I take it that the object of this discussion is, not to force us to any definite conclusions, but to enable those who form the committee to gauge in some way the trend of the opinions of the Convention, and to become acquainted with the development of political thought upon this question during the interval of our adjournment. I think we may all congratulate ourselves that we have arrived much

[P.113] starts here

nearer to a solution of the problem in this respect, that we are becoming more and more convinced that we must trust the great parliament which we are to create, and are coming more and more to recognise the distinction between the principles which a constitution should contain and the functions which should be handed over to the legislature which has to carry out those principles. I think we are coming to recognise that there are many questions in regard to which an attempt was made at first to deal definitely which would be much better left to a parliament which will have more material, and will have circumstances more clearly before it than we have at the present time, I do not propose to say anything with regard to the financial proposals beyond this, that I cordially agree with the view expressed by the hon. member, Mr. McMillan. I also think that some proposal such as that suggested by my hon. friend, Mr. Lyne, might very reasonably be accepted to. My object in addressing the Committee was to make some observations which may, possibly, be of some use to those who have to consider this matter, in regard to the aspects of the railway question and the inter-state commission. I think it will be recognised that during the Adelaide sittings we did not come to a clear understanding of each others' views on that particular question. I think there was a tendency at the time to rather minimise differences with a view to getting to some kind of conclusion. We cannot postpone coming to a conclusion on this question now. It is one of the most important questions with which we have to deal, and not only affects the form of the constitution, but it is at the very basis of the agreement upon which the several colonies are willing to enter into the union. The first thing to be clear about is the idea we leave in our own minds as to what we want to do. When we have the idea of what we want clear in our own minds, it will be much easier to express it in the constitution. Above all things we must be careful to express what we wish in clear language, and with no unnecessary verbiage. The experience of all constitutions of this kind is that there gradually grows round them a great mass of decisions. The courts interpret them continually, and a body of law gradually grows up which is almost as important and as bulky as the constitution itself. We must be careful that we use only such words as carry out our meaning, and that no loose general expressions are used which may enable interpretations to be put upon the constitution which it was not our intention should be put upon it. I would like in this place to make as clear as I can the view I take with regard to the railway question. It appears to me that there is no half-way house in this matter. Either you must hand the railways over absolutely, federate them, and vest them in the federal government, which would give you the advantages of one railway system throughout the commonwealth, or, if you do not do that, if for reasons which appear to me, and I think will appear to most hon. members, to be good and sufficient, you do not wish to hand over the railways, then you must accept the position with all its consequences. It appears to be thought by some hon. members-the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, seems to be of this opinion that under the provisions of an inter-state commission it would be possible for the commission to fix upon some central point in the railway systems of the colonies, say Cootamundra, and to arrange for long distance rates running to the New South Wales and to the Victorian seaports upon equal terms. I think that the hon. member, and those who take that view, have rather mistaken the position in assuming that any such thing can be done. The position which it appears to me New South Wales must take up under the circumstances is this: We agree that these warring tariffs which have been causing so much loss to the railway systems of both colonies for some time past, must come to an end. Whether you call them preferential or differential rates, I do not think matters much for the purposes of my argument. We are all agreed that you may just as well obstruct freedom of trade by placing prohibitory rates upon your railways as by imposing prohibitory duties through the Customs-house. Therefore we must arrive at some method by which this can be obviated.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Would not the federation of the railways have the very opposite effect?
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I am coming to that. I am pointing out what a very strong, and it may be dangerous, weapon you place in the hands of any state if you give it the power of absolutely regulating its own rates as it thinks fit. You may put it in any form you think fit. Suppose there is a certain product coming into New South Wales from Victoria which we wish to keep out. If we have the right to impose railway rates in any form we think fit, there is no reason why a rate of a prohibitive character should not be imposed to prevent this article from coming into New South Wales. So Victoria in her turn might impose a similar rate. Take the case of stock. Supposing under free-trade all duties upon stock disappeared, it would be quite within the range of possibility for Victoria to impose such rates upon stock coming from New South Wales by railway as would practically have the effect of a stock-tax, or, vice versa, the process might be applied by New South Wales. I only point this out to show what a dangerous weapon would be left in the hands of the state, and I agree with the hon. member who interjected that the operation of it would have quite the opposite effect. In all countries where there are government railways or where the railways are in the hands of private companies in which you have two railways competing in any one district the effect has been to lower the rates of carriage to the persons living in that district. The general system of the railway suffers, but the effect no, doubt upon the producers, the persons interested in the carriage of goods to a given district, is to lower the rates to them. In that case you shift the incidence of injury from the producers in a particular neighbourhood to the whole country which has to pay. I therefore assume that it would be taken for granted on all hands that we must have some system by which the possibility of imposing differential rates against each other's products would be removed. Now it is said that that can be done by handing over the power to a commission to fix some general rates upon the whole of the railways running through the different colonies. But that cannot be done consistently with maintaining the control of our railways, and for this reason: Each colony has its own railway carriage on its own system, and with a view to benefit particular localities As a general rule the railways are worked directly for the benefit of the state's own Crown lands, and those lands have been sold with the knowledge that railways will be made as roads are made by the Government to render them accessible. I look forward to the day in New South Wales when, preserving the system in the prosperous condition in which it has been preserved, we shall make use of the profits, not by putting them into the Treasury, but by reducing the rates; and it is in that respect that the state railway system in these colonies differs in a very important particular from-the ordinary business concern of a carrying company. Our railways are not only managed with a view to make a profit out of the carriage of goods and passengers, but also with a view to the development of the country; and it is just as much for the benefit of the state that people should be settled on the land, and that greater facilities should be given for the opening up of the country, greater facilities to bring produce to the seaboard for export, as that increased revenue should be derived from an increase in the carrying business of the lines.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Would not the hon. gentleman allow the reduced rates to apply to two ports and not to Sydney alone, giving the benefit of the reduction of rates to producers, not only in one direction, but in the other?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

As long as you keep the railway systems separate, each colony will have the advantage of such cheap rates as can be given by its railway system to its own producers. I say, in the first place, that the plan of each colony keeping its own railways is advisable from the point of view that its own people will derive all the advantages that can be derived from their economical and proper management, among those advantages being the special one of a reduction of rates in any way, or in any direction which may be thought desirable. What I was about to point out was that if all the lines are handed over, if you have a system under which the rates are fixed by some authority in the commonwealth, altogether apart from whether it is or is not in violation of the constitution, what follows is this: Take, for instance, New South Wales. Instead of her having the benefit of the successful administration of the railways in the form of reduced rates are handed over, if you have a system under which the rates are fixed by some authority in the commonwealth, altogether apart from whether it is or is not in violation of the constitution, what follows is this: Take, for instance, New South Wales. Instead of her having the benefit of the successful administration of the railways in the form of reduced rates are handed over, if you have a system under which the rates are fixed by some authority in the commonwealth, altogether apart from whether it is or is not in violation of the constitution, what follows is this: Take, for instance, New South Wales. Instead of her having the benefit of the successful administration of the railways in the form of reduced rates are handed over, if you have a system under which the rates are fixed by some authority in the commonwealth, altogether apart from whether it is or is not in violation of the constitution, what follows is this: Take, for instance, New South Wales. Instead of her having the benefit of the successful administration of the railways in the form of reduced The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The experience of other countries is that amalgamation enables the rates to be reduced!
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
The hon. member will know that amalgamation takes place only upon a business basis, and I hope that it may take place by-and-by in our case. No doubt it will under the permissive powers given by this constitution to the commonwealth. While I think that each colony should retain the control of its own railway system, I say at once that that railway system should be worked in such a way as not to be used unfairly against the railway system of another state. For instance, take the case of Victoria and New South Wales in Riverina. I say at once that provision should be made in this constitution by which the cutting rates of the New South Wales railways coming Sydneywards, and on the Victorian railways, going to Melbourne, taking away traffic in either case from the other colony, should be done away with.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Would the hon. member have a uniform mileage rate?
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I say that it is not necessary. As far as that is concerned every state ought to have the control of its own rates within its own borders. The only restriction which should be put upon the perfect liberty of the state to fix its rates is this: that it should charge in all respects the same rates to the producers of other colonies as it does to its own. Take a concrete instance - the railway running from Hay to Sydney. I do not think any produce run on that line should be carried at a lower rate than would obtain upon the same distance anywhere else in New South Wales in order to attract traffic to our railways.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The hon. member wants to take away our only weapon for the Riverina trade, and to keep all the weapons which his own colony has!
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I do not see how that could possibly be.

[P.116] starts here
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
   By not agreeing to a uniform mileage rate

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
   The right hon. gentleman will see what a uniform mileage rate involves. I maintain that the country which has built the railways, which maintains them, and which has to hear the whole responsibility of their being worked at a loss, ought to have the benefit of any gain which may be made from them. I say it is impossible, as long as you keep the system upon that footing, to allow any other state to come in and fix a rate for you which may involve a loss to you. All we can expect is this: that, inasmuch as the railways of New South Wales adjoin the railways of Victoria, both being worked independently, that New South Wales shall not impose rates which will unfairly draw traffic from the Victorian lines, and, in the same way, that Victoria shall not impose rates on her railways which will unfairly attract traffic from the railways of New South Wales.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
   If you wish the advantages of geographical position, the only way in which you can obtain them fairly is to hand over the railways. In other words, the question must be treated in exactly the same way as if the railways were private railways owned by private companies.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
   If the railways were in the hands of private companies there would be a through rate!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
   That is a matter of arrangement; and there is no reason why such a thing should not be arranged. The only way in which you can deal with the railways is to treat them exactly as if they were owned by private companies, always with this proviso: that they must be worked in such a way as not to give unfair advantages to the people of one state as compared with the people of another territory.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
   In no country in the world are competing railways run on the lines suggested by the hon. member.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
   I would put the railways in exactly the same position as the American and English railways are put. You cannot fairly ask for anything better than that.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

Is any complaint ever made in America that railway companies charge too little?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

No. It is not my complaint; it is the hon. member's complaint!

The Hon. S. FRASER:

You say that we charge New South Wales less than we charge Victoria!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Whoever makes the complaint, it is not that Victoria charges less, but that she charges New South Wales traffic less than she charges her own traffic, for the purpose of attracting that traffic to the Victorian railways. That is to say, Victoria charges preferential rates. I say that should not be allowed.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

New South Wales does the same at Bourke!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Why? Because it is a necessity of the position that these things should be done. I say that that kind of cutthroat competition should disappear under a system of the kind we propose. After all, this is not a matter to be settled on any abstract principle as to what is right or wrong, or what is just or unjust. It is only a question of what we can best do under the circumstances. Speaking for myself, although I am perfectly willing to make any provision in this constitution to ensure that these unfair differential rates shall disappear, I shall be no party to any arrangement that will give a right to any authority outside of New South Wales to fix the rates to be levied on the New South Wales railways. The next question is—how have we attempted to carry this out in the constitution? I was one of those who strongly favoured the appointment of an inter-state commission; but reflection has satisfied me that, with the bill in its present form, it would be a very unwise and cumbersome way of dealing with the question. The inter-state commission provided for by the bill originally had its constitution fixed—that is to say, it was to be a commission appointed with a tenure of office as independent as that of a supreme court judge. That has been struck out. As it is now, it is simply to be appointed as any other officers are appointed by a colony.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The tenure of office can be regulated by the federal parliament!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I know that; but in the constitution originally submitted there was a guarantee of the independence of these officers; there was also a provision, which was struck out, restricting the operation of the commission to the particular preferential rates which I have pointed out should be swept away. That has been struck out. Clause 97, as it now stands, says:

The commission shall have such powers of adjudication and administration as may be necessary for its purposes, and as the parliament may from time to time determine.

Originally there was this proviso added

But shall have no powers in reference to the rates or regulations of any railway in any state except in cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect and made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway from the railway of a neighbouring state.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The New South Wales representatives told us that those words were put in for the benefit of Victoria, and I objected!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

The hon. member is mistaken in thinking that that was the case. The hon. member, Mr. Wise, said it made no difference, and I think it was the hon. member, Mr. Barton, who said that this proviso was put in for the purpose of pointing plainly to the extent to which the interference with the local rates—the rates on the different railway systems—should be allowed. There is no mystery about it; the words are plain enough in their meaning. I call attention to them now, because they emphasise the view I held, that the only interference that could be allowed is where railways are being run unfairly to the railways of other colonies.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It is to define their duties!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Yes; and to point beyond all question to the fact that there was no power given in the constitution to this commission except for the purpose of seeing that the railways were fairly run, and the rates fairly made in the various colonies.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Without that clause to point out the object and the duties of the commission, and without any guarantee as to its constitution, I should be opposed to the appointment of any interstate commission. Let me point out why. This inter-state commission would necessarily consist of men of some expert knowledge of railway matters. That, probably, would be a necessity. Now the duties which they have to perform are to execute and maintain upon railways within the commonwealth and upon rivers flowing through, in, or between two or more states the provisions of this constitution relating to trade and commerce. These powers are very vague and very general. It would be impossible to hand over with any reasonable anticipation of satisfactory work the duty of construing this constitution to a commission of this kind.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

The President of the Inter-state Commission in America is generally a lawyer!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

I would point out the difference between America and the state of things here. Even if you have a mixed commission, the duty of interpreting this constitution should be placed upon the highest judicial authority in the commonwealth, and it should not be handed over to such a commission as we have here. Therefore I have come to the conclusion, although I think an inter-state commission ought to be appointed, that such a commission should be appointed by the parliament under a statute passed by the parliament of the federation. Then you would be in the position of being able to lay down lines upon which this inter-state commission should proceed. You would be able to lay down certain principles and definite limitations within which they should do their work; you would be able to guarantee that they would have a certain status, with a certain tenure dependent only on good conduct, and in that way you constitute a commission which may have any powers you choose to give them, but which would exercise those powers on certain definite lines. Any inter-state commission, however constituted, in which you place the duty of interpreting this constitution, would certainly be a failure, and give no satisfaction to any of the parties concerned.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Is not that exactly what is done now in clause 97?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

No; clause 97 says:

The commission shall have such powers of adjudication and administration as may be necessary for its purposes, and as the parliament may from time to time determine.

The hon. member, if he reads that clause, will see that the inter-state commission might be constituted at once by appointment, without an act of parliament.

An Hon. MEMBER:

It must be by law!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

If the hon. member looks at clause 96, he will see that the parliament may make laws constituting an inter-state commission.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Exactly.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It would have to be appointed by the parliament!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

No doubt the parliament would have to pass some legislation constituting an inter-state commission. The act might simply be to constitute an inter-state commission without limitations of any kind.

An Hon. MEMBER:

So it might be in the other case the hon. member has put. You might leave the whole thing to parliament, unless you propose to abridge their jurisdiction!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Undoubtedly. I propose to leave their jurisdiction to be defined by the federal parliament within such limits as may be found to be necessary. I wish to point out that this interstate commission, as constituted in this way, is not really a necessity for the purposes of carrying out the objects which we have in view. Clause 52 of the constitution gives a power to regulate trade and commerce with other countries, and clause 95 is as follows:-

Preference shall not be given by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over the ports of another state, and any law or regulation made by the commonwealth, or by any state, or by any authority constituted by the commonwealth, or by any state, having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the commonwealth, shall be null and void.

There may be a good deal of vagueness about these expressions; they may have to be amended in some way; but, taking the thing generally, I hold that, under the power to regulate trade and commerce, and under the provisions of that clause which prohibit preference to the ports of one colony over the ports of another, and prohibit any rates which have the effect of restricting trade or commerce, you have quite sufficient power to carry out all the objects we have in view in regard to the doing away with these preferential rates. Under an almost exactly similar expression in the Constitution of the United States even larger powers than this have been assumed by the commonwealth, and decided by the great jurists of the United States to be within the powers of the Constitution.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Quite a different thing!

Another Hon. MEMBER:
The very opposite, the hon. member will find!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I know, and I think you will hear me out in this, that the words on which the interstate commission have been appointed are the simple words at the beginning of clause 52 of this bill—"The regulation of trade and commerce."
It is on these words only that, the United States have founded their right to pass the Inter-state Commerce Act. Perhaps I may remind hon. members of what the position of things is in America. The provisions in the United States Constitution are the power to regulate trade and commerce, and the provision, which is very much like clause 95 of our bill, that no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over those of another, and so on. These are the only two sections in the constitution which in any way deal with the matter, and under the provisions of that power to regulate trade and commerce the Supreme Court of the United States decided in 1886 the case between the Wabash, St. Louis Pacific Railway Company and the State of Illinois, and it was upon that decision that the Interstate Commerce Act was founded. This act deals specifically with the duty of the Inter-state Commission, and lays down certain rules which shall be observed in the carrying out of inter-state commerce, and it is all founded upon the power which is held to be contained in the constitution. If hon. members will read the provisions of this Inter-state Commerce Act they will find that they contain everything which can possibly be desired for the purpose of the fair running of these railways within the four corners of the act itself. All that power flows from the right which is given to regulate trade and commerce. Before I read the decision in that case I think I may have the assent of the Committee to this statement, that the interpretation of our constitution will be most probably upon the same lines as the interpretation of the United States Constitution. In both cases the law administered is the common law of England derived in this colony and America from exactly the same sources, and administered on exactly the same principles. I think we may take it that the decisions which have established certain positions in America in the construction of their constitution will most probably be followed here. The case of the Wabash, St. Louis, and Pacific Railway Company is reported in 118 United States Reports. The court said:

It cannot be too strongly insisted upon that the right of continuous transportation from one end of the country to the other is essential in modern times to that freedom of commerce from the restraints which the state might choose to impose upon it that the commerce clause was intended to secure. This clause giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the states and with foreign nations, as this court has mid before, was among the most important of the subjects which prompted the formation of the constitution. And it would be a very feeble and almost useless provision, but poorly adapted to secure the entire freedom of commerce among the states which was deemed essential to a more perfect union by the framers of the constitution if at every stage of the transportation of goods and chattels through the country the state, within whose limits a part of this transportation must be done, could impose regulations concerning the price, compensation, or taxation, or any other restrictive regulation interfering with and seriously embarrassing this commerce. . . . As restricted to a transportation which begins and ends within the limits of the state, it (the law of Illinois) may be very just and equitable, and it certainly is the province of the state legislature to determine that question. But when it is attempted to apply to transportation through an entire series of states a principle of this kind, and each one of the states shall attempt to establish its own rates of transportation, its own methods to prevent discrimination in rates or to permit it, the deleterious influence upon the freedom of commerce among the states upon the transit of goods through those states cannot be over estimated. That this species of regulation is one which must be, if established at all, of a general and national character, and cannot be safely and wisely remitted to local rules and local regulations, we think is clear, from what has already been said. And if it be a regulation of commerce, as we think we have demonstrated it is, and as the Illinois Court concedes it to be, it must be of that national character, and the regulation can only appropriately exist by general rules and principles, which demand that it should be done by the Congress of the United States under the commerce clause of the constitution.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The hon. member sees the distinction there!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
The distinction is, and it brings out the whole position, that the power to regulate commerce gives a right to interfere in regard to any contract of railway carriage, where goods pass from one state into another state or through another state.

Mr. HIGGINS:
And river navigation The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR: And river navigation as well. But where the carriage is entirely within the state the constitution gives no right whatever to the federal authority to interfere.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
The preferential rates are all within the state—or nearly all!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
The preferential rates are within the state, but the preferential rates within the state will be met by clause 95.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The hon. gentleman forgets that there were no railways in America when the constitution was framed?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
That does not affect the question. We are dealing now with the constitution as it is. In answer to Mr. Gordon, clause 95 is exactly intended to meet the case he puts.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
Very eminent authorities say it will not!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
The clause says:
Reference shall not be given by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over the ports of another state.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
Does the hon. member say absolutely that that meets the case—as a lawyer?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I say, as a lawyer, that that absolutely meets the case of the whole of the differential rates we know of, or have experience of, up to the present time. I say it absolutely meets the case, for instance, of the differential rates on the railways from Swan Hill to Albury in Riverina, and it absolutely meets the case of any rates of ours calculated with the view of attracting that traffic to Sydney; because, in the case of the railways which tap the river Murray within the lines I have indicated, those rates are all made for the purpose of giving preference to the ports of one state over the ports of another state.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The hon. member loses sight of the fact that the provision as to preference to the ports of one state over the ports of another, as cited in the case of the United States, does not apply to state laws; but the commonwealth must not give preference to the ports of one state over the ports of another.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

By the constitution it is expressly provided that any law or regulation made by the commonwealth, or by any state, or by any authority constituted by the commonwealth -

An Hon. MEMBER:

What law?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Any law or regulation. I am not discussing a constitution that we have rigidly agreed to, but I am willing, if any amendment is necessary, that those words should be amended so as to make it perfectly clear that there is embedded in this constitution a prohibition against any rate which will give an undue preference to the ports of one state over the ports of another state. What more can be asked than that? If that is done, if you prevent that preference being given by some words—let them be as large, as strong, and as clear as you like—that altogether meets the difficulty which is put by the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, and the other hon. gentlemen who have interjected.

An Hon. MEMBER:

-.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

You would, no doubt, have to legislate in this matter. You would have to appoint an inter-state commission which would have the power of dealing with questions of this kind exactly the same way as is done in America.

An Hon. MEMBER:

They fine and imprison a man in America!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

That is a detail; it does not matter very much what you do with him. You will have the sanction of an act of parliament. To bring my comments on this clause to a point, it not only prohibits the rates I speak of, but it makes them void; so that any rate of the kind made in violation of this clause is a void rate, and cannot be collected. The position, therefore, that I take in regard to the matter is this: I say that as far as the preferential rates are concerned, which puts the railway system of one state in an unfair position in regard to the railway system of another state, that can be met by the provision of clause 95, or some such provision. And I say in regard to the carriage of goods from one port to another, or through the different states, that that comes absolutely within the power of the commonwealth to control. Take, for instance, the main trunk line from Melbourne to Sydney. It would be within the power of the commonwealth to absolutely control the making of those rates to the extent that they were in any way interfering in the treatment of any person who had a right to use the railways. As a measure of what can be done, the Inter-state Commerce Act of America itself provides, for instance, that the rates shall be reasonable over the whole journey, that the rates shall not be unjustly discriminative. It also provides for what is called the prohibition of charging a less sum for a long haul than for a short haul, and in a number of ways it supplies all the guarantees which could be fairly asked for in regard to any inter-state traffic. As regards traffic which does not pass continuously from one state to another, I say that Clause 95 is quite a sufficient answer. I should like to call the attention of the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, who has taken so much interest in the river question, to this point: that exactly the same principles which have enabled the United States to take the control of carriage by railway would enable the commonwealth to take the control of navigation and of waterways from one state to another, and, therefore, whatever the provisions of this constitution may be, so long as they are not contradictory of that, the constitution gives power to the commonwealth to make laws regulating carriage upon the rivers as well as upon the railways.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

And the use of the water?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

The use of the water as far as navigation is concerned.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

That is only going half the distance!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

The hon. member, I know, wants the whole of the water, but the Convention was against him at Adelaide, and I do not think they will be more favourable here. I have placed these views before the Committee, because it appeared to me that at this stage, though we need not come to any definite conclusion, it is just as well that we should understand each other. It is just as well that some statement should be made definitely, as far as New South Wales is concerned, of what we require in the treatment of this question; and I should like to assure hon. members that, within the lines I have pointed out, I am quite willing to make any amendment which would be necessary to carry out these purposes. As far as the inter-state commission is concerned, I do not think it would be wise to encumber the constitution by such provisions. I think it would be very much better to give the power to make this kind of legislation to the federal parliament. If we trust it with many other things we may trust it with that. Then the power may be given in such a way that it may be exercised by the kind of body which is likely to be appointed.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

You give no weight to geographical position!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Certainly not, and we had better understand one another.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

You make the political boundary the test!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

The federation must either take the railways or leave them!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Undoubtedly. There is no half way about the matter. Hon. members want all the advantages of taking over the railways, and want to leave New South Wales the disadvantages. We cannot consent to any such proposal. If the railways are to be treated as if each colony retained its own, then they must be dealt with exactly on the same principles as if the railways in each state were conducted by private companies. I am quite willing that that should be done; but there should be no general handing over to any authority power to fix the rates in such a way as would eliminate all geographical boundaries, and put the other colonies in exactly the same position as if they had to bear the burden and responsibility of the railways of New South Wales.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

In other words, the hon. gentleman declines to take over the railways altogether, or to leave them precisely as they are!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

No, I do not say that. You must either take over the railways or leave them as they are, with, this exception: that you may very reasonably make provisions which will insure that the preferential rates which have been causing so much loss on our railway borders shall no longer continue. I have made these observations, which have been drawn out to a greater length than I intended, in order that we may understand exactly what we are about before we come to a decision.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria) [2]. [Committee counted]:

I should not have risen to claim the attention of the Committee at this time but for the lucid and admirable speech which has been delivered by Mr. O'Connor, who has given me the cue for the few remarks I feel bound to make. Before I deal with Mr. O'Connor's speech, I should like to wedge in such remarks as I may have to make upon the general financial question, and then deal with that of the railways, I may state that at Adelaide, as well as here, I carefully abstained from speaking much on financial matters, simply because I feel that upon financial matters, more than upon any other, there is need of modification of opinions to suit the views of others. I feel that upon financial matters, more than upon any other, there is need of give and take; and I have found it rather a fault in my own mind-and I suppose other members find it also-that if you have once expressed your opinion on a particular point, especially in public, you are apt to adhere to that opinion more obstinately than you would have adhered to it if you had not expressed it. But I have also felt that, upon financial matters, official experience tells more than any other thing. A man of official experience, especially as a Treasurer, can speak with more weight; and we who have no official experience— we who have not had anything to do with the Treasury or its difficulties—ought not to dispose of the finances upon mere grounds of theory without hearing exactly how the financial proposals will affect the treasuries of the different colonies. I have felt from the first that the financial question must be settled eventually by some rough-and-ready adjustment—that it cannot be settled upon any pure principle of theory, and cannot be settled upon terms of absolute justice to every one. I have been anxious, as far as I can, to leave my mind open upon the financial matter to the very end of the debate; but I have been invited—and I accept the invitation—to express how the position strikes us unofficial members, so that—the Finance Committee may be able to go to its room, and to frame a scheme which they see some reasonable prospect of carrying through—a scheme which hon. members will afterwards be able to recommend to those whom they represent. I also feel that, although the financial question presents great difficulties, and is of great importance, it is put altogether out of its true perspective in the columns of the press and in the debates in Parliament. I say with all respect that it has, the least important bearing of all the problems of federation upon the ultimate welfare of the people of Australia. I say that, in the main, the financial difficulty is a problem of the transition period, and, being a problem of the transition period, it necessarily must be transitory; that whatever solution may be effected will be transitory in its effects, and that, even supposing any great loss occurs to any state of Australia by any financial proposals—losses spread over some years to come—the resources and the capabilities of the different states are such that, eventually, they will be able to overcome the injury which may be occasioned.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

They will have to find the money in the meantime!

Mr. HIGGINS:

Just so. It is just because we shall have to find the money in the meantime that the financial problem has become of such importance. It is exactly as the author of the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" says, "Tomorrow morning's breakfast subtends a larger angle in a man's mind than the welfare of the nation for future years." And it must be so. The difficulties of the Treasurers of the different colonies are before their minds, and they must see that they have enough with which to carry on the government of the states. We must bear in mind that the loss in the adjustment of the financial problem will be no more than the low inflicted by an invading army. It will be a great loss no doubt, but still time will cure any ill effects which may arise from the temporary injustice. To go back to problems which hon. members faced in the first instance, it appears to me that there are two causes of our difficulty with regard to the financial problem. The two causes, I think, are the New South Wales tariff and the Western Australian tariff and conditions. I speak of the Western Australian tariff, inasmuch as it taxes more articles than any other colony.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Not at all!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I know I speak under correction. But if the right hon. gentleman will look, as I have looked, at the comparative table of tariffs which has been published-

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

It is two or three years old!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I do not wish to persevere in that statement if I am wrong. But if there has been an alteration within the last two or three years which reduces the number of taxable articles, then I have no doubt I must correct my statement. Two years ago the Western Australian tariff taxed more articles, and of course by that means taxed a number of articles from other colonies which the other colonies did not tax. To go back to my main point, I say that the New South Wales tariff and the Western Australian conditions are the two causes of our difficulty. I feel that in dealing with this matter we must try to adopt that system which will be suitable to the conditions of the majority of the colonies, and that, we must make special arrangements for the special conditions of the minority of the colonies. By the minority of the colonies I mean New South Wales and Western Australia. I think that the opinion is hardening all round this House, and throughout this country, that special arrangements must be made, at all events in regard to Western Australia, and I think also that special provision must be made in the Commonwealth Bill to obviate the fears of hon. members for New South Wales, and gentlemen who have written in the press and otherwise in New South Wales, so as to show the people of New South Wales that no glaring injustice at all events will be done to them in the course of the federation. I may say in passing that I am quite sure that there is no desire on the part of Victorians, or on the part of the people of the other colonies, to take any advantage of New South Wales.
There is no desire—there is no cunningly-laid trap as I have seen stated in one of the articles on the part of the people in the other colonies to take one penny more from New South Wales than they are entitled to take for the federation. I might say also in this connection that if I were to think that certain articles and speeches which I have read within the last few months, written and delivered in New South Wales, in regard to the grasping intentions of the other colonies, as against New South Wales, could be taken as representing the deliberate views of the majority of the people of New South Wales, I should say that we Victorians and the representatives of the other colonies could not in self-respect do anything more than simply to retire and say, "Gentlemen, you are treating us as robbers; we shall have nothing more to do with this matter." But I feel that the heart of the people of New South Wales is in favour of federation, and that they will trust the representatives of the other colonies to be as just to New South Wales as they expect the representatives of New South Wales to be just to the other colonies.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
They will have their share in determining what is just!

Mr. HIGGINS:
They will, most decidedly. With regard to the New South Wales difficulty, I agree with the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, that, without going into the merits of free-trade or protection, it is an absolute truth—no one can deny it—that the tariff of New South Wales, as it exists at present, is it difficulty with regard to New South Wales in this federation.

An Hon. MEMBER:
And the land revenue!
Mr. HIGGINS:

At all events, in consequence of the peculiarity of the New South Wales tariff, it has been put forth that New South Wales will pay far more under a uniform tariff towards the expenses of the commonwealth than the other colonies will pay. Of course, I need not go into that reasoning again; but the idea has been strongly urged, and it has been spread by the press with much diligence. It takes a good deal to kill an error; but if anything could have killed an error, I do not think that that error should still be living, having regard to the speeches and the letters of a member of the Upper House of New South Wales—the Hon. Mr. Pulsford—whose speeches and letters I have read with the most intense interest.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

He is becoming quite a favourite authority with Victoria now!

Mr. HIGGINS:

There is no doubt that we are willing to take light from any quarter.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Does not the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, think that he might as well lend Mr. Pulsford to the protectionists for a time?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I quite agree to that!

Mr. HIGGINS:

We shall be very happy to take Mr. Pulsford to Victoria, and to give him as much information from our point of view as be will be able to give us from his point of view. I have no doubt we shall learn mutual lessons; but I say that if the error could have been killed—the error which has been based on a false reading of Mr. Coghlan's tables—it would have been killed by the speech of Mr. Pulsford. I hold in my hand a speech which he delivered in the Upper House of this colony, and I quote it because he has given the exact words used by Mr. Coghlan, which show that Mr. Coghlan has been most guarded and careful in his statements; and I think that a great deal of injustice is likely to be done to the Government Statistician of New South Wales, who merely based his figures on the only facts which lie had before him, and who set out the figures correctly, and, in my opinion, in most guarded language.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

He has done the sums properly!

Mr. HIGGINS:

He has done the sums properly; but, at the same time, it must be admitted that it was his duty to do the sums. He had to do the sums on some basis, and he has taken the only basis open to him. Mr. Coghlan has stated this:

In order to show what might have been the result had the tariff of one of the other states been adopted in the years under review, instead of the tariff actually in force in each state, the schedule of customs duties of the federating colonies has been applied to the imports of each of the other states in turn, on the assumption that the goods would have been imported to the same extent, no matter what tariff might be in operation.

Mr. TRENWITH:
An erroneous assumption!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I would not say that Mr. Coghlan made an error.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Oh, no!

Mr. HIGGINS:
Because he simply said, "I have nothing else to go upon, and, therefore, I take the tariff for 1893, 1894, and 1895, and I say that if New South Wales were to import the same quantity of commodities under a uniform tariff as she imports now, then she would pay so much customs duties." No doubt, as a matter of arithmetic it turns out that New South Wales would, on that basis, pay far more. But Mr. Coghlan is still more guarded when he follows on his remarks. He says:

For example, the first series is headed, "New South Wales tariff," and shows the value of goods imported into each colony for home consumption, the value of narcotics and stimulants, the value of goods which would have been subject to duty under the New South Wales tariff, and the value of goods that would have been admitted free. The second series gives like information on the assumption that the Victorian tariff was in force in the other colonies as well as in Victoria during 1893, 1894, and 1895; and so on with the tariffs of South Australia, Western Australia, and Tasmania.

What is the result? In the first place, observe that Mr. Coghlan is going purely on an assumption, and has explicitly said that be is going on an assumption. A number of persons, in their reasoning, have said: "Look at these figures for New South Wales."

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
He adopted that method to get at a certain result!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Dr. MacLaurin, in the Legislative Council, said that those were the figures of the Convention themselves!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think that Dr. MacLaurin was right in this respect. It will be remembered that, in the speeches at the Convention upon the finances, there were some members who put them forth as figures which represented actual facts.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
No; as only approximate, I think!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think that the hon. member was more guarded; but if the hon. member said that they were approximate, I think even there he was incorrect.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Well, they were a guide!

Mr. HIGGINS:
They were a guide if a certain assumption were correct. The whole thing depends upon the word "if."

Mr. MCMILLAN:
A matter of degree. No doubt, the extreme degree was in the absolute statement!

Mr. HIGGINS:
At all events, what I submit is, that not even approximately are these figures to be taken as correct, and they were never meant to be taken as correct. Mr. Pulsford, in the very short speech to which I have referred, goes on to say that in addition to the fundamental error with regard to New South Wales, the years 1893, 1894, and 1895 are absolutely the most unfair years which you could take in regard to the other colonies, and notably in regard to Victoria.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
They are unfair years for us, too!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I understand that the right hon. gentleman was in office during those years?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
No!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I believe the right hon. gentleman was in office during the years 1894 and 1895, and I am not aware that any year could be a bad year under his regime.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It was better than it otherwise would have been, no doubt!

Mr. HIGGINS:
Mr. Pulsford also shows that the Victorian tariff which is referred to as
Mr. Coghlan's basis for his reckoning, is the tariff of 1896, whereas the figures given are for the years 1893, 1894, and 1895. The Victorian tariff, in consequence of changes made in 1895 was lower in 1896 than in the three years I have mentioned, and, being lower, produced more revenue. So that this was not fair to Victoria.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Mr. Coghlan did not favour New South Wales. He took the later tariff here. He took my lower tariff. The same tariff was used in both cases.

Mr. Higgins:

I understand that there was an alteration in the New South Wales tariff during the year 1895, but I think that with regard to Victoria the comparison was hardly fair. Mr. Pulsford gives an instance of its unfairness. In Victoria, because of the protective tariff there, the importation of a number of articles is absolutely, or almost absolutely, excluded; but these articles come into New South Wales. This does not mean that the consuming power of the Victorian people in regard to such articles is less than the consuming power of the people of New South Wales; it simply means that they consume home-made goods. Mr. Pulsford instances the facts in regard to the importation of soda crystals. He says that in Victoria there is a duty of £2 per ton upon soda crystals:

That is an absolutely prohibitive rate. Last year some portion of a ton got into Victoria, and £1 4s. 8d. was collected on it. There was no duty in New South Wales on soda crystals, and last year 700 tons were imported. It is very easy to see that 700 tons at £2 amounts to £1,400. That is the system adopted in these tables. But is the assumption correct? Already in this colony we make a certain proportion of our soda crystals without any duty. Put on a duty, similar to that in Victoria, and what becomes of our exports?

This, no doubt, should be imports. They disappear just the same as the imports of soda crystals have disappeared in Victoria, and in their disappearance disappears also the revenue assumed as possible of collection, and so much of the difference disappears. I have taken the trouble to calculate what this difference is as a matter of percentage, and those gentlemen who want to give the country a start and frighten it very much about the cost of federation, may possibly take advantage of it, The difference between £1 4s. 8d. in Victoria and £1,400 in New South Wales is actually no less than-

Let the Treasurer and Premier of New South Wales mark this-110,000 per cent.

Every hon. member will see the absurdity of the calculation. Therefore the difficulties which perplexed the Finance Committee in Adelaide, and the financiers of the various colonies who have discussed the matter since, and which have led to the principal bone of contention in this and in the other colonies, are owing to a mistake in taking as facts what are mere assumptions. I have listened to the debate during yesterday and to-day with a great deal of interest, and I was sorry to hear that the Treasurers of South Australia and Tasmania still laid emphasis upon these figures. At all events, the Treasurer of South Australia went so far as to say that there was no doubt whatever that a uniform tariff would inflict great injustice upon New South Wales. He did not support his contention with any figures, so far as I could see, unless we are to understand that he assumed that Mr. Coghlan's figures represented facts.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
I did not base my statement upon Mr. Coghlan's figures. I thought it was self-evident!

Mr. HIGGINS:
Of course I speak upon this subject with nothing like the weight which attaches to my hon. friend's utterances; but I should like to be convinced that there is a real and serious danger of large injustice being done to New South Wales by the imposition of a uniform tariff.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Would not New South Wales have to pay a tax to Victorian manufacturers for a time?

Mr. HIGGINS:
I do not think so. The hon. member is entering into a very large question, which opens up the incidence of the tariff.

Mr. GLYNN:

Mr. HIGGINS:
There is no doubt that if you have a uniform tariff with a protective tendency throughout Australia it will, to a certain extent, develop the manufactures of New South Wales. Of course the Premier of New South Wales will say that the development would be at the expense of more productive industries. Still, such a tariff would protect the manufactures of New South Wales, and would encourage the production of articles for home consumption. In the meantime, before New South Wales has her manufactures established, she will be able to import from Victoria, and from other colonies, articles which are manufactured there. It is certainly clear that whatever may be the incidence of a protective tariff, there is no increase of price proportionate to the amount of the duty. What I regret is that the hon. member, Sir Philip Fysh, and the hon. member, Mr. Holder, seem to have taken the view that a uniform tariff would injure New South Wales, without giving us the reason for that contention. The hon. member, Sir Philip Fysh, referred to some tables prepared by the Government Statistician of Tasmania, who takes certain articles such as tea, coffee, sugar, narcotics, and stimulants, and says, "If you take these articles by themselves, looking at what has been consumed in the past, in the future the consumption of New South Wales will be greater than the consumption of Victoria." For the purpose of this calculation, Mr. Johnston took the year 1895. I do not think, however, that statistics as to the consumption of articles during one year are of much use. I think you must take the statistics of a series of years, or else you cannot get any definite knowledge as to the trend of trade or the bulk consumed.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
That is why Mr. Coghlan took a period of three years!

Mr. Higgins:
Well, I am speaking now of the figures of the hon. member, Sir Philip Fysh. I want to confine my remarks to one thing at a time. I am glad to see that the members of the Convention who have spoken are coming round to the conclusion that in regard to the distribution or adjustment of the surplus, the more you leave to the federal parliament the better. That is a view which I am strongly in favour of. If you leave it to the federal parliament—and if New South Wales has sufficient confidence in the constitution of the federal parliament that its great population will be sufficiently represented in both houses, I think you may leave it to the federal parliament—it will see that New South Wales does not suffer injustice. In fact I should go so far as this, if it were needed: I should allow the sliding scale of the hon. member, Mr. Holder, to apply, so as to avoid injustice being done to New South Wales, or I should allow the federal parliament to vote subsidies to those colonies which, by any means of investigation, might be found to be injured by virtue of the uniform tariff coming into force. With regard to the suggestion of the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, to have an unlimited guarantee for all time, I could not fall in with that, I call understand a guarantee for, say, five years. I think all you want is to have a guarantee for a time that is reasonably within your ken. If we limit the guarantee for five years, the period of transition, and make the Treasurers feel that they would not have a big deficit to face, that they could look well about them and see what arrangement could be made to meet the expenditure, that is all that is required. There is a danger in guaranteeing a fixed sum for ever. No one can foresee the position of these colonies. It might be a great injustice to some colony. Then as to Western Australia, there is no doubt that the present scheme will not do for that colony. Both Sir John Forrest and Sir James Lee-Steere have placed it beyond all doubt that as things stand at present it will be utterly impracticable for their colony to enter into this arrangement. But, unfortunately for the Convention, these gentlemen have not quite intimated to us what they would propose as a workable alternative. I understand that Sir John Forrest wants to go back to the 1891 scheme; but his good sense will at once tell him that that would not be fair to the other colonies.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Why not?

Mr. HIGGINS:

It would not be fair to make the distribution in proportion to the amount collected.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Why not?

Mr. HIGGINS:

The figures were worked out by Sir Samuel Griffith in an article which the hon. member must have read.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Mr. HIGGINS:

It really comes to the same thing. I imagine that we shall be able to meet one another eventually by leaving as much as we can to the federal parliament. I do not see why Western Australia should not come in under a federal arrangement under which there would be a guarantee to all the states of a certain percentage of the amount of their customs and excise duties. Say, for instance, there were a guarantee to Western Australia, Victoria, and other colonies of 70 per cent. of the amount which has been collected in a certain year. It would be a matter of detail to arrange afterwards which year should be selected. I think, however, that there was a great deal of force in the argument of the hon. member Mr. Walker, that the first year after the operation of a uniform tariff would not be a good year to select. It might be fairer to take the second year when things would be more settled under the new conditions.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

-Mr. HIGGINS: Of course it would mean that we should have to keep up the book-keeping for the second year; but it might be better to do that than to have a scheme in your bill which would not be workable for so many years as the constitution was in existence. We want a scheme to bridge over the five or six years of transition, and I would rather have bookkeeping—although I admit that it is open to objection—for two years of the uniform tariff than I would adopt a scheme which was unworkable. I think opinion is drifting in favour of a per capita distribution combined with a guarantee to the treasuries of a certain percentage, and combined also with a special provision to meet the difficulties of New South Wales and Western Australia. I think opinion is going in a direction which would leave the matter to the federal parliament; but upon the assumption that there will be a per capita distribution, except so far as it may be necessary to make exceptions. I do not think that anyone who is acquainted with these colonies and with other parts of the world can say that there are any communities on the face of the globe which are so similar in their habits of life, in their clothing, their food—I will not say in climate—as are these communities of Australia, New Zealand, and Tasmania. I have never been in Queensland, and I know very little of Western Australia; but I have been in the colonies of South Australia, Tasmania, Victoria, New South Wales, and New Zealand. You find similar food consumed and similar clothes worn in all these colonies, and, taking things all round, there is the same average degree of wealth. I say, therefore, that taking the matter in its broad aspect, a comparative distribution in proportion to population of any surplus which may be found to exist after the necessary federal expenditure is the best course to adopt. Now, with regard to having a distribution at all, I am strongly of opinion that there need be no actual distribution. I hold strongly the view that it would be possible to have matters so arranged that in place of actually paying back to the government of each state its per capita share of the surplus, it should be applied, to a certain extent, in payment of the interest on the public debt. It will come to the same thing, whether we hand the surplus to the state treasuries, or whether we apply it to a reduction of the interest on the public debt. I think the idea of paying the interest on the public debt of the states in proportion to the lowest scale of borrowing is about the best course. Supposing one colony had borrowed £67 per head, and another colony only £40 per head, all you would have to do at the most would be to insist that the surplus should be applied in paying the interest on the lowest scale of borrowing. In that regard I think the bill might be amended. We say here that the commonwealth may take over the state debts, or any proportion of those debts. It was at my instance, in the last session of the Convention, that the words referring to the proportion of the debts were inserted. I think some distinction should be made between the principal and interest of the debts. Take, for instance, an amount of £10,000,000. At 4 per cent., the interest would be £400,000; at 3 per cent., it would be £300,000. You might, for the same amount of principal debt be paying in one colony £1,350,000, and in another colony only £1,000,000. Conversion, I think, must be put off until we can so convert as to give the benefit of the premium to ourselves, and not to speculators in London; but until the federal authority guarantee the public debt, it will be possible, I think, for the commonwealth to distribute the surplus in paying the interest in ratable proportions. I shall now proceed to refer to railway matters with which the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, dealt. I think the members of this Convention are indebted to that gentleman for having put before us the view which he holds, and which I understand most of the representatives of New South Wales hold in regard to interference with the rates of the railways. It seems to me that in regard to the other financial questions we ought not to separate without settling them in some way. It would be an eternal scandal if we should have to separate without settling a problem which is merely a problem of transition, and which, at the most, means a possible temporary loss to some state or states. We should, as regards the main question about the surplus, be able to settle something, and we shall settle something. But, with regard to the railways, if the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, and those who think with him persist in their endeavour there will be very grave danger, indeed, of a deadlock in our scheme. I say it with profound regret. I can look at the question from the point of view of the hon. member and his friends, and I see exactly how it strikes them. I will ask the hon. member to try to look at it for a few minutes from the point of view of Victoria. The hon. member wants to be fair, and the only question is: What is fair? The problem is this: You must in some way let the federation have control, or the right to interfere with the rates on the railways, otherwise the provision for intercolonial free-trade is nugatory. Having once done that, the question is: how far you will interfere? The hon. member's suggestion is this: He says, in effect, "Interfere with and prohibit preferential rates, the only means by which Victoria has a chance of securing the Riverina trade or any part of it, but allow New South Wales to be at liberty to impose differential rates, even to that point at which they become, in effect, preferential."

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Differential rates would not give them the traffic!

Mr. HIGGINS:
The hon. member speaks with experience as a Riverina station-holder, who gets an advantage from these cutting rates. I am sure his experience will hear me out that it is a great advantage to a producer in Riverina and all round that district to have two railway systems fighting for his business.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
A man gets free-trade in New South Wales and freer trade in Victoria!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I hope New South Wales members will understand that I think this system of competition between the two railway systems is to be deplored. It means eventually a loss to the states, to the people, and it means extra taxation and burdens. There is no doubt whatever that it inflicts a loss upon the Victorian railways to take wool from Echuca at 2s. 1d. when sent by New South Wales producers, while they charge about 6s. to the Victorian producers. That, no doubt, is a loss to the Victorian railways, and I want to stop that.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

There is no federal aspect in that!

Mr. HIGGINS:

No; neither is there a federal aspect in that system by which you charge less for the carriage of goods for 200 miles in New South Wales than for 400 miles, or convey the goods 200 miles for practically nothing. All I urge is that we must either have in play the principle of competition between these rival railway systems-

Mr. WISE:

Even if we federate, there must be low rates for long distances!

Mr. HIGGINS:

No doubt that is the case. I feel that you must either let the principle of competition operate fully or not at all. If you are going to have the purely commercial competitive principle, you must leave Victoria free to charge what preferential rates she likes. On the other hand, if you want the thing to be federal, we are with you. If you want the railways worked in the interests of the producers without regard to the interests of the individual ports we are absolutely with you. The only point is this: I do not see how Victoria can be asked to give up the only weapon with which she endeavours or can endeavour to secure any of the Riverina trade unless New South Wales consents to give up her weapon also. The hon. member, Mr. R.E. O'Connor, is one of the fairest members of the Convention, and I appeal to him to say how be can expect us to go back to our constituents and ask the people of Melbourne

The Hon. S. FRASER:

It has always been our trade!

Mr. HIGGINS:

Yes, but you will find that there is more and more a tendency for goods to be supplied to Riverina from Sydney, because of the differential rates being worked on so low a scale for long distances. May I say is this:
"Gentlemen, we are with you, as far as I am concerned—and I am only speaking on my own responsibility—if you will make the railways absolutely federal property."

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
That is to allow you to fix the rates to please you!

Mr. HIGGINS:
Nothing of the sort. Say we are with you if you will make the railways absolutely federal property to be worked in the interests of Australia as a whole. Even if we cannot get that, if that is too much to expect at this time if Australia is not ripe for such a thing, we are with you in having an inter-state commission, or in remitting the question to the federal parliament to make arrangements so that the railways shall be worked in the interests of the producers, add of Australia as a whole, without regard to the port at which the goods are to be delivered. But if you come to us, and say, "You give up this preferential rates system, but we will keep our differential rates system which will force goods to go over 400 miles more cheaply than they go to you over 180 miles," I am afraid it will be impossible to persuade the people of Victoria to agree to such a proposal. I have not the least right to speak for anyone except myself, but I am giving my own well thought-out opinion that it is impossible to ask Victoria to do that. I say either abolish the competitive system altogether, or else let competition have free play. We cannot occupy any middle position. If you have competition, competition is a war, and we shall use all our guns. The only guns which Victoria has to secure the Riverina trade are the preferential rates.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Then you must regulate and control trade and commerce!

Mr. HIGGINS:
Among the returns given to the Adelaide Convention there was an act from Queensland which cast a very important side-light on this question. In the act they did not distinguish very clearly between preferential and differential rates, but it is perfectly clear that they mean preferential rates. It would appear that New South Wales is doing to Queensland exactly what Victoria is doing to New South Wales. And Victoria is doing to South Australia exactly what New South Wales is doing to Victoria. It is a lamentable state of things. There is no doubt that we impose differtential rates in Victoria for the purpose of drawing trade away from Adelaide to Melbourne. There is no doubt also that New South Wales is doing the same thing with regard to Melbourne. The question is, shall or shall not all this attempt to drag trade from its natural channel be put out of the power of the states? If you want to put it out of the power of the states to have the railways worked on any but one Australian system in any reasonable fashion, we are with you. But we cannot persuade the people of Victoria to give up this system of preferential rates unless you give up your differential rates. It does not mean an additional burden to the producers, because we are quite of the view that there must be differential rates for the back country. A uniform mileage rate is impossible owing to the circumstances of Australia. You must give the producers the advantage; but the producers would get more advantage under what I propose, because, in place of their having low differential rates to one port, they will have low differential rates to two or more ports. They will have the choice of Melbourne or Sydney. And, supposing we had a zone system of 100 miles, it must be a through system with the political lines of separation between the colonies obliterated. The recital in the Queensland Border Tax Act of 1893 is:

Whereas large sums of money have been expended by the Government in extending and maintaining railway communication with the southern and western districts of the colony, for the purpose of promoting agricultural and pastoral settlement in these districts: And whereas large sums of money have at various times been expended by the Government in harbour and river improvements for the purpose of increasing the shipping facilities of the colony: And whereas a large sum of money has been, and is being, annually paid by the Government in subsidising direct steam communication with Europe, primarily with the object of facilitating the speedy and direct shipment of goods and produce therefrom and thereto: And whereas it has been ascertained that differential rates on the railway lines of the neighbouring colonies have been promulgated and otherwise arranged for, which have had, and are continuing to have, the effect of diverting the traffic which ought legitimately to be conveyed over the railway lines of this colony, thereby entailing a considerable loss in railway revenue: And whereas it is considered desirable to prevent, as far as practicable, this diversion of traffic: Be it enacted-

And the enactment is that every bale of wool or every dray with goods that passes over the Queensland border into New South Wales has to pay a certain export tax.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

That does not affect goods. It affects only wool!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think the hon. member will find that it does.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

That has never been put into force!
Mr. HIGGINS:

I see that it applies to station produce, wool, sheepskins, and hides.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

To wool and sheepskins, but not to goods!

Mr. HIGGINS:

What you in New South Wales complain of Victoria doing you do yourselves against Queensland, and you are willing to give that up; but at the same time you are not willing to give up differential rates within New South Wales. The hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, said very fairly that in the United States there is nothing to prevent differential rates even if they have the effect of attracting traffic to a port of that state; that the provision of the constitution only affected the inter-state traffic rates, from one state to the other. But look at the difference between the conditions of the United States and the conditions of these colonies. Every capital here is at the seaboard; every capital is a port; whereas in the United States you have only a comparatively few states on the seaboard, and a great mass of states—forty-three or forty-four in all—behind. Only a small number of these states are affected, and, more than that, you have there no, states of the huge size which are proposed here. In talking of the states in Australia you ought really to talk of slices of a continent. You have Western Australia which would swallow up France, Austria, and Germany, and something else without those countries hardly being missed. You have also South Australia and Queensland. You cannot say that the same principle ought to apply to a place like Australia as applies to the United States. When the Constitution of the United States was framed they had no railways. With us railways are a vital part of our existence; they are the great civilisers, they are the arteries by which the trade is conveyed from one part of the continent to the other. This provision, if railways had had to be dealt with by those who framed that constitution, would have been framed on a more liberal basis than that which is proposed. Now, clause 95, about equality of trade, has to be read with the first part of clause 52. Clause 95 is divided into two parts. It first states that preference is not to be given by any law or regulation to one port over another. That has been held in America to mean that preference is not to be given by any law of the commonwealth. It still leaves the power for any state to put on a preferential rate. The 2nd part of clause 95 says that no law or regulation made by the commonwealth, or by any state, shall have the effect of derogating from freedom of trade. A preferential rate would not have the effect of derogating from freedom of trade. Freedom of trade means that you must allow the products of other countries to come into your country free. But here a preferential rate has the effect of drawing the products of other countries into yours for a less sum than they would pay if drawn in your country. So that that clause does not at all affect preferential rates so far as regards states. Clause 96 says the parliament may create an inter-state commission -for what purpose-to maintain on the railways and the rivers the provisions of this constitution relating to trade and commerce. Now, these provisions are contained chiefly in clause 95. That does not hinder a preferential rate; but then, if the hon. and learned member looks back at clause 52 he will see that the very first subclause says that parliament may make laws for the regulation of trade and commerce with other countries and other states. It is under a similar provision that the Federal Parliament in the United States has the power to make laws which forbid preferential rates. Looking at clause 96, I think, if you want to avoid preferential rates, you, will have to add some words indicating that the inter-state commission is to regulate and maintain, not only the provisions of the constitution, but also the provisions of any federal laws made under the constitution. I shall now refer to clause 52. It is under the first sub-section of that clause that all these extraordinary powers to appoint an inter-state commission have been conferred:

The regulation of trade and commerce with other countries and among the several states -

It is under that, and under that alone, that we can stop the system of preferential rates. I cannot think of the railways except in connection with the rivers. It is under that same clause that the United States Congress has kept open the rivers of the United States. I voted at the Adelaide Convention in favour of a federal control of all the rivers-and I hope to have the opportunity of voting for it again-so far as they are navigable, and to keep them navigable. I think we could not consistently be in favour of federalising the railways unless we were in favour of federalising the rivers, as far as they are navigable.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Does that include the Yarra?

Mr. Higgins:

There are plenty of rivers in Victoria which run into the Murray. We have the Goulburn, the Campaspie, and a number of others that are affected. So far as rivers are navigable they ought to be under the control of the federal parliament, and the federal parliament ought to be able to keep them navigable.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

And pay for them?
Mr. HIGGINS:
Yes, pay for them; that in quite another point. I admit that the rivers of Australia are quite different from the rivers of America, because in Australia we require the waters for irrigation. If you leave it to the federal parliament, to control the rivers, you should provide that that control of the rivers should not make it impossible for the waters to be diverted within reasonable limits for the purposes of irrigation.
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
so long as the navigation is conserved!
Mr. HIGGINS:
so long as navigation is conserved in a substantial form in the other colonies.
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
We do not want to provide that. It is the law now!
Mr. HIGGINS:
A mistake was made in sub-clause 31:
The control and navigation of the river Murray, and the use of the waters thereof from where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales, to the sea.
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It was not considered a mistake! Mr. HIGGINS: I want to be perfectly, frank, and to say that since the meeting of the Convention in Adelaide I have looked into the matter carefully, and I find that if that sub-clause were struck out it would be better for those who want to federalise the rivers than if it were left in the bill as it stands.
As far as navigation is concerned you get navigation, and the use for irrigation purposes of a certain portion of the river, and you give up control for navigation purposes of the whole of the river.
Mr. HIGGINS:
My view is this: that we should strike out that sub-clause 31, so far as federalising the rivers is concerned, and insert a special provision to suit the circumstances of Australia, so that, while you allow the federal parliament to control the navigation, you also provide that they shall have power to give to any state a reasonable use of the waters of all rivers and tributaries for the purposes of irrigation. I think it is possible to arrange that there shall be irrigation of adjoining land without any serious interference with navigation; but a number of precautions will have to be taken to prevent interference with navigation. I feel that I have taken up as much time as I am entitled to take; but, as this is the only opportunity I shall have of placing my views before the Finance Committee, I should like to refer to one or two other matters. First, in regard to clause 88, which provides that "uniform duties of customs shall be imposed within two years after the establishment of the commonwealth," I would suggest that the word "excise" be inserted after the word "customs." Obviously, that is necessary.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It might not be necessary, at that stage, to impose excise duties. That is why "excise" was left out!

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is practically certain that we shall have excise duties as well.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

That is, assuming that we want that limitation at all!

Mr. HIGGINS:

If you say uniform duties of customs, you must also include excise; otherwise a state, by imposing excise duties, could avail itself of a system of protection by catering its excise duties to a serious extent.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

it is provided that on the imposition of the uniform tariff, duties of customs and excise in the colonies shall cease; so that on the passage of a customs law, excise duties in all the colonies would cease!

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is provided that the exclusive power to impose customs duties is not to come into force until uniform duties have been imposed by the parliament of the commonwealth. That is to say, in the meantime the state shall be at liberty to alter or impose duties. I think that is dangerous, for this reason: You are giving over all the revenues by customs and excise to the commonwealth, and the states will no longer receive these revenues. But a state, seeing that it does not receive duties of customs and excise, but that these all go to the commonwealth, may reduce the revenue-producing duties within its boundaries during the two years prescribed in the clause, so as to lighten the burden upon its people at the expense of the commonwealth.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Will not that induce the commonwealth parliament to pass the uniform tariff as soon as possible?

Mr. HIGGINS:

Still you cannot tell how long the making of a uniform tariff may take. It would be as well to provide that there should be no tinkering with the state tariffs until a uniform tariff had been made. It is only a short time at the most.
An Hon. MEMBER:
They might want to put on a primage duty or something like that!

Mr. HIGGINS:
There might be a provision that no state should alter its duties without the consent of the Governor-General-in-Council, in order that there should be no interference with the amount of the customs revenue.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
You might say, not to reduce the amount!

Mr. HIGGINS:
There is another matter. In clause 89 it is provided:

So soon as uniform duties of customs have been imposed trade and intercourse throughout the commonwealth, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation shall he absolutely free.

Apart from the verbiage of the clause, I may say, speaking frankly, that one of the serious obstacles to the acceptance of the constitution in Victoria is any sudden convulsion in regard to the border duties. There is at present a stock-tax on the Murray. Personally I am strongly against the tax. At the same time I want to carry out the view so ably put by Mr. Holder that the great thing to be achieved in making a constitution is that there shall be no sudden, violent convulsions. Nothing causes so much injury as sudden convulsions. I should like to warn hon. members of this: that the stock-tax has been in operation for a few years, and under it our small farmers are in the habit of breeding calves; it pays them to do so. The men who have big runs find that it pays better to introduce store cattle from New South Wales and to fatten them. A number of our farmers are seriously afraid of having the breeding of their calves suddenly stopped; they are afraid of having their living taken from them. One of the members of the ministry has announced that he will stump the country against the Federal Bill, and he has more influence with the farming community than any other person in Victoria.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Of course it is not a ministerial question!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I admit that. But the point is this: The minister, who has adopted this attitude, has based his argument upon reasoning with which I cannot concur in the slightest. All he has suggested is that the duty shall be taken off in stages; that there shall be a sliding scale—that it shall slide over five years.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Would the hon. member have the customs tariff of the federation increased by means of a sliding scale?

Mr. HIGGINS:

There is a good deal to be said not only for taking off duties gradually, but for their gradual imposition as long as we enact in the bill what the stages shall be. There must be a provision in the bill for a graduated scale.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

It is like pulling a tooth out by stages. Why not pull it out at once?

Mr. HIGGINS:

But it is not a tooth in this case. All I suggest is suggested not from the point of view of a protectionist or free-trader, but from an independent point of view—from the point of view of one who wants the bill to be carried. I hope a clause will be inserted allowing the federal parliament, at all events, to alter the duties by steady gradations and not all at once. I think we might produce too violent convulsions and interference with trade if we tried to do it in one year. I am frequently called, in Victoria, a radical; but I can see that I am the most conservative man here. I do not want violent changes. I do not think there is anything which does a country so much harm as violent changes. I have taken up more time than I intended, and it is only the importance of the subject and my anxiety to make the bill as acceptable as possible to a large class of the community that I have been induced to make my remarks so long.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[3.15]:

I have listened very attentively to the able speech of my friend, Mr. Higgins, and I do not think we should criticise too severely the concluding remarks of the hon. gentleman, in view of the fact that a general election is about to take place in the neighbouring colony.

Mr. HIGGINS:

There are no farmers in the electorate I represent! The Right Hon. G.H. REID: I know. My hon. friend, with his usual disinterestedness, is not speaking for himself, but for a number of friends who are members, and who wish to remain members. In fact nothing but the most ingenuous generosity of the hon. member towards the gentlemen to whom I refer would have prompted him to make such an extraordinary statement as that with reference to such an obnoxious bar to intercolonial free-trade as the stock-tax of Victoria. He would actually, as to that particular form of obstacle between the colonies, bring about freedom of Australian intercourse by safe and mild doses. It seems to me that if any such plan is put forward, we have a very strong claim on the part of this colony, in view of the circumstance that there is so strong a representation here and in the other colonies of opposite views in fiscal matters. I think we might very fairly come forward with a request that there should be some sort of a provision drafted which, if it happened that we were eventually to be exposed to a tariff of 20 or 30 per cent. would enable us to gradually get accustomed to it. I do not ask for any such stipulation. I feel that it would be trifling with this great question of federation if the people of these colonies were not prepared absolutely, and at once, to surrender every shred of advantage which they get by putting up barriers against their Australian fellow-countrymen. If we are not prepared for that, we are simply wasting time in endeavouring to bring about this federal union. I am sufficiently in earnest about it to be prepared to risk every fiscal principle in which I believe, and for which I have fought for so many years. I am prepared to risk my fiscal principles in view of the commanding national destiny which we are called upon to realise, feeling at the same time sufficient confidence in my principles to believe that, just as we have been able to win here, we shall be able to win in the federal parliament, if not at once, at no distant date. I am prepared, at any rate, to take the risk of all these things, and every federalist must do so. We cannot make reservations about rival matters.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Not even about railways!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I think we will all admit that the freedom of all the Australian colonies from customs duties set up by one colony against another is the most vital point of federal union, because the fact that the railways are in the hands of the state is simply an accident. In some countries of the world they are not in the hands of the state, and they are worked upon widely different lines. Observations have been made by a number of hon. members, in reference to railways and rivers, which I think are somewhat out of place now, although very valuable, for I think the Finance Committee, in asking for an early, consideration of these clauses, desired rather assistance as to the very difficult problem of dealing with the question of federal finance.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
It will all be useful!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
As the hon. and learned member says, it is all valuable, and it will probably save discussion at a later stage. I do not intend now to enter on any discussion of the matter affecting the railways and the rivers, except to make one or two observations. In the first place, I quite agree with an exclamation made by the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, this morning: We must either take or leave the railways; and the reason is obvious. If we take the railways into the federation, we take with them all the financial responsibilities; and then, having taken the financial responsibilities, we can administer all the railways in the general interest. But if we, as the federal power, endeavour to interfere with railways the responsibilities for which and the management of which are entirely vested in individual states, we get into a very dangerous position at once, because the notion of any power being able to control the management of railways, which has no responsibility financially in respect to the management of those railways, is too absurd, I think, for any reasonable body to entertain. It has always seemed to me to be a question of handing over the railways and the liabilities, so that each and every Australian railway can be administered upon federal lines, or leaving them with those who are responsible for their maintenance, and for paying their expenses. If you leave them, then it seems to me that this attempt at having an inter-state commission is ill-advised, that the colonies must be left to make their own arrangements, and it ought to be possible that they should. We in New South Wales have, rightly or wrongly, built lines into the south-western parts of our own territory. If an inter-state commission, supposing it existed, interfered with the working of those railways, interfered be quite in a humour to bargain with them for their sale. Therefore, I pass by the interstate commission as an endeavour to build a bridge which would not rest at either end on a solid basis.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
But you leave an impassible river!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
My hon. friend has been for many years very keen on this matter of river navigation and railway rates, and an a South Australian patriot it is quite right that he should be. I am just giving him a little bit of New South Wales patriotism in return. As to rivers, the same principle applies. If the federal power is to take over all the rivers of Australia, whether they do or do not run through different states, I can quite understand that. Then they become responsible, not only for their navigation, but also for the maintenance of the navigation. But under clauses 95 and 96 it does seem to me that there are certain rights taken over, with respect to rivers in New South Wales, which are not accompanied by the necessary responsibilities. Therefore, whilst I think it will be found that this colony will always act as the proprietor of a water-course ought to act in reference to other proprietors having rights in a continuation of the same watercourse-although I hope that we will always do that, and even carry out any irrigation works at such time and in such a way as not to injure our natural waterways, such as we have in the Darling, the Murray, and the Murrumbidgee; whilst I hope that we will always act in that spirit-and hitherto we have done so, because we have cleared rivers for our cousins without charging them anything for it- whilst I hope that we will continue to show that free and delightful spirit, which is not always returned to us, I am not prepared to say that this country should give over rights with respect to rivers in New South Wales when other colonies do not give over their rights in regard to rivers in those colonies-I mean the navigable rivers, and I believe that the Yarra is a navigable river. Now, passing away from those two matters, I come to the difficulty we are in. We have always felt the gravity of this problem of finance in connection with federation, because we have always felt that the power of raising revenue by means of customs and excise must, in the nature of the case, be handed over to the federation, and that power being the source of nearly the whole of the Australian revenues, in handing it over we practically commit the financial interests of each colony to the supreme control of a federal power, which is a very serious thing to do. If we could by any method manage so that, instead of the commonwealth financing the states, the states should finance the commonwealth, the project would be infinitely simpler; but I feel that, in the nature of the case, that cannot be done, and therefore I have to face the difficulties to which that view leads me, and I confess that the more I look at all those difficulties the more serious they appear. Some tables have been referred to, and also some conclusions which have been drawn from those tables, and I am very glad that my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, has most fairly pointed out that the criticism of these tables, so far as it reflected upon the person who constructed them, was entirely undeserved. It is the wrong use which has been made of those tables which might well be made the subject of criticism. As a matter of fact, they simply workout in simple figures on the basis of facts, and on an assumption which is quite open to argument and quite open to analysis, and which is indeed a matter of opinion. I agree with the hon. member, Mr. Holder-and as that hon. gentleman represents a colony whose financial interests in this matter are not very seriously at stake, because, as he says, his colony is about the middle line, I strongly point to his opinion as one which should impress itself upon the Convention. I believe, as he does, that it is self-evident putting figures and tables aside, that in the operation of any tariff applied to the different colonies which might compose this federation, for some time-the time doubtful, but the fact certain—for some time the distribution per capita—which would be a distribution we would all at once adopt if we could, because it is so simple—would be unfair. Now why should not the hon. member, Mr. Holder, say that that is self-evident? I should think the representatives from Victoria should be the first to say that it is self-evident.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I admit it, and I have endeavoured to meet the right hon. gentleman's difficulty!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I am glad that my right hon. friend has made this admission. It is a fact that he has always admitted it, and he has always, in a manner which has excited my hearty recognition, endeavoured to meet the difficulty. But it seems that there are others who are not sufficiently clear upon this point. It should, however, be clear, especially to the representatives from Victoria, and indeed to every man who is a party to a high tariff, particularly if his object be what is called a protective policy. The object of high duties, and the boasts which we hear concerning them all point to the same effect; that is, they result in this marvellous change, that instead of goods coming from abroad they are made in the country which is protected. That process has been going on for twenty-five years in Victoria, and, differ as we may about this or that aspect of the protective policy, everybody must admit that with any policy of high duties you have that result from the very nature of the case. Whether the result be bought at too dear a price or not is a matter of opinion, and we do not want to discuss such matters here. We must all admit that a policy of this kind, as contrasted with a policy which does not interfere in such matters, and is therefore substantially open, would yield this state of things, speaking broadly: that given the number of persons in each of two communities, in the one community the custom house would not be prolific, while in the other community it would be prolific of revenue. These are self-evident facts.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

The hon. member is quite right; we do.

An Hon. MEMBER:

I know it!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

At the present time I am taking the view of my hon. friends. I am accepting the views of those who seem to believe that there is no difference.
The Hon. J. HENRY:
Would not goods manufactured in Victoria be consumed by New South Wales after the establishment of a uniform tariff?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
To a certain extent, no doubt; but to say that in a great business community such as this, accustomed for so many years to do its business in a certain way, all at once, as if by a stroke of magic, the conditions of trade will be reversed, is to speak of something which has never happened. These changes only work out gradually.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Is that position disputed?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Well, if everybody thought as my right hon. friend does, I do not know that I should have said a word; but the observations I have heard during this debate have been quite opposed to his admissions. If it is admitted that there is a difference serious difference-I have nothing more to say. I quite admit that the difference would, gradually, and perhaps readily, disappear.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The establishment of a sliding scale would bring that about!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I confess that in Adelaide I thought I was giving up a great deal too much; but the additional light I have obtained since has made me believe more in the scheme we arrived at in Adelaide. At the same time, I cannot be insensible to the fact that that scheme has created no sort of confidence, in this colony, at any rate; that, on the contrary, the clear-cut expression of the opinions of the two houses of our legislature is quite against it.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
No better scheme has been suggested! The Right Hon. G.H. REID: No, and the action of the Parliament of New South Wales is a practical admission of that. Our Parliament does not profess to supply a better scheme; it makes the suggestion that, in view of the fact that no solution has been discovered by the convention, or any other method proposed which can be adopted, it would be infinitely wiser to leave the whole matter to the federal parliament. That is the effect of the recommendations of our houses, and I must say that the necessity of bringing about a union of the Australian people being pressed upon me, I am there again prepared to trust the federal parliament. If we cannot see our way out of this trouble-and it is no reproach to us that we cannot, because there is nothing in the world more difficult than to appraise, with any degree of reasonable certainty, the possible effects of a tariff the constituent parts of which are all unknown—there is nothing more absurd than to attempt to do so. That being the case, the question of distribution, if we give up the theory of a per capita distribution, if we admit that it will not work fairly—and I think that that is pretty generally admitted, the extent of the unfairness being very much in dispute—we must admit that we have no solution which we can ask the people to adopt.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

It is not admitted that a per capita distribution would be unfair!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Not eventually; but we must see that, just as our friends the farmers, who, as the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, says, have become accustomed to bringing up calves, are seriously exercised about their own particular interests, so there are a number of people in all our colonies interested about many matters; and our failure to find a scheme which commands general approval being admitted, the effect of laying down a scheme which would not be accepted as satisfactory by the electors of Australia would, probably, be fatal to the whole project of union. Well, union being our main object, we must endeavour to bring the bill into such a shape that it will command the approval of the constituencies of Australia, that being the only road to union. I am prepared—and I really think we can all do so—to leave the whole financial question to the federal parliament. But I do not want this question left to the federal parliament in any such way that whilst all my views are risked and made uncertain, the views of others are made certain in advance. I do not call that fair compromise. I ask every hon. member, whatever his views, or interests, or policy, to follow my example, or rather I am prepared to follow the example of others, the example of all who are prepared to trust these financial matters to the federal parliament. I must confess my strong feeling of doubt as to whether the provision limiting the expenditure of the commonwealth for a short time was not a very good one. I attach a great deal more importance to it than most people do. Still, again, I am quite prepared to bring the bill into a shape which will command the general approval of the electors and the constituencies. So far as I can see, that project has not been received with favour. Whilst not yielding rashly or inconsiderately to what appears to be a well-expressed public opinion, I think that, under existing circumstances, we should ill-conceive our duty here if it were not our very great desire to give effect to public opinion in every possible way. Because our duty here is not to produce a constitution which will meet with our approval. We have been sent here to perform a different task, to produce a constitution which will meet with the approval of the electors of the various colonies. I am prepared, believing that it will be better for the project, to let all the fiscal problems go, and to adopt the spirit of the amendments suggested by the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly of this colony, simply conferring power on the commonwealth to raise revenue to pay its expenditure and to distribute the surplus.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

There, again, our trust in the federal parliament comes in. The federal parliament takes away from each of the five colonies its almost sole source of revenue. This is all done in the interests of federal union. It is done because we cannot retain this source of taxation and have federal union. No stronger obligation under such circumstances could rest upon any body of hon. gentlemen, no matter what colony they represent, than that of not exposing the constituent parts of the federation to financial-

The Hon. S. FRASER:

Insolvency!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Insolvency, for it would be nothing less than that, and at the very beginning-

Mr. WISE:

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Those persons who appear in the federal parliament will be there on the franchise which we provide and will be elected by the men whom we know in Australia, and with those persons, sitting in that parliament, and having the financial interests—indeed, as my hon. friend, Mr. Fraser, suggested, the solvency or insolvency—of the colonies in their hands, it is inconceivable that they would begin their existence as an Australian legislative body by a course of finance which would immediately throw all the colonies into difficulties. The situation, I think, is inconceivable. If we are not prepared to believe that the outcome of this movement will be a parliament which will protect the colonies from such obvious dangers, not to say disaster, then I say that we cannot believe in the thing itself.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The trouble is that unless you come to some reasonable arrangement, a large number of persons will have a doubt in the matter and will vote against the bill.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Having perhaps an equal knowledge—I will not say a greater knowledge of the popular view with the right hon. member, knowing the views of Australians and the way in which Australians take things, I say, without hesitation, that I believe this project will come to Australian people with infinitely greater force if those who recommend it to them show by the constitution they frame that they, at any rate, have confidence in the machine they have constructed. People do not refine in this movement. Frame your constitution as you will, let it be the most perfect embodiment of human wisdom, there will be here and there a selfish element of opposition. You cannot escape it. It will inevitably face us in this great struggle for federal union, do what you will. But if I do not misapprehend the genius and the intelligence of the Australian people, if we show, in the construction of this charter, confidence in the future electorates of Australia it is not at all likely that the electors themselves will begin by mistrusting their own patriotism and integrity.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

What is the objection to a minimum refund?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

There, I say again, you would, by any such proposition, in view of the extremely divergent situation of the different colonies, nullify the advantages which a free hand would give to the federal parliament. We must begin by believing that that body, representing not this little clique, or that little clique, but representative of a great national constituency, coming for the first time into the home of Australian nationality—that these men maybe safely trusted to maintain the financial position of each of these colonies as one of the most sacred things committed to their charge. My fear would be—and I confess it—that in an anxiety to meet the varying circumstances of the different colonies, there might be, perhaps, too great a sum taken from the people in the shape of federal taxation. There are difficulties, look which way you will. There are uncertainties, look which way you will. But, looking at the fact that we are composed of gentlemen representative of so many widely divergent views as to what the policy of this future parliament should be, we ought, I think, to enter now into a tacit understanding that the spirit in which we will approach these difficulties is this: when we cannot feel sure that we are solving them properly in the interests of the constitution, we will hesitate to put there provisions which will be very difficult of alteration, and which may work, not for good, but for ill to the whole of the colonies.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The federal parliament could not devise a satisfactory scheme until the uniform tariff had been in operation for several years, and what would be done in the meantime?

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

The difficulties disappear at once in the federal parliament. The federal treasurer knows exactly the amount which the Victorian Treasurer, for instance, has received during the previous year. He knows the facts of trade. Suppose the colonies had been united for twelve months, the federal treasurer would have twelve months' facts of the united position before him. He would know the obligations of the Victorian Treasurer as well as did the Victorian Treasurer himself. I should not think the Victorian Treasurer would leave him in any state of uncertainty on that point any more than would the Treasurer of any other colony. So, with the latest facts before him, the construction of a tariff which would at once return a sufficient amount to, say, the Victorian Treasurer, or to any other Treasurer, would not be a difficult task. The amount might vary, as estimates; but it would be substantially near the mark—so near as to leave no colony exposed to any serious difficulty.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:

It is the mode of distributing the surplus which is the difficulty!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

There again the advantage of time, of union, of further experience, of reflection, will all be on the side of the federal parliament.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:

What is to happen in the meantime?

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

In the meantime, until the uniform tariff comes into operation, the financial situation is free.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:

But what is to happen after the uniform tariff has come into operation and while experience is being gained?

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

That is a point to which I have already referred to some extent. During that time the federal parliament must arrive at some mode of distribution which will be equitable.

Mr. Walker:

By book-keeping!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Now, my hon. friend, with the voice of the federal parliament in his throat, says book-keeping. I do not presume to know what the voice of the federal parliament will be. I say that that body of men, elected by the people of Australia under federal conditions, will be infinitely better qualified to bring about an equitable solution than we shall, because our solution, remember, is one which is stamped in letters of iron, whereas their solution would be capable of alteration. If the federal parliament, in working out the solution as it thinks equitably, finds from experience, which will be speedy, that the result is not equitable, it can amend what it has done without appeal to the arduous and very uncertain process of amending the constitution. I leave all these matters in that way. I confess I feel some anxiety about this federal tariff. I should have infinitely preferred that in this constitution there should have been a definite time stated within which that federal tariff should be in force.

An Hon. MEMBER:
What is the penalty?
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
The penalty is an obvious one, inasmuch as we in this constitution, a supreme court of the federation. If any tariff were passed violating the terms of the constitution, any importer, by taking proper proceedings, could recover what he had been called upon to pay under an invalid act. That is the simple and effective remedy. When we remember that we put a stipulation in the constitution that the federal tariff shall be settled in two years, when we know that the federal parliament will begin with the knowledge that, if the work is not done in two years the whole financial fabric will disappear—that their own salaries will not be payable—it is probable that the funds would be there when the due date arrived. My fear in this: We make all our sacrifices for federal union; after infinite struggle and vicissitude we see ourselves at last united. The federal tariff is a subject which will excite intense interest. It will be a time of much popular agitation, huge personal and pecuniary interests will be sleepless and active, there will be, above all these mercenary and somewhat humiliating circumstances, in the hearts and minds of the people, a deep desire, a great anxiety, that they should return men whose policy would be for the good of the commonwealth. All these things when they come down to the form of a precise tariff may lead to keen disappointment in this colony or that. Some particular native industry, highly thought of there as a great national industry, might happen in their opinion to be ruthlessly disregarded. Other duties may seem, perhaps, in the estimation of the representatives of another part of Australia to be fraught with disaster to the whole commonwealth, embodying principles which they utterly abhor. All these grave influences, conscientious most of them, may lead to a state of difficulty in the federal legislature. If there was an escape from it something might be done. We might find ourselves with free-trade in New South Wales, across the border, and nowhere else for an indefinite time; but again, I will stand true to the position I have taken up in this matter. I say again it is inconceivable that this federation will shirk its obvious national duty in that way. The struggle may be a bitter one. There may be many disappointments, but I feel convinced the federal parliament would loyally and faithfully discharge its duty, not so soon as we might like, but, at any rate, without any great delay. I say in a word that many of our difficulties will disappear if we all agree to confide the different interests of our localities to the wisdom and justice of this great parliament representing the Australian people.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[3.54]:

I think I may say that there is no member of this Convention who does not feel deeply impressed with the broad and encouraging speech which we have just listened to from the Premier of New South Wales. The purpose of this discussion has been in order that the committee on finance which has been appointed should be enabled to gather the sentiments of the Convention, with the view of being assisted in the performance of its duties. I am sure that if my hon. friend, Sir Philip Fysh, instead of having addressed the Committee yesterday, had addressed it today, he would not have expressed the opinion that this debate would be really a beating of the air. He would have come to the conclusion, which I maintain is foremost in the minds of all of us, that the results both as regards the assistance to the committee and as regards the advancement of the great purpose which we hare all at heart, that is, the union of Australia, must be immense. For my part, at the commencement of the discussion I did not feel particularly sanguine as to the possibility of time being saved. Now I have arrived at exactly the opposite conclusion. Although it may be that the Finance Committee in some respects will be placed in a position of difficulty because of no resolution being adopted by the Committee for their guidance, still they will feel that underlying every criticism and surrounding every remark in the debate has been the gradual accretion of the sentiment that the federal parliament which we are about to create under this great instrument of self-government will be the best for accomplishing the purpose we have in view, and of extricating us in a just and fair manner from all the difficulties that surround this financial problem. Under these circumstances, the remarks which I shall offer to the Committee will be very few. In the first place, I should like to say a word

[P.144] starts here
in regard to the question of the railways, I have always taken the view that if it were practicable to accomplish the purpose the railways ought to be federated. I should myself like to see the whole of the railways of the continent brought under the control of the central government. It always appeared to me to be one of those matters which came well within the category of federal control. The railways in these countries affect the entire body of the people certainly as much as do the posts and telegraphs. We have not hesitated to bring under the control of the federal parliament the posts and telegraphs, and, on substantially the same principle, if the conditions were practicable-I admit that there are some conditions which make it impracticable at the present time-the railways of the states, which will be the railways of the commonwealth, ought to be under federal control. At the same time, sir, I admit that at present it is vain to discuss the federalisation of the railways. There is a strong feeling in, perhaps, all of the colonies, more or less, that the railways are matters which concern more immediately the states. At any rate, I recognise this fact: that there is a duty, a responsibility on the government of a state, to develop its own distant country, and to provide facilities for the people located in its distant parts getting their produce to market in the quickest possible way. And I recognise the fact that with that state of things existing it will be difficult, perhaps, for any state to reconcile itself to handing over the control of the railways, constructed for the purpose of development in that sense, entirely to the central authority. I do not share the apprehension on that score, because I believe that the same principles to which my right hon. and learned friend, Mr. Reid, has referred in relation to the adjustment of the financial trouble, will equally apply to the control and management of the railways. I do not believe that the federal authority, for instance, in dealing with the railways in any particular state, would forget the principles which guided their construction. I do not believe for a moment that the federal authority would seek to so interfere with rates as to do an injustice to one colony and give a special advantage to another. But, at the same time, seeing that it would not be practicable to federate the railways at the present moment, the only question is what can be adopted as a middle course in order to prevent some of those mischiefs as I think them, to which my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, in his exceedingly instructive speech called attention this afternoon. My hon. and learned friend, Mr. O'Connor, dealt at some length with this point as to the inter-state Commission. It seemed to me that his view was one of power to the federal parliament rather than one of substance affecting the principle of control which should be exercised over the railways. He seemed to me to say that he considered that clause 95, which provides that preference shall not be given by any law or regulation of commerce to the ports of one state over the ports of another state, sufficiently gave to the federal parliament power to impose regulations and to pass laws, and that, therefore, the provisions embodied in clauses 96 and 97 were, as I understood him, superfluous. If that is the only point of attack which he makes, to my mind it is not a very serious one, because he concedes, as I understood him, that it is essential that there should be a control over the railways of the commonwealth to prevent preferences being given so as to take the goods of one portion of the country to an outlet to which in the ordinary course of things they would not travel. That, I think I may say to my hon. and learned friend, is all we wish. It may be that if the existing state of things were permitted, what would be a differential rate in New South Wales would be construed into a preferential rate in Victoria. That would be, to my mind, exceedingly unjust. If the object is to have a series of rates which will not interfere with the natural outlet of the goods of any part of the commonwealth, then, so far as my judgment goes, it is impossible to take any exception to the method prescribed of establishing an inter-state commission with the view of bringing about that result. Either hand over the railways entirely to the commonwealth or establish an interstate commission with the view of regulating the railway tariffs so as to prevent what we all desire to prevent-an advantage being given to one port over another. Now, instances have been given of that, and I do not propose to go into detail except, to say this:
My hon. friend points out that, of course, any particular state regulates its, rates, according to length of haulage, and from a variety of other circumstances incidental it may be, as I have said, to the development of a distant part of the country. All these things would be taken equally into consideration, I apprehend, by an inter-state commission. Surely if you establish a tribunal of that kind you do not limit the functions it has to discharge, within the scope of the powers conferred upon it. You give that body the same judicial control as you would expect to be exercised by a corresponding power in the state, if the railways were left to the state. That, at any rate, is my conception of what this inter-state commission would be,
and what it would do.

The Hon. C.H. GRANT:
The federal management would do exactly the same!

Mr. SYMON:
And the federal management would do exactly the same. The difficulty is that we are bound to recognise that there is a very strong feeling in some of the colonies against a transfer of the railways bodily to the federation.
Recognising that fact, the point then is, how are we best to prevent what are described as cut-throat railway tariffs, not with the view of benefiting the producer employing the railways as his carriers, but with the view of injuring one state for the benefit of another. To my mind, if that state of things is to continue, federation, the blessings of union, the harmony which we expect to result, would largely disappear, and we should have each constituent part of the commonwealth watching every state in connection with the railway tariffs, and in a constant condition of irritation with regard to the progress of trade. It does seem to me, as my right hon. friend has just declared, that a dominating feature of this federation is freedom of trade, freedom of intercourse, but I disagree with him to this extent, that it appears to me that the barriers you erect in connection with your railway tariffs are now, and will in the future, be just as troublesome and just as detrimental to that perfect freedom of trade which you wish to secure as are your border custom-houses, and your border duties.

An Hon. MEMBER:
It will be a delusion altogether!

Mr. SYMON:
Therefore, I hope that if we sweep out from the measure as drafted in Adelaide the interstate commission, we shall be able to introduce something instead that will be equally effectual for the purpose. Just one word as to the rivers. That is a matter which concerns the colony I have the honor to come from very intimately indeed. The same principles, perhaps with intensified force, that apply in regard to the railways apply also to the rivers. But I gathered to-day a considerable crumb of comfort from my hon. friend, Mr. Lyne, who told us that he-and, I understood him, the people of New South Wales have no desire to so use the river Murray as to prevent its being navigable. Now that embodies the contention which I am disposed to fight for.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is all we want!

Mr. SYMON:
All we seek is that the great stream of the Murray, which is not only a channel of communication, but a vehicle of traffic, shall be open along the whole of its course, so far as it is now navigable, for all time. We do not wish that interfered with or lessened. I hope the people of New South Wales will believe that we have not the slightest desire to interfere with that great public object they have in view in the development of their country by means of irrigation. At least, personally, I have not. I agree that in a country like this it is impossible to treat waterways on the same footing as in other countries, where waterways and rivers are abundant, and we must all feel that to deprive New South Wales of the particular dealing with the affluents of the navigable river Murray for the purposes of irrigation would be to take away from them that control which in eastern countries was sought to be exercised over the wells of water about which there is so much dispute recorded in Holy Writ.

Mr. GLYNN:
If you let them carry out their schemes you will have to navigate on dry land!

Mr. SYMON:
I do not agree with my hon. friend as to that. My experience, which is not very extensive, but is useful as far as it goes, is that when you improve streams, in themselves originally small, for the purposes of irrigation, you develop very often, if not generally, the water supply. You may utilise streams in the way I have indicated and still preserve the navigability of the main river, where it is navigable now. At any rate, I believe that is the case, and I am not prepared to ask the people of New South Wales to yield up their control for the purposes of irrigation of the internal rivers of their present system. It may be that the federal parliament, under the powers embodied in clause 95, to which my hon. friend, Mr. O'Connor, referred, may be enabled to deal with this question should difficulties and trouble arise. But at present my view is that the arrangement made in the Convention at Adelaide will be ample for the purposes of South Australia— for the purposes of all Australia, because all Australia is interested in keeping the Murray navigable. I believe it will be sufficient for that purpose, and I hope that to that extent, at any rate, it will be preserved. I should like to say also in regard to the taking over of the debts of the various colonies, that I hope the provision in the bill will be allowed to remain as it is—in other words, that it will be permissive to the commonwealth to take over the debts. If I had entertained any doubt on that subject before, it would have been removed by the very excellent and convincing speech made yesterday afternoon by my hon. friend, Mr. Holder. That the debts ought to be taken over some time or other, and that they will be taken over, probably, goes without saying. But if we were to embody in this constitution an obligation on that part of the federal parliament to take over the debts, it would at once send our stock to a premium, and it would paralyse the hands of the federation in making terms for an advantageous conversion.

Mr. GLYNN:

Mr. SYMON:

We hope to convert before the stock expires, and I think we may be able to do it if—to use the word of Mr. Higgins in connection with another matter—we have a weapon in our hands, or it lever which we can use for that purpose.

The Hon. J. HENRY:

How would the hon. gentleman set about it?

Mr. SYMON:

I would set about it in the way my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, indicated yesterday. I think he put it this way: If you make it obligatory, your stock immediately increases in value, and you have nothing to offer to the stockholder in order to induce him to give up his stock and allow it to be converted.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The moment it was known that the federal parliament intended to convert, up would go the stock!

The Hon. J. HENRY:

Exactly!

Mr. SYMON:

If my right hon. friend were treasurer of the federal government he would take care not to intimate the intention until he had first negotiated.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The moment you started to negotiate the rise would take place!

Mr. SYMON:

My hon. friend would, no doubt, be astute enough and careful enough in the interests of the federal government to make adequate arrangements in that respect, and I am satisfied that my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, would be perfectly able to devise some method of securing—I would not say all the benefit—but some of the benefit for the federal exchequer.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

He would not be astute enough for the English capitalists!

Mr. SYMON:

We can only face the difficulty when it arises. Without prognosticating on which side the advantage will be, of the two methods the better is that advocated by my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, to leave it permissive rather than to make it obligatory on the federal authority. In regard to the financial adjustment and the regulation of trade, undoubtedly that is the most important part of what may be described as the commercial bargain into which we are entering, and I would only say, after the view which has evidently been adopted by the Convention as to the desirability of leaving the question to be dealt with by the federal parliament, that the principle it seems to me is to give back to each state as nearly as possible what it contributes, less its proportion of the federal expenditure. That seems to me to be really the guiding principle of the whole subject. If each state contributed equally per head there would be no difficulty whatever; but that is not so, and I think we ought to bear in mind that it never will be so. I do not believe you will have an equal contribution per head from the states of the commonwealth any more than you will have it from towns, parishes, or other districts. A great deal of misapprehension has arisen, and a great deal of what I regard as very unjust criticism has been cast upon the labours of the Convention in Adelaide, because that fact has been forgotten. It is said that so much per head will be produced by New South Wales, so much by Victoria, and so much by South Australia.
These inequalities must, more or less, always exist, and all we can hope to arrive at is a fair approximation. The object is really twofold. First, to get as near as you can, if you are to settle it in the constitution, or to leave it to the federal parliament with all the knowledge which will be at its disposal, with the data by which it may be guided in order to finally settle it. I have always been opposed to having it settled in the constitution, and for this reason: It seems to me that we are simply going blind. Whatever effort we may make to arrive at some approximation we are dealing with matters of prophecy, and not matters of fact. No human being - I do not believe even an archangel from heaven - could at this moment introduce into the constitution which it is our mission to frame a provision which would do justice all round upon the financial question.

The Hon. J. HENRY:

Have archangels any speciality in regard to finance?

Mr. SYMON:

I have no doubt my hon. friend is not merely a great authority in regard to finance, but he has great qualifications for being an archangel as well.
Even a combination of the two would not produce in this constitution an arrangement in respect of finance which would give satisfaction to the people of the colonies. It would, at any rate, give, as it has given before, the greatest stimulus and the widest scope for all kinds of criticism. But that is about all. If it is a matter of prophecy, then they tell you that it is like the Lamentations of Jeremiah, that it is all to the injury of some particular state or some particular set of taxpayers. Therefore, I am glad, as I think we must all be glad, that the feeling is crystallising in favour of what was really adopted by the bill of 1891-the ultimate disposal of this question by the federal parliament; and as the Premier of New South Wales has said, to what better authority can we possibly commit that task,-a body elected on the widest franchise available, a body which will be as patriotic as any states parliament will be, a body which will be certainly as competent as any other legislative assemblage can possibly be, and concerned not only for the interest of the entire commonwealth-the union of all the states-but concerned to see that in securing that general welfare the interests of no individual state are sacrificed? My belief is that we shall have in the federal parliament a legislative machine that will be actuated by the highest possible principles, and that it will not be open to the charge that it will be likely to view any particular section of the Commonwealth with more favour than another. I would remind hon. members that, in the bill of 1891, which was subjected to a great deal of criticism, and was condemned by its author-Sir Samuel Griffith-with very trenchant criticism, really the power of disposing of this matter was left in the hands of the federal parliament. We know the difficulties which have arisen. We know that the best minds and the best experience have been brought to bear upon this question. We know, as I have said, that in the bill of 1891 we had provisions that for the moment were considered admirable. They were condemned. We know that in Adelaide we had a Finance Committee which sat for a good while thoroughly investigating the subject, and the proposals they brought forward were allowed to slip under the table and were heard of no more. Then came a reference of the Treasurers, and we find that throughout the whole of Australia great denunciations were heard of these proposals, although I am bound to say that, looking at the sliding scale in the light which Mr. Holder has cast upon it in his pamphlet, and also in his speech yesterday, I am inclined to think that if we were to deal with the matter now, the sliding scale system is about as near an approximation to what is fair and just as we could possibly meet with.

Mr. WALKER:
Extending over twenty years!

Mr. SYMON:
I do not say anything about that. The extent of its duration is another matter. Whether it is five or ten years is a matter which I hope the experts on the Finance Committee will be able to settle. No doubt if it is adopted in the Constitution something of that kind will probably be secured. At the same time, we are not able to escape from the bookkeeping system which for some period or other must be adopted. But the vice of all these proposals and schemes is that it is not no much in the details of them as it is in the inherent impossibility of settling prophetically a practical question which depends on data not now available, and which afterwards will have to be obtained. Passing over a number of other matters with which it seems unnecessary to deal, I wish to say a word as to the suggestion of the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, as to the establishment and payment over of a minimum. I disapprove of that altogether. It we trust the federal parliament we should trust it all in all. If we are to endeavour to fix it minimum, we are met on the very threshold with the anomalous position of Western Australia. We all agree that Western Australia must receive some special treatment; but if we are to deal with that special treatment now, we shall be entangled in the very thing which we wish to avoid, namely, entering upon the details of a financial inquiry by the light of what a particular customs tariff may produce. I therefore think, with the Premier of New South Wales, that we should leave the matter to the federal parliament. A minimum would undoubtedly have the effect of being an encouragement. It might remove difficulties from the path of some who may feel some hesitation as to the state of the particular finances of their own colony; but if we have confidence-confidence in the machine as my right hon. friend put it-then I think we may fairly say to the people of the colonies from which we come, "We recommend you to trust the federal parliament throughout, not only to deal with particular items-maximums or minimums-but to deal with the whole question, so that each colony shall be fairly served, and that each colony's finances shall be fairly maintained." I do not propose to occupy one moment longer upon some other aspects of the matter which have presented themselves, and which are of considerable difficulty, because the main question is really whether we shall or shall not remit this adjustment of the finances to the federal parliament; and if we convey that intimation, as I think, it has been very generally conveyed, to the Finance Committee, it will give them a basis upon which to work, and a beacon by which they may proceed. I will only say this further: It is a mistake to be always on the look out for a "lion in the path." We are very apt to imagine that we see a "lion in the path" when no lion exists. No one can tell what particular difficulties may crop up; and no one can deny that there are difficulties to be overcome - great difficulties; but, if any recommendation would be of influence, as I have no doubt it would be, what I would say to the Finance Committee is, if there is a difficulty - if there is a nettle, let them grasp it firmly - let them not be afraid to meet the difficulties that lie before them; and if they do grasp the nettle firmly, then, out of it, I am quite sure that we, in this Convention, with their help, will be able to pluck the flower of safety and success.
The Hon. J.W. HACKETT (Western Australia): At this late hour of the Convention's proceedings to-day I do not propose to trouble hon. members with very many remarks; but, as the tone of the debate for the last two or three hours has largely occupied itself with local questions-by which I mean questions not peculiar to any one state, but which involve the interests, not of the whole commonwealth, but of two or three states perhaps you, sir, will allow me a few minutes to speak generally on the question, and afterwards to put a few aspects of the matter from the Western Australian point of view, which, if they have been alluded to, have only been alluded to in general terms, and not specifically. I think that, in the first instance, I may congratulate the Committee on the course taken in putting into the forefront this financial difficulty. The feeling that has been evinced, and the expressions which have been called forth in the course of the debate, must very materially shorten the work of the Convention in arriving at its desired conclusion. Had indeed this matter been as fully and freely debated in the Adelaide Convention, with the materials which this Committee possesses at present, I believe that our work at this adjourned Convention would have been so shortened, would have been so satisfactory in everyway, that we might have been prepared to take a poll of the people before many months are over. I take it that the main difficulty now in our path is this financial question. The arrangement of the relations between the states and the commonwealth has never seemed to me to be of such a formidable character as to threaten a suspension of the work required to bring the commonwealth into being. But I have all along felt-and any one familiar with the history of my own colony for the last few years must also have felt, especially if he had been in my own position, labouring in a small minority on behalf of federation and against a great body of doubt and misgiving-that unless we could give a satisfactory reply with regard to the financial bearings between Western Australia and the commonwealth, we might as well spare ourselves the trouble of appealing to our people. Of course the main difficulty in the matter arises from the fact-and it cannot be divorced from it-that the one source of unencumbered revenue-by which I mean revenue, no part of which is applied in payment for services rendered-is the customs. The customs, by the terms and implication, must pass into the hands of the federal authority. It is its natural revenue. But it so happens that the transfer of that revenue to the federal authority is attended with three grave contingencies, every one of which represents a vast body of difficulties that would have to be surmounted before the commonwealth is brought into operation. The first is that the customs must inevitably bring in a revenue immensely greater than the commonwealth will require for its own purposes. That would have a natural tendency to create extravagance-to cause carelessness and indifference on the part of the financial authorities of the commonwealth -unless they were very closely looked after. The second point is that if it interferes in a fundamental degree-and we cannot close our eyes to the fact that it must interfere in a fundamental degree-with the fiscal policy of one of the largest states of the commonwealth, the probability-I hope not the certainty-is that it would lead more or less to the reversal of that policy. That is the second difficulty which is contingent on the appropriation of the customs by the federal power. The third is that it robs the states-or perhaps a milder phrase would be that it deprives the states-in all cases of their chief weapon for collecting money. It takes away from them that source to which they are all looking for development, and even for the payment of their way. In view of those three facts, it was inevitable that the question of seizing the customs should, the more it was looked into, constitute itself the main difficulty to be solved before we could see our way clear to establish this federation. We must remember further that it is also complicated by this consideration that we are not now engaged on the construction of a tariff; but this financial question is to be made part of our constitutional bonds. We are not looking so much for revenue as for conditions of union; in other words, finance is to be made a part of the constitution of the commonwealth. There is yet an additional difficulty-that in, that there is practically no tax at the disposal of the commonwealth, so far as we can see, excepting the customs; for it so happens that in the forty years of nationhood among the various Australian colonies they have been exploring all the fields of taxation, and, so far as I know, have occupied them all-all that are known to us and our fellow citizens in the United Kingdom-with the exception of certain special taxes which are imposed on luxuries-on what are commonly called aristocratic luxuries. They have gone beyond that. Not only have they explored and occupied all the fields of taxation; but, because of various exigencies-usually depression at one time or another-they have loaded up all the colonies with as much taxation as they will bear. There is neither room for a new tax nor margin to increase the present taxes. Therefore we are driven back upon customs duties, and we have to face the difficulties as best we may. The spirit in which they have been faced to-day to my mind bodes better for the early inauguration of the commonwealth than anything I have come across either in my reading or experience during the last three months. If we settle this matter satisfactorily to the states, to our people, and to Australia as a whole, we need have no ground of alarm for the future of the commonwealth. For so far as we can see there is no question which will impose a greater strain upon the capacity, the good feeling, and the patriotism of the people of the commonwealth than the financial question. I have listened to nearly everything which has been said during this debater have not been absent many minutes at any time from the sittings of the Committee—with regard to the materials at our disposal for forming a judgment in regard to this question. I have heard statistics attacked; I have heard them defended; but the doubt has never left my mind that we have not sufficient figures in our hands to enable us to lay down hard and fast lines in regard to the future financial policy of the commonwealth. In other words, we have no materials so assured and so reliable that we could take it upon ourselves to crystallise them into a part of the constitution. The figures which we have tell us a great deal about the past, something about the present, and nothing at all about the future. We must remember that all the difficulty lies in the uncertainty of the future. We have nothing before us now which leads us to do anything that affords the smallest indication in our own fancies, the smallest conjectures as to what will happen when we have such new factors introduced into the situation as a wholly unknown tariff. So far we have been able to refer only to the tariffs now in existence. We do not know what would be the course of intercolonial commerce under a uniform tariff. We cannot forget that behind all these unknown factors there remains the constitution of the commonwealth, whose inevitable operation— I had almost said whose principal object and intention—is to change the whole course of the relations between the states in regard to trade, production, and expenditure. There is a general feeling growing up, and once it is started it seems to be almost inevitable that it should grow, that the conditions are too great for us to master with the materials at hand. There is a growing feeling that a federal parliament will be in a better position to deal with these difficulties as they arise, and when they arise. In fact, the question is not now whether this and a number of other matters should be left to the federal parliament, but how much of this and other matters is to be left to the federal parliament. It seems to be perfectly inevitable that it should be so. Take one clause of the bill, for example; the final and completing clause of the financial system worked out by the Convention at Adelaide. After making an interim arrangement for seven years, it is there declared that after the expiration of five years from the imposition of uniform duties of customs, each state shall be deemed to contribute to the revenue an equal sum per head of its population, and all surplus revenue over the expenditure of the commonwealth shall be distributed month by month among the several states in proportion to the numbers of their people as shown by the latest statistics of the commonwealth.

Probably by a slip more than anything else, or possibly with a view to placing it there for discussion, this clause was made a binding part of the constitution. If the constitution were accepted, this provision could only be altered by adopting the designedly protracted and cumbrous course of sending the proposed amendment to the federal parliament, and afterwards to the people of the states. Now it is quite obvious that if a provision of this kind is to be registered in the constitution, and is to be made part of the Commonwealth Bill, there are only two ways in which it can be done. One is to declare that the surplus shall be returned to the various states in proportion to the amounts collected from them, which again involves the perpetual maintenance of border custom houses, if the arrangement is to be made effectual and satisfactory, and which stands condemned for that very reason. Consequently, the proposal made in the Adelaide Convention that the surpluses should be returned to the states, per capita, in proportion to population, was adopted in the bill. I would ask the attention of the Committee for one moment to the probable operation of such a clause in regard to the colony of Western Australia. It must be remembered that if Western Australia comes into the union, however late she may come in, she must come in under this clause, unless it be altered in the manner I have indicated, a most unlikely proceeding, because it is evident that a majority of the states could, if they pleased, block any attempt to alter the clause, even though a majority of the people of the commonwealth were determined to have it revised. The hon. member, Sir Philip Fysh, has calculated that, if the clause were in operation, Western Australia would lose £659,090 in the first few years, and that after the interim arrangement had expired we should lose £613,894 annually. I come now to a matter I understand better, the calculations made by our own Government Statist. He declares that during the year 1898-9 we should lose £386,360. That is a serious loss; but at the next year, 1899-1900, we should lose £411,847.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That will be the first year of the operation of the uniform tariff!
The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:
Yes. He arrives at these figures largely by deducting the loss of intercolonial customs. The chief loss would be due to the cessation of the collection of customs upon intercolonial imports. In the year 1900-1, the loss would amount to £433,975; in the year 1901-2, to £452,560; in the year 1902-3, to £466,978; in the year 1903-4, to £621,122; and in the year 1904-
5, to £652,280.
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
That is all upon the assumption that the present abnormal conditions continue!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
The figures are only hypothetical!
The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:
They are accurately hypothetical. It is simply out of the question that we could join under any system which involves a per capita return, excepting, of course, for a limited experimental period. But even these figures hardly represent the true position of Western Australia with regard to federation. Those that have been laid upon the table by the Government Statistician of New South Wales take some important matters into consideration. Now, the contribution for services of which we should be relieved, the payment for services rendered, is set down at £158,000 in the papers distributed among hon. members a couple of days ago -that is, about £1 per head. It is manifest that that is extravagant, and that later on it will have to be reduced. It is out of all proportion to the amounts contributed by the other colonies. Take, for example, Tasmania, which has about the same population that we have. The amount of expenditure in respect of the services of which she would be relieved would be £33,000, or about 4s. per head, as against £1 per head in Western Australia. In the case of South Australia, which has just about double our population, the amount of expenditure in respect of services of which who would be relieved would be £41,500, or about 2s per head, as against £1 in the case of Western Australia. Now, adjustments of that kind will have to be made all along the line, if a fair view is to be prevented of the position of Western Australia. It must not be forgotten either that we have no excise, and as our customs in most cases quadruple the normal customs rates of the rest of Australia, it is fair to take for our excise about double the average excise. That being about 2s. 6d., if we take it at 5s. a head, that will be a still further contribution to the federal treasury which will have to be returned; so that, the more you look at it, the more serious the prospect becomes, so far as Western Australia is concerned. Let us now take the other side. We have expended very little in defences. New South Wales and Victoria have expended money liberally in this direction. We have not had the means to expend, nor have we had the opportunity to expend them. No doubt, in time to come, we shall rival the other colonies in an extravagant expenditure in this respect; but, as matters stand at present, the defence bill in New South Wales and Victoria stands at about 4s. per head of the population, while our defence bill is only about 2s. per head. There is not the slightest doubt that something like an equality will have to be established in that direction if Western Australia is to be satisfied and is to be defended. In fact, it is more than likely that the expenditure per head for defences will be larger than that per capita of the other colonies owing to the vast extent of territory to be defended. The coast-line virtually commands three seas, north, west, and south. There is another matter. Take the ocean lighthouses. New South Wales, with between 700 and 800 miles of coast-line, expends a sum of £16,000 a year on lighthouses. According to the latest particulars which I have been able to obtain, in our own colony of Western Australia the sum expended per annum is £3,000 upon a coast-line 3,000 miles in length. Now, these facts emphasise the importance of us from this western colony, not only looking closely into this financial question.

but doing all that we can to impress upon the Convention the great inequalities of the position of that colony as compared with the rest of the colonies. In view of all these facts, I am afraid I cannot agree with my right hon. friend, Sir John Forrest, that Western Australia does not need exceptional treatment. It is unquestionably the case. Either we must compel the rest of Australia to accept the conditions applicable to us, and in the highest degree unjust and injurious to all or nearly all the other states, or we shall have to accept conditions which will be absolutely ruinous to ourselves. Indeed, it appears to me that if a common rule is to be laid down, we shall have to stand out of the commonwealth until we can make terms under that clause of the constitution which enables the commonwealth to bargain with a state in regard to the conditions of its admission. We are abnormal from first to last. The hon. member, Mr. Higgins, referred to our tariff. The hon. member did not pursue the argument; but, if he intended to show the abnormal conditions we stand in, I would take the opportunity of correcting him in regard to several points, especially as they concern the honor of those who are interested in the Government of the country, which has endeavoured to make the burden of taxation on the people as light as possible, insomuch that at the present time we stand in the position of the most lightly-taxed colony in the Australian group. We have no direct taxation whatever, excepting death duties on a limited scale. We have no property, income, or land tax; and, if you measure our tariff by the rest of the Australian tariffs in succession we come out at the bottom, New South Wales only excepted. With regard to the number of articles, the hon. member will find that we stand lower, with the single exception of New South Wales, than all the other colonies. The year before last we remitted taxation on twenty-one articles, and the year after on sixty-seven articles-altogether on nearly ninety articles.

Mr. HIGGINS:
There has been a change within the last two years!

The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:
Yes. Most of those articles are not single articles, but groups of commodities. In fact, as it stands now, out of a total import value of £6,500,000 at the very least £2,500,000 worth of goods come in free of duty.

An Hon. MEMBER:
How much of these imports come from the other parts of Australia?

The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:
£3,000,000, and I would point out that that will be very largely diminished within a very short time, because it consists mostly of farm produce, and in three or four years we shall be able to produce all we want in that respect.

Mr. WALKER:
Without protection?

The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:
Yes; we have no protection, except small duties levied on food, and the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest will bear me out in saying that they are left as much for the purpose of revenue as for protection. It is true that our customs revenue now is £7 15s. per head. That is thoroughly anomalous, and a belief has been expressed all round the Committee that that amount will diminish to something approaching £2 per head, which is the average for the whole of Australia. But we have always been abnormal in that respect. What the reason is I cannot say. It maybe that in a thinly-peopled country, possessing large productive resources, there is a smaller number of unproductive inhabitants than in the more densely-populated colonies. Ever since I have known the colony, since 1886, the customs revenue per head has never fallen below £4, and it has exceeded £5 even in years when gold was never heard or dreamt of.

Mr. SOLOMON:
Under a higher tariff!

The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:
Under a higher tariff than we have now, but under a lower tariff than we have had.

Mr. SOLOMON:
The male adults in Western Australia are seven-tenths of the population, and they earn £4 per week as against £2 per week in other colonies.

The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:

That is the case.

An Hon. MEMBER:

But it will not last!

The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:

It has lasted for ten years, but it will not last for ever. What is to be done under these circumstances? I entirely agree with the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest that we should revert to the provisions of the bill of 1891. In common with the great majority of the members of this Committee, I earnestly hope that the policy indicated of trusting an Australian parliament will be pursued. It seems to me that nothing is more cheering than the different spirit of this Convention now compared with its spirit when we met a few months ago. This Convention has reverted to the spirit of the Convention of 1891, when we were all for trusting to the federal parliament. For some reason doubts seem to have come across the minds of many of the now members of the Convention, if I may say so without offence, and they are unwilling to accord those large powers to the federal parliament which the Convention of 1891 had most willingly and unreservedly given. In fact, we are now beginning to trust the federal parliament. At the same time there is a great deal of force in what the hon. member, Mr. Symon, has urged, that, after all, we are asked to go into this union blindfold. What I would ask the Convention and its Finance Committee to bear in mind is that if we do take this leap in the dark they will at all events let us know how far we shall have to fall, so that there may be some limitation to our descent. I shall not be behind any me in trusting a parliament of our fellow-citizens of Australia. I have the most implicit confidence that when the time comes, even if we stand out for a time, the terms that an Australian state will ask will be fair ones, and that the terms that an Australian parliament offers will not be less fair.

Progress reported.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Motion (by Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:

That leave of absence for one week be granted to Mr. George Leake on account of urgent private affairs.

Convention adjourned at 5.9 p.m.
Wednesday 8 September, 1897

Petition - Federation of the Railways - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.
PETITION.
Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition from the responsible officers of the New South Wales Local Option League, praying that a provision be introduced into the constitution to prevent the forcing of alcohol and opium into any State against its wish.

FEDERATION OF THE RAILWAYS.
Mr. WISE:
I wish to ask you, sir, whether you have received a communication from the Wagga Farmers Conference, presenting a resolution to the effect that federation will not be acceptable to the producers, unless it provides for the federation of the railways; and if so, by what means such resolution can be laid on the table of the Convention?

The PRESIDENT:
I have received such a communication, and have consulted with the leader of the Convention on the subject; but it was thought that as the representation was not in the form of a petition, which is the proper mode of addressing this Convention as regards any action it is desired to take, the best course would be to acknowledge its receipt, and to point out what should be done. At the same time, if I understand it is the wish of the writers that publicity might be given to the communication, of course there will be no objection to handing the communication to the press.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
In committee (consideration resumed from 7th September, vide page 155):
Clause 88. Uniform duties of customs shall be imposed within two years after the establishment of the commonwealth.
Amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of South Australia:
In line 1, after "customs," to insert "and excise."
Question-That the words "and excise" be inserted-proposed.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[10.32]:
I have to express my regret that, in consequence of serious illness, I shall be unable to speak, perhaps, as clearly or as fully as I ought to do as Treasurer of Victoria; but I feel perfectly certain that hon. members will, under the circumstances, overlook any shortcomings on my part. I think this discussion has shown the wisdom of the course we are pursuing in having a general debate on financial matters before the Finance Committee undertake the very difficult and onerous task of once again endeavouring to devise a scheme in connection with the finances of the commonwealth which will bear scrutiny, and be satisfactory to the people interested. Certain tables have been circulated, and representatives here have referred to them, and I feel bound also to refer to them briefly. We recollect how those tables were sprung upon us in the Finance Committee and at the Convention in Adelaide. They were rammed down our throats, and we were led to believe, and people outside were, unfortunately, led to believe, that they were justifiable. On the basis of those tables we were told that the mother colony would have to bear the whole burden of federation, and that, while she was inclined to be generous to her poorer daughters to the extent of a few hundred thousand pounds, when it came to a million or so it was necessary to draw the line. Unfortunately also, the use of those tables has not stopped there, because others have unwittingly used them as being correct. Even my hon. friend, Mr. McMillan, in an address he delivered to the Chamber of Commerce, which he has published in a very useful pamphlet, referred to them in such a way as to lead a casual reader to believe that New South Wales, under the proposed system, would lose £668,000 a year and that Victoria would gain £812,000 a year.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I think I, to a certain extent, said that I did not absolutely consider them reliable!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The hon. gentleman qualified it to some extent.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

As much as I could!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

No, I do not think the hon. gentleman did, because he might have said that these figures were wholly and totally unreliable, as they undoubtedly are. The foundation on which they rest is absolutely rotten, and the hon. gentleman, as a financial man, must know it as well as any one here. That statement, coming from that hon. gentleman, has had great weight, and will do, to my mind, a considerable amount of injury unless it is clearly shown now, as may be done by this Convention, that these figures should have no reliance whatever placed on them. Fortunately for us, Mr. Pulsford has taken this task out of our hands, and he has shown clearly and distinctly by many examples, and if necessary I could add many others, and give further reasons—that these figures ought not to weigh one iota with us in considering this question. This bombshell was thrown in amongst us. Why it was thrown in I do not know, but it was thrown in, and at the time it had some effect. I believe it led some of my colleagues from Victoria to the conclusion that the only means of getting rid of this difficulty was the imposition of a land-tax, and as they were strongly against a land-tax, they were prepared to agree to almost anything. Unfortunately, like many other bombshells, although it did not accomplish its object, it has, to my mind, done more injury, especially in this colony, to federation than anything which has happened during the last ten years. The sooner we make it clear that we are perfectly satisfied that these figures should be put on one side the better for the cause we have at heart. No one, I think, will deny that ultimately the uniform tariff will, as nearly as possible, realise a uniform rate throughout the whole of Australasia. There may be variances in some colonies. They may contribute more on one line than they do on another; but in the colony where they contribute more on one line, they will probably contribute less on another line. Taking it all round, in my opinion, after thinking the matter out carefully and getting all the information I could, there is no reasonable doubt that we will, after some reasonable period, contribute equally per capita to the amount under a uniform tariff.

Mr. WALKER: Excepting Western Australia!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER: In all my remarks I intend to leave Western Australia out of the question, because the abnormal conditions existing there put us in a difficult position to deal with that colony, unless we treat her in an exceptional way, as undoubtedly the Finance Committee will do. The Victorian Government appointed a committee of gentlemen holding responsible positions—the Secretary of Customs, a gentleman who was for many years an accountant in the Customs, the accountant to the Treasury, the Government Statist, and a well-known accountant in our department—to investigate this matter. Hon. members will find their report in a document which Victoria's representatives have brought here for their consideration. On page 5 of their report they show that taking the customs and excise duties collected in 1896 on Australasian goods, and deducting that amount from the total customs revenue derived, the net amount per head in Victoria, New South Wales, and South Australia approximates very closely. I will give the figures. In Victoria, the total we collected was £2,047,000, the duties on Australian goods, £291,000, leaving a net amount of £1,756,000; in New South Wales, the total was £1,848,000, the duties on Australian goods, £201,000, leaving a net amount of £1,647,000; and in South Australia, the total was £1,452,000, the duties on Australian goods, £195,000, leaving a net amount of £1,257,000. These figures show that we contribute equally per capita to the amount under a uniform tariff.
South Wales the total was £2,259,000, the duties on Australian goods, £372,000, leaving a net amount of £1,887,000; and in South Australia the total was £556,000, with duties on Australian goods, £42,000, leaving a net amount of £514,000. Working this out the amount will come for Victoria to £1 9s. 9d.; for New South Wales to £1 9s. 10d.; and for South Australia to £1 9s. 1d. Mr. Pulsford follows that up by showing that, allowing for the difference in populations, the imports of New South Wales in 1896 would stand, after allowing for the exports, at about £10,000,000, against £8,000,000. He further quotes certain statistics from the Government Statistician's book which show that of tobacco and alcohol both colonies consume somewhat alike, the proportions being—New South Wales, tobacco, 3.38 lb.; Victoria, 3.01 lb.; alcohol, New South Wales, 2.17 gallons; Victoria, 2.32 gallons. Taking all the figures available, and looking at the position fairly, I think we are forced to the conclusion, as I have said, that we may fairly base all our calculations of the future on the assumption that in a few years time we may deal with the matter on a per capita basis. I think Mr. McMillan very fairly put the difficulty before us which is raised by the fact that we have in New South Wales a free-trade tariff, and in the other colonies practically a protective tariff. Whilst dealing with this subject and looking at it from a states point of view, I join my friend, Mr. Holder, in saying that we are not fairly or rightly subject to any charge of provincialism. We know that we are giving up to the commonwealth the elastic source of our revenue when we part with our customs. We are bound to see exactly where we are going to be led before we do that. Therefore, in the remarks I make with regard to the various proposals, I am bound, as Treasurer of Victoria for the time-being, to ascertain what amount of loss will be forded on the colony by joining the commonwealth, and also by what means we are going to make up that deficiency. We have had various schemes submitted for dealing with this troublesome situation. In 1891 we had a scheme which, I confess, I took to be fair and reasonable; but afterwards, when figures were applied to it, it was admitted by the authors, and is generally admitted now, to be one which would not be acceptable to a great many of the colonies. Then the Convention at Bathurst formulated a scheme which has met with no acceptance, because it would involve, practically for all time, bookkeeping; and book-keeping is so foreign to federation that I think we are fairly unanimous in our opinion that we should get rid of that system at the earliest possible date. Then our Finance Committee evolved a scheme, which received little support in the Convention. Ultimately the Treasurers were requested to formulate a scheme, and they did so, and that is really the only scheme at all practicable to my mind which is at present before us for consideration. We must not lose sight of the basis on which this scheme rests. It rests on a per capita distribution of the surplus. That is the leading principle upon which it is formulated, and many of us thought that the per capita distribution should come into operation at once on the imposition of uniform customs. But, again, the trouble of New South Wales having a free-trade tariff brought us face to face with a difficulty. It is pointed out by the representatives of that colony on the Finance Committee that if we brought the per capita system into operation at once we would deal somewhat unfairly with them, because they would, in the calculation of imports, receive a larger amount than they would get credit for in the distribution. It was pointed out very strongly that the uniform tariff, enabling manufactures to be started, would not take effect in that colony for a number of years. I myself thought there was some considerable force in that argument. We then came to a compromise that instead of having a sudden drop in that colony we should extend it over a period of five years. I think that was a fair arrangement. Indeed I have now come to the conclusion that it was somewhat too liberal an arrangement. I do not think there is so much in this question with regard to the imports, because there will be almost two years in which it will be known that a uniform tariff—an admittedly protective tariff to some extent is about to be imposed, and we may fairly assume that manufacturers in New South Wales will say, "We are to have this tariff, and we will be prepared as soon as it is imposed to compete with the outside world, and will start our manufactures at once." Then manufacturers in Victoria will not be blind to their interests. They have their machinery; they have their means of manufacturing; and they will lay in good stocks, and be prepared to supply New South Wales as soon as they have free-trade. Therefore, I think the amount of customs which will be collected will decrease much more rapidly than is anticipated. I think in one or two years my friends in New South Wales will probably find that the decrease will have taken place.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The right hon.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

If they, have not it is because politicians, in many instances, have not very great faith in themselves. If we are thought little of outside it is because we are in the habit of belittling ourselves inside.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I mean the chances of politics!
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The chances of politics, so far as this matter is concerned, as I will endeavour to show later on, are pretty certain to be that for many years under federation we will undoubtedly have a protective tariff against the outside world, so that in allowing the five years' sliding scale period I feel that we have treated the mother colony not only fairly, but liberally.

Mr. WALKER:

Does the right hon. gentleman think that Queensland would agree to that if she came in?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Queensland I have not considered, because she has so far not attempted to come here and show us what her difficulties are, or to endeavour to arrange such a scheme as she may eventually, come under.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

She has done a good deal of sliding already!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Undoubtedly she has, and I do not know that we ought to add to our many other difficulties by considering a colony which will not come here to help us to formulate such a scheme as might be satisfactory to her. I admire our friends from Western Australia; they do come here and point out their difficulties, and they find us all ready and willing, as we would be in the case of Queensland, to meet any fair and reasonable difficulties placed before us. The position in New South Wales in regard to free-trade is no doubt difficult to that colony, because, as was pointed out at the last Convention, and as has been pointed out in our parliaments and here, it will enable merchants to stock very largely under a free-trade tariff with, the view of ultimately sending the goods into the different colonies without the payment of duties. That is something we ought to endeavour to prevent. So far as the other colonies are concerned it has been-provided that although the goods may come into Sydney free of duty if they pass over the borders into other colonies those colonies are to get credit as if the duties had been paid by them. That of course places them in a fairly good position, but it places the commonwealth in the unfortunate position of having to pay money which it actually does not receive. There is another point in regard to that. Although the colony would not suffer to any appreciable extent, there is no doubt that the manufacturers in Victoria would suffer very largely in consequence of those goods being sent into that colony free of duty. The difficulty arises in New South Wales, and I say that New South Wales ought to be prepared to obviate it. We can to some extent in the other colonies obviate it by insisting that those goods, for a period at all events of twelve months, shall be charged with duty on passing into our colony-goods which have been imported with a view of putting profit into the merchants' pockets, doing something that may be perfectly legitimate in itself, but which is injurious to the commonwealth. Another suggestion has occurred to me, and I give it to the Convention for what it is worth. It may appear on further consideration that it is impracticable. I take it that the object of free-trade in New South Wales is to let the people of New South Wales have the benefits which it is alleged accrue from free-trade; but it is never intended to give what I, without wishing to be offensive, would call illegitimate benefits to the merchants; therefore I offer this suggestion: That if this federation is to take place it ought to be a condition that the Parliament of New South Wales shall impose a protective tariff, not for the purpose of doing away with free-trade—of course if they choose to impose a protective tariff for that purpose, well and good—I, as a protectionist, will be glad to see it; but, independently of that, I think it would be quite competent for them to impose a protective tariff for the purpose of getting rid of this difficulty by charging a duty and then allowing a rebate to all the importers who can show that the goods imported have actually been consumed in the colony during the specified time honestly and bona fide.

Mr. WALKER:
Would it not be better to make the intercolonial free-trade commence from the second year?

An Hon. MEMBER:
Where would New South Wales be able to get her revenue from?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
New South Wales would to some extent be able to get rid of the difficulty by imposing a reasonable tariff.

The Hon. J. HENRY:
How would you reach all the stocks in hand prior to the duties coming into force?

An Hon. MEMBER:
To prevent speculation?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The object that I have in view is to prevent illegitimate speculation, and I have no doubt that, if the Finance Committee thoroughly thrash out this scheme on a basis somewhat similar to that, we might, with the assistance of the representatives of New South Wales, come to a satisfactory arrangement, for they, in their own interest, ought to be anxious to prevent what I have mentioned from being done, because it is admitted, and it is true, that, if goods can be imported into New South Wales without any duty being paid upon them, and if we, in the other colonies, can get credit for them, not only will manufacturers be injured, and the commonwealth have to pay money it does not receive, but New South Wales, in the year of calculation, will be put at the bottom of the list, and that would form the basis for the other four years. If we can, on a reasonable basis, such as I have suggested, charge a duty, and if, as in our colony, we have an allowance of drawback to those who are not attempting to take advantage of us, we may to some extent obviate the difficulty. However, I admit that this idea occurred to me only lately. I have not thought it out as thoroughly as its importance may deserve, and, perhaps, other hon. members may be able to show that it is impracticable or unjust. I give it to the convention for what it is worth, in the hope that some hon. members for New South Wales will be able to discuss the matter, and show whether it is a reasonable and fair mode of dealing with the difficulty.

Mr. SOLOMON:

The right hon. gentleman's suggestion will give a lot of ammunition to the opponents of federation!

Mr. LYNE:

There is a great deal of ammunition left if you do not agree to it!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The hon. members Mr. McMillan, with his usual frankness has admitted that the per capita arrangement is the most scientific and simple means of dealing with the matter eventually, although it should not be enforced at present in the exceptional circumstances of New South Wales. If the period is not long enough we could, of course, lengthen it. The hon. gentleman also says that it is only fair to expect that the merchants of Sydney will load up. I desire to help the hon. gentleman to get a fair system, and to prevent the merchants of Sydney from loading up if we can do so fairly. This idea about loading up is apparently looked upon as a somewhat new one; but it was pointed out at the last Convention that no doubt the merchants would take advantage of this provision, and we knew that we had ultimately to devise some scheme as far as we possibly could to prevent this difficulty from arising. I ask hon. members whether any other scheme has been placed before us which is better than the one which is submitted. The hon. member, Mr. Holder, says that unfortunately this scheme does not appear to have been challenged. I have listened to all the other proposals, and I am still of opinion that this scheme, whether we adopt it here or whether the federal parliament adopt it hereafter, will be the basis of the system of distribution of the surplus that must ultimately come about.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The only objection to that scheme was basing it upon the first year. As a mere matter of form it is perfect!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I am glad that my hon. friend has gained experience, and will support me. There are two objections alleged. One in that the sliding scale term is not long enough. I think it is too long, but I will not go back on the compromise which has been made. I think five years is ample for New South Wales, and I do not object to five years, because we shall be actually dealing with the amount collected in one year, and if we extend the period to five years we shall not be giving too great an advantage to New South Wales.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I think that five years is conceded!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

No it is not. Some hon. members desire five and twenty years. As my hon. friend has pointed out, the real objection is that we have taken the wrong year. If we limit it to that point surely we can, among ourselves, devise a means of getting over the difficulty. It has been suggested that we should take the second year. If we do so it means another year's bookkeeping. But what is that if we can get a fair and equitable arrangement? If, by taking the second year, we can prevent this loading up and it would prevent it, though not altogether—and we can make this scheme fair and equitable, I shall be prepared to throw in my lot with those who say, "Let us take the second year, or an average of the first and second years." This is a matter with which I have no doubt the Finance Committee, if it comes before them, will, upon talking it over, be well able to deal. So far as I have been able to see, it is really the only objection of any weight which has been raised against this scheme, which has been open to criticism for so many months. It is true that many of the parliaments have simply wiped out the scheme, and they have not attempted to suggest any clauses showing what their ideas on the subject are. I consider that an admission on their part that, with the further length of time they have had, and the further information they have derived from the many criticisms which have been delivered in the various colonies, they are not prepared to submit any scheme which they think would be more acceptable to the people than that which the Treasurers suggested after the hurried consultation which they held over the matter in Adelaide. I have said that, so far as bookkeeping is concerned, I am one of those who desire to obviate the difficulty at the earliest possible moment. One writer in the press—evidently a very able gentleman—has told us that the whole difficulty can be got rid of by making savings equivalent to the amount we shall lose. It is apparently admitted that, if Queensland comes in, we shall lose intercolonial duties amounting to, probably, £1,000,000, and that if Queensland does not come in we shall lose less than half that amount. Of the £290,000 odd which we collect from intercolonial duties in Victoria, £190,000 is obtained from duties on sugar, most of which comes from Queensland, while £60,000 of what is left is collected by means of what our friends look upon as the very obnoxious stock-tax. Now we are told that we can save £1,000,000 a year by handing over and consolidating the debts of the various colonies.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
I think it is £500,000!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Well, £500,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
How shall we be able to save if we do not consolidate?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
We cannot. That is the difficulty. I have always argued that, eventually, we will, as a commonwealth, be able to save £1,000,000 a year, and perhaps more, as the loans of the various colonies expire, or as the time of expiration drawn near, though, no doubt, the colonies, if we do not federate, will themselves be able to save almost as much. I am not at all sure that, upon the renewal of the existing loans, the money-lenders will be very much more pleased with the commonwealth securities than they are with the securities which are offered to them now by the different colonies.
They know that they are perfectly safe now, and, as astute business men, you are perfectly satisfied that the colonies are always solvent enough to pay the interest. While, no doubt, they would like to have a larger consolidated stock for market purposes and it is our curse now that we have no large stock-

Mr. SOLOMON:
They would like to have an interminable stock!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Yes. That would be better for market purposes. Therefore, when we came to renew, or when we came to borrow further, we should probably get better terms. But so far as security is concerned, I am perfectly convinced that the securities of the individual colonies are just as good as the securities of the federal government would be. So that any saving of this kind is at the present time a myth; and that is a point which we must very carefully bear in mind. We know that a loss must take place if we have federation, and that, unless the states recover almost as much as they contribute to the federal government, they will not be able to carry on their work. The saving which would be gained by consolidating our loans would no doubt take place eventually; but it is a saving which we cannot take into consideration now. The same remark would apply in regard to the saving which would take place upon the consolidation of the railways. I believe that if the railways were consolidated, and managed under federal control, free from the pressure which can be brought to bear by the states, higher rates could be charged and more revenue could be raised. But the amalgamation of the railways is, at the present time, admittedly impossible. Therefore we must put any saving on that account out of the question altogether. Dealing shortly with the loans question, while I usually agree with the hon. member, Mr. Holder, I do not agree with his position that we ought not to say in the bill we are framing that it shall be compulsory upon the commonwealth to take over the loans of the colonies, because that will be giving a bonus to the English capitalist. If we say that we are going to amalgamate, and we propose to convert and to consolidate our loans at once, no doubt the prices of our stock will go up, because the holders of it will ask for more. But we are not likely to do that. It will be only as the stock falls due that the commonwealth will be able to convert upon anything like terms which will suit us. If we simply say that the commonwealth may take over these loans

-as, we ought to do to avoid the difficulty—will not the same difficulty arise when we come to convert and to consolidate, if we ever do? The moment it is intimated that the commonwealth intends to consolidate the loans of the various colonies, the holders of the stock will say, "This is going to be more valuable and we shall want more for it." If we are to bargain with individual holders of stock, and to say, "We will give you so much if you will take the new stock on our terms," then we shall have, not one large stock, but partly old stock and partly consolidated stock.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The holders of the stock must take payment if we offer it to them!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

They need not take payment for the stock until it falls due. If we wait until the stock falls due, it is immaterial whether we say that it shall be optional, or that it shall be compulsory, to take it over. But if we make it compulsory, I say that even then it will make no difference.
The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
We cannot make it compulsory, because there are two parties to the bargain!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Well, as the Convention was against me upon this point before, I will not press it any further at the present time. I am against the proposal to take over only a portion of the loans. I think it would be a great mistake for the commonwealth to take over loans to the extent of £30 or £40 per head, if that were a fair mode of arranging the matter, which it is not, anymore than the per capita scheme is. I would not be in favour of taking over a portion of the debts of the colonies, making the commonwealth responsible for a portion of the debts of the colonies, and the individual states responsible for another portion of it.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is not proposed!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
It is proposed by some that the commonwealth shall take over the debts of the colonies to the amount of £40 per head of the population.

The Hon. J. HENRY:
Take over the whole of the debts, but make it obligatory on the colonies to be responsible to the federal government for all in excess of a certain proportion.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That, I believe, is the proposal put forward by Tasmania; but the proposal was made at the last sitting of the Convention at Adelaide that the commonwealth should be at liberty to take over only a portion of the debts of the colonies.

An Hon. MEMBER:
A ratable proportion!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That is objectionable, because it would never do. We want to have one stock.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Power is given in the bill!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Yes, I know it is there; but it would be unwise to exercise that power. However, it is only a power in the bill, and the federal parliament would exercise its wisdom in dealing with the matter. Now, it is perfectly clear that we must not have a surplus. That has been a trouble to Treasurers in days gone by, and will be a trouble to the federal treasurer unless we take the surplus away from him by some definite and distinct means. On one occasion in Victoria we had a surplus of £1,700,000, and we have been in trouble ever since. We do not want a surplus like that again; we are satisfied with smaller ones now. But it is admitted that we must hand over to the federal government the customs if we are to have a federation, and that source of revenue will undoubtedly furnish a surplus. Now, we have to divide it. There are only two ways of dividing it either in proportion to the collection from each colony or per capita. Those are the only two propositions it is possible to suggest. If we are to divide the surplus on the basis of collection it will necessitate book-keeping accounts for all time, or for as long a period as the practice is continued. Therefore, I think we have come down to only one mode which is feasible, and that in the per capita distribution, subject to such modifications as will make it fair from the present time. We have had two or three suggestions to that end which are well worthy of consideration. One is: that we shall deal with narcotics and spirits as distinct subjects. That might to some extent get over the difficulty. I am not now in favour of it; but I admit that it is well worth consideration. It has also been suggested that in calculating the population we should deal with adults or with males, and that might enable us to meet the views of the other colonies. I have no decided view upon the question, and I am quite willing to consider it with our hon. friends upon the Finance Committee if the scheme will get us out of the difficulty. One thing we must keep before us: we cannot have an absolute equality. If we are to enter this federation there must be give and take; and certain of the colonies must be prepared to sacrifice something for the assistance of the smaller colonies—to enable them to tide over their difficulty. We must keep this one point always before us, and be prepared to tell those we represent that we are making sacrifices, but that we think the end in view justifies them—that we must be prepared to make some reasonable sacrifice for the purpose of bringing us together in the great scheme we all desire to see accomplished. Now what suggestions have been made which would enable the Finance Committee to arrive at any decision in this matter? The most popular—and it is one which seems to have been well received, as far as I can judge—is that we should shelve the matter—that we should leave it to the federal parliament to decide it—that we are not competent to deal with the question—that we must give it up as something beyond our powers, and must trust the federal body with this great matter as we have trusted them with other matters. But even those who advocate that particular proposal are divided into three classes.
Some are prepared to trust the federal parliament if they will guarantee a certain amount for all time. Some are prepared to trust them if there be a guarantee of a fixed amount for five years. Others, again, are prepared to trust them absolutely. Now, how are we to meet these three classes? My hon. friend, Mr. McMillan, also says that he will trust the federal parliament, but he says that he thinks that in deference to the views of the other colonies-and this was elicited by an interjection—we should have a period of five years.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

In deference to their peculiar position!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

New South Wales, with its enormous land revenue, the hon. member tells us, is in a position different from the other colonies. I think she has about £2,000,000 a year from land, and, as a matter of fact, about £1,250,000 of that is derived from the sale of land. Now, I think that if New South Wales can manage to get a certain amount of extra revenue without much injury to the people, it would be a good thing to do it; and instead of eating up all this capital and using it for current purposes, she might very fairly deal with the money in the direction of forming a sinking fund, with a view to the payment of some of her liabilities. That would be a grand idea. We have started it in a small way in Victoria, and it is gradually growing with us. For instance, we have taken the whole of the mallee country, and we say, "Whatever we get from this land we will put into a sinking fund for the purpose of eventually helping to pay off our debt." Now, New South Wales has £1,250,000 of revenue from the sale of land. She could put the whole of that into a sinking fund, and could in a few years wipe off her debt, and be free from the interest she has now to pay. I throw that out as a suggestion. If my protectionist friends are in office they might collect another £500,000 from protective duties. They would then be able to take a large proportion of this capital and apply it to this particular purpose.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

We might give you an area for a federal capital free!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

You might give us Riverina. I will make a bargain with my hon. friend. If New South Wales, with her usual generosity, is anxious to help us, let the hon. member advocate before his constituents, or in the next Parliament, that Riverina should be handed over to Victoria.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

You say you have it now!
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

We have it practically. Now my hon. friend, Mr. Deakin, who is an ardent federationist, cuts the Gordian knot very simply. He says we shall get rid of all the difficulty if we take a certain fixed sum calculated on the receipts, as at present, or for a series of years, and making that the amount to be handed over to the states. On its being pointed out to the hon. member that it that were to be done the interest on the debts might be reduced, whilst the customs might steadily increase until they brought in a very large amount under the uniform tariff, the hon. member said, "Let that be the minimum amount" - that being the amount proposed by the hon. member. But we should deal with the whole surplus. In America they handed over the whole duties less a fixed amount, thereby having a very large sum, and there was a continuous demand for its extravagant expenditure, and I am afraid that under the arrangement suggested by the hon. member we should have taking place that which has taken place in America. On the other hand, if we make it the minimum amount there would be continual logrolling, and continual pressure would be brought to bear upon the federal parliament to get better terms, as has occurred in Canada. While I agree with the hon. member on many subjects, I cannot agree with him as to this mode of getting rid of the difficulty. The hon. member, Mr. Walker, brought forward a scheme to capitalise the discrepancies. I endeavoured to understand it; but I confess that so far I have not mastered its intricacies. As, however, we shall now have the benefit of the hon. member's advice upon the Finance Committee, I have no doubt that we shall eventually understand the matter. If the hon. member's scheme obviates the difficulty, we shall no doubt be very glad to deal with it. It carries on book-keeping, however, for a period of five years. The hon. member says, "Let invoices be sent in"; but we know that if we have to trust to the merchants to send in invoices, in a number of cases it will not be done.

Mr. WALKER:

Make it compulsory!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

You may make it so, and you may impose any penalty you like; but the matter will be left to clerks; they will be careless, and invoices will not be sent in. However, I have not yet had an opportunity of thoroughly understanding the hon. member's scheme. I have no doubt we shall do so when we

[P.166] starts here

there be extravagance. It is all very well to say that we should trust them; but we know that when a Treasurer has money to spend, pressure is brought to bear on him to spend that money. Look at what is occurring in Victoria. For the first time in many years we have a trifling surplus. Is not pressure being brought to bear upon me from all sides to spend it?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Does not the hon. member resist it?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I do resist it, and intend to resist it; but if I had a surplus of £400,000 or £500,000 the pressure would be too strong. No Treasurer could resist it. So surely as you allow the federal parliament a surplus to spend, so surely will the Government of the day insist on spending a great deal of it. There has been the same experience in every colony, and we shall have the same experience wherever we have to deal with human nature. I am strongly of opinion that we ought at once to saddle the federal parliament with such liabilities that there will be no surplus. The only way is to give them a greater expenditure than they will have receipts from customs to meet. The mere ordering of them to pay interest on the debt will not get rid of the difficulty of distribution of the surplus. It must be provided for on the per capita basis or upon some other system.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

What about the future debts?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

There will be only one consolidated debt for the whole of Australia. The federal parliament will have to take over the whole of the present debt, and when once they take over the present debt-

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Future borrowing will have to be done with the consent of the central government!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The borrowing will have to be by the central government for a particular colony, and that particular colony will become responsible for the interest.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The federal government could not be responsible for all the states might borrow!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Not unless it assented, and that would be the most effective check upon improper borrowing. I quite admit that we must have one authority to deal with the loans.

Mr. LYNE:

Supposing one state wanted to borrow money for a railway, would you give the federal government power to prevent that?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I think it necessarily follows that if we hand over the existing debts, we cannot make the federation liable for one portion of the debts and separate colonies liable for other parts of the debts. It is impossible to have two systems running concurrently with any satisfaction; but I am quite open to hear argument on the other side of that question. I am quite certain that if that course is to be taken, we must have only one borrower. As far as New South Wales is concerned, I think, as I have said before, that she has been very liberally dealt with. We have met her very fairly on the question of the aggregate distribution. The first idea was that a limited amount of the surplus was to be handed back to each state. It was pointed out to us that owing to the unfortunate policy—I will not say the unfortunate, but the present policy—of New South Wales, she would get less under that arrangement than she contributed. We then agreed, in fairness, to make the amount an aggregate sum. To meet New South Wales, we agreed to a sliding scale. We must not forget that although New South Wales may contribute a considerable sum, she will undoubtedly save a large amount in expenditure if the surplus is distributed per capita instead of an exact amount. The Hon. Sir Philip Fysh has shown by his tables that the saving will be a large sum. Whether his figures are absolutely correct I am not prepared to say. It is admitted by all the writers in New South Wales that a distribution per capita is favourable to this colony, so on the whole I think New South Wales has not much to grumble about in connection with the various proposals which have been put forward. I shall now deal shortly with the questions of the railways and the appointment of an interstate commission, because, although they are hardly before us at the present time, they have been introduced into the discussion. As far as the inter-state commission is concerned, I think it is somewhat peculiar that when the Finance Committee recommended such a commission, with certain powers and authorities, when we came to consider the draft bill, we found in it a proviso which was very objectionable to Victoria, although we were told it was put in for our benefit. We could not see the benefit to us of that particular proviso, which was as follows:—

But shall have no powers in reference to the rates or regulations of any railway in any state except in cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect, and made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway from the railway of a neighbouring state.

After careful consideration we asked that that should be struck out. Now that it has been struck out, all interest in this inter-state commission seems to have died. It is not wanted; it is of no use. It is rather a curse. It is somewhat peculiar that this inter-state to commission should have been somewhat popular at the last Convention while the proviso existed, and that it should now be so unpopular after the proviso has been struck out. I put very shortly the views I held with regard to this railway rate question at the last Convention. At page 1129 of the official report, it will be found that I said:

Whatever are the natural advantages of a port, no state should be allowed to interfere, so as to draw trade from its natural channel; that absolute justice should be done to all parts of the commonwealth, leaving out imaginary boundary lines; that the people in all districts shall have conceded to them the advantages of their natural position; and that no obstruction to the free flow of traffic in its natural channel should be allowed.

I now say, after months of further opportunity for consideration, that that is the true federal principle whether it be a question of railway or water carriage. If we are to have a true federation we should wipe out all our imaginary lines, our platform speakers, and after dinner orators. It is the object of federation to wipe out our imaginary lines of demarcation, and to have one great island continent. If that is the true principle on which federation is to be based, then we ought to deal with the railways so that our people in all parts of the country shall be able to send their goods to their natural port, and not be forced by any artificial means to send them to a port which is not their natural port. Of course, this is a serious subject for South Australia, and it is also a serious subject for Victoria.

Mr. McMILLAN:

By natural port do you mean the nearest port?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Not always. All things being equal the nearest port is the natural port. Of course, it might be that being closer to a railway line, it would suit some people to send their goods to Sydney and not to Melbourne.

Mr. WALKER:

The right hon. gentleman said it was a serious matter for South Australia; how is it so?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Because by the railway rates that we impose we prevent traffic from going to South Australia which ought to go there; If we have federation we are perfectly prepared to consent that that traffic should go there. The serious subject as between New South Wales and Victoria is the Riverina trade. Victorian capital and the Victorian people brought Riverina to the front while New South Wales neglected it.
Victorian railways have been taken there as far as we could take them. If we had had the Riverina district, as we ought to have had, we would have taken our railways further on. We opened up that territory years ago. Until lately we had undisputed possession, but New South Wales has since claimed it.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Does Victoria pay for the roads, the gaols, and courthouses in that part of the country?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

No; but we have not sent any of our criminals there. There is no doubt that we have opened up that part of the country, and it cannot be expected that our people and our merchants are going to quietly submit, by the provisions of this bill, to have the present cut-throat policy abolished as far as Victoria is concerned, while the same cut-throat policy is to be continued by New South Wales. We are prepared to have that cut-throat policy on both sides swept away, but we are not prepared to give up our weapon of defence or offence while that weapon is still to be used by New South Wales.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Just because you happen to be there!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Just so, and, geographically, the district belongs to us.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

That is one way of getting a title! The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER: So far as this railway question is concerned, it must remain as it is, or, otherwise, there must be an independent tribunal established to settle the difficulty. We care not whether it is the federal parliament, the federal judiciary, or an inter-state commission. That is immaterial; but unless we are to have some independent tribunal you may rest assured our people will be determined to fight, not for the purpose of getting the trade, but for the purpose of keeping it, because we have it already. The hon. member, Mr. McMillan, admits that. It may mean that we shall have to reduce our railway rates all round, and give concessions to people in our own colony similar to those we give to people outside; but I am perfectly certain that our merchants and I do not look upon this as a strong bar to federation—will insist on reducing our railway rates, so as to keep the trade we have already. I do hope some means will be devised to prevent this conflict in future. I think no power should be allowed to use the railways so as to destroy the benefits of intercolonial free-trade. Unless we have some independent tribunal to decide this question, I say unhesitatingly that, to a, very great extent, the railways can be worked so as to prejudice what we desire to see, namely, intercolonial freetrade. I do hope that some provision will be inserted in the constitution, or that some independent tribunal will be established, so as to enable us to get over that difficulty. I now come to the last point I purposed to deal with-I have been longer than I intended—and it is the most important of all. I allude to the popular idea that we are to leave this entirely to the federal parliament. We know that we are going to have great difficulty in convincing people to enter into this bargain at all. It has been said that Victoria is going to gain immense benefits from federation. But I do not know that that is so. I am not so sure about it. To begin with, we shall have a larger number of people to contend with, who are interested as farmers in keeping on what is called the obnoxious stock-tax, which five years ago was imposed by a unanimous house immediately after a general election.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Not a unanimous house!
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Well, as unanimous as a house is possible to be on a subject.

An Hon. MEMBER:
There was a majority!
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
A practically unanimous house. My hon. friend, Mr. Deakin, will recollect that so strong was the feeling that the government of the day was almost forced to take up that subject before the great question on which their existence depended—the question of the railway commissioners.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Hear, hear; that is right!
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Although my hon. friend and one or two others were opposed to the stock-tax I think he will admit that it was passed by a practically unanimous House. Now, we do not want to give a handle to the class of opponents I have referred to, enabling them to say that we should not enter into federation. Then there are our manufacturers. They will naturally look at the question in this light: While expecting to gain an advantage during the first few years, they will recognise that there are just as clever men in New South Wales, that New South Wales has a far larger territory, that New South Wales has its coal and minerals to work upon, and that ultimately in its manufactures it will catch up to and probably excel Victoria. For many other reasons I have come to the conclusion that it is a mistake to think that federation is going to be such a great boon to Victoria, and such a great loss to the other colonies, I believe that New South Wales is the colony which has more to gain from federation than all the others put together, and the people of New South Wales should be those most anxious to see federation brought into existence.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

There is no question that it will be so ultimately. My hon. friend must see that the feeling I have referred to will grow in Victoria, and that the people there who are interested will say, "The benefits we are going to derive for the first four or five years will be more than swept away by the losses we will ultimately sustain by the competition to which we shall be exposed. We shall not be able to have the trade of New South Wales, and we shall have New South Wales competing with us in our own colony of Victoria."

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

We in Victoria have the New South Wales market open now, but New South Wales has not our market!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

We certainly have the New South Wales market open, but we have to contend on equal terms with the outside world.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

The hon. member must not look upon that as permanent?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I do not think it will be permanent. Therefore, the aspect of the case I have mentioned will be found to be rather a serious one when we are advocating federation in our colony. We shall go to the people knowing that we have a large number who, in their own interests as farmers and manufacturers, will be opposed to the scheme knowing also that there are a large number of the people who are apathetic. We know that we have to get a vote of 50,000 to carry federation. We know there are hundreds and thousands of people who will not trouble themselves to go to vote-men who do not go to vote at a general election unless you drag them there. They will not care to vote on federation, and there will be no one to drag them there. Knowing that we have these difficulties to contend against, is it wise for us, sitting here as a body, to admit our inability to deal with this subject, and to go before our people and say, "Shut your eyes, open your mouth, and swallow whatever the federal parliament may give you"? Why should we give such a handle to those who are opposed to federation and strongly object to it? Then there is another class whom we must not omit.
There are a large number of people who are strongly opposed to direct taxation. Will they not be afraid that, if they are to trust the federal parliament altogether, there may be just a slight possibility that the federal parliament may say, "We are not going to raise all this money from customs. We do not care for the states. It is true we here are the representatives of the states" -

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
They care for the people!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That is true, but still they will represent very large constituencies. I do not say absolutely that the view I have suggested will be taken by the federal parliament. But my hon. friend known as well as I do that it would be a very catching argument to those opposed to federation. It caught on here. When it was put to the Finance Committee, it caught them. It was put to them in the light of the land-tax. That very same argument would have some effect put to the people of the class to which I refer. They will say, "There is going to be a land-tax. A few of us only are going to be taxed to raise all these millions, and we had better not have federation at all." That argument would have a strong effect upon those who are wavering in the balance-those who are not very strong in their opinions in favour of federation.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Does the right hon. gentleman think anybody would believe that for the first few years of federation any taxation would be imposed, except through the customs? It would be impossible!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I think a large number of people would believe it. I do not say that there would be direct taxation under the commonwealth. What I mean is that the commonwealth would raise what it required, and would say: What do we care for the states? Let them raise what they require by direct taxation." I do not believe the commonwealth would do that; but such an argument would be put by the opponents of federation. It would be a very catching argument, and would take with a very large number of people. I want to avoid the possibility of that argument being put forward, because I honestly desire to see federation brought about. I do not believe that the colony of Victoria, my native land, is going to de all the benefit. I believe that we shall derive some benefit, and I believe that even if we suffer some losses, it is well that we aboard suffer those losses in order that we may have the greater advantage of federation. I believe that the benefits we shall derive from federation will counterbalance the losses we may sustain. Although I am not strongly impressed with the idea that we are going to derive all the benefit, I believe that we shall derive some benefit, and that we ought to join in the proposed federation. But I believe New South Wales is the colony that is going to derive most benefit. The difficulty that occurs to me in connection with this scheme is that we are going to ask the people to accept it blindfold. We are not prepared, to formulate any reasonable scheme to be placed before them. We are going to say to them, "We cannot tell you what the basis of this will be. We have to trust entirely to the federal parliament." Although those of us sitting here who have watched the matter with deep interest, and have thought it out carefully, may be perfectly prepared to do that, I venture to say there are hundreds of thousands in all our colonies who will be afraid, who will not trust the federal parliament, and who will abstain from voting altogether, and that under those circumstances we should run a great risk of not getting a majority in favour of the proposal. The proposal in the bill is that we should continue as we are for two years, and that then we should have a uniform tariff. It is said that the Convention cannot decide this question, because we do not know what the uniform tariff will be, and we do not know what the effect of the uniform tariff will be in the different colonies. In what better position would the parliament be for two or three years after the uniform tariff was in operation than we are at the present moment? It will not be able to know what the effect of the tariff will be, and it will not be able to say what should be a fair means of distribution, and either it will have to work in the dark, as we are working in the dark, or we must devise for some period a scheme on which the federal parliament should proceed. It is possible for us in this Convention to deal with the matter in a fair and equitable way. Personally, I do not know that I would object to, leave the matter to the federal parliament, for this reason: that the great issue at the first election would undoubtedly be, protection of free-trade. While I believe that there would be an overwhelming majority of protectionists, I admit that from each colony would be sent some free-traders. I do not think we should have a mass vote in any one colony. I think that all classes should be represented in the federal parliament. But, surely as we leave this an open question, to surely will the protectionists get a block vote, because those who are afraid of a land-tax, and who are free-traders, will say, rather than run the risk of having a land-tax, "We will vote for the man who is a protectionist, and will raise revenue by customs duties." As a protectionist, I shall be very glad to leave the whole matter to the federal parliament, because I believe there will be a unanimous vote for protection in all the colonies except New South Wales, and in that colony I believe a good many protectionists will be returned if this is left an open question. I know the difficulty in which our friends here are placed. They do not want to put anything in the bill which will tell their people that it is going, to be a protectionist tariff; they want to leave it an open question. They say "there is a majority of free-traders in New South Wales, and if we tell them that it is going to be a protective tariff they will vote against us." I think the other difficulty will be just as great, and if these free-traders fear that the whole of this large amount is going to be raised by direct taxation, of some sort or other, then they will probably rather send men to the federal parliament who are in favour of protection against the outside world than men who will take such a course as to force individual colonies to impose direct taxation to make up their requirements. My hon. friend, Mr. Holder, touched a sore point. He said, "Before I agree to leave this to the federal parliament, I want to know how that parliament is going to be constituted." What is going to happen? As the matter is now, we are leaving the smaller states power, practically, by their veto, to decide what the tariff is to be. Are we willing to go a step further, and at once allow them to say, not alone what that tariff is to be, and what the surplus is to be, but how that surplus is to be distributed? With equal representation in the senate, and with the power of veto they possess there, are we prepared to leave to them this power of saying how this surplus is to be distributed? I am not afraid of a combination, but other people are. That is another argument which will be used outside by the opponents of federation. Then, those who are advocating, and will advocate hereafter very strongly, that the smaller states are not to have equal representation, will use this fact as a strong lever; they will say "We are going to leave to the federal parliament the distribution [P.172] starts here of this immense surplus. Do you think we are going to leave it to them if they who contribute only in a small amount are going to have the absolute power of saying how it shall be distributed?" They will argue very strongly that the federal parliament has that power, and that, therefore, there should be proportional representation of the smaller states. I warn my friends from the larger states that they are met with the difficulty that the smaller states are going to control this matter, and I warn my friends from the smaller states that they will be met with the argument that they must not have equal representation, because they will be met with the argument that we cannot give them equal representation, because they are going to dictate to us. We must agree to a compromise; although my colleague does not agree with it, I hope it will be carried out. I feel that, if we are going to put this extra difficulty in the way, in all probability those who represent the smaller states, and who voted with us on that occasion, will not feel justified in voting with us on this occasion; and, that being so, the question which was fought then of giving equal rights in regard to money bills will be reversed at this Convention. So surely as it is reversed, so surely you make an end to any federation. My hon. friend, Mr. Holder, touched that sore point. It is undoubtedly, a sore point. It is one which we ought to obviate if we can. This is a great difficulty, but we ought not to say we are not to make a further effort; even if we spend months more over it, if necessary, we ought not to say we are going to give it up in despair until we put our heads together, until we have thought it out once more, until we can see whether we can meet the difficulties which are raised, until we see whether outsiders or ourselves can suggest some other or better scheme. I have said that I am against the scheme of leaving it to the federal parliament. I believe, even if I am charged with provincialism, that the states must be protected. I believe the state treasurers must know, at all events, for five years, that they are going to receive a certain amount of money. I believe the states must have that money to enable them to carry on. I believe, if we are going to get our people to go into a federation, we must be prepared to tell them, "The utmost you can lose during the first five years will be so much. We think you ought to lose that sum. We know by the ever-increasing customs that ultimately we will get more than sufficient returned to us by way of surplus on whatever basis may be adopted, and, therefore, we advise you to accept the scheme." But unless we can tell our people that, then I feel that we are asking them to do something which is impossible for them to do. There is one difficulty I can see in this scheme, and that is, that it is hard and fast, that once we embody it in our constitution it will be very difficult indeed to alter it. I have not been able to give this matter the full consideration which its importance demands, and which its seriousness entitles it to receive. I think we may possibly evolve some means of obviating that. We ought to lay down in our constitution principles somewhat on the lines which are laid down in the bill as it stands, but I quite admit that if they are found to work inequitably there should be some means of altering them. In other instances we have left to the federal parliament the right to alter provisions. I throw out for thing from giving the federal parliament the power to initiate a new scheme. Although I do not think the difficulty will ever arise, I think it is wise to have some simpler mode of dealing with that difficulty than is proposed in the bill. The bill makes it hard and fast, and if we can by some modification of the scheme leave it to that body to ultimately say that the scheme is unfair and inequitable, then I think we might fairly be prepared.
to say that having provided for five years, having guarded the first difficulty of the various states for the time during which they are going through a period of transition, the time when the customs revenue is not increasing at a sufficiently rapid rate to give them back all the money they have parted with at the present time-having protected them for five years, we may fairly then trust the federal parliament to alter the scheme if it is inequitable. We are now trusting them after the interval of five years, because we are placing no limit on them. I think if we went to the full length which some of us would desire to go, we would say that even after five years they should return to us a certain percentage of the customs revenue-that they should return to us for all time 70 per cent. of the customs, keeping 30 per cent. for themselves; but as we are giving to them, necessarily, the power of saying for themselves what the customs revenue at the end of five years shall be, I, for one, do not press the idea of insisting that they should return us a certain percentage for all time. I think that suggestion may possibly obviate the difficulty. Therefore my view of the matter is this: that as no one has yet been able to suggest a better scheme than the despised scheme of the Treasurers-the one that has been swept away so quietly, the one upon which the power of destruction has been brought to bear-we are bound to follow it out. Let us modify it and meet the difficulty with regard to the test year; let us modify it with regard to the period after the five years. If we cannot devise a better, let us, as representatives of the various colonies, put that scheme forward. Let us not finally decide it now; let us allow the Convention to stand over for a period-

The Hon. J. HENRY:
That's the point!

An Hon. MEMBER:
Better that than ruin it altogether!

The Hon. J. HENRY:
It would be ruined altogether!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I confess I desire to see federation brought about as much as any man. That is the object I have in view.

An Hon. MEMBER:
-

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
What we do now is final. If we put a scheme before the people now we shall have no power to alter it.
An Hon. MEMBER:
Nor have they!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The people will have no power to alter it; it will be a definite and distinct scheme to which the people will have to say "aye" or "no." We are asked-I care not how long we may sit to do it-to formulate a distinct and definite scheme, which, when completed, we cannot alter, to be put before the people. After an adjournment some of us may be able, from information we may obtain from outside, to suggest something none of us have yet thought of.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
But that would apply to anything at any time!

An Hon. MEMBER:
And are we to have no further opportunity of considering that?

An Hon. MEMBER:
The people have been considering it since 1891!

Mr. MCMILLAN:
What is the good of discussing this now?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I am only stating what I think we ought to do. We ought not to shunt the matter to the federal parliament. We ought to decide definitely the best scheme we possibly can. Then we shall have to adjourn—there is no doubt of that—unless the Convention is prepared to go on in the absence of Victoria. We ought not at this sitting to finally decide any scheme, but we ought to decide the best scheme tentatively, and we ought to have another opportunity of making it permanent, and of hearing any objections to it in the meantime. It may be that we may afterwards propose an entirely new scheme. Are we to positively say, "The scheme submitted to this Convention is the best and only scheme"? I cannot see why there is an objection to the idea of adjourning for a little time.

The Hon. J. HENRY:
Does the right hon. gentleman want to adjourn for ever?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
No, a couple of months.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Suppose there was more danger in adjournment than in completing the
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

If there are some schemes with which I am not acquainted, well and good. We are putting forward as our last conclusion a scheme that we have no power to alter.

An Hon. MEMBER:

That would be an objection to any heaven-born scheme!

Another Hon. MEMBER:

Let us have a scheme from the other place!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

There are a good many members of "the devil's brigade" here, and possibly the lawyers may agree upon a scheme although it does not seem as if the Treasurers ever will. The Finance Committee have had the benefit of all the arguments which have been adduced, and I would like them to have the benefit of a few more. After listening to the arguments I have come to the conclusion that many of us are prepared to leave the matter to the federal parliament. If we are, let us take the responsibility of passing a direct resolution, and saying at once, "We are prepared to leave the whole matter to the federal parliament to be dealt with without any restriction." If that is done, the work of the Finance Committee is at an end, and they have nothing to recommend. It is of no use the Finance Committee spending days in discussing various ideas and schemes if the majority of the Convention are prepared to eventually send, the matter to the federal parliament. If we do that we end the matter, and finish the whole of our business.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

If we decide on a definite guarantee, the scheme we propound is as good as any—that is, if we alter the first year!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I do not know that that would necessarily be adopted; but if we are prepared to, take the responsibility to which I have referred let us take it at once, and shorten the work we have to do. Whilst the members of the Finance Committee are discussing the matter the Convention will not be able to proceed with important work, and it is useless wasting day after day discussing the details of the various schemes, and then to have the Committee telling us, "Our mind is made up; we are going to leave the matter to the federal parliament." Again, if we are prepared to leave the matter to the federal parliament after a period of five years, let us say so by a distinct resolution, and limit our labours to devising a scheme in respect of that five years. My idea, after hearing all that has been said, is that the scheme proposed by the Treasurers is the best that has as yet been submitted. I do not know that a better scheme could be proposed. I am prepared to stand by it, and, to do the best I can to advocate it in the colony I represent. I am prepared to meet the various objections which have been raised to it by modifications. I would ask hon. members, however, not to put hindrances in the way of the Finance Committee, but to give them direct instructions as to what we desire.

Let us tell them we are prepared to leave the matter to the federal parliament to be dealt with at once, or to be dealt with after a period of five years. If we do that we shall shorten the work of the Convention and of the Finance Committee. I regret I have trespassed on the time of hon. members so long, but as the other Treasurers have expressed their views, I felt bound, representing the colony of Victoria, to place my opinions as fully as I could before the Convention. Otherwise it might possibly have been said that I had something to conceal, or that there was something to which I was afraid to give utterance.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia):[12]

I am sure that hon. members have been gratified by what has been already referred to, that is, the marked advance made in the federal spirit since our assembling in Adelaide. If the result of this debate should be to lessen the work that would otherwise devolve on the Finance Committee, it will not be a subject of regret. The Right Hon. Sir George Turner pointed out that it might be urged that there were two objections to the suggestion that has been made to handing over the settlement of the financial question to the federal parliament. One objection might seem to be of considerable weight; but I think that on a little reflection the sense of its importance will be greatly diminished. The right hon. gentleman stated that if you allow this question of finance to be settled with a perfectly free hand by the federal parliament, objection might be made to granting to all the states the right of equal representation in the senate, and those who are still advocating the application to the senate of the system of proportional representation will find their opposition strengthened by additional arguments. But I would say that, as far as I am concerned, I am still prepared to take up the position which I assumed in the Convention at Adelaide—that of, to some extent, tying down the hands of the senate as against the house that represents the people at large. Notwithstanding the fear expressed by the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, I, at all events, and I believe the right hon. the President of the Convention, will adhere to the votes which we then gave, and on questions of finance will not allow the upper house equal power with the house that represents the population. If that is the case I do not see where there is an opening for very much fear on the part of the larger states that a settlement of the financial question inequitable to the larger states will be arrived at, inasmuch as the ultimate work in connection with the financial question will practically rest with the house of representatives. Did such a fear animate those who suggested the great type on which we are now basing our federation-did it animate the men who framed the American Constitution? It was after exceedingly bitter fights that the principle of equal representation in the Senate was granted in the United States, and they did exactly what is now suggested-they left the settlement of the financial question to a parliament in which the smaller states had equal representation with the, larger states. Therefore, as a matter of reason, and I submit, also, as a matter of precedent, on which there can be no doubt, we, notwithstanding what the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, has said as to the possibility of objection being made to equal representation of the states in the senate, are justified in taking up the position that the larger states will not, as a matter of reason-because they have nothing to, fear from it-find in that an additional argument strengthening their opposition to equal representation in the senate. I speak of the larger states, because the bulk of the opposition to equal representation in the senate comes from their delegations. The right hon. member, Sir George Turner, has mentioned that it ought to be a condition - though I do not think be mentioned it very emphatically - of the handing over of this matter to the federal parliament, that New South Wales should assume a protective tariff to start with.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I did not say it ought to be. What I say is that New South Wales has got us into a difficulty, and can get us out of it by doing that!

Mr. GLYNN:

I do not think that the right hon. gentleman urged it with as much emphasis as he would have done if his convictions on the point had been very deeply rooted. But if such a proposition were made in this Convention I should certainly oppose it. There are many grounds of opposition to it. One is that, as a free-trader, even if it were not proposed to fix it in the constitution forever, I should object to fix in the constitution for an indefinite period what I regard as an economic heresy. Furthermore, I should like to know what particular tariff New South Wales would be asked to establish. We know that continual fights are made on the question of what is and what is not a protective tariff. We know the countries that apparently have a protective tariff claim to be free-trade countries. Would it be the tariff of Queensland, which, with a population of something like 100,000 more than that of South Australia, obtains nearly three times as much revenue from customs as South Australia does? Whatever tariff you may take, it will be open for people to say that its character either is or is not free-trade, and we are further met with the difficulty that in speaking of a protectionist tariff it is impossible to reduce your ideas to a common understanding. The right hon. member, Sir George Turner, made this as a suggestion, which was, no doubt, intended at all events for the careful consideration of the Committee. Again, the right hon. gentleman has referred to the question of direct taxation and the fears in relation to the possibility of a land-tax being particularly heavy. I think he mentioned the possibility of its running into millions of pounds. On the question of direct taxation, we are met, no matter what may be our preference for any particular kind of taxation, with two difficulties. I mention this, because, if we were not met with these difficulties, I certainly would go in for a direct tax as a method of meeting the general expenditure, in preference to the system of customs duties which so unduly absorbs the earnings of the people. We are met with two difficulties. One is, that we are not sent here to start new policies - that the adjustment which we frame must be on conditions which already exist, leaving the question of development on fiscal lines to the future parliament. If that were not the case, the settlement of our difficulties, looked at from one point of view, might be exceedingly easy. We would not require to raise millions of pounds. The total new expenditure will not be very much more than £400,000. The loss from intercolonial free-trade is really more nominal than real. Up to the present time we have been viewing federation very largely from the point of view of its possible disadvantages. Very little has been said about its undoubted advantages, and one of these will be that a given tariff will be more productive than a protective tariff. But a free-trade tariff will undoubtedly be more productive to the revenue than the system of diverse tariffs which exist at present, and the loss on free-trade which is gauged on the existing tariffs might almost approximate to being nominal. If that is so, the addition made to the cost of the federation, in connection with the loss of intercolonial duties, may be exceedingly small, and if you bring that amount down to, say, £500,000, instead of its being put as it has been at millions of pounds, and if you add on the new cost of federation, you will not have to raise as the total cost of federation a sum exceeding £1,000,000. I believe that the sum would not exceed £600,000. A land-tax to raise that amount would not require to be more than 1/2d. in the £, as in the case of South Australia, where it produces about £100,000 a year; for, with the enormous taxing capacity of the other colonies, it would certainly produce whatever is likely to be required, and it would have the great advantage that it would not be disproportionate. The value of the land which would be taxed would be a perfect barometer of the state of the industrial and commercial atmosphere.
The rise and fall of the wealth of the state might be accurately gauged by the existing condition of land values. But we are still met with this difficulty, which shows that we cannot exercise our individual preferences in this matter: As your first object of federation, you have to bring about intercolonial free-trade, and in doing that you have to pool your revenues, and that would have the effect that if you wish to give back, on the amalgamation of your tariffs, the same revenue to the various states as they have lost, you must keep up the disadvantages of the existing system -that is, in order to gauge what those losses are, you must keep up the border customs officers. I say then that you will not get rid of these difficulties, which necessarily follow from the extension of the principle of intercolonial free-trade which faces you at the present time, without finding out-and we do not wish to keep up these border officers-what the loss to each colony would be by the amalgamation of the tariff. Therefore, at the present time we are, for these two reasons, practically stopped from the advocacy of a policy of direct taxation. I think it should be exceedingly gratifying to us that we have swept away the mass of statistics, which, instead of adding to our knowledge, have really deepened our ignorance upon this question. I believe that if the heads of hon. members were trepanned, there would be found printed upon their brains a tabulated impression of the financial difficulties of federation.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Several tabulated statements!
Mr. GLYNN:
Tabulated statements by the dozen have been submitted to us, and I have come to the conclusion that the result of the erudition evidenced by them has been merely to extend by confusion our ignorance of the financial question, so as practically to cause us almost to despair of its solution.
There is one matter which I have already mentioned to the Committee, and that is, that we have laid rather too much stress upon the possible disadvantages of federation from the Treasurers' point of view. Because it is only from the Treasurers' point of view, and the loss to the Treasurers may be a gain to the people. If that is not so, the very basis of our argument for the adoption of federation will disappear. We have laid rather too much stress upon the possible disadvantages of federation from the Treasurers' point of view, without laying sufficient stress upon the advantages, some of which arise in connection with this very financial question. For instance, we should save at once—and it is a matter to be taken into consideration in connection with the cost of federation—a sum which is now spent upon the collection of intercolonial duties. The total amount of the customs expenditure is something like £230,000; but a portion of that amount is the result of the system of border duties which we propose to abolish. Believing as I do in the advisability of at once taking the bull by the horns, and leaving the settlement of the whole financial question to the federal parliament, I would like to point out to the Committee that we must not, in considering the advisability of doing so, too nicely balance the possible loss and advantage to each particular state, that is, the loss and gain from the abolition of the border duties. On the figures submitted by the statisticians, applying the proportions paid by each state for the collection of customs both from outside and inside the various colonies, Tasmania, of course, would gain nothing, the gain to Western Australia would be exceedingly small, the gain to New South Wales would be largest, and the gain to Victoria would come next. But we are not going to quibble, about these matters. Let me view the question, again from the point of view of South Australia. I mention this solely to show that there are loans and advantages which we must overlook. We must not sit down in a huckstering spirit to tot them up in so many columns. Take the case of South Australia, We have an advantage over the other colonies in the matter of telegraph revenue. In 1895 our telegraphic system—leaving altogether out of consideration the postal system—produced £89,000.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Mr. GLYNN:

Of course, that is the reason. I am dealing with the proceeds of our telegraphic system to show that we, have an undue advantage there which we are willing to give up. In 1895, South Australia received £89,000 from telegrams New South Wales, with a population of something like four times as large as ours, received £126,000 from this source; Victoria, with a population not very far from four times as large as ours, £95,000; Queensland, with a population exceeding ours by about 120,000, only £71,000.
An Hon. MEMBER:
Mr. GLYNN:
Of course not If we were animated by an anti-federal spirit—which we are not—we should oppose the abolition of the advantage which we get in connection with our telegraphic system through being wedged in between the other colonies, and thus being able to charge special rates.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Mr. GLYNN:
My contention is that we do not want selfishly to preserve special rates. At the present time we have special advantages, because of the separation of the colonies. Instead of raising a small sum from our telegrams, we receive practically as much as Victoria, whose population is nearly four times as large as ours; and only £50,000 a year less than New South Wales, whose population is four times as large as ours. The reason is we have special rates, and we are enabled, by our situation, to practically levy a tax upon our neighbours. Hon. member sought to approach the whole financial question in the spirit which we are prepared to assume in South Australia in regard to this matter of telegraphic revenue. Then in regard to the uniform tariff, and what is the very crux of the financial question, the possible loss to each state of the amalgamation of the revenue and expenditure, it is an exceedingly strong point that Western Australia makes when she says that she at present receives something like £6 8s. per head from her customs duties. I think the hon. member, Mr. Hackett, pointed out that, although this might seem abnormal, the regular receipts from customs in Western Australia had been something like £4 per head. That is shown by the figures submitted to the Convention but I feel confident, knowing what has occurred at Broken Hill, and as the result of every flush in the industrial progress of any country, that the exceptional rate cannot be maintained, and that the other rate will not be maintained either. The railway revenue of Western Australia will gauge the exceptional prosperity of that country as accurately as, if not more accurately than, the customs revenue, and for that reason I think that its present prosperity will not continue, Four or five years ago the railway revenue of Western Australia was something like 1/3 per cent, and it rose by almost regular gradations, until it is now something like 11 per cent., showing that there has been an amount of importation into Western Australia which cannot possibly be kept up. We find also that the prices of articles which in Coolgardie and Kalgoorlie were formerly exceedingly high, have now, if we may rely on the evidence of Western Australians sunk to a point lower than the prices in Victoria and South Australia, showing that there is a glut there. Consequently you will have a cessation of importation, and, therefore, a loss of revenue.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The railway revenue is not likely to fall off!

Mr. GLYNN:
The railway revenue, must depend upon the amount of supplies carried over the line; and if these supplies are not wanted they will not be shipped. No mining population, unless it is a very large one, can absorb at the rate of consumption which has prevailed in Western Australia. I do not say this as an argument against the claim for exceptional treatment put forward by Western Australia; but I say that her position, is not likely to continue abnormal, that it will approximate towards that of the other colonies, and that she may trust the federal parliament to deal fairly with her conditions until that takes place. The same thing occurred in Canada, and the Canadian states have not suffered from it. To come to the question of the railways. The Right Hon. Sir George Turner has very properly said that, although we may be prepared to hand over the settlement of the financial question, to the federal parliament, we ought to offer some specific solution, if one is open to us, and we ought not to allow the fear which may operate with some people, that the federal parliament will deal unjustly with particular states, to be of any force in determining the acceptance of federation. Why should we not hand over the railways? Has not that course the recommendation, that, apart altogether from the question of abolishing the surplus by taking over the debts and the railways, by amalgamation very large economics might be effected? I find here in the Constitution of Germany, with the extraordinary diversity of interests which existed in the case of the states which are federated under that constitution, that uniformity, of rates was declared, to be one of the fundamental principles of the federation at the very start. The railway system of all the states for the future were to be practically in the hands of the federation. Clause 42 of the Constitution states:

The governments of the federal states bind themselves in the interests of general commerce to have the German railways managed as one system, and for this purpose to have all now lines constructed and equipped according to a uniform plan.
Clause 45 states:
The empire shall have control over the tariff of charges. It shall endeavour to cause (1) uniform regulations to be speedily introduced on all German railway lines.

All the German railway lines to be constructed are by these special powers in the constitution vested in or to come under the control of the federation. I advocate the taking over of the railways as a matter of policy. By the saving we shall make more out of them as assets, and the plan is one which has not been much dwelt upon up to the present. The Indian railways are now practically one system, and the result is that there is a revenue of about 6 per cent. The Belgian railways were bought by the state, and they have since become more largely productive than formerly, with the result that the rates have been reduced by something like 40 per cent. In Switzerland, also, there is a great and growing feeling in favour of the purchase by the federal body of the local railways. The experience of Pennsylvania also shows the economic effect of amalgamation. There are seventy-two railways there which are all under one management covering 8,000 miles of line. The Erie system, which formerly consisted of forty lines, has also been brought under one management, and is another instance of economy. In England there have been several select committees dealing with railway matters, and their recommendations have been in the direction of diminishing the evils of competition by amalgamation under one central management. Tyler, an expert in railway matters, in the evidence he gave before one of the committees of the House of Lords, stated:

No one who is not actually engaged in the working of the railways, or in watching the details of their working, can have any idea of the unnecessary cost, labour, and obstruction to traffic which arise from diversities of interests and of managements of the various boards.

I come down now to the effects of the inter-state commission, because, if we do not take over the railways, we shall have to fall back upon the other alternative as a cure for differential and preferential rates, that is, the establishment of an inter-state commission. Now, it is an additional argument in favour of the purchase of the railways, that the Inter-state Commission in America was practically a failure. I will endeavour to give a few reasons, because I do not wish to rely merely on bare statements. I will give a few reasons upon which I base that assertion. In the first place, the sanction of the obligations of the law under which the inter-state commission carries on its operations are fines and imprisonment. Now, I cannot see how you are going to imprison a state, nor do I see how you can levy a fine upon a particular state without such bickerings and jealousies as might lead almost to a disruption of the union. Again, it will be of no use merely to declare that the rate is invalid because it is contrary to the principles laid down by the inter-state commission. How is such a provision to become of any effect? Is the person who is called upon to pay the rate to urge the objection? He is the person who will reap the advantage, because, under preferential rates, the advantages are given to shippers from outside, and they are not likely to raise a point which will tell against their own pockets.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

What about the others who pay too high rates?

Mr. GLYNN:

Internal rates are supposed to be justified by the charge which should be made as a return for capital, and are therefore, by supposition, not too high. External rates, on the other hand, are ridiculously low. They are preferential rates; they are penalties on the whole people of the colony which grants them to outsiders for special trade benefits which tell for the advantage of the few. The same system of secrecy as to a specific or special rate would be impossible under this new system; therefore the definition of rates to be declared invalid will become a great difficulty. If am justified in the expression of this opinion, because in a work published in 1896, Shaler - I quote from his "History of America"-states that in America the evasions of the Inter-state Commerce Act amount to something approaching a general disregard of it, and he goes on to amplify this in the manner suggested by the following quotation:-

It must be admitted, however, not only that the law against unjust personal discrimination is not thoroughly enforced, but that it is not clear that it can be thoroughly enforced without some great increase in the powers and resources of the Inter-state Commission, or some radical change in the organisation of railways.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

That does not show that the Inter-state Commission is a bad thing. It shows that there is a bad act!

Mr. GLYNN:

It shows this: that the powers vested under the act of 1886, in the Inter-state Commission, enormous though they are-that will be admitted, I think-are being found in efficacious. There has been a cry for the extension of these powers, and there has been, by various writers, a declaration of opinion that the true solution is not by regulations under the act or by the continuance of an Inter-state Commission, but by the purchase of the railways by the government. It is contended that it is only by this means that you can secure that which the Inter-state Commission has, to a large extent, failed to accomplish. Here is another quotation from the same writer. After pointing out the great disadvantages inseparable from the existing system, he says:

Still more serious have been the difficulties arising out of the exemptions from the action of the law of what is commonly called state traffic in distinction from inter-state traffic.

We propose here to keep up the distinction between traffic confined within the limits of a particular state and traffic extending beyond those limits. This distinction has been found, as the quotation I have read shows, to destroy a large part of the benefits predicated as the result of the establishment of the Inter-state Commission. As regards the uniformity of rates, the writer to whom I have referred points out:

Notwithstanding the advance in consolidation, the management of the railroads in this colony presents to-day a diversity, a working at cross purposes, a tendency to feverish and unhealthy competition inconsistent with proper performance of the work of transportation, rendering railway regulation extremely difficult, and hurtful in many ways to the country as a whole.

Now it might be asked what, under the circumstances, I recommend? I recommend the position taken up by thirteen or fourteen members of the Adelaide Convention-the position that the purchase of the railways is the only method of dealing with the difficulty. In purchasing the railways you take over the debt as part of the payment; it cannot be done in the way set up for the purpose of criticism by some members of the Convention. You cannot take over the debts without arriving at a common denominator, and we have debts at various rates of interest, with periods of currency, which are also different. If therefore, if you are to take over the debts, you must convert them on paper to some common stock, at the current rate of interest. That it is not an exceedingly difficult thing to do is shown by this fact-that the average period which the loans have to run, for the whole of the five states, starting from 1897, is twenty-one years. The lowest average-that of Victoria-is seventeen years; the highest average, which is New South Wales, is twenty-two and a half years' currency. So that, even if you do not do that, and if you take over the debts as they stand, as the variation from the average rates of duration of the loans, from the highest to the lowest, is very small, very little injury would result. Looking at it again, from the point of view of interest, the average rate of interest paid by the five states is 3.846; the highest-Victoria-3.925; the lowest is Western Australia, 3.801.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That is a new loan with a long currency. When we renew the loans, which bear heavy rates of interest, we will get below that!

Mr. GLYNN:
It is not a question of a number of loans maturing next year. It is a question of average duration of loans. That must be determined by the average currency, and the average interest paid.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
They are pretty well all alike. The average value on the London market is about the same!

Mr. GLYNN:
I am glad that the right hon. gentleman agrees with me substantially. If you take the loans as they stand, making no distinction between their varying terms of maturity and rates of interest, very little would happen, because their average is approximate. The average rates of interest only differ about one-tenth between the highest and lowest; therefore, very little injury would result by pooling the debts at once. As to the financial difficulty with regard to the railways, what we would really be doing would be to enter into a partnership. When partners come in with different capitals, it is a question of balancing. The man who brings in the largest amount of capital is credited with a larger amount than the others. Therefore, if you amalgamate the railways, even by purchase, it will only be a question of settling a balance between one or two states, which will not be particularly difficult. The same applies to the debts. If you amalgamate the debts, it will still be merely a question of settling the balance, because certain colonies have a comparatively small indebtedness. I believe that is the case with Victoria. You would practically cancel the debts. Therefore, I think there is no difficulty, which we should be unprepared to face in connection with taking over the railways and debts at once. It has been very well pointed out this morning in the Daily Telegraph, by Mr. Nash, that you would practically get rid of about half the surplus at once by taking over the railways and the debts. The receipts from the railways amount to about half the interest; and the surplus after the other half was paid, would be practically abolished.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Is that the net railway receipts!

Mr. GLYNN:
Yes, it must be the case, because the railway receipts are set off against the interest on the debts. The proposition is not to separate the railway debt from other parts of the debt. The leader, when he advances us money, does not fix upon any particular asset. He supplies his capital upon the credit of the whole community. The objection to this principle of taking over the debts at once has been urged with considerable force by the hon. member, Mr. Holder; but I think he has been practically answered by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner. I would further point out that it is the knowledge of solvency rather than solvency itself which operates in the mind of the English creditor when advancing money. A knowledge of the solvency of South Australia could not be so easily obtained as a knowledge of the solvency of the whole federation. But I do say that the moment the federation agrees to take over the debts, and that becomes known to the English public, it would have a practical value over the present knowledge of the solvency of each state within the union.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Does not the English creditor know that solvency is secured at present?

Mr. GLYNN:

Undoubtedly the majority do, but they all do not. The hon. member, Sir William Zeal, has interjected that there is a difference in the price of the several stocks at present.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

That is accounted for by the different terms of the loans and the time that the stock has to run!

Mr. GLYNN:

Not altogether. South Australia floated a loan recently on the principle of terminable annuities. It has twenty years' currency, with the right of redemption on notice. That brought a much higher price than the last Western Australian loan. We must also take this into account in connection with the price offered for our loan that our indebtedness was £64 per head of the population against a comparatively small indebtedness per head in Western Australia.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

You must also take into account money market conditions!

Mr. GLYNN:

I am simply dealing with it from the point of view of knowledge of our solvency. There are different degrees of knowledge with respect to each colony. It is absurd to think that Western Australia, with her abounding resources and her lower per capita debt should get a lower price than South Australia, when the latter offered terms less open to acceptance than those offered by Western Australia. The hon. member, Mr. Symon, and the hon. member, Mr. Holder, dwelt upon this point of the possibility of conversion to the advantage of the federation if you do not go in for conversion at first. But there will be no greater possibility of conversion afterwards than there will be by banding over the debts at once. That there will be no possibility of a premium being given has been shown by Sir George Turner. There never has been a conversion except when loans matured.

The Hon. Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

Oh, yes!

Mr. GLYNN:

Certainly not on a large scale. For instance, take the three great conversion schemes which have been carried out in England. There was Pelham's in 1749, in which case all the stock had matured. Then there was Goulburn's scheme in 1844, in which £300,000,000 were involved. The stock had all matured in that case. Then there was Mr. Goschen's scheme in 1888. There was a conversion of two classes of stock in that case. One class had matured, and another was capable of redemption on one year's notice. The difficulty with which Mr. Goschen was faced was that in the case of £150,000,000 payment on non-conversion should be made at once. If he offered a lower-priced stock and it was accepted, could he find the cash necessary to secure that stock which would be exchanged for the lower priced stock? He took the risk of finding the money in the event of his offer being accepted.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

They offered in South Africa to convert stock not becoming due and which he was not ready to pay off. It was not a large amount—about £10,000,000!

Mr. GLYNN:

At all events, except in a few small cases, conversion has not taken place unless the stock had matured. I think it is undoubted that you cannot possibly convert without giving a quid pro quo. Where then is the possibility of great benefit accruing to the federation subsequently by putting in the words "may convert," and leaving it optional, so as to prevent the possibility of stockholders getting a premium out of the conversion? The very moment it was decided to convert, the terms would be known, and the price of the stocks would be increased by the knowledge that federation had taken place, and of the implied guarantee of the solvency of the states within the compass of the federation. I refer to this because my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, very properly said that we ought before we separate to offer some solution of the question which does not necessitate the handing over of the matter altogether to the federal parliament. At all events, I, for one, will say this: that if no solution is adopted—and I believe the taking over of the railways and the debts is the proper one—I can see no danger that should deter us from allowing the matter to be settled by the federal parliament. They did it in America under circumstances of prejudice much more difficult than those which exist here. All their troubles arose from the taxation question. All the writers on the Constitution of America have shown that the mutual animosities of the states were far more intense than any animosities which could possibly exist between the states that would constitute a federation in Australia.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:

There was no question of a surplus there!

Mr. Glynn:

Were they not bringing into existence a federation of thirteen states, some of whom had practically no customs tariff, and no political organisations, while others had very high political organisations, and large customs tariffs? Were they not bringing into existence a federation, in which the states who had not those organisations and tariffs would have the very strong objection that they would become part of a federation which would be bound round at once by a high protective tariff?

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:

That is not the difficulty here. The difficulty is the distribution of the surplus!

Mr. Glynn:

The difficulties of jealousy, and of the economic effect of the fiscal policy operated quite as strongly in America, and yet did not deter them there from handing over the whole question to the federal parliament. At all events, as has been very properly emphasised during the debate, I do not think there is any possibility of injustice being done. It is a solution by which we shall get rid of most of our difficulties, while it will not render our constitution hide-bound from the very start, and it is the one we should be prepared to adopt.

The Hon. H. Dobson (Tasmania)

In response to the intimation of the leader of the Convention that those members who are not on the Finance Committee should ventilate the points which they think worthy of discussion, I desire to say a few words on one or two matters which face us in this complex financial problem. I desire to thank Sir George Turner for his very practical speech, and I think we should also be very grateful to our friends, Mr. Reid and Mr. Holder, for one or two sentences that filled me, at all events, with hope and with comfort. Mr. Reid told us that he thought more favourably of a sliding scale now than he did when he left Adelaide, and if we could not fix up a financial scheme upon that sliding scale, or upon some modification of it, he was willing to leave everything to the federal parliament. Mr. Holder told us previously that the principle of the sliding scale could not be wrong, and in view of the confidence which Sir George Turner has in the scheme,
I think it is pretty plain that the way is being made clear for us to settle this financial problem. There are three ways of doing it. First of all we ought to go on and tackle the work we commenced by putting the principle of the problem in the bill. Secondly, there is the idea that we should leave the whole thing, without defining any principles at all, to the federal parliament, and, thirdly, there is the compromise between the two-that we should adopt something like Mr. Deakin’s idea, which has also been suggested by several others, namely, that we should leave everything to the federal parliament after we have provided for the security of the state treasuries by giving them a guarantee of so much money-in perpetuity, if you like; but I think that would be a very wrong course-for the term, say, of five years, and then to reconsider everything. I am quite in accord with Sir George Turner when he says that to leave everything to the federal parliament is open to the very gravest objections. When I left the Tasmanian Parliament I was not of opinion that it would be particularly wise or expedient to leave everything to the federal parliament; but I formed the impression that we should perhaps have to do that. My friend, the Hon. B.S. Bird, who is one of our ablest men in Tasmania, and whom it is well known was a member of the Convention of 1891, when I expressed that view, immediately interjected that leaving everything to the federal parliament would mean taking a leap in the dark. I answered that interjection by saying that it would, I thought, be taking a leap with the light around us, as the federal parliament would have before it all the true facts and correct figures, which we have not, and, therefore, would be able to settle the question with an advantage which we lack. But when you have said that, I think you have stated every advantage which the federal parliament would have over this Convention in settling the matter. Let me add also the advantage on the part of the federal parliament-that it would, of course, be better able than this Convention to say the exact time when we could, with fairness and equity, commence the distribution of the surplus customs duties on a per capita basis. But, having given the federal parliament credit for these two advantages, I think there the advantages end. These are the reasons why I think it is fraught with danger to leave the matter to the federal parliament:

First, it is the duty of this Convention to do the work; secondly, the people expect it of us, and have sent us here that we may do it; and, thirdly, I feel the greatest possible danger in asking the people of Australasia, who are composed of ardent federalists, of lukewarm federalists, and anti-federalists, and who are composed also of men like our hon. friend, the Attorney-General of New South Wales, and Sir Julian Salomons, and other hon. gentlemen, who may be described as the absolute wreckers of federation-men who say they are going to stump the country against the great movement—

An Hon. MEMBER:
And wreck themselves!
The Hon. H. DOBSON:
I think they will wreck themselves if they are going to try to wreck federation. I think you are going to put a weapon in their hands which will be of the greatest use to them with the many lukewarm and anti-federalists throughout the electorates, if you hold up to them the fact that we are incapable or incompetent to settle this financial problem, and that we are therefore going to leave it without any principles or any guiding star, so to speak, to the federal parliament. But the greatest objection of all, to my mind, is this: Although I am one of those who think with Sir Samuel Griffith, and to a very great extent, in fact, entirely, with you, sir, in believing that federation will develop a better form of government than our party and responsible government, and believing as I do that there is not the same room in the federal parliament for party politicians as there is in the state parliaments, I am bound to face this fact, that we shall have the party politician on this everlasting question of free-trade and protection, a leading feature in the federal parliament the moment its doors are open. But if you leave the whole financial problem to the federal parliament you will create party electorates and party would-be politicians before the doors of the federal parliament are open; and if you are going to hold up a sliding scale to the people of the colonies without passing it into law, what will you have? It is obvious that there is a difference in the wealth and consuming power, and the spending power of the various colonies. No mortal man can say when that will end. It may never end. Therefore, the sliding scale to a very great extent is a contribution from the richer colonies to the poorer colonies, and the people of the richer colonies may be very naturally and properly asked, "Are you going to consent to absolutely hand over a part of your revenue to the poorer colonies?" At election times we all know what force a cry of that kind would be certain to have. If that is so, you will have every electorate in a rich colony like New South Wales—we may take the three colonies of New South Wales, Queensland—which I hope will come in—and Western Australia as the three wealthier colonies, according to their customs revenue—you would have every elector, who is a democrat and likes his own way, asking every candidate for the federal parliament in those three wealthier colonies, "Are you in favour of a per capita distribution? Are you in favour of a sliding scale?" And I suppose in a weak moment—we are all of us more or less weak when we face the electors—in a weak moment perhaps, the candidates, to a very great extent, would bind themselves before they entered the federal parliament to vote in a particular way—the way in which the electors wanted there to vote; the way in which self interest on their own side—and who can blame them for looking after their self interests?—would dictate that they should vote. Every elector in the small or poorer colonies, if he was alive to his interests, and the interests of his state, as he would be, what would he ask his candidate? Exactly the opposite question: will you favour the per capita distribution, and will you object to the distribution of the surplus on the basis of collections. Therefore the poorer colonies would endeavour to send, and in most cases they would send, delegates to the federal parliament who would be pledged and bound to do every possible thing they could to get a per capita distribution, in order that they might win a contribution from their richer neighbours to their own treasuries. For these reasons, unless they are all moonshine—and I do not think they are—I think there are great dangers in leaving the matter entirely to the commonwealth to determine. If you could leave it to the federal parliament with some guiding principle where you would have that eminently satisfactory tribunal, the high court of the commonwealth at your back, whose eminent judges would be able to take evidence from their statisticians and commercial men and people all over the commonwealth; if you had that at your back to see that the federal parliament carried out the principles which this Convention laid down, then there would not be very much objection. But if you are going to leave the thing to the federal parliament, without any guiding principle, without any appeal, without any hope of getting an error rectified, except by the parliament itself, then I do see some danger in that course. I am inclined to adopt the language which my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, used yesterday. To some extent it will be a disgrace to us unless we can see our way out of this difficulty. Surely there is some way out of it; and instead of giving the Finance Committee a direction that we are going to leave it all to the federal parliament, I hope that when this debate is finished the Finance Committee will believe that it is their duty to set arduously to work, as they did in Adelaide, until they have threshed out some good proposals for the consideration of this Convention. Now, allusion was made that the question of trusting the federal parliament to some extent depended on how it should be constituted. I am not going into that question any more than to say this: When I am talking about the constitutional clauses of the bill I dislike entirely the word "compromise," because I do not quite understand, although you sometimes have to do it, compromising a principle. The question of equal representation in the senate, the question of the referendum, and what control you are going to subject the will of the people to, are more or less principles, which we ought to determine from the books we have in front of us, from the four constitutions we have to guide us, and from the experience of mankind in working out those four constitutions. Those are what I call principles, I do not quite understand compromising these principles, except so far as it may be we will have to draw closer to one another, and give and take, and then we do come back to the word "compromise;" but I hate the word "compromise" in reference to what I conceive the framing of the machine you are going to make to carry on your federal government. It would be just like when you were asking one man, who has a particular kind of railway brake, and another man, who has an utterly different kind of railway brake, if somebody were to suggest that you should try and have a compromise between the two, and get one man, to alter his brake and the other to alter his a little, and to take half the quantity you want from each of them. Now, sir, on the terms and conditions on which you are to go into this federal parliament, which means the financial clauses, there I do understand the meaning of the word, "compromise." You must have a compromise. You there make a bargain; and although it is very necessary that we should all show a federal spirit, at the same time we are going to make a bargain. We are going to lay down terms and conditions, and these are the terms and conditions forming the bargain which it is our duty to frame, and not leave to another body. Hon. members will see that I am trying to draw a distinction between compromising principles and compromising the terms of a bargain which, in the latter case, I think we must compromise more than we ought to do in the former. I think, from the language we have heard from other speakers, we will find that we will have no better scheme put before us than the sliding scale which is contained in the bill, and the whole of that sliding scale must absolutely depend on the accuracy of your year-test. I am inclined to think that we are making a very woful mistake in fancying that we can build up that sliding scale with anything like justice to the people of these colonies, if we make the first year after the imposition of the uniform tariff a test of the sliding scale. It is absolutely the worst year we could choose. We might make it one, two, or three years-I do not know, and I am hardly capable to say; but I do think that if you make one blunder there, if you are out in the slightest degree in fixing the test amount, which is to be the amount up to which the poorer colonies are to rise, and from which the richer colonies are to descend, you will, indeed, make a blunder which may involve the grossest injustice to some of the taxpayers of federated Australia. That, I venture to say, will require the most earnest attention of the members of the Committee.

[The Chairman left the chair at 1 p.m. The Committee resumed at 2 p.m.]

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

When we adjourned for luncheon, I was quoting a sentence from a speech of the Premier of Victoria, to the effect that the fight at the first election of the federal parliament would be in reference to free-trade and protection. Mr. Holder told us that what we required was a broad revenue-producing tariff, and I am inclined to think that the latter announcement is more correct, because, from the very circumstances of the case, the federal parliament, if it does its duty, will be compelled to look to a revenue-producing tariff, and if it strays away into the paths of protection, and imposes duties which it thinks will help its local manufactures or industries, it is certain that Tasmania, and some of the other colonies, will be left without the revenue which they require. We only have to look at the figures to see that that is apparent. The tariff which the commonwealth would produce if collected upon the Tasmanian tariff, would be £7,430,000, whereas if it were collected on the very much lower tariff of Western Australia, it would be £4,712,000. Therefore it is perfectly certain that the federal parliament must devote their energies to framing a tariff which will produce revenue; but if it is tried to frame a tariff which will be protective that adds another argument to the admirable arguments used by, the Premier of Victoria, that there is a very great danger in leaving the adjustment of the finances to the federal parliament. In reference to the question of conversion, it appears to me that some little misunderstanding has arisen. Whilst it is quite true that we find no ease in the books where debentures have been converted which have a long time to mature, it is equally certain that you can convert long-dated debentures, and do it on a sound basis, if you provide a sinking-fund, so as not to put on to posterity the bonus which you have to pay to induce the holder to convert, and exchange his stock at a high rate of interest for stock at a low rate of interest.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

You may, if the holder is reasonable; but you cannot say for certain!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
You cannot say for certain; but if you offer a man a quid pro quo, and better security in addition, and a larger and interminable class of stock, there are some reasons which may induce the holder of the debenture to convert. The reason I have alluded to this matter is to draw the attention of the Finance Committee—and I think it requires their earnest attention—to the question as to what security a united Australia is going to offer to the investors of England. I tried in vain to get some information from Mr. Goschen on this point. Mr. Walker tried, with better success, to gain information on the point from Mr. George, who for thirty years has been the manager of a large bank in London, and who must have had a great deal of experience in floating loans, and who, therefore, ought to know something about conversion. He tells us, after consulting experts, that you ought, in addition to your customs duties, to hypothecate some part of your railway revenue as additional security. It appears to me that the Finance Committee will make a great blunder in framing their financial clauses unless they seriously consider what is the best position for us to occupy in the English market when we come to convert; because if they adjust the financial clauses to suit all the states, and do not adjust the other clauses so as to give us the base of a conversion scheme, they will make a blunder which may cost us £500,000. If you are going to have, as I think you must have, a sinking fund, you cut down the profit on your conversion scheme from £1,000,000 to £500,000. I think you may safely put it at that.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Not immediately!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Yes, immediately.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Does the hon. member say that £500,000 will be docked immediately?

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
The profit of £500,000 will go immediately if you convert immediately. I am pointing out that if you wait until the debentures mature, it will not be for thirty-five years in some cases, and whenever debentures mature, it goes without saying that you do not convert them, but exchange them, and pay them off with debentures at a lower rate of interest. Most of us, in our speeches to the electors, have pointed out—Sir Philip Fysh also has pointed it out—that there is a way of converting your debentures at once.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Does Mr. George advocate that in his letter?

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
He does not say it cannot be done; I think he says it can be done.
An Hon. MEMBER:
   How can it be done?
The Hon. H. DOBSON:
   By giving the holder of the debenture a proper quid pro quo. You save a lot in interest, and at the same time you add to the debt of the commonwealth, and in adding to the debt of the commonwealth, you have a financial transaction which is unsound. In order to get rid of that unsoundness, you take part of the saving you make in interest, and pay it into the sinking fund.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   How can you force a man to take what he is not agreeable to take?
The Hon. H. DOBSON:
   You do not force him to take anything. But by giving him a quid pro quo—a sovereign for a sovereign—and by giving him interminable stock, and the better security of the commonwealth, you give him a slight advantage.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
   I quite agree that that is so; and, therefore, I am inclined to think that the quid pro quo we will have to give will be a little more than you otherwise would give. In answer to the Premier of Victoria, I would point out that we all know that the demand for consols is increasing, and that the supply is decreasing. Why? The supply is increasing because the British Government are paying off the national debt at the rate of £7,000,000 or £8,000,000 a year. The demand is increasing, because all the numerous friendly societies of England, the savings banks, and other institutions, are increasing their wealth and funds, and want more and more of these consols. Therefore, I think that, in three or four years' time, after the federal constitution has been established, we shall find that there is a demand in London at a low rate of interest for good stocks, where the security is undoubted.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
   That will not affect present loans, because they are already held; but it will affect new loans. It will not benefit present holders!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
   It might benefit them if you could offer them a fair quid pro quo, and if the saving is so great that you can save £500,000, and at the same time provide a sinking fund. I agree that if you have to add to the debt of the commonwealth to pay the quid pro quo the transaction would be so unsound that there would be an end of it. As Sir Philip Fysh has pointed out, however, you add to the capital debt of the various colonies; but if the reduction of interest will still leave you a saying of interest and give you sufficient to establish a sinking fund, it will be a sound transaction.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It is a pure assumption that you will convert!
The Hon. H. DOBSON:
No; it is an assumption based on a very great fall in the rate of interest.

An Hon. MEMBER:
It is a pure fallacy!
The Hon. H. DOBSON:
I do not think it is. It would be if the rate of interest had not fallen greatly. But the rate of interest has fallen so greatly, and the demand for interminable stock and good securities has become so great that the difference in the rate of interest will enable you to get rid of the sum you add to your capital and at the same time give you some reduction in your own interest.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
If a man gets £1,000 interest now you will have to give him an equivalent amount of stock to give him £1,000 a year interest or he will not take it!
The Hon. H. DOBSON:
That maybe so. Then, a great many of us have been telling our electors what is not the case, because we all know perfectly well that, apart from federation altogether, each colony could quietly wait until its debentures matured and then float a new loan, to pay them off, at a much lower rate. I have always understood that a large majority of the members of the Convention, in speaking to the country, have said that they thought some kind of conversion scheme was feasible, with long-dated debentures. I am inclined to think that it is feasible now; but what I desire to call the attention of the Finance Committee to is that they must be very careful in framing their financial clauses, or we must be very careful in framing our constitution, not to do anything which will detract from the additional security which we all hope the commonwealth will give to the English investor. If you ask the English investor to take your consolidated Australian stock, and he is to have no security whatever but your customs duties, I am inclined to think that you are making a mistake; and I am also inclined to the opinion that you will not convert your debentures on any terms making it worth your while to do it, and this is the opinion Mr. George seems to hold. Mixed up with this question is the most important question to which the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, has alluded, namely—that of making our consolidated Australian stock such an admirable security that the Imperial Parliament will pass the necessary act to enable trust moneys to be put into it. Now, as far as I can understand the reasons which induced the Imperial Parliament before to refuse that, or which induced her Majesty's ministers not to suggest it—I forget which was the fact that they did not consider the security quite sufficient, and—they did not think that trust funds in England ought to be lent to people 12,000 miles off when the English people have no control whatever over the revenue. I have read a pamphlet—I forget whom it was by-in which it was said that if this were an insuperable objection to the Imperial authorities consenting to enact that trust funds could be lent upon Australian securities, a scheme might be adopted whereby your customs duties alone might be hypothecated—that they might be received by an Imperial officer at home who would simply deduct the £5,000,000, or whatever sum it was, for interest, and transmit the balance to Australia.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
We would never agree to that!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
If it would get rid of all the difficulties and troubles of the question of security, it is worth thinking about. We will all admit, I am sure, that there will be, to some extent, a blot on our consolidated stock so long as the Imperial Parliament refuses to pass an act authorising trust funds to be invested in it. I do not say that the suggestion in this pamphlet is a particularly good one; but I do say that we, as statesmen, ought to adopt any feasible scheme we can, to get rid of that blot on our credit, for no doubt it is a blot on our credit. I understood the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, to say that, when the commonwealth was established, all future borrowings on behalf of the state—for state railways, and so forth—he was inclined to think, should be made through the commonwealth. Here, I think, the right hon. gentleman will see that he is getting rather into a difficulty. If you are going to leave all your assets—land, and so forth—to the states, and if you are going to leave them your magnificent railway revenue, and are going to give over nothing but the customs to the commonwealth—

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Customs, and unlimited power to tax!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Is it expedient or wise, under those circumstances, to say that you will leave borrowings for state purposes only to the commonwealth? It appears to me that that is rather mixing up the affairs of the commonwealth with those of the state, and that while in one clause we have set forth all the things that are to be delivered over to the commonwealth, we are now delivering over to the commonwealth another thing which is far more important than all the others put together.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:

You have to chose the less of two evils. You cannot very well have two stocks running at the same time. It would reduce the value of state stock enormously if you did!

The Hon. H. Dobson:

This is a matter to which I think the Convention has devoted very little attention, and I think we shall have to devote a great deal of attention to it, for it is a most important question, which is at the very root of the progress we all hope to make. I have only one or two more words to say—that is, that two colonies will, I think, have to be specially provided for. Now, although we all seem favourable to the adoption of the sliding scale, either with or without modifications, I cannot help thinking that it will hardly suit our friends from Western Australia. I think that the words used by the right hon. member, Sir John Forrest, were rather misquoted in the newspaper this morning when it said that he very generously stated that he wanted no concession or no-special favour. The right hon. gentleman did say that, but provided that you return to each colony the amount of revenue which it collects less the federal expenses.

An Hon. Member:

It would not answer for the other colonies!

The Hon. H. Dobson:

It would not answer altogether the federal spirit; it would not answer so well as the sliding scale; but if you adopt this it is absolutely certain that you will have to make special provision to do justice to our friends from Western Australia. I also desire to point out that I think that to some extent you will have to make one or two special provisions in favour of the colony which I represent. The sliding scale gets rid of the book-keeping after one or two years, and the sliding scale would suit Tasmania.

The Hon. J. Henry:

It would not!

The Hon. H. Dobson:

I understood that my hon. friend, Mr. Henry, was in favour of the sliding scale.
The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

It would suit us well after five years!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

I have just come to the point to which the hon. member, Sir Philip Fysh, has called my attention. You will have to make some special provision in regard to this smallest colony of the group, and will have to do it in terms that are absolutely fair and just to yourselves. They are these: We are joining with colonies which certainly are richer than we are, and whose spending powers are greater than ours, and, therefore—I will not say—their extravagance; but if their spending powers are greater they spend more money in keeping up the services of the state. As we are able to do, we administer our state departments with more economy than the larger colonies do, and, consequently, if you ask us to join with you and share in your larger or more extravagant expenditure—if I may use the term—then of course we will lose money which we cannot afford to lose, and I think that that will have to be got over by putting in one or two lines providing that for the first five years at all events you shall not ask Tasmania to contribute more towards the federal expenditure than she contributes now for her own expenses. That is to say, if we conduct our departments at a certain rate per head, do not ask us to contribute more at first to the federal finances. Another point is that we are now making a profit of about £15,000 from the postal and telegraphic departments. The hon. member, Sir Philip Fysh, said that if we lost £50,000 a year it was equivalent to New South Wales losing £300,000, but I would point out to the hon. gentleman that he is a very great deal under the mark. I look upon the great colony of New South Wales as being about ten, twelve, or fifteen times as wealthy and more able to pay than Tasmania, and if we have to give up £15,000 a year profit from our postal and telegraphic departments it is equivalent to this colony giving up from £150,000 to £200,000 a year in one state item; therefore, as a matter of fair play and justice, I think we are entitled to ask the Convention to consider that profit which we make as against the loss which some of the states make in conducting their postal and telegraphic departments, because it is perfectly certain that the sum of £15,000 a year is a very great deal to Tasmania. It is more than the whole of the revenue we receive from our tax upon incomes derived by personal exertion. Therefore, hon. members will see that Tasmania may demand some special concession. One word more in reference to the position of Queensland. I have always been of the opinion that it would be a very great mistake, if we could avoid it, to start our commonwealth without every colony joining it at the same moment. Just as surely as you leave out one colony, and especially a colony which has had no hand in the framing of the constitution, so surely will the public men of that colony-its politicians, and its newspaper writers-instead of applying criticism of a generous and fair character to the constitution, apply criticism of a hostile and ungenerous character. Whenever a man has an opportunity to join, with his eyes open, an association or a society, and he does not join it, he always finds very good reason, or he thinks be does, why the society is not worth joining, and why he is justified in his own eyes, and in the eyes of the world, in standing out from it.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
That was not the experience of Canada, at all events!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
One or two of the Canadian states joined the Dominion of Canada only quite lately, and I would point out to my hon. friend that one of the states has not joined the Dominion to this day.

An Hon. MEMBER:
They are the losers by it!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
That may be so; but if Queensland has no hand whatever in framing the constitution, and if she does not enter the commonwealth when it is established, no man can predict when she will come in. I desire to say, with all deference to the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, that in framing a constitution we ought to think of all the colonies; we ought to think of the colony that is not with us. Although nothing would induce me to favour a proposal to adjourn now, or one hour before it is necessary to do so, yet when we have come to the end of the three weeks when we must either adjourn or close our proceedings, I shall be in favour of adjourning if I can see any reasonable hope in any ministerial utterance from our friends in Queensland that after an adjournment they will come in and help us to frame a constitution.

Mr. JAMES (Western Australia)[2.24]:
I do not for a moment intend to propose any scheme the effect of which will be to bring Queensland into the Convention. I think it would be entirely wrong to permit the absence of any one colony to interfere with the progress of the movement towards federation. We are assured by some parties in Queensland that they are thoroughly attached to this movement; other parties there say that they are not attached to it. I think it would be wise if we in this Convention extended the warmest sympathy and consideration towards Queensland, and, having shown that sympathy and consideration, we got on with the practical work before us. So much sympathy and generous consideration has been shown towards Western Australia, that one is invited in dealing with the financial part of the scheme before us to ask for a concession which, in my humble opinion, is necessary if Western Australia is to come into the federal union. I am not competent to deal with the merely financial aspect of this matter, the aspect which involves the consideration and discussion of more or less unreliable statistics. I only wish to say a word in connection with the political aspect of it, and to express my thorough approval of the speech delivered by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner this morning. I cannot understand how it is possible to remove the difficulty in connection with the financial question by putting it on to the shoulders of someone else. The difficulty does not exist because it has been crystallised into part of the bill; but as it exists, it has to be faced before we can have a federal union. It seems idle to attempt to, as it were, pasteurise the question, to free it altogether from the germs of future discord by passing it on to the federal parliament to deal with. It has to be dealt with, and the difficulty we have now in connection with it is, not so much in dealing with the details of it, but in a want of confidence—perhaps unworthy of us—in the central parliament which is to have control of our affairs in the future. If we have that complete confidence in the federal parliament which we must have before we can trust them with the determination of this important question, will it not be sufficient for us to pass an act saying that we shall have a senate with certain powers, and a lower house with certain powers, and then to hand over to them the settlement of this vexed question, giving them absolute power to do what they like? If we can afford to hand over to them the settlement of this vexed question, I do not know any other power more important which we should refuse to give them. So far as Western Australia is concerned, we asked for this concession in no mercenary spirit. It is not because we desire to make money out of the remaining colonies of the group, but because we desire to work out our own development. For years past—as a matter of fact ever since Western Australia was established—we have had this difficulty to face, that, despite the work which we have done there, the money which has been made in the colony has been spent somewhere else. We have found enormous difficulty in settling the country, in securing to ourselves a settled agricultural population. We have not been blessed with good country as you here in the eastern colonies are blessed. We have had enormous difficulties to contend against, and now when the opportunity has arrived, and we have a chance to secure to ourselves the benefit and enjoyment of some of that wealth which the colony yields, it is difficult, however strongly one may be attached to federation, to hand over for ever the power which have come to us after sixty years of existence. Hon. members no doubt will agree with me when I say that our gold, valuable though it may be, will be useless unless we can succeed, while we have it, in settling upon our lands a good agricultural population. For years and years past, as our good friends from South Australia know, a great deal of money has been made in Western Australia and spent elsewhere.

Mr. SOLOMON:
A great deal of money has been made elsewhere and spent in Western Australia!

Mr. JAMES:
I am not aware of it, and I have lived a long time in Western Australia.

Mr. SOLOMON:
The hon. member has not been a shareholder in many companies then!

Mr. JAMES:
I should be very glad if the shareholders in Perth had made as much money in Western Australia as the shareholders in Adelaide have made there. We have the opportunity now, and it is not only because we want to develop Western Australia for our own selfish purposes that we ask for a concession. We say that if we succeed in developing Western Australia, and in settling there an agricultural population, we are adding a new province to the commonwealth; but we shall not succeed in this unless we have the power of levying customs duties. At the present moment, with the assistance of customs taxation, we can encourage the settlement of an agricultural population upon the land. During the last twelve months an enormous increase has taken place in this direction. Thousands of acres of land have been opened up, and thousands of people have come to our shores and settled down there. It has been the want of population that has been our drawback in the past. This has isolated us, and has made us a small, and, to that extent, a narrow-minded country. If we could attract to our shores a great many of those whom you have the good fortune to have in the eastern colonies, not only would it be a great assistance to Western Australia, but it would add a province to the commonwealth. Therefore I think we are entitled to ask for this concession. Unless you give to Western Australia the right to impose its own customs duties for the next five or ten years, I venture to think that that colony will not come into the federation. That feeling has marvellously strengthened over there in connection with this question. It is not merely a question of money. I am vain enough to believe that if a sacrifice has to be made, Western Australia is broad-shouldered enough, as the diagram before you shows, to bear the sacrifice, so far as mere money is concerned. But that is not the point. It is vital to the future development of Western Australia that, for five or ten years, she shall collect such duties under a system of protection as will assist, as far as is possible, the agricultural industry of the colony. Provision might be made, if this concession were granted us, that no duties levied in the western colony should be less than the duties levied in the commonwealth.
That would be quite right. Or we might take a still more limited power, and agree to the levying of taxation on certain articles, because we have no desire to build up industries other than those which will directly settle people on the soil. We have no desire to have a protective system applied to all sorts of industries. That which we want to do is to get people on to the soil, and now that the opportunity has arisen to do this we do not want it taken from us. There is nothing narrow in that view of the question. After all, ten or twenty years in the life of a nation is a very short time indeed. If we approach a question like this under the impression that ten years is an important period of time, then I say, with the utmost respect, that we are not capable of dealing with a question so great as is that involved in this Commonwealth Bill. If such a concession as that which I have suggested, is not granted, then I think Western Australia will stand out until she can secure a more settled and larger population. But whether you grant this concession or not, so far as the eastern colonies are concerned, they will not have the benefit of the trade of Western Australia. We do not ask you to accept a burden for our sakes. But those of us who are attached to federation say this, "Leave a side door by which we can come in. Do not throw obstacles in the way of our entrance." No one can tell what may happen in ten years' time. In that time Western Australia may become greater and infinitely more populous than both New South Wales and Victoria put together. Those on the western side of the continent might then take up a position somewhat similar to that taken up by some good people in New South Wales at present when they say, "We can get along very well, independently of federation. We do not want it." I say that Western Australia might assume the position I have indicated in ten years-I do not at all think that it will—but at the same time that which we ask involves no injury to those from whom we ask it. We are willing to give the federal authority power to interfere in all matters except in the matter of customs; but we do ask for that concession, and unless we get it, the probability is that our entrance to the union will be delayed for some years. I am not asking for any concession which is unreasonable, having regard to the great object to be gained. It may be said that you gain nothing if Western Australia does come into the federal union upon these terms; but do you not secure that which above all things you desire to secure, the operation of those forces—moral, social, and political—which above all things are the most valuable fruits of that federal union into which we wish to enter. For these reasons, I hope the Committee will take into serious consideration the question whether they cannot give to Western Australia the right to control customs taxation for a period of, say, ten years.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

- Mr. JAMES:

Undoubtedly, and that is the question involved. Surely the hon. member must know that it is the competition in intercolonial produce which will injure us in connection with the desire I am emphasising—namely, the desire to settle people on our soil. Perhaps the hon. member will tell me where the concession will be if we are to have intercolonial free-trade? I am asking for a concession.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

It strikes at the very foundations of a federation!

Mr. JAMES:

I repeat that I am asking for a concession. I have used the word "concession" all through, and where is the concession, as far as we are concerned, If you are going to have intercolonial free-trade?

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

I thought the hon. member was asking for a concession in the shape of power to collect duties on foreign products, as Sir Samuel Griffith suggested!

Mr. JAMES:

I make no qualification of that kind at all. We wish power to levy duties having for their object the settlement of people on the soil. Foreign products can come in as they do now. We do not want to levy duties in connection with foreign products, but in connection with agricultural products; and we want to do this solely for the purpose of settling people on the soil, and, as I have pointed out, adding a new province to the commonwealth. Unless we have this power, not only shall we not come into the federation until we have settled people on the soil; but I question—strongly attached though I am to the cause—whether I myself would advocate any entrance to a federal union which would have the effect of destroying the one opportunity we have had for sixty years of securing a population for Western Australia.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia)[2.36]:

I have no desire to protract this debate in Committee; but I do think that the Finance Committee appointed by the Convention has so far received very little indication of any definite course of action which they are expected to take. I was somewhat pleased to hear yesterday from the lips of the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales that, as far as the delegation from this colony is concerned, he, as representing that delegation, or the bulk of it, was willing to trust the future parliament of a federated Australia, not only in matters of minor detail, but also in this great and important question of finance, and the distribution of any probable surplus. Following upon that speech, the tone of which was certainly conciliatory and cheering to most members of this Convention, we had today a speech by the Right Hon. the Premier of Victoria, which at once swept away all, or a very great deal of the hopefulness we had taken from the address of the Right Hon. G.H. Reid, and which threw in our path all the difficulties which have ever been mentioned by any enemy to the scheme of federation.

Mr. JAMES:

The difficulties are there, and they have to be faced!

Mr. SOLOMON:

There is something to be said for the hon. member's candour in mentioning the whole of these difficulties to the members of the Convention. But there is such a thing as playing a game of cards fairly, and there is such a thing, especially if it be a game of euchre, as giving to the other side all the "bowers." This may not have been the intentional attitude of the hon. gentleman, but it was certainly the result of his speech this morning. He certainly put into the hands of the enemies of federation in New South Wales every possible argument which could be put there by the worst wrecker of federation. I admit with the Right Hon. Sir George Turner that there is a great deal to be said in favour of our framing some definite proposals in regard to the financial position, and that although it may smooth over the difficulty to say that we will trust the federal parliament to deal with this subject entirely, it will, as the right hon. member stated, give the enemies of federation a considerable argument. As the right hon. member pointed out, if this Convention, chosen by the whole of the colonies, cannot frame any equitable system of dealing with the finances, the enemies of federation may ask, "How will it be possible for the future federal parliament to deal with the question?" I admit that there is a great deal in that argument. But now in this Convention we are faced with precisely the same difficult problem that the Finance Committee were faced with when the Convention sat in Adelaide. There we found that, although the smaller colonies were prepared to make considerable concessions, the two larger colonies were the ones with which the greatest difficulties occurred. We have had from the Premier of New South Wales a declaration that he is prepared to trust the federal parliament. We have had from the Premier of Victoria a declaration that he rather desires to deal with this matter at once, and that the Finance Committee shall present something that maybe placed before the people. In this morning's paper we find another solution of this financial problem given to us by a gentleman who bears the character of being one of our deepest thinkers on the financial problem. I refer to Mr. Nash. Although his solution of the problem is not a new one, coming, as it does now, in the light of all the difficulties that have been raised, and all the objections to previous solutions, it certainly seems to me to be well worth thinking of. The hon. member Mr. Glynn, dealt very clearly with this question of the debts and the railways, and the advisability of the federal parliament taking over both the debts and the railways. He dealt with the question from several standpoints. Especially among his arguments may be noted the one that taking over all the railway services would do away with all the difficulties and all the jealousies in connection with the question of an inter-state commission. I think we may consider that taking over the railway systems would mean a great deal more than that. We know that at the present time, taking the statistical figures, which I think can be relied upon, that the railways of the colonies as a whole mean a loss to the revenues of the different colonies in round figures of £1,000,000 per annum. If these cut-throat rates which we have heard so much about in the Finance Committee and in this Committee could be done away with by the administration of all the railways being placed in the hands of the federal parliament, there is little doubt that the bulk of this loss of £1,000,000 per annum might be easily made up without any great tax upon the producers or the people who use our railways. In fact, £1,000,000 divided amongst all the colonies over a year's traffic on the various lines, would represent an infinitesimal advance in the rates for the haulage of goods and for passenger traffic. Then, again, we must consider this branch of the subject in connection with the handing over of the debts of the commonwealth. Here we find opposition raised to handing over the whole of the debts to the federal parliament on the ground that the federal parliament can do no better in the way of converting those debts than the states themselves can when the debts mature. I venture to think, however, that if the whole of the debts are placed in the hands of the federal parliament to deal with, an immense saving can be made in the way of interest, not an immediate saving certainly, because, as the hon. member, Sir William Zeal, pointed out by an interjection, we can pass no law to force the present holders of our bonds and stocks to hand them over. Whenever we desire to give a new stock or a new bond in place of those at present held, we shall undoubtedly have to pay the top market price and it fair equivalent. But there is this to be considered: that the value of the stock with the endorsement of the whole of the colonies behind it must certainly be somewhat greater than the value of the stock of each individual state. I do not say that it will be very much greater, because the credit of the individual states at the present time is very high indeed in the London market; but it undoubtedly would be somewhat higher. With the power of converting the whole of the debts into one interminable stock somewhat similar to English censors, undoubtedly a vast saving could be made. Let us come to definite figures with regard to the debts. It has been pointed out that you cannot look for any great immediate saving with regard to the conversion of our debts, and it has been pointed out with a great deal of truth that we can hardly hope to convert any of these debts into one regular consolidated stock until such time as these debts mature. In looking through a statement of the debts of the commonwealth contained in the Votes and Proceedings of the last meeting of the Convention, I find that during the next three years, between 1897 and 1900, we have colonial debts maturing to the amount of £9,000,000. These debts at the present time are bearing interest at 4, 4 1/2, 5, and 6 per cent., so that within the next three years we can certainly look forward to the federal parliament being able to reissue that amount of £9,000,000 of stock at a saving of at least 1 1/2 per cent. That is to say, within three years from the present date sufficient of our debts will mature to enable the federal parliament to make a saving of £135,000 a year.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

The states could also make a large saving!

Mr. SOLOMON:

I admit that, but I do not think the states could make the same saving, and be as sure of a conversion on favourable terms as the federal parliament would be. Taking a further term of five years, from 1900, we find that about £12,000,000 of the colonial debts will mature. For that amount we are paying 4, 5, and 6 per cent. per annum. Here we find a further saving can be made. Supposing that stock can also be issued for this amount at par, at an average rate of interest of perhaps 3 per cent. - which I do not think is unfair - a further saving of £180,000 a year could be made; so that in eight years' time, under favourable circumstances, we would be able to save at the very least over £300,000 per annum, which at the present time is being lost by the individual colonies. Before passing from this question of the debts and the railways, it seems to me that the suggestion that in handing over our debts we should also hand over those tangible assets consisting of the railways of the various colonies is only a reasonable one, although there seems to be a great prejudice, especially in New South Wales, amongst many I have spoken to, against handing over the control of their various railway lines. I cannot understand that prejudice, in the face of the declarations of the trust and reliance they are prepared to place in the federal parliament. We an not going to hand over the control of these railway lines to any body of man who would be likely to use them unfairly. We would not hand over the lines of the different colonies to the control of an administration that would be likely to use them, as they are used now, for the purpose of injuring one colony or another. The object of making these lines pay fairly, and at the same time develop the producing interests they are intended to serve, would have just as great care, and just as much watchfulness on the part of the federal parliament as it now has on the part of the parliaments of the various states. Then, we come to, perhaps, the more difficult problem of the customs duties; and here, I think, as has been so openly pointed out, is the great stumbling-block to federation-not a stumbling-block on the part of four out of five of the colonies-at least, three out of five, I suppose I may say now, after the declaration of Mr. James, representing Western Australia-but a stumbling-block in New South Wales, not openly declared, for it is a question that many of the representatives of New South Wales do not care to declare themselves very definitely upon. It is admitted, I think, on all hands that, in order to obtain the same aggregate revenue for Australasia through the customshouse that the various colonies obtain now, it will be necessary to have a moderate degree of protection. That, I think, most of us at least regard as a sine qua non.

The Hon. J. HENRY:
A revenue-producing tariff!

Mr. SOLOMON:
A tariff not for protective purposes but for revenue-producing purposes—a tariff, nevertheless, which will very nearly equal in some respects a protective tariff as we at present understand it.

The Hon. J. HENRY:
Not necessarily framed as a protective tariff!

Mr. SOLOMON:
Not necessarily framed for the protection of industries, as the tariff in Victoria is, but framed for producing revenue. At the same time it would undoubtedly be in effect a protective tariff to some extent, and it is useless for us to shut our eyes to that fundamental fact. As far as four out of five of the colonies are concerned there seems to be no difficulty in regard to this matter; but as far as New South Wales is concerned it seems that the representatives do not care to pin themselves to any definite instructions being set out in the financial clauses of the bill which will in effect mean the imposition of a protective tariff. It is no use mincing words over this. It is no use attempting to evade the question by suggesting that other modes of taxation may be adopted. We know perfectly well that the only mode of taxation which will be tolerated by the states, if they come together in this union, is at the first, at any rate, a moderate taxation through the customs. Then the difficulty crops up as to the returning of the surplus to the various states. After a great deal of argument, after a great deal of trouble on the part of the Finance Committee in Adelaide, and after a great deal of light thrown upon the subject by various writers in the press, we found at the last that it was necessary for the Treasurers of the various colonies to frame a clause dealing with what is known now as the sliding scale of adjustment. That sliding scale has not been fairly and fully debated, and it has been very little understood. I venture to think that until my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, from South Australia, in the pamphlet he issued a few days ago, explained the operation of the sliding scale upward and downward, very few people thoroughly understood what was intended by it. In dealing with this question it may be an instruction of this Committee that the Finance Committee shall draft resolutions somewhat in that form. There is no instruction at present. We have had a pretty equal expression of opinion on the one side in favour of trusting the federal parliament, and on the other side in favour of a sliding scale with some variations in respect to certain colonies. If it is the desire of this Committee that the sliding scale should be adopted, I should like to point out that the operation of the sliding scale will not be as drafted, that the colonies receiving a greater amount than the aggregate ascertained in the first year shall lose one-fifth in each year of its operation. I should like to direct the attention of my legal friends in the Convention to the wording of this provision in subsection v of clause 92. By the drafting of this sub-clause it would appear that the colonies having an excess would lose one-fifth of that excess in each year. On the other hand, we know perfectly well that it was intended, if the plan set forth in Mr. Holder's pamphlet in correct, that, during the first year after the ascertained average contribution, each colony having an excess should lose one-fifth, during the second year two-fifths of that excess, during the third year three-fifths, and so forth; and that, in the same ratio, the contribution of the colonies having less would increase. But, if hon. members will look at that clause as drafted, they will see that it does not carry out the intention of the Drafting Committee.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The words are those of the Finance Committee itself!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
It is very questionable whether it does or does not; but we can reconsider that point!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
We need not trouble about the form!

Mr. SOLOMON:
In its present wording, the clause is liable to somewhat mislead those who seek to find out what the result of its operation will be.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
It is a question as to whether you take the beginning of the year or the end of the year!

Mr. SOLOMON:
It will not, I suppose, be difficult to make a verbal amendment. What I was about to say was this: Have hon. members really studied from such figures as are available what the result of the adoption of this sliding scale will be? Representing as I do a colony like South Australia, where a considerable advantage would be gained, I feel that this scheme would certainly suit my constituents, but would it suit the constituents of some of the other delegates?

The Hon. J. HENRY:
New South Wales, for instance!

Mr. SOLOMON:
Yes. If we take Coghlan's figures in table 5 of that little pamphlet which was provided for us in Adelaide, showing the relative contributions of the various colonies for the years 1893, 1894, and 1895 as a basis of calculation-

An Hon. MEMBER:
Does the hon. gentleman think we ought to take that as a basis?

Mr. SOLOMON:
I do not care what figures you take. I do not for a moment pretend to say that these figures are likely to represent what the results will be when a uniform tariff has been established.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
They will serve as an example!

Mr. SOLOMON:
I am taking them as an example, they being the only figures available, and I find that according to those figures New South Wales would lose in the first year something like £106,000.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
If they are taken as absolute facts!

Mr. SOLOMON:
They are arithmetically correct, because the losses are balanced by the gains of the other colonies. If a table is worked out, it will show hon.
members that that is so. I am pointing this out not to raise another difficulty, but in order that those members who are on the Finance Committee may have some more definite instruction as to what policy we wish adopted in framing resolutions. This debate, of course, is only held with a view to give the Finance Committee some information. I would ask
hon. members what information have we as to the general views of this Committee on this financial problem? Little or none. Those speakers who may be taken to represent the opinions of their various delegations—I refer to the Treasurers especially—are all at a tangent: they are all going in opposite directions, and the Finance Committee will have no more information to guide them when they meet after this debate is concluded than they had when it started. The most equitable scheme so far that has been submitted—and we have had none submitted to take its place—is the scheme submitted by the Treasurers at the Adelaide Convention, with certain variations which must be made to deal with certain colonies. Take, for instance, the position of Western Australia. Undoubtedly, some clauses will have to be introduced which will secure to that colony, irrespective of what the division of the surplus may be to other colonies, an absolute return of the surplus in accordance with her contributions. It will be ridiculous to think that Western Australia, with a revenue from customs of £7 per head could go into this federation knowing it was possible that she would only receive back, after paying her contribution to the expenses of the commonwealth, perhaps £1 or 30s. a head. And in this connection I would point out that there is little or no difficulty in dealing with Western Australia in a totally different way from that in which we deal with the other colonies. Western Australia in its isolated position will be able to keep an accurate account of the whole of the contributions through customs without one penny of additional expense, in regard to the customs-houses or their officers, so that little difficulty need arise in that respect. With a view to meeting Western Australia, not as suggested by the hon. member, Mr. James, by allowing her a free hand as to the imposition of customs—if such were Western Australia's idea in joining the federation, I am rather surprised at any delegates coming here from that colony but with a view to meeting her special conditions—the condition of the enormous amount per head she is receiving by customs—I think a simple clause might be inserted in the bill. I do not imagine for an instant that this enormously increased contribution through customs is likely to continue. The reason of it is simple and plain to those who will seek it. The bulk of the population—I suppose seven-tenths or eight-tenths of the population of Western Australia consists of adult males, who are earning twice as much as are adult males in the southern portions of Australia in the same position. That is to say, none of these tens of thousands of men employed in mining throughout the length and breadth of Western Australia are receiving less than from £3 10s. to £4 a week as against from 35s. to £2 a week, which they would receive in the southern colonies. Here is the simple solution of the question how it is that their revenue is so enormous. The spending power of a community is the test of what the revenue from customs will be. So long as this abnormal rate of wages continues, and so long as the bulk of the population continue to be single men, or rather adult males, without their wives and children accompanying them—so long will the contribution of Western Australia, through the custom-house, be greatly disproportionate to the contributions of the other colonies. But all this will, in a very few years, come down to the same level, or to nearly the same level, as that of the other colonies, and although, during that operation, the population will increase, the customs revenue will not increase per head in the same ratio. As to the other colonies there seems to me to be little difference between them; so little indeed that I think that we might easily prophesy that within three or four years at the outside, the customs revenue contributed by men, women, and children in Victoria, South Australia and New South Wales will be very much about the same. I have listened to what has been said as to the necessity for some guarantee to the treasurers of the states that the division of the surplus received from customs will be made on an equitable and proper basis. I do not think it will be necessary to lay down hard and fast lines demonstrated by figures as to what percentage, or what proportion of the contributions through customs shall be returned to individual states. But I think that for a period of years, at any rate—the hon. member, Mr. Holder, names five years, and that seems to a very fair term, during which the federal parliament can settle down to its work, and financial matters can adjust themselves in the states—provision should be made at least to secure to those states a just and equitable return in accordance with their contributions. I do not wish to delay the Committee longer, because there will be other opportunities to speak after the Finance Committee have dealt with the matters relegated to them. But I do urge upon hon. members to give that committee some definite expression of opinion, by resolution or otherwise, as to whether the majority desire to leave the whole of these matters to the parliament of federated Australia, or whether they desire to follow out more the lines laid down by the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, and the lines laid down in the financial portion of the bill, and frame clauses to deal with the finances on that basis.

I cannot commence the remarks I have to make without joining in the congratulations which have been showered upon hon. members for the development of the federal spirit which has taken place since our meeting in Adelaide. And when I speak of such development, I do not assume, as some of our critics assume, that that very federal development is a forgetfulness of the interests of the colonies we here represent. The whole principle of federation depends on the framing of a constitution which maintains an even line of justice between the general authority and the provincial authority. To depart from that on one side or the other would seem to me to be a forgetfulness of the interests of Australia, or of the interests of one's own colony. But so long as justice can be secured on both sides of that line, it seems to me that we are pursuing the path which the statute that sent us here commanded us to pursue. How then, will these matters work out? Is it not true that considerations of this kind suggest a principle on which we can act? We all admit that we are constituting a free people; we all admit that we cannot withhold from that people every attribute of power which is necessary to the consummation of the purpose for which they are constituted. If we surround the federal power too much with safeguards for itself, not for provincial interests, we shall be derogating from the rights of the citizens whom we do not call into existence, but to whom we hand larger powers of self-government. If on the other hand we make the powers of the commonwealth so extensive that they necessarily result in an absorption of the interests and the properties of the states, then, correlative, we depart from the path which we ought to pursue. That suggests to me that there are some quarters in which guarantees are necessary, and others in which guarantees are decidedly unnecessary. It suggests to me that in all those matters which are purely federal, which are either the matters which no province can undertake for itself, or are the matters which a province cannot effectively deal with, and which she consents to hand over, there is no necessity to hamper the federation with any guarantee; but that where the interests of the federation and of the state are inextricably involved, as in the case of the distribution of the surplus of customs revenue, some principle must be laid down—you may call the laying down of that principle a guarantee or not—but it must be safe to enter into the federation. It must be understood that the line of safety in observed for the states which join it, otherwise you may bid good-bye to the hope of the electors of those states accepting the constitution. Well, then, in such matters, as for instance the federal franchise, the choice of the federal capital, and so on, I am prepared to impose no guarantee whatever upon the federation because they are purely federal matters. In such matters as the essence of government—if it in true that finance is government—in such matters as those financial adjustments, the maintenance of which on both parts is alike necessary to the federation and the states,—that is a point where something like a principle—if you can call it a principle—something like a guarantee, if you prefer that name—must be inserted in the constitution. While we must fully and thoroughly trust the federation in respect of all matters which are purely federal—and we must trust it as much as we can even in other matters—we must also safeguard the continued entity of the states, because with the states wiped out there is no longer a federation. If we observe these principles I think we shall be on the safe path. I do not think that this question can be fully discussed, as has been suggested by one or more hon. gentlemen, without some relation to the question of the railways, because one of the strongest arguments used in favour of the vesting of the railways in the federation, is that by that investiture the financial difficulty will be solved. I am not at all sure in the first place that that investiture would solve the financial difficulty—in fact I am pretty confident that it would not get rid of the great question which we have all the while to determine: given a federal surplus what is the just proportion in which it should go back to each state? You may wipe out the federal surplus by taking over the railways, by taking over the interest on debts, but your federation has to set what it gets out of that surplus against the proportion which would otherwise be payable to the state; and therefore it is a moot question what is the proportion payable to that state. No expedient of one kind or other can ever get rid of that question.

Mr. GLYNN:

You might be applying it to smaller figures!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

You might be, but if you arrive at a surplus out of one source of revenue or another—if you observe the principle—and I think we all desire that returns should be as nearly as possible according to contributions—if you observe that principle and you have a surplus, the amount to be credited to each state, even if you amalgamate the railways, must be ascertained upon some definite principle. That is the difficulty which is unsolved by every suggestion. But I believe there is one suggestion which has been made out of doors, and which has been to a certain extent made by Sir John Forrest, which goes some distance to meet it. I am heartily at one with the Premier of New South Wales, whose speech, of yesterday must be regarded as an admirable contribution, not only to the finance of federation, but also to that federal impulse upon which we rely to obtain popular support for our movement. I am heartily at one with him, as I think I have said a great many times in previous discussions, in saying that we should trust the federal parliament, but we must have one qualification to that. First, we do away with the solvency of the several states. If we do that those states die, and we have no longer a federation, but a legislative union. If we are to preserve that solvency, then the question arises, are we to arrange for it upon a speculative basis, or upon a basis of fact? It seems to me that there can be no question that the basis of fact, which means experience, is the right basis upon which to proceed. I am as heartily opposed to a prolonged system of book-keeping as is anyone in this chamber. I am as heartily opposed as anyone here to that dealing between state and federation which has been characterised in Canada as the system of better terms, that designation being a convenient euphemism for corruption. The hon. member, Mr. Fraser, who has knowledge and experience with regard to the working of the Canadian Constitution, knows how good a constitution on the whole it is, and yet how the loopholes that are left for dealings, for bargainings, for transactions between the states and the federation, have resulted in some cases in bargains which were not wholly creditable. That we wish to avoid, and it seems to me that if we are to combine those two principles, if we act not upon speculation but upon facts, and if we also act at that earliest possible moment in such a way an to determine all bargainings, all transactions for better terms between the state and the federation, we shall have arrived at something, like a solution of this problem. Yew I revert to: what was said by Sir John, Forrest. He said that the principles laid down in the, bill of 1891 were, after all, the most feasible that had yet been suggested. Without committing myself as far as that, I am inclined to think there is in the provisions of the bill of 1891 the germ of the solution at which we ought to arrive. I have said-and I am sure I have the concurrence of the Convention in saying it—that if we can arrive at a decision based on facts instead of a decision based on speculation, we shall be nearer the truth. All the figures that have been, laid before us by statisticians are admittedly speculative in this: that their calculations-no doubt very good sums in arithmetic-depend upon the assumption that under a tariff which may in one place be higher than the previous tariff, and in another lower, the rate, of the collection of duty will remain the same. There is only one objection to that method of calculation, and that is that it leaves you a sum in arithmetic, but it does not leave you any facts. What, then, is the position? Must we not at once acknowledge that the purely speculative basis, the attempt to prophesy—and it will be an audacious attempt on our part—must be abandoned, and that we cannot venture to predict what will be the operation of a uniform tariff because in a people conditioned as ours we have never seen any attempt at such an operation? If we once realise that, we may still give due weight to, the fact which has been so much emphasised by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, that there will be, after the federation is accomplished, and after the uniform tariff is established, a gradual approximation in consuming power, purchasing power, and payment of duties between all the colonials. But we cannot foresee the result of that approximation, and if we attempt to place on record in the constitution a fancied result of that approximation we shall probably be leading, either to a considerable convulsion in our federation, or to an agitation which could only be satisfied by amendment of the constitution by way of referendum, because experience is almost certain to falsify any predictions we may make. We should be more than human if predictions of this kind could succeed. What, then, is the alternative? The alternative is to proceed upon facts. We have not yet the facts to proceed upon. Experience alone will show the way. It is to experience that we must revert, and that is an experience which can be gained only by a federal authority. That, it seems to me, leads us to the conclusion that, notwithstanding our repugnance to book-keeping, we must still bear in mind that the final determination of this matter must be based upon experience, upon fact; and it will be just to all the colonies—just particularly to the smaller colonies—that we should reserve a time during which this book-keeping—much as I object to it—may go on in order that a basis of fact may be once for all established. Take a period of three years, or of five years if you prefer it, for the uniform tariff. Let the collections be estimated somewhat on the principle laid down in the proposed 92nd clause during that time. Let it be ascertained as nearly as the statistics of the commonwealth enable you to ascertain it—and they will be much more effective than those of any single colony as the colonies now exist—and on the experience of those three or five years you will have had an answer to the question, what is the tendency to approximation in the consuming and importing powers of the various states? You cannot answer that question today. If the answer to it is at the root of the question, and if only another authority can find the answer, then the solution of this problem lies in putting off the answer until there are such conditions as I have named.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Suppose that you applied it to the experience of Western Australia, how would it fit in?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
It would raise some difficulty; but my hon. friend must recollect that there is no course that you can propose in regard to this question that will not raise difficulty, and I am sure that he will agree with me at once in saying that the nearer you approximate to facts, and the further you leave speculation behind, the nearer you are to a reasonable solution. We all know that we had such times here in 1851 and onwards for a few years as my right hon. friend opposite has enjoyed. Those were the days when a pair of boots cost £3 or £4, and when a man had £4 or £5 with which to pay for them. These conditions—I am sure it will not be annoying to my right hon. friend for me to say this—these conditions are proved by the experience of other colonies to be evanescent. At the same time, they are conditions which are factors in the building up of a solid system under which prosperity is possible. That has been so in the case of other colonies. We have lost our booms; but the conditions of booms have been replaced by conditions of settlement, of progress, of production, of the utilisation of the soil, which I am sure will follow in my right hon. friend's colony. That is, I think, a fair answer to the question; and the question of my hon. friend, Mr. Henry, leaves the position still intact, that the further you go away from fact, and the more you endeavour to speculate, the more you assume a function in which events will stultify you.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I do not think that book-keeping is impracticable at all, and for this reason: We take the collection of duties at the present time, and that gives us, in the first instance, a guide to the amount we may require to raise by the uniform tariff.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is between colony and colony!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Yes. My hon. friend means as between the southern and northern portion of South Australia?

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

---

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I admit that there is a very serious difficulty, but, notwithstanding my hon. friend's suggestion, we cannot get away from this, that the conditions which will arise under federation are conditions of which we have had no experience, and they cannot be dealt with except by an authority that has experience of them. We still have difficulty, I admit. I do not for a moment say that my suggestion is free from difficulty—indeed it is not my suggestion, but the suggestion of many minds before—but I say that it is less beset with difficulty than any other course before us.

An Hon. MEMBER:

What would you do in case of the admission of new states?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Is my hon. friend in possession of any scheme by which a difficulty of that kind could be met? I do not think so, and, therefore, inasmuch as power is given to the federal parliament to settle the terms for the admission of new states, it is in the power of the commonwealth to legislate on such an occasion so that the colony in question shall receive a certain guaranteed amount on its admission until its experience under altered conditions, under the tariff, designated the amount properly returnable to it; and that would be the subject of adjustment I see no difficulty in that case, except the necessity of resorting to bookkeeping, and, as much as I am opposed to book-keeping, I have come to the conclusion that if it leads to the abandonment of continual aggression on the states by the federal authority for the purpose of getting better terms, a limited time of bookkeeping will be a necessity.

An Hon. MEMBER:

It will not cost very much!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

No, it will not cost very much. There would simply be a system of inspection which would supplant the collection of customs duties on the borders. It is true that that would be, to some extent, irritating; but he who feels the aggravation of border duties will not object to a system of inspection when he knows that, at any rate, he is relieved from the great trouble, the great outlay, the great harassment, of the collection of duties. So that it will be admitted that a resort to such a system as this will at once be a lightening of burdens. There will be an abolition of the intercolonial customs; and those who feel the benefit of that abolition cannot very well object, if for reasons which may redound to the lasting benefit of the commonwealth they have for a few years to suffer a system under which the amount and value of importations across the border may be ascertained. I should prefer if we could say, "Trust this question to the commonwealth absolutely and at once." My sympathies are all with those who say, "Let us settle this financial question by empowering, as the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales sought to empower, the commonwealth"-and I admit the federal spirit of that amendment-by at once saying to the federal authority, "We trust you to deal justly with us. We leave the matter in your hands." But this, upon the lines which I endeavoured to indicate at the beginning of these remarks, would create a difficulty, because it would not guarantee the primary solvency of the states, and without that guarantee there would be a tendency-an unnecessary tendency-on the part of the federal authority, not to usurp, but insensibly to encroach, so that the revenue and the financial position of the various colonies would be so impaired and hampered that they would become municipalities instead of self-governing communities. That is alien to the spirit of federation. The result of that would be to destroy federation. It might substitute a legislative union; but we are charged under the Enabling Act with the framing of a federal, and of no other form of, constitution. The difficulty in the way of inviting the federal commonwealth to take charge of the distribution of the federal surplus seems to me to be beset, first, by the consideration which I have mentioned, and also by other considerations which, to my mind, if the principle I have laid down is correct, would be fatal to success. I have already pointed out one danger that would arise if we charged the federal authority with the duty of distributing the surplus among the states without imposing any condition or restriction whatever; and that is the danger of insensible encouragement to the diminution of the revenue of the states, and the impairment of their individuality. Another danger is that immediately upon the establishment of the federal tariff you would have every one of the states so strongly pressing the federal authority to lay down a principle of distribution, and to pass an act for that purpose, that it would be forced to pass such an act. That would be substituting one difficulty for another, because if there is to be a distribution without experience, and not upon the basis of fact, it matters little whether the basis of that distribution is laid down here or by a federal parliament; it will be equally faulty in either case.

Mr. HIGGINS:
There would be an all-round grab!

The Hon. E. Barton:

As my hon. friend says, there would be an all-round grab. There would be a rush by the various states to secure the best terms they could get, and necessarily so, because of their financial exigencies. No basis of distribution would be ascertained as a matter of fact and of experience, and the result would be that the distribution would be according to pressure, and not according to experience. That would be fatal. It would be as bad as if we fixed the basis of distribution now.

An Hon. Member:

It would be worse!

The Hon. E. Barton:

Perhaps it would be worse, because here there is not the pressure which a federal government would be under. Does not that suggest that there must be this experience, this basis of fact. I suggest, therefore, that we consider the institution of the system of book-keeping for three or five years after the commencement of a federal tariff, so that the authority we are about to constitute may act according to the lines which experience may dictate. We might lay down in our constitution—I make this suggestion to the Finance Committee—a direction to the federal parliament to distribute the surplus upon the lines of the experience gained by them; or—and I am not now talking as a draftsman—we might invite them to make a distribution as nearly as possible according to the contributions obtained and expected from each colony joining the federation. We might take one or the other of those courses. Either of them would be a much greater approximation to justice than any other we could possibly make, and would be a much fairer and juster scheme than the variant and discordant schemes which have poured in upon us from the press, from the parliaments, and from our own members. We make no distinction, I hope. We must admit that we are full of suggestions—and I do not use the term in its slang interpretation. The Convention is as guilty of, or as much to be credited with, the making of suggestions, as is any other body which has criticised it; and I am sure that there is a spirit here which welcomes criticism and suggestions from abroad. But I think that we shall not arrive at any true solution of the problem unless we draw a real line of demarcation between the speculative and the actual. I think that the only way we can do so is to await the result of experience. We should says, either that this distribution must take place upon the basis of the experience gained by the federal government, or that there shall be a direction to the federal government to distribute the surplus according to the actual and expected contributions of the states, less the per capita expense of government. As I said a little while ago, I am sure that this question cannot be considered without considering the question whether the railways are to be taken over. As to that, we have had suggestions which are, no doubt, valuable. In my opinion they will be more valuable to a federal parliament than they are to us. I am one of those who think-as I thought when we met in Adelaide-that upon entering into federation there should be no bargain made for the sale of our railways. The railways are largely instruments of production; they have been instituted for the purpose of opening up markets to our producers. They are there for the development of our land, and as our land must remain inalienably our property, so we ought to have the right of retaining our railways as interwoven with the success of our land development. There may come a time when, a principle of this kind, which I believe to be true, may have to be foregone in view of some great impending danger, or expected advantage. This is another of the cases in which our commonwealth should be invested with certain powers, and I am, therefore, in favour of the sub-clauses inserted in Adelaide, empowering the commonwealth to take over, not at its own option, but only with the consent of the states interested, the whole or any portion of the railways. I am in favour of that simply because I believe that as time advances the wisdom of the body which we are constituting will be far more effective, practical, and valuable than any off-hand opinions which we can express at this date and at the present stage of development. Therefore, I am strongly in favour of allowing such provisions to remain in the constitution as will allow of the railways being taken over, provided that a satisfactory bargain can be arrived at between the states interested and the federal authority. In the meantime I remain of the opinion which I held in Adelaide-that there should be no investiture of the railways in the federal government. It is agreed that the taking over of the railways would recoup the loss of £1,000,000 a year occasioned by the giving up of intercolonial duties. We must first consider what is the meaning of the term "loss." There will be a loss of £1,000,000 if intercolonial freetrade is a loss; but not otherwise.

An Hon. MEMBER:
There will be revenue loss!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
So much revenue will be lost to the states; but that will be an actual gain to the people in their taxable capacity. They will be relieved of £1,000,000 of taxation. If, then, it is said that an ensuing tariff on the part; of the federation which would bring back that £1,000,000 to the treasury would be a system of heavy, unheard-of taxation, the argument must be dismissed at once as an absurdity, for the reason that, although an adjustment may be effected, the total revenue drawn from the pockets of the people will be exactly the same. If, with one stroke of the pen, by abolishing intercolonial customs duties, you do away with £1,000,000 of revenue, and get back that revenue by imposing a federal tariff which may be nominally a higher tariff, if the total revenue is the same in one case as in the other, who can say that the burden upon the taxpayer is greater? No one can say so. So that the whole of this thing is an absolute bogy. It is another of those spook illusions which some of our friends, who are opposed to federation, are so fond of creating. There is nothing in it. I think we may take heart of grace upon a question of this kind, and say this: that providing the federal tariff realises approximately the same amount of revenue as was realised by the aggregate of the previous tariffs—and that it is sufficient for the states—we may take this course with perfect satisfaction, without increasing the burdens of the people.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Are you not tying the federal parliament down to raising that amount?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I am not saying that the federation should be tied down to raising that amount. I am answering the objection that a federal tariff of an average of so much is a higher tariff, imposes a higher burden on the people than would an intercolonial tariff of a less amount. I take it that that tariff which results in an income equal to that which is swept away cannot truly be said to increase the burdens of the people. I take it that if that contention is correct, the first line of the argument that we cannot federate without taking over the railways is destroyed, because that line of argument depends on the assumption that you lose £1,000,000 by abolishing the intercolonial duties, and that, in order to bring that back by means of a federal tariff, you are over-taxing the people, and, therefore, you must take over the railways and save the million in their management. That is the fallacy in the first line of the argument in favour of taking over the railways. Then, again, it is said that we must take over the railways if we want to take over the debts; but that is a non sequitur, and for this reason: The actual security for a public debt, in the first instance—and I am distinguishing between the actual and the legal security—is the energy and thrift of the people. It is to that that the moneylender looks when he advances his money. Separate the people from the railways, and the railways without them would not be worth a farthing; but the people without the railways still have the capacity to make progress; and it is to the people, therefore, and to the results of their energy that lenders look for their security. Of course, the railways are included in the security, because the people include everything, the people being the larger security. I say, therefore, that the actual security for a national debt lies in the energy and thrift of the people, always provided that they are allowed to operate freely under a stable constitution. If this were not so, there would be no security, practically, for the national debt of England. The advances made by capitalists all over the world, those of England included, are made on the faith of the honesty and ability of the people, upon the faith of their readiness to meet their obligations, and their capacity to do so. England being a country in which public works, as we understand them, are practically unknown, and where, notwithstanding, the security offered is the greatest in the ch sense that if you handed over the public debts you must also hand over the railways? I will turn first to the legislation of Victoria. These provisions, of course, are well-known but they require recalling because we hear so much said which, I venture with the greatest respect to say, does not fall very far short of nonsense, including the statement to the effect that the railways are the chief asset for the public debt. In Victoria the Stock Act, 59 Victoria No. 1,217, in section 4, provides:

All stock issued pursuant to this act and all dividends thereon shall be and be deemed to be a primary charge upon the consolidated revenue of Victoria, &c.

I take that as a type of the legislation on the subject. There is a similar act in New South Wales, 59 Victoria, No. 5, an act to authorise a loan for the repayment of loans, in which it is provided that:

It shall be lawful for the Governor to raise by the sale of debentures or the issue of inscribed stock secured upon the consolidated revenue fund of the colony, &c.

Then in the act No. 6 of the same session, there is a provision to the same effect:

It shall be lawful for the Governor to raise by the sale of debentures or the issue of stock secured upon the consolidated revenue fund of the colony, &c.

I said that I distinguished between the actual and legal securities; the actual security being the energy and thrift of the people, whereas the legal security is the consolidated revenue of the country. What do you propose to do but to hand over to the federation, in order that they may collect it, a very large proportion—throughout the colonies it may be taken as nine-tenths—of the consolidated revenue. This will be subject to redistribution under the federation. You have the same security in the energy and thrift of the people, but under the federation you have also that which is the legal asset—the consolidated revenue fund nearly in its entirety.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

It would not amount to nine-tenths!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I leave it to the right hon. gentleman to work out the proportion, but it does not matter very much. I was forgetting for the moment that New South Wales under a policy which, notwithstanding my great patriotism and admiration for the country in which I was born, I cannot indorse, has for many years had a large land revenue—a policy under which she sells her capital in the shape land, and expends it as revenue. We are in an advantageous financial position in this respect as compared with the rest of the colonies, because we may be said to be cutting down the ancestral trees. This great security, the energy and thrift of the people, is subject to such duties as are imposed for customs revenue. It is a constant saying that nothing is more elastic than is that source of revenue. Now the customs revenue being the most elastic source of revenue, reflects the energy and thrift of the people. Therefore we have not only the index but the product of the energy and thrift of the people handed over to the federation, handed over as the bulk of that which is by law the recognised security for our debt. I may be, perhaps, pardoned for my positive form of expression when I urge that it is entirely a mistake to suppose that the railway are the asset for our debt. Whether you look to the actual security or to the legal security, it is not to be found in our railways. It is true that they are contributor to the consolidated revenue fund, but the contributions of the railways to the consolidated revenue have a large set-off against them in the form of interest on the debt. Now, what is to prevent this handing over of the public debts from being a factor in the settlement of this financial problem? I admit that the problem can be settled without it; but I do venture to say, in the first place, that the system need not be complicated by the handing over of the railways at this stage. It will be of great benefit to the credit and to the capacity of every state to have its public debt handed over, and it would form a very strong means of preventing that bogy known as the federal surplus. The Finance Committee may decide entirely against the views I venture to express, which, however strongly I may put them forward, are only meant in the spirit of suggestion; but we must not overlook the fact that taking over the national debts of the colonies, if not altogether, yet to as large an extent as possible, will be a great preventative of a system in future years which may result in further agitation between the states and the commonwealth.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

And it will take away a great incentive to extravagance!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I quite agree with that. There is a case which illustrates what I am saying—it is this: the statutes supply us with an interpretation as to what is the security for the debts, that is to say, that class of revenue which is the product of the energy of the people is made, among others, the security for the debts. Let us consider what would happen if the railways did not return one penny of profit—

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Or were run at an actual loss!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The interest must be paid, and it would have to be paid out of the consolidated revenue. The customs revenue you hand over to the federal government. What can be more right than the dealing with and adjustment of the question of debts should be handed over to the very authority which takes the revenue which is the main source for the payment of interest on our debts? I venture to submit that both the actual and the legal security would be practically in the commonwealth. If they are both in the commonwealth, the latter ought to take over the debts irrespective of the railways. Now, it may be thought that in saying this there is some implied distrust of the federation. I do not seek to impose impossible obligations on the federation. I wish to leave them as free a hand as is possible. I wish to give the federation all that is federal in essence. But the railways are not federal in essence. You can hand over the debts without handing over the railways. The railways are provincial in their essence. The debts maybe made federal without injury to one provincial interest. The railway question is one that experience can settle; it is a question to be decided by the territorial authority, which has the land to develop, and which should also be possessed of the instruments for the development of that territory. Among these I regard the railways as the highest. As I have said, I am quite ready to go further, and say that we will give the federation power to take over the railways if it and the states concur, and then only when occasion arises, which will depend upon the nation's safety and advantage, and that can be judged of by them, while it cannot now be judged of by us. In the meantime, I think that the railways must not be worked so as to neutralise intercolonial free-trade. Without the railway clauses in the bill, it may be argued that the commonwealth can legislate and prevent such a thing. It is perfectly true that under the clause for regulating trade and commerce, and under a particular clause, such as the 95th, not only is there some automatic operation in the constitution, but there is also power to legislate so as to deal with that question. But I ask whether it is not better to prevent interference with intercolonial free-trade by the same instrument which creates intercolonial free-trade? Why is it a good thing to dissociate these two things? If you enact intercolonial free-trade in your constitution, why hesitate to make it effectual by the same document? Why should you leave the complete enforcement of that free-trade to be a mere matter of legislative interference, when, if the gift is a good and a great one, there is nothing to stop its being complete in the one act. I take it, therefore, that it is better to prevent this interference with intercolonial free-trade as far as possible in the same constitution which grants that very boon. Otherwise, I think we should have to confess that we thought it was not necessary to safeguard the first condition of federation. This does not mean the abolition of differential rates in their restricted sense. It does not mean the institution of a uniform mileage rate, as so many timid minds fear. I concur with all those who think that it means the institution of a uniform mileage rate, in saying that such a rate would be fatal to the producers of the colonies. We must all agree that any system which meant a uniform mileage rate would be as injurious to the producers of one colony as it would be to the producers of another. So that anything that necessarily brought that about must be rejected at once as erroneous. I hope that those outside, who are writing letters to us, and who are putting letters in the papers suggesting that the abolition of the present system means the replacement of it by a uniform mileage rate will take encouragement, because no such thing is involved in the mere enforcement of the free-trade clauses of the constitution. An interstate commission would not necessarily have power, so far as we sought to constitute it, to make any rate at all. They would have an interdicting power, the power of maintaining and executing the intercolonial free-trade clauses in the constitution bill. It would, therefore, be their business, like the Inter-state Commission in America, to interdict those rates which would interfere with free exchange between state and state.

Mr. GLYNN: They have larger powers than that in America!

The Hon. E. BARTON: I know they have, but we are not bound to go so far. I am speaking of the degree of power to the inter-state commission which we think should be embodied in the constitution. What we wish is that they should not interfere with the railways of the different colonies further than is necessary to maintain free-trade between the various colonies. The commission would not have power to make any rate at all. It might be given that power afterwards by legislation, but it is not necessary for us now to give it. But they would have an interdicting and judicial power. I think if we confer that power we should make it subject to appeal to the highest court of the federation; and for this reason: that while the question whether a rate is preferential as well as differential is a mere matter of evidence, still, since the application of the constitutional provision entrusted to such a commission is a matter of law, the sense in which they interpret those provisions is a matter that ought to be allowed to go for final interpretation to the highest judicial body in the state.

Mr. GLYNN:

In that case what would be left for them to do in the way of regulating the railways?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The Hon. member will see that there is a power of regulation in the power of prohibition. If a rate is found in its working to interfere with the constitutional provisions laid down in this bill, there will be plenty of work, in its first years at any rate, for this inter-state commission to do. It will have to decide on such questions as were put to me by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, in Adelaide. Take the case of a rate in New South Wales on goods running both ways between Sydney and Hay, and another rate on goods running both ways between Sydney and Dubbo, Dubbo being to a certain extent outside the influence of intercolonial competition. Questions in regard to such rates would necessarily have to be determined by the interstate commission. They would have to determine whether the southern rate was so different from the other, that one was justified as a mere developmental rate, while the other had assumed the form of a rate which gave a preference to one port over another.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Would the hon. and learned gentleman allow that power to be given to the inter-state commission?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I would allow that power to be given to them subject to an appeal to the federal high court—that is to say, subject to an appeal to the very guardian of the constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS:

We should be perfectly satisfied with that!
The Hon. E. Barton:

These questions were put to me in Adelaide, and I did my best to answer them satisfactorily. I take it that the discrimen is this: Is your rate a rate which embodies the principle, not of less money, but of less money pro rata for a long haul than for a short one? If it embodies that principle, and no more, it is a perfectly just and right rate in itself. If it goes beyond that, and you find that it is either made or being used for the purpose of diverting traffic from one port in the Commonwealth to another port, then you have fallen right into the trouble of preferential rates, the avoidance of which must be a condition of intercolonial freetrade. But,

Mr. Higgins:

Even as to goods produced in New South Wales?

The Hon. E. Barton:

I do not care where the goods are produced, or what the goods are, because railways are commercial concerns, even in the hands of the state. They have certain political factors behind them, but they are to a large extent a commercial concern, and I take it that the carriage of goods, wheresoever they are produced, must still be regulated by this: that, if we lay it down that preference shall not be given to the ports of one state over the ports of another state, say Victoria and New South Wales—to mention no other states—we must, irrespective of the spot of production, be content to submit to a regulation which deprives those states of the opportunity of injuring each other in that way. Let us look at this problem in another sense. Does the whole of this question depend upon Sydney and Melbourne? Does federation depend upon Sydney and Melbourne? Does the commonwealth that is to be depend upon them? The man who thinks that comes to an opinion because he is one of something like half a million of people in a great city who meet each other every day, and, being a large aggregation as they stand together in a small space, think they are the whole colony. But that is not so. When we recollect that neither of these capitals would exist in anything like its power and wealth if it were not for the production of the country—and the primary factor for us to look at is the factor of production—we must acknowledge that it is the producers of the country whose interests are to be consulted in regard to the railways; and I altogether object to the custom which has sprung up of discussing this railway question as affecting purely the interests of Sydney and Melbourne. We have to do with an Australian commonwealth. We have not to do with Sydney particularly, or with Melbourne particularly; and those who will follow me in not aggrandising the interests of Melbourne above the interests of the rest of Victoria, will find me following them in not aggrandising the interests of Sydney above the interests of the rest of New South Wales. That is really the position in which we stand in regard to this question. If that is so, must we not consider that after all the welfare and prosperity of our people and the whole of our people is our first consideration? I am not saying for a moment, as Sir George Turner says, that because Victoria first opened up a particular trade she is entitled to keep it. That is an argument which would not be true, and which would not prevail as between two railway companies. It does not apply as between two railway ownerships, and if it does not, and cannot, prevail between two companies, how much less can it prevail as against a state-owned railway system which represents the producing interests of a territory which is not given over to the federation, but exists still in its entity? That cannot be. We cannot say for a moment that the first man who opens up a trade is entitled to keep it. I hope that the whole temper, the whole spirit of our federation, irrespective of the railways altogether, will be against anything like monopoly. We do not want to give a patent right to Victoria or to New South Wales, because either first opened up a territory. We do not ask for it for New South Wales, if anybody can take it from us by better management. But we say we are entitled to have the results of our railway management, that we are entitled reasonably to cater for the wants of our people. That is all we ask.

Mr. HIGGINS:
But you want to tie our hands!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
We do not ask to tie the hands of Victoria or of anybody else. All we urge is this-and I am not saying this in any combative way at all, much as my tone may seem to indicate it-I am not saying that it is a necessary thing to tie Victoria's hands. I wish to give this principle in the constitution its full operation, and so anxious am I to give it that operation that, unlike some of my lion. friends from New South Wales, I am desirous of seeing this principle of an interstate commission, to do justice between the colonies, implanted in the constitution, and I am sure that if it is so implanted, the constitution will have much greater hope of acceptance by the people of New South Wales outside of Sydney. As I have said, I do not regard Sydney as having the right to control the whole of New South Wales. Although I have almost invariably represented a Sydney constituency, I have never told my constituents such nonsense as that. Inasmuch as we must give to those who live outside our capitals that influence and that justice which is inseparable from their position, and which is something, at any rate, in counteraction of that centralising tendency which is doing, so much harm-inasmuch as we must do this, I take it that our policy, with regard to railway rates, the policy of our constitution, must be to regard, first, the interests of the person who is settled on the soil, if you like—the interests of the person, whether he lives at Sydney, or lives at Hay, or lives at Bourke, who is a citizen of the country. That is our first concern, and if you in Melbourne, or if we, in Sydney, exalt the interests of the citizen in either one of, these capitals above the interests of the other citizens, then I think we are untrue to our trust. Does not that bring us round to this point—that the truth about the railway position is to be found in the interests of the persons who use the railways? Let the citizen live at Dubbo, let him live at Hay, let him live at Tenterfield, or in the country around any one of those three places, we have to regard this question whether he is equally treated with the rest of the country; and the policy which aggrandises the interests of the citizen of Sydney, whether he be a merchant or anybody else, above the interests of the person who lives inland, and which form that person to trade in a certain way whether he will or no—that is a policy which is not consistent with the justice we owe to that great constituency which sent us here, and which is as large as the state represented. Therefore, I take it that in the whole of our dealings with this railway problem—and I want what I say to be more suggestive than combative—in all our dealings with this railway proposal we should consider that we are not dealing with a war of rates between Sydney and Melbourne, that Sydney and Melbourne have no right between themselves to have a war of rates; but that the interest to be consulted is the general interest of the public in each colony. That can only he consulted by preventing rates giving a preference to the ports of one colony over the ports of another, and, with that limitation, the policy of a lower rate for a longer haulage, so far as it is a developmental rate, must be left over, both in New South Wales and Victoria, as well as elsewhere.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I understand that the interstate commission is to have power to say whether a rate is for the purpose of diverting trade from its natural channel!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I am afraid that this question of natural channels is being rather relied on as a shibboleth. I do not exactly know whether a conundrum is being put to me. The inter-state commission will have power to say whether a rate is antagonistic to free-trade between one state and another, and also whether it is a rate which gives a preference to one port over another. If it has that power and exercises it, surely the gain will be large, to both New South Wales and Victoria.
The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
They will sit as a jury!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
They will sit as judge and jury.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Has the hon. and learned member varied the opinion he gave in Adelaide? I cannot exactly follow him!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I think I have said pretty much the same as I said in Adelaide. I was not understood in Adelaide; perhaps I have been more clear to-day.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
-

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I am afraid that there was sometimes in Adelaide a little atmosphere of suspicion which has rather disappeared like the morning mist. That position would give the inter-state commission power to prevent differential rates only when they were preferential, and not when they were absolutely developmental. My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Higgins, in his very well thought out speech, put the question in this way: that we should either let the competitive principle operate fully or not at all. I think that remark was very fascinating as it looked; but it must be accepted with some reservation. As to the competitive principle, let it not operate at all to any extent in which it conflicts with intercolonial free-trade. That is the object of: the power which is given in the constitution to regulate trade and commerce, and of the injunction in the constitution that trade between different parts of the commonwealth shall, after the imposition of a uniform tariff, be absolutely free. We are not dealing here, I hope, with anything which is purely speculative. In America-and I am speaking more of decisions which, preceded the Inter-state Commission than those which have been given since, for the reason that I am speaking about the interpretation of such powers as I have just indicated- I think the indications have been fairly clear. I am not speaking now of decisions under the Interstate Commerce Act, because we shall not have such an act for some time, and even the inter-state commission will not be equivalent to such a drastic act as there is in America; but I venture to think that the American decisions point to this:

Mr. HIGGINS:
Freedom of trade is not affected by preferential or by, differential rates!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Free-trade clearly has not in itself anything to do with differential railway rates, became you can put the competing railway lines in the position of two public companies which compete by cheapening rates against each other. If free-trade is the cheapening of production, and the cheapening of production is the indirect effect of cheaper rates, one may say that differential rates are consonant with free-trade; but they will not be consonant, as they are used now, with intercolonial freetrade. There is nothing against free-trade in differential rates in a colony; but, with preferential rates between two colonies, there may be something which may interfere with a system of free-trade between the two. That is a difference which we can well appreciate, and that is the difference which is fairly brought out by the decisions in the United States, the effect of which is to leave to each state the management of its own internal affairs, even in matters of carriage, except in so far as the exercise of that power would derogate from the free interchange of trade between state and state.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Very much so, and there is great force in what is put forward by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Glynn, that there might not be somebody to raise the question of differential rates. But we find that these questions have arisen, although perhaps not so much as was expected, in America, and I should very much distrust the legal ability of many of my friends here if they could not suggest a way in which, if occasion arose, to raise the question.

An Hon. MEMBER:

I think there have been no differences there, and there ought to be no differences under the constitution so far as it is drawn here. I have to make the qualification which I thought necessary from his remark, and subject to that qualification I quite agree with what the hon. and learned member, Mr. Higgins, said. I believe it would be a righteous thing; I believe it would be a matter also which would conciliate to this measure a great deal of support in every colony if, on the face of the instrument, there were implanted the institution of some tribunal which would substitute a non-political and impartial body for the dealing with the railways and all that kind of trade at the dictation of a minister, which after federation would so destroy all right of free intercourse. If we put a right of that kind in the constitution, we shall go far to satisfy many—I am talking, not of our statesmen or politicians, but of our farmers and producers—who say, "Take over the railways," if in substitution for the unfair management of the railways we give that system of administration and prohibition of injustice which would ensure that their interests would be reasonably dealt with, not in contradistinction from the interests of citizens of large towns, but on an equality of citizenship of town and country.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
Is not the real test that no traffic shall be carried at a loss?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
To a very large extent it is. I fancy in the evidence which he gave in Adelaide Mr. Eddy pointed out that all the rates he was charging to the Riverina district were resulting practically in a profit; but I am not disposed to throw a bombshell amongst hon. members by referring to matters of that sort. It may be that there will be such competition between colony and colony in the way of railways that while rates have been resulting in profits they have been so cut down that the margin of profit is sensibly diminished, and has reached that point at which, in the very interests of the railway themselves, as well as of the producers of the colony, there ought to be a reform.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Give us an independent tribunal with full powers, and the whole thing will be settled!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
An impartial, non-political tribunal.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Would the hon. member allow that tribunal to take the distance to a port as the basis of the charge, no matter whether it went through another colony or not? Suppose it went partly through New South Wales and partly through Victoria, and the total distance was so many miles, would he allow the tribunal to make the rate, as if that distance were all in one territory, on a differential basis?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I think the tribunal ought to be allowed to consider this question: Is the rate which is charged ostensibly on the principle of a low rate for a long haul, merely a cloak to a design to divert traffic from another port? The substantial question of fact is this: Does this thing look merely a differential rate, as it would always be made to look, or is it in effect a preference? If the commission can discover as a matter of evidence, that it is used as a cloak for the diversion of traffic from another port against the provisions of the constitution, it does not matter on what principle it is charged. I think, at any rate on this question, I have sufficiently indicated what seemed to me suggestive matters for the consideration of the Finance Committee, and I do not wish to go beyond that. I come to this conclusion, that the constitution need not, and that it should not, provide compulsorily for the purchase of the railways by the commonwealth; that it is advisable and right to take over the debts without the railways; that the credit of the commonwealth will be clearly strong enough to sustain the operation, because the population of the commonwealth will be its strength; and that intercolonial free-trade can be secured against invasion on the part of railway managers, although the management remains in the hands of those who built them. Before I conclude I should like again to say that the federal spirit of which I spoke in opening my remarks has been still further evidenced in the reception of what I have had to say, and that I find, its we go along, a less degree of suspicion. There are those amongst us in this colony whose consciences are not satisfied unless they term their intercolonial neighbours a band of robbers. They remind one very much of that old sketch by John Leech of the two countrymen, one of whom says to the other, "Who's him, Bill?" "Dunno; a stranger." "Then heave a brick at him." I hope our visitors so far have not had many bricks thrown at them, I hope they will find during the whole of their stay here that the federal spirit exists strongly in New South Wales, notwithstanding the rather bigoted and intolerant views that a few, even of our most respected and esteemed fellow-citizens hold. I would not detract from the ability and character of those gentlemen by one word that I can say, because they are gentlemen for whom I entertain, in some cases, personal affection. But we, in this Convention, can discriminate, at any rate, between argument and invective, and we are not going to answer invective with invective. I hope we are here simply to offer arguments and to meet them. That spirit has been thoroughly shown, and there has been an absence of the former suspicion which seemed to prevail in a certain line of argument about railway matters. The absence of that feeling, I think, betokens that cooperation which will resulting the framing of a workable constitution. Let it not be supposed in anything I have said, that I have come here, as I have been accused of doing, for the purpose of surrendering the interests of the colony in which I was born. I hope that all of us are here for the purpose of securing justice to all. When I said, in a recent speech, that the members of this Convention were all for each, and each for all, I meant that whilst each member was charged with seeing that the interests of his colony were not unduly sacrificed, he did not come here merely as a partisan, but in the prime hope that in whatever action he should take, he would secure as much justice for everybody that surrounded him as he sought for himself. Perhaps, as this clause is part of the whole scheme of finance, it will be a desirable thing to formally move its postponement, and then go on to other clauses of the bill. I should like to take the opinion of hon. members whether it would or would not be a desirable thing to postpone clauses of minor importance, and proceed at once to consider such matters as equal representation in the senate and the relative money powers of the two houses. If that course meets the wishes of hon. members generally, I think it might be desirable. It might be a desirable thing before we part so deal with the most important questions as to show—even if we could not finish our work—that the matters left for solution are minor ones. I should like, in the first instance, to obtain the views of Sir George Turner as to whether it would be an advisable thing not to go through the bill clause by clause; but, inasmuch as we are agreed upon the major portion of the bill, to pick out those questions upon which most serious differences arise and argue them.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[5.26]:

I mentioned when addressing the Chamber this morning that, as a member of the Finance Committee, I should be very glad if some direction could be given to the committee of the desire of the Convention in regard to the manner in which they should frame their proposals, because that would, to a very, great extent, lessen the work we have to do. As it is, we have heard the views of several members, and they are very divergent. We shall have to go through the whole of the proposals and discuss them very fully, and then bring up a scheme which will probably be met by an amendment to refer the whole matter to the federal parliament. Is it fair to the Finance Committee that they are to spend night after night—they will have to sit at night when the Convention is not sitting endeavouring to formulate a scheme, having at the same time in their mind the knowledge that, perhaps a majority of the Convention intend to refer the whole matter to the federal parliament? As far as I am concerned, it will practically take the heart out of me. I will not feel inclined to work the matter out with the same spirit as I would if I felt that whatever scheme was going to be proposed would be discussed upon its merits. I should be very glad if the matter were allowed to remain in abeyance until to-morrow morning, and if hon. members were in the meantime to think it over, and if some hon. gentleman who feels strongly that the whole subject should be left to the judgment of the federal parliament would test the feeling of the Convention in a full meeting. If a majority of the Convention is prepared to declare that at once, well and good—we shall have to abide by that decision. But I feel that it is throwing upon the Finance Committee an immense amount of work, in regard to which, at the time they are doing it, at the time they are endeavouring to reconcile the various proposals and formulate a scheme, they will feel they are perhaps doing an immense amount of labour which in the end will be useless. I suggest that the matter should be allowed to remain in abeyance until to-morrow morning, and that hon. members should think it over in the meantime.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Why not now?
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I have no objection to doing it now; but perhaps it would be better to give the evening to its consideration.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
Why not deal with the minor clauses now as far as equal state representation, and leave that until tomorrow?
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That means sitting later.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
I am not, going to ask hon. members to come here in the night this week; but I shall ask them to sit three nights next week!
The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[4.29]:
The question put by the Premier of Victoria seems to me to be this: that the Finance Committee would like to know whether or not the whole financial scheme is to be referred to the federal parliament. Does not that depend upon how the federal parliament is constituted? It is impossible for hon. members to give a, reply to that question until they know the constitution of the body to which the financial matter is to be intrusted. If the financial problem is to be left to a federal parliament, constituted as it is constituted by the bill before the Convention, I shall vote for that proposal; but if not-if there is an alteration in the Constitution Bill, and that appears to be a matter for further discussion, I shall be against it. If the position is that the Finance Committee wish to know whether or not the whole financial question is to be left to the federal parliament-if they wish that to be decided-we must first of all decide how the federal parliament is to be constituted. That appears to we to be absolutely essential.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
We should have considered that question first, if that be so!
The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
Clearly, if we are in the position now of having to say whether we will or will not remit the whole financial problem to the federal parliament, we must first of all know how that parliament is going to be constituted. That is absolutely essential. On that depends the whole scheme. I apprehend, from the remarks made by the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, on this question—remarks which met with the approbation of almost every member of the Convention that when he suggested leaving the whole question to the federal parliament, he had in his mind's eye such a parliament as is constituted by the bill. If he meant anything else, I, at any rate, was deluded into approbation of his remarks. Everybody I think understood him to any that he was willing to leave the whole question to the federal parliament as we now conceive it would be constituted. That assumption underlay the whole of the right hon. gentlemans remarks, and if he intended anything else I am sure that he would have been frank and honest enough to have said so. That is the assumption upon which his remarks—which were delivered with very great impressiveness and great eloquence—meter with the approbation of hon. members. That being so, I for one would be willing to vote to leave the whole financial problem to the federal parliament. But had we not better state a simple "aye" to that question, right off—as I believe it would be voted? Then we shall know where we are.
Until we know where we are on that essential point, it is impossible for us to say how we will deal with this matter or if we will leave it to the federal parliament.

The CHAIRMAN:
As a matter of order, I would point out that the question before the Committee is clause 88, which must be dealt with—either agreed to, negatived, or postponed.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
I will move that it be postponed!

The CHAIRMAN:
If that clause be postponed we shall go back to clause 1.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
That is the course I wish to take!
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
(Victoria)[4.32]: I desire to point out to the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, that, whilst his proposition is very good to some hon. members, the converse of it is very good to other hon. members. Some hon. members may think it is perfectly fair to say that, if they know what the constitution

[P.219] starts here
of the senate is to be, they are prepared to leave this question to them. Others may say, "If we know that this question is or is not to be left to the senate, then we can decide how the senate is to be constituted." The same difficulty will arise under any circumstances; but I myself have no objection to fall in with my hon. friend's desire. I am perfectly prepared to have the other matter discussed first, and decided one way or the other, if it will obviate the great difficulty I feel the Finance Committee will be in unless they know the mind of the Convention with regard to referring the whole subject to the federal parliament. If it will get rid of the difficulty, I am perfectly prepared to give way to my hon. friend, and, as far as I am concerned, consent to the discussion in regard to the rights of the senate coming on.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[4.33]:

There is another consideration which occurs to me, and that is that the determination by this Committee as to whether this matter shall or shall not be referred to the federal parliament must be governed very largely by the conclusions arrived at by the committee of financial experts. Many schemes have been suggested, and if, on examination by the experts who have been appointed, any one of these schemes is declared to practicable and likely to command universal favour, I suppose that every one of us would be prepared to adopt it rather than to leave the matter in a state of uncertainty. Therefore, although it may seem rather ungracious towards those who have taken a great deal of labour upon themselves - and no one deserves greater recognition for it than the right hon. member, Sir George Turner - and although I also see that the labour may be serious, still I hope that this Committee will ask the right hon. gentleman and those associated with them on the Finance Committee, to take upon themselves the duty of investigating the proposals that have been made, and of reporting to us whether in their opinion any one of those proposals is or is not practicable. If they report that any one of those schemes, or all of them, although practicable in a certain sense, are objectionable for the reason that they might give rise to popular misconception, or for any other reason, we shall know exactly the position we occupy. If, on the other hand, they report that any one scheme is free from objection, let that one be submitted to criticism, and, if the Convention as a whole fall in with that view, there will be no need to put the motion that the matter be referred to the federal parliament.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Two premiers have announced their readiness to refer the question to the federal parliament!

Mr. WISE:
That is their personal opinion.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The suggestion appeared to meet with general approbation!

Mr. WISE:
I did not understand the right hon. the Prime Minister of New South Wales to mean that he would go into the Finance Committee with any fixed determination to refuse to consider any scheme, but that he merely gave his own personal expression of opinion when he said that he thought that no scheme had yet been suggested which was good enough to recommend solidly to the people of Australia for adoption. His opinion may alter. I do not apprehend that the discussion of the matter will take any great length of time or that the Finance Committee need meet very often. It is not requisite for them to go into many details. The broad outline of the scheme is well known.

An Hon. MEMBER:
What is the scheme?

Mr. WISE:
I only know of four schemes that have been proposed. They can be considered in broad outline, and the determination of the Committee given upon each of them. I hope that the suggestion of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner will not be carried out without serious consideration.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[4.37]:
When the Finance Committee were appointed, it was arranged that we should have a general discussion, and I understood the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, to entirely agree with that. There was not the slightest suggestion that we should come to a final conclusion that must bind us, and which would make the appointment of the Finance Committee unnecessary.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
A discussion was asked for, for the guidance of the Finance Committee!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
The Finance Committee themselves desired a general discussion, in order that we should let them know our views generally.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
And that discussion took a turn which showed that the appointment of the Finance Committee was unnecessary!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Until the Prime Minister of Victoria spoke there was, perhaps, a good deal to be said in favour of his present point of view—that the discussion took a turn which might fairly enough have resolved itself into a clause which we might have discussed in a very short time and passed—and I am not at all sure that, in spite of the speech of the Prime Minister of Victoria, his views might not be properly put in identically the same words as would represent the views of the majority of other hon. members who have spoken. Undoubtedly we arranged to have a general discussion, not for the purpose of directing, but for the purpose of assisting the Finance Committee, with a view of allowing them to know the trend of our minds.
Now, the right hon. gentleman, Sir George Turner, asks for a direction—a direction which would make the appointment of the Finance Committee absolutely unnecessary, and which he says very truly would save him a very great deal of trouble, because it would leave him nothing to do.

Mr. WISE:
If we can give a direction we do not want a committee!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
That is what I was endeavouring to avoid expressing in too clear language, but I wished to imply that.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[4.39]:
I said so myself. My feeling is this: If the majority of the representatives here have made up their minds that the proper solution of this difficulty is to refer the whole subject to the federal parliament, as we refer the subject of the tariff, what on earth is the use of the Finance Committee being appointed at all? Let some one take the responsibility of moving such a motion, if the Convention is of that opinion, when we next meet. If it is not of that mind, the Finance Committee can go to work heart and soul and endeavour to bring the best scheme they can devise before the Convention.
This the Convention can tear to pieces or deal with as they think fit. If a majority of hon. members, as the cheering would apparently show to be the case, have made up their minds that the proper course is to leave the whole matter to the federal parliament, I, as one of the Finance Committee, object to its being referred to the committee.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[4.40]:
I would suggest to the Right Hon. Sir George Turner that it may be the opinion of the members of the Convention that, although the matter should be left to the federal parliament, there should be a provision in the constitution guaranteeing a minimum return for a certain number of years, or as one of the right hon. gentleman's colleagues has suggested, for ever.
Suppose that happens to be the view of a considerable portion of the Convention—and certainly I am sure the right hon. gentleman is astute enough to see that it is the view of five-sixths of the members here that a guarantee should be given, for some time at all events—does he think that there is no work for the Finance Committee to do?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
No, I think there will be a great deal for them to do!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I am delighted with the right hon. gentleman's admission.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
It is only during the first five years that there will be trouble. Afterwards there will be no trouble!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
In that case the right hon. gentleman will have something to exercise his pertinacity and perspicacity upon, and in doing so he will have the advantage of our more or less ill-considered opinions. He will be able, by means of his financial knowledge, to reduce our ideas into a form which will be effective to carry out the views which we hold. I think it is not necessary to have any clearer understanding on this subject, and in my opinion we ought now to go on with the bill.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.43]:
I understood the Right Hon. Sir George Turner to wish for a discussion upon the financial clauses of the bill in order that the Finance Committee might ascertain the general views of hon. members of the Convention.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Their general views upon the scheme before us!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I did not understand the right hon. gentleman to mean that the Finance Committee desired anything more than a discussion which would enable them to give their different relative weights to the arguments advanced. I think that what the Convention would like to see the Finance Committee do is to consider the arguments which have been advanced in the debates, without giving undue weight to cheers which may have followed this or that remark; to compare the facts and the reasons, and then to bring up some scheme for the adoption of the Convention. I do not think the right hon. gentleman need trouble himself particularly with the fact that one speaker may have received more applause for his speech than another speaker received. Sometimes we find that very able men have the faculty of putting things in so effective a way that they receive applause for their speeches which reflection does not confirm.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
That is why the hon. gentleman is always cheered!
The Hon. E. Barton:

That may be so, and what I have said may help to clear up any doubt on the subject that may be in the right hon. gentleman's mind. I think it is intended that the Finance Committee should have a free hand in weighing arguments, and certainly there will be no endeavour to force them to estimate the weight of the opinions given in this House by the number of members who give them support. They will estimate the opinions by the reasoning power behind them. After all, the reasons behind the suggestions will be the root of their consideration by the Committee. As my right hon. friend has indicated, I would suggest that we consider between this and tomorrow whether we should go on with the question of equal representation in the Senate, or should first pass the preceding clauses of the bill.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner: I think that we should determine the point now, so that hon. members may be prepared for the discussion tomorrow.

The Hon. E. Barton:

Unless I receive a very strongly supported suggestion to the contrary, it will be my duty to simply submit the clauses in their ordinary sequence. Hon. members may take it for granted, that unless between this and tomorrow I receive such an expression of opinion, I shall ask the Chairman to put the clauses as they follow one another in the bill. I think we might now dispose of this matter by postponing the clause under consideration and reverting to clause 1, when I will move to report progress and go on with the bill in the ordinary way tomorrow.

Clause 88 postponed.
Clause 1 (Short Title).
Progress reported.
Convention adjourned at 4.47 p.m.
Thursday 9 September, 1897

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

NIGHT SITTINGS.

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER (South Australia):

I desire to ask the leader of the Convention a question without notice. He has stated that he proposes to ask the Convention to sit at night on three occasions next week. It would be convenient to some hon. members if an intimation were given by the hon. gentleman as to what, those nights will be.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):

The nights on which I suggest that the Convention should sit are Monday, Wednesday, and Friday.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria):

Might I suggest to the leader of the Convention that he should consider whether it would not be possible to lengthen our day sittings, and not to have resort to night sittings? For instance, we might meet an hour earlier in the morning, and sit an hour later in the afternoon, and if that were not sufficient, we might sit on Saturdays. I must my that, personally, when we had night sittings in Adelaide, I felt it quite impossible to devote that attention which should be given to questions which had arisen, which were in process of settlement, or which were likely to arise. If we have the evenings to ourselves, we shall be better able to prepare for and keep pace with our work. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that we might sit some extra hours each day, and, if necessary, add Saturday to the days of meeting. Of course, it will be for a majority of members of the Convention to decide the matter; but the course which I have suggested in that which I myself should prefer.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):

I would point out to the hon. member that there is some difficulty in, our sitting earlier in the morning on account of the printing required to be done for the Convention. There is quite trouble enough as it is in getting the printing through in time for the use of hon. members. I would remind the hon. member that we: shall have reached the seventh day of our sittings before having a night sitting, and if we begin night sittings next week, we might then, by taking two or three nights, save ourselves arduous labour afterwards. I would suggest to hon. members that it would be better to take... time by the forelock in that way. If the time is not otherwise likely to be saved, that is one means of overtaking it. If, on the other hand, it is likely to be saved, then our labours will be eased finally.

AMENDMENTS.

The Hon. Sir JAMES LEE-STEERE (Western Australia):

I observe that no amendments appear upon the notice-paper. It will be extremely inconvenient if they are not before us when we have to consider them.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

They are all printed upon a separate paper!

The Hon. Sir JAMES LEE-STEERE:

I am referring to amendments of which notice has been given by hon. members since the Convention commenced its sittings.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Any amendments of which hon. members desire to give notice will be printed without their formally giving notice of them!

The Hon. Sir JAMES LEE-STEERE:

Amendments have been handed in but have not been printed!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

If the hon. member refers to the amendments of which notice has been given by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest they have already been printed and will be distributed at once.

MAYOR OF SYDNEY'S LUNCHEON.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria):

I desire to ask the leader of the Convention what is proposed to be done to-day with regard to the Mayor of Sydney's luncheon? I understand that it takes place at half-past 1 o'clock.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It appears upon the programme in the hands of hon. members as fixed for that hour, but I have been informed by telephone that the hour is 1 o'clock.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

What I was about to suggest is that there is no necessity for the whole of the Convention to adjourn for a considerable time for the purpose of attending this, luncheon. We might easily select from each delegation one or two hon. members to represent us. I propose, as far as Victoria is concerned, to ask our President and Speaker to be present. If we all attend the luncheon we know it will be very late in the afternoon before we are able to get away, and when we return here, judging, from our past experience of functions of the kind, we shall not feel inclined to settle down to work in the way in which we generally do.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I intend to be here again at 2.30. It amounts to half an hour's extension of the usual adjournment.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I feel certain that we shall not be able to get away by that hour.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I shall take care to do so. Perhaps the President will intimate that he will take the chair at, 2.30 o'clock, and that intimation I take it will be the magnet which will draw us. I myself will undertake to be here ready, to go on with business at the hour I have named.

The PRESIDENT:
The intimation will require to be given by the Chairman of Committees. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen will give effect to the wishes of the Convention in the matter.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia):
I would suggest to the Right Hon. the Premier of Victoria that it would be hardly courteous, to the Mayor of Sydney if, after the whole of the Convention have accepted his invitation, am I presume they have, and preparation has been made to entertain the whole of the Convention, we send only a delegation from each colony. If by attending the luncheon for a short time we can be courteous, and at the same time not delay business, I would suggest to the right hon. gentleman that that would be the more appropriate course to take.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
In Committee (consideration resumed from 8th September, vide page 222):
Clause 1. This act may be cited as the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales:
Omit "commonwealth," line 2, insert "dominion," and substitute "dominion" for "commonwealth" whenever occurring in subsequent parts of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN:
I take it that this will be a test vote as to whether the word "commonwealth" or the word "dominion" shall be used, so as to decide it one way or the other, and it will not be necessary to put the same amendment again to the Committee.
Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[10.41]:

I do not rise for the purpose of supporting the substitution of the word "dominion" for the word "commonwealth," but I rise for the purpose of reiterating what I was enabled to say at the Adelaide session that it appears to me that the word "commonwealth" might very well be omitted altogether. I do not wish to argue the view which I then submitted, and which would more properly be given effect to in clause 3. I would not have directed attention to it now except for the intimation which you were good enough to make that this would be taken as a test vote as to whether the word "commonwealth" should be retained. In clause 1 it is simply the title of the act. There will have to be an Imperial act passed, and so far as I am concerned I have no objection to keep the title which is there given to it. But in clause 3 it says, "The colonies shall be united in a federal constitution under the name of the Commonwealth of Australia." I still adhere to the view which I expressed in Adelaide, that it ought to be under the name of "Australia." Australia would be a dominion and a commonwealth whatever the name. "Commonwealth" expresses the well-being of the entire community, or the body politic. But the name of our country ought, I venture to submit, be simply "Australia."

Mr. HIGGINS:

You want some common noun?

Mr. SYMON:

The proper noun is Australia, just as United States of America is the name of that great country. We do not want to import into it the name "commonwealth." Commonwealth designates the political condition, that is all. I do not propose to argue it, but when we come to clause 3, I shall move the omission of the words "the commonwealth of" with the view of leaving the name of the country to which we ought to be proud to belong, as simply "Australia." I think we should be proud to give it that name without any other prefix, or other noun or word of any description, but simply the plain name "Australia." I do not propose to support the amendment which has been submitted.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales)[10.44]:

When the proper time comes, I propose to move that the word "Australia" be omitted with a view of inserting the word "Australasia," because in future we hope to have New Zealand, Fiji, and British New Guinea under the same dominion.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.45]:

This amendment, which was made by the Legislative Council of New South Wales, was moved with a view of testing whether the title of the new confederation should be "dominion" or "commonwealth." I opposed this amendment, but I moved a prior amendment on which this was an amendment, that the short title of the act be the "Australian Commonwealth Constitution Act." I think it ought to be called the "Australian Commonwealth Constitution Act," and not the "Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia," because there is more than the constitution here. There is an Imperial act which we suggest should be passed.

Mr. SYMON:
And there is a commercial bargain!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The act is more than a constitution, taking it as a whole. Clause 8 says
"the constitution shall be as follows," It clearly defines that what is prior to clause 8 is not in the constitution.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
There would be a double interpretation!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Yes. If the amendment is negatived we might call it "The Australian Commonwealth Constitution Act."

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales)[10.46]:
I am not opposed to the introduction of the word "dominion" into this clause; but I am perfectly satisfied that if we are to discuss every trifling amendment we shall never get through with the bill. I do not think it is necessary to discuss this amendment. The Adelaide Convention, by a majority, having come to a determination, is it likely that they will go back upon that at the suggestion of our Legislative Council, which has done everything it possibly could to destroy the bill?

Amendment negatived.

Amendment (Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:
That the words "the Constitution, of the Commonwealth of Australia" be omitted, with a view of inserting the following words:-"the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2. This act shall bind the Crown, and its provisions referring to er her Majesty the Queen shall extend to her heirs and successors in the sovereignty of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[10.48]:
I should like to call attention to these words, "This act shall bind the Crown." We know we have to send this bill to the Imperial Parliament to be passed. I cannot see why these words should be inserted. Of course the act will not bind the Crown unless the Crown is mentioned. But throughout the whole of the bill the Crown will be mentioned, and therefore the Crown will be bound. Sir Samuel Griffith has drawn attention to this matter. He says:

This section begins with the words "This act shall bind the Crown"-an expression which is at least unusual in statutes, and which is surely unnecessary. How can it be suggested that an act in which the Crown is continually mentioned, and which establishes a new dominion under the Crown, does not bind the Crown?

I fully concur with these remarks. I certainly would urge upon the hon. gentleman that he should omit these words.

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR (New South Wales)[10.49]:

The hon. member will admit that it should be put beyond question that every portion of this act binds the Crown. It is true there are a number of sections which expressly bind the Crown, but this provision is inserted in order that it should be put beyond all doubt that every portion of the constitution binds the Crown. Although the form of expression is unusual, it has this to recommend it, it is very concise and carries out exactly our meaning. I see no reason for omitting the words.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[10.50]:

I would ask the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, whether he thinks that these words are sufficiently specific to negative the prerogative of the Crown? The intention undoubtedly is to prevent the possibility of our taking away the right of appeal to the Privy Council. In Canada the words used were, "Such judgment shall not be susceptible to appeal," but they were held to be insufficient. Lord Cairns, in a case in 1876 on which this question turned up, stated that the words must be definite and precise, that they must amount to a direct negation of the prerogative before they can take away the prerogative. The principal object of these words is to take away the royal prerogative so that subsequent portions of the bill may be effective. The Canadian act which was passed in consequence of that decision begins with the words, "Notwithstanding any royal prerogative." What I would suggest with deference to the judgment of others is that we ought in this section to distinctly negative the prerogative, because it will then operate right through the act. I think we should begin the clause with the words, "Notwithstanding any royal prerogative this act shall bind the Crown."

An Hon. MEMBER:

Will not those words be too strong?
Mr. GLYNN:
The fact that Sir Samuel Griffith did not understand the meaning of the words proves that they cannot be strong. He, as a distinguished lawyer, must be admitted to know that the prerogative must be taken away by express words, or it will still remain.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
He thought that they were not necessary. That was his objection!

Mr. GLYNN:
He did not see the object for which they were inserted.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
He did not see the necessity!

Mr. GLYNN:
If the object had been accomplished he would have seen that at once. As the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, has pointed-out, the act does bind the Crown. In clause 1 of the constitution the Crown is distinctly stated to be part of the commonwealth, and a section in an act of Parliament must bind the Crown, because the Crown in one of the consenting parties to the legislation. I would call attention to the fact that the prerogative ought to be distinctly negatived in the act.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN(Victoria)[10.52]:
Here we are at the very outset engaged in a discussion on a question of drafting-on the choice of an expression-

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I take it that the point mind is distinctly a question of the selection of one phrase or another to accomplish the same thing.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I take it that the hon. and learned member, Mr. Glynn, is in accord with the hon. members who have drafted the bill as to its being made effective. I would ask the hon. and learned member in charge of the bill whether it would not be advisable at the outset to make an arrangement as regards the meaning of expressions in the bill that questions, of that kind shall be allowed to stand over until the close of our proceedings, when the assistance of all legal members, or any of those who have questions of interpretation to bring forward, may be invited to go through the measure, if necessary, once more on the question of drafting, and drafting alone? It is most undesirable that these questions should be launched here without notice at every stage when we are discussing the question of the ascertainment of the purposes we wish to effect. If the legal members of the Convention and other members can agree to reserve all such questions till the close of our proceedings, till we have settled what it is we desire to do, and then discuss means of doing it, or the form of the clauses in which those purposes should be embodied, it appears to me that we might save much time.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.54]:

My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Deakin, has anticipated me, because I was intending to make that very suggestion to the Committee. I am very glad he has made the suggestion, and I thank him for doing so. What I would like to do, if there is time for it, is to leave aside questions of mere drafting until we have gone through all the clauses, and that the Drafting Committee should have a day, possibly two days, in which to go through the bill with a view to make any desirable alterations in drafting in the light of amendments which may have been made by hon. members, and that then the bill should be formally recommitted for the purpose of enabling hon. members to judge of that work.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I would suggest that the Drafting Committee should have the advantage of the suggestions, and that any hon. member who has any suggestions to make should forward them to the Drafting Committee-I think the drafting of this clause is wrong, and ought to be altered-and let the Drafting Committee, exercise its own discretion in regard to alterations.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I quite agree with my right hon. friend. I shall be very glad if my legal friends who notice any fault in the drafting, or think that an improvement can be made, will make a suggestion to the Drafting Committee, if possible in writing, and certainly there will not be any disposition to take high ground, in matters of that sort. Now, with reference to this particular matter, we have considered it well, and we think that a wider form of words, could not be selected, and that their very width gives them strength in an act.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[10.56]:

I certainly do not quite approve of the suggestion thrown out by the right hon. member, Sir George Turner, as to sending in memoranda with regard to matters of drafting. That would be an exceedingly invidious thing to do, and really I do not think we are here for the purpose of verbal criticism. It would take up a great deal of our time. You would never know what was going to happen, and if a member dissented from the Drafting Committee we might have a debate hereafter upon it. A much better way will be for us to suggest amendments. That is all I understood my right hon. friend intended to do. I did not understand that he was going be move any amendment. He merely called attention to this language. My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Glynn, also called attention to the fact that the prerogative was not properly negatived. The particular instance he referred to, namely, the abolition of the right of appeal to the Privy Council, is expressly provided for by a clear and definite negation, which he says is necessary in order to negative the prerogative of the Crown. He must have overlooked the language used in clause 75 which Sir Samuel Griffith, in his criticism, thought was too direct in fact direct to the point of discourtesy, if I may say so. I am sure there was no intention of that kind on the part of any one. I believe that if my hon. and learned friend had remembered that clause we should not have had this discussion.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of her Majesty's most honorable Privy Council, to declare by proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being later than six months after the passing of this act, the people of [here name the colonies which have adopted the constitution] (hereinafter severally included in the expression" the said colonies") shall be united in a federal constitution under the name of "The Commonwealth of Australia"; and on and after that day the commonwealth shall be established under that name.

The CHAIRMAN:

There is an amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales to omit the word "federal" in line 10.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)[10.58]:

I have a prior amendment to move, sir. I wish to call the attention of the Committee to the limitation of six months in the clause. It provides for a proclamation to be made, and fixes a date for not less than six months after the passing of the act, at which the commonwealth is to be established. That is a very important date, because on that date the control of the departments and the obligations of different states in federal matters pass to the commonwealth. The land and buildings vest in the commonwealth at that date, and provision has to be made for the, election of senators, and probably some provision will have to be made in the different states for the election of representatives. It appears to me that we ought to be very careful that sufficient time is allowed for all that to be done before the date fixed in the proclamation is arranged. I would suggest that six months is rather a short time for all that to be done in. A number of these matters have to be arranged between the federal authority and the different states, and the necessary legislation cannot always be brought on simultaneously in all the states. I would suggest that the word "eight" should be substituted for the word "six." It is only a maximum limit, and the date fixed might be much earlier. It would be a very serious thing to limit the time in such a way as to make it impossible for the work necessary to be done to be carried out.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
Take a year!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Perhaps it will be safer to take a year. I move:
That the words "six months," line 5, be omitted with the view to the insertion in their place of the words "one year."
Amendment agreed to.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales to omit "Federal," line 10, negatived.

Amendment (by Mr. SYMON) negatived.

That the words "the commonwealth of," line 11, be omitted.
Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4. Unless it is otherwise expressed or implied, this act shall commence and have effect on and from the day so appointed in the Queen's proclamation; and the name "The Commonwealth of Australia" or "The Commonwealth" shall be taken to mean the Commonwealth of Australia as constituted under this act.

The CHAIRMAN:
There are several amendments s
Omit "Unless it is otherwise expressed or implied," lines 1 and 2, insert
"the provisions of," and insert after "act," line 2, "relating to the constitution of the commonwealth."

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
These amendments are of a drafting character, and are not important!

The CHAIRMAN:
I understood it was agreed that all the amendments suggested by all the parliaments should be put before the Committee whether important or unimportant. I am under an obligation to put them before the Committee.
The suggestion of the legislature of Tasmania is to omit certain words, as stated, and to insert others. It has been suggested by the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of New South Wales to omit, in addition, the words "in this act." I shall divide the amendment into two, and submit that of the Tasmanian legislature first. If that is carried, I shall put the question, "That the words this act stand part of the clause." That will enable every member of the Committee to give a vote for either of the amendments.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[11.5]:

Before that amendment is put I desire to call attention to a matter of machinery—it is by no means a matter of drafting—affecting the mode in which the commonwealth is to be brought into existence. With regard to the question of drafting I desire to say, as I said in Adelaide, that I have always found a word in the ear of the Drafting Committee is ample to insure that they will listen to any suggestions which may be made. I think that if any member desires any alteration in drafting, the best thing to do is to speak to a member of the Drafting Committee about it. There is a difficulty in connection with the machinery of the clause about which I do not see my way clear. The act is to come into force on the day appointed by the proclamation. The first step, when the act is in force, is to appoint a governor-general who is to issue writs for the election of members of the lower house. There can be no parliament until the writ is issued, and there can be no ministry until there is a parliament. The position is this: That you cannot have your ministry to advise the governor-general until there is a parliament, and you cannot have a parliament until there is a governor-general. That means that the governor-general is to act on his own responsibility, and is to have no recognised official advisers in bringing into play the provisions of the act. What I want to understand is what provision has been made for the purpose of giving the governor-general advice in regard to the question of appointing the times for holding the first and every session of parliament, and of giving him advice as to what returning officers are to be appointed. Of course, the returning officer will make his returns to the governor-general; but who is to be entrusted with the duty of announcing the returns of the election There will, of course, be no funds in the commonwealth at that stage; but I apprehend that the governor-general will act in the hope of being recouped any expenses afterwards to which he may be put. My difficulty is this: is the governor-general in the issue of the writs to returning officers under clause 41, to act on his own responsibility, and is he, in appointing a time for the holding of the first session of parliament, to act also upon his own initiative and responsibility? I think hon. members will see that this is not a question of drafting; but one of practical machinery.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):[11.8]

I think the objection of my hon. friend is met in this way. Of course, it is true that there may be a possibility of the governor-general being, for a time, without advisers, but Chapter II, relating to the executive, deals with this matter. The last paragraph of clause 63 states:

After the first general election no minister of state shall hold office for a longer period than three calendar months unless he shall be or become a member of one of the houses of the parliament.

It is clearly to be gathered from this that there will have to be, before the first general election, ministers of state who will be responsible ministers. It is quite obvious that the governor-general will not set to work upon any important executive act without sending for some person to form a ministry. That gentleman will have to be the adviser of the governor-general, and the Ministry will take the steps for the holding of the first general election, and for taking over the control of the departments which, under the constitution, are to be taken over at once. Upon the control of these departments being assumed, revenue will become available for the federal treasury. Therefore, all the acts, apart from legislation, which are necessary before the election of the first parliament, will be done with the necessary provisions and sinews of war.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The governor-general is to appoint his own officers!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

He must send for his first ministry. There is no one to advise him whom he must send for; therefore he must use his own discretion. For this time he will have unassisted discretion. If his succeeding advisers tender him any advice as to the appointment of their successors when they go out, he can act upon it. As it is, he has sometimes to act without advice, and he will have to take that by no means uncommon step in the first instance by sending for some gentleman to form a ministry. With reference to the amendment put from the Chair, I should advise the Committee to accept it - I refer to the amendment by the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales. The same amendment has been made by the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of Tasmania, and it has been put from the Chair in the form adopted by the Tasmanian legislature. The intention of it is this: As things stand now, the act would not have force, possibly, until the day appointed by the proclamation. That is really the day on which the constitution should have force. The act has force as an Imperial act immediately it receives the royal assent.

Suggested amendment (omitting "unless it is otherwise expressed or implied") agreed to.

Amendment (suggested by the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly (if New South Wales, omit "this act," line 2) proposed.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[11.12]:

I should like to hear what the leader of the Convention has to say about this. The words suggested for insertion-"relating to the constitution of the commonwealth"-seen rather wide. If the provisions of this act "relating to the constitution of the commonwealth" are to come into operation on the day appointed in the proclamation, can it be said that the preceding provisions of the act are not "relating to the constitution of the commonwealth," and do not suggest the same difficulty as we are in at present? Because clause 3-the clause which gives power to her Majesty to issue the proclamation-is certainly, in one sense at all events, a clause "relating to the constitution of the commonwealth." "Relating" is a large expression. The Canadian act is very distinct. If my memory serves me rightly, it says, "unless otherwise expressed or implied by the subsequent provisions of this act." But if you insert the words suggested by the Tasmanian and New South Wales Parliaments-"relating to the constitution of the commonwealth"-it seems to me that we shall be almost, if not altogether, in the same difficulty as we are at present.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

You may get over the difficulty by heading the first chapter "introductory"!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Or alter the other suggested amendment so as to make it read "the constitution of the commonwealth shall commence and have effect from so and so!"

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment (suggested by the Legislative Council and Assembly of Tasmania)-Insert after the word "implied," line 2, "The provision of this act relating to the constitution of the commonwealth) proposed.

Amendment(Hon. E. BARTON) agreed to:

That the suggested amendment be amended by omitting the words "The provisions of this act relating to."

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and Assembly of Tasmania:

To add to the clause: "But the parliaments of the several colonies may at any time after the passing of this act make any such laws, to come into operation on the day so appointed, as they might have made if the constitution had been established at the passing of this act."
The Hon. E. BARTON:
I should like to have some explanation of this amendment, and, perhaps, some hon. member representing Tasmania will explain it!
The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH (Tasmania)[11.15]:
I supposed that the leader of the Convention had made himself acquainted with the purpose of this amendment. I can only give it as I read it in Hansard. The amendment was proposed by the Attorney-General of Tasmania, and was evidently made on the suggestion of Sir Samuel Griffith for the purpose of giving the Convention an opportunity of considering the suggestion which Sir Samuel Griffith had made. The Attorney-General said:
In that very clause Sir Samuel Griffith seemed to imply that this bill was going to give the parliaments of the states power to pass laws with regard to the constitution of the commonwealth. Section 29 said "until the parliament otherwise provides the electoral divisions of the several states for the purpose of returning members of the house of representatives, and the number of members to be chosen for each electoral division, shall be determined from time to time by the parliaments of the several states. Until such division each state shall be one electorate." At the present time he was not prepared to accept that view; but possibly after further consideration he might agree with Sir Samuel. There was power now under clause 29 for dividing into as many electorates as they liked; but if they did not so divide, each state was the electorate. . . . . Queensland was not represented in the Convention, and was not likely to be, and that being so, it would be a graceful act on the, part of the Tasmanian House of Assembly, or any other house of parliament, to enable Sir Samuel Griffith's suggestions to be laid before the Convention, even though Sir Samuel was not a delegate.
That seemed to be the reason why the Attorney-General of Tasmania suggested this amendment-in order that Sir Samuel Griffith's views might have some consideration at the Convention.
The Hon. N.E. LEWIS (Tasmania)[11.17]:
I desire to add, to what has fallen from my hon. colleague in the representation of Tasmania, that in clause 9 the two houses of parliament of Tasmania have suggested that the senate should be composed of six senators for each state, to be chosen by the people of the state "in such manner as the parliament of each state shall determine." If that suggestion is to be carried out, it will be necessary for the various, parliaments to pass enactments and make their own provisions for electing the first senate. It is with that view that this amendment has been suggested. Of course a parliament would have no power to legislate in this direction unless there was some provision of this sort under which it could work before the day named in the proclamation as that upon which the constitution is to take effect.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales)[11.18]:

I take it that the meaning of the amendment is that as the constitution is to come into force at a later date, and inasmuch as the power of the states to legislate on these particular subjects is one which is only embodied in the constitutional part of the act, so those powers of the state only come into force at that time. The result would be, therefore, it is suggested, that unless a provision of this kind is made in the interim that would pass before the proclamation took effect, a state would, not be able to pass such legislation as was necessary to provide for the representation of the state. I think there in something in that suggestion. I do not see what harm the suggested amendment could do, and I think it may do good. The argument is that the power, although given in the constitution, will not be an effective power until the constitution itself takes effect, and you want to fill up the gap.

Amendment agreed to; clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5. The term "the states" shall be taken to mean such of the colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, and Western-Australia, and the province of South Australia, as for the, time-being form part of the commonwealth, and such colonies or states as may hereafter be admitted into or established by the commonwealth, and each of such parts of the commonwealth shall be hereafter designated a "state."

Amendment suggested by Legislative Council of New

Add at end of chase "Original states shall be taken to mean such states as form part of the commonwealth at the date of its establishment. New states shall be taken to mean such states as may thereafter be admitted into or constituted by the commonwealth."

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales)[11.21]:

This amendment has been suggested for the purpose of distinguishing in the interpretation of subsequent clauses between the original states of the commonwealth and those which join it afterwards. Any question of the different treatment of original and new states will arise upon clause 114, so that it need not trouble us now. The amendment in one which I myself suggested in the Legislative Council.

An Hon. MEMBER:
What is the object of it?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
To enable a distinction to be made, in the subsequent parts of the bill between the original states of the union and states which join afterwards. If the Convention decides to adhere to the work done in Adelaide, that the ordinary provisions of the constitution shall apply to the states originally federating, and that new states are to be admitted upon such terms as may be agreed upon between them and the commonwealth, the amendment will enable a distinction to be drawn between the two classes of states.

An Hon. MEMBER:
What about the word "dominion"?

The CHAIRMAN:
I take it that it is the desire of the Convention that the word "commonwealth," and not the word "dominion," shall be used to describe the union, and therefore I intend to alter any amendment in which the word "dominion" occurs.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[11.23]:
I am sorry to say that I am quite unable to follow the explanation of the hon. member, Mr. Barton, as to the necessity for introducing this discriminating definition into clause 5. I have just looked at the provisions of clause 114, which define the powers of the federal parliament to admit new states into the union from time to time. After the admission of a fresh territory, or a non-concurring state into the union, there would be no reason why it should continue to be described as a new state in contradistinction to an original state. They will be all states of the union, both those that come in originally, and those which join afterwards. I am therefore unable to see why it should be necessary to discriminate in this way between new states and original states.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[11.24]:
I am sorry that I did not make my explanation as full as I should have made it. I omitted to refer to the bearing of the amendment upon clause 9. It has been pointed out that there is an apparent conflict between clause 114 and clause 9 in this way: that whereas under clause 114 power is given to the commonwealth parliament to make terms with a state wishing to join the union, clause 9 appears to be constructed in favour of equal representation in all cases. I have in my hand an amendment which I propose to move in clause 9, in order that this inconsistency may be removed, and then clauses 9 and 114 will make the necessity for the amendment now before the Committee plain.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[11.25]:

I think we all agree that the federation would be incomplete unless it embraced the whole of Australia; that without Queensland the federation would be maimed. Do we not, therefore, desire to give every inducement to Queensland to join us? But if Queensland is for all time to be designated a new state, that is, an inferior state, in name at least, will not that be a bar rather than an inducement to her joining?

An Hon. MEMBER:

If she comes in now she will get better terms!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

Suppose she cannot come in just at once; but wants to come in as soon afterwards as possible? If the amendment is carried, and she comes in a month after the federation is formed, she will, for all time, be placed in the category of new states, and will, therefore, be on an inferior footing in regard to the original states.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The term "new state" will never have to be used after the admission of a state!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

But it will stand in the constitution for all time. For all time Queensland can be referred to as a new state.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

So she is now. We are all new states!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

I think the amendment is a mistake.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Suppose Queensland divided into three before she enters the federation?

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

Well, I fear that if we make the distinction in name, we shall be removing one of the inducements to Queensland to join the federation. Queensland should be admitted upon an equal footing in substance and in name with the other states.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[11.27]:

I think that the hon. member, Dr. Cockburn, is labouring under a misapprehension. The only object of the proposed amendment is to define the terms used in the bill. The position very properly taken in Adelaide was that the colonies that joined the union at the beginning, and shared all the dangers and difficulties of federation from the outset, should be entitled as a right to equality of consideration, and that other states which did not come in then should run the risk of being admitted on such terms as the commonwealth might thereafter think right and fit. The expression "new states," in clause 114, requires some definition, and it is thought right to give it that necessary definition, and in contradistinction to define the term "original states." If the hon. member, Dr. Cockburn, will read clause 5, he will see that:

The term "the states" shall be taken to mean such of the colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the province of South Australia, as for the time-being form part of the commonwealth.

Each part of the commonwealth, once it is admitted into the commonwealth, becomes a state. It will not have the prefix "original" or the prefix "new." The term "original state" and the term "new state" is each a term requiring interpretation. The words "original" or "new" can form no part of the designation of a state once it becomes part of the commonwealth.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[11.28]:

I have not been convinced by the explanation of the hon. member, Mr. Barton. I agree with the hon. member, Dr. Cockburn, that the proposed addition is altogether unnecessary. The plan adopted in the bill is that the colonies of Australia, as they exist at the present time, may come into the federation now or at any time hereafter. To say to a colony which by force of circumstances is unable to come in at the present time, "If you do not come in now, the terms upon which you shall enter shall be the subject of future consideration," seems to me to be more likely to keep that colony from federating than to attract it into the federation. I do not suppose anyone desires to visit any penalty upon Queensland for not joining us. The public men of Queensland, and, perhaps, the people of Queensland, are probably just as anxious to be federated as we are; but, through the force of circumstances which cannot always be controlled, they have not been able, up to the present time, to come into the Convention. To inflict penalties upon states now existing, should they subsequently desire to join the federation, seems to me to be ungenerous.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Read clause 114?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I know all about clause 114. The new states referred to in this bill are those that are to be formed out of existing states. The states mentioned in the bill are the existing colonies of Australia and Tasmania, and the new states are those which hereafter may be formed by a subdivision of any colony. Those are the new states referred to in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891. I can see no object in the amendment of Mr. Barton, unless it be to erect some barrier against a state, which by force of circumstances may not be able to join immediately, from hereafter becoming part of the commonwealth. That is not the spirit in which we should deal with this matter. We should, on the other hand, act generously, if we are desirous of forming a red federation. A real federation of Australia cannot be complete unless all the colonies of Australia form part of it. If that is our desire, we cannot act too generously with those colonies who by force of circumstances may be unable to join at the beginning.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[11.32]:

I would suggest to the leader of the Convention that the proposed addition is not required, and may well be omitted, and for this reason: I understand that where an interpretation of a term is useful you are going to use that term. It avoids setting it out at length afterwards. That what is proposed is this: to give an interpretation to the term "original state." Now where in the whole bill do we find the term "original state"?

Mr. SYMON:

Or "new state" either!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The amendment I intend to move in clause 9 will make the use of the term "original state" necessary!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

I am inclined to think it will be emphasising a distinction which is altogether unnecessary. We have already, within the four corners of the bill, declared what are to be new states, and there is no necessity for the introduction of the amendment now proposed for the purpose of further emphasising the distinction. Without this amendment the bill will be perfectly clear, and I am sure there will be a general desire to avoid the introduction of any unnecessary distinction of the kind. I should like also to point out to the leader of the Convention that if he intends to press the amendment, it would be better to use the word, "established" by the commonwealth, instead of "constituted," because that word is used in the earlier part of the clause.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[11.34]:

It will be more satisfactory to hon. members if I indicate the amendment I intend to move in clause 9. Then it will be apparent that, if that amendment is one that commands itself to hon. members, it will be necessary to make the slight amendment I propose in clause 5. I propose to alter clause 9, so that it will have the same effect, except that it will not conflict with the power given in clause 114 to regulate the admission of new states. It will read in this way, down to the last paragraph:

The senate shall be composed of senators for each state, directly chosen by the people of the state as one electorate, and each senator shall have one vote. Until the parliament otherwise provides, there shall be six senators for each original state. The parliament may, from time to time, increase or diminish the number of senators for each original state, but so that equal representation of the several original states shall be maintained (and that no original state shall have less than six senators). The senators shall be chosen for a term of six years, and the names of the senators chosen by each state shall be certified by the governor to the governor-general.

The object of that amendment is to make it quite clear that the principle of equal representation shall be conserved to the states which originally join, and that the parliament may have the power, by way of arrangement or statute, of dealing with the terms on which any new state is to be admitted. As a matter of drafting, therefore, the amendment I have now proposed in clause 5 became necessary in order that the term "original states," used so often in clause 9, might be understood at once, and that clause 9, when amended, taken together with clause 114, might be free of any conflict with that clause. As things stand now, there is a conflict between clause 9 and clause 114, and it was the expressed and determined intention, as I understand, of the Convention in Adelaide to keep its hands upon the power of regulating the representation of new states. Let me divest the minds of my hon. friends of any suspicion that I would for a moment attempt to place any slur upon Queensland or to invest Queensland with a designation which might in any way diminish its dignity. That is not the purpose of this amend... amendment in clause 9, then, unless I have this amendment defining original states, I shall have to use a long form of words in various places throughout clause 9 that would make the drafting cumbrous. The object is not to draw an invidious distinction between states, but to allow the bill to be more readily understood.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid (New South Wales) [11.41]:

I think the hon. member, Mr. Barton, is going slightly away from the subject of clause 5, which is simply a definition clause. Even if new territories are admitted as states into the commonwealth, with a less representation in the senate than have the other states, it is still necessary that they should come under the general definition of "states" throughout the whole of the bill. The definition of "state" would be necessary even for a state which, in the senate, does not return as many members as do the other states.

An Hon. Member:

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

That being the case, why should we attempt to legislate for that particular matter under the general definition clause at the beginning of the bill? It often happens that where an interpretation is only necessary for a limited purpose, it is put into the forefront of the act, and is limited to the part of the act where the definition is necessary. I confess I lay great stress upon the observations of the right hon. member, Sir John Forrest. We surely do not mean to ask Queensland to come into this federation as a new state. It is certainly a mere matter of words; but those words sometimes carry great weight, and, inasmuch as the definition clause does not refer to three states of Queensland, but to only one, it is impossible that the question about the division of Queensland into three states can affect the matter. This clause simply provides that the term "the states" shall be taken to mean such of the colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland-

It does not refer to the division of Queensland into three states-

Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the province of South Australia, as for the time-being form part of the commonwealth, and such colonies or states as may hereafter be admitted into or established by the commonwealth.

That definition will be necessary for the new as well as for the old states. It is a general definition.
An Hon. MEMBER:

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

The stipulation that in the case of certain new states there shall be certain variations is a thing for express legislation and not for a definition clause of this kind, and I would strongly counsel my friend, Mr. Barton, not to raise the difficulty in this clause. We must have regard to the fact that whatever may have been the conduct of the Government of Queensland the people of Queensland are absolutely blameless. They are at present impotent to do anything they may wish to do. For aught we know the people of Queensland may be absolutely desirous of joining a federation, but they are paralysed by the action of the Government and Parliament of Queensland. Let us suppose for a moment that the people of Queensland, having a better means of expressing their opinion than they at present have, wish immediately to join this union. Is it necessary to brand Queensland for all time to come as being a new state?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

That would not be the case. Directly she was admitted she would be a state!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Clearly a state which is admitted after the passing of this act becomes a new state, or what do these words mean:

"Original states " shall be taken to mean such states as form part of the dominion at the date of its establishment. "New states" shall be taken to mean such states as may thereafter be admitted into or constituted by the dominion.

The case I am putting is the case of Queensland seeking to be admitted after the union has been formed. We should certainly then be putting upon Queensland for all time the brand of a new state, because that definition means that any state which comes in after the union is formed shall be taken to be a "new state." Now, why should we press in a definition clause a little point of this kind which may irritate an adjoining colony? What is the difficulty about leaving the clause as it is? It is this: that it is quite possible that this bill, as finally settled, will limit the number of senators in some particular cases-certainly not the case of Queensland if she comes in as she is. The term of a limited number of senators as distinguished from the existing colonies cannot mean Queensland, it must mean some other territory or part of an existing state coming from where I do not know.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Perhaps Fiji!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Fiji or New Guinea, or, perhaps, some subdivision of an existing colony. It cannot affect a colony which remains as it is without subdivision. I strongly advise that this clause should not be cumbered by a provision which might be brought more immediately to the point of application in another part of the bill.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[11.47]:

I am obliged to my hon. friend, Mr. Barton, for his explanation, which is sufficient to induce the withdrawal of my opposition to the amendment he proposes. I think we ought all to do what we can to support the leader of the Convention.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

This is not the drafting of the leader of the Convention. It is a suggestion from a branch of the legislature!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The amendment was made on my motion!

[387] starts here

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

So far as I have been able to gather it appears to meet with the concurrence of the members of the Drafting Committee, and under these circumstances I shall vote for it. The objection I took was that we did not require a definition of original states, because the term was not employed in the constitution; but, as the hon. member, Mr. Barton, has pointed out that he intends to introduce the term to emphasise the distinction, which, no doubt, we intend to make as regards the states which join at the outset and those which afterwards come in in the terms of this bill, I withdraw my opposition.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

We have already affirmed that principle in clause 114!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

After the explanation of the leader of the Convention, I shall be happy to vote for the amendment. It is suggested that we shall be branding new states for all time as new states; but we do not do anything of the sort. We merely make that distinction at the time of the bargain. When the states have been admitted they are states, and will come within the meaning of the first part of the clause, which declares that the term "the states" shall be taken to mean such of the colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the province of South Australia, as for the time being, form part of the commonwealth, and such colonies or states as may hereafter be admitted into or established by the commonwealth.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
It cannot be one of those!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
It will, undoubtedly, when it is admitted. It will be included in the general definition of states; but at the period of bargaining it is not one of the original parts of the federation, but is regarded as a new state, and must be so regarded. When it is once admitted the distinction disappears, the whole of the states being treated alike.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria)[11.50]:
I think we are very much in the position of drawing up a deed of partnership for states which it is contemplated will come in at the inception of the commonwealth. Unless we have an amendment such as is suggested we shall bind the original partners to take in new partners at any time without having fixed the terms of the partnership.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It does not propose to do anything; it is only a definition!

Mr. TRENWITH:
It is a definition having reference to another clause. Seeing that certain colonies are expected to enter into partnership on conditions that they understand, we have a right to leave them as free as possible when they choose to extend that partnership by taking in new partners.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
IS that the federal spirit?

Mr. TRENWITH:
It is the federal spirit most assuredly. Anyone would object strongly to take in new partners on terms which he had no hand in framing. Whoever chooses to come in twenty or one hundred years hence under the Commonwealth Bill as it leaves our hands should surely be bound to come in under terms agreed upon by the original partners.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Mr. TRENWITH:
I would be just as reluctant to compel colonies to come in under conditions of which they disapprove as I would be to compel a number of other colonies to admit new partners without giving them any choice as to terms.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[11.52]:
I rise to order. I think we are discussing the merits of clause 114, whereas the only question before us is the interpretation clause. We shall have an opportunity of discussing the important question raised by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest in clause 114. This is not the time to discuss whether the federal parliament is to have power to arrange the terms for the admission of new states.

The CHAIRMAN:
I think the point raised by the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, must be sustained. I did not stop the discussion, because it was impossible to separate the necessity for the interpretation clause-

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[11.54]:
Will you, sir, allow me to make a few remarks before you give a final decision on the point? The whole question of clause 114 is involved in this one. It is not simply an interpretation-

The CHAIRMAN:
Clause 114 is absolutely necessary to give any effect to the interpretation. It is the operative clause.

Mr. SYMON:
Would you allow me to point out that the amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales which we are now discussing, is unnecessary if, in clause 114, we allow the principle of equal representation in the senate to apply to the new, as well as to the old, states?

The CHAIRMAN:

Mr. SYMON:
I am perfectly aware that we cannot decide now as to clause 114; but the better way would be to postpone this amendment until clause 114 is dealt with. As to the interpretation, I am at one with the Premier of New South Wales.

The CHAIRMAN:
The hon. member cannot discuss the main question in discussing the point of order.

Mr. SYMON:
I desire to facilitate the proceedings, and I think that would be done if the hon. member would postpone this amendment until we deal with clause 114!
The CHAIRMAN:
On the point of order, I declare that the definition clause has no effect at all until the subsequent clause affected by it is dealt with. It is not now in order to discuss the main question.

Mr. TRENWITH [11.57]:
Having regard to the ruling of the Chairman, I shall not pursue my argument further than to say that it is well to remember that this definition will cover the possibilities of the future. I can see no objection to the term which is proposed. I think it will have some historic value, and will enable people to discover at a glance the states that took part in the federation at its inception and the states that subsequently joined the federation. There will be no stigma attached to the states which did not take part in the commonwealth at the first.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It is rather strange that the United States have managed to do without such a definition although they have admitted so many new states!

Mr. TRENWITH:
That may be the case; but if it appears to us that it would be better to rise such a definition it is no reason that we should not do so simply because the United States have not done so. Western Australia came into this Convention somewhat later than the others, but they do not occupy any less dignified a position in this Convention on that account.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[11.59]:
I intend to ask leave to withdraw my amendment in order to enable an hon. member to move a prior amendment. I would first say that if clause 5 is the right place to define the term "The states" it is evidently the right place to define "original states." I for one will not be a party to scattering interpretations all over the act. On the other hand, inasmuch as the term "new states" might be considered by some hypercriticism out of doors as a slur on Queensland, it would, perhaps, be better not to use that term, although I do not think such an inference could be drawn by any reasonable interpretation. I withdraw the amendment now to allow of a prior amendment, and I intend to move my amendment later on only as a definition of the original states. Instead of saying that "original states" shall mean so and so-which might be taken exception to-I will bring it into conformity with the rest of the amendment by saying that "the term original states" shall be taken to mean so and so, and leave out the last part of the amendment so that the susceptibility of no one in Queensland, or other places, may be offended by the use of the term. The definition of "original states" will then suit my purpose. I ask leave to withdraw the amendment so as to admit of the insertion of a prior amendment.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[12.1]

was understood to ask the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, whether it would be better to leave this matter until a decision was arrived at in regard to the amendment he proposed to move in clause 9, and then, if that alteration were made, on recommittal we might make the necessary alteration in clause 5.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Perhaps it will be better to postpone the whole of this clause!

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia)[12.2]

A misunderstanding may arise in the future as to the position of the Northern Territory, and its relation to South Australia, it being under its charter provisionally annexed to South Australia by the Queen-in-Council. I wish to indicate that in the consideration of this clause I will move to insert after the words "South Australia" the words "including the Northern Territory of South Australia," so that there can be no misunderstanding as to that territory forming part of the province of South Australia.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[12.3]:

I am glad that my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Barton, is taking the course he is taking, because we will avoid the difficulty which I refer to; for clearly under clause 114 as it stands there is a distinction between admitting existing colonies and establishing new states. If that amendment had been carried we would have had to establish Queensland as a new state instead of admitting it as an existing colony.

Amendment postponed; clause postponed.

Clause 6 (Repeal of 48 and 49 Victoria, Chapter 60) agreed to.

Clause 7. The constitution established by this act, and all laws made by the parliament of the commonwealth in pursuance of the powers conferred by the constitution, and all treaties made by the commonwealth, shall, according to their tenour, be binding on the courts, judges, and people, of every state, and of every part of the commonwealth, any. thing in the laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding; and the laws and treaties of the commonwealth shall be in force on board of all British ships whose last port of clearance or whose port of destination is in the commonwealth.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales:
Omit "and all treaties made by the commonwealth," lines 4 and 5.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[12.4]:

I think it is expected by the Legislative Council of New South Wales that I should explain what the meaning of this amendment is. In the first place, the desire of that body is that, inasmuch as the treaty-making power will be in the Imperial Government, we should omit any reference to the making of treaties by the commonwealth; in other words, while they concede that we should make certain trade arrangements, which would have force enough if ratified by the Imperial Government, the sole treaty-making power is in the Crown of the United Kingdom.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Clause 52 refers to treaties!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
And, in conformity with the amendment they suggest in this clause, they desire that the words "and treaties" should disappear from clause 52. There is a good deal of force in the contention, I think. I do not think the constitution will be in any way minimised or weakened by the omission of the words. As regards the remainder of their amendments, they propose to confine the clause to laws, and not to treaties, and to make its latter part read in this way:

And the laws of the commonwealth shall be in force on board of all British ships, excepting her Majesty's ships and vessels of war, whose first port of clearance and whose port of destination are in the commonwealth.

The gentleman who moved that amendment was not a member of the Convention. He contended that there might be an embarrassment to ships' captains with regard to conflict of laws in their application outside the territorial limits, and that it was better to confine the application of commonwealth laws not merely to coasting vessels, but to ships bound on intercolonial journeys—that is, to ships starting a voyage from a port in the commonwealth. In other words, he seemed to fear the application of the Imperial shipping laws, and also the commonwealth shipping laws, or, until the commonwealth legislated on the subject, the laws within the territorial limits of the various provinces, to ships such as the mail steamers passing on their journey from port to port here. He desired to remove the conflict which he thought might thus arise by this amendment. I think in his desire to substitute the word "and" for the word "or" he was carrying out what seems to be the view of a great many of us, and what some of the other legislatures have carried out. To that extent I take it this series of amendments will be acceptable to the Convention, and I think perhaps the omission of the reference to treaties might be well assented to by us; but as to the rest of course it is a matter of judgment as to the application of these laws, and I admit the difficulty of the question.

Mr. HIGGINS:
What is the first port of clearance in the case of ocean tramps?
The Hon. E. BARTON:
I suppose that will be one of the class of vessels which will be excluded?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[12.5]:
If my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Barton, does not move formally this amendment, I will move it.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The amendment has been proposed.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I strongly support the amendment for the reasons which my hon. and learned friend has hinted at. This is an expression which would be more in place in the United States Constitution, where treaties are dealt with by the President and the senate, than in the constitution of a colony within the empire. The treaties made by her Majesty are not binding as laws on the people of the United Kingdom, and there is no penalty for disobeying them. Legislation is sometimes passed to give effect to treaties, but the treaties themselves are not laws, and indeed nations sometimes find them inconvenient, as they neglect them very seriously without involving any important legal consequences. The expression, I think, ought to be omitted. I will deal with the other suggested amendments when the time comes.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia:
Omit "and" where it first occurs in line 10 insert "in addition to the laws of Great Britain."

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[12.8]:
Before that suggestion is considered, I should like to give effect to the suggestion which the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, referred to. I move:
That the clause be amended by the omission of all the words after the word "notwithstanding."

The Hon. E. BARTON:
That will be going too far, perhaps!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I am going to give the reasons which I think make it wise we should take this course. There was a great deal of difficulty at the Convention in Adelaide, certainly in the Constitutional Committee, to understand the reason why such wide words were inserted in the draft constitution. Under the words "whose last port of clearance is the commonwealth," our laws would follow a vessel from here to England, because her last port of clearance would be Sydney to England. Or under the words "whose port of destination is in the commonwealth," a vessel sailing from Hamburg to Sydney would be covered by our commonwealth laws, which would be a preposterous pretension.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
As to British ships!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
As to British ships, we are in a still more serious difficulty, and I suggest the omission of these words, because otherwise we will get into infinitely more difficulty with the Imperial Parliament.

An Hon. MEMBER:
They are the same words as those in the Federal Council Act!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I think not; but whether they are or are not, that will not affect the facts to which I am referring. There is a well-known Imperial statute known as the Merchant Shipping Law. The provisions of that act cover all British ships wherever they are, and we cannot, in the commonwealth, override Imperial statutes.

An Hon. MEMBER:
This will be an Imperial statute!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
My hon. friend is a little previous in saying that. It never will be an Imperial statute with those words in it. They would certainly have to be expunged before it became an Imperial statute.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
What about the Federal Council Act?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I am sorry I should excite so much impetuosity, I do not care a pin about the Federal Council Act, because no one ever heard of it, and no one ever will hear of it. I am referring to an act which has a much livelier signification—the Merchant Shipping Law of Great Britain—which contains matters dealing with all British ships, wherever they are, subject to the right of her Majesty's self-governing colonies, to pass a law with reference to shipping which comes exclusively within their jurisdiction. Under that provision of the Imperial law we have in our several colonies passed local navigation acts. We have one in this colony, which refers to shipping over which we have jurisdiction. There will be no difficulty in the commonwealth exercising similar powers without the special power of the constitution, because it is provided in clause 52 that this is a subject on which the commonwealth shall legislate; so that, without the words to which I have referred, the commonwealth can legislate on the regulation of navigation up to its jurisdiction.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
Within its territorial limits!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Exactly; and we have no power of legislating beyond.

An Hon. MEMBER:
A similar bill to this has been made an Imperial act—the Federal Council Act!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
May I tell hon. members that I do not speak idly in the remarks I am making. I hope hon. members will give me credit for making these observations, knowing what I mean. I tell the Committee that these words will be a source of embarrassment in the consideration of the bill, that they conflict with the laws of the British Empire, and seek to establish a jurisdiction which we shall not get, a jurisdiction beyond our limits.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
We have got it already in regard to beche-de-mer fishing, for instance!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I do not know whether beche-de-mer fishing comes within the limit of the general navigation law. It may be so. I have nothing more to say, except that I speak advisedly.

Mr. CLARKE:
Has the right hon. gentleman been talking with "Joe"?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
My hon. friend is entirely wrong; but I have taken advantage of my visit to the mother country to get all the information I can with reference to matters of this kind, and I shall tell the Committee advisedly that difficulty may arise if these words are left in the clause.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Why not insert a proviso to the effect that the latter portion of the clause shall prevail where it does not conflict with the English law?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
The hon. gentleman must see that in matters of shipping there is great jealousy as to jurisdiction, and if laws are uncertain, the position of trade and commerce is put into a most undesirable state. One of the secrets of the success of the British mercantile marine is the fact that it is governed by one code of laws all over the oceans of the world, and that the different colonies cannot pass laws affecting British ships, excepting within the limits of their jurisdiction. I warn the Convention against anything of that kind.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[12.17]:

I do not quite agree with the right hon. gentleman in his refusal to ignore an Imperial statute which exists at the present time. The right hon. gentleman not only ignores the Federal Council Act, but he ignores the Imperial Parliament which constituted it. Seeing that the Imperial Parliament, acting under the advice of the Board of Trade, inserted a clause which is identical both in words and substance with the clause now proposed, I do not think any conflict can possibly arise, but some conflict may be prevented by following the lines which the Imperial Parliament not only suggested but persisted in. The drafters of the Federal Council Act, now in force, never drew any clause like this—never hoped for any extension of their authority like this. It was forced upon them by the liberality of the Board of Trade and the Imperial Parliament, and we accepted it, as we naturally would accept all good things. Now, it is proposed to say, that because we have a certain power, and seek to preserve it—a power which the Imperial Parliament insisted upon giving us—we should put an obstacle in the way of the Imperial Parliament passing the bill which we are considering. I should imagine, if there is any consistency in the Imperial Parliament, they would rather treat with respect our observance of their legislation than complain that we were endeavouring to arrogate to ourselves authority for which we never asked, and which they insisted in bestowing upon us.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

There is nothing in it!

Mr. SYMON:

Does anybody defend the retention of these words?

The Hon. S. FRASER:

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

If this were a new matter, and I had to consider what I would ask the Imperial Parliament to do, I do not think I should ask them to do this; but if the Imperial Parliament insisted on giving me this, I should accept it with all due thanks, and not complain. If there is any difficulty in the matter, the Imperial Parliament can alter it.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

That would mean delay!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I do not think it would. It is not a cardinal alteration of the bill, and we can scarcely imagine that, when we send the bill to the Imperial Parliament, they will necessarily accept it without altering anything. I think we might very well leave the words as they stand, seeing that they are not our idea, but something insisted upon by the body to which we are now appealing.

The Hon. H. Dobson (Tasmania): When at Adelaide I pointed out the same objection, but not with equal force, as the Premier of New South Wales has pointed out. The leader of the Convention, however, replied that identical clause was granted by the Imperial Parliament in connection with the Federal Council Act. Sir John Downer has rightly reminded the Convention that not only does this identical clause find a place in the Federal Council Act, but it was suggested by the Chamber of Commerce of Great Britain, and was agreed to by the Imperial Parliament and our right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, now points out that he has been gaining information at home.

Mr. Symon: That the Board of Trade originally suggested the insertion of these words!

The Hon. H. Dobson: I have heard that statement made two or three times, and, therefore, I accept it as a fact. I do not know of my own knowledge that it is a fact, but I have heard it stated by so many eminent men, that I accept it as such.

Mr. Symon: Where is it shown that the Board of Trade suggests it?

The Hon. H. Dobson: The Imperial Parliament has passed the provision, and the right hon. the Prime Minister of this colony will find that this clause is identical with it except that it does not contain the words "excepting her Majesty's ships and vessels of war," which, I think, ought to contain, and I find that a subsequent amendment suggests that her Majesty's ships of war should be excepted.

The Hon. E. Barton: All acts of the council, on being assented to in manner hereinafter provided, shall have the force of law in all her Majesty's possessions in

The Hon. I. A. Isaacs: What is the statement?

Mr. Symon: That the Board of Trade originally suggested the insertion of these words!
Australasia in respect to which this act is in operation, or in the several colonies to which they shall extend, as the case may be, and on board all British ships, other than her Majesty's ships of war, whose last port of clearance or port of destination is in any such possession or colony.

Those are the identical words in the Federal Council Act to which the Imperial Parliament has agreed; and it appears to me that the clause in our own bill can be made absolutely correct and consistent if you insert in the bill a section similar to that which is in the Federal Council Act next but one after the section which I have just read, namely, the section which provides:

If in any case the provisions of any act of the council should be repugnant to or inconsistent with the law of any colony affected thereby, the former shall prevail, and the latter shall, so far as such repugnancy or inconsistency extends, have no operation.

Then, it appears to me that the legal objection to this clause will at once pass away if you simply add a line saying that any laws which the federal parliament may pass, and which are to be in force upon British ships, other than her Majesty's ships of war, shall not prevail against the Imperial law wherever they are inconsistent with or repugnant to it. If you put that provision in, the whole thing will be plain. What reason is there why we should hold on to this power to legislate for British ships? I went to a concert last night, and I understood from one of the songs, which was admirably sung, that Australia is to become "the queen of the southern world," or something to that effect. If Australia is to become "the queen of the southern world," or a great power in the southern seas, we shall be establishing pearl and other fisheries, we shall have guano islands, and enormous interests springing up in the South Pacific. If the Imperial Parliament have generously given us authority to legislate for British ships which may affect our trade—if the Imperial Parliament have given that large power to a small and, what some hon. members might call, an impotent body like the Federal Council—by all means let us allow a body like the commonwealth to retain the same power.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)[12.23]:

I do not see any reason for retaining these words, although they have been allowed to pass in the Federal Council Act. Perhaps they were suggested without a full appreciation of their meaning, or the mood of the Imperial Crown law officers may have changed.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The Federal Council Act took an enlarged form on the advice of the Imperial officers. They may have changed their mind since!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Undoubtedly that is so; but we ought to be careful to frame the bill in such away that there shall be no alteration of it of any kind. This constitution, after being passed by the Convention elected by the whole of the colonies, has to pass under the review of the whole of the Australian parliaments, and then be agreed to by the Imperial Parliament. It is intended to be final, and that it shall come back to us, if possible, from the Imperial Parliament exactly as it leaves these colonies. Therefore it seems to me that a proposal of this kind Should be dealt with on its merits, and if there is any reason to warrant us in rejecting the proposal we ought to reject it. I do not think the Premier of New South Wales has sufficiently considered the reason of this matter, if I may judge from the observations he has made, Hon. members know that the laws of a colony apply only within the 3-mile limit, and that any intercolonial vessel leaving, say, Sydney, and going to Melbourne, so long as she is within the 3-mile limit is under the laws of the colony to which she belongs, or of the particular colony in whose waters she happens to be; but directly she goes outside that limit she gets into British territory, and not only the shipping laws but also the criminal laws of England, as distinct from any criminal law in any part of Australia, are in force on board that ship. I take it that the provision already inserted will need some amendment which will make it clear that it is not intended to apply to a ship which leaves, say, Albany, as its last port of clearance, and is going to London or some port in the east, but is intended to apply to ships only so long as they are voyaging in the waters of the commonwealth.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Not merely in the waters of the commonwealth, but also between different ports of the commonwealth.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Yes. That could be done by the suggested amendment, which I assume is meant to carry out that view. There is very great reason for urging that under such circumstances the laws of the commonwealth should apply to ships voyaging from one port of the commonwealth to another.

Mr. SYMON:

Would it not be so without these words?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

No, it would not.

Mr. SYMON:

For what reason?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Because supposing that the commonwealth exercises its powers to make uniform laws in regard to the shipping of the commonwealth, those laws can be applied only within the 3-mile limit, and directly a ship gets outside the 3-mile limit it is outside the territory in respect to which those laws apply. The laws of the commonwealth with regard to shipping can only have operation within the 3-mile limit around the coasts of the commonwealth, and when ships pass beyond that limit they are under British law. It is very desirable that the laws of the commonwealth, so long as they do not conflict with the Merchant Shipping Act, or other British laws, should apply to vessels that are passing from one port of the commonwealth to another. I may give as an illustration the criminal law. That is the most obvious one that can occur to anybody. Surely, considering the immense trade that exists now between the different ports of these colonies, and the variety and extent of that trade, and the way it is likely to increase, it is desirable that there should be a uniform law, and that the law which is to be administered within the commonwealth itself should apply on board these ships. This provision means that all these ships, when outside the 3-mile limit, instead of being as now in British territory, would be in commonwealth territory.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

The hon. gentleman could not have understood what I was pointing out. I propose that this provision should apply to ships only while voyaging from one port of the commonwealth to another. Its only object would be that in so far as ships under those circumstances were concerned, the territory outside the 3-mile limit would be turned from British territory into commonwealth territory. There are, of course, other laws besides the criminal laws. I understand that some colonies have already passed laws in regard to pearl fishing, and they may make laws in regard to beche-de-mer fishing, or if we develop our fisheries, as I hope they will be developed, we may have a fleet of many hundreds of vessels belonging to the commonwealth outside the 3-mile limit. It seems to me very desirable that the laws of the commonwealth should prevail in regard to all these matters. I agree with the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, that there should be one law for the whole of the shipping of the empire, and I should be willing to agree to any amendment which would make it perfectly clear that the clause would not in any way conflict with the Merchant Shipping Law of Great Britain, which is in force on all British ships. But I do not think that any such provision would be necessary, because if hon. members will look at the wording of the clause they will see that it says "the laws of the commonwealth shall be in force." The laws of the commonwealth, under clause 52 of the draft constitution, can relate only to matters under the jurisdiction of the commonwealth. The commonwealth will have no authority to make laws in the domain affected by the British Merchant Shipping Acts which have been referred to.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The navigation acts!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

The navigation acts of course apply only to territorial limits. It may be a mere matter of drafting; but I am perfectly willing to consent to any amendment which will make it clear that this provision which turns a ship passing from one colony to another into commonwealth territory should not be contrary to the Imperial Merchant Shipping Acts.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[12.32]:

I think we should do well to retain these words, though in a somewhat altered form. Substantially the provision is almost, though not quite, the same as the provision in the Federal Council Act. There is, however, an important exception in that act which we ought in faithfulness to insert here.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

The hon. member should not forget the limited range of subjects dealt with by that act. Shipping is not mentioned there!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

That is a matter of degree; it is not a matter of principle.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

It is a most important matter in this connection!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

If we are to have power to make laws as a commonwealth, it is highly important that those laws shall be properly carried out within the commonwealth and upon all ships, which, although they go beyond the 3-mile limit, are to all intents and purposes part and parcel of the commonwealth. The exception to which I wish to refer is an exception in regard to her Majesty's ships of war. I think it is quite clear that we could not fairly ask the Imperial Parliament to say that our laws should apply to her Majesty's ships of war, which are really Imperial territory. Therefore I suggest that words should be inserted in the clause, as in the Federal Council Act, by way of exception. When we consider the immense coastline which we have-some 8,000 miles-and the possibility of having within the jurisdiction of the commonwealth at some future date—not a very distant one. I hope such places as the New Hebrides, it is highly important for the carrying out of the laws of the commonwealth that we should not permit ships which are really part of our regular shipping trade to sail beyond the 3 miles limit, and then be free from the commonwealth laws. Such ships are to all intents and purposes part and parcel of the commonwealth, and these words are necessary, though in a slightly altered form, to effectuate our desire. When we were discussing this matter in Adelaide, I was very much puzzled, as to a certain extent I am now, as to the real meaning of these words:

Whose last port of clearance, or whose destination in the commonwealth.

Clearly those words are too wide.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Should not the word "and" be substituted for "or"?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I made that suggestion in Adelaide, and it has been followed in several of the legislatures. It takes away much of the absurdity of the clause as it stands, and I think would fairly meet the difficulty. I believe that if we substitute the word "and" for the word "or," strike out the word "treaties," and insert with the exception of her Majesty's ships of war," we shall have done all that is fair and right, and I believe that the Imperial Government will then agree to the clause.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[12.35]:

I have not the Federal Council Bill before me; but I believe that that bill contained the words "sailing between the ports of the colonies." The bill was sent home with those words in it; but her Majesty's advisers at home deliberately changed the wording of the measure so as to give the Council wider jurisdiction. There was a limitation in the bill which does not appear in the act, and the Imperial authorities must have made this alteration for some specific purpose. They could not have accidentally inserted the words "port of clearance, or." There is no danger of conflict between the laws of the commonwealth and the Imperial law. The moment a new act is passed in England which conflicts with any legislation passed by the commonwealth, that act will to the extent of the difference abrogate the legislation under the constitution of Australia. At the present time there is never any conflict. Our Marine Board and navigation acts are not in conflict with the English merchant shipping acts; but they give us jurisdiction, not to the 3 miles limit, but within Australian waters, as specifically defined in these acts, that is, between port and port. Without these acts we should not have this jurisdiction. As I understand the law, it was decided in the case of the Franconia that, the 3-mile limit only applied in connection with intercolonial disputes, that limit being arrived at in the first instance because it was then the range of a cannon shot; and that civil and criminal jurisdiction stopped at low-water mark. Originally there was no jurisdiction beyond the limits of mean low-water mark; but that jurisdiction has been extended by legislation, and the Imperial authorities deliberately changed words in the Federal Council Bill which would place a limitation upon the existing jurisdiction as defined by our local acts, so as to amplify it, and make it apply to any vessel leaving our ports for foreign parts, or coming from foreign parts to the colonies. They did this deliberately, and in view of the fact that there was no possibility of conflicting decisions being arrived at under the proposed constitution, we have no criminal jurisdiction at all, so that if a crime is committed on board a ship coming to Australia, the criminal will be tried according to the laws of Great Britain.

The Hon. E. Barton:

We cannot give a sanction to a law without imposing some penalty or punishment!

Mr. Glynn:

The hon. and learned gentleman is quite right; but we have only power to impose such penalties as will operate as sanctions for the civil legislation under clause 52.

The Hon. E. Barton:

We cannot establish a new criminal offence!

Mr. Glynn:

No, unless it is part of a sanction to enforce the obligation of a civil law. So that if an offence is committed on board a ship coming to the commonwealth it will have to be dealt with according to the law of England, not according to the law of the commonwealth. Seeing that the English authorities deliberately changed the wording of the Federal Council Bill, although there is no possibility of the legislation of the colonies clashing with Imperial legislation, because English legislation must abrogate colonial legislation to the extent of the difference between them, I think we should accept the words used by the Imperial advisers of her Majesty.

Mr. Symon (South Australia)[12.39]:

I shall be found supporting the amendment moved by the Right Hon. G.H. Reid. I am not greatly influenced by the argument as to Australia being at some future time the queen of the southern seas, or by the fact that in the Federal Council Act these words, or some of them, were introduced.
To begin with, we evidently do not intend to regard that as a particularly binding precedent; for my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, proposes to do some violence to the wording used by the Imperial authorities by substituting the word "and" for the word "or." So that, after all, we are not to accept the Federal Council provision as literally correct, and I think it is a very strong indication that the Imperial authorities either did not know very well what they were doing, or that, on further reflection, we here think there is a better way. At any rate, that shows very conclusively that the provision introduced into the Federal Council Act could not have been put there with any careful premeditation or thought, and I thoroughly agree with my hon. friend that the language, as it, exists in the clause we are now considering, and as it exists in the Federal Council Act, is, to use the phraseology of Mr. Reid at the Adelaide Convention, sheer nonsense. In addition to that, we are all agreed that the words "and treaties" have to be eliminated. We have just amended the clause by striking out, the reference to all. treaties made by the Commonwealth. Therefore, it is clear that the language, as it appears here, and as we are now considering it, does not give effect to what we believe to be the jurisdiction of the commonwealth and the scope of the commonwealth legislation. I think there is a good deal of misapprehension as to the merchant od, is applicable to all British ships, including colonial ships. Every Australian vessel is a British ship within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, and I do not believe that any person, whether a simple citizen or one interested in shipping, would be prepared to abrogate the Imperial merchant shipping laws one iota, at any rate, without very careful consideration. These colonies have the power, subject to the Merchant Shipping Act, of passing what are called navigation acts—we call them in our colony marine board and navigation acts—but that is entirely subsidiary to the Merchant Shipping Act, and everything that takes place, every offence that is committed on board a British ship, the engagement of every seaman, the punishment of every offence, comes under the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act, subject only to details of administration, and to the summary jurisdiction of particular courts as provided for by the Merchant Shipping Act for particular purposes in view.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

There are some sections of the Merchant Shipping Act sections 54 and 94—which do not apply to the colonies, unless the colonies adopt them!

Mr. SYMON:

Just so; as there are also certain provisions in other Imperial statutes which are not applicable, for instance, to Ireland; and there are provisions which may be excepted as regards Scotland. It is exactly the same here. Therefore, the point taken by Mr. O'Connor loses its force. The Merchant Shipping Act is the Imperial legislation dealing with shipping, and nothing we can do by general words of this character can have the effect of repealing the Merchant Shipping Act in relation to all British ships.

Mr. GLYNN:
When we legislate under this constitution it will!

Mr. SYMON:
I do not think so. The limitation of our legislation under the commonwealth is contained in clause 52, and a few minutes ago the President of the Convention indicated what I think is really in the minds of many hon. members, namely, that what is required is something to define territorial waters. It is a very important matter, undoubtedly, as Mr. O'Connor, pointed out, that we should have full control over our fisheries, that we should be able to establish and regulate pearl fisheries, and various other pursuits of that kind beyond our 3-mile territorial limit. But we have that power expressly given to us under clause 52, sub-section 12, in reference, for instance, to fisheries-and I am not dealing now with anything else, but simply taking that by way of illustration. The words in that sub-section are "Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits." There you have it. If the Imperial Parliament passed the Commonwealth Bill containing that provision we should have express power to deal with fisheries beyond territorial limits. That deals with the whole subject. With regard to criminal law, as my hon. friend, Mr. Glynn, pointed out, the criminal law of England is applicable on board every British ship, and you cannot take that away, nor is it intended that it should be taken away or lessened in any manner whatever by this constitution. Therefore, there is nothing to be gained by leaving these words, or any part of them, in the bill. The precedent of the Federal Council Act fails in the particulars to which I have referred, It cannot possibly extend the operation of our laws generally one atom further than the constitutional law will permit.

The Hon. N.J. BROWN:

Mr. SYMON:
Not under this. My hon. friend will find that under the Federal Council Act there is express provision for the passing of laws dealing with fisheries. But that is legislation specially directed to a particular purpose, and so far as this act specially confers power to deal with a particular subject, the laws passed under that power will be enforceable. But a general expression of this kind amounts to nothing. It is nonsense as it stands. We have to alter it; and, therefore, to suggest that we should have some special regard to the insertion of it by somebody in England who perhaps did not thoroughly appreciate what the position was is to ask us to assent to something of which our better judgment does not approve.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[12.47]:

The difficulty to be obviated is one which must arise very frequently. Imagine the commonwealth to have legislated on the subject of navigation and shipping. Without some provision of this sort-I do not say exactly like this—the captain of a vessel sailing between two ports in the commonwealth will be under the law of the commonwealth when he is within the 3-mile limit, and will be under the Imperial shipping law when he is outside that limit. The difficulty will be great enough in the case of a captain of a steam vessel. His vessel may be within a certain distance of the shore in calm weather, and if it comes on to blow, and he has to take an offing, he will be under a different law. But in the case of a sailing vessel proceeding under a head wind, she will be alternately inside and outside the 3-mile limit, and the unfortunate captain will be embarrassed by being under one law when inside the 3-mile limit, and under another law when outside the 3-mile limit, and he will not know when he has passed that mark.

Mr. SYMON:

But that exists now!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

There is no reason why there should not be some improvement. I am not particular about the retention of these words. I do not think any very serious injury would be done by the omission of the whole of these words. On the other hand, I think it would be preferable that we should limit them in the direction of the amendment I indicated some little time ago, which I think would so restrict the matter that there could be no objection on the part of the Colonial Office, while, on the other hand, any shipping which is ours, or ought to be under our jurisdiction, would be fully protected. That, I think, is the point we ought to aim at, and I would suggest, therefore, that we should alter the word "or" to "and," as my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, suggests, and strike out the words "and treaties." I would also suggest that it would cause no harm to accept the suggestion of one of the houses of legislature to adopt the words "whose first port of clearance and whose port of destination are in the commonwealth." That has been designed to provide for any difficulty that might arise with regard to vessels which commence their journey in the way the mail steamers do coming out here, and which might have the additional obligation of laws imposed upon them, causing some conflict and embarrassment if the clause were left in its original wide terms.

An Hon. MEMBER:

-

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It might go a little further than that. But still I think that, having got that, we shall have that which should suffice for all ordinary cases; and I think we might rest content with it, because I am quite with those who say that the less opportunity we give for amendment in these covering provisions the better. We do not expect that the Imperial legislature will amend the provisions which are in the constitution itself, although they are an endeavour to extend our autonomy; but these covering clauses are suggestions to the Imperial legislature, and it would be absurd to expect that, as regards these clauses, the Imperial legislature will not make such amendments as they please. In that respect, we are not only powerless, but we freely admit that we must not attempt to dictate—that this portion is merely in the form of suggestions to the Imperial legislature, to be dealt with as it pleases. A matter of this kind is practically so unimportant that I do not care very much what the result of this debate is, except that I think the preferable course is that in which I think I have the concurrence of a majority of the Convention.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It will be necessary to introduce words excepting her Majesty's ships!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I am quite prepared to insert words excepting her Majesty's ships.

[The Chairman left the chair at 12.55 p.m. The Committee resumed at 2.35 p.m.]

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[2.35]:

I do not think we should act upon the assumption of the Imperial Parliament having made a mistake in this matter. I think the best course for us to take would be to put this clause into similar words to those in the Federal Council Act, as passed by the Imperial Parliament. I would point out to the leader of the Convention that I do not think the amendment proposed would altogether meet some of the cases. Suppose you strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and" in the thirteenth line, and suppose that a ship leaves any part of the commonwealth for Queensland—which does not happen to be a part of the commonwealth—or that she starts for Fiji, or New Zealand, or any other place in the vicinity of Australia, possibly for another part of the continent; immediately the ship is 3 miles away from her port of departure she would cease to be under the commonwealth laws. I think that a ship sailing from Sydney to Brisbane, although Brisbane would not be in the federation, should properly be under Australian laws. In fact I do not see that a great deal of harm would be done if ships sailing from England to Australia were brought under Australian laws. It is not for us to say that they ought not to be, because ships sailing from England for Australia carry on board of them Australians and they are laden with the property of Australians.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Not solely!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

But chiefly. I do not think any harm could be done if those ships were entirely under Australian laws, although we know that that would not be the case. But I do think that ships trading in the Southern Ocean in the immediate vicinity of Australia to ports not in the commonwealth, although close to it, and under precisely similar conditions to those obtaining in other parts of Australia-being possibly a part of Australia itself-should be brought under the commonwealth laws. In any case, I think the Imperial authorities had some such thought as that in their minds when they framed the Federal Council Act, and I think we had better word this clause similarly. Let us adapt it to our requirements, and put it on all-fours with the clause to which I refer, excepting, of course, British ships of war, the inclusion of which cannot have been contemplated by the Imperial act constituting the Federal Council, and which certainly ought not to be included here. It is not for us to assume that the Imperial Government or Parliament do not know what they are about, and it certainly is not for us to limit the operation of the commonwealth laws in the immediate vicinity of the commonwealth.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[2.38]:

I am sure that our desire is to secure two objects-first, to obtain as large powers in managing our own affairs as may be conveniently conferred; and, secondly, to avoid the introduction into this bill of any provision which would necessitate its amendment before it received the assent of the Imperial Parliament. Under these circum-

An Hon. MEMBER:
What are they?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

Does the hon. member know? I do not know at the present moment, but we must have a definition, because on page 13 we use the expression "Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits." I do not think you can, at the present moment, adopt once and for all a permanent definition of what these Australian waters are. The plan which might be best adopted would be to give power to the Queen-in-Council to declare these waters. That I think was the provision adopted in the Federal Council Bill. Not only was the power given to regulate fisheries in Australian waters, beyond territorial limits, but under this power, by acts of the Federal Council, the bech-de-mer fisheries of Queensland and the pearl fisheries of Western Australia were dealt with, although admittedly they were far beyond the territorial limits of any colony or of all Australia combined. I would suggest that, as a definition of Australian waters must be provided for, perhaps the solution of the difficulty may be found by giving a power of general legislation with respect to British ships in Australian waters, and then frame a clause which will enable those Australian waters to be defined when the occasion arises. I think, but I am not quite sure, that with respect to the locality of the beche-de-mer and pearl fisheries of Australia, an Order-in-Council was issued defining these boundaries before the legislation was adopted by the Federal Council.

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR:

That might be objected to by Queensland, Fiji, or New Zealand!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

Of course; and that would be a reason for not fixing it now once and for all, but from time to time as the other colonies came in.

The CHAIRMAN:

The first amendment I shall put is suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia, namely, to omit the word "and," line 10, and to insert the words "in addition to the laws of Great Britain." Perhaps I may explain to the Committee that I do not think I ought now to put the amendment proposed by the Right Hon. G.H. Reid, because if that were put and negatived, it would be incompetent for the Committee to consider the suggestions made by all the other legislatures. I intend to put all the amendments in such a form as to enable the Committee to give a vote on every amendment suggested by every legislature.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[2.45]:

I wish to say that an amendment was proposed by the Legislative Council of this colony which provided that the laws of the commonwealth should apply to all British ships whose first port of clearance, and whose port of destination is in the commonwealth. I am not at all opposed to that form of words, because there is no doubt there are a number of difficulties such as the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, pointed out, where vessels are going out on fishing expeditions beyond the 3-mile limit, but which return to the same port. There could be no difficulty about those vessels, such as whalers. But as the words stand they would create a difficulty. What would we say if the Canadian legislature put in these words in one of their acts, and claimed authority over vessels coming to Sydney from Canada? It would throw the whole of our shipping laws into confusion. But it is quite consistent with all our shipping laws that the amendment which our Legislative Council has suggested, should be passed, and I cannot see any serious objec-

The CHAIRMAN:

Perhaps I may explain that I propose, if the amendment of South Australia is negatived, to put as a test the next amendment, which is that of the Legislative Council of Victoria, namely, to strike out the latter part of the clause beginning with the words "and the laws." I will put the question that the words "and the laws" only be omitted. If that question is carried it will necessitate striking out all the rest of the words of the clause, but putting it in that form will enable the Committee to vote, if the amendment is negatived, on the amendments of the other legislatures.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[2.48]:

I would point out that it would be exceedingly undesirable to insert these words "in addition to the laws of Great Britain." Such an amendment would be most confusing and embarrassing. Either one set of laws or the other should prevail. Whichever prevails constitutionally we shall have to submit to, that is, whatever set of laws is paramount. As the hon. member,
Mr. Barton, reminds me, the word "laws" in this clause means statute laws,

[P.252] starts here

it has nothing to do with the common law of England. So that by inserting these words in addition to the laws of Great Britain we shall be making confusion worse confounded. Even the words "Great Britain" are a little uncertain. The amendment is bad in substance, and also in form. Although I yield my opinion in deference to what appears to be the opinion of the Committee on the other point, I think the confusion will be doubly increased if we insert these words. I therefore suggest that the Committee should give careful consideration before they insert an expression of that kind.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)[2.50]:
I think the amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales will carry out what appears to be the sense of the Committee, that is, to amend the clause so as to read in this way:
Whose first port of clearance and whose port of destination are in the commonwealth.
That will make it quite clear that it applies only to ships whose whole voyage is within the commonwealth, and however desirable it may be to extend it to other cases such as has been mentioned by my right hon.
friend, Mr. Reid, I do not see that it can be done. I think all we can do is to ensure that the laws of the commonwealth shall be in force on all ships whose voyage is wholly within the commonwealth. I quite agree with what my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon, has said, that it will make confusion worse confounded to insert the words "in addition to British laws." It might make it more clear, perhaps, to insert these words: "the laws of the commonwealth in so far as the same are not repugnant to any Imperial act relating to shipping or navigation."

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Is there not an Imperial act relating to repugnancy?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
The Colonial Laws Validating Act applies only to the acts of the different states; it would not apply to this act at all, so that I think it will be necessary to have some words of that kind inserted.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
That will be unnecessary, because the Imperial law is paramount!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I really think it would be better only to accept the amendment of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, which I think carries out the views of the Committee.

Question-That the words "in addition to the laws of Great Britain" be inserted-resolved in the negative.

The CHAIRMAN:
The next amendment suggested is that by the Legislative Council of Victoria to strike out the words:
And the laws and treaties of the commonwealth shall be in force on board of all British ships whose last port of clearance or whose port of destination is in the commonwealth.

I would ask the Committee to take a test vote whether that suggestion should be agreed to on the question to strike out the words "and the laws." If we strike out these words we must strike out the rest of the clause. If we do not strike them out we can make the amendments suggested by the legislatures or consider any other suggestion.

Amendment (suggested by the Legislative Council of Victoria) negatived.

Amendment (suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales) agreed to:
That the words "and treaties," line 10, be omitted.

Amendments (suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales) agreed to:
That the words "excepting her Majesty's ships and vessels of war" be inserted after the words "British ships," line 12.
That the word "last," line 12, be omitted with the view to the insertion in its place of the word "first."
That the word "or," line 13, be omitted with the view to the insertion in its place of the word "and."
That the word "is," line 13, be omitted with the view to the insertion in its place of the word "are."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8 (Division of Constitution).

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[2.55]:
The first portion of this clause involves the names to be given to the branches of the legislature and to the executive. Some houses, I believe, have made a suggestion for an alteration of the names. One house, I know, has suggested that the name should be "House of Assembly" instead of "House of Representatives." I feel bound to mention that fact, because the suggestion comes from a house of legislature in this colony.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
We will stand by the bill; that's the best way!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
We will stand by the bill!

The CHAIRMAN:
There is no amendment suggested in this clause.

Mr. SYMON:
Yes, to omit the word "federal"!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
That was consequential on what they did.

The CHAIRMAN:
I am not going to put such amendments. I understood that once, it was decided that the word "commonwealth" should be retained I should not put any amendments absolutely contradictory to the resolution which had been arrived at.
Clause agreed to.

CHAPTER I.-THE PARLIAMENT.
Part I.-General.
Clause 1. The legislative powers of the commonwealth shall be vested in a federal parliament, which shall consist of the Queen, a senate, and a house of representatives, and which is hereinafter called "the parliament," or "the parliament of the commonwealth."
Amendments suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales: Omit the word "federal," line 2; omit "representatives," line 4, and insert "assembly."
Amendments negatived; clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Governor-General).
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I would suggest to the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, that this clause should be postponed.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):
With the consent of the Committee, I will postpone the clause. Some question may arise about the clause, which I do not like to indicate at present; but the Committee may take my word for it that it will be wise to postpone it now.
Clause postponed.
Clause 3. Until the parliament otherwise provides, the annual salary of the governor-general shall be ten thousand pounds, and shall be payable to the Queen out of the consolidated revenue fund of the commonwealth.
The salary of a governor-general shall not be altered during his continuance in office.

The CHAIRMAN:
Two amendments have been suggested in this clause. The House of Assembly of South Australia suggests that the salary of the governor-general shall be £7,000, and the Legislative Council of South Australia suggests that it shall be £8,000. I will put the question "That the word "ten" proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause."

Question-That the word "ten" stand part of the clause-put. The Committee divided:

Ayes, 38; noes, 7; majority, 31.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[3.5]:

I move:
That the words, "The salary of a governor-general shall not be altered during his continuance of office," be omitted.

My reason for moving this amendment is that it is a matter of legislation. The paragraph was inserted at the last moment by the Convention at Adelaide. The principle on which we ought to act is not to put anything in the bill which is a matter of legislation.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
It was in the bill of 1891!
Amendment negatived; clause agreed to.
Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.
Clause 6. The governor-general may appoint such times for holding the first and every other session of the parliament as he may think fit, giving sufficient notice thereof, and may also from time to time, by proclamation or otherwise, prorogue the parliament, and may in like manner dissolve the house of representatives.
The parliament shall be called together not later than six months after the establishment of the commonwealth.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia:
After "dissolve," line 7, insert "the senate or."
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[3.9]:
Before we proceed with this clause I desire to make a suggestion. The clause will, I think, open up a big question in regard to the settling of deadlocks. The whole question of deadlocks will have to be discussed at a later stage, and I think it would be wise to postpone the clause in the meantime. I do not know that I would, in any case, give power to the government of the day to dissolve the senate. It is one thing to give it with an object in view, with certain restrictions and limitations, and it is another thing to give an unrestricted power to the government of the day to dissolve the senate whenever it chooses. That is a power I would not be prepared to give if I could possibly avoid it. In order that we may have a fair and open discussion on the matter, I suggest that the wiser course would be to allow this clause to stand over until we have dealt with the other question.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.10]:
I quite approve of the suggestion which my right hon. friend has made. On clause 9, which we shall reach presently, there will be a thoroughly wide and comprehensive debate on the relative powers of the two houses. Of course, in considering the question of equal representation, we cannot exclude from consideration what money powers the houses will respectively have, and the opinions of many of us may be influenced-I know the opinions of some hon. members will be influenced-by the question as to whether there is to be any provision to meet deadlocks. I do not wish to debate that question at this moment. I can, however, see that there is some feeling in favour of providing something which may be called a safety-valve. I do not myself attach as much importance to such a provision as some hon. members do; but the demand for it has been so general that it will force an me a full consideration of the question, and I agree with my right hon. friend that the best plan at present is to postpone this clause. I therefore move:
That the clause be postponed.
Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[3.12]:

I understand that, according to the standing orders, one member cannot object to the postponement of any clause supposing the House is in favour of its postponement. Personally I think that this clause ought not to be postponed. I think that this question of the dissolution of the senate ought to be discussed on its own merits. Not that I think that this provision is sufficient in itself to obviate deadlocks, but that it is one of the means which would make the constitution workable. I think that the question ought to be discussed on its own merits, inasmuch as we are to have two independent houses, and the only reason that now prevents the dissolution of a second house is that it is not representative. Both of these houses will be representative, and, therefore, I think that they should be subject to dissolution. It will be remembered that in the Convention in Adelaide I moved that there should be absolute power in the governor-general to dissolve either house. I know that it is not a cure for everything. I know that it is not sufficient in itself. I know that on an appeal to the states and to the people it may be that the states will say one thing and the people another. But I do not apprehend that there will be much difference between the two houses as to state interests. However, the question now is, are we or are we not to postpone this clause? The view of the hon. and learned leader of the Convention, I understand, is that it is one of the means of solving deadlocks. I do not recognise that at all. I say it is an essential means for the purpose of preventing deadlocks occurring in a number of cases. Otherwise you give one of the two houses an enormous advantage. One has a six years' tenure, and the other a tenure of only three years, and may be dissolved at pleasure. I admit that this provision is not a complete solution of the deadlock question; but I regard it as an essential provision of the constitution, and think that there must be other provisions as well to avoid deadlocks.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

We can discuss all those!
Mr. HIGGINS:

Yes; but by postponing this clause we shall practically assume that the dissolution of the senate is to be one of the alternative means for avoiding deadlocks.
The Hon. E. BARTON:

We shall not assume anything of that kind!

[P.256] starts here
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Without prejudice!

Mr. HIGGINS:
So far as I am concerned, I think it is better not to have the question postponed.

The CHAIRMAN:
I understand it to be the general wish of the Committee that when we come to clause 9 the whole question relating to the senate shall be discussed.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON (Tasmania)[3.15]:
I intended to move the postponement of the clause if the leader of the Convention did not do so, for I think that before we approach this question, or any question dealing with the settlement of deadlocks or interference with the status or the existence of the senate, it is most desirable that we should know thoroughly what the powers of the senate are to be. I, at any rate, am one who would not be in a position to give a vote on this question of dissolution, or on any question affecting deadlocks, until I knew that. I should vote against this provision now, desiring to see, at any rate, that the senate shall have that due continuity which it is argued so strongly is one of its rights and privileges. But if the question of the powers of the senate is settled in a spirit of equity and justice I shall be found among those who will vote for this mode of settling deadlocks.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[3.16]:
It seems to me that this clause will have to be passed in any case—that is to say, the people's house will have to be subject to dissolution by the governor-general, without reference to the other house. That may or may not be liable to dissolution. We will consider that question when we come to it. As far as this clause is concerned, I think we should agree to it without any discussion, for the house of representatives must of course be liable to dissolution, and when we come to the senate we will consider whether it should or should not be liable to dissolution under any circumstances.

Clause postponed.
Clause 7 agreed to.
Clause 8 (Privileges, &c., of houses).

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[3.17]:
I do not intend to propose an amendment, but I must point out that under this clause it would be in the power of the houses of the commonwealth, when they did draw up laws regulating their privileges and immunities, to frame them even in excess of those enjoyed by the members of the House of Commons. I do not wish to create unnecessary debate, but I confess that I should prefer this clause very much if there were a provision in the constitution itself that any such powers and immunities as the two houses may frame for themselves, shall not exceed those of the House of Commons, which, I am sure, are comprehensive enough; at the same time I see the inconvenience of definition, because there might be a perpetual dispute as to whether a given provision was or was not in excess, and in view of the fact that we do not want to have these powers, whatever they may be, open to continual question, I think that, upon the whole, we can safely trust the Parliament in this matter not to go to any extreme.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9. The senate shall be composed of six senators for each state, and each senator shall have one vote.

The senators shall be directly chosen by the people of the state as one electorate.

The senators shall be chosen for a term of six years, and the names of the senators chosen by each state shall be certified by the governor to the governor-general.

The Parliament shall have power, from time to time, to increase or diminish the number of senators for each state, but so that the equal representation of the several states shall be maintained, and that no state shall have less than six senators.

The qualification of electors of senators shall be in each state that which is prescribed by this constitution or by the Parliament as the qualification for electors of members of the house of representatives, but in the choosing of senators each elector shall vote only once, and if any elector votes more than once he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

The CHAIRMAN:

I shall put this clause by paragraphs.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.19]:

I wish to get a certain amendment put, if possible, first, for this reason. The amendment which I wish to move, though not a very great alteration in principle, involves the recasting of the clause-the making of it clearer, and, I think, in better consecutive form. The reason why I wish to move the amendment now-and I will move it by way of insertion, so as not to interfere with any words now in the clause-is this: Amendments have been proposed by several houses of legislature, and if they were taken first the result might be that the Committee might decide that certain words should stand part of the bill, which would prevent the putting of my amendment.
As my amendment seems to involve the whole of the clause except the last paragraph, I will state it now, and ask you, Mr. Chairman, what would be the best way to obtain its consideration. I propose to recast the first four paragraphs of the clause, so as to make the clause read in this way:

The senate shall be composed of senators for each state, directly chose

That is practically a recasting of the clause, and in order to make it clear that the principle of equal representation is granted to the original states, in accordance with clause 114, the admission of new states will be subject to the terms imposed by the commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is suggested that there should be a quota!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

That is not involved in the amendment. I have left the number of senators to be dealt with by the parliament. In the latter part of the amendment I have given the parliament the right to increase the number of senators as they think fit, so long as the minimum number from each original state is six.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Will that enable the total to be absolutely increased?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Which total?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The total number which the hon. and learned gentleman has left blank.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The blank which appears in the amendment which I moved in the New South Wales Legislative Council is a misprint. I wish my amendment to read:

The senate shall be composed of senators for each state. . . . . .

The amendment makes that part of the constitution which refers to the establishment or admission of states more intelligible and clear, and as a matter of draftmanship it would appear to be a little better than the original clause.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No power is given to the parliament to increase or diminish the number of senators for the now states!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I am leaving out the word "criminal" in the part my hon. and learned friend is referring to.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I would suggest that the hon. and learned member ask leave to substitute his amendment for that portion of the clause which he proposes to recast!
The Hon. E. BARTON:

I do not wish to do that, because the question then put from the Chair would be "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question"; and, if the amendment were rejected, the rest of the clause could not be altered. I propose to move the insertion of the words I have read after the word "the" at the beginning of the clause. The amendment will then be open to amendment, and if it is rejected the clause will still be open to amendment.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

If what the hon. member proposes is a mere recasting of the clause in order to get it into a better form, it might very well stand over until the bill goes before the Drafting Committee!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I suggested the insertion of the words I have read after the word "the" because that will still allow a general debate upon the whole clause. If the amendment is accepted, the drafting of the clause will, I think, be improved; while, if it is rejected, the clause will still be open to amendment.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

The mere improved draftsmanship, of the clause would, I think, be better dealt with after we have dealt with the salient principles involved. There is no doubt that a great deal of revision can be done in regard to the drafting of the bill. If the amendment does not raise any new controversial point-

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It does not.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Then I think it would be more convenient to have a debate upon the clause as it stands!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I shall be quite content with the understanding that if the Committee adheres to the original intention of the clause the Drafting Committee will make some amendment of the kind I have suggested.

The CHAIRMAN:

I think it would, perhaps, be better if the amendments were put in the form which I now suggest. I propose to split up the amendments of the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, and to put first the amendments suggested by the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales. If it is decided that the words proposed to be omitted shall stand, the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, can move the insertion of the word "original" after the word state."

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Perhaps we had better leave that to the Drafting Committee!

The CHAIRMAN:
In that case I will put the amendment of the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of New South Wales to strike out the words "six senators for each state." Upon that amendment the question of equal representation can be discussed. I will then put as another amendment the suggested amendment omitting the words "and each senator shall have one vote.

Amendment suggested by the Council and Assembly, New South Wales:
Paragraph 1. Omit "six senators for each state, and each senator shall have one vote." Insert "members representing the states in proportion to their population. But no state shall have less than three senators. The senate shall consist of not less than forty members."

Mr. WISE:
Will it be competent for the Committee to discuss the question of finding some way out of the deadlock? The Committee's determination upon that question may influence the votes of many hon. members in regard to the question of equal representation.

The CHAIRMAN:
Strictly speaking, it would not; but I understand that it is the wish of the Committee that the general question of the constitution of the senate should be discussed now upon this clause.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[3.28]: At the Convention in Adelaide I moved the omission of the word "six" practically with the same object as the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of New South Wales had in view.

Mr. WISE:
Not with the same object as the Council had in view. Their object was to kill federation!

Mr. HIGGINS:
The only object of which we can officially take notice is that expressed by their words, and the object expressed by their words is that there shall not be equal representation. I am not going to assume, as the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, appears to desire me to assume, that their intentions were anything else. I have read the debates which took place in the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of this colony, and I take it that there are as strong federationists in that Council and Assembly as any here. We have no right to call these gentlemen provincialists. I rather take it that those are provincialists who, in conceding powers to the federation, still insist that the states shall keep a control over those powers by means of equal representation. I need hardly say that, having moved the amendment in Adelaide, under circumstances which were most discouraging, and made mine a very uphill fight, because I felt that, no matter what I said, I should be beaten and have only a small minority with me, I am not going to change my views now in view of the circumstances which have occurred since.

The Hon. J.H. Howe:

The hon. member will change his tactics, I suppose!

Mr. Higgins:

There is no question that has touched the imagination of the people of Australia in connection with the federation scheme so completely as this question of equal state representation. And I knew it would be so. I do not arrogate to myself any special knowledge of the feeling of Australia but the thing is so obvious. When you find that the proposal is that, upon all subjects of legislation—whether, for instance, on bankruptcy or divorce—a man in New South Wales is to be treated as equal only to one-eighth of a man in Tasmania, the absurdity of the thing is so apparent that the good sense of the people of Australia is coming round, not merely in New South Wales and Victoria, but in all the colonies, to see the impossibility of the arrangement. In moving my amendment, I had in my mind not alone the question of equal representation. I had in my mind a fallacious principle which was at the basis of equal representation, and of a number of other chimerical proposals—a principle which is at the root of a number of difficulties in our general scheme. I mean the principle that we were to insist upon the consent of the states as well as the consent of the people. I deny that to be a principle of federation at all, and I defy any of those who advocate federation on the scheme in this bill to point to any authority of weight to show that that is an essential principle of federation. It has been drilled into the ears of the people throughout the colonies, and I want to find out where it comes in. This question of federation is a mere question of a mode of government. All governments, as Burke says, are mere contrivances for the benefit of the people. There is no cut-and-dried system of federation which we are to adopt, and say that that and nothing else is federation. This principle of the consent of the states, and the consent of the people, has led many of the reasoners on federation into a most difficult position. You are in the chair, sir, but I may say this much, that I have read with great interest a pamphlet by Sir Richard Baker, which has been issued since the Convention sat in Adelaide, in which he deals with this matter, and in that pamphlet he starts with the principle of the consent of the states as well as of the people being necessary, and as a result be logically comes to the conclusion that you cannot have responsible government in a federation. I am convinced by the logic of the writer of the pamphlet, but at the same time I deny the premise. I say that the consent of a state is not necessary to a federation. No consent, in the ultimate result, ought to be necessary to the administration of the affairs of the people, or to the making of the laws of the people, but the consent of the people, and any other consent which you put in, in addition to the consent of the people, is a consent which means to a large extent a baffling and a thwarting of the people.

Mr. WISE:

The consent of the states is necessary!

Mr. HIGGINS:

The consent of the states is necessary when you are going into a league, but as soon as you are in a league the consent of the people is sufficient. I am not going to be thwarted by anything of that kind, because I feel confident that the sense of the people of Australia, even in the less populous colonies, has come round to recognise the justice of the view I put forward. A number of phrases have become current, and have been accepted as gospel, from federal teachers or assumed federal teachers, who say, for instance, that because you have one man one vote you ought to have one state one vote. That is one of the most transparent fallacies that could be enunciated. A state has no right to a vote in a federal matter any more than a federation has a right to a vote in a state matter. The proper corollary of one man one vote is many men many votes. It is a matter of arithmetic. If you give one man one vote, then if you have many men you must give those many men many votes. Having watched the course of the debates on this subject in the different colonies, I have come to the conclusion that the doctrine that the consent of the states on a federal subject is necessary in addition to the consent of the people is rapidly disappearing. That bubble has been pricked; that tyre has been punctured, and although all the wind in not out of it yet, there is no doubt the wind will soon be out of it. Like Humpty-dumpty, who sat upon a wall, it has had a great fall, and three score men and three score more cannot make Humpty-dumpty as he was before. I have said that the feeling of the people is coming round on this question of state representation. At the Adelaide Convention, my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, was good enough to refer to the principle of proportional representation as impracticable, and as the subject of a mere academical dispute. What I am curious to know now is whether that proposition ceases to be impracticable, and whether the dispute ceases to be academical when the hon. member finds that the two houses of legislature over which he rules have affirmed by two majorities that equal representation should not be adopted. Does the dispute cease to be academical when we find that the New South Wales Assembly, by a majority of 59 to 4, voted against equal representation? Does the dispute cease to be academical and the question cease to be impracticable as soon as the Premier of New South Wales finds that the vast mass of the people in his colony as well as in the other colonies are coming round to the view that equal representation is an injustice and a snare? As I am speaking to the same audience whom I addressed on the last occasion, I do not think I shall be justified in going into this question at very great length. In reading the debates of the New South Wales Parliament I was gratified to think that that legislature at least had the courage to express their true mind upon the matter, unlike our Victorian Parliament, where, unfortunately, we were beaten on this issue by a majority of 45 to 36. If we had had five members from the other side we should have won upon the issue. But for the fact that the leader of the Government for the time-being in Victoria did not see his way to depart from the vote he gave in Adelaide—although with his usual clearness and comprehensive grasp, he saw the fallacy of the principle of equal representation—but for the fact that he threw the weight of his influence and advice against the movement, we should have won. We wanted five members to get a majority. There was not found in the Victorian Parliament a single member who justified the principle of equal representation. The only attempt at justification was the statement that was drummed into our ears that there could be no federation with the minor states without this principle.

Hon. MEMBERS:
Hear, hear!

Mr. HIGGINS:
At least I have achieved one success. I have achieved the distinction of eliciting the loudest cheers which have greeted any member of the Convention, and I am glad to find the right hon. Premier of Tasmania leading the cheers, notwithstanding his recent illness.

Mr. WISE:
The first demand for equal representation came from Victoria!
Mr. HIGGINS:
That shows the superior intelligence of the Victorians. What I say is this: that you have in the more populous colonies opinion strongly swinging mod as soon as they grasp the position; and, not only is it so there, but I have found from the debates in the South Australian Parliament-although I was told in Adelaide that every one in South Australia was in favour of equal representation-that even South Australia is coming Mud to the same view.

Mr. SOLOMON:
Only the enemies of federation!

An Hon. MEMBER:
One swallow does not make a summer!

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is true that one swallow does not make a summer. At the same time, the views of a few members of Parliament in South Australia may have a considerable influence on certain hon. gentlemen I see around me. I was exceedingly amused at the debates in South Australia on this subject. We found member after member saying that he saw no need for a second house at all. Member after member said, "What is the use of a senate, it is not wanted?" The Hon. Sir John Downer, who is watching this Federation Bill keenly and quietly, as soon as he saw hon. members going upon that dangerous track, interrupted with such a question as this: "Would you fight against the smaller states-your own state?" If the hon. member refers to the debates in the South Australian Parliament, he will find that when Mr. Price was speaking, and that when that hon. member was going off with the chariot of the sun in a dangerous way, saying that he could not see the use of a second house; that he did not see why, in regard to federation more than anything else, we should have the consent of the people given in two ways; that he could not see why the interest of the masses of the people in Australia was not solid; that he could not see why the interests of the people in South Australia were not the same as were the interests of the people in New South Wales-when the hon. member heard this, then, like a good master of the hounds, he gave a smart crack with his whip and brought the stragglers to heel at once, using such words as these: "But would you vote against the interests of the less populous states?" "Oh, no;" said the member, "I am quite willing to accede to this in the interests of South Australia." Of course the member felt that he had to face his South Australian constituents, and that any other course would be unpopular. I remark also that my hon. friend, Mr. Glynn, who spoke in South Australia, sees also very clearly, although he may vote in favour of equal representation—that all this outcry about state interests being the one matter in this federation is a mere sham, that it is merely one of the numerous devices which have been evolved for the purpose of persuading people here that they have different interest's from people there, in order that the people may not be able by combination to show their power.

Mr. GLYNN:

I denounced making logic the test of granting it! Mr. HIGGINS: I can see that the hon. member has grasped the position—that there is no danger to the states—that the questions that will arise under this federal scheme are not so much questions between the states. On the question of bankruptcy, for instance, how can there be a difference of interest between the states?

Mr. WISE:

Then there is no fear of a combination of the smaller states against the big ones?

Mr. HIGGINS:

That is not the question. I say that there is no fear of a combination. It is not a question of the fear of a combination. You must put power with the numbers.

Mr. WISE:

That is what this bill does!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I do not see how the hon. and learned member can say that this bill puts the power with the numbers, when you have the representatives of 650,000 persons in the three minor colonies, with the power to outvote the representatives of 2,500,000 in the bigger colonies. The position is this: we are invited to follow the precedent of the United States as against the precedent which was afforded us in Canada, in Switzerland, and in Germany. We are invited to adopt that which was a compromise between a confederacy and a federation in place of adopting a federation. I say distinctly that the system in the United States was a compromise between a confederacy and a federation. A confederacy, a loose bond between the independent states, was the object of one party at the time of the American Convention. The federation or binding together of the different states for certain specific objects under which the majority would rule was the object of the other party. But they could not agree. They felt, however, that the English guns were at the gates, and that they could not afford to have one single state standing out. With great misgiving, therefore, they adopted the compromise of having two houses the house of a confederacy, and the other house, the house of a federation, where the majority would rule.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Does the hon. member know of any federation which has not been a compromise?

Mr. HIGGINS:
Every federation is a compromise. That which is proposed by New South Wales is a compromise, and, as I think, a very reasonable compromise.

An Hon. MEMBER:
It is unification!

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is not unification, it is federation.

An Hon. MEMBER:
It is gormandising!

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is a federation. There ought to be a unification on the subjects which are federal, and a severance on the subjects which are not federal.

An Hon. MEMBER:
But we do not want unification!

Mr. HIGGINS:
The hon. member, Sir John Downer, asked me to give him an instance of a federation which is not a compromise. I do not think I can do so. I am asking for a compromise in this instance which will give the smaller states certain advantages in representation, which will not be based exactly upon proportional representation, but which will be a compromise of that kind. May I indicate this to the hon. member?-that, starting with the United States, every new federation created since has departed more and more from equal representation. The next federation created was that in Switzerland in 1848. In that case, although you had cantons historically distinct, different in religion, different in race, different in language, they gave themselves equal representation, with few exceptions. Still there were the exceptions. You had half cantons, which returned only one member as against other cantons returning two. The action of Switzerland was largely influenced by the historical difference between the cantons, and also by the analogy of the United States. The next of the federations was that of Canada. In Canada they started with twenty-four for Ontario, twenty-four for Quebec, and twenty-four for the maritime provinces, which consisted of three provinces at first. As it now stands, Manitoba has one, British Columbia one or two, and various other colonies which came in have a mere fraction. It is much more of is federation than the scheme proposed in this bill. After Canada came Germany, is 1870 or 1871. That federation was based upon principles still further removed from equal representation.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

It was a federation of the lion and the lamb!

Mr. HIGGINS:

The hon. member's colleague, Mr. Barton, said practically the same thing in Adelaide; but it is not a question of the lion and the lamb. How can that apply to a state like Bavaria, or a state like Mecklenburg-Strelitz? Was Bavaria a lion, or Mecklenburg-Strelitz a lamb?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

What about Prussia!

Mr. HIGGINS:

Bavaria had six representatives; Mecklenburg-Strelitz, two; Prussia, seventeen members; until you come to the cities of Lubeck and others with one member, so that you will find a steady gradation which is still more different from the principle of equal representation. The principle of equal representation proposed in this bill is a retrogressive proposal. The people are gradually coming to understand better what a federation means—a differentiation of subjects where what I may call different strata of people are ruled by the majority upon different subjects. The people are gradually coming to see what a federation is, and I hope that in forming our Australian federation we will not take a step backward, such as is proposed in this bill, by going back to the first real federation of modern times, the federation of the United States of America. I need hardly say that the consent of the states and the consent of the people will not be realised by this proposal, if that is the true principle; because if you have five states, and if there are six senators for each state, and if three states vote with three members on each side, and the other states vote four members against two, or five against one, I ask where then is the consent of the states? That will be simply the consent of one state to a measure. When you talk of this consent of the states as well as of the people it is simply arrant nonsense. You do not get the consent of the states. If you want to get the consent of the states as well as of the people you ought to insist that in the senate they must vote by states, and then you can understand what is being done. This is simply one of those ingenious devices which we have to watch continually to prevent the will of the people, as a mass, having its ordinary and proper effect. It has been used as an argument that this system has been a success in the United

Mr. SYMON:

Why has it not been a success in the United States?
Mr. HIGGINS:
I cannot answer everything at once. I say that in the United States the circumstances, historically and practically, are as different as possible from ours. I say, first, that it has not been a success in the United States. If you read the comments in the June number of the New England Magazine upon the system of equal representation in the United States you will see the evil of its working.

You will see how the arbitration treaty with England was defeated by equal representation. In that majority were found the representatives in the senate of what are called "rotten borough and sagebush states." A few rich men can control a state with a small population much easier than they can control a state with a large population. If you look into the history of the United States you will see that the great civil war was brought about by equal representation.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
No! Mr. HIGGINS: I am glad to see the hon. member so lively after his recent illness.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The hon. member's remarks are as good as a dose of medicine!

Mr. HIGGINS:
Some minds as well as bodies need medicine. I hope to administer a useful dose of medicine to the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, and my right hon. friend. I hope they will not take it with wry faces. I read a speech delivered by the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, in the Assembly, and I understood from it that he had seen the error of the principle I am speaking of. In that speech he did not in the slightest way attempt to combat the views put forward with such force by some gentlemen whom I did not know until quite recently, such as Mr. A.B. Piddington, Mr. Millen, and Mr. Ashton, who were mere names to me, but whose able statement of the case from the point of view of the mass of the people I admired exceedingly. There were others whose names I cannot recollect, but who struck me as having seized the position better than most of us and most members in our Assembly.

Mr. WISE:
The most democratic arguments in favour of your view were used in our Legislative Council!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I am not going to be led into the question of the virtues of the Legislative Council. I understand the hon. member is sore in regard to the Council in some way, but I do not know the Council officially.
Mr. WISE:
They would welcome the hon. member among them!

Mr. HIGGINS:
As an hon. friend reminds me, it is the only Council in the Australian colonies that would welcome me. If they did I should be exceedingly surprised.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Only on this question!

Mr. HIGGINS:
However, I do not intend to be misled or led astray by discussing the virtues or vices of the Legislative Council. I wish to keep the subject out of local politics as far as I can. I do not care for anything except the principles I find laid down in these speeches by strong federationists in the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales. There is also the fact that the circumstances are exceedingly different. Historically, the United States were in such a terrible mess that they could not afford to come to some agreement, no matter if it was a bad agreement, and I freely confess that if I had had the honor of taking a part in the framing of that constitution I would have taken it that the only patriotic course was to have accepted that constitution, faulty as it was, under the circumstances. When Delaware was saying, "Unless you concede equal representation, we will make terms with the British," and when they felt that if the British had Delaware and the guns were at the gates of the other colonies, this new federation would be ruined, I do not see what they had to do but to accept the inevitable, and take the equal representation offered to them. But I am thankful to say that we are in no such circumstances. We have not to frame our constitution with the guns of the enemy at our gates. It will be remembered also that in the United States they had not so many subjects of general interest given to the federation as are given here-subjects like the company law, bankruptcy. They had the subject of patents given to them-six or seven subjects I remember which were very leading subjects; but they had not a number of other subjects, such as insurance, banking, the incorporation of banks company law-

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
They did not know anything about that one hundred years ago!

Mr. HIGGINS:
Divorce, and all that kind of thing. I ask where do states rights come in as to that? I hold that prima facie the majority should rule on a subject which affects the whole people; and, if this subject affects the whole people, why should not the whole people rule by majority; for you cannot get them all to agree? Where do state rights come in in that? Because there is a possibility of a state's interest being affected in one out of ten thousand subjects, you practically propose to give the less populous states equal voting power an to the other nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine subjects. Where is the logic of that? The experience of the states of America shows that there are no differences of interests arising between states. There has never been a cause of quarrel between the less populous and the more populous states. What need, then, is there for a safeguard? The people of New South Wales are coming round to the conclusion that this fallacy is merely one of those numerous fallacies which are put about ingeniously for the purpose of preventing liberal and radical legislation. It will be seen that the more consents you require to legislation the less likely is that legislation to be enacted.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

No!

Mr. HIGGINS:

The only consent that I acknowledge in the case of legislation which is necessary is the consent of the people. I do not acknowledge that the consent of the state has anything to do with it at all.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Has any conservative influence in the senate of America come by equality of representation? Has it not come by the method of election?

Mr. HIGGINS:

The senate, all American writers agree in saying, is becoming more and more a house to represent the rich men and the trusts.

Mr. SYMON:

That is the fault of the election!

Mr. HIGGINS:

The reason is this: that in the less populous states one or two big silver men, for instance, can get whomsoever they will elected. I do not mean to say that the election by the parliaments of the different states does not also contribute to that result.

Mr. SYMON:

Some of the finest men are from the smallest states!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I want to be perfectly clear, but at the same time I say that the effect of equal representation in the senate was, if you look into it closely, one of the chief causes of that great civil war.

Several Hon. MEMBERS: No!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I do not wish to go into an historical discussion now, but I will tell you very briefly how it occurred. As soon as some of the states found that they could not get any other new state South, of Mason and Dixie's line, which would be a slave state; as soon as they found that by the increase of the number of the states to the west and the north, they were being out-voted in the Senate; as soon as they felt that they were no longer to have a majority in that Senate to work in the interests of the slave states, the southern states put into practice the doctrine they had long been preaching of the absolute right of any state to secede. When Abraham Lincoln was elected they said "that election shows that those states will return senators which will outnumber our senators, and we shall have no protection," and they at last determined to secede.

The Hon. J.H. Gordon:
Did not the stand of the Senate in that case bring about righteousness in doing away with the slave trade?

Mr. Higgins:
It is difficult for me to hear the hon. member.

The Hon. J.H. Gordon:
Did not the Senate in that case do away with the slave trade, and, therefore, support the principle of equal representation?

Mr. Higgins:
Even now I do not hear the hon. member, and I think I had better go on.

Mr. Wise:
The hon. member cannot answer the question!

Mr. Higgins:
The great Civil War in America was owing to equal representation, because the framers of the Constitution had in view the stopping of the slave trade and slavery, but they were not able to bring it about in due time, and gradually, in consequence of the slave states having equal representation in the Senate. As soon as the southern states found that they could not persuade Texas to be subdivided, and they hoped to be able to get in Texas two slave states, then it was that they determined to secede.

The Hon. J.H. Gordon:
Then the hon. member is regretting the abolition of slavery?

Mr. Higgins:
I do not see the logic of that statement—it is not necessary for me to see logic in everything. I do not intend to labour this question, as it is simply the same audience as I had on the last occasion. As far as I am concerned there will be a division, and even if we have merely the same minority as we had the last time, we can leave with confidence to others the determination of the question of who was right. I have to thank hon. members for listening to me, and for plying me with questions so courteously. I can only say, in conclusion, that I feel chagrined at the thought that in place of trying in our constitution for Australia, to make an improvement on the federal constitutions of the United States, Switzerland, and Germany we are going back to the first form of federation which was suggested. I think we should try to get for Australia as good a constitution as we can. No one now attempts to justify equal representation on principle. If there is anyone who does so, I invite him, I challenge him, to do so now.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
Is it necessary to show that two and two make four?

Mr. HIGGINS:
If there is any hon. member who can justify equal representation on principle I should be very glad to learn of him. I leave my mind open, and if I am convinced on principle that I am wrong, I shall withdraw my call for a division. The only principle upon which this idea can be conceded or proposed is that it is the only way to get federation.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
Hear, hear! The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON: Hear, hear!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I am glad the Tasmanian Premier accedes to that.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
That is not the only reason!

Mr. HIGGINS:
Then there is some principle behind it! Hear, hear! and a good one, too!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I hope to hear what is the principle behind it. I may state there has been no attempt yet, in the Convention or elsewhere, to give us the reasons for it.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Is not that rather an assumption of infallibility on your part?

Mr. HIGGINS:
I do not think so. How is it an assumption for me to say I have been listening for reasons and I have not heard them? I have been listening simply to find any justification, on principle. The only thing approaching justification is, that without equal representation, you will not have federation. I even doubt very much whether, with equal representation, you will have federation. I doubt very much whether you will have a federation amongst the minor states, and I doubt very much whether the larger populations of New South Wales and Victoria will not refuse federation upon such terms as those. Of course time will tell. We are going back to the system in the United States. We are going back disregarding experience—we are going back to equal representation in the senate. I take it that the circumstances of our geographical position, of our history, of our objects, of our trade, are quite inconsistent with it, and I hope it will not be conceded.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[4.13]:

I have listened with very great pleasure to the interesting speech of my hon. friend, because I know that every word he said he meant. I believe the hon. member, honestly meant every word he uttered. The accent of conviction was in our ears all the time he was speaking; but I had a painful feeling that his early education had been neglected. He made a most lamentable mess of "humpty dumpty." I thought any reasonable man would know that, but he stumbled over it. After having carefully prepared his speech, too, he at the last moment forgot that which every good child ought to recollect. The hon. member begins with this illogical proposition and I interrupted him, not for the purpose of bothering him in any way, but for the purpose of getting my mind informed. I said to him, "Is not federation, of necessity, a compromise?" The hon. gentleman had been arguing that federation could only be established on strictly logical lines.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I did not say that!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

The hon. gentleman has certainly been arguing that the only test should be that the majority of the people ought to rule. That was the infallible and only test, democratic and radical, which ought to apply. Having laid down that cardinal principle without which he said federation could never exist, he admitted, in answer to my objection, that federation was a compromise, could therefore proceed on no set logical principle, and, as a necessary result, I should think would be impracticable and impossible. I think my hon. friend gave himself away in the line he took, for when you once admit that the very essence of federation is a compromise, away must go your logical principle. And the hon. gentleman a lawyer, too! Really, I am almost ashamed. Fancy expecting to make a settlement between two people who are at arm's length with each other on logical principles. The logical principle is give-and-take. The hon. gentleman's logical principle is to take and not to give.

Mr. HIGGINS:

What do I want to take?
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
The hon. gentleman wants the smaller colonies to hand over to the larger colonies their principal sources of revenue, their customs, their post-offices, and to place a child-like trust in the gentle way in which they will be handled. He says that will be a constitution founded on the eternal right of the majority to rule. That, he says, is a compromise; and what a compromise! I really thought the time had passed for discussing this question of equal representation in the senate. The hon. gentleman referred to the case of America, and he said it had not worked well. The hon. gentleman attributed all the troubles of America practically to the Senate. Even the war of slavery, the hon. gentleman seemed to think, came from the pernicious influence which the Senate exercised. Has my hon. friend ever thought of this—and this was not mentioned at the Adelaide Convention—that whatever difficulties there may have been in reforming the Senate in America, the inelasticity of the constitution before and after that most terrible war and loss of life, was brought about through the acts of the Senate. There was a retributive body in existence immediately after the war—

Mr. WISE:
And they amended the constitution there!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
There was a general with a conquering army, with constitution and everything else at his feet, and amendments were made in the constitution. But at this time, with all the power to redress the grievous wrongs they sustained through this unrighteous body—the Senate—this army, brought into existence through the wrongs this body had created, and of course anxious to do away with the existence of that which had produced the mischief, instead of interfering with the Senate upheld it, and not a suggestion or word was said, when they had the power in their hands, of amending all these grievances, which my hon. friend's industry has found out since, and no one has dreamt of remedying.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The hon. member must not forget that the one principle in the American Constitution which is unalterable is that of equal representation!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
If the Senate brought about all the mischief of the American war, it was bound to stink in the nostrils of the successful army, which had had to fight for the rights upon which the Senate had been trespassing.

Mr. HIGGINS:
How could they alter it?
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Alter it! They had the power of a conquering army. If you want an argument from experience more conclusive than all the clever speeches made by ingenious lawyers, or all our thoughtful books written by clever essayists, long after the thing occurred if you want an answer to all that, there it is. There was a wrong, you say. I say there was the power to redress it. Could we have a more triumphant vindication of the constitution of the American Republic than the fact that, with a huge standing army—because that is what it had become—flushed with victory, unconquerable, irresistible, the constitution was maintained, except in some particulars which they very properly took means to redress. But in this, the crucial thing—out of which all the mischief and harm had come—the result was a triumphant vindication of the constitution in the publication by the victorious army, not that the Senate had brought about all the trouble, but that under their constitution they would live or for their constitution they would die. We there have argument from fact and experience such as my hon. friend here said we would have to refer to oh financial questions. Speculation, however clever, must prove useless against the mighty experience obtained from those unanswerable facts. Now, my hon. friend refers to Switzerland, and says that there is not equal representation there. I say that, in effect, there is, and the Swiss Constitution was not established last century—not established so very long ago. It was established with the American Constitution before the Swiss people, with nearly one hundred years' experience of its working. It was founded substantially upon that, only with those alterations which differences in blood and country naturally create, and in Switzerland there is, in effect, equal representation.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Forty-four representatives—two from each canton!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

There are some little places—as afterwards we may have some territories—in which this rule may not be adopted, but the base principle of the Swiss Constitution was equal representation in the Senate.

Mr. SYMON:

And there the Senate has also a voice in the election of ministers—

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Exactly.

Mr. SYMON:

Which we do not ask for!

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

More powerful than ours!
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Whence come these fears on the part of the larger colonies? Can they suppose for a moment that, under this constitution, if adopted, the senate of this commonwealth will have anything like the powers of the Senate of the American Commonwealth or the Senate of the Swiss Confederacy? The hon. member knows they cannot. He knows that the principal reasons which give the American Senate their power-the control of foreign affairs, the power really of making peace or war, the control of all the civil offices bring along with them of necessity a power which makes them a very effective chamber. The same thing may be said to a less extent about the Senate under the Swiss Constitution. But under this constitution what has the hon. member to fear? The majority must have in one house all the charms and incantations-everything which the larger states and larger populations can afford will belong to them. The smaller states will have enough to hold their own against them under any circumstances. Besides, if this were not so, the conditions are so varying, that a colony on the top to-day may not be so high to-morrow. Western Australia, notably, has Attained a higher position than we anticipated at the time of the Convention of 1891, and is likely to attain a greater position. That is a notable instance staring us in the face. Are we going to assume that the relations of the colonies are always to remain the same, and that there need be no fear? I say that wherever the large population is, there will be the power. I care not what state regulation you may make; the will of the people will be supreme whatever state rule you make to try to prevent it.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Why try to prevent it, then?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Would the hon. member make the constitution so elastic that it would be constantly varying in its incidence? We want to begin this constitution in trust and confidence, and we want the larger states to recognise that, while we do not distrust them, we respect ourselves, and when we are handing over to them the sources of our most material revenues, we take with us, at all events, not, perhaps, the power of active legislation, but the power of being able to say "No" to anything that would be disastrous to us. In the course of time, I dare say, it will turn out, as it has done in America, that state rights will come very little into theme matters, and the results will be highly satisfactory, because we shall know that we really have become so much one people that these smaller considerations never occur to anybody at all. I say that may be so. But there is a greater chance of doing that if we begin on a righteous and fair foundation, and if we recognise that this foundation is after all, a compromise-fair terms to be made-to give powers to the whole acting as a whole, and yet to take care that the identity of the units shall be in no way destroyed. If we take care of that, then we shall have a constitution founded on good feeling and righteous consideration for each other, and we shall have some sort of guarantee that in the end it will work well, as I say unhesitatingly the constitution has done not only in Switzerland but also in the United States of America. I did not intend to speak on this subject at all today, and I do not think that at the present stage of our business it is wise for anybody to make a long speech, going exhaustively into this matter. I have just mentioned a few points of view in reply to the hon. gentleman who addressed us on this subject, and I am very pleased to know that he does not represent the majority of the Victorian delegation.

Mr. WISE:
Nor of the Victorian people?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
And much less the Majority of the Victorian people.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[4.27]:
I hope that in this Convention there will be exhibited no feeling of impatience in the discussion of this question, because, no matter what the decision may be, a good deal will depend on the method and manner of arriving at that decision. I feel quite sure that the deathblow to federal instinct in this colony would be dealt in one act by this Convention at this juncture, if it were to reject a proposal of this character, and were to reject it in a manner that showed that the Convention brooked no argument, and was impatient of discussion. Hon. members must not forget that the recommendation from the New South Wales legislature, so far as the popular assembly is concerned, was practically a unanimous recommendation. There were only four hon. members of the whole House who voted in favour of a system of equal representation in the senate. A large and over-whelming majority of the members of the legislature were against that principle. In the Legislative Council - despite that we had the benefit of the presence there of the leader of the Convention and his hon. and learned colleague, Mr. O'Connor, with all the weight of their influence, all their argumentative power-by a very large majority the vote was against equal representation.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
It was pretty well against everything that I proposed!
The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

But it is the greatest mistake for hon. members of this Convention, and especially those representing New South Wales, to attempt to flout the legislature, as the legislature on some occasions has attempted to flout the Convention. It is better to take the most charitable view of the proceedings of the various houses of Parliament in their deliberations, and I say that if we put ourselves in the same point of attitude, and look at these matters in the way that the legislature here have looked at them, we shall be apt to take a more charitable view of their actions than if we merely look at them in the aspect which some hon. members affect, of being enemies of federation. I deny that these proposals have been the outcome of a majority of the enemies of federation. It is true that we have in the legislature here, as in every legislature, men who fear federation because with federation their occupation would be gone, and the position of a local politician would be belittled. But we cannot include in that class the whole of the members, or a majority of the members of the legislature. Men of culture, of ability, and of patriotism, who are not without influence if they go to the country and arouse public feeling upon the opinions which they hold, have supported this proposition. It will be only trifling with the question if the members of the Convention refuse to apply the best of their reason, and the calmest and closest consideration to it, even though it was decided in 1891, and again this year in Adelaide, by a large majority. The question has to be raked up again, and let us have argument for argument upon it, not any appeal to close the discussion because we have had enough of it. To close the discussion in that way may close federation. I speak as one who anxiously desires, not only the passing of, the bill, but the accomplishment of federation, and as one who desires by every means in his power to contribute something towards its accomplishment. We can better contribute towards it by paying due deference to proposals which will meet the objections, aye the prejudices, of those who have ultimately to be invited to give their assent to the measure which we frame. I undertake to say, be the value of my authority great or little, that so far as the colony of New South Wales is concerned, if a plebiscite were taken on the question of equal representation there would be an overwhelming majority in favour of it, as there would be in favour of federation. Unfortunately we shall not have an opportunity to take a test vote upon this particular question, though we shall have the opportunity of taking a test vote upon the bill itself, and it may endanger the passing of the bill if we have the constitution so rigidly framed that, without granting proportional representation, we have no safety-valve for the expression of the ultimate rule of the will of the people. I say that it is unfortunate that there can be no opportunity for testing the people upon this point. We may have this greater misfortune—we may imperil the passing of the bill simply because we refuse to make a concession in this direction. I believe, much against the opinion of the majority of the politicians in New South Wales—and I want hon. members to mark this—that the prospects of federation are brighter in New South Wales than in almost any other colony. These prospects cannot be jeopardised by the local legislatures; but they can be jeopardised by the Convention itself. If we deal with the matter in a moderate way, if we exhibit consideration towards the people of these colonies who feel that it is not simply a question of state right but a question of manhood right that is involved, we shall, when the final test vote is taken, win over to our side thousands and thousands of voters, and thereby help forward the consummation of our great purpose. I largely object to arguments based upon the precedents of the past. There has been no period in the history of the world from which precedents can be adduced on all-fours with the position of the Australasian colonies to-day. Here we have a unique story of reform gained by the people in the direction of manhood suffrage and equal political right. In America or in the old country no such reforms have been wrung from the ruling authorities. But here in every colony, and more especially in the two larger states of Victoria and New South Wales, the political aspirations of the people have been directed to acquiring for themselves, not greater rights one over the other, but equal rights as citizens of the same country, so that they may have, not only manhood suffrage, but equal manhood suffrage. The leader of the Convention knows full well that the measure which he was successful in passing through its various stages in the Legislative Assembly of this colony, and which gives us our present electoral system, was the result not only of a struggle for manhood suffrage in its widest form, but of a struggle for equal manhood suffrage, so that we might have equal electorates, each man having one vote, and no vote in one electorate being of more weight than another vote in another electorate. The tendency of agitation and reform has been in this direction in all the colonies. Now, we are asked to invite the people of Australasia to agree, in accepting a constitution for their national life which is to break down all these state instincts and provincial feeling, to give up that which they have been successfully battling for for years and years past, and to adopt the retrograde stage of distinguishing between the voting power of various individual members of the states. We may be able, if we insist upon having equal state rights, and if with it we provide safety-valves which give to the people the ultimate rule in the constitution, with the consequent divergent forces at the ballot, to get the people to agree to it; but I fear that in New South Wales it would be a hopeless task, even for men of intellect such as the leader of the Convention, the Premier, and others, to go to the country with a bill in their hands conferring, not equal rights upon the citizens of Australasia, but equal rights upon the states, and at the same time closing up every outlet by which the popular will and the popular opinion could be ingrafted upon the statute-book of the commonwealth. I say that the task is too large for the ablest man in New South Wales to undertake. I think that my hon. friends from Victoria would find that if they had that contract to undertake it would be a contract which might very well be postponed until some future date. I think that the amendments emanating from the Attorney-General of Victoria, and other amendments which have been suggested, go to show that the provision of equal representation is accepted with great misgiving in Victoria, and that it will only be recommended by the politicians, and accepted by the electors, when it is accompanied by such safeguards as will ensure to the people that what they are giving away with one hand they will get back with the other.

Mr. HIGGINS:
They are accepting it against their convictions!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
I have always had the feeling throughout the meetings of the Convention, that the going back to precedents, not of ancient history, but even of modern times, has been so much waste of time. Why go to America and have the story told to us of the building up of the constitution there, and the causes which led to the establishment of a senate upon the basis of equal state rights, and the story of the war and slavery, when we have had in the past few weeks the story of the conduct of the Senate in refusing to ratify the arbitration treaty with the mother country, undoubtedly against the popular will of the citizens of the United States. Go to Germany, America, or Switzerland and you are not going to a country where the battle-cry of reform for years and years past has been in the direction of placing greater or equal powers in the hands of the people themselves.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Neither of those countries possesses our form of responsible government!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
Hon. members know that those constitutions are not what they would be if made by the will of the people to-day. The difficulty in the case of these other countries, America especially, is that the people have to live under the constitution, and make the best of it, knowing that it is impossible for them, by the machinery in their power, to amend it. I want now to leave that aspect of the case, and in the calmest and most reasonable fashion possible to invite those who think that the discussion is one worthy of being continued in the interests of further light to those who are against the bill as it stands, to answer me on one or two points. In the first place why do the states desire equal representation? Are there any particular rights of the states as such involved which can only be safeguarded by granting this concession in the constitution? Are there questions of so inseparably a state character that they cannot safely be left to the opinions and the will of a majority of the people of Australia? And, more than that, is this federation to be merely a union of the states of Australia according to artificial geographical lines and boundaries, or is it to be that greater union which will bind the hearts of the people together? If we are going to accomplish, as I hope we are, the greater union of the people, why limit and confine the people by a power of veto vested in the states for some purposes which it is very difficult to justify? I will take the three great purposes under clause 52 of this bill for which the commonwealth is to be established—for taxation, for defence, and, what is to my mind one of the greatest of all purposes, the regulation of the inflow of population so as to secure a white Australia.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
The hon. gentleman has just mentioned a state right. Queensland, for instance, could not possibly come in unless you had regard to her sugar plantations!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
We will take the first of these three questions—the question of raising revenue for the maintenance of the machinery of government, and for the defence of the commonwealth. Is that a state question? Is not the very incidence of taxation a question which affects, not the states as such, but the individual units that compose the nation? We do not propose by this bill that we should go to the states and levy a contribution from each state as such; but we propose to give to the commonwealth parliament or government the power of levying its taxation directly upon the subject people.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Then it is a state question. If you have a modified tariff, Tasmania will not have enough revenue!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
My hon. friend imagines this to be a state question. He will find that the taxes will be collected, not from the state of Tasmania, not from the state of New South Wales, not from the state of Victoria, but from the individual citizens of the commonwealth.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Quite right; but it is a state question for all that!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
And the citizens of Tasmania will pay the same tax as the citizens of New South Wales will pay.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Quite so!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
That is to say, so, far as taxation is concerned and the force of its incidence, the Tasmanian will pay just as much as the New South Welshman. Then I ask, what necessity is there to secure the Tasmanian by giving him in one chamber six or seven times the voting influence of the person who is equally taxed with himself-the New South Welshman? That is the aspect of the case as it presents itself to the taxpayers of this colony.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Put the power, not in one chamber, but in the two chambers-in the machine?

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
The power of veto?

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Put it in the whole machine-not in one part of it!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
We have felt it in this colony. We know that the power of veto is the power which, when exercised, will mould your laws.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Is the man who puts on the

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
But the brake cannot be put on, the train cannot be put on, the whole machine cannot work, in this case, without the concurrence of the two houses.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Hear, hear!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
So that if one house refuses to concur the machine will not go; and if by any chance an alteration is made, before you can take the brake off the train when once it is put on, according to the constitution my hon. friend desires, you have to get the concurrence of the second chamber. Their power of veto comes in which prevents you from reforming and amending your laws. You may get a tariff at the beginning of federation. which may meet the necessities of the first few years.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
If you do not—if you do not have a tariff which gives us enough revenue to keep us solvent—Tasmania has a right to the veto!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
In this question, right through the whole proposal as to the tariff and the imposition of taxation, the state is to have the right of veto at all times, and that right of veto is tantamount to the power of legislation, because the state will say, "You stand where you are."

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
What is the right of veto if we have two senators for Tasmania?

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
If two senators are all that Tasmania is entitled to on the score of population, then there is no reason to complain. But there is every reason to complain if Tasmania, being only entitled to two senators on the score of population, should be given four, five, and six times the number she is entitled to. There is ground of complaint then on the part of the colonies with the larger populations. I pass away from the question of taxation, which is one affecting the individuals of the commonwealth, and take up the question of defence. The defence of the commonwealth will not be a matter to be borne by the states. We shall not ask Tasmania to make an equal levy with New South Wales for the defence of the commonwealth. The defence of the commonwealth will have to be undertaken by the individual citizens, and the states which have the larger populations will contribute the larger amount of money and the greater number of men, in proportion to their means and their numbers, towards the defence of the commonwealth. Let me take another point: the very important question of immigration. We may find an instruction to the representatives of Victoria and the representatives of New South Wales in the house of representatives to pass a bill to prevent the invasion of undesirable aliens. That bill may pass in the House which represents the public voice of Australia. In the senate it may be possible for the representatives of the three small states, who do not represent more than practically a third or a fourth of the population of Australia, to exercise the power of veto. What happens? By the exercise of the power of veto they throw open the port of Melbourne and the port of Sydney to the influx of men who may degrade our manhood and our womanhood, and reduce the population to a lower level than we have ever known before. I mention these things as possible. The difficulties felt in the more populous centres may not be felt in those portions of Australasia where the state has not presented those attractions which would lead these undesirable immigrants to flock to their shores. I think my hon. friend from Tasmania, Mr. Dobson, will admit that the state from which he comes has not felt to the same extent as Victoria, or Queensland, or New South Wales the evils attending the influx of immigrants of a degrading character.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

I am not talking of the evils. I say that immigration is a state right, which wants protection in the senate, in the interests of Queensland and of every other colony.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

If we could only limit state rights to the exercise of the power of veto in regard to laws affecting state interests, well and good; but the misfortune of it is that state rights go further than that. It is proposed that there shall be a power on the part of the smaller states to impose on the large states, which hold a different view, legislation, taxation, and, practically, administration, which is against the will and wishes of a majority of the people.

Mr. WISE:

The hon. member wants to take power to impose the will of the big states upon them!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

My hon. friend, Mr. Wise, who, unfortunately, has not had an opportunity of being present at the debates in our Parliament, does not know the strength of the feeling there upon this question. The hon. member thinks very strongly with myself, I know, that there should be an adequate safety-valve in the constitution, so that the will of a majority of the people, when found to be in conflict with the will of the state representatives, shall have some opportunity of finding expression upon the statutebook. But we have no warrant for assuming that any provision of that character will be acceptable to this Convention.

The amendments suggested by the various colonies go to show the trend of the feeling which will probably guide delegates here, and we have, I fear, very little reason to hope that there will be proposed amendments of such a character as will allow those of us who are more anxious to see a constitution passed into law than are some of those who are opposing it in the various parliaments, to see our wish accomplished. I think there is very little hope of the carrying of any of those amendments which the hon. and learned member and myself desire. I was one of those who, in Adelaide, indicated that they were prepared to vote for equal representation in the senate, providing there were a power of dissolution of the senate, and, with it, the power of referring to the people themselves those questions—mainly questions of social reform, questions such as that of immigration, questions which are likely to provoke a deadlock between the senate and the house of representatives. I have not changed my views upon that point. I know that, to be logical, I should at all times be found voting with the hon. member, Mr. Higgins. I do not intend to depart from the view I expressed in Adelaide until a safety-valve is provided. I intend at all times to vote for that which will operate in that direction, namely, the proportional representation of the people in both chambers. If, in any scheme which is proposed, either of the suggestions thrown out by me in Adelaide—one of them was proposed by my hon. friend, Mr. Wise, himself—are contained, I shall be willing to accept, upon that condition, equal representation. But to say that you trust a minority of the people in a state to deal out rough-and-ready justice in Australia, with this one proviso that when it is found that the will of a minority in the senate is thwarting the will of a majority of the people, the minority should give way, would be a most dangerous provision for us to ingraft, upon the constitution. It would be imposing on the people of the commonwealth under a hard-and-fast rule, the provision that there shall be an overwhelming majority, of the manhood of Australia in favour of a certain reform, and, at the same time, having a constitution of such an unbending character that the reform cannot be accomplished. We know sufficient of the tendency of our race to know that they will not brook the withholding of reforms by reason of any rigidity in the constitution. We have always expressed our admiration for the British Constitution because it has been of such a character that it has adapted itself at all times to the circumstances of the people and to their growing aspirations. The amendments of one branch of the legislature in this colony have been largely fashioned as they have been simply because we have learned to regard with veneration and esteem that model, upon which our own constitution is founded—the British Constitution. There was, and there is, I admit, a desire here and it is not absent from the Convention itself—to have a constitution so framed that there will be power to bend, and not of necessity to break—so framed that there will at all times be an opportunity for the will of the people to find expression upon the statute-book. Now, I leave it to those who are in favour of the bill as it now stands to answer some of the objections which have appealed to the people of this colony; the objection, for instance, that state rights are not so radically involved in this bill as to necessitate the people's rights being over-ridden; the objection that the rule of the people by the states is not such an ultimate necessity as to render it inevitable that the rule of the people should give way at all times. To answer these objections is the task which we have set to ourselves in this colony, and those members of this Convention who are in favour of the accomplishment of federation must answer them in a direction which will carry conviction to the minds of our people. I would say, in conclusion, that so far as the amendments in this bill, which have emanated from our local Parliament, are concerned, I regret to hear my hon. colleague, Mr. Wise, intimate that they are amendments of the enemies of the bill.

Mr. WISE:

I referred to the amendments of the Legislative Council; I did not refer to the amendments of the Legislative Assembly!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

I regret to hear that stated, because the amendments of the Legislative Council were practically word for word the amendments of the Legislative Assembly.

Mr. WISE:

Then I will say the same thing of the amendments of the Legislative Assembly!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

A charge of that character hurled forth in this colony is calculated not to allay those feelings of excitement and animosity which have been raised, but to call forth bitterness in the accomplishment of a purpose in which the greatest amount of tact and good judgment is necessary. I sat here in this Chamber during the whole course of the debates upon this bill, and I can tell hon. members that while many of the speeches were extravagant, when we came down to the question of amendments, the extravagance disappeared, and we had expressed in a concrete form the reasonable demands of those who represented the people of this colony. If we do not approach the consideration of those reasonable demands in a reasonable way, we are not smoothing the way of federation, but we are making it more difficult of accomplishment. I hope that the utmost generosity will be extended to the consideration of the suggested amendments, or if we have not the utmost generosity extended, I hope that the fullest amount of justice will be conceded to those who, in the performance of a parliamentary duty, have made those suggestions to the Convention. I would only like to add this: that I believe that the amendments will be considered in that spirit. I hope that in the course of the debates there will be a curbing of any expression of a desire not to accept them, or to exhibit impatience concerning them, because they are the suggestions of a minority. I hope that there will be some regard for the difficulties which the minority have had to face, and that every assistance will be afforded by the use of those arguments which have carried conviction so many times to the minds of a majority of the members of this Convention.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia):[5]

From the trend of the arguments up to the present of those who oppose the principle of equal representation, I think I am justified in concluding that the chief ground of their attack is from the point of pure principle and logic; in fact they apply the syllogistic method to the question of equal representation. According to the trend of the argument of Mr. Higgins, equal representation is unjust in principle, and dangerous in its tendency in a country where there are various states having a ratio of population varying from one to three five, or six. I would remind hon. members that the moment you begin to apply logic to politics, the moment you attempt to test constitutional or economic axioms or principles by the syllogistic method, you strike at the underlying and essential conditions of political, organisations and the relations of communities. Apply such a test to that combination of compromises and contradictions called the British Constitution. There is not a single principle, power, or tenet contained in or suggested by that combination of contradictions known as the British Constitution that can stand the strictly logical test. Take the power of the prerogative of the Crown. To push it to the extent to which it is recognised would be inimical to popular liberty. The power of the Lords, the necessary corollary of their recognition as an estate, cannot be justified, because it would be inconsistent with the principle of popular supremacy. That very principle of popular supremacy, embodied in the Commons, cannot be pushed to its extreme limit, because to do so would be to sweep out of the constitution as not merely useless but obstructive to the growth and play of popular power, the other estates of the realm. There is not a single principle, tenet, or power in the literature of constitutional relations that, considered merely apart from its objects and application, can survive analysis or be justified on grounds of abstract right. Nor, sir, is there a single constitutional principle that can be success

Mr. HIGGINS:

No; I said that the true principle was consolidation for certain purposes and severance for other purposes!

Mr. GLYNN:

I differ from the hon. member. I say it is a mixed principle in its organisation and a unification in its powers. In its essence it is a consolidation for all purposes. But, notwithstanding that admission, taking a strictly consistent position, I still say co-equal representation of the states is justified as a matter of expediency and common-sense. The position I take, as a matter of principle, is this: that equal representation is justified in the case of a confederation. It is not at all justified in the case of a consolidation, but it is justifiable in the case of a federation, which is a consolidation having superimposed upon it the check of an upper house with equal representation. Why? Because you cannot bring about a large consolidation of peoples, all diverse in character, prejudices, and institutions, or a consolidation applicable to a very large geographical area so as to preserve interests that have local colour. The day of small states has gone by. Small states succeeded in the old world; but we know that states which are to succeed must be large ones, and, if we are to become an important nation, dominating affairs in the east, we must become a large state. The only states which can succeed according to the analogy of Europe are large states. For instance, there is the power of Russia, which is colossal, and overshadows the higher civilisations of the smaller political organisations on the western side of Europe. What does Mr. Seeley tell us? He points out that the ideal principle, the principle of the future, is extension, is that the larger states must dominate. He says the small states only succeeded when they were small states among small states. Athens fell as soon as Macedonia arose. We are endeavouring to build up a large state, a strong state, which will have by its magnitude some power to offer against possible aggression from the young giants in the north and the east—from Japan, which, in 1906, will have an addition to its navy measured by an expenditure of £24,000,000. Then we have China, which has been slumbering for 2,000 years, but which, breaking the cake of its inertia, is now awakening to activity. That is a power which must become enormous as soon as the industries of the west are applied to it. We have both, these powers overshadowing us. We are in such a position that we must have a large state, and the only organisation possible is the federal organisation, which, as far as legislation is concerned, is unification. But, inasmuch as consolidation may result in inequality so far as local interests are concerned, we must provide some safeguard against their neglect. That has been shown in the case of Ireland. Inasmuch as she has interests with a certain local colour, although the lines of cleavage are not finely drawn, her interests have been neglected. It is, therefore, necessary to have this anomalous principle of; equal representation in an upper house somewhat emasculated in its powers.

Mr. HIGGINS:

If there were a federation of England, Scotland, and Ireland, you would not need to have equal representation there!

Mr. GLYNN:
I say that history has shown us that we ought to have had equal representation in that case. It is the only safeguard against local interests being neglected owing to the enormous disparity of local representation in the popular house.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Ought not the majority to rule under any constitution?

Mr. GLYNN:
Must not the majority rule in the popular house? Do you mean to say that the British Constitution could ever be worked unless on that understanding? Do you mean to tell me that if the theoretical power of absolutely vetoing legislation by the House of Lords was ever exercised it would not destroy popular liberty, and will the hon. member say that there is the least danger of that? The Lords must go down as soon as there is are emphatic protest made by the Commons. The very same thing will occur here; it has occurred in America. The popular voice will eventually be heard, and my hon. friend's fears are utterly unsubstantial as to the possible coercion by the smaller states of the states which ought to dominate on the principle of gradual proportional representation. I will give out in one sentence what I take to be the distinction as regards this larger consolidation with the anomalous principle of equal representation in one house. Speaking generally, in an ordinary consolidation the principle of proportional representation is departed from to an extent necessitated by the existence of interests not necessarily dependent on population, and the greater the geographical area, and the more different the conditions of the people covered by a consolidation, the greater is the expediency, if not the necessity, for a departure from the principle of representation in proportion to population. Again, I would tell the hon. member that we are asked to go into a partnership, and we can dictate our own terms with states that have enjoyed this freedom up to the present.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
"Dictate your own terms" is rather an unfortunate expression!

Mr. GLYNN:
Perhaps the right hon. member is perfectly right; one is too emphatic sometimes. This fact is undoubtedly before us: We are asked to go into a partnership, and these are the terms on which we will go in.

Mr. HIGGINS:
-

Mr. GLYNN:
Does not the hon. member know that I voted with him when he was in a minority of three?

Mr. HIGGINS:
Not on this point, though!

Mr. GLYNN:
I know that the hon. member takes a very strong view on this point. States like ours, which are asked to go into a federation, are very largely imbued with the confederal idea, chimerical though it may be, as regards the effect a it, if fixed in the federation; that is, they are very largely imbued with the principle or the notion of state rights and will not come in under any other conditions. The hon. member referred, I think, to the case of the confederation of Germany, and be sought to discount the argument which had been urged in furtherance of the principle of equal representation by pointing to the analogy of Germany, where equal representation was not granted. From the point of view of historical prejudice, I may say that in Germany they have had proportional representation in the second house even from 1815.

Mr. HIGGINS:
There was no federation until 1870!

Mr. GLYNN:
There was an advanced form of confederation. The arrangement brought about by the Peace of Vienna, although it was called a confederation, was not, in the strict sense of the word, a confederation, such as the confederation which was formed in America in 1777. The arrangement amongst the North German states from 1815 to 1867 was a sort of federation, not as perfect as the one into which they were forced in 1871, but, nevertheless, one in which there was unequal representation in the upper house, or, as we call it, the principle of proportional representation. In 1867 we had the North German Confederation started on a new basis, and still they kept up the principle of giving Prussia seventeen members against a smaller number for Bavaria, and they grouped several of the other states in the Federal Council, which was one of the bodies of the parliament of Confederation of North Germany. Concurrent with that parliament there was the customs union of Germany, which dealt very largely with some of the financial matters which we are delegating to our parliament. This union was composed of two houses; there were the Federal Council and the Parliament of the customs union. In the Federal Council there was the principle of unequal representation kept up, or, as we call it, proportional representation. When Germany did come to a real federation in 1871, the historic, prejudices made for proportional representation in the upper house, rather than against it. Therefore, any analogy from that point of view, at all events, is not applicable to the case before us. From the point of view of the dangers of granting equal representation, these dangers have never risen, with the exception of the imaginary case of slavery and the Civil War. There is no case in the whole compass of American history which the hon. member can cite, where, through the granting of equal representation, there has been pressure brought to bear on the larger states by the smaller states.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Would there be danger in granting proportional representation?

Mr. GLYNN:

Undoubtedly I think there would be, because you would always have in the lower house a majority composed principally of large states, and therefore you would have the possibility of special interests of particular localities, affected to some extent by a local colour being neglected or overshadowed. Assuming that there is not much danger on either side, I submit that history has shown us that you have not had oppression from the principle of equal representation, but you have had neglect through the absence of it.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Would you say that the people of Bourke ought to have the same voice as the people of Sydney?

Mr. GLYNN:

The hon. member again falls back on the logical basis for the justification of his position.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I must fall back on good logic as against bad logic!

Mr. GLYNN:

Yes, when your outworks are carried. We cannot apply strictly mathematical tests in politics. We are not dealing with the symbols of mathematics.

---

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Nor with the abstract entities of states!

Mr. GLYNN:

I quite agree with the hon. and learned member. I never took the position which has been assumed by many of the advocates of equal representation of sticking up this imaginary state entity. Where is the state entity? There are state interests which merge into the consolidation interests; but where in a federation are these so-called state entities? They do not exist except on paper. If you look at the thirty-seven matters delegated in this bill to the federal parliament, there is no single one which can be put down as a confederal matter; but there are very many of them which have very large local colourings or tendencies being of more importance, but not of exclusive importance, in one state than in another.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The hon. member is coming round to our side!

Mr. GLYNN:
The hon. member need not have the slightest fear of my coming round. I took this stand at the beginning, and I take it now. I am endeavouring, if lie will pardon the paradox, by logic to show that logic does not apply. America has further shown us that they work under this principle both houses on a consolidation basis. Do we not know from Foster that up to 1828 the old confederal idea was very potent in America, that when the so-called tariff of abominations was introduced in 1828, the Senate absolutely stated that they opposed that tariff because their states told them that they must do so, as they were delegates, but that their convictions would have led them to the opposite opinion? Since then we know they have gone in for the consolidation idea, and that small states vote with large states, and so on. There is a general mixture with the lines not taking their directions according to the large or the small states.

Mr. HIGGINS:
They vote now!

Mr. GLYNN:
And that is what will occur here!

An Hon. MEMBER:
And the better for the large states!

Mr. GLYNN:
The hon. member has referred to some cases of disparity. I will give some cases of disparity of representation. I will tell the hon. member that the principle of proportional representation is not even approximately applied in these consolidations. Take, for instance, the German Empire. Out of fifty-eight members there are seventeen members for Prussia. On a strict population basis Prussia ought to have thirty-six members.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That shows that the lion does not absolutely swallow the lamb!

Mr. GLYNN:
We will leave the swallowing alone at present, as I am rather engaged in giving out. Prussia has one representative in the lower house for 1,800,000 of its population, while Schaumburg-Lippe has one representative for 37,000 of its population. There, again, the consolidation idea is not with mathematical accuracy applied.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I never urged that it should be!

Mr. GLYNN:
To show how poor this German analogy is—and I think it has been suggested by the hon. and learned member, Mr. SYMON, that Prussia practically forced in the smaller states—what do you find in the preamble to the German federation? Why, the smaller states are not even mentioned. They talk about an intended partnership between certain states, and they do not raise them even to the dignity of mentioning that they are parties to the Constitution. This is the preamble to the Constitution:

The kings of Prussia, Bavaria, Wurtemburg, the grand dukes of Baden and Hesse conclude an eternal alliance for the protection of the territory of the confederation, as well as for the promotion and welfare of the German people.

They do not even mention the smaller states. Further, I may state, to show there is no application of the analogy to that case, that in Prussia they vote by delegations. Though she has seventeen representatives, they vote in a block, though I think all votes count, which discounts the effect of their higher representation. Again, in a matter where a particular delegation is not directly interested, that delegation cannot vote. Therefore, we see with what safeguards the principle of proportional representation is surrounded in the second house. What we say is: "Go one better than that; give the principle of equal representation in the second house, and you will have a perfect safeguard to the application of the principle of population in the lower house," because, with communities like these, growing to enormous proportions hereafter, you may otherwise have the Smaller states completely overshadowed by the larger states.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Mr. GLYNN:
Of course, that points to the domination of Prussia—that Prussia forced them in, and said, "We are a military power; we are the people who beat Austria, and who carried to a successful conclusion the war against France." Prussia absolutely dictated the terms upon which the smaller states should come in, those smaller states having, in 1867, refused to come in. Again, as regards Prussia, it occurs to my mind that Prussia's larger proportion of representation is partly the result of an aggregation of states. Prussia has been added to by several states being attached to her. The very fact that Prussia and some of the larger states appear in the preamble, and that some of the smaller states are excluded altogether; the very fact that Prussia at the time was the successful power, and that the smaller states came in, having in the past refused to come in—the very fact that the Prussian delegation has the final voice whenever there was a tie, shows that Prussia intended to, and must rule. It also shows that the military despotism of Prussia dictated the terms of this constitution. With regard to Switzerland, we have in Switzerland, Berne, with a population of 536,000; Zug, with a population of 23,000; and Uri, with a population of 17,284—each of which have only two members. Where is the population basis there? Sir John Downer has excellently pointed out what occurred in America—that where they had the opportunity of amending the constitution they did not amend it. I would go further and say that the very revolting states made equal representation in the second house the basis of their proposals. The very states alleged to be over-swayed by this principle said: "We will establish a new constitution and put that principle in it."

Mr. HIGGINS:

Mr. GLYNN:

Do you mean to tell me, than in the face of substantial dangers, which resulted in a revolution, in this desperate war-do you mean to tell me that, simply for the sake of a paper principle, or consistency with precedent, they would keep up this dangerous principle of equal representation in the Upper House if they had not a substantial advantage? Men are not fools; they are not theorists. Soldiers, especially, are not men who are not likely to be called theorists. If they have to contend for anything at all, it is for the dogmatism of practical politicians. The federated states of America went one step further than that, because they gave the power of amending money bills to the dangerous house—a power which I would not give them. Every clause of the constitution, I believe, has been recast on the principle of allowing equal powers to the upper and lower houses; therefore there cannot be much danger in this bogey of the upper house. I have trespassed upon the patience of the Convention in favour of what is probably a foregone conclusion. I have done so, because, as Mr. Carruthers suggested, it is well to show that the principle of equality can be supported by something more than the vote of a majority; that its strength lies not in historic prejudices and numbers alone, but as well in considerations of expediency.

[P.282] starts here
and reason; that it has the recommendation of precedent and experience, of theoretical recognition and practical success; that it is the essential difference of the federal ideal a concession to the sense of nationality and the fear of subordination; and that without it you have unification under conditions that ensure its failure, or federation without an element that is a guarantee of its success. You will never get states in whom the sense and pride of independence is strong to enter without the pressure of some great emergency into a union that must extinguish their individualities. No vague consideration of material benefits can stand for an hour against the pride of separate life; can outweigh the love of personal identity, the prestige of nationality, that prejudice which is the inspiration of all patriotism, and to which what is best in a nation's records is so largely due. The recognition of this feeling is a prime condition of our union, and can be made without the least substantial danger to the real interests of the larger states.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[5.29]:

I do not think it would be a wise thing to obtain any division on this clause to-night. The discussion which has taken place since we sat in Adelaide has been so keen that the Convention owes it, in reason to those who have expressed their opinions in one direction or another, to deal with this matter in a deliberate way. Therefore, I would propose that we report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

RETURN.

The Hon. J.N. BRUNKER laid upon the table a return-made on motion by the hon. and learned member, Dr. Quick - showing the population and number of electors in each electoral district for the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales.

Ordered: That the document be printed.

Personal Explanation - Correction of Speeches - Commonwealth of Australia Bill - Papers.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[10.31]:

I should like to make a short personal explanation. I find that in this morning's newspapers there are several statements attributed to me which I did not make yesterday, and the like of which I did not make, and I feel it of importance that I should put myself right at this early stage of our proceedings. For instance, I am reported as having opened my speech by saying that I advocated proportional representation from the same motive as actuated the Legislative Council of New South Wales. Of course that gives point to an interjection of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, that the Legislative Council of New South Wales voted for the proportional representation with a view to destroy federation. I think hon. members will recognise that I did not say what is attributed to me in this connection, nor anything like it. Of course I am referring now to the reports of speeches appearing in the newspapers, not to what appears in the leaders or in the crisp and clever articles giving an account of our proceedings. To them I make no objection, because I think that we are only fair game for criticism. I am also referred to as having said that the southern states of America revolted because of equal representation. I did not say that, or anything like it, though attributing such remarks to me gives point to the statement of Mr. Glynn as to why the states of the south adopted equal representation. I refer to these matters, because I feel that, as the public only get information of what takes place here through the newspapers, in my own interest, and in the interests of other members of the Convention, such grave misstatements-

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I submit that the hon. member is now going considerably beyond a personal explanation!

Mr. HIGGINS:

Well, I have said all that I want to say!

The PRESIDENT:

I allowed the representative of Victoria the same latitude that I allowed on a previous occasion to another hon. member; but I would invite hon.
members to consider whether personal explanations ought not to be confined to matters which occur in this House, and that misrepresentations and mistakes in the press open rather too fertile a source of discussion.

CORRECTION OF SPEECHES.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[10.33]:

I should like to draw attention to the fact that no proofs of the speeches made by me has ever reached me. Certainly in the report of debates which has been issued there is no room to make corrections, unless we tear out the pages or have a double set. It seems to me that the course of sending proofs for correction hitherto adopted would be a very desirable one to continue, otherwise I expect that no corrections will be made.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales)[10.34]:

I should like to say with regard to the official report of speeches that the practice in this colony has always been to issue a proof copy of the Debates to members. If anything wrong is found in this proof copy the member complaining has the right to go to the Principal Shorthand-writer and have it rectified. With our Hansard staff we have never adopted the practice of submitting proofs of speeches to members for the purpose of correction. If any inaccuracy is found in the proof copy of the Debates now issued the member complaining can have it rectified by directing the attention of the Principal Shorthandwriter to the matter.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[10.35]:

Probably the practice to which the hon. member, Sir Joseph Abbott, refers has arisen from the fact that the Hansard reporting in this colony is positively admirable.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

There were a good many errors in my speech!

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR:

The right hon. member sits right under the Hansard gallery!

Mr. SYMON:

Yes; the right hon. gentleman ought to come over to this side of the chamber. I only wish to pay my slight tribute to the fact that the official report here approaches as near perfection as a work of that kind can do.

The PRESIDENT:

I have no doubt that we all desire that in connection with an important gathering such as this every facility should be offered to representatives for the correction of their speeches, and no doubt arrangements will be made for the acceptance of any corrections which hon. members desire to make.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee:

Clause 9 (The Senate).
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and Assembly of New South Wales:

Paragraph 1. Omit "six senators for each state, and each senator shall have one vote." Insert "members representing the states in proportion to their population. But no state shall have less than three senators. The senate shall consist of not less than forty members."

Question-That the words "six senators for each state" be omitted-again proposed.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[10.36]:

I have no doubt that if the amendment were immediately put to the vote it would be rejected. At the same time I think that it involves, without doubt, the most important question that we have to consider, and I agree with the representative of New South Wales, Mr. Carruthers, in deprecating anything in the shape of undue haste. The financial question in its details may be more troublesome, but it does not involve so great a principle as is involved in the amendment. Further, whilst it has been said that we ought to treat the amendments of the various legislatures with great respect, this amendment, by reason of its origin, is entitled to the very greatest respect. It is presented to us with the endorsement of an overwhelming majority-I might almost say that it was practically carried unanimously-of the popular assembly of New South Wales, a body which has the right to claim to represent more than 1,250,000 of the people of Australia, which is more than one-third of the number of people who will be associated in the federation if our present proposals are carried out. I think our thanks are due to the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, for the lucidity, the courage, and the excellent temper with which he presented his aspect of the case to a somewhat adverse house, and I think also that we should not lose sight of the fact that not only has an amendment of this sort found practically unanimous support in the Assembly of New South Wales; but it has received very substantial endorsement at the hands of a considerable proportion, though not a majority, of the Assembly of Victoria. Under these circumstances it seems to me that it is important, if we are to negative the amendment-as I hope we shall-that we should at the same time give good reasons for doing so, reasons such as are likely to be accepted by the people of the larger states, who, of course, are vitally interested in the amendment proposed. In this connection I would not hesitate to recollect that my first duty is not simply, to the state which I have the honor to represent, but to the nation which is to be. I think that on a previous occasion some of us, honestly differing from the views of our colleagues, gave proof that we were prepared to separate ourselves from our colleagues in the representation of a particular state to secure what we believed to be the interests of Australia at large. If the occasion arose for similar action here we should not be found to hesitate to adopt it. I might say, incidentally, that I intend to adhere to the vote which I gave in connection with the limitation of the financial powers of the senate. At the same time, I shall not be found recording my vote in favour of the amendment which is now proposed. I am addressing myself more particularly to the amendment suggested by the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, which is to dispense with the equality of representation of the different states in the senate and to provide for the recognition of extra population by increased representation. I am much concerned with justifying myself in this connection as regards the vote which I intend to give; and I propose to state a few of the reasons for the faith which is in me and which impels me in the action I take to-day. Firstly, I put it that no federation of the larger and smaller states is possible within a measurable distance unless you provide for equal representation of all in the senate. There is no room for doubt upon that point. I shall be told-in fact we have been told-by my friend, Mr. Higgins, that that is not a logical reason for opposing his amendment.

Mr. SYMON:

It is an effective reason!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

On a variety of occasions I have heard very excellent reasons given for pursuing what will be an acceptable course in the interests of the people rather than proceeding upon purely scientific and logical lines. No more illustrious example has been given than was afforded lately by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain in the House of Commons when recommending for acceptance that magnificent reform, the Workman's Compensation Bill. When taunted with not pushing the principle to its logical conclusion in its extension to all sorts and conditions of men, he replied that it was his duty to propose that which was practicable under the circumstances, and not to risk the direct defeat of the reform which he was then attempting to effect, and which he was then able to carry out. Subsequent proceedings have justified his most sanguine expectations. He contended that he ought not to endanger that great reform by striving after something which he knew he could not carry. What is the position here? Is there one representative who seriously believes that if the larger states be given, not only proportional representation according to their population in the national assembly, the house of representatives, but increased numerical representation in the senate, federation will or can be accepted at the present moment, or at any near date by the smaller states? Surely nothing of the sort can be expected. We have met from time to time for the purpose of devising a scheme that will be acceptable to all. How do you meet here to-day? We have equal representation in point of numbers. How are we ever to meet on dissimilar terms?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

We are here to make a bargain!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

When has it been seriously proposed that we should meet otherwise than we do now? I have read with a great deal of interest the utterances of various distinguished representatives when before their constituents-and it was undoubtedly an advantage that they had an opportunity to consult the people on the matter-and I do not recollect that by any of them, take the head of the Government of New South Wales, for example-I may be wrong-it was put that not only should the larger states have increased representation in the house of representatives, according to their population, but that they should have it also in the senate. I think not. I think also as regards my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, that he did not contend for any such position. Certainly the point was not very seriously or strenuously argued for at the last meeting of the Convention. I do not mind admitting to hon. representatives that I practically feel myself pledged by my declarations on this matter of the gravest principle, upon which I consider we have a right to expect a distinct pledge, to vote against an amendment of this sort and for equality of representation of the states in the senate. I feel that there is no reason for the shadow of a doubt that if this amendment be carried, we shall put back federation for years and years, and that is a responsibility I am not willing to undertake. I venture to think I should be false to my trust and undertaking, false to the pledges which I gave, false to my profession of interest in the cause of Australian union, if I were to do so. But I go a little further, and say that this is not a question of expediency - not simply a question as to what it is desirable to do for the purpose of securing the accomplishment of federation at an early date. Our position can be justified on higher ground. I take it that in a system of unification the states as such have no voice. In provincialism there is no provision for the representation of the nation; but in a federation a facile means is and ought to be provided, whereby under a system of two chambers, both voices ought to be heard - the voice of the nation and the voice of the states as different constituent entities; and no such right and power of audience, it seems to me, can be given effectually to the states unless you provide for their equal representation in the senate. Personally, I have no fear of the permanent clashing of state interests on important national questions—no fear at all. At the same time, I am reminded of the position which was illustrated by the remark made by the brave captain of a ship when the vessel was labouring in a heavy sea off a lee shore. He was asked, "Have you any fear?" He said, "I have no fear; but there is some danger." Now, the reverse is the case with reference to the clashing of state interests on national questions. To my mind, there is no danger; but there is a good deal of fear. We have to allay this fear on the part of the small states before we can induce them to enter the federation. We can do that in a variety of ways; but the greatest means of all, and that to which most importance is attached, is that of equal representation in the senate. I will be no party whatever to the encouragement of a provision which will enable the states to permanently override the wishes of the people of Australia, as a whole, on great national questions. And, even with equal representation, it seems to me that you will be unable to get away from this position that the representatives of the great states, the most populous states, in the senate, though only, equal in number, if they faithfully represent the views of their constituencies, will and must speak with greater authority on account of the larger section of the community which they represent.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

They will not vote with the greater authority, though!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

They will not have a greater vote, but I am inclined to think that in whatever deliberative assembly you provide for, there will be a disposition on the part of each section of it to act in the interests of all.

Mr. SYMON:

They will exercise their individual judgment!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

And if the senators, say of South Australia, feel that the senators of New South Wales are truly voicing the views of the people of New South Wales in the senate in a matter of national concern I cannot help thinking they will, aye, and that they ought to, regard the expression of the opinion of such a great section of the people in a matter of Australian interest with a degree of authority which—though of course I do not suggest that they should subordinate their deliberate private judgment—they would not attach to, and could not attach to, the representatives of a smaller community. I put it also, therefore, that whilst senators from the larger colonies must speak with a greater weight on account of the greater constituency which they represent, if they faithfully represent it, that that is a sufficient reason why the greater states should be satisfied with their position in the senate, and with the position also that in the national house, the house of representatives, the representation of the people according to their population will be provided for. I do trust there will be an endeavour on the part of the representatives of both the large and the small states to agree in this. I have tried so far as I could to weigh the matter well, trying, as we are all trying, to come to the conclusion as to what is fair in the interests of all-in the interests of Australia. I think we have given a very substantial concession to the representatives of the larger states in providing for preventing the interference of the senate in matters of purely financial and administrative concern. I ask the representatives to say that they will be satisfied with a provision of that description. The subject of this clashing I think can be further regulated by the limitation of the jurisdiction of the federal authority to national matters. Let us scrutinise as closely as we can the various powers proposed to be conferred on the federal authority. Let none be given in which the will of the states as states ought to be supreme, but let everything be confided which can be better managed on behalf of all by one central authority than by the various provincial governments. Let us make the franchise for both houses as broad as possible; let us provide if we can for a uniform franchise. Just as you broaden the franchise, in the same degree that you effect uniformity, so you lessen the probabilities of any clashing between house and senate; because they will represent, practically, the same constituencies. Here I would like to say that I favour a proposition which will place it within the power of the federal authority to dissolve the senate as well as the house of representatives. I know that that will not necessarily be a solution for deadlocks. I do not think that we will often require a solution for deadlocks if you practically make the constituencies of the two houses alike in character. That will prevent deadlocks from arising. I cannot contemplate the probability-it might be possible-in national questions of some matter of considerable difference arising between a small state and a large one; but I think, if it is a matter of national concern, and properly confided to the federal authority, that a solution will be worked out under a parliament constituted as I have suggested, I merely indicate my intention to support any proposal for the power of dissolution of the senate which may recommend itself to me for the purpose of solving the question, which alone it can solve, as to whether the senate is in touch with its constituency; whether, as a matter of fact, it represents the people whom it is intended to represent. Under these circumstances I shall be found recording my vote against the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Higgins. Something has been said about the unpopularity of the American Senate. I have had some opportunities lately of acquiring information on the subject. I think there is no room for doubt that that Senate is not held in the same high esteem that it used to be. As far as I can form an opinion, it arises from two causes, both of which are provided against in our proposed constitution. Here I would like to say that not only have I acquired information at large, but I have had the opportunity of exchanging views with some of the highest constitutional authorities, amongst whom I may mention Mr. Bryce, whose work on the American Constitution has, I am sure, been perused with interest by most hon. members. One of the causes of the unpopularity of the American Senate is this, that it is not elected by the people, that it is chosen simply by the local legislatures. We propose to avoid all this. The result is, so I heard in America, that the local elections turn to a very great extent on the rival claims of senatorial candidates. Wealthy men-and we know full well how many wealthy men find a seat in the senate as a result-do not hesitate to spend large sums in securing the election of candidates to the local legislatures simply for the purpose of securing their vote and influence in connection with senatorial elections, and the result, undoubtedly, has been most disastrous; a mixing up of federal and state concerns in a way which is operating altogether to the disadvantage both of senate and of state. Mr. Bryce, in his work-I think it is in a note-calls attention to a feeling which has been growing in favour of the provision we have adopted. I was, happily, able to supply him with a copy of this bill, and to draw his attention to the provision we propose to make on that subject, and, after the most careful consideration, he was pleased to express his most delighted approval of it as a very substantial amendment, and one which would have been made years and years ago in America had it not been for the very great difficulties which were imposed in the way of any alteration of the constitution.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Does he believe in one electorate?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
I do not know that I directed his attention particularly to that; but he had the advantage of a perusal of the whole bill. I have received a letter from Mr. Bryce on the subject, which has gone to Adelaide, but which I hope to have in my hand shortly, and which I shall be very pleased indeed to place at the disposal of this Convention, and of the public generally, as I am sure that any expression of opinion from an authority of such acknowledged weight will be a substantial addition to our knowledge of the subject. The other objection is that in the American Constitution the provision with reference to the equal representation of states applies not only to the states which were parties to the contract on which the constitution was founded, but also to new states, and the result is that in the admission of smaller states, and in view of the great growth of the population of the older states, the differences are most marked; marked to a degree which we might consider was not within the contemplation of the founders of the constitution. We are profiting by the mistakes of those who have preceded us, and no doubt representatives recollect that in this connection, whereas, as regards existing states, we can count them on our fingers, whilst we secure equal representation to them if they choose to come in, still we take and preserve, as we ought to do, the power and authority in the future of regulating on what terms new states should be admitted. I think in this respect also we are improving on the conditions which obtained in America, and we may be justified in expecting the happiest results. I think if we substantially retain the conditions as regards the senate in the state in which they are, we shall be adopting a plan which we can confidently recommend to the acceptance of the people of the various states. I am more than sanguine, I am positive, that if we adopt the amendment of our hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, however much we respect the motives which induced him to move it, and admire the way in which he has put it, we shall be taking a course which will set back federation for years and years, and I for one am not prepared to take that responsibility.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[11.5]:

I make no apology for following the right hon. gentleman, who is on the same side as myself, and a representative of the same colony as myself. Probably it will be difficult for any of us to speak at all on this subject if we wait until we find some preceding speaker taking the opposite view to that which has just been so ably laid before this Convention. I particularly feel that it is desirable that we should lay before the Convention, and before the people of Australia, our views on this subject, because it is the most vital question involved in the constitution which we are about to frame. It lies at the very root of the business on which we are engaged. The effort that was made to establish unequal representation at the Adelaide session met with little support, My belief is that it will meet with equally little support on this occasion; but, at the same time, I agree with what was so forcibly said by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, yesterday afternoon, that it is our bounden duty to make clear to the people of this country, particularly to those who may honestly differ from us in opinion, the reason for the faith that is in us, and our belief that whilst it may be a matter of expediency, whilst it is indeed an absolute necessity in order to secure federation, and an early federation, it is also founded on what we believe to be right principle and just reason. I hold out no threat or menace of any kind. It would

I think, be idle to do so, particularly after the proclamation made by my Hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, at the banquet at the Town Hall the other night of the banns of a possible union between Victoria and New South Wales. I am quite sure that if that came about all of us would rejoice; we should say, "Bless you, my children." I do not know whether my hon. and learned friend had fixed the federal capital in this twinship of federation to be in Sydney; probably he had arranged that also, but whether that be so or not, I am quite sure that none of the smaller states are likely to disturb the serenity of any such federation if it were brought about unless upon the footing of equal representation in the senate. The Convention upheld during its Adelaide session the provision which is now being called in question, and on that occasion very few of us, indeed scarcely any, debated the question from the point of view that the smaller states take. At the same time I believe it would be a dangerous, and I think an unfortunate thing if we allowed it to be supposed throughout New South Wales and Victoria that we, in order to secure equal representation in the senate, were simply relying on the force of numbers. It would be disastrous. It might create a difficult, and a troublesome feeling to overcome, and for the sake of securing a sympathetic as well as a quick federation, we ought to submit our views, I think, in the fullest possible way. I do not quite agree with my hon. and learned friend, Sir John Downer, that equal representation cannot be defended on logical grounds or on principle.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I never said that it could not!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
It was Mr. Glynn!

Mr. SYMON:
I was under the impression that it was my hon. and learned friend Sir John Downer. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Glynn, I know, put it that there was no such thing as political syllogism, or put it in some such shape as that. It appears to me, and upon that I accept the challenge of my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, that equal representation in the senate, if you are establishing a federation, is founded upon a v

Mr. HIGGINS:
Is equal representation to be passed like the forged note?

Mr. SYMON:
My hon. friend must sometimes have misgivings about the argument he offers. Yesterday there was not that genuine and emphatic ring about his speech-although it was filled with chivalry and good nature-which we remember on the last occasion when the Convention met in Adelaide. I think he has occasional doubt-some misgivings as to the validity of his arguments; but there are times when he thinks them absolutely invulnerable, and then he passes them off upon us. For instance, my hon. friend is carried away by the phrase "one man one vote," and by what he calls the corollary—even the Attorney-General of Victoria smiled yesterday when that was trotted out again—"many men many votes." That is a very fine antithesis. It was served up to us hot in Adelaide; yesterday there was a slight want of freshness about it.

Mr. HIGGINS:
My words were in answer to the misleading phrase, "One man one vote, therefore one state one vote"!

Mr. SYMON:
May I suggest that a truer corollary of one man one vote than that put forward by the hon. member is one woman one vote. I commend that, at any rate, to the consideration of my hon. friend.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Does the hon. gentleman think that will bring about federation?

Mr. SYMON:
It may be that is the kind of union my hon. friend had in view in his great speech at the Town Hall the other night. At any rate, possibly we, coming from the more enlightened colony of South Australia, may be a little prejudiced as to that form of antithesis, but as the matter is one of highly debatable politics, I will say nothing further about it. My hon. friend interjected with regard to one state one vote. I will ask him, Are the states, in his judgment, to be represented in the federation? Ought the states, as states, to be represented in the federation? I am discriminating between the people and the states, and I ask my hon. friend: Does he concede that the states, as states, are to be represented in the federation?

Mr. HIGGINS:
Certainly not!

Mr. SYMON:
Then he is not a federationist at all. My hon. friend—and I do not blame him, I do not reproach him for one moment—is going for a unification.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is a mere phrase, you know!

Mr. SYMON:
It is not a mere phrase—at least, we do not think it is a mere phrase. We think it is a matter of very serious substance.

Mr. WISE:

It obliterates a lot of human nature!

Mr. SYMON:

What my hon. friend is going for is absorption. He is like that celebrated bird, the cassowary, which, it is said,

On the plains of Timbuctoo,
Ate up the missionary,
Body, bones, and hymn-book, too.

That is the position. He wants the larger states to swallow up the less populous. He wants absorption. Again, I say I do not blame him, for I am free to confess that, if it were possible, I should like to see a unified Australia-

The Hon. S. FRASER:

We had that years ago, and we did not like it!

Mr. SYMON:

If it were possible, I have no theoretical objection to it. I say that in order to show I do not reproach or undervalue for one moment the contention of any hon. member or any person throughout the length and breadth of Australia, who believes in unification. All I say is that is not what we are going to do. If we are going to have a federation, and if the states are to be represented, then I say that a man who discriminates between one man one vote and one state one vote, when the states are to be represented, is doing violence to the principles of democracy, which underlie the one proposition as well as the other. Then my hon. friend had a patent way of turning a minority vote into a majority vote, by taking five from the majority, and so converting the minority into a majority of one.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

With the same success which attended Paddy when he increased the size of his blanket!

Mr. SYMON:

I do not know what Paddy did with his blanket.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

He cut a piece off the top and put it on the bottom!

I thought that a most astute way of getting over the majority, and the effect of it. The hon. gentleman also dug up precedent, not with great success, I confess; but my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, objected to precedent being dug up, and I do not wonder at it, if it were put to such base uses—base in the Shakespearian sense—as those to which Mr. Higgins put it yesterday. The way in which he treated the United States Constitution was almost a kind of sacrilege, to say nothing of the Swiss Constitution. He discriminated in the most singular way the Canadian Constitution and the Constitution of the German Empire. The hon. member dealt with the United States—the greatest of all federal constitutions—in a way which, I think, he will find the very greatest difficulty in justifying, either from constitutional writers in America or from American public men of any standing who are willing to express an opinion. We have had an example from the right hon. gentleman who has just sat down, as to what the view in America is with regard to the senate; and an illustration of that kind-of fact produced in that way—is worth pounds of mere declamation or assertion on the subject. But then my hon. friend, in addition to putting these so-called arguments, wound up by some utterly unsupported assertions, and called upon us to give reasons to the contrary. He was like a man who asserts that the moon is made of green cheese, and then calls upon all those who dispute it to prove that it is not. Even at the risk of accepting a position of that kind, it is, I think, my duty to point out to my hon. friend some of the authorities which should satisfy him—at all events, I am sure he will give them the weight of his acute mind—that equal representation in the senate is an essential of true federation, that it is a principle which we cannot ignore, and one which, though it may be departed from, still underlies the basis of any union of that kind. What we are doing is this: we are framing a "federal" constitution. We have no charge or duty to do anything else. The people of Australia may prefer unification.

An Hon. MEMBER:
They do not!

Mr. SYMON:
I say they may prefer it. They may prefer a loose confederation. That is not what they have said.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
They do not want centralisation!

Mr. SYMON:
No, I am sure they do not. But if they want either the one or the other, that is not what they have said in the enabling act, under which they have sent us here, and by the authority of which we sit. We are here to construct a system containing the elements both of unification and of a confederation, if we can. It is to be a union of people and an alliance of states; it is to be federal; it is to be a national government with a federal union; and, in that respect, I wish to say that I do not agree with the proposition that federation is a compromise—not in the sense in which that expression has been used upon this particular question. I say that either equal or unequal representation is not a subject of compromise.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

It is a principle!

Mr. SYMON:

Federation is only a compromise in this sense: it is a compromise between unification and confederation; but, once you reach that, then there is no scope for compromise in the principles which underlie the system which you are seeking to establish. My hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, put it perfectly well, only he put it in the alternative. He said, "Is it to be a union of states, or to bind the hearts of the people." It is to be both—it is to be a union of states and to bind the hearts of the people. That is the answer to my hon. friend's alternative proposition; and it is in order to secure that result that, if we have two chambers, we must have one chamber in which the hearts of the people—to use that phrase—are represented, and another in which the states are represented.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

Suppose inevitable conflict occurs, what then?

Mr. SYMON:

I do not know exactly what conflict my hon. friend is alluding to, but very probably I will have something to say a little further on as to what I think is in his mind. What I want to do now is to refer my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, especially, to one or two authorities, which should satisfy him as to equal representation being a principle in a federation. The learned editor of the latest edition of "Freeman's History of Federal Government" says:

The object both of ancient and modern federation was to provide that both each state as a whole and each citizen individually should have a voice in the federal assembly.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Who says that?

Mr. SYMON:

A most learned gentleman—Mr. Bury. I have no doubt that my hon. friend is aware of that, though he may have forgotten the name.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Can we learn what our federation ought to be from that book?

Mr. SYMON:
Where is my hon. friend going to learn what federation is unless he learns it from authorities on the subject? I can understand that he wishes to evolve some kind of federation out of his own inner consciousness.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

There is no precedent for the view of the hon. member, Mr. Higgins!

Mr. SYMON:

As the hon. member, Sir William Zeal, says, there is no precedent for the view of my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins.

Mr. HIGGINS:

And there is no precedent for equal representation with responsible government!

Mr. SYMON:

Now my hon. friend is putting his finger on a matter of the greatest importance as though it were a new discovery, but which in Adelaide we threshed out as exhaustively as we could, and which my hon. friend, Sir Richard Baker, now in the chair, dealt with thoroughly, probably long before my ach state as a whole and each citizen individually is to have a voice in the federal assembly, you concede the whole contest—there is an end of it as a matter of principle, because, as regards citizens, the representation must be according to the number of individual citizens, each having the same power—one vote. That, of course, is not always achieved, because one individual one vote to be perfectly scientific, ought always to have one value; but you get as near to it as you possibly can. Then, as regards the states, the representation must be according to the number of individual states. That principle of state equality was established centuries before the United States Constitution was ever dreamt of. I do not propose to deal with the matter academically for more than one single moment; but it is a most fascinating and interesting subject to trace the history of the early federations in Greece and their remarkable similarity to the United States Constitution. Since Mr. Freeman wrote his book—and this is the only academical quotation with which I shall trouble hon. members; but I do think that we ought to make it clear to the people of the country that there is some foundation for this, and it is from that point of view that I take the liberty of occupying the attention of hon. members with this—since Mr. Freeman wrote his book, some further discoveries have been made which have thrown a flood of light upon the principle involved in this question. At page 247 of the latest edition of his work on the history of federal government, there is this footnote:

In the Achaean Assembly, each city, great or small-because in those days it was, of course, a federal league, not of districts or of countries, but of cities—each city, great or small, had one vote.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It was merely a league!

Mr. SYMON:
My hon. friend is talking without knowing anything at all about this particular subject. I wish to enlighten him if he will allow me; we are all capable of enlightenment:

In the American Senate, each state, great or small, sends an equal number of senators; but the votes are not taken by states—the two senators of a state may vote on opposite sides of a question like the two members for an English county or borough.

And upon this, at page 249, Freeman says:
Probably no two constitutions, produced at such a distance of time and place from one another, ever presented so close a resemblance to each other as that which exists between the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution of the Achaean League.

But there is more than that. After the lamented death of Mr. Freeman, further investigation was made, and the learned editor discovered that not only in the Achaean League, but also in the AEtolian League, which was a federal league representing the people in the primary assembly, and representing the states in the senate—

Mr. HIGGINS:
What about the Lycian League?

Mr. SYMON:
Perhaps the hon. member will allow me to proceed. I dare say he is familiar with Greek.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
Before the flood!

Mr. SYMON:
I am not going so far back as that.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Before the flood of democracy!

Mr. SYMON:
The learned editor says:
This being so, certainly for the AEtolian, and probably for the Achaean Senate, a parallel and contrast may be drawn between the federal assemblies of these old leagues and the federal assembly of modern Switzerland. The object of both the ancient and the modern federations was to provide that each state as a whole, and each citizen individually should have a voice in the federal assembly.

The doubt was whether the senators were elected by the assembly in those early days or whether they were elected by the particular states. Since Mr. Freeman's death it has been discovered from an old Greek inscription that they were elected by the particular states just as we propose that our senators should be elected. In the appendix, page 651, we find these words:

We can say definitely in the case of the AEtolian League what could only be put forward tentatively in the case of the Accaean, that the senate consisted of representatives chosen by the states.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
What became of those leagues?

Mr. SYMON:
What has become of the United States? The United States has gone from small things to great until it has become one of the mightiest nations on the face of the earth under a federation including, as an essential part of its system, equal representation in the senate. What is the use of my hon. friend asking me, as implied in his question, whether these old Greek federations have not, like all things human, passed away? Of course they have. But they had elements of weakness which do not exist in a modern federation such as that of the United States of America. If my hon. friend puts the question to me, then I say to him, "Take the United States, and you have at any rate, a most valuable parallel, and you have the proposition, which I am seeking to establish, that from the earliest federation until the latest federation on true federal principles the states have had representation in what has been called the senate, and they have had equal representation per state. That is all I am contending for. But I want to go one step further. My hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, gave us the United States in support of equal representation. He would not give us Switzerland. My hon. friend, Mr. Glynn, has thoroughly disposed of his exception of Switzerland, and, therefore, it is unnecessary that I should travel over that ground. My hon. friend has shown that Switzerland, so far as equal representation is concerned, is identically on the same footing as the United States of America. But more than that-and this is the only observation with which I shall pursue the subject-the senate in Switzerland has what we have abandoned in the senate to be formed under our constitution. It has a voice in the choice of the federal council, which is the governing body in Switzerland. We have not got that. It appears to me that we have reduced our senate under the proposed federation to the barest necessities of the case. Still, I do not pretend to be bound by precedents. I do not pretend that this convention is bound by precedents. We all represent what are really sovereign states-sovereign states in essence, if not in form-and we can strike out, if we please, an entirely new line. I thoroughly agree with my hon. friend in that. But it is instructive to have examples of other federations, and to fairly follow them, if we fulfil the federal theory, unless, of course, it can be shown that experience condemns them. Now, I have no slavish devotion to the Constitution of the United States. But what is said of that constitution in which equal representation in the Senate is a conspicuous feature? My hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, said it was not a success. Did he produce a single authority? Did he produce the considered judgment of a single constitutional thinker or writer to establish such a proposition? To follow such an example, he says, would be taking steps backward. Surely if it were bad in this particular respect we should have some one, some constitutional authority, to say so! On the contrary, we have the United States Constitution, containing this grave blemish, if my hon. friend's view is correct, spoken of by Lord Rosebery as "the matchless Constitution of the United States." We have it spoken of by Freeman, to whom my hon. friend pins his faith, at page 4, in this way:

The other two-

Meaning the other two federations of Switzerland and the United States—one of them among the least, the other among the greatest, of independent powers, still remain, exhibiting federalism in a perfect, or nearly perfect, form, standing, in the old world and in the new, as living examples of the strength and the weakness of the most elaborate of political combinations.

And at page 5 he says, again-and this is the last I shall quote upon this point from Freeman; there are scores of other passages, but hon. members would not thank me for reading them now:

The Achaean League, and the United States since the adoption of the present Constitution, are indeed the most perfect developments of the federal principle which the world has ever seen.

Surely, sir, that is some authority upon which we can go. Surely that is something which we can tell the people of this country is, at any rate, a fair foundation upon which our claim may rest. Putting Mr. Freeman aside, let us take what Mr. Justice Story says—probably one of the greatest constitutional writers who ever lived in the United States or any other country, and an authority whose value will not be questioned. He says:

The structure has been erected by architects of consummate skill and fidelity. Its foundations are solid, its compartments beautiful as well as useful, its arrangements are full of wisdom and order, its defences are impregnable from without, it has been reared for immortality.

If we find a constitutional writer so full in his judgment, and in his heart, of this great federal principle which we are now to some extent following, I think we may very fairly say that it is worthy of our imitation, as far as we can possibly adopt it. But it appears to me that the greatest tribute to that constitution embodying the principle of equal representation is that, though framed for thirteen states on the Atlantic seaboard with a population of something like 3,500,000, it has been found sufficient for forty-five states, with a population of more than 70,000,000, extending from ocean to ocean. It has been found sufficient to withstand the difficulties that arise in peace, and to resist the shock of the greatest civil war which the world has ever seen. Surely that is something on which we can rely. But in addition to that, the confederate states, as was pointed out by my hon. friend, Sir John Downer, yesterday, modelled their constitution upon that of the United States as a whole, and adopted the principle of equal representation in the senate.

Mr. WISE:
Every South American federation has done the same!

Mr. SYMON:
Yes, as my hon. and learned friend points out, every South American federation has done the same. But, what I want to suggest for the consideration of my hon. friend and others who fairly and honestly think as he does is, that we have the seceding states adopting the same principles upon which to construct their constitution, and the nonseceding or federal states retaining their constitution unaltered, or without any attempt to alter it in this particular, although to help them to scatter all difficulties in connection with the constitution to the winds, if they had chosen, they had not only the civil power, but the power resulting from the possession of a victorious army, and the conditions which always follow upon a great civil convulsion. They abolished slavery, which had existed under the constitution, and, if they could abolish slavery, difficult as it undoubtedly is to abolish these great evils once they are established, they could have abolished that principle in the constitution which, it has been stated, was the cause of the civil war—the equal representation of the states in the Senate. I deny that the cause of the war was equal representation in the Senate. Mr. Freeman lays special stress upon this particular aspect when speaking of the immortal work of Washington and Hamilton. He says:

The American commonwealth, with its manifest defects—and which human constitution is without defects?
still remains one of the most abiding monuments of human wisdom, and it has received a tribute to its general excellence such as no other political system was ever honored with. The states which have seceded from its government, which look with the bitterest hatred on its actual administrators, have re-enacted it for themselves in all its essential provisions. Nothing but inveterate blindness of party spirit-

I do not for a moment apply this to my hon. friend-can hinder this simple fact

That is a quotation, and I hope it will be understood that it is within quotation marks. There is this further observation I should like to make. I do not say for a moment that the vast wealth and splendid progress which we have witnessed in the United States, with its unsurpassed enjoyment of peace and freedom, is due to its constitution, or to its form of government; but with all its defects, that constitution has been no hindrance to national prosperity. Therefore, I ask you, what warrant have you for saying that even if the equal representation of the states is provided for in our constitution it will impede the government, or for one instant, delay the prosperity of the people of Australia when they are united. My hon. friend said that the provision in the United States Constitution giving equal representation of states was a compromise. I have dealt with that statement. He also said that it was adopted with misgivings. But we were not told on whose side the misgivings were. The misgivings were on the side of the smaller states. It is an extraordinary fact, but it is true, that the states, afterwards the United States, some years after the war, were in a state of disorganisation, and, in some parts, in a condition bordering upon anarchy; yet that the Philadelphia Convention and the federal constitution were really the outcome of a desire to establish some better kind of trading system. Webster says that it arose in this way: The precise object of the appointment of the conference which took place at Annapolis, at the request of Virginia, in September, 1786, was to take into consideration the trade of the United States, to examine the relative situations and trade of the several states, and to consider how far a uniform system of commercial regulations was necessary to their common interests and permanent harmony.

Hamilton was one of the commissioners, and the conference, or commission, recommended the general convention which assembled at Philadelphia. It is no doubt true that there were disturbances in some of the states at the time; but it is not true that equal representation of the states was brought about in consequence of the enemy thundering at the gates of the United States. I ask, again, upon whose side were the misgivings? On the side of the smaller states. Let me establish that by one quotation from a letter of the great Samuel Adams, who was a representative from one of the smaller states, opposed to the federal union, Massachusetts. Notwithstanding equal representation, they were afraid to join the federation. As the last speaker asked, whose fears have we to allay? Not the fears of the larger States; it is the fears of those whom we, coming from the smaller states, represent, the fear that they will be liable to coercion. This is what Samuel Adams wrote:

I stumble at the threshold. I meet with a national government instead of a federal union of sovereign states.

He wrote again to his friend Lee:

I have always been apprehensive that misconstructions would be given to the federal constitution, which would disappoint the views and expectations of the honest among those who acceded to it, and hazard the liberty, independence, and happiness of the people. I was particularly afraid that, unless great care should be taken to prevent it, the constitution, in the administration of it, would gradually, but swiftly and imperceptibly, run into a consolidated government, pervading and legislating through all the states, not for federal purposes only, as it professes, but in all cases whatsoever. Such a government would soon totally annihilate the sovereignty of the several states, so necessary to the safety of a confederated commonwealth, and sink both in despotism.

That is the evidence I have been able to find of misgivings in connection with this matter at the time of the inception of the federal constitution in America, and these misgivings were on the side of the smaller states. It has been said that the federal powers and duties are no concern of the states as states; that upon these subjects it is a unification that we desire. Instances were given. Laws affecting marriage and divorce and other subjects were mentioned. The simple answer to that contention is this: We are not committing these subjects of legislation to a national or unified government; we are committing them to a federal government. If, you do not give us equal representation in the senate and a true federation, we will not commit them. If we were prepared to commit them to a unified government, there would be an end to the matter; but it is of the very essence of the system we are seeking to create, and under which we are willing to come, that we shall have equal representation in the senate. Therefore it is begging, the question to say that these are matters of common concern and proper to be dealt with by the national rather than the state government. Then there is the objection as to the disparity of the populations. South Australia has over 350,000 people or thereabouts, as against New South Wales with a population of 1,300,000. What is that? It is less than four times as many. But if you look to the other countries that are now existing under a federal system, you will find in the Swiss federation, Berne with nearly 600,000 people, thirty times the population of Zug, with equal representation, nearly forty times the population of Zurich, with about 17,000. Take the United States. In the state of New York, you have 6,000,000, and you have Nevada with 45,000, and Delaware with 150,000.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is what they complain of!

Mr. SYMON:
I challenge my hon. friend to find one constitutional authority who condemns it. Let him find one. My hon. friend, speaking yesterday afternoon, referred in mild terms to some wretched magazine or other, in which some bitter opponent of the particular party in power, or some person who is, or was, strongly in favour of the arbitration treaty, and of course ready to condemn any one who opposed it, expressed himself. It is all very well to indulge in the loose rhetoric of political denunciation in regard to those opposed to you. We know what that means. It must be all taken with a discount. I have been unable to find-and I have devoted some research to it last night, after my hon. friend's interesting speech, which stimulated my powers of research-I have been unable, I say, to find, although I endeavoured to do so, any constitutional authority who condemned this principle of equal representation in the senate. I have been unable to find one. In regard to this very arbitration treaty, the hon. member quoted some expression about rotten boroughs and that sort of thing. But he did not say that one of the states who voted against it was the immense state of Illinois, containing the city of Chicago—one of the most populous, prosperous, and powerful states of the union.

Mr. WISE:
We have no evidence whatever that that treaty ever passed the House of Representatives?

Mr. SYMON:
There is not. And it must also be remembered that there is a function on the part of the Senate there which would not vest in the senate here—which is peculiar to the Senate as constituted in the United States—an executive function. Epithets such as "rotten boroughs" applied to states of smaller numbers is no argument whatever upon this question. The solution of the difficulty as to smaller states coining in at a later date is either that they should not be admitted, or that there should be a minimum of population in them upon their admission. I am not justifying that, but those are some of the possibilities. You might either not admit them until they have a minimum of population, or you might admit them on terms, if it be thought just, which, while conserving the principle at the heart of the federal system, would also conserve the interests of those who already belong to the federation. For my part, I confess—and I was pleased to hear the remarks just made on the subject by one who has been so recently in America—I have never heard myself—and I have been in America, I have travelled through it, and taken advantage of the opportunity to communicate with men in political life—I have never heard an American express condemnation of the principle of equal representation in the Senate, or attribute to that condition of things the evils which afflict America, and which afflict other countries as well, tho evils incident, to particular forms of civil government. I have been informed on this point, that some of the ablest senators who have ever been members of the United States Senate, have come from the smaller states.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

They would have come all the same had there been no equal representation!

Mr. SYMON:

I admit that equal representation does not necessarily bring good men; but my hon. friend's argument I understood to be that equal representation had a most deteriorating influence—that you could only get the best men by proportional representation, owing to the opportunities for greater corruption in the smaller states. Perhaps my hon. friend's argument did not go to that length, but that was the tendency of it. I do not wish to dwell on the instances given in support of the opposite view—it is of no moment that there are exceptions to the doctrine that the true principle of federation is equality. There may be exceptions; there may be departures. You may constitute the senate on any basis you please. The German federation is no example for us to imitate. All the so-called states in the Germanic federation were dependent principalities. They were not independent commonwealths, and therein lies the great difference between the two positions. When the German states federated, as one hon. member put it in an interjection, they federated at the point of the sword. Prussia was the dominant monarchy, and was able to do exactly what she pleased. She dictated the terms which she thought proper. Perhaps they were not just to the other states; but they were convenient and safe for herself. I remember hearing of a German colonel who, having had an argument with some one, on relating the incident to a friend, said, "I felt that the man was going to convince me, and so I kicked him down stairs." That was just the case with Prussia. What would have been the fate of the minor states had they expostulated?

Mr. HIGGINS:

She took seventeen, although entitled to thirty-six!

Mr. SYMON:

It is true, as my hon. friend observes, that she took seventeen members; but she might have taken seventy-seven, and the other parts of the German federation would probably have had to give way, or get nothing at all.

Mr. HIGGINS:

According to population she was entitled to thirty-six!

Mr. SYMON:

But she did not take that number. She did not join the other states according to population; but she took what she pleased. It was the length of the Chancellor's conscience which me ted out that particular amount of representation, the Chancellor being, of course, Bismarck. We come now to the Canadian federation. That is no federation for us to imitate.

An Hon. MEMBER:

They have equality!

Mr. SYMON:

There was a kind of equality settled between two large states, and they gave equality to a certain group of states.

An Hon. MEMBER:

There was a common interest!

Mr. SYMON:

No doubt there was; but whether that be so or not, I do not suppose my hon. friend would apply the nominee principle to the senate of this country as it has been applied to the Senate of the Dominion. My hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, in the exordium to his speech, dealt largely with the question of manhood suffrage and equal political rights. Those are not infringed in any way whatever. This question does not touch them. He asked whether they were expected to give up that for which they had been battling for years? "Never!" said he. "Are we to throw open the ports of this colony to influences degrading to our manhood and womanhood?" Who is asking you to do anything of the kind? That kind of argument is all very well, but it really has no more relation to the subject with which [P.299] starts here we are dealing than Tenterden steeple has to do with the Goodwin Sands. My hon. friend then asked some questions. He asked the supporters of equal representation, "Why desire this particular representation?" Now, I do not share my hon. friend's objection to precedent. I like to dig up precedent. My own vocabulary is poor-

Hon. MEMBERS:
Oh, oh!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
I do not like graveyards myself!

Mr. SYMON:
I am not about to give the hon. member a musty precedent; it is quite a recent one-as recent as February of this

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Is it Freeman?

Mr. SYMON:
No, it is not Freeman. Freeman was a historian, but the quotation I am going to make is from one who is an orator as well as a historian. He says:
Great confusion existed in the matter of the treatment by candidates of the senate and state rights, and he preferred to deal with them as two distinct matters, namely-the rights of the states in the senate, and state rights versus the federal powers.

Now that is a very excellent way of dealing with the subject, and I say amen to it. He was entirely in favour of equal representation of the states in the senate, and by popular election.

That is what we have got in the bill. His reason for conceding this--and this is the answer to the question-- was that at present each state had an equal voice in matters of federal concern-such as defence, tariff, posts and telegraphs, &c.; and they were only granting a continuance of power now existing by giving them an equal voice in the senate.

Now, I assent to that. I submit that answers the question which was put.

Hon. MEMBERS:
Author! Author!

Mr. SYMON:
My hon. friends are a little impatient. I submit that that is a complete answer to my hon. friend's question. The speaker then goes on to state most admirably the other view which we from the smaller states urge with all humility.

The alternative to granting this power would, he was convinced, mean that the smaller or less populous states, would refuse to federate, and by so doing they would keep that very power which some might protest against but not destroy.

That is an excellent statement, and I owe my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, a debt of gratitude for it. He is the author, and in that declaration he has conclusively answered his own question. I know that my hon. friend who delivered himself yesterday of a powerful speech on this subject will say, because the view of course has been indicated this morning, that there should be some treatment in connection with deadlocks. That is a matter with which, no doubt, we shall have to deal before this Convention is very much older; but the question of equal representation in the senate is one thing, while the treatment of possible deadlocks is quite a different one. I am not going to deal with the deadlock question now; but I only add this in one word before closing, that the senate has also to fulfil the functions of an upper house. That I also commend to the people of New South Wales and Victoria, who may properly and naturally take the view if they choose of the hon. members who have addressed us, that this is an upper house in a sense. It is also to be a check, as all upper houses are, upon the representative chamber.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

They are both representative!

Mr. HIGGINS:

That is why all the tories go in for it!

Another Hon. MEMBER:

Mr. SYMON:

If I thought that the use of the expression "upper house" was going to cause such a subdued disturbance, I would not have employed it. I would have called it the second chamber. But, at any rate, if it is to be a second chamber in any sense of the term at all, one would think-and I merely offer this as a suggestion-there ought to be some different character about it in some way or other so as to differentiate it from the other chamber, otherwise what on earth is the good of having it?

Mr. HIGGINS:

Just so; what is the good?

Mr. SYMON:

There is the advocate again of absorption.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The hon. and learned gentleman is using the most dangerous argument, one which will be used against his view!
Mr. SYMON:
I always like my hon. friend to point out my danger; but, as I am reminded from my right, a different character is given to it, because it is representative of state interests; that is the reason for it.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Mr. SYMON:
Yes, it must exercise a revising function, and it is only because of that revising function that there seems to be an argument, and, I admit, a fairly strong argument, in support of something in the nature of a dissolution under certain conditions. I say nothing further about that now; but, at any rate, it is representative of state interests. It is the outward and visible sign of the autonomy of the states; that is what we are going to have unless this Convention breaks up federation by refusing to give it to us. Then it has been purged of every possible source of objection which exists to the senate of the United States. I believe, and I say this advisedly, that the bill, as it left the Adelaide Convention—there are matters which may have to be modified but as it left the Adelaide Convention, the bill was the finest and the most democratic instrument of federal government ever framed. We have taken from the senate their executive powers, their powers of dealing with treaties, and appointment to offices. All that I agree with. We have taken from them the power of dealing with money bills, and possibly this Convention may reaffirm its decision. When the time comes I shall intimate my own view, and I may, at any rate, say this much, that my view has undergone some change since the last convention, as to amending money bills. But we have also taken from it its voice in the choice of ministers which exists in Switzerland, and we have given to it that broadest of all, and best of all foundations, direct popular election. We must also remember that the senators are to vote individually and not as states. I think that is an immense safeguard. The six men who come from each state will exercise their individual judgment just as we in this Convention are exercising our individual judgment. I do not believe for one moment, I have not the least apprehension that there will be a combination of block votes of certain states against certain other states in this senate which we are about to create. I cannot conceive of matters which would bring that about. Slavery in the United States of America was a totally different thing; happily we are free from a bondage of that description.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Not quite!

Mr. SYMON:
I do not want to go into another matter of that kind. I may entertain views which may or may not agree with those of my hon. friend, but I do not want to go into what is a debatable subject, as to the labour conditions in this country at the present moment. But at any rate never we hope, never we believe, never as long as we have life and breath to keep it out shall we admit anything into these free countries at all resembling the condition of African bondage in the states of America.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
They will have to go to their constituencies every three years!

Mr. SYMON:
What are we offered instead of it? We are offered proportional representation. I venture to say that that gives away the whole position. It is a bastard and alien method of dealing with this subject. It must be either equal representation or representation as in the lower house according to population in its widest sense. I admit with my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, that we must talk, no matter what the provocation may be, with calmness and moderation with regard to the debates in the legislatures all of which we most highly esteem. There have been expressions which were not very kind towards us from the small colonies. We have been told in some of these whirlwinds of rhetoric that we were deserts seeking to be represented and not human beings. All I can say is that South Australia occupies as good a position as does this state. She is proud of it. She has done great public services. She has prosecuted gigantic national works out of her own pocket and at her own risk and responsibility, and if there is any colony which deserves to rank with the foremost states of this continent it is the colony from which we come. I have no indignation to express about it, but I think it is a pity that sneers are uttered against these smaller colonies, and when we are told that they do not represent individuals, and that the only centres of life and action in this country are Sydney and Melbourne-

Mr. HIGGINS:
Who said that?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
No one has said that!

Mr. HIGGINS:
Who has sneered at the representatives from the smaller colonies, or said anything like that?

Mr. SYMON:
Does my hon. friend put that to me as though I were making the statement without authority? Shall I quote my authority?
Mr. HIGGINS:
It is a most unfriendly statement to say that any member of the Convention has sneered at South Australia!

Mr. SYMON:
Really my hon. friend does not give that attention which he usually bestows on matters of this kind.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
It is as well to clear up the misapprehension now it has arisen and to say where it was said.

Mr. SYMON:
I do not think there is any misapprehension, if I may say so.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I think my hon. and learned friend's words were that he was referring to a statement made in this Convention!

Mr. SYMON:
If my right hon. friend says that he was under that impression I will accept it at once. I did not think they were capable of that construction. They were not intended to have it; but if any member of the Convention thinks that my language was capable of the construction which is suggested, then I at once correct it as I have done. I was not referring to any member of the Convention, I was referring to a statement made-

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Outside the Convention?

Mr. SYMON:
I was referring to a statement made elsewhere, and only because of the appeal which my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, very properly addressed to us, to speak with calmness and moderation, notwithstanding the provocation to which we might have been subjected by members of houses of legislature when dealing with this question. I am quite willing to be to their faults a little blind, and to their virtues very kind. Therefore, I merely indicate the unhappy line which, was taken in some places, and I should be sorry, even in order to clear up a misapprehension, to mention any name.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
That is carrying out the scriptural injunction!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
What does the hon. member know about scriptural injunctions?

Mr. SYMON:
We always turn the other cheek.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Too much cheek!
Mr. SYMON:

My hon. friend knows best whether he has too much cheek. Is it that you in New South Wales want the federal capital to be in Sydney—is that what is tile matter? I have heard it said—it has been said to myself, "Give us the federal capital, and I will go for federation."

The CHAIRMAN:

Does the hon. and learned member think that this has anything to do with the question of equal representation in the senate?

Mr. SYMON:

I think so, sir; but if you, in that kindly way of asking me the question, really answer it yourself by putting it, I will not deal with the question of the federal capital, except to say this: that I do not wonder at it. I consider that Sydney—if my hon. friends opposite will not jump down my throat—is the metropolis of Australia.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

After Melbourne!

Mr. SYMON:

But it does not follow that it ought to be the federal capital. As far as I am concerned, though I hope this will not be considered final, I should be perfectly willing to have federation with the capital in Sydney, if we could not get it without.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Mr. SYMON:

It is a delightful place; but I do not deal with that aspect of it. All I venture to say is that I hope that the motives underlying the opposition to the contention that there ought not to be, equal representation in the senate, are founded upon such grounds as were' stated yesterday, which are really matters to be fully dealt with, as I am endeavouring to deal with them, and not upon indirect reasons. I thank hon. members for the attention they have so kindly given to me. I am sorry that I have trespassed so much on the time of the Convention—

Hon. MEMBERS:

No, no! Mr. SYMON: But I have sought, and I hope my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, will believe me when I say that I have sought to meet the challenge which he naturally and properly directed to those coming specially from the smaller states.

Mr. HIGGINS:
   It is the first real attempt to meet the challenge!

Mr. SYMON:
   I accept that as a compliment, at any rate, to my intention, whatever may be the success of my effort.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
   I have spent seven or eight years in meeting it in New South Wales, and if that is not complimentary enough to my hon. friend it ought to be!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
   No wonder my hon. and learned friend is greyheaded!

Mr. SYMON:
   Possibly I may not be able to convince my hon. friend; at any rate, I have sought, as far as I could, to do so. My hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, assures us, and asks us to, accept the assurance, that his desire is for federation. Let me assure him that I have only one political aspiration, and that is for the union of these great colonies of Australia. When the day of its accomplishment comes, I confess I shall walk with a prouder step on the soil which I love. To help to bring about that consummation, I shall concede much; I shall give way upon everything down to the bare essentials of our freedom and existence as a separate state, to which I humbly venture to think that equal representation is an essential. I ask my hon. friend, to register a like resolve, and I believe he will. As his heart is in the cause let him remember that any serious check to this movement now must be fraught with the very gravest disaster. Every year, I feel, will put us further apart. Generations may come and go before we shall be so near to union as we are now. By that time the years will have told their customary tale upon most of us. The marks which are made by the "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune" may have deepened into fatal wounds. If we are still here, our eyes and our energies may be dim. But the cause will not die. It will live, and it will be accomplished. Others will come after us greater than we as these colonies must inevitably be greater than they are now—perhaps wiser than we, possibly more earnest, and to them will belong the glory and the triumph. But, for myself, I would anticipate that triumph. Let us share the glory of what I conceive to be a godlike task. If we, assembled in this Convention, do our part I have no fear whatever, in spite of all apprehensions, that the people will do theirs. If we say "aye" the voice of the people will respond with a grand "amen" that will roll round the world, and so swiftly and surely will the harvest be reaped and the fruits gathered that the oldest man among us shall see it and rejoice.
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[12.21]:

I thoroughly agree with the observations that have been made by several hon. gentlemen who have preceded me that the question now under consideration is one of the most critical points in our discussion, and I thoroughly indorse what was said by my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, that our decision upon this question is not to be arrived at hastily or by a mere wave of the hand. Its own inherent importance, apart from every consideration, is sufficient to justify that position. The fact that it comes to us under the sanction of one of the most important legislative bodies in Australia carries a weight that we cannot disregard, and what impels me at the present time more than any other matter to deal with it is this: that our determination upon this question may carry with it a determination upon other questions. I think I am justified at this stage of our deliberations in offering some views upon the matter, because, in the absence of the right hon. Premier of Victoria, it fell to my lot to conduct the federation debate through the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, and I wish to place before the Convention as clearly as I can the views which I think, and indeed feel with very little doubt, are entertained by the popular chamber of the legislature of that colony, and by the great majority of the people. When the question was under discussion I announced in no uncertain tones what I believed to be the resolve of the members of this Convention, and I stated—and hon. gentlemen who have, perhaps, followed the debates of the Legislative Assembly in the official record which has been forwarded to them will know—that it was not an easy task to obtain a vote in the Assembly of Victoria in favour of equal representation. Very little, indeed, would have sufficed to turn the majority the other way.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It was carried by the hon. member's influence!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It may have been my influence to a certain extent. I had to urge against what I believed to be the logical result, against what I believed to be the reason of the matter, the expediency of yielding by way of concession this doctrine of equal representation in the senate; but I wish to make it perfectly clear at the outset that had it not been well understood by a great number, at all events, of those who composed the majority that the principle was assented to, not as a principle in reality, but as a concession which would not carry with it the ordinary results of a principle, their votes would have been found registered on the other side. Speaking for myself I should have voted on the other side under those circumstances. I do not in the smallest degree depart from the opinions which I ventured to express at Adelaide. I stated there, and my opinion has only been confirmed and strengthened by what has taken place in Victoria, both in the Parliament and in the press, that Victoria will not consent to equal representation in the senate if that principle is to carry with it the consequences that may be claimed to flow from it by those who advocate its insertion on the ground of principle alone; and unless it is accompanied by certain other provisions, which I believe will be consented to by this Convention, so as to secure in the last resort the security to the larger populations that they shall not be interminably outvoted by the smaller populations. Therefore, I desire to impress upon the Convention that they must not accept that vote of 45 to 36 as an indication in the smallest degree that the Victorian legislature-I am speaking now for the popular house-or the Victorian people assent to the doctrine, as such, of equal representation. Some of my hon. friends, more particularly Mr. Symon, have again ventured to assert here that the principle is defensible upon the ground of reason, and upon the ground of the inherent nature of a federation. I do not say for one moment that my hon. friend and those who think and speak with him, are not justified in maintaining to the fullest extent that opinion, or in regarding the arguments of the authorities they adduce as supporting them. On the other hand, I think it is beyond all contest that those who with myself regard that as a vicious principle, who regard it as indefensible on the ground of reason and of logic, and who, furthermore, regard it as branded with the disapprobation of history, are entitled to our opinion also. I should like to say, furthermore, that the principle of equal representation in the senate was never so well understood in Victoria as it is at the present moment. The debates in this Convention, the criticisms upon those debates that have appeared in the press, have been gradually, in my opinion, convincing a larger and larger area of our people that equal representation is not correct as a principle, and I very much doubt if, by any unfortunate mischance, which it is our duty to try, if possible, to avert, federation should not be accomplished on the present occasion, Victoria would never, after the expiration of a few years, consent to equal representation on any terms.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Nonsense!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I can assure my hon. friends that there is a continually strengthening feeling that it is not correct; and it does require-it did require, I know, in my case, and in that of some of my colleagues-a considerable amount, may I say, of courage, to place ourselves in opposition to a great number of men of our own way of political thinking—our own supporters—men who are, perhaps, the strongest advocates of popular government that Victoria contains. I wish to say—and I may be permitted to any it now, once for all—that if my hon. friends who have cited precedent, who have quoted history, who have urged opinions of constitutional writers, in defence of equal representation as a principle, have done so in order to follow it up by insisting upon the logical consequences of that doctrine, then, I say to them that it is perfectly hopeless so far as our colony is concerned. I have supported equal representation, because I recognise, as a fact, that the smaller colonies so-called—the less populous colonies—will not come into a federation without it. I recognise that as a matter of fact; it is a political fact, and it is a fact that has the justification of expediency. I am prepared to accept that position provided that, on the other hand, hon. gentlemen representing other colonies are prepared to meet Victoria on terms on other subjects.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

And yet the hon. and learned gentleman will not give us the logical consequences of it!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

My hon. friend, by his observation, entirely justifies what I have just said. He demands from us the logical consequences of equal representation.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

No, I do not. My mind is quite open on that point. I want to have federation, and I will take it at any price at which I can get it. I will take it at any price at which I can get it from the wisdom of this Convention, backed up by the common-sense of the people.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Perfectly safe!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I hope that my hon. friend does not feel that he has committed himself; but I cannot help observing that my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon, with the vigour which distinguishes him, put the whole thing in a nutshell when he said that equal representation in the senate is the one visible sign of the autonomy of the states. I venture, with great respect, to differ from him on that point. As I understand the matter, the visible sign of state autonomy consists in the reserved powers.
An Hon. MEMBER:
The states governments!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The states governments?
Mr. SYMON:
In the federation!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The states, as states, according to my view, have no place in the federation. We find, at the present moment, a host of authorities, powers, and jurisdictions, in the hands of the several states. We have come to the conclusion that a number of those powers, and authorities, and jurisdictions could be better wielded by some central authority—better than by leaving them under the control of the states—and we create, as we hope, a federal authority, not a state authority in any respect, but a federal authority—a national authority, I prefer to call it—to wield those powers and to exercise those authorities and jurisdictions, and leave the states as they now stand in respect of all other matters. The residuum of power is the visible authority of the states; and in the book to which my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon, referred—Freeman—is one sentence which I think contains the matter in the smallest compass and in the clearest words that it is possible to use. He says:

The state administration within its own range will be carried on as freely as if there were no such thing as the union. The federal administration within its own range will be carried on as freely as if there were no such thing as a separate state.

That is the doctrine of Freeman, and I cannot understand why it is being insisted upon that equal representation in the senate is to be regarded as any sign at all of state autonomy. The nearest approach to the preservation of the sign of state autonomy is in a confederation; but my hon. and learned friend must know that, even in the earliest form of confederation in America, though equal representation was given, the reason of it was not because the states were equal, but a very different reason. My hon. and learned friend, if he turns up a very recent work—"Foster on the American Constitution"—will find that even before there was a confederation—when the American colonies were dissatisfied with the British Government, and they met in their Continental Congress in 1774, their first resolution was in these words:

That in determining questions in congress, each colony or province shall have one vote, the congress not being possessed of, or at present able to procure, proper material for ascertaining the importance of each colony.

That was the reason, and Mr. Foster goes on to say:
The larger states were never able to procure an alteration of this rule. Then they had their confederation; and he says in effect—be does not use these words, but he says in effect—that the equal representation of the states in the senate has undergone a considerable modification. He tells us that, though there has been no need of its interposition to protect the smaller states from any encroachment by the larger states, until the Civil War the Senate was more conspicuously the guardian of state rights in general. I am not going to take up the time of the Convention by making long quotations; but he goes on to point out that the senators from the various states regarded themselves as ambassadors from sovereign powers rather than as members of a federal legislature. However, he also says:

These doctrines are now abandoned.

So that, if my hon. and learned friend goes to the very root foundation of this question, he will not find its insertion in the American Constitution based on any ground of principle. The truth is that the American Constitution—I desire to place this clearly before the Convention—the American Constitution is recognised to-day by their foremost political writers—I way mention Mr. Macy, who has just published his work on the English Constitution, and in that compared it with the American Constitution—that the American Constitution of to-day is not the same constitution in substance as that which was originally passed—that the whole flood of judicial decision and official administration, and the whole trend of political thought, and, most of all, that great convulsion, the Civil War, have led to, in many respects, an entirely different view of the American Constitution. He points out that the American Constitution has developed from a mere gathering of so-called sovereign states united under what was then understood to be a federal constitution into what has gradually become to be looked upon more and more as a national state. We have been asked to produce the opinions of leading constitutional writers in America. I can assure hon. gentlemen that the prevailing opinion, the growing opinion of American writers and American politicians, is that the federal authority is becoming greater and greater, that the development of the American Constitution since the Civil War has taken a turn that never was anticipated, that those eloquent words of Mr. Justice Story, which were quoted by my hon. friend, Mr. Symon, and which were written, I think, some two or three years before the Civil War—

Mr. SYMON:
They are repeated in the latest edition!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
But Mr. Justice Story has not lived to write any new edition. There was one in 1858. At all events, the words written by Mr. Justice Story were written not in anticipation of that terrible convulsion that we know of as the Civil War; and the very words that my hon. friend read—how do they look in the light of subsequent events? Absolutely falsified. How has the constitution affected all the peace, the quietness referred to in those words of Mr. Justice Story? It is idle for any gentleman to quote a constitutional writer before the Civil War, because the later writers, and notably one whom I shall quote, Dr. Burgess, who has written as late as 1895—these writers have told us in the plainest possible manner what is now the trend of the American Constitution. The hon. member, Sir John Downer, I think hardly treated Mr. Higgins well yesterday. He said that my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, had entirely given himself away by admitting that federation was a compromise. Is not the argument of nearly every hon. member of this Convention that the whole of this constitution must be founded on compromise? If it were not to be founded on compromise with regard to, equal representation, the Victorian delegates would have a very short task indeed, and I think the New South Wales delegates, many of them at all events, would be in the same position. But most of all did my hon. friend, Sir John Downer, bring forward an argument which, while possessing, as all his arguments do, great power, was lacking in one thing. He said that if the American Constitution was so faulty in regard to equal representation, would it not have been changed at the termination of the Civil War, when the northern armies, victorious and irresistible, were in the field? I ventured to interject at the time that the one provision in the American Constitution which is substantially unalterable, because it requires the consent of every state, is the provision preserving equal representation in the senate.

Mr. HIGGINS:

And that is in the bill here!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Therefore, the hon. member will see that, in that respect, his argument was not as cogent as his arguments generally are. Let me take the hon. member a little further, and ask him to carry his mind back to what that irresistible army was established for; and let me point out to him that the American Constitution, with all the boasted elasticity referred to in those eloquent words of Mr. Justice Story, was unable to stand the strain of a people determined on having greater freedom than they had hitherto enjoyed.

Mr. SYMON:
It did stand the strain, and emerged from the fire triumphant!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Was the army to destroy the constitution it was sworn to preserve?

Mr. SYMON:
To amend it!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Will my hon. friend permit me to proceed to show that his observations are not justified by history? We know perfectly well that under the terms of the American Constitution no amendment can be made unless certain conditions are complied with, the only one material to this being the consent of three-fourths of the legislatures of the states. The Civil War was the final outbreak of a gathering and growing feeling of antagonism that had prevailed almost from the inauguration of the constitution. Contests had been waged in the courts between the national party and the state party. Degrees of nullification had taken place in some states, and the federal army had been called upon to assert the federal jurisdiction and authority. The matter reached its climax when the Civil War broke out, and then for the first time—I believe for the last time—the American nation met the confederacy on the field of battle. The confederacy fell, the nation emerged victorious. But it was necessary in order that the fruits of that tremendous contest might be preserved that there should be an amendment of the constitution. Without the seceding states agreeing, or a sufficient number of them, that amendment was impossible. In 1866 the Congress passed the 14th amendment of the constitution, giving to the negroes the right of the suffrage, providing that certain confederate leaders should not hold certain offices either in the federation or in their own states, and providing certain other things regarding the debts. The Congress sent that amendment to the states for ratification. The seceding states, strong in the literal construction of the constitution, refused to ratify it—defied the federal government. What was done? Was the constitution strong enough to stand the strain? Was the constitution so elastic as to provide for such a matter? Certainly not. Congress then passed, on the 2nd March, 1867, what is known as the iron law. They divided the "secessia," as it was called, into five military districts. They place a commander over each, and they told the southern states that until they did ratify that 14th amendment they should have no representation whatever in the Congress. There was the irresistible argument that the hon. member, Sir John Downer, referred to. And in order that the necessary provision might be made so as to maintain the Union rather than the paper constitution, the Congress went further. It laid down no a condition that conventions should be held in those rebellious states, that they should pass new state constitutions, that they should elect new state legislatures, which legislatures should ratify the 14th amendment.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

The same force might have been used to bring about proportional representation!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Not so easily. Let me take the matter a little further. The district commanders under military control had the supervision of registration of elections, and other matters connected with it, in their hands; all but three of the states—Virginia, Mississippi, and Tennessee—ratified under these compulsory conditions. The constitution was literally fractured under the power of that conquering army. In July, 1868, three-fourths of the states had, according to the decree of Congress, ratified, and it went into operation. Even then the three states I have mentioned were not admitted to any representation in Congress until they had ratified the 14th amendment, and another amendment, the 15th, which had been forced upon them. I appeal to my hon. friend whether history does not confirm the view we take that the constitution, unless it is so framed as to give full play to the will of the people as it may be expressed at any particular time, is not liable to such convulsions as may imperil the very existence of the state. We do not want such terrible convulsions here! Heaven forbid they should ever come near us! But we want to make the danger of equal representation, unless this principle is counterbalanced by such other provisions in the constitution as may avert anything like the consequences that history, if we were not blind to it, tells us have occurred in the United States, perfectly clear. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to go back to the views of the Philadelphia Convention, to bring forward the letter of the American Constitution—the bare words of that constitution. We must go further than that. We must not be deaf to the voices of the orators, the statesmen, the judges who, from time to time, have gone on and interpreted that constitution, and have to a very great extent changed it from the mere form and letter in which it was first cast, and brought it into the condition in which it is to-day. Let me, as I promised to do, read what that learned writer, Dr. Burgess, says on this subject at the present day—

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

What does the hon. and learned member intend to quote from?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Dr. Burgess, as hon. gentlemen know, has written a very instructive work upon the constitution. In the Political Science Quarterly Review, volume 10, pages 408 to 418, will be found some of the extracts which I intend to read. I do not intend to read all that is printed on those pages; but at page 416 of this very fine essay, on what he calls the "Ideal American Commonwealth," he says:

The language of the constitution of 1787 may be construed, and I think should be construed, as changing a confederacy of sovereignties into a national state with federal government, that is with a system of government in which the powers are distributed by the national constitution either expressly or impliedly, specifically or generally, between two sets of government organs, largely independent of each other. Yet, on the other hand, it may be construed with much show of logic as having simply substituted the people of the several states for their legislatures, that is for the organic bodies in the confederate constitution of 1781. A very large portion of the population of the whole country at one time - and for a long period a large majority of the population - held this latter view. Even now it is possibly held by a majority of our people.

But I think this theory is now wholly erroneous. It will not fit the facts of our history since 1860. Those facts can be explained only upon the theory that federalism with us now means a national state, with two sets of governmental organs, largely independent of each other, but each deriving its powers and authorities ultimately from a common source, namely, the sovereignty of the nation.

And this conception of a governmental system I claim to be purely an American product. It is, however the true ideal of federalism, and all other nations must, I believe, ultimately come to it. It reconciles the imperialism of the Romans, the local autonomy of the Greeks, and the individual liberty of the Teutons, and preserves what is genuine and endearing in each.

Hon. members do not need me to remind them that the two sets of governmental organs referred to are, the federal government, having charge of those matters which are of common import, and the state governments, which have charge of matters which are purely provincial. At pages 408 to 410, Dr. Burgess says:

I do not think that it need be feared that the doctrine of the sovereignty of the several states will again seriously threaten this development.

The Civil War fixed the principle of our polity, that the nation alone is the sovereign, that the nation alone is the real state. We do still hear, indeed, the phrase "sovereignty of the states within their respective spheres": but this only signifies that we have not yet invented the new forms of expression to fit the new order of things. All that we can now mean by the old phrase is: that realm of autonomy reserved to the states by the sovereignty of the nation declared through the constitution.

While I admit most unaffectedly and most unfeignedly that opposite opinions, supported as they are by many learned writers, are entitled to the greatest possible weight, I think I have said enough to convince hon. members that the opinions we venture to support are the views entertained by later writers and statesmen. As Professor Macy, whose work I heartily commend to the perusal of hon. members, points out, the idea of democracy is of modern origin. We know perfectly well that democracy was unknown at the time the Federal Constitution of America was formed, and that some of the men who framed that constitution had strong leanings towards a monarchical system of government.

The Hon. J.H. Howe:

How could democracy be unknown to them, when the constitution declares all men to be equal?

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:

I am sure that the hon. member's reading must have led him to the perusal of numerous passages in various works which should have convinced him that democracy, as we understand it to-day, was totally unknown then, and that the founders of the American Constitution feared democracy. No one could peruse the debates of the Philadelphia Convention without being convinced of that. We had men there saying, "What have the people to do with this matter; it is dangerous to trust the people with this power?" If they were so democratic, and did not fear the people, why was it provided that the senators should be elected by the state legislatures? There is no room for doubt on the subject, and, to repeat a quotation which I made use of on a former occasion, the fathers of the American Constitution feared democracy. No one could peruse the debates of the Philadelphia Convention without being convinced of that. We had men there saying, "What have the people to do with this matter; it is dangerous to trust the people with this power?" If they were so democratic, and did not fear the people, why was it provided that the senators should be elected by the state legislatures? There is no room for doubt on the subject, and, to repeat a quotation which I made use of on a former occasion, the fathers of the American Constitution, in their fear of arise of democracy "ate sour grapes, and their children's teeth were set on edge." There is no doubt that if they could have risen thirty years ago, and seen the work that the doubts and difficulties of their constitution have produced, they would have been appalled. What they did, as the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, so ably put it, was to make the best constitution under the circumstances, and a marvellously good constitution it was under those circumstances. Their duty and their plain desire was to get the best constitution they could under threatening circumstances, and leave the consequences to be worked out by those who came after them. Massachusetts, great state that it was, received the constitution-how? It accepted it by only 187 votes to 168. One of the greatest American statesmen who ever lived, John Quincy Adams, tells us in words of almost living fire, that it was a constitution "wring from the necessities of a reluctant people."

[The Chairman left the chair at 1.1 p.m. The Committee resumed at 2
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

My hon. friend, Mr. Symon, dwelt at considerable length upon the fact that no complaint whatever had been made by any persons or writers with regard to equal representation. My researches have brought to my knowledge a good many observations made in public journals, and in various recognised works on the subject which, to my mind, tell distinctly the story that there is a great and growing dissatisfaction with the principle of equal representation—certainly not to such an extent as exists with regard to the mode of election of the Senate, and some other matters. I shall not attempt to detain the Convention with any number of extracts, but I shall refer to two recognised writers, whose writings I think distinctly point in the direction I indicate. One is Sir Henry Maine—an undoubted authority. He points out that which is not generally recognised—that this doctrine of equality of state representation in the Senate is not at root equality, but is inequality. He takes the trouble to point that out in at least two places in his valuable work on popular government, and at page 186 he says:

The Senate of the United States is in strictness no more a democratic institution than is the House of Lords. As I shall point out in the following essay, it is founded on inequality of representation, not on equality.

He does point it out in the following essay. A reference is made to the subject on page 227, where he says:

It is very remarkable, that the mode of choosing the Senate finally adopted did not commend itself to some of the strongest minds employed on the construction of the federal constitution. Its first article provides, in section 3, that the "Senate of the United States shall be composed of two senators from each state, chosen by the legislatures thereof, for six years." Hence it follows that the Senate is a political body of which the basis is not equality but inequality. Each state elects no more and no fewer than two senators. Rhode Island, Delaware, and Maryland have the same representation in the Senate as the great and populous states of New York and Pennsylvania. The constitutional composition of the Senate is, therefore, a negation of equality.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Does he condemn it?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I think he does; he points out that it is an inequality and therefore an injustice to allow the smaller populations to have the same voice in taxation matters as have the larger populations.
Mr. MCMILLAN:

He is a very conservative writer!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

He is; and, therefore, his testimony upon this point is so much the stronger, because that admission has to be made. An American writer, Professor Alden, in an essay-"The World's Representative Assemblies of today"-to be found in the "John Hopkins' University Studies for 1893," vol. xi, page 61, writes in these terms:

As the states of the American Union vary greatly in population, the disproportionate representation of the minor states-notable even at the adoption of the constitution-has become excessive. In Nevada 21,000 persons are represented by a United States senator; in New York nearly 3,000,000, a ratio of 1 to 40. These are extremes. In Wyoming and Idaho a senator's constituency is 30,000 to 40,000; in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois it is 2,000,000 to 3,000,000.

This gentleman, therefore, does refer in terms of, I should think, disapprobation to the disproportionate or, he calls it, excessive representation in some states as compared with the representation in other states. Therefore, I think I am justified in the observation I made in the course of the hon. member, Mr. Symon's, speech that there were writers who did look upon this principle with disfavour. I have referred to an English writer, and to an American writer. I know that the hon. member contemns newspaper articles, and in a speech which I had the honor to deliver in Victoria I did refer to newspaper articles with which, however, I will not trouble the Convention now. This question, however, seems to be dealt with at some greater length than I anticipated would have been the case, and I should, therefore, think myself wanting, since we are on the subject of equal representation being a legitimate principle in itself or a mere concession, if I did not refer to two authorities, with one of whom hon. members are more or less familiar, and with the other of whom they are, perhaps, not so familiar upon the federal theory. I should like, however, before quoting them, to draw attention to one very important circumstance. It is conceded by a majority of the Convention, at all events it is embodied in the 114th clause of the bill it has adopted, that future states entering the federation shall be put on terms which will not give them equal representation in the senate. If that be so, and if they are to be admitted into a federation so-called without equal representation, what becomes of the argument that equal representation in the senate is essential to a federation?

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
The clause is a mistake—it ought to come out of the bill!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
What becomes of the argument that equal representation is essential to a federation under these circumstances? Does it not at once dispose of the argument that equal representation of all the states is essential to such a form of government?

Mr. SOLOMON:
That clause contemplates the subdivision of existing states rather than new states!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
It cannot contemplate the subdivision of states; it may contemplate the subdivision of existing colonies, and it contemplates more than that. It contemplates existing colonies without subdivision entering into the commonwealth after its establishment. It contemplates the contingency that there may be some colonies which will wait and see how the commonwealth progresses before they decide to cast in their lot with it. It contemplates their waiting to be certain whether the commonwealth is going to be a success or a failure, and allowing other states which are willing to join the federation to take all the burden of the first few heavy years of its existence. And then it says both to those states who stand out and which afterwards wish to come in and also to future states that may be created—

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Where from?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
By subdivision or it may be from elsewhere.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
As existing at the time of the establishment of the commonwealth!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
No; the hon. gentleman is not quite accurate in that respect; but it contemplates either of these cases being met, and the commonwealth being able to say to them, "If you wish to come in, we are perfectly willing to admit you; but upon terms, both as to representation in the legislature and otherwise.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDOCK:
Clause 114 says nothing about admitting new states!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
It does not perhaps use those precise words, and I may not have conveyed my meaning to the right hon. gentleman. What I mean to say is that it contemplates the existence at some future time of states that may not have equal representation in the senate.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
   Not existing states!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
   Yes, certainly; existing colonies which do not enter into the commonwealth at the time of its establishment.
Mr. LYNE:
   Supposing Queensland comes in afterwards!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
   Of course, that is a case in point. The only colonies that will be named in clause 114 are colonies that do not come in at the time of the establishment of the commonwealth, which have not adopted the constitution. It is the same principle; the idea is right; the existing colonies which have not adopted the constitution.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
   Queensland is named in the interpretation clause!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
   Will the hon. member permit me to say that I am perfectly right in what I am stating. The clause says:
   The parliament may from time to time admit to the commonwealth the existing colonies of-
   I hope there will be none to be named, but there may be some to be named. For example, and I hope no exception will be taken to the statement, Queensland and Western Australia may be admitted afterwards.
Mr. LYNE:
   Or New Zealand!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
   Yes, New Zealand. Very well, supposing they are named, it will be in the competency of the commonwealth, after its establishment, on the application of any of these colonies, to admit them into the commonwealth as states, and to admit them upon terms, which terms may or may not include equal representation or the reverse. Therefore I say, if that should be so, we will have in the commonwealth one, two or three colonies without equal representation in the senate, and yet admittedly forming part of the confederation.
Mr. WALKER:
   It is the original states that require equal representation!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
   No doubt, but the new states may or may not have that equal representation. Therefore, my point is, if there be states that come in on these terms, which may be of such a nature that equal representation is not guaranteed to them, we should have a confederation of states, some with equal representation among themselves, and others with less representation. Therefore, how can we say that federalism has as one of its essential points—that is one point without which federalism cannot exist—equal representation of the states.

Mr. SOLOMON:

Is that not an argument for amending clause 114?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It is an argument to show that the majority of this Convention do not believe that equal representation in the senate is essential to a federation.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:

It is a principle that is departed from!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I am only pointing out that if this clause is retained, and I believe it must be retained—and it is only fair to retain it—it brings us back to our original contention that equal representation is to be assented to, not as a principle, but as a concession.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It may be one of the terms; but the principle and the argument are the same. It is not equal whether it is larger or smaller.

Mr. SOLOMON:

It may not be!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Therefore it seems to me that that very principle disposes of the argument that it is essential to federation. If we turn to the recognised authorities, we have Mr. Dicey on the constitution supporting my position. What does he say is the fundamental idea of federalism? He says in his "Law of the Constitution," pages 131-132:

A federal state is a political contrivance intended to reconcile national unity and power with the maintenance of state rights.

These state rights of course hon. members will see are those which are conserved by the constitution to the states separately. He goes on to say:

The end aimed at fixes the essential character of federalism. For the method by which federalism attempts to reconcile the apparently inconsistent claims of national sovereignty and of state sovereignty consists of the formation of a constitution under which the ordinary powers of sovereignty are elaborately divided between the common or national government and the separate states. The details of this division vary under every different federal constitution; but the general principle on which it should rest is obvious. Whatever concerns the nation as a whole should be placed under the control of the national government. All matters which are not primarily of common interest should remain in the hands of the several states.

Then he goes on to refer to the preamble of the Constitution of the United States, and he quotes it. He says:

The tenth amendment enacts that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people." These two statements, which are reproduced with slight alteration in the Constitution of the Swiss Confederation, point out the aim and lay down the fundamental idea of federalism.

So, according to his view, the fundamental idea of federalism does not consist in having in the federal sphere two houses based on different foundations, but in having the powers and jurisdictions and the subject matter so divided that one part belongs entirely to the national sphere and the other part to the separate state spheres.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

No, they overlap!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not agree with the writer.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

I agree with him, but not with the hon. member! The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The other reference I shall make is to a speech made on a memorable occasion by Lord Carnarvon, when he introduced the British North America Act for the establishment of the Canadian federation. Hon. gentlemen will find it in a book now in the library, "Wheeler's Confederation Law of Canada," published in the present year, page 169. I am quoting from the book which gives the speech:

Referring to the distribution of powers, he said:- I now pass to that which is, perhaps, the most complicated and most important part of this measure, the distribution of powers between the central government and the local authorities. In this, I think, is comprised the main theory and constitution of federal government. On this depends the principal working of the new system; and the real object which we have in view is to give to the central government those high functions and almost sovereign powers by which general principles and uniformity of legislation may be secured on those questions that are of common import to all the provinces, and, at the same time, to retain for each province such an ample measure of municipal liberty and self-government as will allow, and indeed compel, them to exercise these local powers, which they can exercise with great advantage to the community."

I quote these high authorities to show what their view of federalism is. They may be right, they may be wrong; but I do claim this from the authorities I quote—that the later thinkers, the later writers, the later speakers, and authorities, both in politics and out of politics, are those who express the opinion that federalism consists in dividing the powers and authorities into two distinct portions. On one side we have the federal, the national, sphere, and on the other we have the state sphere, and neither must intrude into the other.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
The whole tenor of Dicey is against the hon. member!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
What I have stated is the true doctrine of federalism. I admit that it is a bargain. I admit that you can have federalism which does depart from that true principle. I think in this federation we must depart from that principle. I will not go so far as my hon. friend, Mr. Symon, who says "It is my only political ambition," but I do distinctly say that the highest political aim I have is to see Australia united in one national government. I am entirely amongst those who desire—and I say it with all the earnestness and sincerity of which I am capable—that we shall have at the earliest possible moment an Australian union. And to gain that I am willing, I am eager—I will go as far as that, because I know that without it it is impossible—to make known my view, and to concede equal representation to the less populous states. I have fought for that under very great difficulties; I am prepared to fight for it again. I want to assure hon. gentlemen from the less populous states that our strong desire in Victoria is that the federation of Australia shall be complete, that we shall have the whole range of the Australian colonies amongst us from the very beginning. We desire that earnestly; we are prepared to make sacrifices for it; but I want to remind hon. gentlemen that it is no use telling us, when we urge some of our views, that we are playing into the hands of the enemies of federation, because they look only, as it appears to me, when they make that observation, at their own colony. They forget that there is a great body of public opinion in Victoria which, if we do not gain from the smaller colonies the same consideration as we are prepared to give them in this respect, will decline to have federation. We are going to help them to get it. But what we desire is to get a federation which will carry out the very first words of the preliminary resolution which was carried at Adelaide-to enlarge our powers of self-government. I have no fear about equal representation, accompanied with the safeguards I desire. I do not even go to the length that some of my hon. friends do; but I will apply in this respect the observation of my right hon. and learned friend, Mr. Kingston: "There may be no danger; but there is a considerable amount of fear." I will apply that to what I am now saying, as he applied it to what he was saying this morning, and you have to make allowance for that, just as we are making allowance for the fact that, no matter what my hon. friends from the smaller colonies may think, no matter how, like the hon. and learned member, Mr. Glynn, they may admit that logic will bring them to our view, their people will not enter into this federation without equal representation; so in Victoria, we have a large, and I believe an overwhelming, body of public opinion, that will not enter into a federation unless we have a fair consideration in other respects shown to us.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

My hon. friend's opinions are always entitled to respect, and I am always ready to yield that. He will have an opportunity of expressing his opinions. I am expressing what I think is the state of opinion in Victoria. I have always played with cards on the table; I have never concealed my opinions. I have never endeavoured to twist them for a particular moment, and hon. members know that I expressed in Adelaide the same views as I am expressing to-day, and they have been strengthened and confirmed by what I have learned since. Therefore, having that great aspiration, of which we may all be justly proud, that we want a federation of Australia at the earliest possible moment, I do ask of my hon. friends from the other colonies, when we come to the later portions of this bill, when we come to the questions which will present themselves as to the powers of the senate, and as to the means of settling deadlocks, that they will recognise in their turn what we are recognising on our side now, that without conciliation, without compromise, without recognising and allowing, for the great body of public opinion amongst the populous colonies, federation will be impossible.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[2.26]:

I only continue this debate because I agree with what fell from my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, that it might be to the interest of Australian union in this colony if the Convention did not appear in any way to slur over the discussion of this matter. But I candidly confess that, in my view, it is a discussion which appears to be more suited to a debating society than to a serious political Convention, because I regard the equality of Austra lian states—and I limit my remarks to Australia—as one of those essential political facts which we ought no more to be called upon to justify than we are called upon to justify the principles of Magna Charta, or of trial by jury. I feel very much inclined to treat the arguments that have been urged with great force, and in a most interesting fashion, against equal representation as that great moralist, Dr. Johnson, treated the arguments which were urged against free-will, when he settled that interminable metaphysical controversy in the single sentence—"Sir, we are free; and there is an end on't." I would say, as to this political controversy, "We are equal, and there is an end on't." I quite recognise that it is conceivable to base a federation on a different theory; that, as my hon. and learned friend, Mr.
Isaacs, said, "You might have a federation in which it would be agreed that on certain matters there should be a complete unification, whereas on other matters there should be absolute isolation. I recognise freely that there may be a limited unification for certain subjects, and as regards those subjects a complete unification; but I decline to discuss these wire-drawn theories of political philosophers. We have to deal with facts as we find them to-day, and it is because to-day we are equal, because these states leave a separate, independent, national existence, that we come to deal with this question of federation on the basis of the facts as they exist. I really regret, if I maybe allowed to express my own opinion, that the views contended for so ably by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, did not find favour in Victoria in 1851. I deeply regret that his predecessors in office did not then take the view that he and his supporters take to-day, that for certain municipal purposes there should be a complete independence, and separate action of large states, and that for the larger matters of common concern the two States should be united. If that view had been taken in 1851, Victoria would be to-day a part of New South Wales. But I have always understood that that on which Victorians pride themselves more than anything else was that they, achieved a separate and independent national existence by their separation, which they celebrate every year, I believe, by a national holiday. It is because Victorians do not appear to me to bear in mind that the smaller states have exactly the same feeling with regard to their absorption by larger states that the Victorians themselves had in 1851 when they were a small state, that they fear to go into a union even for limited purposes. The smaller states fear to go into a union for the limited purposes contained in this bill, which will place them completely at the mercy of the larger colonies, even though one of the larger colonies be New South Wales, which has always shown them a more sympathetic countenance.
than has Victoria. There is this further fact: that no single movement towards the achievement of the Union of Australia has ever been made except upon the assumption of the equality of the states. Every conference that has been held to deal with federal matters has proceeded upon that basis. The larger state has had no more voting power than the smaller in dealing with any matter affecting the Post Office, the tariff, or defence.
There has not been a gathering of the states for any purpose whatever throughout our history that has not given equal voting power and equal strength and influence to the largest as well as the smallest state of the continent.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   Take the Federal Council Act!

Mr. WISE:
   Yes, take the Federal Council Act. Each state has equal voting power under it. Take the very act under which we sit. It provides that each colony shall send an equal number of delegates here. In other words, it provides for equal representation. I am very glad it does. If it did not, we should be entitled to ten delegates and Victoria would only be entitled to nine. I believe the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, occupies upon the Victorian list the same position as I occupy on the New South Wales list. He was last on the list. If it had not been for the equal representation which was agreed to in the Federal Enabling Act we should not have had the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, sitting amongst us. I regret that he should have turned with such unfilial ferocity upon a principle to which he owes his existence here. I contend that we, summoned as we are to consider what is to be the constitution

[P.316] starts here

for Australia. We are not making a constitution for Utopia. We are not making a constitution for the United States, and I decline to follow altogether Mr. Higgins or Mr. Isaacs in their new reading—very new reading
I may say—of old history. We are dealing with facts as we find them, recognising that in every movement towards union, in every expression of its public opinion, each state now has an equal voice with every other, and we are met to ask all the states to surrender some of their equality. It seems to me that when we make that demand we are all justified in saying, "We will surrender some portion of our equal power, but we will not obliterate our separate national identity." There is only one way I know of by which the effective voting power in each state as a separate national identity can be preserved, and that is by giving each state representation as a state. If I am asked on what principle I justify that, I retort with another question,
"Upon what principle do my friends justify the proposal that there shall be proportional representation in both houses?" I have read the speech of Mr. Higgins, and I have listened to the speech of Mr. Isaacs, and I notice the very large phrases about the power of the people, and the absolute right of the majority to prevail; and I apprehend that they justify their demand for proportional representation on the ground of the absolute right of the majority to rule in every case. I deny that the rule of the absolute majority has ever been a principle either in the British Constitution or in any of the constitutions of these colonies. It is not the prevailing principle to-day in Victoria. It is not the prevailing principle in New South Wales or Tasmania. If it were, Sydney and the county of Cumberland would return to this parliament more than one half of the representatives of New South Wales.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Does the hon. member propose that Bourke should have the same representation as Sydney?

Mr. WISE:

No; but what has been acted upon in this colony and in every other colony is that where you have different districts and separate local interests, those districts should be represented irrespective of the fact that they contain a minority of population. I care not for the theory which says that the majority ought always to rule. My answer is, that the majority, as a fact, does riot rule, and, personally, I think it is far preferable, within certain limits—based on the good sense of parliament and of the country—that different interests should have a separate representation, irrespective of population. I do not know how it may be in Victoria, but I do know that the divergence of interests between Sydney and the country is a constant source of conflict in this colony. I am told that there is the same divergence of interest between Melbourne and the country districts. I wonder whether Mr. Isaacs or Mr. Higgins, when they go back to Victoria, will urge throughout the country districts of that colony the absolute right of the majority to dominate over the minority. Could they urge to the farmers and to the inhabitants of the country districts that because there is a larger population in Melbourne than in any other quarter of the community, therefore there should be no representation according to local districts, that the vote should be taken all through the country as one electorate, in order that the overwhelming concentration of population in the city should have power to override the wishes of the minority. Would they tell the electors in Melbourne, "you are bond slaves; you are serfs to the minority; you are the majority in Melbourne, yet, owing to your absurd electoral system, which does not give one man in Melbourne the same voting power as is given to one man in the country, the majority is ruled by the minority."

Mr. SYMON:

It is not one vote one value!

Mr. WISE:

It is not one vote one value, and it ought not to be, and no one wishes that it should be in local politics. Why, then, do we ask for it in federal politics? We have adopted an electoral act which goes nearer to one vote one value than the electoral act of any other of the colonies; but even then we have given a different quota for suburban and city districts than we have given for the country districts.*

An Hon. MEMBER:

Are the interests of the several states different in respect to the subjects of common import?

Mr. WISE:

No; I think they are exactly the same.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Then the analogy does not apply!

Mr. WISE:

I think the demand for proportional representation which is being made now is exactly equivalent to that demand which has always been raised in our local parliament, that the town shall dominate the country. I believe the resistance to proportional representation arises very largely from the fact that the smaller colonies are agricultural, pastoral, or mining communities, with no large city populations. They see with the utmost clearness that if proportional representation is acceded to, they will be, in federal matters, as completely at the mercy of the large urban populations of Sydney and Melbourne, as they decline to be in their local affairs to-day. It is the old controversy between town and country in a new form; and that is why I do not apprehend great difficulty in carrying this bill past the criticism of its opponents and ensuring the support of the popular majority in this colony. The moment it is perceived that equal representation means an assurance to the country districts—to the agriculturists, pastoralists, and miners of the whole of the continent—that they shall not be dominated by city populations who have little knowledge of their wants or little sympathy with their local interests.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It can be all met in fixing the districts!
Mr. WISE:

What I wish to make clear is this: that the so-called small colonies—only small in population—are small in population because their interests are chiefly agricultural and associated with country pursuits. The colonies of Victoria and New South Wales are large because we have two great concentrated city populations. I, for one, think it would be a misfortune to put the control of the destinies of Australia completely in the hands of the city populations of Melbourne and Sydney. I am sure, when this matter is properly understood by the country voters, not only of this colony but of Victoria, this demand for proportional representation will greatly lose its strength, and they will see that their interests are bound up with the maintenance of that which the smaller states are now insisting upon: equal representation of each colony in the senate. It is said that there might be no diversity of interests

* Note by Mr. Wise on revision:-Omit "given a different quota for suburban and city districts than we have given for the country districts," and insert "in fact, differences between the numbers of electorates in order to secure adequate representation of local interests."} between the small states and the large states. I think that there is a diversity of interests, as I have already pointed out, but I agree with my hon. friends in thinking that that diversity of interests will not under any system of equal representation break out into open conflict between the small states and the large states. There is a diversity of interests which needs protection; there is not any diversity of interests which is likely to lead to conflict. It does seem strange that the statement that there should be no diversity of interests comes from those who insist that there is a danger to the large states from conceding to the small states equal representation in the senate. If there is no conflict of interests between the small states and the large states, what have we to fear—we who represent the large states? If the small states have no interests different from those of the large states, how inconsistent it is to argue that there will be a combination of the small states against the large states?

Mr. HIGGINS:

What have any of the small states to fear?

Mr. WISE:

I do not think they have anything to fear; but they have something to guard—something to guard, which, despite criticism and theories, is perhaps more precious to them than logical consistency. They have to guard their own historic identity, for which they care perhaps more strongly than we do, because such feelings are more strong in small communities than in large ones. They care for their provincial history, and take pride in their past, and, therefore, they decline to come into a union if they have to give up powers to such an extent that they will be altogether merged in communities in which their own identity will be obliterated. When the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, remarked that later speakers were insisting that federation consisted in dividing the powers and authorities-I think I am quoting his words exactly-into two distinct portions, and, therefore, that it was in no way inconsistent, as a matter of principle, to urge that the states a clear and broad line drawn between those matters and the matters left to the states, I admit that there would be no state interests to conserve, no possibility of any conflict arising. But has any such measure ever been drawn, has anyone ever proposed it? This bill certainly does not make that line of demarcation clear. It does not make it impossible that there should be any matters of states, as states, which should be affected. We have a clause in the bill which has been copied from the American Constitution-a most valuable one, without which federation would be incomplete-a clause providing the federal parliament with power to regulate the commerce. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, knows very well that it is that clause which has given rise to more disputes between the commonwealth and the States as states than any other clause in the American Constitution. I think that the state of New Jersey, for example, has been five or six times in the Supreme Court, suing officers of the federal government, or being sued by them, in order to assert those state rights which it claims-sometimes successfully and sometimes unsuccessfully-are being infringed by the action of the federal parliament.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Mr. WISE:

I admit that. I am only pointing out that if it were possible to draw a clear line of demarcation between those matters on which we were to unify and those matters distinctly conceded to the local government, I would admit at once that there would be no state interests to be conserved. But as the bill now stands, I think it is undeniable that there are certain interests of the state, as a state, which May be affected under the bill.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Incidentally!

Mr. WISE:

Incidentally-sometimes very, seriously. If there are, there is something more than mere sentimental historic justification with regard to the states being equally represented. If they are not represented in that way, they have no effective means of making their voice, as states, heard. It is idle to say that a state which has two representatives in a senate composed of thirty-six members, and has seven representatives in a chamber composed of eighty members, has any effective voting power in either house. I grant fully that the representation of opinion by the representatives of each state does not necessarily ensure that those views shall prevail, and that those opinions could be equally well represented by one representative as by six. But there can be no doubt that in the popular imagination-and, this is a matter in which we cannot afford to overlook sentiment, or in which we can appeal only to pure logic and reason-there can be no doubt that in the popular imagination the effective voting power of six men representing a state, when they are equal in number to the representatives of any other state, is likely to carry far more weight than the vote of two in a house of thirty-six.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It would not be two in a house of thirty-six!

Mr. WISE:

I am assuming they are not equal, but proportional. Finding that the states are equal to-day, and that they are unwilling to surrender their equality, is there any method—a practical question we have to deal with—of recognising that sentiment, which, whether well or ill founded, exists? It is that of giving some form of representation to the states as states. I do not know that either the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, or the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, would dispute that. They boldly take the bull by the horns, and, in the boldest and most emphatic way possible, deny the right of states to have any representation whatever as states. Putting that on one side, not as illogical, but as unworkable and impracticable, are we not driven to the conclusion that the only representation which is a possible one is representation on the basis of equality?

Mr. HIGGINS:

If the hon. and learned gentleman assumes that the other is impracticable—yes!

Mr. WISE:

I do assume it, and the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, assumes it.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I do not assume that it would be impracticable, but—

Mr. WISE:

I understand the hon. and learned member to mean that it is not impracticable in Utopia, but it is in Australia. I was very much struck by a curious omission in the arguments of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Higgins, and the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs. I have always regarded the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, as the apostle of proportional representation, or of hostility to unequal representation, and the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, asserted that the objections to equal representation were thoroughly well understood in Victoria, or were getting more understood there every week. Why have they not given us an alternative scheme? What proposal do they offer?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The answer is because, by a majority of 9, they thought there should be equal representation!

Mr. WISE:

But I ask my hon. and learned friend for an alternative. In our Parliament here, the matter was discussed on one side only—there was no presentation of the view of the smaller states at all in our Lower House. I ask the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, now, "If you are not going to have equal representation in the senate, what is the alternative scheme"?

Mr. HIGGINS:

A compromise between proportional representation and equal representation!

Mr. WISE:

What, compromise on a matter of principle! My faith in the hon. member is completely shattered.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I was prevented from answering the question fully by the howls around me. I intended to say, compromise to meet the groundless fears of the smaller states!

Mr. WISE:

If I thought the objections to equal representation were as great, if I believed as strongly in the absolute rule of the majority, as I understand Mr. Higgins does, I should decline to compromise. If you are going to compromise, on what basis will you compromise? Is the question only to be, then, what degree of inequality is to exist? Will you admit that there is to be a certain amount of inequality, or will you take your stand boldly, as the Lower House in our Parliament has done, upon this, that there should be absolute proportional representation?

Mr. HIGGINS:

I put forward a scheme in Adelaide which proposed a compromise!

Mr. WISE:
I remember the hon. member's scheme, and I apply this test to it. Under the hon. member's scheme—I will not weary the House by working out the figures in detail—would it not be possible for the senators who represent a minority of the population to outvote the senators who represent a majority? Under that scheme if you raise our representation to twelve, and treat the others proportionately, you will find the figures work out this way; Although the majority in the combination of the smaller states is less, there will be a majority still, and under any scheme you may propose, based on unequal representation, there will always be that danger. The opponents of equal representation never give this a moment's consideration. In the lightest and airiest fashion possible they simply will not have equal representation. They never suggest any other scheme of representation that is workable. Suppose, as has been assumed, that votes are given to each colony, not strictly according to population, but on a basis that will give the larger states a larger proportional representation in the senate. One plan suggested here was that New South Wales should have twelve senators, Victoria should have twelve, Queensland eight, South Australia six, Tasmania six, and Western Australia six. Any one adding up those figures will find that New South Wales and Victoria, the two large colonies, who in these curious calculations are always supposed to be going to combine harmoniously, would have twenty-four votes, while the other four colonies combined would have twenty-six votes. I throw out this challenge to some of these ingenious mathematical calculators who want to introduce their theories into the practical working of Australian politics—I ask if they can suggest any system of representation for each of the colonies in the senate which has not an equal basis and is not proportional, which will not be open to exactly the same objection as that which is urged against the system of equal representation, namely, that a majority of senators representing the smaller states, and, therefore, representing a minority of the population, would be able to outvote a minority of the senators representing a majority of the population in the two larger states?

Mr. HIGGINS:
Assuming that you have three senators for the first 100,000, and one for every 200,000 more, you will find you will have twenty-seven members of the senate, of which there will be seventeen from the larger states.

Mr. WISE:
That might work out on the present basis, but it would not work out as the populations altered.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Quite so; but I answered the hon. member's question!

Mr. WISE:

The hon. member does not suppose that we are framing a senate for today. We are framing a senate for all time. It cannot be done on any basis for permanent representation without rendering it possible under certain circumstances for the smaller states to combine and out-vote the larger states.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It all depends upon how the population alters. I cannot deal with all the centuries at once!

Mr. WISE:

But we have to frame a scheme which we can put forward to each state, and point out to them that even in the future they are not going to lose their separate national identity, which will be preserved for all time, just as it is to-day.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

One state might ultimately have a population greater than all the rest put together!

Mr. HIGGINS:

And it should have more votes!

Mr. WISE:

If we adopt the plan which has been suggested-and the only alternative plan which has been suggested by any legislature-that of proportional representation, we are in this difficulty. Of what use is the second chamber? I am one of those who have long been in a hopeless minority here-like a voice crying in the wilderness-in the belief that in all local parliaments for state purposes we ought only to have one chamber. But I find an overwhelming expression of public opinion against that view.

An Hon. MEMBER:

There is only one chamber in Ontario!

Mr. WISE:

One of the principal reasons why I hope to see federation accomplished is that, I believe, the inevitable result will be that in a very few years there will be only one chamber in all the component states. But we have most emphatically declared, not only by the several conventions, but by the popular voice throughout all the colonies, that federation should be accomplished with two chambers. That issue was put directly to the people of this colony; directly to the people of Victoria; directly to the people of South Australia; and we have come here charged with an absolute mandate from the electors of the whole of Australia to frame this constitution with a parliamentary machine composed of two chambers. Once concede that, and how impossible does it become to conceive of two chambers elected on the same suffrage, representing exactly the same class of people, the same interests, with no difference whatever between them, except that the second o

An Hon. MEMBER:
Not only a longer tenure of office, but also continuity of existence!

Mr. WISE:
Just so. I was greatly struck by one of many admirable speeches in the debate in the Victorian Assembly—and I may be allowed perhaps to say here that there was no parliament which appeared to me to discuss the Commonwealth Bill with greater acumen and lucidity or to take a broader view of the situation than the Parliament of Victoria, and I think this was very largely due to the fairness with which my hon. friend, Mr. Isaacs, presented the bill, and the lucidity with which he explained its clauses. One of the speeches on this point that made a great impression upon me, and I wish it had been more widely known, was that of Mr. Deakin in dealing with this proposal, and I hope my hon. friend will give the Convention the benefit of his reflections on this matter before the debate closes. I will only indicate briefly what was the trend of the argument of my hon. friend, as I understood it. He pointed out that if the views of those who insist that there shall be proportional representation in the senate prevail, all hope of limiting the power of the second chamber is gone—all hope of securing responsibility of government to the lower house is gone; because it will be impossible to deny to the second chamber coequal powers with those exercised by the first, if you constitute it on the same pattern, representing the same constituency, on the same franchise, and strengthen it by giving it a longer period of existence and a continuity of existence. So if there is any proposal more calculated to shook the true democrat, any proposal more likely to destroy the responsibility of ministers and the people, and to destroy the powers of the first chamber in dealing with money bills, and, in fact, to give up altogether those democratic demands with regard to the constitution of parliament which have been so loudly voiced both here and outside, it is this proposal which would suggest that the second chamber should be made stronger than the first, based upon the people's will just as the first, but having a greater strength from having a longer tenure and a continuity of existence.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Does the hon. member think that continuity of tenure will make it
I do; and that is why I propose, later on, to limit its powers in the most effective manner possible. As I am speaking as a representative of one of the colonies in which there has been a great deal of misapprehension as to the meaning of equality of representation, and in which the question has been greatly obscured by the use of misleading analogies and the statement of half truths, I propose to ask those who, on behalf of the large colonies, are afraid that they are going to give up something, and surrender themselves entirely to the mercy of the smaller colonies, to consider a very few facts. When we are told that one man in New South Wales is to have only one-eighth of the voting power of a man in Tasmania, and when pictures are drawn, as we have seen them drawn, showing the big Tasmanian and the little New South Welshman.

The Hon. E. Barton:

They made the New South Welshman one sixty-fourth of the size of the Tasmanian!

Mr. Wise:

That I should expect. We wonder how these ingenious calculators come to forget the distribution of voting power in the election of the first chamber. On the basis of this bill the voting power in the first chamber is as follows:-New South Wales gets twenty-six votes, Victoria twenty-four, Queensland nine for I decline to discuss federation upon the hypothesis that Queensland will not come in-South Australia seven, Western Australia five, and Tasmania five, making seventy-six in all. Among these seventy-six representatives New South Wales, the colony which is going to be at the mercy of the four small "robbers," the colony whom Queenslanders, South Australians, Western Australians, and Tasmanians are going to forget their divergent interests in order to combine to rob, has actually more voting power than the whole of them put together. Under these circumstances, speaking as a representative of New South Wales, it seems to me an absolute travesty of the truth, if it is not something more serious-a deliberate misleading of the public—to assert that by granting equal representation the colony of New South Wales is placed at the mercy of the other colonies.

An Hon. Member:

It is quite the other way!

Mr. Wise:

It is quite the other way. I could understand a Tasmanian saying, "If I am only going to have five representatives in a house of seventy-six, and only two in a senate of thirty-six, I will not join the federation; " but I cannot understand a voter of New South Wales who is acquainted with the facts having any such fears.
Mr. HIGGINS:
You admit that Tasmania has nothing to fear under a system of proportional representation!
Mr. WISE:
The hon. member absolutely refuses to consider the historical and political sentiments of great peoples. I decline to discuss this question as if it were a mere matter of chopping logic. I recognise that all the colonies have to a certain extent separate interests, separate histories, separate local traditions, and pride in their provincial history. It is that local patriotism which I wish to foster, not to destroy. I venture to think that those who have spoken so enthusiastically in favour of unification have ignored one of the most powerful causes of development in the United States, namely, the encouragement to local patriotism afforded by the separate existence of the states, of which the outward and visible symbol in the federal parliament has been the equal representation of the states in the senate. It is because this separate representation has impressed the popular imagination to keep alive the love of the provinces, and has been one of the most stimulating factors in the development of the United States, that I desire to continue the proposal which the bill contains. I admit that it would be possible under the bill for the representatives of the smaller states to block a proposal which was supported unanimously by the representatives of the two larger states; but I absolutely deny that the power of veto is the same power as the power of legislation.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
If it is the power of dominance, why do not the representative chambers claim that they shall have the power of veto alone, and give all their other powers to the upper chambers?
Mr. WISE:
That would be a very good test of the sincerity of the objections of those who insist upon proportional representation.
Mr. HIGGINS:
A veto along with a strongly fixed senate which cannot be moved!
Mr. WISE:
I am not dealing with the question of a strongly fixed senate, but with the question of equal representation.

An Hon. MEMBER:
It would be a good thing if we, had a strong senate in the separate colonies to stop extravagant expenditure!

Mr. Wise:

I hope that we shall not get into a budget discussion of the finances of either Victoria or New South Wales. I quite admit that a veto may in some circumstances be equivalent to a denial to the popular will of the achievement of its desire for a time; but I would point out a matter which I think has not received the full consideration it deserves. The power of veto is far less troublesome to a government exercising a delegated power than where there is a sovereign power. The power of veto in the second chamber in the case of a state situated as we in New South Wales, or as the people of Victoria are situated, might be a serious curb upon the popular will, an intolerable curb upon the popular vote. Because each of these provinces is to-day, within very wide limits—so wide as to be almost negligible—a sovereign body. The people of each of these provinces have a potential right to legislate on any subject affecting the welfare and the good government of the community. But the federal parliament will have no such power. It will exercise a strictly delegated authority, largely an authority conferred for the first time upon the voters of the commonwealth. If there is a power of veto, that power will not deprive any voter of a single province of any power he exercises to-day; and it will not prevent him from enjoying to the full the power he enjoys to-day. On the contrary, by federation he gets a larger effective voting power than he has to-day, because his voice can be felt through the ballot-box outside the limits of his own state. All that the power of veto does is to say, "You shall not exercise that power under certain conceivable circumstances to its utmost extent." Nothing is taken away from the voting power of the voters in the provinces, but new powers are granted to them. There are some who seriously urge that because, under very unlikely, but hypothetically conceivable circumstances, you will not be able to exercise your powers to the fullest extent, therefore, you should decline to accept any of them to any extent. Because you cannot get all you want; because, under certain circumstances, you will not be able to do all you could do under other circumstances, therefore you will not come into this union, you will not accept any of the larger powers of government, that the bill offers to the people of Australia. I venture to think that the difference between the power of veto when exercised in a federal state and when exercised in a government which only exercises delegated authority, is such a material difference that it ought to remove most of, if not all, the fears of some that the popular will might not be able to find expression.
But is there any serious doubt that if the people of Australia, as a whole, are deliberately determined that their will shall find expression in a certain direction, they will discover the means of giving effect to their wishes, and find that means through the constitution? With public opinion behind them, any ministry and any parliament may exercise their powers to the extremity of their constitutional limits. Without public opinion, neither ministry nor parliament can exercise the smallest of its functions, and if public opinion determines that a certain course shall be pursued, and if the large states have that public opinion, does anyone really believe that the smaller states would be able to withstand that powerful force for many months? There is only one conceivable set of circumstances in which the smaller states would be able to offer opposition to the will of the majority, and that would be some circumstances difficult to imagine—almost impossible to imagine—where the interests of all the smaller states as states were so seriously threatened that it was a matter vital to their very national existence that they should refuse to give way before public opinion in the larger colonies. I say that in such a case they ought not to give way. If there were a case—one can scarcely imagine it—where the inhabitants of two larger colonies were so regardless of their political responsibility as to pass a measure intended to destroy the existence of the smaller states, I say that these small states ought to have the safeguard and power of veto. If the matter in dispute is one of those matters which have up to the present divided the voters of Australia into two classes, if it be a question between progressivists and conservatives, then the popular will of Australia will prevail. I intend to propose, as I did in Adelaide, a scheme which, while securing to the states the utmost protection which state interests require, will provide to the people in those states an opportunity, to compel their senators to give proper effect to their wishes. If we can construct a measure which will bring the senate into touch with popular opinion in the states, and which will at the same time give to the states that measure of protection which, although never required to be put into use, will remain as a permanent safeguard against aggressive acts on the part of the larger states, then we shall have taken a step which will bring the constitution into harmony with the wishes of the people in every colony, and that certainly will not be out of harmony with the democratic sentiment of Australian public opinion. That vitalising force which pushes one bill on and stays the progress of another makes itself felt, and has its strongest expression in that chamber which is drawn directly from the people, and which represents a majority of the people. But does anyone doubt that the people of the larger states represented in that chamber and in the senate will be as powerful and will have as much effect in modifying the views of the representatives of the smaller states as public opinion in London or in Paris modifies opinion in the provinces.
When those who live in the larger states hear others speak of the tendency of the smaller states to dominate the larger, they cannot help thinking that those who use such language ignore the overwhelming potency of the influence of large cities. If a large city is more seething with great ideas, and if those ideas commend themselves to the people, of the larger states, depend upon it that there will be a considerable minority in all the smaller states in the common way of thinking. The ideas will penetrate from one state to another, so that in time, if we have the means of dissolving the senate - of bringing it into touch with its constituents - we shall ensure that the popular will will prevail in all matters affecting the popular interest as distinguished from the interest of states as states. I venture to urge, therefore, that I have answered the question put by the hon. member, Mr.
Higgins, and that I have shown that equal representation is not only a practical necessity, but that as regards the principle, it can be justified in theory, and has also a sound basis in Australian history. I am very unwilling indeed to quote authorities, but so many authorities have been already quoted that I cannot help referring to a quotation from Mr. Justice Story, which, although it happens to have been written forty years ago, is as true to-day as it was then, and in which he points out two grounds for the existence of the senate, and emphasises a double reason for its existence in connection with our proposal. The senate is not merely a state house - it is something more; it is also a revising chamber - a revising chamber which we determine shall be free from the faults, as some of us consider them - I hope I shall not cause controversy by calling them faults - of the revising chambers of the separate colonies, by being more in touch with popular sentiment; and, being kept by the device which we hope to introduce into this bill, continually in touch with public opinion.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Why is a statehouse particularly fit to be a revising chamber?

Mr. WISE:
I do not know. I want to know how you are going to get any other?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
How is it that it generally is so?

Mr. WISE:
How are you going to get any other revising chamber? We want a revising chamber, so we have been told, and we have been instructed to provide a revising chamber in this constitution.
An Hon. MEMBER:

The lower house is also a revising chamber for the legislation of the upper house!

Mr. WISE:

Mr. Justice Story, referring to the statement that the senate was a mere accident, says:

Whatever may now be thought of the reasoning of the contending parties no person who possesses a sincere love of country and wishes for the permanent union of the states can doubt that the compromise actually made was well founded in policy, and may now be fully vindicated upon the highest principles of political wisdom and the true nature of the government which was intended to be established. It may not be unprofitable to review a few of the grounds upon which this opinion is hazarded. In the first place, the very structure of the general government contemplated one partly federal and partly national. It not only recognised the existence of state governments but perpetuated them, leaving them in the enjoyment of a large portion of the rights of sovereignty, and giving to the general government a few powers and those only which were necessary for national purposes. The general government was therefore upon the acknowledged basis one of limited and circumscribed powers. The states were to possess the residuary powers. Admitting, then, that it is right among a people thoroughly incorporated into one nation that every district of territory ought to have a proportional share of the government, and that among independent states bound together by a simple league there ought, on the other hand, to be an equal share in the common councils whatever might be their relative size or strength-both of which propositions are not easily controverted-it would follow that a compound republic partaking of the character of each ought to be founded on a mixture of proportional and equal representation. The legislative power being that which is predominant in all governments ought to be above all of this character, because there can be no security for the general government or the state governments without an adequate representation, and an adequate check on each in the functions of legislation. Whatever basis, therefore, is assumed for one branch of the legislature, the antagonist basis should be assumed for the other. If the house is to be proportional to the relative size and wealth, and population the states, the senate should be fixed upon an absolute equality as the representative of the state sovereignty. There is so much reason and justice and security in such a course that it can with difficulty be overlooked by those who seriously consult the public good without being biassed by the interests or prejudices of their peculiar local position. The equal vote allowed in the senate is in this view at once a constitutional recognition of the sovereignty remaining in the states, and an instrument of the preservation of it. It guards them against-what they meant to resist as improper-a consolidation of the states into one simple republic, and on the other hand the weight of the other branch counterbalances an undue preponderance of state interests tending to disunion. Another and most important advantage arising from this ingredient is the great difference which it creates in the elements of the two branches of the legislature.

That is the answer to the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, who asks why the state chamber should be a revising chamber? It is differently constituted from the other chamber. It would be no use to have a revising chamber constituted exactly similar to the chamber whose work it is intended to revise.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The American Constitution is compounded of checks and balances!

Mr. WISE:

I admit that.

Another and most important advantage arising from this ingredient is the great difference which it creates in the elements of the two branches of the legislature which constitutes a great desideratum in every practical division of the legislative power. In fact, this division, as has been already intimated, is of little or no intrinsic value, unless it is so organised that each can operate as a real check upon undue and rash legislation. If each branch is substantially framed upon the same plan, the same plan, the advantages of the division are shadowy and imaginative; the visions and speculation of the brain and not the waking thoughts of statesmen or patriots.

I commend this to those who urge that there should be proportional representation:

It may be safely asserted that for all the purposes of liberty and security, of stable laws and of solid institutions, of personal rights and of the protection of property, a single branch is quite as good as two, if their composition is the same and their spirits and impulses the same. Each will act as the other does; and each will be led by the same common influence of ambition, or intrigue, or passion, to the same disregard of the public interests, and the same indifference to, and prostration of, private rights. It will only be a duplication of the evils of oppression and rashness with a duplication of obstruction to effective redress.

These last words say, in words that I do not wish to put into any other form, all that can be said against proportional representation. It is remarkable that this demand for proportional representation should come from two such distinct classes in this community. I can well understand that those who urge that there should only be one chamber in a federal parliament should urge that there should be proportional representation in the senate, because when they get that they get the advantages of one chamber with the further advantage of having an increased number of legislators. But I fail altogether to comprehend how, on any theory consonant with the desire to achieve federation, the extreme tories should urge proportional representation. I confess that when I find the surly tories of the Legislative Council joining hands with the extreme socialists of the labour party to enforce this scheme of proportionate representation, I regard it with the utmost suspicion.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Is the system of proportionate representation in force in New South Wales, with practically equal electorates?

Mr. WISE:
Practically not; it is more nearly so than in any other colony.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Substantially so!

Mr. WISE:
No. We have a larger quota in the towns than in the country-I forget the figures.*

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
A small margin!

Mr. WISE:
Although it is a small margin it tots up to a considerable amount in the towns. I am not going to trespass longer upon the attention of the Committee. I have endeavoured, more fully than was necessary for the purposes of this debate, but not more fully than was required in order to bring out prominently the main features of this discussion, to deal with a matter that for all practical purposes is settled. I, personally, think that it is something more than a mere matter of expediency; I believe that the system of equal representation will ensure that this constitution can be adopted by every province without undue detriment or depreciation of any smaller province, and without any unfair exaltation or advancement of any of the larger provinces, whilst at the same time it will preserve that which I regard as of the utmost value to the national life of the country, the spirit of local patriotism, which is the moving impulse of great national advances.

The Hon. A.J. PEACOCK (Victoria)[3.25]:
Seeing that one of my colleagues from Victoria has supported the amendment, and that the debate yesterday was conducted by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Glynn, from South Australia; the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, from New South Wales; and also the hon. and learned member, Sir John Downer, from South Australia; and that we had a speech from the Premier of South Australia this morning, and one from my colleague, Mr. Isaacs, and another from Mr. Wise, all gentlemen belonging to the legal profession, and all occupying prominent positions in connection with the bar in their respective colonies, and all well informed on the subject, and all being able to quote from text books the history of this question for many years past, I am surprised at my own rashness, as a layman, in stepping forward to discuss the question at all. But the reason that has caused me to offer a few remarks on this subject is this: At the previous convention I was a patient listener to all the observations from the different members, and belonging to the younger generation of politicians, and having taken a great interest in federal matters for many years in my own colony, and knowing well that if every one exercised the full right of speech with regard to this question we should not get on with the work that we have been sent here to do, and noticing that several of our legal friends get up to offer a few remarks which spin out to a great length, I think it would be wise for me to offer a few remarks on this question, remembering that it is one that will really settle the whole business that has brought us together here. I see my hon. and learned friend, Dr. Quick, from Victoria. He and myself for many years past, long before we thought there was going to be a

Note by Mr. Wise on revision: Omit, "We have a larger quota in the towns than in the country," insert, "By the use of a variable margin our quotas are not the same for all constituencies."
enthusiastic worker in the cause; I have visited many parts of the colony of Victoria—and the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin, has done the same—so that we have become acquainted with the people in the country districts as well as the citizens in the towns; therefore, we are, fortunately, in the position, through the medium of the Australian Natives' Association, of having the electors generally well educated, not only with regard to the general sentiment, but also as to the principles of federal union; and I do not hesitate to say that I have never heard seriously discussed out of doors, in our own colony, that it was wise to go into a system of proportional representation.

Mr. HIGGINS:

There is the difficulty. It has been assumed right all through, and now it is too late to change!

The Hon. A.J. PEACOCK:

I cannot deal with interjections. I must go on in my own way, and I will express what I believe to be the view of my own colony. My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Wise, who preceded me, took away, as nearly every speaker does, some of the points which I intended to deal with, though, no doubt, I should not have done it so effectively as he has done. I remember well when it seemed that the federal movement was about to drop to the ground, after the Convention of 1891 in our own colony, that my learned friend, Dr. Quick, took a great deal of interest in the matter, and consulted the political federal leaders in this colony, also in Queensland, in our own colony, and in South Australia. After he had done so, I had the privilege and the honor of being consulted by him with regard to what views the Australian Natives' Association held— I then occupying the position of president— as to the best means of trying to awaken interest. I am not going to enter into all the details, but I remember well the doctor asking my opinion as to the true constitution of this Convention, namely, that it should consist of an equal number of representatives from the different colonies, thus conceding, at the very outset, the principle that we have been advocating ever since, and that was really passed in the Adelaide Convention—that the interests of the different colonies as states required equal representation. I am not going to argue whether it is a right, or whether it should be given as a concession to states, but I argue in this way: It is of no use for us to go on with the work one bit further if the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, be passed. That view is a view held strongly in the colony which I have the honor, with my colleagues, to represent. I quite agree with what the hon. member, Mr. Wise, has said in his excellent speech just now, when he showed that you cannot go in for proportional representation as a compromise. I may not be as clear as others; but, as I have understood the debate yesterday and today, it strikes me that there are only two positions open to us-the first, actual representation accord-[528]ing to population in the senate, or, second, equal representation. If you come to that position, and my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, does not come as far as that, then you may as well concede that there should be no second chamber whatever. I do not think any one from my own colony, or those who have heard anything about me in the other colonies, would say that I have been a conservative or a tory in our own local politics. I have been one of those who always advocated that Parliament should represent, not only the manhood of the country, but also the interests of the country. I never have advocated in my own colony that the electorates of the lower chamber should be framed on the basis of exactly equal population; for, if that were done, numbers of our great country interests would be completely sacrificed. That has been recognised in, our own colony and in the very bill brought in by Sir George Turner's Government last year in both houses, providing for the reduction of members this very principle was recognised. Why then should the second chamber not be elected on the basis of equal representation? Simply because it has to represent the interests of the state as a state. As a very patient listener to all that transpired both in Adelaide and here up to the present, I do confess that it has seemed to me that from the very fact that we did not have a full debate on this principle at Adelaide at the outset-because some of us representing the larger colonies were prepared to recognise, whether it was a matter of right or a matter of concession, that there should be equal representation-because that was admitted by the two larger colonies-it is my honest opinion, and I never have failed to express it, that some of the representatives from some of the smaller colonies were led to make a demand for such powers as in my opinion I believe the colonies of Victoria and New South Wales would never concede. Therefore the very fact that we agreed at Adelaide to an adjournment has shown the wisdom of not dealing too hastily with this and other matters. That is shown by the speech of Mr. Symon. We all know he is an ardent federationist, and people in my colony have been taught to believe that he is an extreme tory; but we now recognise that he is prepared, as we, have been prepared all along to admit,
I do not care what any one may say, that we will submit a constitution to the people which will not be framed on absolute logic. It will have to be based on such principles that we, living in these times, can cast aside what occurred one hundred years ago, because the circumstances then were absolutely and entirely different. All the authorities quoted to-day and yesterday, which were supposed to bear on this question, will, in my judgment, have no influence upon the public mind outside. The people will look at the circumstances which exist in Australia today, and they will say this—remembering that there are larger colonies with different interests, remembering these two chambers are to represent, one the people and the other the states, what are the powers proposed to be conferred? We who represent the larger colonies—and that is why I am sorry the amendment has been moved—should recognise the same spirit which was displayed at Adelaide by Mr. Henry, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Brown, and also the Right Hon. C.C. Kingston and Mr. Glyn, who cast aside for a moment the fact that they only represented their own province and their own colony. They felt, as every man here feels to-day, no matter what his views on this question may be—that if you do not provide equal representation in the senate the movement for federation is as dead as a door-nail. That is what my hon. friends recognised at Adelaide. That is what we have to deal with to-day. I maintain, no matter what the consequences may be, that the people of Victoria, despite all that has been said to the contrary, will be prepared to accept this constitution providing for equal representation, provided there will be some safeguard in case of any difficulties arising between the two chambers.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN (Victoria)[3.38]:

I would not have followed my hon. colleague, the Chief Secretary for Victoria, had it not been for the fact that possibly I might not have another opportunity of contributing a few sentences to this debate. The ground has now been so thoroughly traversed, the difficulties of the field have been so cleared by those who preceded me, that I certainly do not think it necessary to apologise for the brevity of the observations I propose to offer. I take it that our views upon this question, however much they may be supported or illustrated, are not likely to be altered by the citation of historical precedents or text-book quotations. Not that such aids to argument are to be despised—quite the contrary; but my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, and the Attorney-General of Victoria on one side, and Mr. Symon and Mr. Wise on the other, have, I think, contributed to this Convention Hansard all that is necessary in that direction. Whatever opinion we may hold as to the proceedings taken in the United States—whether we consider with my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, that equal representation was the cause, or, as I consider was merely a condition of the great eruption which occurred in the republic of the west—is, after all, comparatively immaterial. The issue which faces us is, first of all, a practical issue. My hon. friend, Mr.
Peacock, gave me an undue measure of credit when he remarked that I had in any respect devoted the same attention to the preaching of the federal cause to the Australian Natives' Association in Victoria as he has done.

An Hon. MEMBER:
You have done a good deal!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I have not contributed a tithe as much as the hon. member, Mr. Peacock, who, as president of the association, has undertaken for several years that most onerous duty, discharging it with an ability and enthusiasm with which I think members from that colony are now familiar. As a mere private member of that association it has been rarely my lot to contribute in the same way. I introduce that fact for the purpose of basing another upon it. I fear that my hon. friend, Mr. Peacock, addressing as he does that body which with us is practically the heart and soul of the federal movement, and which consists almost without exception of enthusiasts in the federal cause, has undervalued the strength of the support which is likely to be rallied to the cause of which in this Convention my hon. friend, Mr.
Higgins, has constituted himself the standard bearer. It seems to me therefore that we should err if we allowed this debate to close-without each of us contributing his mite, especially those who represent the larger colonies, and especially those whose politics are usually associated with the implicit acceptance of that doctrine on which the hon. member, Mr.
Higgins, relies as the basis of his argument-the doctrine of the rule of the majority. We have to be prepared to show to the citizens of Victoria and New South Wales that the principle of the rule of the majority, as applied in our constitution, is not seriously interfered with, is not seriously impaired by the proposal for equal representation in the senate of the federation. So much has been said by my hon. and learned friend, Mr.
Wise, in that stirring, admirable, and effective speech of his, on this score that I have little to contribute. But, speaking as he does to a constituency which will largely prejudge this issue by, as it seems to me, a misapplication of that all-important principle, that fundamental principle of the British Constitution, the rule of the majority, I will venture to add a few words even to what he has said. In the first place, I think my hon. and learned friend has applied that doctrine with a too rigid radicalism to the interpretation of what our constitution really contains. Our constitution embodies the principle of the rule of the majority, not as its working principle or method, but as its final and ultimate test of the work done. If we succeed in embodying in this federal constitution the principle of the rule of the majority as the final and ultimate court of appeal on great public questions, we shall have imparted to it all the authority which it possesses and all the sway which it enjoys under our own constitution.

Mr. LYNE:

What if you don't?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

I must confess, if we do not, I shall take an entirely different view of this problem. I must confess, if we do not, that the colony of Victoria, as far as I with my opportunities can judge, will take an entirely different view of this problem. It is because, like the Attorney-General of Victoria, I am counting in advance on some constitutional safeguards being added to the bill, that I am using these arguments.

Mr. WISE:

So are we all!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Higgins, whom I congratulate as others have justly done on the courage and consistency with which he has advocated his view in the face of an adverse majority, is entitled to exult, as he undoubtedly did exult, in the fact that since we parted at Adelaide, he has had on his side an exhibition of hearty support and encouragement from great constitutional bodies, in this colony in particular, and from large numbers of representatives in other legislatures. That adds, if anything were needed to add, even more force and emphasis to the arguments which he has submitted to us. But let me urge a reconsideration of the doctrine of the rule of the majority, as he, appears inclined to apply it in this particular instance-and I speak of him, although of course my hon. friend, Mr.
Carruthers, practically adopts the same position, and puts it from another standpoint with great force. These gentlemen appear to me to be endeavouring to apply the doctrine of the rule of the majority in a manner which would be absolutely inconsistent with our constitutions as they exist.
If it is to be pushed to the length to which they go, I fail to see how they can stop short of the declaration which my hon. and learned friend, Mr.
Wise, has made in favour of a single chamber. If proportional representation is the only means by which majority rule is to be expressed, and it is to govern absolutely, I fail to see the purpose of a second chamber;
in fact, we should see in the future the disappearance of even the first chamber, and as a substitute legislation by referendum. This is the inevitable conclusion of their argument, if it is to be pushed to the extreme-

Mr. HIGGINS:

There will be no debate under a mere referendum!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

The second chamber as we have it exists for the purpose of debate, for the purpose of fuller and further consideration, and if my hon. friend's argument is to apply, it must be swept away. You are reduced to one chamber, and is only another step to say that the press—that great organ of public opinion, which discusses every problem presented to a legislature—is in itself a sufficient means of arousing and expressing public opinion, and all you need are, first, leading articles in the newspapers, and then the referendum to decide what your legislation shall be. I am pushing the argument to an absurdity, I confess; but if my hon. friend is to insist on a logical deduction from this principle, so as to exclude any other possible means of representation in the second chamber, except proportional representation; I fail to see how his principle of an absolute and unqualified, and, apparently, immediate rule of the majority would leave him any second chamber, or any first chamber, or any recourse existing, except a voice which will speak to the people, and the answer from the people which declares their will.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I have been accused of being logical!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

If I offend my hon. friend by terming him logical, I will willingly withdraw the charge. I am perfectly sure that this is the last thing he desires.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I never knew of a debate in which a man was accused so much of being logical.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

As my hon. friend knows, logic, though an excellent servant, is a bad master in some cases, because the whole of your case is assumed in the premises with which you start.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The hon. and learned member accuses me of being illogical, and I want to agree with what he says!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

Scarcely so much as that. I fail to see that my hon. friend has yet indicated any reason why he should pause where he does pause, or propose what he does propose, if he accepts, as he appears to accept, the one doctrine of the rule of the majority as the sole guide in constitution making. I hold that two chambers and an executive such as we are aiming at, form no less an important part of constitutional government than the ultimate decision of the majority, and are, in fact, the essential means by which we arrive at a decision as to what the will of the majority really is. You cannot take away any part of that mechanism without disarranging your whole scheme, and therefore my hon. friend is omitting grave and important factors which must be included in his premises. He cannot apply his logic, correct as it is within limits, without making the problem he is solving quite another one from that which is being submitted to us. The problem which is submitted to us is, not simply to provide for the rule of the majority, but to provide for the rule of the majority by constitutional means-by those means which long experience has sanctified to us, and than which human experience has yet not been able to discover better. We have now first, the representation of the people by those to whom they delegate a certain measure of their authority-who discuss in a first chamber in administrative detail, in legislative detail, the whole of the business submitted to them. From that chamber it passes, when it has received the impress of its authority, to a second chamber, to a chamber of revision, review, and reasonable delay; a chamber in which and by means of whose criticism the public-the electors-are enabled to arrive at those right and reasonable conclusions, that ripe and reasoned judgment on which action is finally taken. You can no more say that this last step in the argument is the only valid step any more than you can say, if you ignore all our existing constitutional machinery, that you have fairly described its character. So I am not prepared to admit that the hon. member has been logical in dealing with this problem. I say he has been logical in dealing with the problem as he stated it; but that his statement is imperfect.

Mr. HIGGINS:
He omitted those important factors which require to be taken into account!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
The hon. member is logical within limits.

Mr. LYNE:
Does not the hon. member think the introduction of the referendum to a large extent destroys the principle of equal states representation?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I shall have much to say when we come to the referendum.

Mr. LYNE:
It all hinges upon that now!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
No; I do not think it does, because, excellent as the referendum is, much as can be said for it, it is not the only means of solving difficulties and deadlocks. Even if I were to reply to the hon. member at length on that point I should not be able to give him the answer he desires. It is inadvisable to enter on a discussion of the question of the referendum now, especially as I am anxious to fulfil my promise in regard to the greatest possible brevity. I will admit that beyond the objection I have already taken in the Victorian Legislative Assembly, and to which Mr. Wise was kind enough to call attention, and which, therefore, I need not elaborate except to repeat that to allow the senate to be elected by the proportional method would be to deprive the Legislative Assembly of its strongest argument why there should be differing powers in the two bodies, and different duties discharged by them. Why, if you made the two bodies identical in franchise, in constituencies except as regards their boundaries, in the qualification for representatives, and the qualification for electors, I fail to see the necessity for a second chamber at all; or, if you have a senate, I fail to see how you could logically refuse them co-equal powers. Putting that aside, no liberal, so far as I know, can see any objection to proportional representation.

Mr. HIGGINS:
There is always that objection to liberalising the upper house!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
If Australia were at this time unoccupied territory, and it remained for the Convention, as a body of imported authorities to determine a constitution for the territory, there is no doubt that first of all we should adopt very different boundaries from those which exist, and having adopted different boundaries it is probable that we might take equal representation, but it is more probable that we should adopt proportional representation. If we were a body of men coming from the mother country, saturated with the principles and doctrine of the British Constitution, we should certainly not create a second chamber either with proportional or equal representation.
We should create it on a nearer approach to British precedent, and I am far from sure that we would not be taking a wiser course than that proposed.
But we are not dealing with a sketch map—with an unpopulated continent;
we are dealing with settled Australia, with settled communities, absolutely independent of each other, enjoying all the rights and privileges of self-government, and without exception, absolutely self sufficient. I make no exception. The colony of Tasmania is sometimes alluded to as an insignificant portion of Australia. I am far from holding that opinion.
Tasmania is not only much larger than several European states, but it contains within itself, so far as I know it, natural resources and potentialities of development which will enable it, in a comparatively few years, to outstrip those European states. There is nothing in the circumstances of Tasmania to forbid a policy of separate existence being carried on for all time, and with great success. If that is true of Tasmania, it is absolutely and unequivocally true of every colony of the group. Every one of these great colonies possesses within itself sufficient resources and powers to stand alone. Meeting, as we do, equal numbers of representatives from those equally self-governing states, equally capable of self-sufficient life, we naturally meet on an equal platform, and it seems to me that the proposal for equal representation is therefore one which is naturally laid before us for our consideration. And it is one which, if it does involve, as the hon. member asserts—and as I admit—that an elected body should be constituted by equal representation of units without regard to population, means a sacrifice and concession on the part of larger populations, accustomed, as the final test of all their constitution working, to, adopt, the principle of the rule of the majority. It is a sacrifice and it is a concession; but, on the other hand, have we no sacrifices or concessions to ask, and do not we expect to obtain them? Are we to ask these smaller communities to simply merge themselves in a great Australian state and disappear for ever? Are we, to expect them to accept a number of members in both houses which shall leave them absolutely powerless on those rare occasions when a question affecting state existence does arise? Are we to say that they are to commit themselves absolutely to our hands in a sense in which they, cannot ask us to commit ourselves to their hands while we have proportional representation in the house? Although Mr. Higgins admits this difficulty, and fairly meets it, as he does every difficulty he sees, by modifying his demands for proportional representation—

Mr. HIGGINS:

I say the fear is wholly imaginary!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

From his point of view the hon. member fairly meets that by his proposal as to their scale of representation. But even then we require to obtain from this Convention two other important concessions, one of which is already embodied in the bill in part, while the other is not yet introduced into the bill. The first is the distinction between the, two houses in regard to the control of matters of finance—a distinction without which, to my mind, our system of government cannot be carried on, a distinction without which it would be impossible for the taxpayers of the future federation to retain that just control over their contributions to the revenue, since these ought necessarily to be governed by their numerical strength. On financial questions, it appears to me that we have to ask the representatives of the smaller states, when conceding them equal representation, to concede to us the control by the taxpayers numerically of the expenditure of the commonwealth. Then we come to the other necessity which has been alluded to-the introduction into the bill of that which is not at present in it-of some means of providing for a solution of disputes between the two houses-some means of imposing a limit on the veto which the second chamber is able to, exercise. We may refer the chamber itself or the question in dispute back to, the constituencies, we may take a means, preferable to met of sending the Senate representatives back to their constituents, to ask for a renewal of their confidence, or another means, suggested from Victoria, by which those constituents would, be asked the question directly as to whether they, approved or not of the proposals in dispute between the two chambers. Finally the question as to whether any danger exists in this concession of equal representation is the last point to, which, I propose to address myself; and I submit, without hesitation, that, granted the two conditions to which I have referred, the concession can be made without any real danger to any substantial or permanent interest of the great body of the people of the, future federation. I say that, admitting that at the outset, not only does the demand for equal representation possess a certain amount of equity-as we meet here on an equal footing-but also because I take it we desire to preserve in the future the dignity of the separate states. We do not wish to see, any of the communities possessed of all the appendages of self-government, possessed of independent parliaments, independent governors, with wide, and undefined privileges-sovereign states, except for the powers included in this bill-we do not desire to see them so reduced in dignity that, in any future federal house of parliament, their representation may be reduced to an insignificant minority. We could not do that without largely impairing the machinery of government which would exist in those colonies, and upon which they must be dependent still for their legislation and administration in most, of the practical interest of their daily life. I say that they are entitled to this concession, and that it implies no obstruction to the final rule of the majority. I say so for this reason: I have always contended that we shall never find in the future federation certain states ranked against certain other states, or that party lines will be drawn between certain states which happen to be the more populous and those which do not happen to be so populous. I have said before, and venture now to repeat with emphasis, that this appears to me a wholly mistaken reading of the situation. What is absolutely certain is that, as soon as this federation is formed, parties will begin to declare themselves in every state. Every state will be divided. Our form of government is not susceptible of continuous or successful working without parties.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Not of states against states!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
I concede that to the hon. member. It partly helps his argument, and partly, helps mine. The crucial question that we have to ask ourselves is not as to the voting power to be given to the less populous states as against the more populous states; but how—with equal representation granted—those votes will be employed by political parties. There is in every colony of the group a liberal party and a conservative party.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
Liberal and socialist—there is no conservative!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
The good old English names of liberal and conservative are sufficient for my purpose. If the hon. member sits uneasily under either name, he can coin another for his own particular benefit. There exists in each colony a party that can be considered liberal, and also a party that can be considered conservative. Is it not, then, inevitable that so soon as the federation is formed, the liberal parties in the different colonies will coalesce and throw in their lot with each other; and that the conservative, parties in the different colonies will do the same, irrespective of state boundaries altogether. There is the progressive party, which is aiming at extending the liberties and rights of the masses of the electors which will range itself on one side, and the party who think that we have progressed, or are progressing too fast or far, will range themselves on the other side. There will not be any question of large or small states, but a question of liberal or conservative. Then, as to the senate, how does the question of equal representation affect parties? It affects them to this extent: that, as in the American Union, the leaders of those parties wA defeat in the smaller states, if parties were evenly balanced, might mean a defeat in the federal parliament, although there was a majority of the representatives of the larger states. That must be admitted.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Under equal representation!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Yes, and, to some extent, under almost any other system of representation. What is the effect in America? It is that the party efforts, the party speakers, the party energy, are concentrated on doubtful states, whether large or small. Is that an evil? It is not an evil. I say, on the one hand, that if you had or could have a second chamber completely proportional in representation, what you might see would be this: A party strong enough to seize the two great colonies, or wherever the larger population might be, could treat with contemptuous indifference the outlying parts of Australia, feeling, "There are not sufficient votes there to be of importance to us in either chamber."

Mr. HIGGINS:
Does the hon. and learned gentleman call only the smaller states doubtful, and not the larger ones?

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
They might be either one or the other. In America, parties concentrate their efforts on the doubtful states, whether the states are small or large, and the same would be done here. But the principle of equal representation has this value-and I consider that it is no inconsiderable value, from a practical point of view,-it compels both parties to study the interests of the small states to take care that in their programme they include no proposition aimed at the liberties or privileges of those states, or their industries, or anything that affects them in a material manner. I think that this is a perfectly legitimate end. I do not believe that the extra burden of responsibility which it imposes on political parties in the larger states is one that they can complain of. In the lower house, the larger states will have a great majority of members, and their safety will be assured; but if they wish to keep the government of the commonwealth, they must study the interests of the small states to such an extent that they will be able to gain a majority in the senate also.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Like Nevada!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
Yes, like Nevada. Unfortunately, owing to the peculiar circumstances of that state, which I happen to have visited-confined as it is wholly to its mineral wealth, and concentrated as that wealth rests in the hands of a particular number of wealthy men, who are interested in obtaining for the silver which is there produced special concessions in the United States—a difficulty has arisen. I fail to see the slightest possibility of an occurrence of such a difficulty in Australia. The states here are so few proportionately, and they are so large and important that I fail to see any possibility of the occurrence of those particular American difficulties. What I say, to put it briefly, is that in practical working-as a matter of practical politics-the states will be fought for by the two parties, liberal and conservative, and that the effect of equal representation will be that, instead of passing those minor states by as lightly as they might do under proportional representation in the senate, the party seeking to win or retain power will pay as much attention to the small states as to the large states. That makes for the good of everybody-for the good of politics. Now I come, I think, to my last point, and it is, that on this question, at all events, we are not taking a leap in the dark; we are not proposing that equal representation should be granted without having before us illustrations of what we may expect will be produced by a house elected on the basis of the proposed franchise in this bill. Fortunately for us I can pass by without allusion the Chamber over which my hon. friend, Sir William Zeal, so admirably presides. If we wish to discover what the future senate must be we must look to a house not elected on a restricted franchise, but to a legislative council such as that of South Australia, elected on a franchise practically almost as broad as that of the Legislative Assembly.

Mr. TRENWITH:

It is not broader than ours, except that the qualification is different!

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:

The qualification is different, and the voting qualification is also different. The hon. member will see that as what he says is accurate, it supports, as he intended it should, my argument, for the future federal senate will be based on a more liberal basis than that of the Legislative Council of South Australia. Any difference there is between the two bodies tolls in favour of the future federal senate from a liberal point of view, and therefore supports my argument; but I say that in the Legislative Council of South Australia we already see that, even with large provinces and under certain local restrictions, the liberal party of that colony, which is as advanced as the liberal party in any colony in Australia, is able to obtain very considerable representation. Under the same circumstances, most undoubtedly the federal electors of New South Wales and Victoria, as well as of South Australia, will certainly return a large proportion of liberals to the federal senate. I go further. In Western Australia and Tasmania there is a great mining development at the present time. Mining development means miners, and miners are liberals; and from both those colonies, as well as the other colonies of the group, there will be no small infusion of liberal principles in politics into the future federal senate. I observed with some surprise the energy, enthusiasm, and unflinching devotion which my friend and colleague, Mr. Higgins, threw into the discussion of this question. It appears to me that so far from the grant of equal representation, carrying in its train the dangers which seem to appal the hon. member, and to affright him almost from the proposal of federation, they are comparatively small in themselves—that the sacrifice or concession which the more populous colonies are asked to make is not an unreasonable sacrifice or concession. It is one which preserves the dignity of the communities to which it is made, and should be the means in the future of simply diffusing a wider political education, and a more diffused party action—when parties arise, as undoubtedly they will—in the federal commonwealth. Now, I think I have said on this question practically all that it is necessary for me to add to what I have said previously at Adelaide and elsewhere. I could perfectly understand if this were a proposition for combining with these colonies the French settlement of New Caledonia and the German settlement of New Guinea, and other foreign settlements in our neighbourhood; or if any of our colonies were inhabited by populations of different blood and different race, such as the South American republics are—if the proposal was that we should unite with them,

I could understand the apprehensions with which my hon. friends approach this question. But, situated as we are, in colonies which are more united, as has already been pointed out in this Chamber, in blood, in race, in political opinions, political ways of thinking, and methods of political action than any other communities on the face of the globe, why is it that we should regard with apprehension the proposal to give to certain smaller bodies of these our own fellow-countrymen, our own fellow-citizens, our own fellow-members of the British nation—why is it that we should regard with such apprehension the proposal to give them a greater representation than the large states? That greater representation is not to be given to any class, or I could understand the reluctance with which it is proposed to be granted. If this equal representation in the senate was a question between one class and another, I could understand the hesitation; but in each colony the majority will rule, in each colony it will rule on the very broadest franchise which is possible, and in each colony it will return representatives without restrictions as to qualifications or any restrictions whatever. It is scarcely possible to imagine, and certainly not possible to propound, a more liberal constitution than this when thoroughly and carefully examined. Give us the safeguards we ask for, and surely we may commit, as far as

[P.338] starts here

it is in our power to commit, the future destinies of Australia to a body of this kind, knowing that that body is to be constituted of Anglo-Saxons, elected by Anglo-Saxons, containing representatives, many of whom probably I see before me now, Men trained to parliamentary-government in these colonies are not likely idly to depart from Australian traditions, or-even, from those longer and greater traditions of the British Constitution, to which I myself would like to see even a closer adherence than that promised under this, bill.

Mr. Higgins:
On the same principle the majority in Old Sarum should satisfy the hon. member!

The Hon. A. Deakin:
The majority in Old Sarum consisted of six or eight persons, and six or eight persons bore no proportion to the population of England at that time that could be measured with the proportion which the population in any one of these great colonies can ever bear to the whole of Australia. Probably as time rolls on these colonies will be divided on other lines than those which exist at present. Population will increase in special places. With that we need not concern ourselves. The fact remains that whatever the future states may be we are handing over this equal representation to electors trained under the British Constitution, and who for half a century have proved their competence to work successfully the constitutional governments with which they have been endowed, under difficulties-many of them-more serious than those likely to confront the federal government for many years to come. None of the constitutions under which we live are perfect. The Constitution of Victoria contains provisions to which I have the greatest objection, and which, as long as I am a citizen of that colony, I shall unceasingly endeavour to reform. But for all that we have lived under it; for all that we have prospered under it; for all that we have gained more, than we could have hoped to obtain under any form of government, except one that has sprung from the British Constitution.

The Hon. E. Barton:
Only free men, could have such a system of government!

The Hon. A. Deakin:
I hope we are free men, and I am sure we shall continue so under this proposal. The constitution on this table is a constitution that can be safely offered to free men. It is a constitution which leaves, as it ought to leave, in the hands of those who will be, the electors of the future federated Australia, the power of shaping it. If we obtain the two safeguards of which I have spoken, if we make those amendments in the bill, then if that constitution does not fit, as it probably may not fit, the Australia of a century hence, the Australia of a century hence will be competent to alter it. The proposal now made is one for which much may be alleged on the ground of fairness and equity, for which much may be alleged on the ground of generosity and consideration to those who are about to join us in this federation. It has been apparent to me from the first, and particularly since, 1890, that without this special concession federation is impossible.
The question I have put to myself has always been the same I may prefer some other system—I do prefer some other system—to equal representation;
but would I sacrifice federation, would I miss the union of these colonies, on this question of equal representation—much smaller as it is, I believe, than some of my hon. friends think it is? I would not dream of such a thing.
Would I lose federation, when asked to make this concession or sacrifice, even if it be as serious as they believe, at the very time when I shall be asking my fellow representatives to make concessions or what they may consider sacrifices to us? Do we desire to absolutely dominate the smaller colonies

because we have larger populations, and to drag them in our train? That might be a federation; but a federation launched on those lines could have no bright or sunny future before it. Its foundation must be laid on justice.
There is no sufficient departure from justice in this proposal of equal representation, balanced as it is, as it should be and as it, must be, by other reasonable concessions to us—there is no such departure from a foundation of justice as to cause us to fear to accept it as, the basis of the whole future federal structure for Australia.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.17]:

As this question has now been rather fully debated—it was the subject of a very full debate in Adelaide and took some time there, and it has now been debated here for more than a day and a half—I do not propose, unduly to prolong the debate, and I would suggest to hon. members that while it is open, to all of, us to speak, and to speak at, length, still the real question is whether the reasons on each side have been adequately and fairly put, before the Convention, so as to reach the ears and eyes of the people of all the colonies. I have very little to add to what I have always urged on this question. I believe that so far as New South Wales is concerned, my views on it are thoroughly well known. They have not been kept secret. They have been the subject of many speeches, and I think that all who are likely to read what I say to-morrow will have read what I have already said on this question I am convinced that equal representation is not only reasonable, not, only expedient, but just. I say that, having fully in view that the constitution we are about to establish must nevertheless be a constitution which will work the machine of responsible government. I cannot, therefore, support equal representation with such co-ordinate powers as would prevent the proper working of the system of responsible government. Short of that - which is a position I must take unless I am prepared to give up the system known to us for some other system of which we have no practical experience among people like ourselves - short of that, I am prepared to support equal representation. But beyond the point at which it is workable with constitutional government, of course, I cannot support it with powers which would make that kind of government impossible. Consequently, upon some such terms as exist in this bill, I am prepared to support equal representation as expedient, reasonable, and just. If we were to add to the powers of the senate, proposed in this bill, powers of amendment, I might ask myself very seriously the question whether a senate, having powers of amendment in money bills, together with equal representation of the various states, would be a body which could bear its part with reasonable smoothness in the machine of responsible government. But, in the vote I shall give, and in the remarks I shall make, I shall assume that this body will, on the whole, think it wise and just to adhere to the lines upon which the relations of the two houses, in respect to money bills, were adjusted in Adelaide, and upon that assumption I shall again give my vote for equal representation. A great deal has been said, not in this debate particularly, but during the proceedings of this Convention, and particularly in Adelaide, upon, the question of deadlocks. We have not yet reached that point for full discussion, but it is open to us to make remarks; upon it at the present time. I have repeatedly said that I do not attach any great importance to paper provisions for the solution of deadlocks, mainly because I think that these are matters to be settled so much, by the common-sense of the parties in a state that the ordinary provisions of a constitution are scarcely very well fitted to deal with what may be the variable operations of their commonsense, acting upon varying circumstances at different times; but there appears to be a considerable and growing feeling in favour of the institution of some method to deal with deadlocks in the case of equal representation being granted. I have not heard the question of the nature of that provision very fully debated during the present session of the Convention. I take it that if provision is made for deadlocks, it must be made by clauses separate from those which exist in the bill, either by the adoption of some amendment proposed by one of the legislatures which has sent suggestions to the Convention, or by dealing with a proposal made by one of the members of the Convention. I shall endeavour to keep my mind open upon the question, but I should not like it to be understood that, while I am voting for equal representation in the senate, I am prepared to resist all and every provision for the solution of deadlocks, if I find a solution proposed which, in my opinion, is not likely to prove an obstruction rather than a facility to the working of government. With regard to the general question, I do not propose to detain hon. members.
The quotation from Mr. Justice Story's commentaries upon the constitution of the United States read by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, is one which was well in my memory, and which I thought of making myself. In my opinion, it puts the question with remarkable directness, clearness, and force. The question which arises upon that quotation, and upon the consideration of all the arguments which have been advanced, seems to me to be this: The extreme proposals from the federal point of view and from the national point of view reduce themselves to this: The extreme federalist goes so far in one direction as to make the constitution entirely of the type one would call a confederation. That style of reasoner demands equal representation in both houses, as it was demanded in America at the time of the framing of the United States Constitution. The person who would subordinate every federal interest to a national interest demands proportionate representation in both houses. These being the extremes, what is the just mean, what is that reasonable compromise at which to arrive in order to give due force to the federal principle, and also to see that the national government of affairs proceeds without undue interruption? I take it that the mean is to be found in the dividing line between those two forces, and that dividing line is so obvious as scarcely to require description. It is found in proportionate representation in the one chamber where the national interests are more peculiarly conserved, and equal representation in the other. If the two extremes are those which will lead to the extreme type of national government in the one case and of federal government in the other, then, if you wish to constitute a body which will work under responsible government, and reserve something like a just mean between the federal and the national type of government, you can only do that by giving proportionate representation to one chamber and equal representation to the other. That is the sum of what is involved in the remarks of Mr. Justice Story, which were quoted by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise. I have been convinced of the justice of that proposition from the beginning, and, much as I admire and respect the arguments of my many friends who hold opposite opinions to my own, and who have addressed themselves to this question, while I have given due and grave consideration to all these matters, I have heard nothing which causes me to alter my opinions. Of course the question of money powers is a very serious one indeed; but, taking, it for granted that equal representation may be conceded upon terms which will admit of the continuance of responsible government in the form in which we know it-and I have no doubt whatever that upon the terms proposed in the bill with regard to money matters that machine can work, and have its due efficiency-then without further detaining the Committee I will say that upon this question I shall adhere to my former opinion.

The Hon. Sir GRAHAM BERRY (Victoria)[4.26]:

I would like to say a few words upon this subject. I have listened very patiently to the whole debate, and to the many very able and learned speeches which have been made by the learned members of the Convention, but I venture to say that the historical precedents which have been brought forward on this question of giving equal representation in the senate are without analogy to our present circumstances. The hon. member, Mr. Symon, drew an analogy with the leagues of antiquity. I presume that those alliances or leagues were for mutual defence, and for nothing more, and have no relation whatever to the conditions and circumstances under which we find ourselves in forming this federation. Passing from that we have the analogy of the United States of America. That constitution broke down in the immense Civil War, which was a matter to be deplored at the time, and is a matter of history now. That alone, I think, should make us pause before we adopt implicitly the provisions of the American Constitution. Then we have had brought before us the Constitution of Germany. That constitution was dictated by a powerful military state, and consequently acquiesced in by the other states, and forms no analogy to a proposal for the federation of these colonies. Nor can we take Canada as an analogy or an illustration, because in Canada the Senate is nominated by the Governor-General, while we propose that the senate shall be elected. Under these circumstances I do not see that there is any analogy in the historical incidents and events which have been referred to to guide us now. But we have a more reliable and surer mode of proceeding if we take into consideration modern thought and the trend of political events and proceedings. That has eventuated more and more as the years have gone by in the affirmation and confirmation of the theory that the majority must rule, based upon the widest possible adult suffrage. I think that is a principle which we can very fairly hold to and regard when we are considering the question of the formation of our constitution. I would even ask, would any liberal delegates ignore that principle unless it was to the advantage, or the supposed advantage, of his own particular colony? I think not. The state rights are to be protected, it is said. But what state rights are there of an isolated character in the federation which we propose to inaugurate? None whatever. The fact is that the work of the senate will be the ordinary work of an upper chamber. and when we bear in mind the constitution of that senate, under the provisions of this bill we have every reason to believe, every reason to fear, that it may be a large predominant power in the constitution. It has continuity of existence; it is based on manhood suffrage; it has power to amend money bills, or to make suggestions equivalent to amendment; it has the initiation of money bills under certain circumstances. Altogether it is a body powerful enough to make headway, under favourable circumstances, with the house of representatives, and I would ask, are the larger colonies of this group New South Wales and Victoria-to be in a combined minority in a chamber which would be powerful enough, if the powers proposed in this bill be made definite and permanent, to a large extent, to a considerable extent, to control the course of legislation, not only of general legislation, but also of financial legislation. If the senate is to be as powerful a body as it is proposed in this bill to make it, then I say that Victoria and New South Wales ought to have a weight and representation in that chamber corresponding to their population, their importance, their wealth, and their power. Equal representation is insisted upon, not only by hon. members who represent what I may designate as the smaller states, but by a number of the representatives of the larger states, especially of Victoria; and I cannot conclude that that opinion is held for any other reason than the avowed reason given-that it is expedient, seeing that in the absence of such a provision there could be no federation at all. A modification of opinion has taken place upon this question since the Convention met in Adelaide, and it has been suggested by more than one speaker—and we may almost assume that this is authoritative, and that it will be acted upon in the future consideration of this measure—that such an alteration might be made in the powers and existence of the senate as will largely remove the objections which have been raised to equal representation. If there be a power to initiate money bills, if there be a possibility of the dissolution of the senate as well as of the house of representatives, if, above all, there be a referendum to the people, if there be an outlet for deadlocks between the two houses—if there be a referendum to the entire body of the people, so that in the last resort a majority of the people of Australia, the people of the commonwealth will decide any subject in dispute between their representatives in one house and in the other—I can see and acknowledge that a great deal of the objection to equal representation will be done away with. In Adelaide the powers proposed to be conferred upon the senate were accompanied by equal representation in that body; but if its powers are limited to the ordinary powers of a second chamber I see less objection to an equal representation of all the colonies. If, however, that be not the case, if the powers given in the bill are continued, if the senate is to be a chamber so powerful as not only to obstruct, but largely to dictate the course of events in this progressive part of the world, I should hesitate to recommend, so far as my influence went, the population of a colony such as Victoria to enter the federation upon those conditions. Having regard to the powers proposed to be conferred upon the senate I think I am justified in expressing the opinion that equal representation is not a good basis, that it is not a fair and equitable basis, and that proportional representation would have been far more just. At the same time I am able to realise that, from, the initiation of this Convention, it has been possibly almost a necessity that equal representation should be given because we have equal representation here. We have the same number of delegates from the smallest colony as from the largest, from the less populous as from the more populous. This having been conceded it was almost certain that a Convention so constituted would in its very nature insist upon a similar principle to that embodied in its own creation being extended to the federal legislature. Undoubtedly the question is prejudged in the formation of this Convention. Further, it has been acknowledged by large organs of public opinion in the press from time to time, and, as I formerly said, it is almost impossible to get away from the necessity of allowing this principle of equal representation to prevail. Therefore, it was that in Adelaide I emphatically protested against the powers which are conferred upon the senate in this bill without any outlet for deadlocks. I protest most emphatically against the conferring of these powers without some outlet for deadlocks. If, on the other hand, there be some outlet for deadlocks, then I confess that the concession of larger representation for the smaller states in comparison with the larger states may be fairly submitted to. I would also urge that the consideration of the financial question is of the greatest importance, and that, therefore, there should be some modification of the other portion of the clause—some modification of those great powers which, at the sitting of the Convention in Adelaide, were conferred upon the senate. If those powers are modified somewhat in the direction which I have heard indicated by some hon. members who support equal representation, then I think that a concession of that nature might be fairly allowed. I do not know nor have I been convinced that this principle is true and just in itself. But we have become entangled with it; we have become so committed to it directly and indirectly in many ways that I see no possible way of escaping from it, nor do I wish to jeopardise the possibility of federation by any action in connection with it. I wished to say a few words on the question; but what I most emphatically desire is a modification of the subsequent portions of the measure, and the provision of safeguards against deadlocks between the two houses as being essential to the full and fair representation in the commonwealth of every state whether large or small. I do not wish to detain the Convention, and will, therefore, simply say that, with the views I have expressed, I shall vote for the amendment, although knowing that it will be defeated. If the other question had been dealt with first in the manner some of my colleagues from Victoria have indicated, I might have voted differently. I shall vote now upon the bill as it stands. We have only one question before us at the present time—the question of equal representation, as settled at Adelaide; and, under these circumstances, I shall vote against equal representation.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria)[4-43]:

I wish to ask the leader of the Convention, as we have now reached nearly the ordinary time for adjourning, whether he will agree to report progress? I know that there are several hon. members who wish to speak on this subject, and there is no more important question than this to come before us. Although we have taken a reasonable time, we are not wasting time in discussing a question of this magnitude. I should like to address myself to the question, but I am not fit to do so this evening. The hon. member, Mr. Lyne, who has spoken to me on the subject, also desires to address the Committee on this question. It seems to me that we should not be very much facilitating business by going to a division, because, if this debate is closed, time will only be taken up in discussing the same phase of the measure at a future stage. It is obvious that, if we make this discussion as full as it can reasonably be, we may save time.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria)[4.45]:

I desire to support the request of the hon. member, and I think that an adjournment of the debate would result in a saving of time. I have listened to the debate which, I may say, has taken a very high level, and I think will impress the public of this colony as well as the public of the other colonies. I believe that if the debate is continued it will result in the strengthening of the position of those members of the Convention who are in favour of equal representation. I do not wish to take up a very great length of time in discussing, the question myself, but if the debate be adjourned until Monday I think it will result in a saving of future time, as well as in the strengthening of the cause of federation.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[4.46]:

I hardly like to oppose a suggestion which is made for the convenience of
hon. members; but surely it is not wise to let it go forth to the public that, having had this question under consideration for some time, we are not prepared to go on with the debate until half-past 5. We know that some are anxious to get away as quickly as they can, but if we commence adjourning at a quarter to 5 we shall not get through the work we have to do. Some hon. member must be prepared to speak now, and we ought not to adjourn.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales): I should be very loth, indeed, if it is persisted in, to oppose a request such as that which has just been made. but I would ask hon. members to consult the public interest of Australia by not persisting in it. I happen to know that there is at least one other gentleman who desires to speak, and he occupies the important position of leader of the Opposition in New South Wales. Although he would like to speak on Monday, I do not take it that he wishes to press his request for an adjournment unduly. I would only like to say that this matter was very fully debated in Adelaide, and it has been very fully debated now. If I could be informed that there was any set of strong arguments which have not yet been advanced, something which we did not hear in our debate in Adelaide or in our debate here-if there was some new phase of the question which had not been put, I should, on being informed of that, ask hon. members to agree with me in consenting to an adjournment. But if we find, as I found when addressing myself to the question, that all the arguments have already been put, and that my song, to use the vernacular, had already been sung for me-if we find that, is it not a good thing to let the matter stand on that full elucidation, that complete placing of it before the public which ought to satisfy the public on the one hand or hon. members on the other, if anything ever will? That is the view I wish to take. I know it would be very convenient for some hon. members who may have to leave town early, and who may not be back on Monday at the beginning of our proceedings to have a division. I may be wrong, but I do not think that the cause, either for or against equal state representation, can now be advanced one jot by further argument. I would ask my hon. friends to recollect that amongst the amendments of the legislatures there are affecting this clause some thirteen suggestions. Of course, on the negativing or the carrying of one or more of them others may not be put, as being Substantially identical; but there is amongst those amendments a complete putting of the various phases of the question, affording a complete vehicle for debate on all the phases of the matter, which I think will be ample for hon. members, and any new views on any of the other amendments, any phase not hitherto advanced, can be got in easily without the curtailment of debate.

Mr. TRENWITH:

The question of equal representation cannot be discussed!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I would put it to my hon. friends that we ought to proceed with the matter. If they persist in their request I leave it entirely in the hands of the Convention. I shall not offer any opposition, especially as owing to the physical reasons advanced by my hon. friend, I should only be too glad to accede to his request. But I ask my hon. friends who take up this position whether it is not better in the interests of the commonwealth not to throw the debate into another week?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[4.50]:

I wish to say for myself and also for my colleagues from Western Australia that we should have liked, and we were prepared to speak upon this question. We entertain very strong views in favour of equal representation in the senate, but the subject has been so fully debated, and all the arguments, it appears to me, have been so clearly and fully placed before us that I and my colleagues do not propose to address the Committee any further on this subject, the real reason being that we do not think we can advance the matter further by argument than it has already been advanced by hon. members who have addressed the Committee.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria)[4.51]:

I desire to say that I intimated to the hon. member, Mr. Barton, that I would not have asked for an adjournment of the debate upon my own account, although I wished to have an opportunity of saying something on the question. In view of the opinions expressed, I readily agree, as far as I am concerned, to withdraw my request.

Dr. QUICK:

In view of the opinions that have been expressed, I wish to withdraw my request.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It would be positively improper that such a debate-

The Hon. J.H. HOWE (South Australia)[4.52]:

I wish to submit a question of order. I believe we are acting under the rules which govern the Parliament of South Australia. I should like to point out that if the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, speaks at length, any member can follow him at whatever length he pleases. The hon. member's reply now does not necessarily close the debate.
The CHAIRMAN:
The proceedings being in Committee, other hon. members can speak after the hon. member, Mr. Higgins.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
I trust hon. members will conclude the debate on the subject this evening. I have listened to the arguments of hon. members who have elaborated the consideration of this clause; but very little new matter has been introduced. A number of us have refrained from speaking solely in the interests of federation. We are most desirous that this matter should be dealt with this evening. We are now subject to the reproach out of doors that this Convention is sitting for the purpose of its own pleasure.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The hon. members are afraid of debate!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
Hon. members are not afraid of debate; but the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, is like Don Quixote—he is tilting at an imaginary foe. There is no substance in his opposition. That has been proved by an hon. member who knows far more of Victoria than the hon. member, Mr. Higgins—I allude to the hon. member, Mr. Peacock. He knows far more about the position in Victoria than the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, does. The hon. member, Mr. Higgins, is producing something which is not valid; he is only taking up time unnecessarily. I trust hon. members will come to a division, and not allow the reproach to be cast upon us that we are seeking our own pleasure rather than our work.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[4.55]:
I have to thank hon. members throughout the debate for the courtesy with which they have treated me, except in the case of the remarks of the last two speakers. We have now spent half an hour in debating whether there is to be any further debate.

An Hon. MEMBER:
NO, only twenty minutes!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I wish to address myself very briefly to hon. members in reply. I did conceive, until I was corrected by the hon. member, Sir William Zeal, that it would positively be improper for me not to take notice of the strong arguments which have been used on both sides in this debate. The hon. member, Sir William Zeal, for whom I have a great liking and respect privately, seems to misconceive altogether the position which we occupy. What is the work we have to do?
Is it to vote, or to debate and vote? I say that debating is the most valuable part of our work. If he thinks that his repeated cries of "Divide! Divide!" are helping the federation of Australia, he is wrong.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

The hon. member is misrepresenting me. I never called, "Divide! Divide!" so that the hon. member is wrong altogether!

Mr. HIGGINS:

Then I hope the hon. member will not do it again.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

I did not do it at all!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think this is too serious a matter for us to indulge in protracted discussions as to whether there is to be further debate or not. I conceive it to be our duty to debate this important question, no matter who cries out against it. I think hon. members will recognise that whatever may be the issue of this vote, the indirect effect of this debate is even still more valuable than our direct vote. I think that those who are strongly in favour of equal representation must feel this: If they are sincere in their belief, as I think they are, all the colonies will look to those who favour equal representation for a strong expression of the reasons by which they justify it. These reasons will go out to the public, and hon. members who favour equal representation will be able to rely upon the public being convinced by the excellence of their arguments. I must say this also, that if I can judge from the expressions of the leader of the Convention, Mr. Barton, in his final statement, I think it is perfectly clear that this debate on equal representation has led to a very modified tone with regard to the provision against deadlocks. It is perfectly clear that, if this matter of equal representation had not been raised-and the raising of it, I may say, has been a matter of great difficulty, and nervous anxiety to myself, and has been done at considerable sacrifice to my own feelings-I say that the raising of this question, even if unsuccessful as to equal representation, may lead to such an adjustment as will, ultimately, enable us to carry federation, even upon its present impulse. With regard to the arguments used, I threw out a challenge to hon. members to show the principle upon which equal representation was to be based. I have to thank the hon. member, Mr. Symon, and others, who have manfully faced that challenge. The difficulty, however, with me has been to try and reduce to simple terms what is the answer first in principle. We must deal with principle first. I cannot put in one sentence the principle on which the argument in favour of equal representation rests. If you ask me, "Can you put proportional representation into a definite sentence?" I would say, "It means that you must count heads, instead of breaking them." If hon. gentlemen have any simple formula by which they can put equal representation into plain words, I shall be glad to hear it; but I have not been able to understand it yet. We have heard a great deal about historic identity. and preserving historic identity. The answer to that simply is that we shall have the historic identity of Victoria, New South Wales, Tasmania, and the other colonies, preserved in their own governments and parliaments. What surely can you want more than that? Is there any formula, is there any sentence, is there any shortly-expressed reason, which you can extract from Story and the other writers who have been quoted, which can convince people that equal representation is right? With regard to an expression used by the hon. and learned member, Sir John Downer, the chief thing I could gather from his argument against me was that I had quoted "humpty-dumpty" wrongly. As to humpty-dumpty," I feel very sore. I may be wrong on equal representation, but I do submit that there are two versions of "humpty-dumpty." I gave one of the two which I had in my mind, and which I thought to be the most appropriate. The only other argument he could use was that because the northern army, when it was in the full flush of victory, did not proceed forthwith to stamp out equal representation in all the states in 1865, therefore, it felt that equal representation was right. Sir, the position is this: In the Constitution of the United States, equal representation is a matter of fixed law which cannot be altered by any change in the constitution; it must be done with the consent of every state, and all the northern army did they did professedly believing it to be according to law. All these war powers, and extraordinary war powers they were, were justified by the federalists on the ground of the ultimate power which must be involved in the constitution that a state must protect itself and keep itself indissoluble. As regards my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Glynn, whose careful and eloquent speech we heard last night, it is simply reduced to this: that he accused me of being illogical, that he accused me of driving logic to excess. I am afraid I wandered from logic too far, and I was glad to hear my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Deakin, remind me of it. What I have said right through is this: Do not carry your proportional representation to an extreme. Give the small states a minimum, and give them some little advantage as against the large states in the senate, simply to obviate their fear. All the speakers appear to admit that the small states have nothing whatever to fear, but still I say, if they have nothing to fear, give them certain advantages. Then, sir, Mr. Glynn's other argument is simply this: That I do not recognise that there are anomalies in every good constitution and especially in the British Constitution. I do not know where he got the idea. If we recognise that there are anomalies, are we going to make anomalies without any sufficient motive? I recollect reading of an officer on the China station, who wanting a silk handkerchief made on the same pattern as a handkerchief he had, handed it to a Chinaman to make a copy of it. The Chinaman brought it back with a stain on it exactly similar to a stain which was on the first handkerchief, and it turned out that the Chinaman had actually copied the stain as well as the handkerchief.

The Hon. E. Barton:

That is what you are trying to do between the federal and the state constitutions!

Mr. Higgins:

Are we to keep the anomalies as well as the good principles which we find in the American Constitution? This system of following the American Constitution for the senate is simply a Chinese imitation, and nothing else, and no one has shown yet how it is to be justified by reason or common-sense. My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon, in his excellent speech, to which I think we all listened with intense interest, has said that our argument is simply for unification, and that we are met here for the purpose of having a federation. Can it be clearer that a unification is simply where all subjects are committed to one parliament for every country, as Great Britain and Ireland are under one parliament, and Ireland and Scotland are unable to deal with their own affairs? The distinction which we draw, rightly or wrongly, is that for the common subjects which pertain to these five colonies, we must be a unification, and that for the subjects which are not common, and which we still retain, we shall be still severed colonies. That is the principle; and it is no answer to us to say that it is unification.

The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:

Clause 52 contains matters of local interest!

Mr. Higgins:

Why give them to the federal parliament? Of course everything which is given to the federal parliament is a matter of local interests. What I want to know is why, if you agree to give matters to the federal parliament, do the states try to keep the control of those matters? The true provincialists are those who are going in for equal representation. My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Barton, who has been so strong an advocate of federation right through, is a provincialist, and behind him are all the selfish forces of provincialism to which be alluded in Parliament. The selfish forces of provincialism are still trying to retain for the states the control of matters which the states agree are to be left to the federal parliament. I think no one can deny that.

An Hon. MEMBER:

We do not want centralisation!

Mr. HIGGINS:

Centralisation I have explained already. We will have perfect severance and no centralisation as to the subjects for each colony. The difficulty in this matter has been that hon. members in reasoning and speaking on platforms appear to treat federation as if it were some definite, fixed, rigid scheme to which we must work up, no matter what happens, and it was well illustrated by the interjection of my hon. friend, Dr. Cockburn, "Are we to go back to pot-hooks?"; as if every one had read some text-books, and in those textbooks there was a definition to which we must all conform, or else make a mistake. That is a very false attitude with which a number of us are approaching this question. Federation is not a question of textbooks, but, as Burke says, government is a mere human contrivance for the purpose of meeting human wants, and the question is what will be the best contrivance for the purpose? My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon, has referred to Freeman and his editor. He has also referred to the Achaean League at some length. I will briefly ask the Committee to consider a passage in Freeman which expresses not the opinion of the editor of Freeman, Mr. Bury, but Mr. Freeman's opinion, and the opinion of Montesquieu and Bishop Thirlwall. On page 162 of the same book as he quoted, referring to what he calls the Lykian League, he says:

I mean the wise and well-balanced federation of Lykia, whose constitution has won the highest praise from Montesquieu in the last century, and from Bishop Thirlwall in the present. The antiquities and the language of Lykia have lately attracted the attention of scholars in no small measure. To the political inquirer the country is no less interesting as possessing what was probably the best constructed federal government that the ancient world be held. The account given by Strabo, our sole authority, is so full, clear, and brief that I cannot do better than translate it. The "ancestral constitution of the Lykian League" is described by the great geographer in these words:

There are three and twenty cities which have a share in the suffrage, and they come together from each city in the common Federal Assembly, choosing for their place of meeting any city which they think best. And among the cities the greatest are possessed of three votes apiece, the middle ones of two, and the rest of one; and in the same proportion they pay taxes and take their share of other public burthens.

Then at page 165, referring to the fact that in most of the ancient constitutions each tribe or state, whether great or small, had only a single vote, he says:

The Lykians avoided this danger by giving to their cities a greater or less number of votes, according to their size, being the first recorded instance of an attempt to apportion votes to population.

My hon. and learned friend has appealed to Freeman—and to Freeman he shall go.

Mr. SYMON:

I have been there!

Mr. HIGGINS:

The Achaean League was the only one to which the hon. member referred, if these old precedents have anything to do with it. I am prepared to meet the hon. and learned member on his own ground. As soon as I try to meet hon. members on the ground of logic, I am told you must not be logical; as soon as I meet hon. members on the ground of history, I am told you must not refer to historical precedents; and as soon as I refer to matters of expediency or practice, I am told you are forgetting the pothooks of federation. I must meet what I conceive to be bad logic by what I conceive to be good logic. I must meet what I conceive to be bad historical analogy by referring to good historical analogy, and I must meet also questions of expediency by counter considerations of expediency. What I say is that there has been, as yet, no attempt to justify this equal representation, except by reading from text writers a sort of loose statement as to the American system as matters of fact. The nearest thing to it is what Mr. Bury puts, not as a matter of expediency, but as a matter of fact:

The object of both the ancient and the modern federations was to provide that both each state as a whole and each citizen individually should have a voice in the federal assembly.

He merely states there a fact in federation. The question is what are we to do? I submit that the true tendency of the federal systems, which are likely to be more general as the centuries go on, embracing afar larger numbers of people within their area and leading to a great distribution of subjects, so that people may be united on some subjects and disunited on others—the true ideal of federation is that the people shall rule on subjects of common interest, and that within separate organisations they shall rule as to matters which come within those separate organisations. That would be a true ideal of federation; but here, unfortunately, we are going back to the ruck; we are going back to retrogressive legislation. We are going to try and adopt the system which was adopted under pressure in America, and which they would never adopt if they had to start again. I desire to refer to one argument mentioned by Mr. Wise, in regard to the separation of Victoria from New South Wales in 1851. The hon. member's argument was, I think, misconceived. We Victorians are not going to give up our separate parliament. We have no repentance about our separation from New South Wales. Our separation was well considered, and has, I think, resulted in great advantage to both New South Wales and Victoria. But at that time, 1851, we had no railways connecting the two capitals-no railways running throughout the continent as they do now. The capitals were simply connected by a few vessels which took a week to go from one to the other. But even at that time—at the time of the separation of Victoria from New South Wales—Earl Grey did his best to bring about a kind of federation. He failed. The time has now come. We have a population now right down from Sydney to Adelaide. We have railways running between the capitals, and it is only fitting for us to have a union for those purposes which are common to the different colonies. But as to preserving the historic identity of Victoria we have not the slightest intention of giving it up. The hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, has given very valuable assistance to the arguments which I put forward, and I think I ought to express my regret that he cannot also give us his vote. I feel hon. members present will be convinced that if that vote had not gone the other way at the Adelaide Convention, and if my hon. friend had not committed himself so far at that Convention, his vote would have gone with his voice on this occasion.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No, I was as convinced then as I am now that without equal representation we will not have federation!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I would not have said this if my hon. friend had not been present; but I still hold to my opinion that no one could have spoken so clearly and forcibly against equal representation, and not given his vote against it, if he had not been in a corner with regard to the matter.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I expressed exactly the same view at Adelaide!

Mr. HIGGINS:

It was expressed very late in the debate—after the representatives from Victoria had given away the position right off. I found in Adelaide that the representatives of the less populous states were pressing larger and larger demands in regard to their admission into the union. I should like to know, after this was once given away by the larger colonies, after it was once given away without any reservation, how the representative of a less populous colony could possibly have expressed his own clear and straight voice on the matter. The representatives of the smaller colonies were bound to take the concession which was showered upon them unnecessarily and prematurely by the representatives of the other colonies. There is no doubt the hon. member, Mr. Peacock, hit the nail on the head when he said that the difficulty is that for several years back in Victoria as well as elsewhere they have been assuming this matter of equal representation. I feel myself like a man pulling against a flood current, and although the vote will be against me, I feel convinced that the raising of this question will do a great deal of good to the immediate prospects of federation. I feel sure that this matter, having been considered and reasons given for and against it, along with the fact that the strong recommendation of the Legislative Council of New South Wales, backed up by a considerable minority in Victoria, has not been thrown aside or ignored, will help those who think they can carry this constitution without equal representation in it.

Mr. LYNE:

Also the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales!

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

Does the hon. member think there would be any possible chance of carrying federation without it?

Mr. HIGGINS:

I have expressed my opinion before as to whether it can be carried in Victoria or New South Wales with equal representation. I know there are other opinions with regard to Victo

Mr. WISE:

The people are far ahead of the politicians in regard to federation!

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is all very well for politicians to decry politicians. One of the greatest evils of political life is for politicians to be always using the name "politician" in a disrespectful sense. I think if we do earn disrespect amongst the people, it is because we do not respect ourselves. I may say I have only been three years in Parliament, but I have come to respect members of Parliament more than I did before I entered Parliament. A strong point seemed to be made by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Deakin. He says, "If you have proportional representation in both houses you have no distinction between the houses, and, therefore, the senate will really attempt to enforce its will to deal with money bills." That is the same old argument that has been trotted out against every attempt to improve an upper house in these colonies. They are always saying, "If you make the Upper House more liberal you cannot give any reason for not giving it more power with regard to money bills." I declare to accept that reason as sufficient. We must attempt to make our upper house, as far as we can, amenable to the will of the people—the only will I can recognise, especially having regard to the extreme difficulty of moving the people.

The Hon. E. Barton:

Which would the hon. member give the most power to—a strongly based upper house or a weakly based upper house?

Mr. Higgins:

It would all depend upon circumstances. I think that if they will think a little further, those hon. members who have laughed without understanding the meaning of my answer will see that I am right. You cannot answer that question without qualification—just as my hon. friend, Mr. Dobson, to-day had to qualify an absolute statement which he made, when he said that he would take federation on any condition, and afterwards said he would do so if it were accepted by the Convention and based on the will of the people. Supposing that you have a senate constituted with a certain qualification, with regard to proportional representation, in deference to the fears of the smaller states, it will not and cannot be the house of the people; and, therefore, so long as there is a senate—so long as an upper house is deemed to be necessary—there will always be a good and solid reason for saying that that house which does represent the people by the number of heads shall have supremacy of power in regard to money bills. My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Deakin, said "in each colony the majority will rule—is that not democratic?" I interjected, "What about Old Sarum—what about the rotten borough system in England before the Reform Bill?" In Old Sarum there might have been six voters, and it might have been said, "Among those six voters the majority will rule. What could you have fairer than that?" The same would apply in Western Australia. Supposing that in the interior of Western Australia you have a rouse about and a station overseer, and that you say that all that area is to be represented by one member, and no more, you might say that there the majority would still rule. It is no answer. Why talk of plural voting? I say it is enacted by equal representation in a still more outrageous form; for whilst you provide that no man shall have more than one vote by saying that he shall vote only once, you give him, by one scratch of the pen in one polling booth in Tasmania, a power which is equivalent to eight votes. In place of having the trouble in plural voting of going about from one booth to another, he, by simply going into one booth in Tasmania and scratching out one name, has eight votes to the New South Wales man's one. I am obliged to hon. members for the kind way in which they have dealt with my arguments. I felt all through that I was doing my duty, and I feel that I have done it.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[5.25]:

I wished to address the Convention at some length on this important question, but, if there is not to be an adjournment of the debate to-night, I do not feel able to do so, considering that I have been two nights in the train, which is not conducive to assisting anyone in dealing with a question of this kind. I do not wish to receive any undue consideration from the Convention, but, if there is not to be an adjournment of the debate, I shall not be able to express my views as I desire; and I regret it more particularly because, from the earliest inception of this Convention, I have considered that this particular point is the kernel of everything, around which everything centres, as far as the federation of the colonies is concerned. Once this matter is settled, I think it is for good or ill as to whether we shall or shall not have federation. The smaller states, I was made amply aware, at the Adelaide Convention, were intending to grasp all the power they could; and, as the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, stated just now, they were induced, I believe, to ask for more than they probably would have asked for, by the action taken by some members of the larger states in conceding very largely a great deal that was never asked for.

The Right Hon. Sir J. FORREST:

They did not ask for more than they asked for in 1891!

Mr. LYNE:

I must differ from the right hon. gentleman. I must adhere to the view I took at the Adelaide Convention: that the action of a majority of the delegates of the larger states assisted much to increase the claims and demands of the smaller states-

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Oh, no!

Mr. LYNE:

As the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, so justly said just now. I would like to ask whether in this Convention the larger states are or are not to be dominated absolutely, and in almost every particular, by the claims of the smaller states? Are we in New South Wales to be dictated to absolutely on this question, and are the representatives of Victoria—a large state also—to be dominated also by the demands of the smaller states? I think it is unwise that any such course should be taken. Listening, as I have to-day, to only scraps of this debate—which has been an able debate—I think it is to be extremely regretted that there seems to be such an overwhelming determination in the Convention to listen to no argument.

The Hon. E. Barton:
Surely that is not so!

Mr. Lyne:
To listen to no argument without showing very strong symptoms of irritation—I mean no argument that is on the side of the hon. member, Mr. Higgins. The speeches that have been delivered have been mostly made by the legal talent in this Convention; they have been legal speeches, some of them logical, some of them, I think, absolutely illogical. I cannot conceive that any man could deliver a logical speech on the side of equal representation of the smaller states; and, as far as the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, is concerned, I think that his arguments have been almost absolutely logical. The only point upon which he could be accused of not being logical is where he admitted the privilege of the smaller states to have a minimum of representation. To be absolutely logical there should be no minimum; we should deal with this question altogether on the basis of population. It is not the question of a large state, it is not the question of land; it is the question of population that should govern the whole of the Australian colonies, if we are to have that representation which will satisfy the people. The taunt has been hurled at those who entertain the views that I do that we are against federation. One of the representatives of New South Wales the other night asserted in my hearing that because I was against equal state rights, I was against federation. Mark my words, sir, that those who want federation are going the wrong way about it if they adhere to equal state rights in this bill. I do not claim to know the feeling of the people of New South Wales better than others; but I fancy I know it fairly well, and I am strongly of opinion that with equal state representation the people of New South Wales will not accept the Convention Bill. The Attorney-General of Victoria, Mr. Isaacs, delivered a very logical speech against equal state representation, and his vote, if he gives it in favour of that system, will be an illogical vote. There are a very large number of electors in Victoria—I know a great many—who are against equal state representation, and it will be found to be the case I think when there is an appeal to Victoria on this bill, as I presume there will be. I venture also to suggest that there is not likely to be an federation without the colony of New South Wales. Anything inserted in this bill which is likely to jeopardise the measure in New South Wales will be the strongest factor possible in preventing a general federation. I do not think two or three colonies can federate without the larger ones. I scarcely think they would attempt to do it. I do not believe, that South Australia, Western Australia, and Tasmania would attempt to federate without Victoria and New South Wales. These two being the larger and more populous, and, at the present time, the wealthier states, some regard should be had to the voice of the people in those two colonies in framing, this bill. It is not necessary that I should reply to the intricate arguments advanced by the legal talent in the Convention on the side of equal state representation. I think it would be unwise to do so at the present time. My object as a true federationist is to see a bill framed that will meet the views and the support of the people of New South Wales, and I desire very much to see a bill framed which I can support before the country. If equal state representation is inserted in the bill in the bald manner in which it seems likely to be, however much I may be in favour of federation, I shall have to oppose the bill after it is framed in this Convention, and I should extremely regret having to do any such thing. There is another feature that struck me when listening to some of these debates. I listened attentively to the speech of Mr. Deakin, and I cannot see much difference between the views of that gentleman and my own, unless I altogether misinterpret what he said, for I interpret his remarks as having this meaning, "I am in favour of equal state rights, provided you insert in the constitution some machinery which will give a power of reference to the people in the case of deadlock." I should like to ask those gentlemen who have been saying so much about logic, what logic there is in standing up for equal state rights if you are going to import into the bill some machinery to destroy the power of the senate elected with equal state rights? Mr. Deakin, I think, made it abundantly clear that unless he obtained some provision in the bill that would be a solution of deadlocks between the two chambers, his words would be different, and I think he said his action would be different, regarding the vote on this particular question. It seems scarcely fair to ask the Convention to vote, to some extent, in the dark on this matter. I should like to ask my hon. friend, Mr. Isaacs, whether if he votes in favour of the motion on the present occasion, and if, when it is proposed to insert a provision in the bill giving power to the people to decide in case of deadlocks, that proposal is not carried, and the bill is framed with this hard and fast rule in it which will give to a, minority of the states the power of overwhelming a majority—a power of overwhelming all legislation that may take place by the representatives of the people—I should like to ask my hon. and learned friend whether in that case he would be prepared to accept the bill without the referendum or anything that would get rid of deadlocks between the two chambers? We are asked to vote on this question as though the Convention had agreed to import that provision into the bill. I venture to think that before many days are over, it will be found that no provision of the kind acceptable to the majority of the people will be inserted. What was the result of a vote on that question in Adelaide? The result was that such a provision does not appear in the bill now.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The voting was pretty close on that occasion!

Mr. LYNE:
I forget exactly what the voting was.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
It was 18 to 13!

Mr. LYNE:
That is not a very close vote. Suppose the Convention decides that it will not insert that provision, or any provision of the kind will my hon, friends; Mr. Deakin and Mr. Isaacs, and other hon. gentlemen who are now willing to, vote for equal state rights, be prepared to accept the bill with equal state rights, and with no provision, to do away with the possibility of deadlock between the two chambers? It is, therefore, scarcely fair to ask the Convention to deal finally with, the question at this particular time. I would go a step further, and say that I cannot see that the adoption of the referendum, or any provision under another name, but having the same effect, will do away, to a great extent, with my objection to equal state rights. I do not support equal state rights at

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The simple answer to that is, that there is nothing in the bill to that effect!

Mr. LYNE:
I beg the hon. member's pardon-there is. Will the hon. member deny that Tasmania, with a population of 160,000, and Western Australia, with a population of 130,000, can each return six representatives to the senate, while New South Wales, with a population of 1,300,000, can only return the same number of representatives?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
That is not what I meant. What I meant was that you do not give a man in Tasmania eight times as much power as you give a man in New South Wales by providing for equal representation in one home and proportional representation in the other.

Mr. LYNE:
If you provide for proportional representation in the house of representatives, and if you create another body which will revise the work done by that house—a power to refuse to pass and absolutely veto anything passed in the house of representatives—is not that equivalent to giving a man in a small state eight times the voting power possessed by a man in a large state? This, seems to me an unanswerable statement. You provide machinery for passing: legislation up to a certain point; but when you get to that point you provide further machinery to block it from going an inch further. What is the use of the machinery created in the first instance when the work of the house of representatives can be blocked by the upper chamber? We have had bitter experience of that in this colony on more than one occasion. The work done after arduous labour by the Legislative Assembly has been absolutely vetoed by the Legislative Council. Will the hon. and learned member, Mr Barton, tell us that if work is done in the house of representatives which the senate has the power of vetoing, the senate will not exercise that power? I venture to think that my hon. and learned friend has introduced a distinction without a difference, and that I am correct in stating that in the provision to be inserted in the bill, the representatives of the smaller state will be able to thwart the will of the majority of the people as expressed by their representatives in the lower house. There can be no answer to that. I think that if we negative the amendment this colony will not accept the bill. My objection to equal state representation would, to a very large extent, be done away with if there were a provision, or if there were to be a provision inserted in the bill giving an opportunity for an appeal to the people under certain circumstances by way of referendum. If that is not done, my objection, to equal state representation will remain whether I am in a minority here or in the country. If the members of the Convention desire to see the bill passed into law, I counsel them to fully consider the question which is to be forced to a vote this evening—I think unwisely, because we know that, great regret was expressed after our meetings at Adelaide were adjourned, because this matter, among others, had been hurried through in such an undue fashion, in order that the Premiers might get away to Great Britain.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

This matter was not hurriedly dealt with in Adelaide. Anyone who said that in the press has spoken an untruth.

Mr. LYNE:

I conceive that this matter and every matter was hurried through. During the last week or ten days of our Adelaide meeting we were sitting not only during the day, but for three parts of the night, and I ask whether, under such circumstances, the minds of hon. members were in a condition to consider important matters of this kind, and to deal with them in a manner satisfactory to themselves or to the electors they represent. I do not wish to detain hon. members longer; but if the arguments used by the representatives of the smaller colonies and by other hon. members who favour equal state representation have not underlying them the desire that the smaller states should have power to veto the will of the people in the larger states, they can have no effect at all. Hon. members might just as well not try to force on the Convention and on this colony the powers of the smaller states as compared, with the powers of the larger states. I say that it is ridiculous for those who favour equal state representation to imagine that the three colonies of South Australia, Tasmania, and Western Australia are fighting so hard for this right if they do not wish to have a very strong whip to lay upon the shoulders of the representatives of the larger colonies should occasion require. Having made these few remarks, which in a sense I apologise for, because they, are not the remarks which I had intended to make if I had had more time, I shall vote for the amendment. I hope that my prophecy that its rejection will do more to retard federation than anything else will not come true, though I think that it will.

Question—That the words "six senators for each state" proposed to be omitted stand part of the first paragraph—put. The Committee divided:

Ayes, 41; noes, 5; majority, 36.

In moving

That the Chairman do now leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again,

I desire to say a few words in reference to the observations of the hon. member, Mr. Lyne. I must say, in all good-feeling and respect for the hon. member, that I entirely dissent from his statement that the division which has just taken place was forced on. I think hon. members on each side will agree with me in what I said earlier in the afternoon—that is to say, that the debate had evoked every argument of which one had ever heard both for and against equal state representation. I merely wish to say this, in order to relieve myself of the charge of supposed complicity in the forcing on of any division. It was represented to me that there were two gentlemen beside the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, who wished to report progress and to defer the taking of a division, but on my putting the matter before both of them, they very properly withdrew their request. I mentioned that to the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, and he said that although he would like to have an adjournment of the debate until Monday, he would not actually press for it. Since the hon. member did not dissent from my statement, I presumed that he acquiesced in it. I wish to clear the hon. member's mind of the supposition that there was any desire on my part that the debate which has just taken place should be unduly forced to a conclusion. I think that what has occurred has fully justified that which I said in the afternoon—and even up to the present moment the statement remains true—that is at 4 o'clock, that every argument of which one had ever heard on one side or the other upon this question had been brought forward in such a way as to be clearly understood.
Mr. LYNE (New South Wales):
I merely wish to say that I understood from three other gentlemen that they intended to speak upon the amendment if an adjournment, of the debate took place until Monday. I certainly had no intention of making any harsh reference to the pushing of business; at the same time, I should have been glad, had an adjournment been agreed to, to speak at greater length than I did.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):
When I said that I had made a certain statement to an hon. member, and that I had not heard any dissent from him, he having been in the Chamber a little while before he spoke to me on the subject, I was not aware that in the interim he had gone out.

Motion agreed to; progress reported.

PAPERS.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST laid upon the table financial and statistical facts relating to the colony of Western Australia, and a report by the Government Actuary of Western Australia upon the Draft Constitution Bill.

Ordered: That the documents be printed.
Convention adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Procedure - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PROCEDURE.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[10.31]:

Before the business of the day is called on, I should like to suggest for the consideration of the leader of the Convention, now that we have practically disposed of the question of the constitution of the senate, whether it would not be in the interests of the movement and convenient to the Convention, if we were to take in hand the next difficult matter—the mode to be devised for settling deadlocks, should any arise, between the two houses. When we once know whether We are or are not to provide any such mode, and, if we are, what that mode is to be, I think it will facilitate the discussion with regard to the powers of the two houses. I think that if we could deal with that matter almost immediately, it would clear the ground of a large number of difficulties, and probably enable us to complete the business much more rapidly then if we were to discuss other matters, not knowing how we proposed to settle difficulties that might arise between the two chambers.

The PRESIDENT:

The matter can be discussed and settled in Committee.

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER (South Australia)[10.32]:

I would point out that when a clause has been amended, its further consideration cannot be postponed unless we pass a motion to suspend the standing orders.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[10.33]:

I am certainly not opposed to the course which has been suggested by the right hon. member, Sir George Turner. I do not know whether any difficulty would arise owing to the fact that such a proposal will, probably, take the shape of a new clause. The ordinary rules, of course, prevent us from proposing new clauses until the whole of the bill has been dealt with.

The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER:

That is not our practice!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Well, then, there is no difficulty in the way. Of course it is a matter of South Australian practice, and I am not able to say what that practice is. Perhaps the hon. member, Sir Richard Baker, or the President, might tell us what it is?
The PRESIDENT:
What is the point?
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Anything in the nature of a provisio n in regard to deadlocks, I am afraid, must be in the shape of a new clause. I am not aware of any clause in the bill before us into which it could be dovetailed; and, according to our practice in this colony, and certainly according to the practice of the Convention in Adelaide, new clauses were not taken until the whole of the clauses under the bill under consideration had been dealt with, and I may mention that owing to that circumstance I was compelled to leave the Convention at Adelaide without having taken part in that discussion, which I consider was the most vital of all.
The PRESIDENT:
The rule is that new clauses cannot be considered until after the rest of the bill has been disposed of; and, if any alteration in that respect is desired, we must suspend the standing orders.
Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[10.34]:
I should like to invite the attention of the leader of the Convention to a difficulty that we may be in when we come to the deadlock clauses. Under the standing orders under which we are working it will be necessary to put each of the three proposals suggested by the various parliaments in their order. We all know what happens when three proposals for amending the same clause are put successively; generally the one put last is carried, because the supporters of the other two combine to defeat the first and then the second, and in that way a real test of the feeling of the Convention would not be obtained. I should like to suggest to the leader of the Convention whether it is not possible, either by suspending the standing orders or by modifying them in some way, to take first of all a vote as to whether there should or should not be in the bill a provision in regard to deadlocks. If that is settled in the negative, of course the matter will be finally dealt with, but if it is decided in the affirmative, then might not there be a mode devised for obtaining the opinion of the members of the Committee as to which of the proposed schemes they really prefer?
The PRESIDENT:
I think that what is desired might be secured by suspending the standing orders and passing a resolution that new clauses maybe considered when desired by the Committee.
[P.358] starts here
The Hon. Sir R.C. BAKER (South Australia)[10.35]:
In reply to the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, I would point out that under the procedure that we have adopted the difficulty which he suggests could not arise because we are treating amendments as substantive propositions and any amendment brought forward can be amended in any way so as to meet the wishes of the members of the Convention. Therefore, there is no preference given to the amendment first proposed, or to the amendment last proposed.

The PRESIDENT:
That is so. I take it that an amendment would require to be pertinent to the subject-matter of the clause, and also to the suggested amendment, before the Chair. I do not understand at the present moment that there is before the Committee any clause which deals generally with the question of the solution of deadlocks.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)[10.36]:
In the suggested amendments that are before the Committee there are three proposals under the head of "amendments to clause 56," and putting forward three different schemes for dealing with deadlocks.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
And the South Australian scheme a little later!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Yes.

The PRESIDENT:
Is that by way of amendment or new clause?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
By way of a new clause.

The PRESIDENT:
An entirely new clause?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Yes.

The PRESIDENT:
I think that that will require to be considered after hon. members have gone through the bill!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
No. It is inserted in that part of the bill dealing with money powers.

The PRESIDENT:
It is a new clause!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
Undoubtedly.

The PRESIDENT:
I think the new clause ought properly to be taken after the rest of the bill has been disposed of!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
In reference to the suggestion of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, the only matter of importance to be dealt with under the head of the senate is the question whether the constituency shall be the whole colony or whether each colony shall be divided into different electorates. That is a very important matter, and perhaps might be dealt with at once.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I meant that after we had finished the question in regard to the senate we should settle the other questions!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
And under the head of money, powers, which are also important, perhaps this question, of deadlocks might be taken.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales)[10.37]:
The suggested amendments can hardly come within the category of the standing orders that require that new clauses shall be considered after the bill has been gone through, because by the act under which we are considering these suggested amendments, whether it is or is not a new clause, it is a suggested amendment which can and must be considered at the time when the clause in the original bill is being considered. Therefore I contend that any amendment, whether in the shape of an amendment or a particular clause, or whether by way of substituting a new clause for that clause, is equally within the consideration of the Committee.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.38]:
Perhaps some relief may be found in matters of this kind by the consideration of the directions given by the statute which overrides the standing orders. Where the business is directed by the statute to be reconsidered together with the suggested amendments, that may mean that the suggested amendments are to be considered at the same time as the clause to which they relate. Whether they are or are not new clauses they are equally suggested amendments. There will be some difficulty in considering the deadlock question at the present moment first, because this proposal comes upon us rather suddenly, and although we are able by the indulgence of the Chair to discuss the deadlock question, still we have not the deadlock proposals before us on the clause which is now before the Committee, and hon. members I think have not come here with the expectation of bringing forward and deciding today upon proposals to meet deadlocks. The consideration of the deadlock question now might therefore plunge us into a discussion we are but little prepared for, and everyone knows that that might cause some bewilderment and a little loss of time. But it is very desirable that these deadlock suggestions and any we may have to make ourselves should be considered as early as possible. In regard to that, I am quite at one with my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner. I suggest that the proper course is this: omitting minor clauses, let us deal with the constitution of the Senate; then with the constitution of the house of representatives—because before settling deadlocks we ought to know how the two chambers are to be constituted. Indeed before dealing with that question we ought to know how this Committee is going to decide as to the manner in which the senate is to be elected, whether each representative is to represent the whole colony or a constituency in a colony. These are the points to be considered: First, the constitution of the senate; next, the constitution of the house of representatives; then the relative powers of the two houses as to money bills; and then the deadlock question, which is contingent upon the question of money powers, which arise in connection with clauses 54 and 55.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Before you deal with deadlocks?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I think it will be more convenient.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I think the reverse?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
It seems to me to work out this way. You want to provide that is the desire of many hon members against such a difference of opinion as will lead to a stoppage of the legislative machinery. You cannot intelligently consider that question unless you first know how the two houses are to be constituted respectively and what powers they are to have in relation to money bills. It is generally conceded in endeavouring to prevent deadlocks, that the disagreements which arise are in near

An Hon. MEMBER:
You might take that tomorrow?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
We might take it immediately after we have discussed the money powers, and postpone all the clauses except those relating to the constitution of the senate, the house of representatives, and their relative money powers. If hon members agree with that suggestion, it will ease our task considerably, and bring on the discussion on deadlocks during the present week.

The PRESIDENT:
In reference to the remarks of the hon. and learned member, Mr.
O'Connor, in reference to the various provisions in regard to deadlocks, having fully considered the matter, I may point out that the proper course is for the various amendments whether in respect of those clauses or others to be submitted for consideration to be taken in the order in which they appear on the business-paper. It is not as if in the ordinary course the clause is proposed for the first time in Committee; but we have them before us already, and further by statutory enactment they are referred to the Committee for consideration, and there is nothing to prevent their consideration in the order in which they stand.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid (New South Wales)[10.43]:

Are we to understand that we finish the constitution of the senate, then that of the house of representatives, then take the money powers, and next the deadlocks?

The Hon. E. Barton:

That is so they would arise consecutively?

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

It does appear to me that the deadlock question should come after the debate on the constitution of the two houses, because deadlocks are not confined to money bills; a provision in respect to that would be a general power. I have no objection to either course as long as these matters are taken in the order which the hon. and learned member suggests.

The President:

With regard to new clauses in the ordinary sense of the word which have not been referred to the Committee and are not capable of being considered by way of amendment, the ordinary rule of procedure will apply.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee:

Clause 9. The senate shall be composed of six senators for each state, and each senator shall have one vote.

Then senators shall be directly chosen by the people of the state as one electorate.

The senators shall be chosen for a term of six years, and the names of the senators chosen by each state shall be certified by the governor to the governor-general.

The parliament shall have power, from time to time, to increase or diminish the number of senators for each state, but so that the equal representation of the several states shall be maintained and that no state shall have less than six senators.

The qualification of electors of senators shall be in each state that which is prescribed by this constitution or by the parliament as the qualification for electors of members of the house of representatives, but in the choosing of senators each elector shall vote only once, and if any elector votes more than once he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

The CHAIRMAN:
Amendments in the second paragraph have been suggested by the legislatures of the five colonies, with a view to omit the words "one electorate." I intend to put the widest amendment, to omit those words, because that includes all the others. That amendment can be treated as a substantive question, and be amended in any way.

Question proposed That the words (as one electorate) proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause.

The Hon. N.J. BROWN:
A similar amendment has been proposed by the Tasmanian Parliament, an amendment which has the same effect as that of the South Australian Parliament, but somewhat larger.

The CHAIRMAN:
Four or five houses have proposed practically the same amendment. The question is: That the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the paragraph.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.47]:
I do not know whether the Committee would like to go to a division on a matter of such importance

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
We have not got to that yet!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
That is exactly what we have come to. That is the amendment which has been put. I want to point out that this is a most serious amendment. It may indeed be the desire of the Committee to leave full authority to each state parliament to elect its own quota to the senate as it may determine, but we must have regard to the fact that that is not the proposal that found favour before. We decided before that each state should as one electorate elect the senators, and by that we decided upon one important principle, and that was that the quota of each state to the federal parliament should be elected by that state as one corporate body by the vote of the entire electorate of that state. The bill of 1891 was on the same principle, because it provided for the election in this respect of each state legislature, and in that respect it recognised the corporate existence of each state. It provided, therefore, that without regard to locality within the state the senate should be elected by that state as one whole. If we are to adopt an amendment of this kind, or those other amendments which provide for splitting the state up into so many electorates, we shall lose the principle of united action on the part of the senate, and give a force to locality which, it seems to me, we ought not to give in respect to the election of the senate. The force to be given to locality is to be created by the proposal that the members of the house of representatives shall be elected by districts. But, in dealing with the place which the senate occupies in a constitution of this kind, we have drawn a broad distinction between the two methods of election by providing in the bill as it stands that, whilst in the one house we give due weight to the principle of local representation, with regard to the other, which is opposed to regarding the state in its local interests, you ignore the principle of locality, and suggest that there should be united action on the part of the state. That is really the matter before us. I thought it wise to point out this, so that the subject should not be dealt with in a hurry, because it involves a wide principle indeed.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia) [10.51]:

I have no doubt the alteration suggested by the hon. member will, from a theoretical point of view at any rate, commend itself to hon. members. If you agree that we should have a vote of the whole of a state concentrated upon the election of the members of the senate, it will be theoretically right under the constitution we are trying to build up; but there are difficulties in the way, practical difficulties which will, I think, as time goes on nullify to a very large extent the good that the hon. member points out from a theoretical point of view. A great change in public opinion, at any rate, a great chance of opinion from the Convention point of view, has come about since 1891. In 1891 we agreed by a large majority to follow the plan which was time-honored, at any rate, which has existed for a hundred years in the United States, that is, that the members of the senate should be elected by the various state legislatures. I can understand well enough the objections that have been raised to that system, especially if we had to elect a large number of members every time, but when we recollect that the election will only be of two or three members at a time it seems to me that plan would have done very well for us, and that it would be more likely to yield good results than the plan proposed in this bill. How

[ P.362] starts here

will it be possible to ascertain public opinion truly with regard to a number of candidates over an immense area with a large population? There will be great difficulty. I think the chief reason why this plan has commended itself to many hon. members has been the result of the election of members of this Convention. They cannot but think that a system which worked so well and so wisely in returning such, able, true, and patriotic members to this Convention as they themselves are must be an excellent plan and one likely to work well in the future. I am quite prepared to admit that it has worked exceedingly well during the first election. I admit it as fully as anyone in this Convention. But I believe that as time goes on, instead of having the voice of the people represented under such a method of elections you will have a host of cliques and rings voting by ticket from one end of the country to the other. People will be called upon to vote for persons of whom they have never heard, and of whom they have no knowledge whatever, who, probably, have had little experience of public life; and the electors will be called upon to vote for a certain number of candidates by one party or another, by one clique or organisation or another throughout the length and breadth of the country. It is a great advantage in an election if you can bring the elector as close as possible to the candidate so that he may know something of the man for whom he is asked to vote. That, of course, is fully recognised in the elections for our various legislative assemblies. The candidates are men fairly well known to the electors by repute, or by intimate knowledge and association. In the case even of a colony like New South Wales, if, the whole colony is turned into one electorate, it will be a great advantage to the more prominent men—the men who are best known throughout the country. If that would be the result, probably I should not be found complaining very much. But I fear that it will not be the result. My objection to this plan is not theoretical; I think such a system would be excellent theoretically, but I object from a practical point of view. We have immense territories now which by-and-by will be thickly populated. Take Western Australia, for instance, or South Australia, with her Northern Territory, and her boundaries running right down to the southern ocean. Take Queensland, or New South Wales. How will it be possible to get a true vote from the people in those territories with regard to the candidates, who will not be able to visit all the localities, and who will not be able to travel from one end of the country to the other to address the electors unless they are millionaires and have nothing else to do. They could not afford either the time or the expense necessary to visit the various parts of one State. The system is altogether too unwieldy to be suitable. Under this plan, which we are adopting it seems to me the most that we could do would be to have three electorates in every colony. Three members go out periodically, and there must therefore be three electorates. We cannot have more than three electorates.
Mr. HIGGINS:
Would not three electorates be huge also?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Yes, but not so huge as a whole state would be. It will be necessary to have the electorates very large, seeing that the franchise of both houses is to be the same, the object being to have the voting power spread over an extended area rather than to establish different qualifications for the electors. I am sure that three electorates would be large enough for every colony.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
Why not leave the question to be decided by each individual state?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I would leave it to each state to say whether they would have one electorate or three; but I think we should have either one or three. The proposal submitted by the Parliament of Western Australia is that there should be one or more electorates, as each state may determine. It must be one or three electorates, because three members retire at certain periods, and there must be one member for each electorate. I have made these observations, not with any desire of dwelling on this subject too long, but in order to p

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[11]:
I agree with my right hon. friend, Sir John Forrest. It is all very well to say that the Convention elections were very successful—I am not going to deny that; but a political election might be very different indeed from a convention election. The issues are totally different. In a convention election, the candidates are judged according to their past history, their patriotic statements, and their long standing; but in a political election men will be elected on their opinions, and no doubt their education and character will stand for a great deal: they will not stand for all. Therefore, I would support the amendment of our own Council, namely, that there shall be as many provinces as there are senators—six provinces for six senators.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
How would the hon. member do when three senators went for re-election?

The Hon. S. FRASER:
Let them cast lots, and let three members belonging to certain electorates go for those seats.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Only half the state would be voting?
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
You must have either one or three!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I think that three constituencies will be better than one. It is not possible for any candidate to canvass any colony, even the smallest colony-

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
So much the better for him!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
So much the worse for his constituents, perhaps! No matter how well he may be known, unless he goes to the various centres of population and even to the minor centres, indeed, he will lose very many votes. Even though his opinions may be the best possible opinions he loses votes. I have known candidates who did not visit some places to lose many votes. It is a common saying of the people, "If it is not worth his while to come here it is not worth our while to vote for him." It is not a very high standard certainly for people to set up, but it is the usual way in which candidates are dealt with. I would like a candidate to have an opportunity to place his views fearlessly before the voters, it might be perhaps in opposition to the press. What possible chance would a candidate have, no matter how true and good his opinions were, if he were in opposition to the press? If the colony is one electorate I have no hesitation in saying that the press will have almost all power, and scarcely a single man will get elected to a convention or succeed in a political contest against the united opinion of the press. In a smaller province it would be possible for a candidate to make his views known, and even stand in opposition to a strong press or any other opposition. A man would be taken on his merits better in that case than he would if the colony were one constituency. I will support the proposal to have three or six electorates rather than one electorate.

The Hon. N.J. BROWN (Tasmania):[11.5]
I hope that the amendment suggested by the right hon. member, Sir John Forrest, will be agreed to for many reasons, but especially for this reason that the principle has been recognised in all our discussions, both in the Convention of 1891, and in the Convention at Adelaide, that as little interference as possible with the independent action of the separate states should be embodied in the bill. In the Tasmanian Parliament I opposed the suggested amendment to strike out the words "one electorate," mainly for this reason that there is a very strong desire on the part of very many persons who have taken a prominent part in public affairs in Tasmania, and I am happy to say amongst a great many who have not taken a prominent part in public affairs, to apply to the election of senators in that colony the Hare system. We can only do that in Tasmania if we have one electorate. I pointed out that if it were inconvenient, as I have no doubt it would be, for the larger colonies to have only one electorate, it was for those colonies to suggest an alteration of the clause, and not for us to whom it would not be a matter of inconvenience. I am satisfied that if it were possible it would be far better, on the principle laid down by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, that we should have only one electorate, but I recognise the fact that owing to the enormous area of the larger colonies, perhaps it is impracticable. I think the Convention would do well to leave it as proposed to the parliament of each colony to divide that colony into one or more electorates as may be found most convenient, and for that reason I shall support the amendment when it is proposed.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[11.7]:

I admit that there is a great deal to be said on both sides of this question. At the same time, I think the tendency in all these colonies during the last few years has been to decrease the size of the electorates. I am speaking now of our present system of single electorates. I am speaking from the standpoint of this colony. It is only about four years since we had double electorates in the country districts, and quadruple electorates in the city and in the suburbs. Our last Electoral Act did away with that system, and we have single electorates now all through the colony in order, as the hon. member, Mr. Fraser, mentioned, that no member shall have to travel over too large a portion of the country, and that he shall come in touch as nearly as possible with the electors. Even supposing that we should divide New South Wales into six electorates, those gentlemen who know something of this colony will know the area of the electorates. I will describe one electorate, and I presume in the division we will have to take into consideration the number of people residing in a certain portion of the country, and not the area alone, If you take the summit of Kosciusko and run the backbone of the range right round to Moss Vale, or near to Moss Vale, and take a straight line from there to Bourke, all the country to the south or south-west of that will be one electorate-a principality in itself. And so also will the western and northern portions of this colony form electorates of immense area. I think a very strong reason is given by my right hon. friend, Sir John Forrest, that if we allow the country to remain as one electorate we will have a system of tickets on which the elections will take place, and one single portion of a colony-for instance, the city of Sydney, or the city of Melbourne-can rule the whole colony.

[P.365] starts here

Mr. HIGGINS:
Apply the Hare system, or some other modification; it will correct it largely!

Mr. LYNE:
I am not sufficiently acquainted with the Hare system to say whether the objection can be overcome in that way. Possibly it may be overcome in that way; there may be a solution of the difficulty. Without some solution, I think the colony should be divided, not into one or three electorates, but into six electorates. I cannot see the virtue of having one electorate or three electorates.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The objection is that only half the state would vote on the election of three members!

Mr. LYNE:
After the first election half the number of the senate go out. There may be some argument in that; but I am firmly convinced that it would be better in the interests of all parties if the colony were divided into six electorates rather three. According to the schedule of suggested amendments which has been supplied to us from both the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, the suggestion, I think, is to have six electorates, and from the Legislative Assembly of Victoria we get the same suggestion.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
From the Council also!

Mr. LYNE:
I did not notice the suggestion of the Council; but in each case, as far as I am aware, it was made by an overwhelming majority. Although, in the vote we gave the other night, the recommendation of some of the parliaments was not approved of, I think we should give some consideration to the suggestions made by the various parliaments on all matters where we consistently can. Here is a strong suggestion from two houses in each colony which, I think, to a large extent, should guide us. I desire, at this point, to say a word in reference to a speech made the other day on the state rights question. Mr. Wise said that in this colony no regard was had to the numbers of people in the various electorates. The hon. gentleman is absolutely wrong. In dividing the colony under the electoral act we fix the number of electors in each electorate. The numbers are the same in the town as in the country.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
They are practically the same. They vary one or two hundred!
Mr. LYNE:

Yes, they vary very slightly, and they vary simply because we cannot get, within one or two hundred, the number required in some of the country districts. At the same time, in some of the country districts, the numbers are greater than they are in some of the suburban districts. I am well acquainted with this matter, because at the time we were dealing with this provision in Parliament I opposed it on the ground that if we gave an equal number of electors to the cities which we gave to the country towns, the latter would be obliterated by the city. My friend, Mr. Copeland, who was debating the question at the time, pointed out that the country constituencies, whose members lived in Sydney, would represent the city perfectly well if it had no special representation at all.

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS:

The numbers vary now from 1,400 to 3,200. The smallest is Lismore with 1,400, and the largest Marrickville with 3,200.

Mr. LYNE:

I think the hon. member will find that the act provides for a margin of 600. It is only where circumstances will not permit of it being otherwise, that any discrepancy occurs. There are instances where, in some of the suburbs, the numbers are not equal to those in the country districts. I only wish to refer to the matter because it was debated at the time, and because it applies to present conditions. I think we should, as far as possible, limit the districts in such a way that each person standing for election can go through the whole of his electorate and make himself known to the whole of his constituents.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

Make his opinions known!

Mr. LYNE:

Yes; he should be able to make his opinions known, and no weak portions of the country should be obliterated by senators running on tickets.

Mr. WISE:

As a matter of personal explanation, I wish to state that I had intended myself to have made the correction to which Mr. Lyne has referred today. I was in error in stating there was anything in our law giving a different quota to one part of the country compared with another. The effect, however, is precisely the same, although the law provides that there shall be the same quota for all electorates. By the necessary use of the margin of 600, there are inequalities created in order to give adequate representation to the interests of local districts. The difference is as large as has been pointed out by Mr. Lewis.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[11.14]:

I agree with the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, that this is a matter upon which a great deal can be said on both sides. My own opinion is strongly in favour of the clause as it stands. I feel that, unless you have a system of this kind, the power of the states will be practically frittered away, and they will bare a fractional representation instead of a states representation.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Local interests will divide their representatives!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Yes, in a number of ways. Then, unfortunately, under an arrangement which provides that half the senate shall go for election every three years, the country, under this subdivision, will never have an opportunity of expressing its views at all.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

It will, if we have three electorates!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Not necessarily; because, as the constitution stands, given the first six senators, lot decides who shall go out in three years. Therefore, lot decides how the elections will come on. It is quite possible that two or three electorates will be in one corner of the colony.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The hon. member, Sir John Forrest, suggests dividing the colony into three electorates!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I am not dealing with Sir John Forrest's suggestion, but with the bill as it stands. Under the bill as it stands the question as to what three senators will first retire at the end of three years is to be determined by lot.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The bill refers to only one electorate at present!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Yes, but, quite in harmony with that provision is another provision to the effect that three senators shall go out at the end of three years. Then ever afterwards three will go out at the end of each three years. There never will be an election of six senators for one, state after the first election. When the matter settles down there will always be an election of three senators at the same time, at intervals of three years. That is the provision in the bill as it stands. Therefore it is quite possible in fact it is more than possible that under such an arrangement the views of the colony as a colony would never be heard. With this fractional representation we shall never have any means, of ascertaining the views of the whole community. I should imagine that the states would look at that matter rather closely.
The Hon. J.H. Howe:
Should not we leave that to the state?

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:
I quite admit, strong as my opinion is, that this is pre-eminently a matter upon which the states have a right to be heard. If only two or perhaps three, states had suggested this alteration, I should feel so strong in my opinion upon the subject that I should certainly stand by the bill; but I find that each of the five colonies has suggested the alteration in principle that is to say, each of the five colonies has objected to the scheme contained in the bill. For instance, New South Wales says:
Omit "as one electorate," insert "such state being divided into electorates, each returning one senator."
Victoria says:
Omit "as one electorate," and insert a provision" leaving the matter to the Parliament.
South Australia says:
Omit "one electorate," insert "each state parliament shall determine."
Tasmania says:
Omit "as one electorate," insert "in such manner as the parliament of each state shall determine."
Western Australia says
Omit "as one electorate," insert, "as the parliament of each state may determine."

Therefore, in view of the fact that the five state by their parliaments unanimously object to the provision we have made, and in view further of the fact that this is a matter peculiarly for themselves to settle, I think although I would adhere to the original clause under less pressure than this that with the enormous pressure put upon us by the fact that each colony through its parliament objects to the provision, we must respect the suggestions which have been made. I feel perfectly sure if one can feel perfectly sure about anything in the future that the states themselves will very soon discover that they have made a very great mistake; that their only chance of being up to their full strength in a senate of this kind is by an election by the whole of the people at one time. That is my strong opinion, and I believe that experience will show it to be right. Still this is a point which is not vital and it is a point upon which the local legislatures have a very strong right to be heard. Under these circumstances, giving my opinion frankly as I have done, I am prepared to let the colonies have their own way in, this one matter at any rate.

Mr. CLARKE (Tasmania)[11.21]:

I should very much like to see the colonies voting as single electorates, and in Adelaide I voted for this proposal with the intention, when we resumed our sittings, of moving an amendment providing for the election of the members of the senate upon the Hare system. Upon considering the matter further, however, I have come to the conclusion that the application of the Hare system to the election of senators is a matter for legislation by the federal parliament, and not a matter to, be inserted in the constitution. For this reason I do not intend to move the amendment of which I gave notice. In respect to this particular matter I regard the senate as the states house. It is the house in which, the various colonies will be represented as states, and it is a matter of great importance that each state should be left to decide how it should elect its representatives. For these reasons I am in favour of the amendment which has been indicated, leaving the matter to the parliament of each state. I know that in Tasmania our Parliament is likely to resolve upon the Hare system as the method of electing the senators. Another reason why I do not feel inclined to press my amendment with regard to the Hare system to a division is that I have just heard from the hon. member, Mr Lyne, that he is completely ignorant of the system. He does not know what it means. There may also be a number of other hon. members who are not acquainted with it, and who would, therefore, vote against it for that reason alone.

Mr. LYNE:

I said that we had had no practical experience of its working here!

Mr. CLARKE:

You cannot have practical experience of it until you have tried it. It has not been tried in this colony, but it has been tried in Tasmania. I should not like to see Tasmania prevented from adopting the system.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Under this amendment Tasmania would not be prevented from adopting it!

Mr. CLARKE:

Tasmania has a much better chance of getting the system from her own Parliament than from the federal one. In our view, for the proper working of the Hare system it is much better to have a number of seats to be filled. If half the senators are retired every two or three years, there will be only three seats to be filled at any one election, and three, seats is the lowest number with which you can satisfactorily work the Hare system. The lowest number we have had in Tasmania is four. I think the system has worked very satisfactorily in our state elections, and we might possibly use it as a method of election to fill three vacancies in the senate. For these reasons I think the matter should be left for each legislature to decide for itself.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales)[11.25]:

With every desire to accelerate business, I think that this is a question upon which we ought to proceed with the utmost caution, when we recollect that the principle of taking a popular vote for the election of members of the senate has been more or less, so far as the general public is concerned, a very late evolution of the federation question. I think it is very difficult for us to decide at the present moment what is best in the interests of the senate and of the constitution. What I fear is that if we put a rigid direction in the constitution that there shall be one electorate in each colony; or, if we put in an equally rigid direction that each state shall have the right to determine the matter for itself, we may be doing that which it will be very difficult to alter, and which may have very far-reaching and important results. I would point out one matter which may bear directly upon the subject. According to the views of several hon. members, you have later on to decide upon the question of getting at the popular voice to avoid deadlocks and extreme cases which can only be settled by an appeal to the people. If we constitute the senate in such a way that you cannot get at the voice of the people as states, it may create a very great difficulty in the future.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

It would be the voice of the people in another way!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

We are trying to determine what we cannot possibly determine, not knowing the conditions of the future. I am speaking now as if we determined in the constitution that the voting should be by districts or by states as electorates. You might have a colony in which there would be room for only one electorate, or for two electorates. If we now crystallise it in this bill, it cannot be changed, except in a roundabout way.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

Will the hon. member explain how there could be two electorates when there would be three vacancies to fill?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Well, I simply mean to say that it would be a difficult thing to decide what number of electorates there should be in each colony. If you provided for six electorates in each colony, it might be difficult in some of the colonies under certain conditions to carry out that arrangement in the future.

Mr. LYNE:

The proposal of the New South Wales Assembly would not limit the number to six. They suggest that the electorates should be in proportion to the population, and that there should not be less than three senators to represent any state.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I want it to be understood that I am, speaking generally, against making anything rigid with regard to the conditions of the future. For instance, supposing and it is very right to say so that it may be wise at the present moment to have one popular vote for the election of members of the senate, we do not know that in the future there may not be large cities and large districts in these colonies which will insist upon an alteration in the plan. Therefore, I shall be very much inclined and I confess it is a question which requires a great deal of light cast upon it—to leave the provision in the bill as it is, subject to alteration by parliament in the future. Now we come to the contention that this is absolutely a state question. We have decided with regard to the lower house that the franchise and everything connected with representation there shall be a matter for the federal parliament. We know, of course, that the case is not analogous, because this is a state-house. At the same time, I feel that, whatever is agreed upon, we ought to have one consistent kind of representation; that is to say, there should not be one electorate in one state and several in another. Because it seems to me that if we are to have cases in which the senate is deeply at variance with the house of representatives, and if it is necessary to know what the opinions of the states as a whole are, in these sparsely-populated colonies where some districts may contain only a handful of people it would be absolutely impossible, even if the senate were dissolved, to say that it came back with the mandate of the people. Therefore, as it is necessary for us to give definite opinions in order to accelerate business, my view at the present time is, and I express it with great timidity, that we ought to leave the provision as it stands in the bill, but make it subject to any alteration which the federal parliament may in the future devise. And then, if parliament is not in unison with the people of the country we can, of course, have that alteration of the constitution which is the last resort.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[11.31]:

I shall give my vote in favour of one electorate. I think it is a grand idea to have at least one house in this parliament which will be free from the deteriorating tendency of local interests. I think it will tend to make those who represent the people in the senate free of the clamour of noisy coteries in their constituencies. They will be able to ignore unreasonable demands made by a thousand or two electors, who might be able under other circumstances to dictate a policy to weak candidates. At all events, whatever is done, we must not accept the suggestion of the Right Hon. the Premier of Western Australia, and leave the matter to the local parliaments, because it is really not a matter of local concern. The mode in which members of the senate are elected in Victoria affects equally the people of Western Australia, South Australia, Queensland, New South Wales, and Tasmania. They are all affected by the votes of the members who are elected. I say, therefore, that the mode in which the members of each state are elected is a matter of federal concern, and I think the right hon. gentleman can hardly have realised the extent to which gerrymandering can be carried on in a particular state if he would suggest that it should be left to the local parliaments to decide this question. If a local parliament has to decide it, then by a careful adjustment of the districts of the senate and a careful arrangement of the population in those districts, it would be competent for the local parliament to unduly colour the principles of the members of the senate. I hope, therefore, that, we shall leave to the local parliaments a matter which is purely one of federal concern. As was pointed out at the last meeting of the Convention by the hon. member, Mr. Holder, each colony in the federal parliament is interested in the mode of election to the senate of all the members for each state. In this matter I am aware, that I am opposed to the views of a number of those who are with me upon the general principles of the constitution. They say that the principle of having the whole colony as one electorate is a bad one, and that under it only rich men will be elected. I think if the question be looked into more closely it will be seen that true safety lies in either small electorates or in an electorate so huge that it cannot be influenced by rich men. I think we are all desirous that any man, no matter how poor he may be, shall be in a position to become a member of the senate, and if you adopt the huge electorate of the whole colony the result will be that those arts which are used for the purpose of getting rich men into the House will be impracticable. No candidate could cover the whole colony with his committee-rooms; no man is able to incur expenditure on account of the whole colony in the way in which and, to the extent to which he would incur it in a large district. I have no doubt that the hon. member, Mr. Lyne, is profoundly affected by the value of the reform of single electorates which has been carried in New South Wales. But the hon. member will find it quite consistent to have small electorates, for a house which is to represent largely local interests, and to have the huge electorate of the colony in respect of the other house. Let me appeal in this matter to the experience of those who were elected to this Convention. Speaking personally, I can say that I never fought an election with less expense. We all found it absolutely impossible to meet the demands made upon us to have committee-rooms all over the colony, or to use those arts which are sometimes employed in order to reach the people.

Mr. WISE:
A very euphemistic expression!

Mr. HIGGINS:
Of course, the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, knows as well as does any one here how a man may be driven by the demands of supporters into this thing, that thing, and the other. If members of the senate are elected by the whole colony, you will be apt to give effect to what Sir Henry Parkes in 1891 termed the only conservatism possible in a democracy, the conservatism which arises from official position, from length of experience and weight of character. And although I do admit that there is a danger of the operation of what is called the party ticket, of only one party being represented in an election by the colony as a whole, I think that any one who looks carefully into the matter, will see that by the adoption of the Hare system, or something of that sort, it will be quite possible to avoid the whole of the members being elected upon a party ticket. I am one of those who have no fear of the due representation of minorities. I think it is our duty to see that we give voice to any substantial number of electors; but if any one has watched, as Mr. Lyne may watch, the working of the Hare system in Tasmania—where it is applied also in Denmark where it has been adopted, he will have seen that the effect of that system, or a similar system and there have been several modifications proposed—is to give a true reflex of the bulk of opinion in the country. If the country, as a whole, is as two is to one. for a particular policy, it will be found that, under some system, such as that of Mr. Hare, you will have members returned in the proportion, as two is to one. That is the theory. But one very strong argument has been used by Sir Samuel Griffith in regard to this matter: He says that, for the large colonies, such as Queensland, South Australia, and Western Australia, the machinery is too cumbersome and complicated—than you cannot, under such circumstances, have an election for the whole country. But, under the proposal of one district for each senator, or three districts returning two members each, you would still have equally cumbersome machinery. There would be the same expenditure; but, in place of having the whole country behind the man-
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Have you that in the house of representatives?

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think it is of great advantage to have local interests—even small interests well voiced somewhere in Parliament, and the house of representatives, I take it, will give voice to those interests and wants. You cannot be too careful in enabling local interests to be represented; but if you have the house of representatives elected by comparatively small districts one member for each and if you have the senate representing the whole colony, I think that will do. I would cordially indorse the suggestion thrown out by my hon friend, Mr. McMillan, and I think the clause might be altered by the insertion of the words "until parliament otherwise provides." If the federal parliament should find that this method is unworkable, they will be able to alter it. But of all the schemes that have been put forward I deprecate most that scheme which will leave to the state parliaments a matter which is clearly of federal concern the kind of electorates for the federal parliament.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[11.42]:

I have always preferred the bill in the form in which we passed it, from the point of view of dignifying the senate as much as possible. I admit frankly that that is the point of view from which I always spoke, and from which I have always acted. When we are asking, and when we mean later on to contend that the money powers of the senate shall be as much as possible those of the other house, we want particularly to be certain that the gentlemen who are returned by the colonies to the senate shall represent the majority of the whole colony. if the electorates are cut up, they will still be very large, as Sir John Forrest had to admit. They may be divided, and what guarantee under any system we know of at present except perhaps one in New South Wales, which, I understand, may be a little help in that way shall we have that the majority of the votes will represent the majority of the people? If we have the senators returned by the whole colony voting as one, Sir John Forrest says, the people will be voting for what they do not understand. I am not prepared to concede that to my right hon friend. I think nowadays the persons who practically run and guide elections, the active elements in elections, know perfectly well everything that is going on without the necessity of the member attending the particular place where they happen to live to make speeches to them.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

The electors want to know the views of the candidates!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

They may not know the men so well personally, they may miss the charm of their speech or the fascination of their presence, but so far as the general views of the candidates are concerned the electors know these possibly a great deal better from the public press and other reports than from speeches which though they might arouse their enthusiasm might be destructive of their judgment for the moment.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
They like to see the candidates face to face!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
They can in a sense see them face to face.

Mr. CLARKE:
The candidates can send their photographs!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
You cannot possibly have more than three electorates, and how many electors will have an opportunity of seeing the candidates face to face? It is true, as Sir John Forrest said, that in America they are elected by conventions.

The Hon. W. MOORE:
They are elected by the states!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
They are elected by the local legislatures. But my right hon. friend thinks that if you have election by the people you will have a different kind of election from election by the local legislatures. I think not. For my own part I supported this altered system of electing the senate the deviation from the American system for the purpose of making the senate stronger so that it shall more directly represent the people. But if you cut up a colony into districts, and have persons of diametrically opposite views returned from districts which have diametrically opposite interests, the effectiveness of the representation will become weaker and weaker. There will be no wholehearted support about anything. And in the same breath in which you are doing this you are asking that equal powers should be given to the senate. Equal powers can only be given to the senate because the senate represents the states as entities, and part from the people as population. But if you go and cut up your entity and make it into a duality, or a trinity, who can say who represents who, or where you get any certainty? And another thing, I look upon it as a matter of the highest importance that you should invite to your senate the best men of Australia. However you constitute it, its ultimate dignity and usefulness will depend on the invitation it gives to the best men and the brightest intellects. In Switzerland the principle of state right is carried out to perfection, because each state is allowed to elect its senators as it pleases. But it is not at all clear that in Switzerland the dignity of the senate is being maintained as it is in America.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Because the people would not agree to it, because we have to be practical, and we must not say we will not have federation because we cannot get it in the way that pleases ourselves. I feel also that the senate will be ever so much stronger when it is directly returned by the vote of the people than by the votes of persons elected by the people. It is because it will be stronger, because its power will be greater, that I prefer the method adopted in the bill. But I want the senate, in addition, to be a body that will invite the best men in Australia to become members of it. Out of that will not come trouble and confusion or difficulty with the other branch of the legislature. Out of that, on the contrary, will come good understanding, wisdom, and content. It is from the point of view of preserving the high dignity of this body by making it secure reasonable uniformity of views amongst the members returned by one colony, and also preserve both its utility to its colony and its dignity to itself, that I hope no alteration will be made.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Then why not elect the house of representatives in the same way?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

The house of representatives represents the people as individuals. From his smile, the hon. member seems to think that he has made a point against me by that remark, but he really has not. He forgets that it is a federation that we are making, and that we are not going in for amalgamation; and on consideration the hon. gentleman will see that we do not disagree with each other so much as he thought. I do not think this is a time to make long speeches on this or any other subject. I only hope that hon. members who come from different colonies and who see the manifest convenience, as pointed out by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest with his usual clearness, of conducting these elections in districts instead of throughout the whole colony, will also observe that the very foundation of the constitution of the senate will be shaken by this method of conducting the elections, and that the very importance we wish to establish and preserve will be destroyed by a consideration for the personal convenience of certain electors.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Not the people, but the candidates really!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Would not the system advocated by the hon. and learned gentleman give an undue advantage to the crowded centres of population?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I think not. The right hon. gentleman put with great eloquence the excellencies of particular candidates returned to this Convention on popular representation, and we frankly admit that. But the right hon. gentleman said that we must not be deceived by that, and that the same thing might not happen again. That is just where I disagree with my right hon. friend. I think that on great questions like this parties cease to exist. There is no tory, there is no liberal. Every man in his own colony is to a great extent a tory if you like. Internal politics have nothing to do with the principles which actuate

The CHAIRMAN:

I wish to state to the Committee that if the words are left in, Mr. McMillan will move to add at the end of the paragraph the following words: "until parliament otherwise provides."

Mr. LEAKE (Western Australia)[11.52]:

If we are to view this question merely from the standpoint of convenience, I think we may at once see that the division of the colonies into different electorates would meet with approval; but I should like to direct the attention of hon. members to the wording of this paragraph:

The senators shall be directly chosen by the people of the state as one electorate.

If the senators are to be directly chosen by the people of the state, can they be so chosen unless as one electorate? That is one difficulty that presents itself to my mind. And, again, suppose the different states are cut up into different electorates, it must necessarily follow that those electorates will return one or two members, as the case may be. How, then, in the event of death or resignation, would those states find themselves placed? It might possibly be that one division of the colony would have an opportunity of returning senators two or three times, and that that particular division of the colony would be taken to be expressing the views of the whole state, whereas, really and in fact, it would be expressing only local sentiment. That occurs to me to be a point well worthy of consideration. I admit that when this question was before our own local Parliament I supported the proposition that the matter should be left to the states to determine, actuated as I was by the question of convenience. But, in considering this question, I take it that we should not be guided merely by local interests, and view it from that narrow standpoint, but should remember that we are attempting to build up a constitution, and that state interests must give way to federal interests. I point out these little difficulties more in the spirit of argument than of assertion, and hope that other hon. members will refute what I have said if refutation is necessary. So far as the question of voting on a ticket is concerned, I cannot say that is a disadvantage, because we hear so often that it is measures and not men we require when we send men forward to represent us in public institutions. Whatever we do, we should safeguard ourselves against returning the roads and bridges politicians who are, perhaps, known to some of us in our different colonies. In politics a local man is not always the best man, and, as has been pointed out by other hon. members, we require the best representative men of the various states. I am impressed with the arguments which have been advanced in favour of the state returning senators by one electorate, and I am disposed to support this paragraph of the clause as it stands. If we adopted this course our senate would undoubtedly be a more popular and representative chamber than if the states are practically divided into separate and distinct municipalities.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[11.55]:

I am prepared to vote for the clause as it is. I think, however, that it might be of importance to give the federal parliament power to work out the federal salvation from time to time, as necessity arose, by appropriate legislation, and I will support any amendment in that direction. At the same time, I suggest to my hon. friend, Mr. McMillan, that the amendment he has proposed goes a great deal too far. I understand that what he proposes is an addition to the clause, so that he can make it read as follows:—

The senators shall be directly chosen by the people of the state as one electorate, and, until otherwise determined by the federal parliament.

The result of making that addition to the clause would be that you would give power to the federal parliament not only to declare that there should be several electorates, but also, if they were so minded, to deprive the people of the states of their direct choice, by providing some other franchise. That of course is not the desire of my hon. friend, and I think that we might meet it by making the paragraph read as follows:—

The senators shall be directly chosen by the people of the state, and, until the parliament otherwise determines, as one electorate.

Mr. McMILLAN:

If my hon. friend will draft the necessary alteration I will accept it!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
I am sure that the desire of hon. members is that whilst giving to the federal parliament the right to deal with the question of electorates, we should at the same time retain as a fundamental principle of the constitution-unalterable except in the mode provided for the alteration of the constitution-the right of the senators to be elected by the direct choice of the people of the state. I know perfectly well that in connection with large electorates there are inconveniences. There is the difficulty of canvassing the whole electorate, and there is the increased expense. On the other hand there are great advantages which it seems to me we ought undoubtedly to retain. I am prepared to do what I can in this connection for the purpose of establishing a senate which shall be representative of the state. I do not see how it is possible to constitute a senate in which each member can rightly claim to represent the state from which he has come, unless he is returned by the voice of the state itself, not by any portion of it. Not only is it desirable that this right should be given to each member in order that he should be able to exercise his proper influence as a member of the senate; but at the same time if he speaks on behalf of the state, and not in the interest of any particular locality, there is less chance of clashing and of deadlocks, which we are all so desirous of avoiding. The hon. member, Mr. Lyne, has put it that in the large districts the interests of the populous centres and he referred to Melbourne and Sydney may be found to be predominant. It occurs to me that wherever these populous areas are the greater is their influence likely to be according to the limit which is imposed on the constituencies. Sydney or Melbourne is more likely to exercise a powerful sway within a limited area, it seems to me, than in districts constituted of an entire colony.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER: It gives country districts a better opportunity of being represented!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON: As the right hon. member says it gives country districts a better opportunity of being represented. It raises this intense probability that, instead of a member being there who is justified in claiming to speak on behalf of the state from which he comes, he can only speak on behalf of the particular electorate. I do not understand that a senate is intended to be called into existence for such purposes, and it would be a mischievous thing if it were. Under the guise of a body designed for the protection of state interests, consisting of representatives of the states, speaking on behalf of the states, we should have a number of men representing diverse local and parochial interests-a sort of thing which ought not to be encouraged.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
    On the other hand, they might be elected only by one or two leading cities!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
    Such men would he sacrificing the interests of the state to local interests!

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
    The contest then would not be for the preservation of the interests of the state on national questions; but the furtherance of local interests in opposition or in contradistinction to the wishes of the entire people.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
    Would that not also apply to the representative house as well?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:
    I think not. That house is intended to represent the various interests of the people irrespective of their state boundaries. The senate is brought into existence to represent the states as states, which no man can do unless he is sent there by the voice of the state.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL (Victoria)[12.4]:
    I trust that hon members will not vote for this proposal to constitute a state one huge electorate. It seems to me that so far from giving greater representation to the state it will confine the representation to very few men. Only well known men will be returned. It is idle to say that a man, if he had ever so much talent, but who is not known, would be able to get returned. Outside the district where he was known he would have no chance. His claims would be set aside. With what bad effect has the present system worked? We have a senate in our province returned by districts, and I have not heard the charge made against the members of that body of being intensely parochial. It has been rather the contrary. Members of our Council represent the province as a whole. They have an electoral body consisting of 185,000 electors. I can speak for my brother members when I say that matters are dealt with in the Legislative Council of Victoria from a national, not from a local, standpoint.

Mr. HIGGINS:
    So expensive are the elections to the Council. that only few men can become candidates!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
    The hon. member is altogether wrong; he cannot see anything good in connection with the Legislative Council of Victoria. If we had the inestimable advantage of that hon. member's presence for a month or two he might alter his opinion. The hon. member speaks entirely from
It seems to me that this question is one of great importance. Our House has taken a great liking to the system of voting by post. It does so on this ground: that where we have elections in districts principally populated by farmers and pastoralists great difficulty is experienced in getting the voters to come to the poll. A farmer will not leave his business to come in and record his vote. If we had a system of voting by post, it seems to me that in the majority of cases we might get a large number of voters to record their votes, and thus take part in the elections. With regard to the argument used by the hon. member, Mr. Leake, as to the members of this Convention being opposed to having roads and bridges members in the senate, I would point out that the states house would have nothing to do with votes for roads and bridges with money votes. That will be confined entirely to the house of representatives.

Mr. LEAKE:
I used that as a metaphor!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:

It has no value whatever. The initiation and discussion of these votes will rest entirely with the house of representatives. With regard to the size of the electorates, I would ask how would it be possible for the candidates to travel around any of the huge proposed electorates? Take the case of New South Wales. It would take two years of a man's life to go all round the province of New South Wales alone. As for the province of Western Australia a man's lifetime would not be sufficient for such a work. If a candidate is to obtain personal knowledge of the electorates we must make the electorates of much smaller area than is proposed. There is another question which, I think, hon. members, especially those from the country, should well consider. Take the two cases of Melbourne and Sydney. A large number of votes cast in Melbourne and Sydney would overwhelm the votes of the country districts, and it would be altogether impossible for a local candidate to obtain any recognition whatever if the votes of those large centres were cast in favour of other candidates. I therefore appeal to hon. members to remember that in dealing with this question they have to deal with all kinds and conditions of electorates. It is true that in some of the provinces, notably Tasmania, there are not these large centres of population but when it is borne in mind that Melbourne itself contains more than one-third of the whole voting power of Victoria, you will see how necessary it is to have some counterbalance so as to prevent Melbourne from outvoting the rest of the colony. The hon. member, Mr. Lyne, has pointed out that the same argument applies to Sydney. I am sure the best interests of the colonies will be consulted only by leaving this local question to be dealt with by local legislatures. It is purely a matter which concerns them. Without detracting from representations made by hon. members who will hereafter be members of the house of representatives, I would point out that the area and population represented by a member of the states house would, in the majority of cases, be five or six times as large as those represented by a member of the house of representatives. Therefore I fail to see where this parochialism comes in. It would be rather a question of too large an electorate, even with the subdivision of each colony into six electorates, and even then it would be very hard for a member to become personally acquainted with and to do justice to his constituents. I shall strongly support the subdivision of the colonies into several electorates.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria)[12.10]:

I entirely disagree with the hon. member, Sir William Zeal, that this is a local question. I consider it is one of the most important of the federal questions contained in this bill. I must also express my surprise at hearing such a large number of representatives of the smaller states supporting this proposal. I believe that if they carry the amendment suggested by the legislatures, and destroy this principle of state representation, they will to some extent injure the cause of equal state representation, for this reason: One of the strongest arguments in favour of equal state representation is that the state is to be represented in the states house as a state entity, and in its corporate capacity. If you destroy the proposed system of state representation through one state electorate you, to a very large extent, play into the hands of the opponents of the principle of equal state representation. I can understand my hon. friend, Mr. Lyne, strongly supporting this amendment, but I cannot understand the right hon. member, Sir John Forrest. There can be no doubt that the recommendations of the various provincial legislatures are entitled to very great weight indeed, and it is a remarkable circumstance that this is a suggested amendment, in which the whole of the legislatures unanimously concur.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

They do not concur in this!

Dr. QUICK:

They are not unanimous as to the substituted proposal, but they are unanimous in striking out the principle of a single electorate. I, therefore, utter a word of warning to my friends from the smaller states who want to retain equal state representation. They should regard this question very seriously indeed, in the manner suggested by the hon. member, Mr. McMillan. No doubt, as suggested by the Premier of New South Wales, we might make a concession in this case. We might yield to the state legislatures in their recommendation, but by so yielding I believe we should inflict a most serious blow on the principle of equal state representation. Certainly one of the strongest arguments in the late debate was that the senate is to represent states as states in their corporate capacity and corporate entity.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Until parliament otherwise provides!

Dr. Quick:

I admit that is a safeguard which may to some extent protect the principle, but if you amend this bill now by providing that the various colonies are to be represented in this states house, not as wholes but as sections, you play into the hands of those who desire to destroy this constitution by attacking the principle of equal state rights. For these reasons I hope the bill will be kept in its present position, or be in some way guarded as suggested by the Premier of New South Wales.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales):

I do not want to detain the Committee, but after having listened to the arguments, I still think we ought to retain the provision in the bill. I attach the greatest weight to the fact that the parliaments of five colonies have suggested alterations in this part of the bill, but I do not find that these parliaments concur, because two are in favour of division—those are the New South Wales and Victorian parliaments. The Legislative Assembly at any rate is in favour of division. The Legislative Council of New South Wales is not in favour of any alteration of this portion, but it is in favour of proportional representation in the senate, while it is not in favour of splitting the colony up into electorates. With reference to the argument that the parliaments concur, they only do so in the form of words. It is not in all cases an agreement, and we must remember that in two of those cases the division of the state into electorates has been suggested, while in the other three the choice of the whole matter has been left to the decision of the state parliament, so that it is impossible to say that the two legislatures first mentioned concur with the other three. It has been suggested that the desire of several colonies is represented in these suggestions, and, therefore, that we ought to follow them. These suggestions represent the desire of several houses of legislature; they do not necessarily represent the desire of several colonies. Hon. members who were elected here by popular choice were probably elected with some reference to the views which they held themselves, and I think that the majority of those who were elected hold the view which was implanted in this bill in our last session. They represent the people quite as effectually as any persons who were ever elected in any of the colonies could represent the people. More than that, they were chosen to deal with a particular subject, with reference to which the members of the various houses of legislature were not chosen. Without disparaging the standard of the hon. members of the various legislatures, and certainly with not the least desire to detract from the effect or weight of their suggestions, I say we were elected to perform a specific duty, and that duty remains with us. We may fairly be described at this stage as a court of review, taking into consideration all that has been urged or suggested by the various parliaments, as a matter of reason, and still exercising that choice which our reason dictates as being the best means to effect the desire of those who sent us here. I cannot concur in any argument that because several houses of legislature have concurred on this subject, therefore we are bound to accept what they suggest. That is not so. If we did so, we should simply forget the mandate which we received when we were sent here. Therefore, I put by the argument that we should go any further with regard to the suggestions, than give them every, weight to which their reasonableness may entitle them. I would urge hon. members not to depart from the bill, for the purpose of having something which may result in a piebald senate. I would rather see the matter left as each state parliament shall determine than see the state split up into several electorates. Still, there is this difficulty: If you leave the senate to be chosen as the parliament of each state may determine, you are likely to have a piebald senate, you are likely to have one method of election possibly in one state, and another method of election possibly in another state. That would lead to a kind of senate which, being diverse in its origin, diverse in its method of election, would not in the same way represent consistently the views of the states as the other house would consistently represent the views of the districts. That, I think, will be a calamity, and those who hold somewhat strongly the opinion that the senate should have, at any rate, some semblance of power with regard to money bills, I would ask to consider whether it is likely that any important power with regard to money bills can be conceded to a senate of which it is impossible to forecast the composition. On the other hand, if you know that there is some consistent way of electing the senate; if you know exactly how it is to be composed, you can then judge for yourself at this stage whether it is a body to which you would intrust any degree of money power or not? If you are going to have the colonies split up into half a dozen electorates, you first will have the inconveniences of that course of action which have been pointed out, and next you may say goodbye to any idea of having your senate characterised as a body which represents the states. There will not be a states house at all, and in proportion as there is not a states house, it will lose its claim to be a strong important factor in this constitution. For all these reasons, therefore, I suggest that the splitting up of the state into districts is not a good thing for the elector, because the general good of his state must be the best thing for the elector. It may be a good thing for the candidate in saving him a more extended canvass; but we are not here to cater for the predilections or wishes of candidates; we are here to see how we can arrange that which is best for the interests of the states in the federation. It is said that there will be great difficulty in regard to this question of canvassing. We had no great difficulty of that kind in the recent federal election. I had to make a few trips into the country, but at no great distance.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Because the hon. member was so well known!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I had to deliver a good many addresses in various forms very often the public requested one to deliver an address but I did not find that there was attached to this system of election all the expense which has been suggested, and I am fortified in what I say by the experience of nearly every one I know who has been elected. There were some who went to inordinate expense, but a great many of those who went to much expense were rejected. On the other hand, the hon. member, Mr. Trenwith, has stated in this Convention that his election by the entire population of Victoria cost him £3 3s. or thereabouts. My election cost me £100 less than any election for a separate constituency ever cost me, and I think the experience of other members was the same. Let us leave that aside, because we are here to decide not on the convenience of candidates but on the good which is to be conferred on the states in the federation. We, therefore, have to consider this matter really on the effect which the different methods of election will produce. I submit that if you leave the matter to the several states to determine you will have a piebald senate, the composition of which cannot be forecast, and as to which there will be a difficulty in saying what powers you will trust to it. If you split the colonies up into various electorates then you will have the result that your senate does not represent state entities as such.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[12.22]:
A great deal has been said on both sides of this subject, and no doubt there is a great deal to be advanced for and against each side. The people of a state can best be trusted to know what is best for their own requirements, and this matter I think we can very well leave to the determination of each state. Each state will find out what is best adapted for its requirements; each state will adopt that mode which it thinks is the very best for itself. I think the greater diversity we allow the greater our freedom from bondage will be. I shall vote to give the greatest possible liberty to the states to exercise their own discretion in this matter.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales)[12.23]:

I find that there is a difficulty in putting the amendment exactly as I moved it. I would now ask leave to withdraw the amendment, so that the paragraph may read in this form:

The senators shall be directly chosen by the people of the state, and until the parliament otherwise determines as one electorate.

That would prevent the amendment from referring to anything except the question of one electorate.

The CHAIRMAN:

I will lay aside the amendment for a moment, and put the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, which comes in first. Question-That the words "and until the parliament otherwise determines," be inserted after the word "state," line 5-proposed.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)[12.24]:

I hope the Committee will leave the clause as it is. Many strong reasons have been given why this matter should be left in the hands of the state.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Yet it is a state matter!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

What we want is to create a body the composition of which will be certain, which will be strong, which will be fit to be entrusted with the powers we are going to give to it, and inasmuch as we are fixing in the constitution the powers which are to be given to the senate, I think we ought equally to fix in a general way the constitution of the senate itself. The constitution of the house of representatives is fixed. The constitution of the house to which we will give powers which are to be used in origination should also be fixed. My strong reason for advocating this view to the House is this: In the different parliaments the tendency has been to suggest the cutting up of the representation of the senate into divisions, and the tendency will be always so in the parliaments, and none the less so in a federal parliament, for this reason: That the method in which the election in the senate is to be carried out will be very largely regulated by the views of the house of representatives. The views of the house of representatives are generally in favour of the representation of local interests, and as the representations of local interest would, it appears to me, not only be not desirable to be secured, but would aim a blow at the very constitution of the senate itself, I think we ought to be very careful, not only that we do not constitute the senate in that way now, but that we do not leave it in the power of parliament in the future to take any step which may derogate from the position of the senate, as we constitute it, and the senate which we are willing to invest with such large powers.

Mr. HIGGINS:
An alteration of that kind can be vetoed by the senate!

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR:
Of course an alteration of that sort can be vetoed by the senate; but is there any reason why a question of that sort should be left to be settled in that way? If it is an essential part of the constitution of the senate that it would consist of representation of the whole state only, would it not be a wise thing to leave that as a fixed part of the constitution, in the same way as we leave other parts of the constitution?

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is an experiment, and we ought to have a loophole!

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR:
The hon. member will see that it is not an experiment. Of course, if it is only an experiment if it is only a matter of convenience I quite assent that it would be as well to leave it to the senate, to develop opinion in the future in the commonwealth But I say it is not a matter of convenience; it is a matter of principle, that the whole of the state, as a state, should be represented, and that local interests should not be represented. I would point out, as an illustration, the danger of an alteration of the constitution of the senate There are many cases in which the expenditure of money will have to be dealt with by the parliament expenditure in cities expenditure in guard to postal and telegraphic arrangements, and expenditure in many other ways. There maybe very strong pressure brought to bear on the federal parliament to have money expended in a particular locality. No doubt we admit now that that is a strong reason why there should not be local representation in the senate; but that strong pressure which wishes to carry out its desires in regard to expenditure in a particular locality will very soon find that the obstacle standing in the way is the representation of the whole of the community in the senate; and, if that is to be over come by a local representation, the same forces will very easily initiate an agitation for the purpose of having an alteration made -that is to say, that the same forces which are always at work in order to endeavour to make the senate a body representative of local interest will be at work in the federal parliament itself, and will probably sooner or later bring about an amendment or an attempt at an amendment which will introduce the evils we are now struggling to avoid. I hope the clause will be left as it is, because it appears to me that it is a principle of the constitution of the senate with which we are dealing, and one which ought to be as firmly fixed in the constitution as any other portion of the constitution of the senate.

The Hon. J.H. Howe (South Australia):[12.30]:

I think this is one of the questions which we should take a little time to consider before we arrive at a conclusion. It is a remarkable fact, from which I, like the Premier of New South Wales, cannot get away, that no less than five colonies are unanimous in claiming this right. So far as I am individually concerned although I was once imbued with the same ideas as those I have heard expressed by numbers who profess to walk in the van of democracy I can view this movement now as a thoroughly tory one a conservative movement of the most rigid nature. I remember, in connection with the franchise of the little colony which I represent because in this Convention South Australian is always alluded to as a small colony the time when we returned to the upper chamber members elected by the whole colony as one constituency. It was the boast of most of the electioneering agents of those days that so long as they had the command of money they could always elect a man, no matter whom he might be, as a member of the upper house. As soon as we saw the evil of that system we altered it, and South Australia is now divided into four districts on the basis of population. I must certainly say that under that system the whole of the people and the whole of the interests of the colony are now represented in the upper house. I should not like to say that previous to that the representation was the representation of the whole of the people, or the whole of the interests of the colony. The arguments produced by various speakers seem to me to lead up to this: that we, as a convention, are afraid to trust the very states that have sent us here. I say that this is purely and essentially a state matter, and it does not follow if it is relegated to the states, that they will take a different view from that which we have taken. They may say that, in their own interests, it may be advisable to have only one electorate. I hold, however, that it is a state matter, and I am wholly in accord with Sir John Forrest when he says it will be far better to leave it to the states to say whether we shall have one or three electorates. I know the unwieldiness of large constituencies. I know it is impossible for a man, even if he has leisure, to travel over the length and breadth of one of these colonies to expound his views; and I know that, under any rigid system which you may endeavour to impose on a candidate, you must still allow him a certain amount of money wherewith to contest an electorate. Under the system of one colony one electorate, you will still place a certain power in the hands of men in possession of capital. If a division is called for, I shall be found voting for the amendments which have been passed by the legislatures of the various colonies interested.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[12.34]:

As the bill stands at present, it is provided that the senators shall be chosen by the people of the state as one electorate. That is rigid. There is no power in a state parliament to alter it; there is no power in the federal parliament to alter it. I think that rigidity should at all events be got rid of. Then we have to consider, as has been said more than once, that the five colonies, by their legislatures, have condemned the bill in this respect; and when we also reflect that these parliaments represent as I believe they do a very strong body of public opinion behind them, we must consider what would be the effect of such a provision upon the people when they come to vote. It seems to me that, with one exception, the amendment suggested by the Victorian Assembly pretty well meets the case. The exception to which I refer has occurred to me in consequence of what I think was a very admirable point made by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest today. The Victorian suggestion is that until the federal parliament otherwise provides the electoral divisions of the several states for the purpose of returning senators shall be determined from time to time by the parliaments of the several states. It goes on to say:

each division returning one member to the senate

I think that is wrong, for the reason given by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest. If it is desired, as I presume it is, that upon the election of half the senators every three years the whole of the people shall have the right to express their views, that desire will not be effected by having only half of the electors pronouncing upon the election of the senators to be returned. Speaking for myself, I should have no fear about making the whole colony one electorate; but I recognise that very strong arguments have been advanced by those who consider that under such an arrangement large centres of population might override less densely populated districts. Whether that contention is absolutely right in the end, the argument is a powerful one, and weight must be given to it. But if we provide that the colonies shall be divided into three divisions until it is otherwise provided by the parliaments of the states or by the federal parliament, we secure, in the first instance, at all events, that proper means will be adopted for the counterbalancing of the larger populations in the principal centres, and getting for country interests their due proportion of influence in the senate. For this reason I am strongly of opinion that the suggestion of the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest is one which reconciles a great many differences. If we adopt his suggestion, and provide that the parliament of a state may make provisions for these elections, but that paramount to that the federal parliament may make provision, we get away from the rigidity of the constitution which, if it is retained, no matter how faulty the constitution may be found in the future, will prevent us from altering it without an expensive and roundabout process of amendment Therefore I shall support the amendment as it stands with a view to adopting the suggestion of the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest. I do not think that the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, goes far enough. So far as I perceive he proposes that there shall be one electorate in each colony, unless the federal parliament determines otherwise. That gives the state parliaments no voice whatever in determining this matter even in the first, instance.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
That is the intention!

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[12.38]:
I think it would be inadvisable to strike out the words "one electorate."

The CHAIRMAN:
The amendment is to insert the words "and until parliament otherwise determines."

Mr. GLYNN:
I think the hon. member is willing to strike out the words "in one electorate." The Victorian amendment makes provision for the division of the states into six electorates, but in clause 29 we have provided that the first election shall be on the one electorate system.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
No, not necessarily!

Mr. GLYNN:
We must look at possibilities. The election is to take place within six months of the coming into force of the constitution, and one of the most difficult and contentious things that a parliament could have to deal with is the division of a country for the purposes of an election. We do not want to have the first six months prior to the election of this parliament taken up with a hot fight in regard to what provisions shall be made for electoral boundaries.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The parliaments will agree!

Mr. GLYNN:

I think there is an exceedingly small chance of that. The regulation of the electoral districts is one of the most contentious things that can come before Parliament. As an additional reason for agreeing to the amendment of the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, I would point out that although the Victorian legislature has provided what shall take place until the federal parliament makes some other arrangement, the legislatures of Tasmania, South Australia, Western Australia, and, I think, of New South Wales, propose to Strike out the words "in one electorate," but make no provision for the first election under the constitution. That leaves it to the states parliament to make provision. But I say you ought not to leave to the state parliaments the exceedingly difficult task of deciding what shall be the divisions of the electorates.

An Hon. MEMBER:

They will know that if they do not make provision they will not be represented!

Mr. GLYNN:

It may take ten or twelve months to decide contending claims in regard to boundaries of electorates. I am speaking of the experience of South Australia, and I think this matter is rather the result of an oversight than of deliberate intention.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON (Tasmania)[12.42]:

Whatever we may do with regard to the amendments carried by the various legislatures, amendments which are, no doubt, fully entitled to our best consideration, I hope we shall not accept that suggested by the hon. member, Mr. McMillan. As I understand it, if we accepted it we should transfer to the federal parliament the right to interfere in local and states elections. It would be very undesirable from the states point of view, because it would be a power which, I think, would very possibly give reason for such differences between the senate and the house of representatives as might have most deplorable results. We do not want to increase the number of causes of disagreement between the two houses, and the more we avoid difficulties of this sort the better. I hope that the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest will give full consideration to what has fallen from the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, as to the effect of his amendment in regard to weakening the states, and in providing the enemy of the smaller states with an argument for withholding power from them.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[12.44]:

The difficulty on this point seems to me to be as to whether we are to leave a loophole through the medium of the states parliaments or through the medium of the federal parliament. If we are to leave a loophole, there are three courses open to us. One, which is strongly advocated by the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, is that we should irrevocably fix it in the constitution that each state shall elect representatives as one electorate. I would like to point out, however, that if we are to leave any loophole at all, it should be in the direction of leaving it to the state parliaments to determine the mode under which the senators are to be elected. A great deal too much weight seems to have been given to the argument that each state as a whole should be represented. It is true that that is so, but that principle is not in any way infringed by the suggestions which have been made. The point is, how are you to ascertain what persons should represent the states as states? That appears to me not to be a matter for the federal parliament at all. Each state if it is to send these persons as ambassadors or representatives should settle for itself how it will choose them. Establish one electorate in the constitution in the first instance, and you will have the senators coming from the different states holding in the eyes of the people the position of representing each state as a corporate body. That position cannot be taken away. The choice will be by the people by direct popular vote; but in such divisions as shall be ascertained to be most convenient both for the candidates and for the people, and as the parliament of the state may determine. Now, the difficulty, it is true, is one which affects both candidates and people, but I should have thought myself that, upon the principle underlying all our representative government, the main question was, bow we can best give the people the means of determining upon their particular choice. Now, I can see great difficulty in the way of enabling all the people to determine upon their particular choice with the larger cities as one constituency. It was a difficulty which was felt at the time of our election to this Convention, and it is a difficulty which may be increased as the people spread more and more over these large extents of territory. If you are to give the people the choice of representatives for any particular purpose the great object is to accompany it by providing them with the best available means of forming an opinion and of selecting the best men. Now, what we are accustomed to under the British Constitution and all our constitutions are modelled upon that constitution is the bringing of the candidates face to face with the people to enable the people to form their opinion as to the candidate they ought to select with the best information which is available, and which is obtainable at first hand from the candidates who offer themselves. Now, it is impossible to accomplish that by having the states as one electorate. I have no particular objection to having the states as one electorate, except that I foresee a great difficulty in enabling the people in the remote parts of a large colony to form an opinion on the merits of individuals who otherwise would be dependent upon what might be their general reputation. There may be men who would make excellent senators who are comparatively unknown in the more outlying districts, and it appears to me that, on the whole, if you are to give effect to the principle that you are to provide a means by which the people may select the best men, you will accomplish that in the most effectual way by dividing your colonies into districts. I see this difficulty in the way of accomplishing it, that if you introduce that principle into the constitution, you will also have to provide in the constitution for electoral districts, or to leave them to the federal parliament. If you leave them, as suggested, to the local parliament, you might just as well leave the whole question to the federal parliament, which, as circumstances in the future may require, can determine whether or not the system of one electorate shall continue.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales):

I should like first to know what effect the amendment of which notice has been given will have upon our dealing with other portions of the clause?

The CHAIRMAN:

The amendment is to insert the words, "and until parliament otherwise determines." That will not prevent any other amendment being put.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria):

If those words stand, words will be added giving the states powers subject to the paramount authority of the federal parliament.

The CHAIRMAN:

It will be competent to insert any words which are not inconsistent with the clause.
Mr. LYNE:

I understand that if this amendment be carried any words can be inserted, leaving the matter to the state parliaments?

The CHAIRMAN:

If the amendment be not carried I shall put the amendment, striking out the words "in one electorate."

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales) [12.51]:

I wish in a few words to direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that it is all very well to talk of one electorate as being conducive to giving power to the people as an entity of the state; but I would ask the hon. member, Sir John Downer, whether in his own colony of South Australia it has not been found that the whole colony as one electorate for members of the Legislative Council was a mistake whether the system was not found to work badly, and whether it is not a fact that the parliament altered that provision in the constitution, and that at the present time South Australia is cut up, if not into single electorates, certainly into a number of electorates for the return of members to the Legislative Council?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Quite so; but the cases are not analogous!

Mr. LYNE:

I should like to know why they are not analogous? In the one case you have the Legislative Council, and in this case you have the senate. In the case of the Legislative Council of South Australia you had the whole colony as one electorate, and it was found that under that condition of things certain well-known gentlemen obtained seats in the Legislative Council, and that it was utterly impossible to oust them from those positions to make way for more able, younger, and rising men who were not so well known to the whole colony.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I do not think there was any special grievance!

Mr. LYNE:

I happen to know that a large number of those who held seats in the South Australian Legislative Council held those seats for many years, and we have been told repeatedly that it was be, cause the younger men were not so well known to the entire colony that they experienced a difficulty in getting votes.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I think it was a question of the expense to members rather than of the convenience of electors!

Mr. LYNE:
We have the statement of the leader of the Convention that when the colony is one electorate there is not so much expense incidental to a candidature as when the colony is divided into districts.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
That is my recent experience!

Mr. LYNE:
Because the hon. gentleman was in the fortunate position of being well known. I will put to the Convention the case of several of the candidates in this colony. I do not wish to make any invidious distinctions, but I will take the cases of Mr. Bruce Smith, and of Mr. Ashton. I will refer especially to the case of Mr. Ashton. I undertake to say that had it not been for the fact of a number of the candidates being better known he would have been returned to this Convention, and would have done good work here.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
He travelled a good bit more than did most of the candidates!

Mr. LYNE:
But he had the misfortune of not being so well known as is the hon. gentleman and others who were elected.

Mr. WALKER:
He did not believe in equal representation!

Mr. LYNE:
I announced my opposition to equal representation whenever I had the opportunity to do so, and I was fortunate enough to be returned. But I was calling attention to what had taken place in South Australia, and I wish before resuming my seat to put another phase of the question before hon. members, and it is this: Take, for example, the colony of New South Wales at the present time, where there is a strong feeling upon one particular question the fiscal question. Suppose there happened to be in this colony 10,000 electors in a centre of population either on the side of protection or of free-trade. Under the provisions of this bill, with the whole colony as one electorate, there might not be one protectionist returned, or, on the other hand, one free. trader. Now, is it desired that the senate should be composed of those who do not represent the minority at all?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Does the hon. member think that only six candidates would go up?

Mr. LYNE:
I think that perhaps sixty would go up. But when there is a "ticket" a free-trade ticket, a protection ticket, or any other ticket the result is that you get six men returned on the one "ticket," representing the one view, and the minority are disfranchised altogether.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The hon. gentleman said he did not think it would be that way the other day!

Mr. LYNE:

The question I refer to was not before the electors, and the hon. and learned gentleman altogether misstates the result of the election which took place the other day. It cannot be compared with the future elections for the senate. The election the other day took place on the selection of gentlemen to frame a constitution to be afterwards referred to the electors. The electors did not take a strong view on any party question in returning those gentlemen. I think I am correct in saying that you would not find such a state of things to prevail in the election of members to the senate. You would find a state of things absolutely different. We will suppose, for the sake of argument, that in the federal parliament the fiscal question a uniform customs tariff is the first matter to be dealt with; and that the leader of the Government in New South Wales and myself go up for election to the Senate. Will there not be a "ticket " attached to my right hon. friend, the Premier, and will there not be a "ticket " attached to myself; and if there happen to be a few more free-traders than protectionists in the colony, I shall be rejected as well as all the others on the same ticket. Or if it should turn out that we have a small majority my right hon. friend and his "ticket" will be rejected and only protectionists elected. That is the position you will be in if you allow each state to remain as one constituency. Without wishing to detain hon. members, I desire to say that I am opposed to leaving the question indefinite, and I think the amendment of my hon. friend, Mr. McMillan, would leave it indefinite. I should like to see it fixed in the bill that there should be one representative of each division in each state, and I should like to leave it to the federal parliament to frame the necessary machinery to divide the various electorates; or, if we do not do that, we should leave it to the state parliaments to do it. But, it being a federal matter hereafter, I think it would be preferable to leave it to the state parliaments to devise the machinery on the basis of one representative for each electorate in each state. I shall therefore vote against the proposal of the hon. member; but I hope that afterwards some hon. member will submit a proposal which will meet more nearly the views I hold.

[The Chairman left the chair at 1 o'clock. The Committee resumed at 2 o'clock.]

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[2]:
You, Sir Richard Baker, said, before the adjournment, and very properly, that, if these words were added, it would be competent for an hon. member to move any other amendment; but I should like to point out that the addition of these words will take away much of the meaning of the amendments proposed by the parliaments of New South Wales, Western Australia, and South Australia. The intention of those amendments is that this matter of the election of the senate by one district, or by several districts, should be left to the state parliaments; but the addition of these words will frustrate that intention, and will give the state parliaments a very limited amount of liberty in this respect. Therefore, those who wish to give effect to the amendments I have named, will be only able to effect their object by voting, in the first instance, against the addition of these words, and then in favour of inserting their amendments; for, if these words be added as proposed, the states will have but a brief autonomy.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[2.1]:

I think that, according to grammatical construction, the meaning of the amendment proposed by the hon. member, Mr. McMillan, will be that the senators will be chosen as one electorate not that the people, as one electorate, will choose the senate. Grammatically, it is incorrect; therefore I would suggest to the hon. member that the words should be put in after the word "as" in the second line of the sub-clause. Then it will read as follows:

The senators shall be directly chosen by the states as, until parliament otherwise determines, one electorate.

The CHAIRMAN:

The word "and" is in.

Mr. GLYNN:

It can be struck out. If you put the words in as suggested by the hon. member, Mr. McMillan "and until parliament otherwise determines" after the word "states" you can test the grammatical construction of the clause by trying it disjunctively. For instance, joining the end of the clause with the first part of it, "The senate shall be directly chosen by the people of the states, and the senators shall be chosen as one electorate." That is what the effect of the grammatical construction would be.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

It is a matter for the Drafting Committee!

Mr. GLYNN:

Where is the necessity for sending this matter to the Drafting Committee? It can be decided at once. I believe that where clearly a grammatical error is being made in putting an amendment in a particular way, the better plan is to correct it at once, and there can be no doubt that the sense of the amendment would be achieved by putting the words "until parliament otherwise determines" after the word "as."

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Will the hon. member make himself responsible for the grammar?

Mr. GLYNN:
I will, if the hon. member will adopt my suggestion.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[2.4]:
This is a matter of drafting which I think we might very well leave to the Drafting Committee. There may be something in the suggestion of my hon. colleague.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[2.5]:
I hope that the Committee will decide to keep the clause as it stands in the bill. It is interesting I think, to see how the clause found its way as it is. In the first place, we were led very much by the American precedent, which leaves no doubt about the representation of the state entity. The election of the representatives of each state by the governing body of that state ensured the representation of the state entity as such; and when the bill of 1891 was framed the same idea was taken up the state entity was to be represented in the senate through the election of senators by the parliament of each state, so that then, as in the case of America, each senator would be able to say that be represented such and such a state as a whole. Now we in Adelaide followed the same path by providing that still the state entity shall be recognised by the election, by the electors of each state in one electorate, of the senators of that state. What is now proposed is an entire reversal of the course we have hitherto followed an entire change of policy and practice and I earnestly hope that we shall adhere to the course we have hitherto followed, and shall determine that the senators for each state shall represent, not only a portion of the state, but the whole of it. Reference has been made to some past experience in South Australia, and I desire to point out that what is now proposed in this bill is much more nearly like the present practice in South Australia than it is like the old now disused practice in South Australia. What is proposed here is that each state shall be a district, and that each district shall, in one electorate, return its own representative to the senate. The present plan in South Australia is that the colony is divided into four districts, each of which returns an equal number of members to the Legislative Council. The old plan that the whole colony should be one electoral district, and should return members as one electoral district would only be paralleled by our providing now that the whole of the states shall be put together and form one electorate. Such a proposal would not be made, or would obtain no support if made. We are not proposing to follow that old plan which broke down in South Australia, but are proposing to follow the present system of election in South Australia which now works with very excellent results. I urge that we not forget the purpose for which the senate is to be called into existence. If it is to be simply a body representing the people in the various electorates, without reference to the states at all, we do not want it. I would be quite prepared to give a vote with those who contend that one house is quite enough, unless we are going to set up a senate representative of states as states, and it seems to me that, the only way we can secure the representation of states as such is to make each state one whole electorate.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria)[2.8]:

This question, like most of the others we have discussed, is one which, it seems to me, we must approach from two points of view. We must consider, first, what is absolutely best in our judgment to make, supposing it can be adopted; we must consider, secondly, what is most likely to be accepted by the people, and if ultimately what in our judgment is the best provision is less likely to be accepted, and another provision, which, while not being the best, is not very objectionable, will probably be accepted, it seems to me that we are bound to adopt that which will probably be accepted. On this question I am in the awkward position of considering to be the better proposal that which I think is less likely to be accepted by the people. My view is now, and has been all along that the best way to elect a senate in order to secure a house worthy to be a house of revision would be to select it by the states as one constituency. But the discussion upon the question in my own colony and in New South Wales appears to have indicated that the people prefer the election of the senate by districts. Now, whilst I consider that that is the least effective and the worse of the two proposals, I do not consider it is so objectionable as to justify me in insisting upon a condition which I believe to be unpopular, though in my judgment the better; and having these two aspects in view, it seems to me now that it would be better to adopt the proposal to elect the Senate by six separate districts.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Three!

Mr. TRENWITH:

Six or three—at any rate by separate districts. A point has been presented by the right hon. member, Sir John Forrest a point which seems to me to have great weight. That is, that as the senate is to be elected half at a time after the first election, if we have six single electorates we shall never be able to appeal in a senatorial election to more than half the electors. Therefore, it seems desirable, in view of the desire of the people, to have districts, that there should be three double seat electorates rather than six single seat electorates.

An Hon. MEMBER:

They will be single seats after the first election!

Mr. TRENWITH:

Yes; but they will be over the whole colony instead of over half the colony, which, as an indication of public feeling, is altogether inadequate I am afraid. But at any rate the indication of public feeling will be better in districts than by appealing to one-half, or three out of six electorates. I should not have spoken on the question were it not for my altered opinion upon the point. At the election for seats in the Convention, at the late sitting of the Convention, and in our own Parliament in Victoria, I urged the adoption of the principle of election by the whole State as one constituency. I still think that that is the better course to pursue, but I have evidence enough to induce me, to doubt very seriously whether a large section of the Victorian people are in favour of that course. It has been urged vigorously and with considerable reason on its side, although not sufficient to my mind, that if we have one electorate for the election of senators the towns the large centres of population will dominate the country districts, where facilities for recording the votes are not so great. I do not agree with that myself; but I believe that a very large number of electors are afraid of that possibility, and if we go to those electors to ask them to adopt a bill with a principle in it of which they are afraid, we are giving them a strong incentive to vote against the bill. I am so anxious for federation; I believe federation to be so desirable, that, personally, I am willing to waive a conviction of my own upon a point which does not seem to be essential. There are some points in connection with this question so important, that I would say, "Better no federation than federation under such conditions." There are some other questions of a comparatively minor character. This, in my opinion, is one of them, and whilst I consider the adoption of districts for the election of the senate will be less useful ultimately than the election of the senators by one electorate, as I believe it to be more likely of acceptance I have resolved to vote for it.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Does the hon. member think that the question of one electorate will cause the rejection of the bill?

Mr. TRENWITH:
I think that, whenever we present the bill, there will be a great many points in it that will be more or less objectionable to some persons; and the more objectionable points there are in it, the less prospect will there be of its being adopted; and, if we put in it one provision that we feel is objectionable to a large number of persons

An Hon. MEMBER:
Why assume that?

Mr. TRENWITH:
Well, I am afraid of it.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
The hon. member should not be afraid of too many things!

Mr. TRENWITH:
I quite agree with my hon. friend. It is not my character-istic to be afraid; but I am afraid in the interests of the cause, of things that personally I should care nothing at all about. In our House of Assembly, at any rate, those who profess to represent the country districts and in our colony, as indeed, I suppose, in all the colonies, the majority of the people live in what are called country districts in the Victorian Parliament the persons who profess to represent the country districts declare that they themselves and the people whom they represent fear the domination of their interests by the interests of those in the cities. I do not think there is any justification for that; but, if it exists, we have to consider whether the prospect of jeopardising the bill for this principle is warranted by the importance of the principle. Personally, I do not think it is. I do not think that the election of the senate by districts will make it so much inferior, or will be so much less beneficial than electing it by one constituency as to justify us in putting in the bill a provision that may startle, that may frighten, a large number of electors from voting for the bill. I felt it due to myself and due to the attitude that I propose to take, that I should say these few words. I may say that if, in every other respect, the bill commends itself to my judgment, I shall feel it my duty to endeavour to induce the people to adopt the bill, whichever of these two provisions is adopted. I shall feel that the better thing is done in the interests of securing a good constitution if the bill is carried in its present form; but I shall think that the better thing is done, having in view the ready passage of the bill by the popular vote if the course which I suggest is adopted.

Question That the words "and until the parliament otherwise determines" be inserted put. The Committee divided:

Question that the words "as one electorate" stand part of the clause proposed.

Mr. LYNE:
How will the clause read now that the amendment has been made?

The CHAIRMAN:
It will read as follows:"The senators shall be directly chosen by the people of the state and until the parliament otherwise determines, as one electorate."

Mr. LYNE:
Is that the parliament of the federation? The CHAIRMAN: Yes, the federal parliament!

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[2.26]:

617
I certainly voted as I did under the impression that the final decision was to be left to the states and not to the federal parliament. I am afraid that others voted in the same way. I certainly understood that it was to leave the elections to the states. I understand the amendment now is to strike out the words "as one electorate," and that after that is dealt with other amendments can be moved.

Paragraph 2, as amended, agreed to.
Clause 9, paragraph 3. The senators shall be chosen for a term of six years, and the names of the senators chosen by each state shall be certified by the governor to the governor-general.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria:
Omit all the words after the words "six years."

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[2.32]:

The Legislative assembly of Victoria suggests the omission of the words: And the names of the senators chosen by each state shall be certified by the governor to the governor-general.

That must be read in conjunction with clause 12, which the Legislative Assembly of Victoria also suggests should be struck out, and which reads as follows:-

For the purpose of holding elections of members to represent any state in the senate the governor of the senate may cause writs to be issued by such persons, in such form and addressed to such returning officers as he thinks fit.

The object undoubtedly is, as far as I can discover, to keep the election of the senate entirely in the hands of the states, and to leave the election of the house of representatives entirely in the hands of the officials of the federal parliament. That means that there will be two separate sets of elections, two separate sets of returning officers, with a double expense to the federation; the times may be different, the places of election may be different, all the arrangements made be different; and no doubt they will, if left in the hands of different persons. Why the federation should be saddled for the mere sake of an idea, with all this terrible double expenditure, is more than we can understand. It seems to me that, for the mere sake of an idea, it would be a terrible argument against federation that this double expense should occur every time there is to be an election.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The same expense must be incurred one way or the other!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No; if the governor-general issues the writs for the election of the house of representatives and the writs for the election of the senate, it is a mere matter of adding a few names to the voting papers.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The argument is that that would be so if the election of the house of representatives and of the Senate were held at the same time!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Yes; unless a dissolution throws the thing out of gear; I am drawing attention to what will happen, in the first instance, if this suggestion is not carried out. The governor-general will issue the writs for the election of the house of representatives, and appoint his own returning officers, who will make all arrangements for the polling all through the country. The central government will fix the times and hold their elections if there is no such thing as a senate to be elected. The governor of each state will issue his writs, appoint his own returning officers, and fix his own polling booths, times, and places, so that there will be two sets of elections going on with a double expense. It seems to me it is an unfair expenditure to impose on the states. They have to hold all the elections.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It will not saddle the federation with any expense!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It will saddle the people of the federation with a double expense; for they will have to pay one way or the other. It seems to me, unless hon. members are wedded very strongly to the idea that there is some virtue in the governor certifying to the governor-general that the senate is elected, we ought not to lose the substance for the sake of the shadow. Therefore, I support the suggestion made by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[2.38]:

I do not by any means wish to have a long debate on minor points. I am not quite satisfied by the explanation of my hon. and learned friend that there is going to be any great inconvenience or expense caused by this provision. If the elections for the senate and for the house of representatives are held at the same time, as they will be on the very first occasion, but, if the bill stands as it is, very likely will not be at any other time, what will be the result? The expense will have to be incurred except in the first instance, in which case there might be some saving. The expense in all the remaining cases will have to be incurred, because the elections will be held at different times.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The members of the senate are to hold their office for six years, and one-half of the senators will go out every three years, if the bill stands as it is. Every member of the senate will hold office for six years, although half of them may go out every three years. There is to be an election every three years, but the members of the senate are to hold their office up to the time specified to the day. Now we know well, as a matter of common occurrence, that, where there has been nothing to cause a dissolution of the lower chamber, before the effluxion of time, the case is extremely rare, nevertheless, in which the members hold their seats until that time has actually arrived. In this colony the practice is to dissolve one, two, or three months before the time expires. Even in that case it would be probable that there would be a coincidence in point of time. Whilst the senate is not dissoluble, except by three, yearly periods, and the house of representatives is dissoluble, we know that in the majority of cases the house of representatives meets with some question which causes its dissolution irrespective of the question of effluxion of time. Therefore, instead of there being coincidence between these times, the immense probability is that, unless some curious accident happens, these elections will be at different times. If they be at different times, whether the federation conducts both or one, and the state conducts the other, the total expense will be the same, and it will have to be incurred. Therefore, I do not think we shall gain anything. Of course something further may be pointed out to cause one to alter that opinion. The clause stands in this position: that it is more in accordance with the separation of functions between the two houses, and the admission that the one is a proportional representative chamber, disregarding state limits, while the other regards state limits, that separate authorities should take charge of the elections. I admit there is not much in the point one way or the other. I do not see any reason for change. If I could see that any expense would be saved I might waver in my opinion.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)[2.42]:

I am inclined to think the balance of convenience is in favour of giving the federal authority complete control in connection with the matter. It seems to me highly objectionable that in any matter affecting federal affairs the carrying out of the necessary provisions for securing the representation of the states should be left to the local executive, which might be altogether hostile to federation. I am inclined to think and I put it for the consideration of Mr. Barton that we ought to make federal authority, within the scope of federal jurisdiction, certainly to the extent of constituting the federal parliament, supreme in itself, and not in any degree dependent upon the will of the local executive, which, if given any right of interference, might exercise a powerful influence for ill on federal affairs.

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS (Tasmania)[2.44]:

It appears to me that the words proposed to be omitted would properly find a place in an electoral act rather than in a constitution act. When the federal parliament is constituted, and frames its provisions for carrying out the elections for the senate, and also for the house of representatives, no doubt some provision for the certifying of the names of the senate will be made. It seems to me undesirable to hamper the constitution with minor provisions for certifying the names of the senators. That had better be left to another measure. The elections, I take it, will be carried out under the authority of the federal parliament and the federal executive.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

The first election, cannot be. There will be no federal parliament then!

The Hon. N.E. Lewis:

There will be a federal executive to carry it out, and someone to issue the writs and make provisions. We have provided later on that until Parliament otherwise provides the laws in the several states for the time being relating to certain matters shall be applicable to the first election. I am inclined to support the suggestion made by the Victorian legislature.

Mr. Wise (New South Wales)[2.46]:

I shall support the amendment, because I hope that, after federation, the office of state governor will become unnecessary. Therefore, I shall vote against the insertion of any words in the constitution which by implication assume the continuance of that office.

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer (South Australia)[2.47]:

I hope the amendment will not be made. In a number of incidental amendments there is frequently a big principle involved, and there is one in this. Whom do the senators represent? They represent the states. Who is to certify that they are elected? The states.

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:

There will be a returning officer; why should he not certify?

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer:

Who should more properly certify as to the persons elected than the governor of a state. It is preserving the essence of the state unity to keep the provision as it is at present. With regard to the question of expense, with our internal parliaments, would we ever agree to make a law compelling the elections of the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly to be coincident in time? If we did, it would bring about most serious inconvenience to one or the other, and the result would be that one body would be insufficiently representative whilst the other would be fully representative. I think the argument of Mr. Barton is unanswerable. To make the amendment which my hon. friend proposes with a view of saving expense might produce an inconvenience which will be greater than the expense.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:

I cannot see any inconvenience!

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer:

First of all, my hon. friend only proposes to strike out a reference to the certifying of the election of the senate. What is the object? Whom does my hon friend want to certify who are the senators? Surely if the senators Fire to represent the state, the head of the state is the proper person to say who has been elected.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

As long as the people elect, and the right men are elected, what matter who certifies?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

If there is nothing in it, why waste time?

An Hon. MEMBER:

It does not matter who issues the writ!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

It does not. Some certificates must be handed in to certify that the members of the senate are properly elected, and who should do that but the governor?

An Hon. MEMBER:

Would not the returning officer do?

Mr. HIGGINS:

The returning-officer to the governor-general!

An Hon. MEMBER:

Why not leave it to the governor?

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

Why waste time?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Yes, I would ask, why waste time?

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales)[2.49]:

I want to know whether this is to come in again? If we destroy clause 12, does the hon. member intend to insert anything in clause 41, or to propose a new clause?

An Hon. MEMBER:

Follow the same practice!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The principle then is that underlying this proposal the parliament or the state as a state should have nothing to do with the modus operandi of the elections.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

They should have all the power in substance, but the mere machinery should be in the hands of the federal authorities!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

That is what I wanted to understand!

Amendment negatived; paragraph 3 agreed to.

Clause 9, paragraph 4: The parliament shall have power, from time to time, to increase or diminish the number of senators for each state, but so that the equal representation of the several states shall be maintained and that no state shall have less than six senators.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria:

That after the word "but" the following words be inserted: "except in the case of new states which after the establishment of the commonwealth are admitted thereto or established thereby upon other terms and conditions.

Question-That the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted proposed.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I might mention that an amendment which I suggested a day or two ago provides for this case. The definition of the word "original," which I propose to insert in an earlier clause will provide for it in a shorter form. If the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, will be satisfied with that amendment I will propose it at a later stage.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Whether now or hereafter I shall oppose any alteration affecting the principle of the equal representation of states in the senate.

The CHAIRMAN:

There will be some difficulty about following the course suggested by the leader of the Convention, inasmuch as it has been decided that amendments suggested by the various legislatures shall be put to the Convention, and of course if an amendment is negatived the principle with which it deals cannot be afterwards affirmed except upon the recommittal of the bill.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

What I have suggested is, that after we have gone through the bill in Committee, a day or two should be allowed to the Drafting Committee to make amendments which are purely drafting amendments, to more clearly express the intention of the Committee, and that the bill should be recommitted for the formal consideration of these amendments. I have not the smallest objection to the amendment now before us being carried, so long as it is understood that this is a mere matter of agreement.
The CHAIRMAN:
Perhaps it would be the best way to discuss the principle underlying the amendment now.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[2.54]:
I will state in half a dozen words why I oppose the amendment. To put a concrete case, if Queensland does not come into the federation at once it will be left open to the federal parliament to make it a condition of Queensland coming in that she shall not have equal representation in the senate. Therefore, in agreeing to the amendment, we are cutting at what I conceive to be an essential principle of federation, namely, the equal representation of the states. If I spoke for a week, I could not put my views upon this subject more clearly, and I think I have stated the proposition in terms which convey my objection to it.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia)[2.55]:
Clause 114, as it was passed in Adelaide, allows a principle to creep in which upsets views that I hold upon this subject, namely, that in every case the states should have equal representation in the senate. I think that the best way would be to negative the amendment, and to modify clause 114 afterwards. We should leave it to the commonwealth to say whether or not it would admit a state, whether or not a state is of sufficient importance to be admitted; but, once a state is admitted, it should have its proper representation in the senate.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[2.56]:
I hope the Convention will agree to the amendment. The substance of the amendment was inserted in the bill in Adelaide on the motion of the Right Hon, Sir George Turner, and I would point out to the representatives of South Australia that so far from its being an obstacle to federation it is actually an advantage. If we do not have such a provision in the bill, what will be the result? The result will be that when any state or colony desires to enter the commonwealth, not having done so on its establishment, it will either have to accept equal representation, or not come into the commonwealth. It might be perfectly willing to come in on lesser terms, and the commonwealth might be willing to admit it on lesser terms; but it might be thought altogether unfair that a state which had chosen to remain outside the commonwealth until the whole problem had been solved by the federation should necessarily come in on equal terms. I would point out again to these hon. gentlemen that there is nothing to prevent the commonwealth from conceding equal representation to the states. If Queensland, or any subdivision of Queensland, desired to come into the commonwealth at some future date, it might urge its claim to equal representation, and the commonwealth might say, "Rather than keep you out, we will give you equal representation." The power to do that is retained, even if we allow the amendment. The amendment does what hon. members opposite have so often urged us to do. It trusts the federal parliament and allows it to make the bargain as close as it and the state entering the federation choose to make it.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Ought not the bargain to apply to financial terms, and not to constitutional terms?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
It ought to apply to any terms. A month, or six months, or a year after the establishment, Queensland might say, "We are perfectly willing to come in. It is true that, by reason of circumstances not wholly under the control of our people, nor of our Parliament, we did not come in at the beginning; but we are desirous of having equal representation." If they were then told: "You have not contributed to the financial calls of the commonwealth," they might reply, "We are willing to give you compensation for that."

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
But not by taking away the constitutional privileges which the original states have?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Nothing would be taken away from the federated states. Every privilege equal representation in the senate, full proportional representation in the house of representatives will be conserved to the original states.

Mr. GLYNN:
The hon. member would not sell a vital principle for cash? That is what it amounts to!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Suppose that Queensland sees that there is a risk hereafter of not getting all she would get if she came in now, will not that be an incentive to her to put forward her best efforts to join us? I think, Sir, that so far from being a drag on federation, it will be one of the most important elements in securing, at the earliest possible moment, a complete federation of Australia. And when we consider the risk that the colonies who first form the federation will run, and are willing to run, in order to create Australian unity, we ought not to put an inducement in the hands of fearsome colonies to stand aloof until the problem has been solved, until risk has been converted into certainty, until they can come in and have all the advantages without having had any of the disadvantages. I do earnestly hope that the proposal of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, which was carried without, I think, any dissent at all in Adelaide, will be adhered to, and that my hon. friends who have just spoken will not just to concede that, why should it not be trusted to do that which it considers just?

Mr. GLYNN:

Why reopen the principle upon the admission of a new state?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

There is such a thing as driving a principle to death, and I think my hon. friends are casting away a great deal of substance for a very insubstantial shadow if they do not adhere to this amendment, which is merely putting into drafting form the principle affirmed in the 114th clause that we should give that which is proper, that which is calculated to make this bill much more acceptable to the colonies who desire to join the federation in the first instance, and, as I said before, and now take leave to repeat, that which would be of great assistance in furthering Australian unity in a complete form.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[3.3]:

I am surprised to find the leader of the Convention if we may judge his meaning from his cheers actually supporting a provision which cuts at the root of the principle which, time after time, both in the Convention of 1891 and in this Convention, he has advocated with so much impressiveness and strength. If the hon. gentleman has impressed this Convention and the colonies generally with the necessity of any one of the principles contained in this bill it has been the necessity for the principle of equal representation in the senate.

An. Hon. MEMBER: Among existing states!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Among all states. The hon. gentleman has never, and I think I have heard all the speeches which he has delivered on the subject, qualified his adhesion to this principle at all. It is an integral principle in the advocacy of which we have so often admired and followed the hon. gentleman. I am surprised, if the hon. gentleman's meaning is to be gathered from his cheers, that he should now depart from the principle; but I am more surprised, if possible, to find such an eminent legal authority as the hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, actually commending this proposition to the Convention on what ground? upon the ground that we are—if I might put it in mining parlance—first robbers, that any state coming in and not being on the bed-rock—to revert once more to mining parlance—must adopt our terms. In other words, that we are to punish a state such as Queensland, which, owing to a combination of circumstances, over which possibly her people may have had no control—

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
We may give them all we take ourselves!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
We may; but I maintain that we should leave the door open to any state to come in on an equality with ourselves after the federation has been initiated.

Mr. SOLOMON:
Within some reasonable time!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
It is open to the federal parliament to receive them; and if it receives them, it should receive them as full brothers, with all the privileges and rights of brothers.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
We want to admit them at the beginning!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
It would be a travesty to call what the hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, puts forward a principle. It is no principle. He puts forward the argument that because at the commencement of this contract, Queensland, owing to circumstances over which her people may have had no control, is not able to be represented here, she shall be at a disadvantage compared with those colonies who happen to be lucky enough to first come into the contract, who really are the first robbers.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
That is too thin!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
That is the proposition I am endeavouring to put before the Convention.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
That would be all very well for a syndicate; but it has nothing to do with this Convention!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
If we receive the states, we should receive them as brethren, with all the rights of brethren. It is argued that the colonies which do not come in at the outset may take all the advantage whereas we take the risk, and that, therefore, if they choose to hang back, we should exact from them terms favourable to ourselves and not favourable to them.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
That does not follow at all!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
It is the basic argument, and the words in which it has been put before us have been these: "We are taking the risk and trouble. If the other states like to hang back, why should we allow them to come in upon the same terms with ourselves?"

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Why should they force us to allow them to come in?

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

They cannot do so. The hon. and learned member does himself an injustice when he imagines that any state can force the federal authority to allow it to come in. Does he seriously mean this convention to accept the proposition that any state which is riot represented in this Convention can force the federation to take it in? Does the hon. and learned member say that?

An Hon. MEMBER:

He does not mean it!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I say that the federal authority must be prepared to admit them on these terms, or leave them out altogether!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

On the terms of a full and free partnership, on the conditions we ourselves insist upon, on the terms for which we contend. The hon. and learned member says that because the other colonies are not represented here now, because we take some risk which they do not take, we should penalise them, and exact of them certain terms because we were the original federators. The hon. and learned member does not say definitely that we should do so, but he says that we should put ourselves in the position of being able to do so. Nothing is further from my intentions than to do any injustice to the hon. and learned member's arguments, but, as far as I can gather, he wishes to put us in the position of penalising any new state which may come in after the federation, and I say that that is a principle which might animate a private syndicate or a number of co-partners seeking some personal gain, endeavouring to line their own pockets, but which certainly should not animate this Convention if it desires to bring about a federation. I am astonished that the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, of all men, should be the man to lead us from those paths of principle into which he has so eloquently and so frequently guided us.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR (New South Wales)[3.8]:

I do not know whether or not to take the hon. member who has just resumed his seat seriously; but if he is to be taken seriously he utterly misapprehends the nature of the amendment. Nothing new is done by it. It merely carries out a principle already agreed to after full discussion in clause 114. It is simply an amendment for the purpose of carrying out more fully the meaning of that clause. I do not say for one moment that that is an answer to any argument which the hon. member may put forward. But, as a matter of fact, the clause merely carries out a decision already arrived at. The hon. member is quite mistaken in supposing that this amendment or that clause 114 as it stands will in any way necessitate Queensland being put in a position of unequal representation.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

But it may!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

It gives to the commonwealth the power to arrange the terms upon which Queensland or any other colony may come in. I am sure the hon. gentleman will not say that we are to leave practical questions out of consideration altogether, that we are not to look at the question from a practical point of view. The colony of Queensland is the only colony to which this amendment can apply. And it is in this position: An agitation has been going on there, as we all know, for a division of the colony into three colonies. If that agitation for separation ever had any point or meaning, surely it would be achieved if the success of the agitation were to secure three times the representation in the federation to which Queensland would otherwise be entitled. The only practical side of this question the only case to which it can apply is the case of Queensland; and if we allowed this basis of equal representation to remain as a right to any colony that came in, it would be a premium to Queensland to divide herself before entering the federation. You may ride a principle too far, and it would be carrying this principle of equal representation to the point of fatuity if the commonwealth were to place itself in such a position as to be at the mercy of any colony that chose to stand outside for any reason-I do not care what- and then when the commonwealth was formed to come in and take advantage of it, The hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, has pointed out that a colony might stand by and watch the struggles and the failures, and when success has been achieved, come in and take advantage of it.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

Why, not?

If the terms to be allowed are only to be terms of money compensation, I say that it does not meet the case in any way. You have to regard the matter from a practical point of view. From a practical point of view, it would be nothing less than folly to leave this matter in such a position that Queensland or any other colony, as a matter of right, could come into the federation upon whatever terms she might think fit. On the other hand, supposing that Queensland does not choose to divide, but comes in as one of the other states, would any one suppose for a moment that she would be accorded any other position than that of equal representation? This amendment and clause 114 simply enable us to deal with the position as it is. If Queensland will enter the federation as she is, she will undoubtedly have a right to be accorded equal representation. If she wishes to impose any other terms, or to alter her condition before she enters the federation, than we have a right to impose such terms as we think fit.

The Hon. J.H. Howe (South Australia)[3.12]:

This matter does not require any debate. If we carry this amendment, we make the commonwealth of Australia subservient to a state.

The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest:

(Western Australia)[3.13]: I feel myself in some difficulty in dealing with this question after the statement made by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. O'Connor; but I must add that I do not read clause 5, taken together with clause 114, in the way he does. It seems to me that there is a very great distinction made in both these clauses between existing states and new states. The existing states are clearly defined-they are the colonies as they exist at the present time-and clause 114 refers to those states which do not join at the present time. That means those states that exist now. I take it that the argument of the hon. and learned member, that it would be possible for Queensland to divide herself into three and claim equal representation with three other states, cannot be maintained under clause 114 read in conjunction with clause 5. I admit at once that my hon. and learned friend is an able luminary of the law, therefore I do not wish to cross swords with him in this respect; but I must say it does not seem to me that under this bill it would be possible for Queensland or any other state to divide itself into three and claim equal representation. There are no words in the bill, so far as I have read it, which could give that right to any existing state. My objection to these words is that they are unnecessary. The desire of the states that do federate, I should say, would certainly not be in the direction of repelling the other states, but rather that of gathering them into the fold. I think we may depend upon it that there will be no desire on the part of any states that federate to do other than everything in their power to draw into the federation those states which have not been able from various causes to come in at the beginning. It seems to me that to do anything which would drive away these states - which would show that if they come in they are to make terms, they are to commence fresh negotiations - would be to cause an irritation which would do a good deal to alienate these states from the federation rather than what we all I am sure desire, namely, that every means should be taken to attract into the federation as soon as possible those states that are not able to come in at the beginning. There would seem to be a desire - and I think that the publication of this debate will go some way in that direction; there would seem to be a desire on the part of the people of the larger states of Australia - those that are most likely to federate in the first instance, for without Victoria and New South Wales

I take it there can be no federation of Australia to try to coerce and force into the federation those states which are not ready or for various reasons are unable to join the federation at the present time. They say to those states: "If you do not come in now, look out; you will not get in on such good terms again. In fact, you will never get into the happy family which we shall have established." I think that that is altogether foreign to our ideas of federation what we have always spoken about our great desire that Australia should be one federated dominion or commonwealth.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:

This will make Queensland an absolute suppliant for terms!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I take it that if it is a good thing to federate at the present time, it will always be a good thing. I cannot understand what circumstance could possibly arise by which the larger states, having federated, would desire to impose on the smaller or any other states joining them afterwards any worse terms than the term is that are offered in the bill. I cannot imagine that that should be the case; and, if that is so, why put in this provision? Unless it is of some importance-unless you mean it to have a certain significance why put it in, unless it is with the desire to coerce? I say at once that any idea of the larger states trying to coerce the smaller will fall very far away from the mark, and you will find that you will raise up a feeling of distrust, and a feeling altogether opposed to what we desire that is, to federate. I say that this proposal also cuts both ways, and would have a damaging effect in every way, both from the position taken up by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, and those who follow him, and also from the position of those who are opposing him. If it goes forth that new states are to be admitted only on fresh terms, will it not be an incentive to new states to ask for better terms? They way not be content to come in on the terms upon which the original states federated. It will give an incentive to colonies desiring to gain admission into the commonwealth to say, "The Commonwealth Bill gives us an opportunity to come in on other terms. We desire that the terms shall be more favourable than those on which the original states federated." It seems to me that we shall encourage the idea in those colonies that will not enter into the federation now that, if they stand out long enough, they will be able to obtain better terms for admission than the original states obtained. It cuts both ways. It seems to me that it will be better to establish a commonwealth which is not easily altered better to form it on such a basis that all the existing colonies at present will know, if they do not come in now, exactly the terms upon which they can come in. The terms should be no better and no worse than those of the original states. They should know exactly the terms upon which they can join the commonwealth. I cannot see a particle of good in the proposal of my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, but I can see a great deal of harm; and looking at it from both points of view it seems to me a proposal which is altogether unnecessary.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid (New South Wales)[3.22]:

I should like to point out to the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, that the very important question which he raises now is raised at a very inconvenient time, and that it will come up on clause 114. The present clause 9 is one which should not be encumbered by any reference to circumstances which may arise on the admission of what are called new states.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:

I do not know whether the hon. and learned member was in the Chamber at the time; but the question whether this was an opportune time to raise the point was discussed, and it was suggested by the Chairman that this was the proper time.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

I suggest, even to the Chair, that this clause is one which points to the general laws which are equally applicable to the whole of the states. Clause 114 deals in a very few words with everything that is necessary with reference to the admission of those states, because it proposes:

The parliament may from time to time admit to the commonwealth any existing colonies.

I will stop there. Surely no hon. member of this Convention would wish to make terms with any of the existing colonies? Suppose, for instance, through the misfortune of the people of a colony in not being properly governed or managed at a particular time, it is left out of the original federation, but loses no time whatever, when it gets a constitutional opportunity to do so, to be so managed that it comes into the federation. Would any one wish to put that state into a different category from that of the colonies already federated?
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
    The commonwealth would not do it in that case!
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
    Then if there is no idea of the commonwealth doing it in that case, there is not the slightest necessity to cast a slur upon those colonies, which infallibly would be the case if in case of a colony, I will not say Queensland, but any others, Tasmania or Western Australia-
Mr. WALKER:
    Fiji!
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
    I hope the hon. member will forget his financial refinements. If we come down to territories I can quite understand that the whole question of terms must be opened.

An Hon. MEMBER:
    Suppose Queensland were divided into three colonies, how then?
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
    That would not be the existing colony of Queensland. Surely the hon. member can see that. The bill speaks of existing colonies. I say that if an existing colony I will not mention any colony is delayed through some unfortunate state of things, but is ready to come in when it is properly governed, and has an opportunity of expressing its own view, no one would wish to call that a new state upon which special terms should be imposed. It would be called an existing colony which has come into the federation as we did, only a little later in point of time. But I quite agree with any power taken to stipulate as to any territory not forming one of the existing colonies, and the bill itself does so. Even if the amendment is passed I do not object to it. I only object to it as raising this general discussion now, because I would advise hon. members who think with me, that there is a proper time and place to put that in, not to waste time on that point about the existing colonies at present, because it is quite right that new states should be dealt with in the way suggested by the amendment.
As the bill stands at present, existing colonies will not be new states. They are saved from that definition by clause 114, which says:
    The parliament may from time to time admit to the commonwealth any of the existing colonies.
    Then it goes on to say:
    And may from time to time establish new states, and may upon such admission or establishment make and impose such terms and conditions including the extent of representation.
Well, we can make it clear when the time comes that if any existing colony applies for admission there will be no terms about extent of representation; but if any territories which are not existing colonies, such as Queensland, divided into three, come in then, they would come under the head of new states. I think we can safely pass these words here, reserving the discussion which is going on at present for the other clauses, because we must remember that clause 5, the interpretation clause, has been postponed, and that clause 114 will give us a full opportunity of preventing anything being done affecting existing colonies.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria)[3.27]:

I think a good deal of time in discussion would have been saved if the original proposal of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, to amend the wording of clause 5 had been adopted. He wanted to distinguish between original states and new states, but some objection was raised, and, in consequence, hon. members have become confused as to the present proposal. The present proposal is confined to new states. Looking at clause 114, there is a distinct difference, as the Premier of New South Wales says, between new states and existing colonies, and the amendment of the Victorian Assembly has nothing to do with existing colonies. All that the Attorney-General of Victoria wants is that in the case of new states this clause making equal representation essential shall not apply. It is a mere question under clause 9 as to whether or not we shall adopt Mr. Gordon's suggestion, and make equal representation an absolute essential for all new states, no matter how small. This proposal of the Victorian Assembly will not apply to the existing colony of Queensland at all. We can deal with that when we come to clause 114.

An Hon. MEMBER:

You may deal with it when you reach clause 5!

Mr. HIGGINS:

Yes. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, wished to deal with clause 5; but at the instance of several members it was postponed. I want to deal now with clause 9 as it stands. The only effect of the Victorian Assembly's alteration is as to new states. New states are not necessarily to have equal representation; but it does not affect Queensland, because clause 114 says, the existing colonies" of Queensland, and so forth.

An Hon. MEMBER:

It goes further than that!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I feel that I ought not to take up time; but there is one point of substance which the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, referred to a point which I think is most material as applicable to the question of the admission of new states. He alluded, amid the cheers of the Convention, to the possibility of Queensland dividing into three parts. If the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, be accepted, it will mean a grievous interference with the normal development and subdivision of this Australian continent.

Mr. SYMON:
No, because the commonwealth would not admit Queensland!

Mr. HIGGINS:
The hon. member interjects before I conclude my sentence. I was going to add because the position is that Queensland, for instance, wants to divide into three colonies.

An Hon. MEMBER:
No, she does not!

Mr. HIGGINS:
Perhaps I should qualify my statement by saying that there is a petition before this Convention from central Queensland asking to be treated as a separate colony or state, although she has only 56,000 people. There is also a well-known standing request from North Queensland to be treated as a separate colony. I hope I will not be interrupted again on mere matters of detail. There is an agitation in Queensland for subdivision into three colonies. What is the effect? Suppose the commonwealth has no option, but must admit any new state on the basis of six senators to each state, the members in the federal parliament for New South Wales, Victoria, and the other colonies will be bound to throw their full weight against the subdivision of Queensland into two or three states if they find it necessarily means six senators to each part of Queensland.

Mr. LYNE:
Why should they not have six senators?

Mr. HIGGINS:
The hon. member sees the injustice of equal representation as clearly as any one does. It would mean then that New South Wales not subdivided will have six senators as against eighteen for Queensland.

Mr. LYNE:
The same anomaly exists now under the decision given at last sitting!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I will not go back on what we decided the other night. The point is this:
Suppose equal representation be carried, the members in the federal parliament representing New South Wales will be face to face with this position: That if an application be made by Queensland to be divided into three colonies under the constitution, each of these three colonies must have six senators. Then the New South Wales members would feel if we admit these three colonies, it will be Queensland eighteen as against New South Wales six.

Mr. LYNE:

But each of those colonies will have a larger population than Tasmania!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I will not enter into that. I think hon. members will agree with me that the whole weight of influence of the Victorian and New South Wales members, and even the South Australian members of the federal parliament will be thrown against the subdivision of Queensland. For present purposes, I am assuming that the subdivision of Queensland is a desirable thing in the interests of Queensland. There is no doubt that in the course of time the subdivision of some of these large colonies will be desirable; but I do not want to have a subdivision which is a normal and proper one interfered with by any rigid clause in this constitution.

Mr. GLYNN:

The hon. member's argument would have stopped the addition of thirty-one states in America to the original thirteen!

Mr. HIGGINS:

It was very different to add two senators to each state where you had a huge number of states, and to add six senators for each state where there are only a few. An hon. member suggests there is also the further consideration that at first the new states in America were only admitted as territories. I alluded to this subject at the Adelaide Convention. What I want to urge is this: whether we accept equal representation or not, still if we do accept it we shall not use it as a lover to maintain the division of Australia into these huge aggregations of land.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria)[3.36]:

The point of importance seems to me to be this: We are passing a constitution for all the colonies that we hope will federate under it. We recognise that it will be extremely wrong to make conditions for some of the other colonies which had no voice in the matter. Hence it is that all the colonies have been invited to this Convention. If we place in this constitution rigid conditions as to the introduction of further states, we shall entail upon the commonwealth of the future conditions in the making of which it has had no voice.
An Hon. MEMBER:

They are not rigid!

Mr. TRENWITH:

Everything that is put into this constitution is necessarily rigid. The proposal of the Attorney-General of Victoria is not to place any colony in an undignified position, but to give the commonwealth which is to spring out of our efforts the power to say at the time it happens what conditions it will impose in admitting other states.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

So that it may preserve the interests of the commonwealth!

Mr. TRENWITH:

Yes; and so that the colonies which come in subsequently may have a voice in securing, if there are reasons for it, different terms to those originally adopted. The Premier of New South Wales supposed the case of a colony, which from some cause or another was just now unable to express its opinion with regard to federation, but which immediately after the adoption of this constitution by some of the colonies would be able to make its choice. He assumed that such a colony would be placed in an undignified position if it could not come in on exactly the same conditions as those colonies which joined at first. There is no warrant for the assumption that the commonwealth formed under this bill would for a moment think of dictating any such terms to any colony that sought to come in immediately afterwards under the conditions of this bill, but we may suppose a case which is equally probable: Suppose the case of a colony that exercised an influence possibly in a decision upon this Commonwealth Bill, but still did not come in, and had no desire to come in at the time that the colonies generally federated. That colony might go on for a number of years without joining the federation, during which time, we might reasonably assume, the circumstances both of that colony and of the commonwealth would have materially changed. If we make this Commonwealth Bill as rigid as desired, we shall entail upon the people of the commonwealth in the future the necessity of going through all the cumbrous machinery of changing the constitution before they could make conditions or arrangements different to those which are suitable now. and which might not be suitable at the time I contemplate; but if we adopt the hon. member's amendment we shall make the Commonwealth Bill as perfect as we can make it for the circumstances of our time. We shall leave sufficient flexibility in it to enable the commonwealth parliament to make such conditions with the colonies which desire to come in in future as are, under their circumstances, desirable. I strongly urge that upon hon.
members. We shall not be imposing any indignity or disability either on the commonwealth or the province we shall simply be providing that flexibility which is necessary, by allowing the parliament of the future to do what will be best in the interests of the commonwealth of the future.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[3.39]:

I would just add to the arguments which were urged by the hon. member, Mr. Barton, and others, that this addition that we made to the 114th clause, and with which this amendment will read, seems to me to be a most exceptional one. So far from greater power on the admission of new states being given to those states, the very reverse has been done in the case of other constitutions. In the case of the Canadian Constitution it was provided that on the addition of those colonies which were to stand out, their representation in the senate, when certain other colonies came in, was to be diminished rather than increased. For instance, it was provided, in the case of Prince Edward Island, that when it came in subsequently the representation in the senate of that colony should be deducted from the maritime provinces; so that the numerical proportion in the senate of the new states would be diminished as new colonies were admitted. New Brunswick's share of representation would come down, because the twenty-four representatives given to the three maritime provinces would have to be divided with New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. There is no similar provision in the Canadian Constitution except to the extent I have mentioned. There is a provision in another clause that terms may be arranged on the admission of new colonies. But the provision to which I have referred as regards the representation tells in the very opposite direction to that which is proposed to be inserted in our constitution. The argument of the hon. member, Mr. Higgins, is completely answered in the case of America. His fears amount to this: If you allow the new states to enter on equal terms with the existing states, then the whole force of New South Wales and Victoria will be thrown against the proposed subdivision of Queensland, because by allowing Queensland to come in as three states instead of one you will probably diminish the power of Victoria and New South Wales.

Mr. HIGGINS:

There was no subdivision in America; there is to be a subdivision here!

Mr. GLYNN:

In America they started with thirteen states, and they made a provision that new states should have equal representation. The constitution practically fixed in itself the terms on which new states were to be admitted that there was to be equal representation.
Mr. HIGGINS:
The point is, that in the United States the new states were increased in number by aggregation, and not by subdivision!

Mr. GLYNN:
The principle is exactly the same. It rested with Congress to say whether an addition should or should not be made. There was a very big fight made about the admission of Texas. The fight was not as to the admission on certain terms as to the representation in the senate, but whether the admission should or should not take place. My hon. friend's arguments are perfectly answered by the case of America.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales)[3.43]:
It seems to me that the public are likely to be rather muddled over this discussion. As far as I have understood the question, it is purely a matter of drafting. It is a matter of inconsistency between this clause and clause 114, and it never intended that that inconsistency should be remedied by passing any slight on Queensland, or by intending for a moment, if Queensland should desire to come in, that she should not come in on the basis of equal representation. It was intended to meet the difficulty of the division or reconstruction of some of these colonies which have large sparsely populated districts. The effect of not introducing some kind of amendment like this would be to prevent the subdivision of those colonies in the near future. It might be absolutely necessary for some portions of Queensland, the northern territory of South Australia, and the northern portion of Western Australia to be divided up into probational territories, at any rate, in order that the local government could be more effectively managed. If we do not include in our constitution a provision to meet that emergency, we should continue the large and unwieldly character of these colonies, which is one of the greatest drawbacks to the cause of federation.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales)[3.45]:
I think it is to be regretted that this question has arisen at the present time. I should have much preferred that we should have determined it on clause 114. But now that it has been raised it must be settled. I am going to vote with the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, perhaps for different reasons from those which influence other hon. members. Every one knows that I have been opposed to equal representation in the senate, as has been decided on. I think the action of the hon. and learned member, and the character of his amendments, will emphasise the absurdity of what has been done. I can understand giving power in the bill to allow territories to enter the federation with unequal state rights, or equal territorial rights of representation in the senate; but I cannot understand all these gentlemen who voted for equal state rights, trying to take those equal state rights away from any states which might hereafter come into the federation. Supposing the southern portion of Queensland, containing the larger proportion of her population, at some not very distant date, should separate and desire to come into the federation, why should that portion of that state with a population as large as, or larger than, that of Tasmania, with possibilities ten times as great as hers, not come in on an equality? I point this out to show the absurdity of what has been done.

The CHAIRMAN:

The hon. member is not in order in characterising what the Committee has done as absurd.

Mr. LYNE:

I may be permitted, sir, from my point of view, to refer to what I consider the absurdity of equal representation in the senate.

The CHAIRMAN:

The hon. member will be quite in order in characterising anything which the Committee proposes to do as absurd; but after the Committee has arrived at a conclusion, he is not in order in characterising that as absurd, unless he is in the position of seeking to rescind the resolution.

Mr. LYNE:

Your decision, sir, would be perhaps somewhat different if it were given under our standing orders. I wish to point out that what the Committee is proposing to do is an absurdity. I am right in saying that I hope, sir. It is an absurdity in contradistinction to what the Committee has done. In the past the Committee may not have been guilty of an absurdity; but if the Committee does what is now proposed it will certainly be guilty of an absurdity. I am going to vote for the amendment. It will emphasise the absurd position we are in in making this proposition. I can understand a proposal to allow the introduction into the federation of inferior states or territories, and it may be the grouping of them together, and to give each one of them a similar representation in the senate, but together not a larger representation than any state, but I cannot see the logic of proposing to allow new states to come in, no matter whether they are at present existing states, or whether they may be a subdivision of existing states, on any other principle than that which has been determined. As I said there are certain portions of Queensland which, if it is subdivided, may come in, and which should Mr Lyne come in, if you are to have equal state rights, on perfect equality with the existing states. We should not put the existing states which would form the federation, as the hon. member, Mr. Gordon, says, in the position of a syndicate wishing to be the first robbers because that is really the logical position which we will occupy in this matter but we should place every state which comes into the federation with its population and with its possibilities on an equality if you are going to have equal state rights at all. I only rose to show why I am

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[3.51]:

I think the hon. member who has just spoken has fallen into the pit which he dug for himself. There is no absurdity about the passage of the amendment, notwithstanding the decision which has been come to about equal state rights. The decision about equal state representation in one house alone was come to as part of that process of compromise and negotiation which must take place in the framing of any federation. If the hon. member would see that, then he would perhaps be more consistent in thinking that it would be impossible for five sets of people to come here with different and conflicting views not compromising upon any one of them, and yet be under the delusion that they could agree upon something. It is only by compromise that a federation can be formed. The very form of a federal government is in its essence compromise, and you have to compromise in a federal government between the extreme federal idea which characterises what may be called a confederation with equal representation in the, two houses and in one if there be only one-and that which characterises the extreme in national matters of insistence on proportionate representation in two houses, or one if there be only one. If there be a bi-cameral legislature, what has been decided amounts to this: that the just line of compromise is to give proportional representation in one chamber and equal representation in another. A compromise is based not only upon fair lines between those two opposing systems of government, but is based also on reason and justice. Mr. Lyne is mistaken if he thinks there is anything in this proposition which conflicts with that principle. In the same way that we are here to reason with each other, and to negotiate about the basis of the constitution we are to form, as regards those who at the opening enter the commonwealth, so we wish to take in this amendment a power for the commonwealth to enter into negotiations, and deal on fair terms with those who afterwards wish to come into the commonwealth, and the process is the same. But this difficulty arises: This amendment is not proposed for the purpose of taking away from any state its right to equal representation, even if it be a new state being one of those we were originally dealing with. Take Queensland, for instance. If Queensland proposed to come into the constitution before it is actually framed, or if she proposed to come in as an undivided colony after the framing of the constitution, it is inconceivable that there would be any objection to her having the same senate representation; but the case may arise of a colony like Queensland dividing herself, perhaps, for the purpose of securing greater representation in one house it may not necessarily be for that purpose but because of other political exigencies. It could, however, be done either for that purpose, or under the pressure of circumstances. What would follow? That one colony coming in, which, if she came in now would be entitled to the same representation in the senate as this or any other colony which is now a contracting party, would be able to come in with the representation of three of the Colonies as they stand at present with representation in the senate equal to New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, or Western Australia, Tasmania, and South Australia. It naturally occurs that the alteration of conditions of that sort is a thing we may reasonably provide for in the constitution. We are not dealing adversely with the question of equal representation in the senate. We are simply providing for a case in which that equal state representation, arising under such circumstances, would be applied unjustly, and might possibly be applied with designed injustice. It is not a case of the larger states coercing the smaller, as Sir John Forrest seemed to fear, but the case of the commonwealth taking means to protect itself in the future. There is no desire to injure any state, but to keep the matter of representation so in the hands of the commonwealth to which it will belong that the terms upon which a state will be represented cannot be so dictated by that state that she may, by a subdivision, grasp a representation in the commonwealth which will be three times what she would have under present conditions.

An Hon. MEMBER:
No one argues that!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
No one does; but, unless we make a provision of that kind, the argument must prevail whether the hon. member likes it or not. The Premier of New South Wales has argued that clause 9 must not be encumbered with provisions as to new states. That would be very well if there were not some qualification inserted in the clause. Necessarily, there would be some conflict between this clause and clause 114. It has been rightly said by Mr. McMillan that this matter is, to a large extent, one of drafting. Still, there is imported into it a question of substance, because we are discussing the same question which arises in clause 114. I put this broadly: that those who are in favour of clause 114... will be in favour of the amendment, because it is simply an effectuation of that clause. Clause 114 itself may require modification; because, whilst it deals with the admission of any colonies which have not adopted the constitution, and also with the establishment of new states, it, perhaps, does not sufficiently express that it is intended to cover the case where a colony—now an existing colony does not come into the federation until afterwards, and has in the meantime subdivided itself.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It applies to both!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It may be that clause 114 covers every one of those cases; but, in any case, the intention of the Convention, as disclosed at Adelaide, if made clear, would be an amendment largely in the direction of drafting. A word was said by Mr. Glynn about the state of affairs in Canada. I would like to put myself right about that. Section 22 of the British North America Act—that is to say, applying to the four colonies which then entered, stated that there were to be three divisions. The two Canadas—Upper and Lower—were to be divided into Ontario and Quebec. There were to be twenty-four senators for Quebec, and twenty-four for Ontario. That is to say, there was equal state representation in the Senate, notwithstanding the disparities in their population; but there were only twenty-four provided for the third division, which consisted of the maritime provinces. At that time, the only maritime provinces which had joined the Dominion were Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. What provision was made afterwards? Under the head of "admission of other colonies," it was provided that it might be lawful for the Queen-in-Council, on address from the Houses of Parliament in Canada, and the legislatures of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, and British Columbia to admit those colonies or provinces, or any of them, into the union—on such terms and conditions in each case as are in the addresses expressed and as the Queen may think fit to approve, subject to the provisions of this act;-

that is to say, taking the full power to make terms and conditions—and the provisions of any Order-in-Council on that behalf shall have effect as if they had been enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. There is only one qualification imposed upon that, and it is this: It is not a qualification in favour of the equal state representation of the remaining colonies—Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland—but that each of them shall be entitled to a representation in the senate, of how many members? Four. Quebec being entitled to 24; Ontario to 24; and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick between them to 24. Either of the other colonies if they enter are to be entitled to 4; but there is a provision in the case of Prince Edward Island for a reduction in the number of senators for the two provinces of Canada that is, the original provinces of Ontario and Quebec whose number in the Senate was to drop then from 12 to 10, so that they shall each have 10, making 20 for the two. But that division was still to have 24 members, because Prince Edward Island was to be counted a part of that division of the Dominion, and her 4 would be added to the 10 each of Upper and Lower Canada, so that the number of 24 for the division would be maintained. It is clear from these provisions that what was intended there was, first, that there should be a full right to negotiate with the various provinces; but that something must be conserved to Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, and that was that they should have, not equal representation, but four representatives each in the senate. The proposed amendment, however, together with clause 114, does not make any such rigid or arbitrary distinction, because it is quite competent for the commonwealth to grant equal representation to Queensland, or to subdivide Queensland, or to any other new state that may be carved out. It remains a question for the commonwealth. There is no destruction of the principle of state right, and it is competent for the commonwealth to apply that principle to any newly admitted state. All that is provided for is that the commonwealth shall have the right, before admitting any new state, to enter into negotiations with it, and to decide with it upon the terms which may seem just. That is all that is intended by the amendment and clause 114. Having made this plain statement, I hope there will be no objection to the acceptance of the amendment.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[4.2]:

I sincerely hope that the Committee will not accept the amendment. We have been drawn away a good deal from what really underlies it by a number of analogies and illustrations which have no application to it. During a couple of days last week we fought out the great principle of equal representation in the senate. I know that some hon. members believe that that principle was agreed to as a concession to the smaller states. I do not regard it as a concession, and I utterly dissent from any suggestion that we who represent the smaller states have accepted it in that spirit. We claimed it, and insisted upon it as a right, and I was sorry to notice and I take this opportunity of correcting the impression that the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, judging from a report which I read in a Sunday newspaper, seems to believe that the representatives of the smaller and less popular states are now inclined to regard this as a concession and not as a right. I tell the Convention, and I tell the hon. and learned gentleman, that that is an entire misapprehension. We claim this as an absolute right, and as an invulnerable principle of federation.

An Hon. MEMBER:
At any rate, it will answer the hon. member's purpose!

Mr. SYMON:
Never mind my purpose. I want to deal with this matter as briefly as I can. I think that a great deal has been introduced into the discussion that has no bearing whatever upon the principle. Either we have been wasting our time altogether, or we have embodied in the constitution the principle of the equal representation of states in the senate.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
We have conceded that fully!

Mr. SYMON:
I am not talking about the original concession. I am willing to accept it from my hon. friend, who is friendly to the less populous states in the interests of federation, for the sake of what I am going to say now. Whether it is treated as a concession or as a right, it is here in the constitution; and the proposed amendment is an entire abandonment of the principle. Of course the amendment is a matter of substance; it is not a mere matter of drafting. It anticipates the discussion we might otherwise have upon clause 114; and I presume that if an amendment upon clause 114 were suggested, you, Mr. Chairman, would rule it out of order if it reopened this matter? Treating the amendment as a matter of substance, what does it amount to? It asks us to empower the federal parliament to abrogate one of the fundamental principles of the constitution. The alternative is to enable the federal parliament to do what it can do now refuse to admit a state. The alternatives are: to introduce an amendment and entirely destroy the principle for which we have contended, and which underlies any federal system of government, or simply to give the federal parliament the power of refusing to admit a particular state a power it already possesses under the constitution. Queensland has been referred to as an illustration. Hon. members have been terrified by the bogy that Queensland may divide herself into three parts.

An Hon. MEMBER:
No!

Mr. SYMON:
Not intentionally, perhaps; but as the result of some agitation.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

No. It is a question of what might happen after she came in; not of what she might do before. It is a question of the future subdivision of these large territories!

Mr. SYMON:

Well, I will take it either way. Take Queensland as an illustration. I quite recognise that Queensland, influenced by the agitation which is proceeding, may subdivide into three; but the remedy for that, if she seeks to enter the federation as a three-fold state, is to refuse to admit her.

An Hon. MEMBER:

We do not want to do that!

Mr. SYMON:

[missing]en you admit part of Australia into the commonwealth as a state, you must give it all the rights of a state, and place it upon the same footing as the other states.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

That is all that is meant!

Mr. SYMON:

Not at all; and it is because of this misapprehension that I have ventured to rise, to clear away the confusion.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It is the understanding of most Hon. members!

Mr. SYMON:

The remedy is, that a clause should be introduced, if clause 115 is not ample, to provide for territories being taken under the control of the commonwealth, upon any system of representation or no representation, as you please.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

How about clause 114?

Mr. SYMON:

We have not come to that yet; that is another source of misapprehension. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, has just said, and it has been said by others, that we are dealing with this as a mere matter of drafting, because it is necessary to bring clause 9 into harmony with clause 114. I quite agree with that, if you are going to leave clause 114 as it stands. But I and other hon. members do not intend to leave clause 114 as it stands, if we can alter it. It was one of the provisions introduced into the bill at the close of our proceedings in Adelaide, when, owing to circumstances which from one point of view might be considered as fortunate, and from another point of view as unfortunate, we were not able to have that exhaustive consideration which otherwise we should have bestowed upon it. But we shall be playing fast and loose with the principle of equal state representation in the senate which was embodied in the bill if we agree to the amendment. If we admit any part of this great continent into the commonwealth as a state, it must have equal representation in the senate. If it is not admitted as a state, if it is not in a political condition to warrant its admission as a state, let it be called a territory; but to hand over to the federal parliament the right of amending the constitution in this essential particular is to abandon everything we have been fighting for.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Had we not better define what a state is, and what a territory is?

Mr. SYMON:
I should like some such definition to be embodied in the bill. What I want hon. members to remember is that this is not a matter of drafting. This is a serious matter of principle. I like the suggestion, as I gather it, of the right hon. the Premier of New South Wales; that if we want to deal with this question exhaustively we should postpone it until we come to clause 114. But do not let us now, by a division upon what some hon. members think a mere question of drafting, decide what is an essential and vital point in the constitution. While, on the one hand, we are inserting in the bill equal representation for every state, we are taking it away with the other hand. It will be a ring-streaked and spotted constitution. The question involved is one which we are here to vindicate; it is a principle we are here to rest upon, and I, for one, am not going to give it away. As to the mere illustration which has been taken from Queensland in the matter, I do not suppose the slightest difficulty will arise in connection with that colony. Certainly Queensland will not divide herself into three for the sake of getting increased representation in the senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Why does not the hon. member move the postponement of the clause?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
If the hon. member does that, we shall not be here to deal with it!

Mr. SYMON:
The reason why I think it would be well to postpone the clause is that we should deal with it in connection with clause 114. There seems to be some apprehension as to whether or not this is a necessary amendment to make the clause in harmony with clause 114. But the amendment is nothing of the kind. In the first place, it is an amendment of the gravest substance.
Secondly, we are reopening the whole question of equal representation in the senate, which some of us regard as a vital principle of this constitution; and thirdly, we are doing violence to what is provided in another part of the bill, namely, the method of altering the constitution by handing over the alteration of it in one particular and vital phase to the federal parliament absolutely. We have the power to prevent all the difficulties which have been pointed out by refusing to admit portions of the colonies as states, and by dealing with them as territories I hope that every care will be exercised in coming to a conclusion on the matter, having regard to the important and far-reaching consequences which may flow from the clause.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)[4.13]:

It was my intention to vote for the amendment of the hon. The Attorney-General for Victoria; but I think, on further consideration, that it would be better to leave to Queensland the right to say "We will come in under the bill as it stands." There will then be no haggling over the conditions. I think that it would be safer to leave the bill as it is than to make this alteration. Queensland will then come in on the bedrock, as it were, and there will be no trouble, no doubt, and no haggling. If the proposed alteration were made, Queensland might have, to some extent, to approach the federal parliament cap in hand, and the federal executive might have the power to coerce the colony, by exacting better terms than she was willing to give. I shall, therefore, vote for the clause as it stands.

Mr. CLARKE (Tasmania)[4.15]:

I am very glad to observe that the hon. member who has just resumed his seat and who interrupted the hon. member, Mr. Symon, with cries of "divide" and "question," has thought fit to change his mind and give the Committee the benefit of his opinion. It gives me some confidence in rising to say a word or two on the subject. While I hold just as strongly as does my hon. friend, Mr. Symon, to the great principle of equal representation, I wish to point out to him that I think he has made a mistake. The principle we affirmed on Friday last was the right of each existing state to equal representation in the senate, and not the right of different parts of each state to that equal representation. I should like to call the attention of my hon. friend to this point: that the reason why different parts of the proposed commonwealth obtained equal representation in the senate was on account of their being existing colonies exercising, rights of self-government. I repeat that while I hold as strongly as does my hon. friend the principle of equal state representation in the senate, I differ from him altogether when he use an argument to the effect that if Queensland be subdivided into three colonies each of such different colonies should be entitled to equal representation at any time it might please them to enter the federation.

Mr. SYMON:
I did not say that!

Mr. CLARKE:
That was the effect of the hon member's argument.

Mr. SYMON:
No; not unless they are admitted as states!

Mr. CLARKE:
Their admission as states should rest with the federal authorities. I believe in giving the federal parliament power in reference to this matter. I have not the slightest doubt that if Queensland chooses to come in in five or ten years hence, the federal parliament will let her come in with equal representation. My hon. friend, Mr. Gordon, referred to the colonies who first join in the federation as first robbers, and he used some other mining phraseology with which he seemed to be pretty familiar. Now, I should like to point out to him, and to any other hon. member who agrees with him, that the question at issue is not a question of money at all. It is not a question of the financial terms upon which each state shall come in; it is a question of the voice which any particular state, shall have when it does come in. That is a very different thing from any question of finance. I should like also to say this, in reply to my hon. friend, Mr. Howe, who said that if we carried this amendment we should make the commonwealth of Australia subservient to a state. In my, humble opinion, the effect of the amendment will be exactly the reverse.

Mr. LEAKE (Western Australia)
It is my intention to vote against the amendment, because I think it is proposed in the wrong place; this question should, be dealt with when we are considering clause 114, and not now.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
If we retain the provision in clause 114, there must be some, amendment of the kind here!

Mr. LEAKE:
But we do not like clause 114, and I would point out the distinction between the two clauses. This paragraph of clause 9 affects only the senate, whereas clause 114 affects both the house of representatives and the senate. Those of us who, like my hon. friend, Mr. Symon, are in favour of the maintenance of state rights, wish to emphasise our position by the retention of these words. If these words stand, then the senate is, from our point of view, soundly established upon a proper foundation, and we, shall not have deprived the commonwealth of the advantage of it may be so termed of placing new states upon a different basis with regard to their representation in the house of representatives. We may abandon that point; but we must have equal representation in the senate, and we say, further, that we will not have the number of senators for each state fixed at less than six. If this amendment be carried, not only is unequal representation in the senate assured for some states, but by it also the representation may be less than six. I think hon. members have hardly regarded the effect of the amendment from that point of view. We may give way, I say again, on this question of representation in the house of representatives; or the admission of new states may be put upon terms other than those of equal representation in the senate. We do not mind terms being imposed, in fact new terms are contemplated I understand. I do not go to the extent of assuming that the terms which will or may be imposed will be stringent. They may of course be liberal, and I am inclined to the conclusion that the commonwealth in dealing with new states would be liberal rather than stringent as to conditions. We who represent Western Australia have always been assured that owing to the peculiar circumstances of our colony special terms must be or probably will be made for us, and I am inclined to think that in those circumstances the terms would be liberal that nothing would be done which would be likely to keep us out of the federation. I say, then, that if it is a question of terms, we are prepared perhaps, to be placed upon terms, but those terms must not be any less representation, or any less power in the senate, than paragraph 4 provides for. We will accept other terms liberal or perhaps stringent but we must have equal representation as states in the senate.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Why not join us at once?

Mr. LEAKE:

I am perfectly willing to join you at once I admit that; but we must consider the views of other persons. I agree with the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, who says that this is a vital question, and you are attempting to give the federal parliament power to amend the constitution in an indirect manner. I do not approve of it. We shall abandon one of the first principles of this federation if we agree to the amendment, and we shall block the way of further discussion and of that liberal trust which we anticipate, when we come to clause 114. If we pass the proposed amendment to this paragraph we shall find that we cannot do what we are promised, and which I believe hon. members desire when we come to clause 114, because, as I said before, this paragraph of clause 9 deals with the representation in the senate alone, whereas clause 114 deals with both houses of the proposed federation.

The Hon. J.H. HOWE (South Australia)[4.23]:

I am very much indebted to my hon. friend, Mr. Clarke, for quoting, I believe, exactly the words that I used. I am sure that the Attorney-General of Victoria understood my interjection perfectly I was cheering nearly everything he said. What I meant to say was that if the Convention did not carry the hon. and learned member's amendment we should be making the commonwealth subservient to any particular state that wishes to stand out. A great deal has been said about equal representation. My hon. and learned friend, Mr. Symon, is not a stronger advocate of equal representation than I am; b

Mr. SYMON:

What danger?

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

Because we shall be simply giving states a premium to isolate themselves from the commonwealth until they see how it works.

Mr. SYMON:

Not a bit of it!

The Hon. J.H. HOWE:

I do not wish to misinterpret the action of my hon. friend, Sir John Forrest be and I were boys together into meaning that Western Australia does not wish to be part and parcel of the commonwealth at the present time. Is not Queensland playing fast and loose with the matter at the present time? Will Tasmania join us if we do not agree to the amendment? I say no. She will stand aloof and see how the other colonies get along. In fact, I think that there will be no commonwealth at all, for I question if Victoria will consent to join in any commonwealth unless that amendment is carried. Consequently, I say that if we do not carry the amendment of the Legislative Assembly of Victoria we are jeopardising the cause we have so much at heart. I shall heartily support the amendment;

Dr. QUICK (Victoria)[4.26]:

I was rather disappointed at hearing the tone adopted by my learned friend, Mr. Symon, and I venture to say that the attitude which he has assumed, and also that of my hon. friend, Mr. Gordon, is calculated to embarrass the representatives of the large states who have up to the present Supported the principle of equal representation. We have done our best in our colonies to prepare the people for equal representation in its application to existing states. To that extent we have gone as far as we possibly can-as far as we dare to go; but it is now proposed to extend that principle of equal representation to the future states.

The Hon. J.H. Howe:
We do not refuse to extend it!

Dr. Quick:
The hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, proposes to lay open the extension of this principle absolutely, as a cast-iron principle, to future states which may be carved out of existing colonies.

Mr. Symon:
If you admit them as states!

Dr. Quick:
If he wishes to have such a principle as that added to the granting of equal representation to the existing states he will increase the difficulties and burdens of those hon. members of the Convention who represent large colonies. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman wishes to do that. His attitude is no doubt consistent; but I wish to point out to him, and to other hon. gentlemen, that if they make it obligatory for all future new states, as well as existing states, to have equal representation, then they will overburden this constitution, and it will probably break down.

The Hon. Dr. Cockburn (South Australia)[4.29]:

A serious matter has been advanced, that if this amendment be not carried the small states are likely to stand out. I think it is quite the other way. I can see a great danger in this amendment being carried. It is very easy to imagine a case in which a new state may be admitted with a larger population than, say, Tasmania, and admitted on the terms contemplated by the amendment, with less than the same amount of representation in the senate that Tasmania and the original states have. I say that this state of things would give rise to a perpetual ferment. You would have a large element of the federation which had less representation in the senate than the smaller element. It would be a continual sore point. The whole question of the representation of the small states would be raised and their representation would be endangered. I say that to carry this amendment would be more likely to give dissatisfaction to the small states, seeing that their representation would be placed in jeopardy, and a great principle having by this means been set on one side.

An Hon Member:-

The Hon. Dr. Cockburn:
I say there is no analogy between the case of Canada and the case of these colonies. Several of the federated provinces of Canada had never known what autonomy was. They had never been in the position of these colonies. In the case of Upper and Lower Canada the analogy is still more imperfect, because they had one legislature between them. The conditions of Canada being so utterly dissimilar from the conditions of Australia, I hope we shall not have precedents quoted from Canada, either in speeches or by interjections.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia) [4.31):

I intend to vote for the amendment, but not on the speech of the hon. member who introduced it, because I think his speech went far beyond what he proposed. The amendment says, "Except in the case of new states, which, after the establishment of the commonwealth, are admitted thereto, or established thereby, upon other terms and conditions." The hon. member introduces this to explain clause 114. Let us refer to clause 114. It says:

The parliament may from time to time admit to the commonwealth any of the existing colonies. That is one thing.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

What are the colonies when once admitted?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

If the hon. member will wait, I will explain it to his perfect satisfaction. The clause says, "and may from time to time establish new states." They can do two things. They may admit existing colonies and they may establish new states. Now, go to the first part of the bill. There it says "states," not "new states"; there is no such term. We have one definition of states, and these are the existing colonies of New South Wales, Queensland, Victoria, New Zealand, Western Australia, and the province of South Australia. Then we have got the provisions in clause 114.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The hon. and learned member is not correct!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I quite agree that they are not states until they adopt the constitution, but directly they adopt the constitution they are states but not new states. You have the positions put in apposition in clause 114. They can admit existing colonies and establish new states. My hon. and learned friend's drafting is better than be dreamed of. I agree with him as he has put it, but I do not agree with him at all as he intends it. I am so delighted to come to an agreement with any hon. member of my own profession even though on opposite grounds, that I cheerfully welcome the amendment.

Clause further amended by the omission of the words "so that."

The CHAIRMAN:

The next amendment is an amendment by the Legislative Council of New South Wales, to strike out the word "equal," and insert the word "proportionate." Inasmuch as that would conflict with a decision arrived at by the Committee, I shall not put it. The next amendment is one proposed by the Legislative Council of New South Wales, to strike out the word "six" before "senators" and insert the word "three." Inasmuch as that would conflict with a decision already arrived at by the Committee, I shall not put it.

Paragraph, as amended, agreed to.
Clause 9, paragraph 5. The qualification of electors of senators shall be in each state that which is prescribed by this constitution or by the parliament as the qualification for electors of members of the house of representatives, but in the choosing of senators each elector shall vote only once, and if any elector votes more than once, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia: Omit "qualification of electors of."

The CHAIRMAN:
The first amendment is an amendment by the Assembly of South Australia. That House proposes to leave out the words "the qualification of electors of," and then to leave out all the words after "shall be," in the first line, with the view of inserting the following words:--"elected in all the federated states on the basis of one adult one vote." I shall put the first amendment first to leave out the words "qualification of electors of." The question is, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the paragraph.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[4.41]:
This is an endeavour to enact in the constitution that no matter what has been the law of the several states, they shall all, with regard to this question of adult suffrage, conform to the law as it is in South Australia. I may be quite prepared to admit that in some colonies there is a tendency to approve of adult suffrage-female suffrage. I am not going to discuss the question as to whether there is an actual tendency to approve of it, or whether there is a majority for it, in my own colony or in any other colony. But I take it that until a uniform suffrage law is passed by the federal parliament, under the general provisions in the clause dealing with qualifications, the various states will reserve to themselves the right to deal with their own electoral laws in their own way; and holding that opinion I do not wish to argue the matter at any length I think it would be unwise; I do not think it would be a wise dictation to the other states, that South Australia should succeed in carrying this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN:
I understand that this amendment will be put to test the whole of the amendments of South Australia in favour of the adoption of adult suffrage as the franchise of the federation.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[4.43]:
I should have been content for one to have simply taken a vote on this question without speech, seeing that its purport is well understood. But as some argument has been used, I am bound, as shortly as I can, to put the other side. It is said that each state should be free to deal with its own representation as it pleases. Now, I do not think that is fair. The question is not the representation of each state as a matter concerning only itself. The truth is, the representation of another state may affect a state even more than its own representation may affect it. Take, for instance, the position of South Australia. I have put it before, and I put it again shortly, that the representation to which the colony of New South Wales is entitled in the house of representatives is a much more vital matter to South Australia than is its own representation, because in this colony there would be twenty-six representatives, while in the colony of South Australia there would be only seven. It matters, therefore, much more to South Australia what the basis is upon which the twenty-six are elected in New South Wales than what the basis is on which the seven are elected there. We protest, then, that it is not a matter in which each colony is concerned only as to its own representation. It is a matter in which each colony is concerned as to the whole of the representa-

I take it that it will be in accordance with the understanding arrived at this morning that we should take in their order the constitution of the senate and the constitution of the house of representatives, and the relative money powers, and then proceed to the question of the deadlock provisions.

An Hon. MEMBER:
There are some more amendments in this clause!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I was not aware of that. I was going on to say that, in accordance with the understanding mentioned, I would move the postponement of clauses from 10 to 23 inclusive, so that we should reach the first clause dealing with the constitution of the house of representatives.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and Assembly of Tasmania:
Omit the words, line 7, "and if any elector votes more than once he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH (Tasmania):
It was pointed out at the Adelaide Convention that the bill should not embrace anything except what was necessary for the framing of the constitution, and that any matters which belong to the criminal law or the electoral laws of the states had better be left as they are. As far as the criminal law is concerned, it should not be part of the constitution. I would, in view of the suggestions made by the Tasmanian Parliament, draw the attention of the leader of the Convention to this desirable amendment.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales)[4.52]:

There seemed to be a considerable number of members at Adelaide who wished to have this provision about a misdemeanour inserted, and it was inserted in accordance with the wish of the majority. I am myself of opinion that so far as you can you should leave the constitution to deal simply with matters of necessary machinery. I am not myself strongly in favour of a provision of this kind; and I think it can be otherwise provided for; but I am entirely in the hands of the Committee. If there is such a desire on the part of the Committee, I shall not object to the retention of these words, although I admit the force of the argument that the constitution act is not the place for making offences against the criminal law, or for prescribing penalties. That is perfectly true; but the object in the first instance seemed to be to obtain a statement of this kind in the constitution. The object seemed to be to make it plain on the face of the constitution that whosoever offended against the law of one man vote should be in danger of the police. I think I pointed out in Adelaide, and hon. members mostly agreed with me; that where a man does wilfully said deliberately what is against the express provisions of an act it is a misdemeanour, and there is no necessity to place that in an act of parliament.

Dr. Quick (Victoria)[4.54]:

I think this is one of the principles which must be kept in the bill if we want to obtain substantial support for it in Victoria. I, for one, strongly advocate that the principle of single voting should be firmly embedded in the constitution., and, not left to the discretion of the state parliaments. Whilst we were not able to secure a uniform federal franchise, I agreed to accept it as a sort of, compromise that the principle, of single voting should be put; in the constitution. I strongly urged that on the leader of the Convention, and it was then put in the constitution. But having put the provision in the constitution without any machinery for giving effect, to it, what was the good of it? There was no sanction for giving effect to the principle of single voting. Any federal voter might vote a hundred times. It was merely an, assertion of an abstract principle in the constitution, and, there was no penalty provided for violating it. Therefore, the hon. member, Mr, Barton, and the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, agreed to put this provision in; the bill.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

We also pointed out that it would be a misdemeanour without stating so in this bill.

Dr. QUICK:

No doubt; but by retaining these words we. shall, make it plain, in the constitution that this is not a mere abstract principle, but one that can be enforced by the federal courts. Unless a penalty is mentioned there, it will be a matter of doubt, As a question of law, it is generally understood that the violation of any statute carries with it the penalty of a misdemeanour. If so, why not place it in the Constitution, so as to make the matter plain and, beyond all doubt? I therefore strongly urge the Convention to retain, this provision!

Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[4.56]:

It seems to me that whether the provision is retained or not it will be precisely the same. The words, in my opinion, are mere surplusage. Everyone knows that when a statute prescribes anything the breach of it is a misdemeanour at common law. There will be this difficulty about retaining the words, and I draw the attention of the hon member, Dr. Quick, to it: If we keep the words in, there may arise a difficulty as to the jurisdiction under which an offer should be tried, whether it should be by federal or by the local courts.

Dr. QUICK:

No more than if it were an implied misdemeanour!

Mr. WISE:

I am not sure; possibly not; and that maybe an answer to the argument. But it does seem to me that if you put in this provision you cannot say by what court au offender should be tried. If we retain the words, it will be a blot on the drafting.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[4.58]:

I do not want to take up any time in, debating this question;

but I would point out that this will be a restriction on the federal parliament. They might want to make this offence more than a misdemeanour; they might want to inflict some other punishment. It seems to me an unnecessary interference with the rights of the federal parliament.

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS (Tasmania)[4.50]:

The principle for which the hon. member, Dr. Quick, is contending is embedded in the constitution without the words proposed to be omitted. We provide that each elector shall vote only once. It is not proposed to leave out those words, so that the principle of one man one vote is embedded in the constitution,

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
A layman reading that would say, "There is no penalty I shall, vote as often as I like!"

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS:
Surely we can leave it to the federal parliament to make provision.

Dr. QUICK:
How can you, do that in the case of the first election?

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS:
As far as the first election is concerned, it will be a misdemeanour at common law, and there is the usual penalty for any misdemeanour, for which a punishment is not otherwise provided. Surely it will be a blot on this constitution if we embody in it something which should be dealt with by the criminal law.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria: At end of clause add the following paragraph:-"No elector who has at the establishment of the commonwealth, or who afterwards acquires a right to vote at elections for the more numerous house of the parliament of the state, shall, whilst the right continues, be prevented by any law of the commonwealth from voting at elections for senators."

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs (Victoria)[5.3]:
This suggestion concerns South Australia more than it concerns Victoria. It is, perhaps, a suggestion for the Drafting Committee to deal with. It is made in order to preserve, in regard to the senate, the right of women in South Australia to vote, just as that right is preserved in the case of the house of representatives. The wording of, the amendment is only, I think, to carry out the intention of the Convention. In clause 30 certain, election qualifications are fixed for electors; but there is a Prevision. that women are not to be prevented; by the federal parliament from voting at elections for the house of representatives. It is restricted to that.

The Hon. E. Barton:
We can meet the, difficulty, I think, by making the last part of clause 30 to apply to the senate, by putting it under the provisions relating to both houses!

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
That, I think, will meet the case. It merely draw attention to the matter, leaving the framing of the amendment to the Drafting Committee.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales)[5.4]:
I would suggest that we should formally negative this amendment, and the Drafting Committee will frame an amendment by which on the recommittal of the bill, which must take place, the provision at the end of clause 30, will be made to apply both to the senate and to the house of representatives.

Amendment negatived; paragraph 5, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9, as amended, agreed to.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales)[5.5]:
The understanding was that we should simply take those clauses which refer absolutely and inherently to the very constitution of the senate and house of representatives in older that we might the earlier get to the question of money powers and the question of deadlocks. I take it that we will go back to those things. If we can save half an hour in that way it will be better to do so. Therefore, in order that we may reach clause 24, I move: That clauses 10 to 23 inclusive be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

Part III The House of Representatives.

Clause 24. The house of representatives shall be composed of members directly chosen by the people of the several states, according to their respective numbers; as nearly as practicable there shall be two members of the house of representatives for every one member of the senate.

Until the parliament otherwise provides for the method of determining the number of members for each quota, there shall be one member for each quota of the people of the state, and the quota shall, whenever necessary, be ascertained by dividing the population of the commonwealth as shown by the latest statistics of the commonwealth by twice the number of the members of the senate, and the number of members to which each state is entitled shall be determined by dividing the population of the state as shown by the latest statistics of the commonwealth by the quota.

But each of the existing colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the province of South Australia, shall be entitled to five representatives at the least.

The CHAIRMAN:

The first suggestion is a suggestion by the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of Western Australia to insert after the word "numbers," in the first paragraph, the words "subject to the provisions of sub-section 3."

Amendment negatived.

The CHAIRMAN:

The next suggestion is to leave out all the words in the first paragraph after the word "numbers." The Legislative Assembly of Victoria and the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales each desire that these words be left out, and wish other words to be put in. The suggestions are substantially the same.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative, Assembly of New South Wales:

Lines 4 to 21, omit after "numbers" to the end of the next paragraph, in line 21, insert "and, until the Parliament of the commonwealth otherwise provides, each state shall have one representative for every thirty thousand of its people."
This is an important clause, inasmuch as it forms the basis for the election of the house of representatives, and if I recollect aright, the scheme was devised by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. O’Connor, at the Adelaide Convention. In the bill of 1891 we followed out the principle that, so far as the house of representatives was concerned, we should have one member for each 30,000 of the population in the state, and the only reason I could ever ascertain for this peculiar provision was that it might form the basis of the two houses meeting together afterwards to settle difficulties under what is termed the Norwegian system. This proposal is that as nearly as practicable there shall be two members of the house of representatives for every one member of the senate. There is no power to alter the fundamental principle which is laid down that at all times, as nearly as practicable, the number of members in the house of representatives shall be twice the number of the senators. I object to that, and I think there are many reasons why. First, I think where there is a house of representatives of the people, the people should have representation according to the numbers in the various states. I know of no reason why there should be any limit upon that, unless it be for the purpose of preventing the house of representatives becoming altogether unwieldy. The proposal in the first instance was that the numbers should be one for every 30,000. I, myself, suggested it should be one for 40,000 or 50,000; and I am perfectly satisfied that it should be one for 50,000; but, under the proposal, as it now stands, if we have a certain number say we have six states coming in—we then would have thirty-six members in the senate, and if we had a double number we should have seventy-two in the house of representatives. As certain states would not be entitled to the full number according to the population, and as the minimum for the existing states is defined for each, the number would be slightly over the seventy-two—I think seventy-six. Hon. members will see that the numbers of people in the various states will probably go on increasing in some colonies more rapidly than in others, and eventually it will happen that in Western Australia, and no doubt in Tasmania, they will arrive at a certain population which will entitle them to the minimum, and as soon as that happens the number will have to be reduced from the seventy-eight to seventy-two. As each colony comes to the minimum that will have to occur. The result of that will be that there will have to be a reduction in the number of members of some of the other colonies. We must not forget that the colonies have to be divided into electorates for the purpose of electing the representatives of this particular house; and experience, I think, will lead us to the conclusion that those electorates will be single electorates. Thus, whenever that event occurr, and the numbers of the people in either of the colonies increase so as to entitle them to their five members, then a redistribution will have to take place in all the other colonies. Some of them must lose a certain number of their members. Then, if we have Queensland with us, and if Queensland is divided at any time, or if by any other means the number of the senators be increased, that will necessitate a redistribution over the whole of Australia. I should like to hear from those who favour this peculiar provision, reasons which ought to induce us to accept it. I fail to see any. I think it is contrary to the principle on which the house of representatives should be based that is, that it is the house which, as contradistinguished from the senate, will represent the people in the various states as individuals. All I think we ought to do is to see that that house is so chosen as not to become unwieldy. If we limit the number to the fifty, each particular state, according to its population, will get its proper number, and as the statistics are taken, I suppose every ten years, the necessary variations will be made. But I think it will be very hard on any state which had been sending to the house of representatives, say, twenty members, to find that because some other states are entitled to an extra number they must reduce their number from twenty to seventeen or eighteen. That will create a great deal of dissatisfaction. Whilst the states will be perfectly satisfied to say "We will remain with the existing number," I fear they will not be satisfied if they find the number has to be reduced. In addition to that there will always be the trouble of redistributing the seats and the extra expense.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
If we have relatively smaller populations there must be relatively smaller representation too!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
If there is relatively smaller population, of course there will be relatively smaller representation. I have read the debates which have taken place on the matter, and I fail to see any justification whatever for adopting this very peculiar principle. I trust my hon. friend will be able to explain the reason of it, and then I, or some other representative who holds a view similar to my own, will be able to controvert them. At present, however, there is no justification that I know of for following any other practice than to say that in the house of the people the people shall be represented from the various colonies according to the number of people in those colonies.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[5.17]:
I hope the Committee will not adopt any such provision as would give the house of representatives for all time unless with an amendment in the constitution accompanied by the referendum a representation of one member to every 30,000 people. If population increase in anything like the same ratio as that which has been exhibited in recent years, such a provision would lead to an enormous and unwieldy house of representatives a house of representatives altogether too large for the requirements of the people. A table, upon which I cannot lay my hands at present, was prepared at the Adelaide Convention, which showed what rate of increase in population might be expected every decade for the next five decades and what would then be the numbers of the house of representatives. The result of that table was, I am quite sure, to open anybody's eyes to the fact that to fix a rigid number as the proportion by which the number of members of the house of representatives was to be gauged would lead to very serious consequences. We have two proposals before us from the parliaments of Victoria and New South Wales, and each of these proposals provides for 30,000 people until parliament otherwise provides. That was the provision in the bill of 1891, and it was deemed wise to prevent any possible danger arising from it by framing the clause in the way the hon. member, Mr. R.E. O'Connor, drafted it by providing for some automatic means of adjusting the quota, that is, the number of people to choose a representative. The clause, as it stands at present, does not by any means prevent legislation on the part of the commonwealth. As hon. members will see, the clause, after stating that the house of representatives should be composed of members directly chosen by the people of the states, according to the respective numbers, and that as nearly as practicable there should be two members of the house of representatives for every one

Until the parliament otherwise provides for the method of determining the number of members for each quota, there shall be one member for each quota of the people of the state, and the quota shall, whenever necessary, be ascertained by dividing the population of the commonwealth as shown by the latest statistics of the commonwealth by twice the number of the members of the senate, and the number of members to which each state is entitled shall be determined by dividing the population of the state as shown by the latest statistics of the commonwealth by the quota.

That also is only a provision that the quota principle shall be valid until parliament otherwise provides. But, inasmuch as parliament may not make any provision for a considerable number of years, there would, in the meantime, under the quota system, be a means of preventing any undue increase in the number of the members of either house. The provision would act automatically, and if parliament afterwards chose to make a fresh provision its hands would not be tied.

An Hon. MEMBER:

It could not alter the proportion of two to one!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

No. So far as that proportion is concerned, I have always regarded it as a very salutary one. The object of it is to provide, as I think it should be provided, that, on the one hand, any increase in the number of states, which might occur upon a particular contingency, should not take place without a corresponding alteration in the number of the house of representatives, and that, on the other hand, the disparity in numbers between the house of representatives and the senate should not at any time be too large. It was considered that there should be two members of the house of representatives to every member of the senate, and I think that this arrangement would prevent the house of representatives from being too nearly approached in numbers by the senate, and would prevent the senate from being confined to some small number, with the result of seriously diminishing its importance and its consequence in the eyes of the federation.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Why should the number in the house of representatives depend in any way upon the number of the states?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

That question was asked in Adelaide, and was dealt with there. The number in the house of representatives must depend upon the number of states, for two reasons: First, there must be an equal number of representatives from the states which originally contract, and the whole number is increased every time a state is added to the commonwealth. I take it that it is a fair thing to provide that there should be concurrent action in these questions as far as possible. If you do not make this provision, as I have just pointed out, you might have the senate approaching too nearly in numbers to the house of representatives and overshadowing it; while, on the other hand, you would have a provision whereby the senate would be kept at some such number as would enable its importance and dignity in the eyes of the community to be maintained. I take it that we do not wish to diminish the importance or dignity of either house of parliament, but to keep them in some relative proportion in every respect. The provision in the first part of the clause that the numbers of the two houses should be as two to one seems to me reasonable. As to the remaining part of the clause, I have now the figures I was just referring to. Taking the population at the end of 1895, upon the average rates of increase in the past, the result would be that with a member for every 50,000 of the population, you would start in 1897 with 71 members in the house of representatives; in 1901, four years later, there would be 98 members; in 1911, fourteen years later, 129 members; in 1921, twenty-four years later, 190 members; thirty-four years later, 283 members; and forty-four years later, 446 members.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Are those the figures which were used in Adelaide?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I do not think they are. They are the figures which were subsequently laid on the table by the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor. They seem rather familiar to me in one respect, and strange in another. They do not seem to hear out certain contentions of my hon. friend, Mr. Isaacs, about the dwindling importance of Victoria under the operation of this table.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Will not clause 28 get over the difficulty?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It may do so to a certain extent; but if you have a representation of one to every 50,000, you will have a house of nearly 450 members a little over forty years hence. I think it is desirable that, until Parliament takes this matter in hand, there should be some automatic provision which would regulate it. I believe that it would be a bad thing to start with an iron provision that there should be a representative to every 30,000 or to every 50,000 of the population. While I am perfectly content to trust the federal parliament in every matter, so far as it can possibly be done, we must acknowledge the contingency of the federal parliament preferring not to legislate; and we must therefore make a provision which will work automatically, as the quota provision will, in the absence of any provisions being made by the federal parliament, or in the event of the federal parliament being satisfied with it. This arrangement will always keep the number of the two houses from reaching an extent which, under the ordinary increase of population, would be disastrous and extravagant.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[5.27]:

I do not think there is any great principle involved in the fixing of the number of the house of representatives at twice the number of the senate. At the same time, it appears to me a very convenient plan for maintaining some balance between the two houses, and I can see no objection to it. The question that I understood the Right Hon. Sir George Turner to raise was:
Why should there not be representation in proportion to population right throughout the commonwealth? It seems to me that that is secured by the wording, of the bill as it stands. One proposal is that there shall be a representative for every 30,000 of the population, another that there shall be a representative for every 50,000 of the population. What the bill says is that there shall be a representative for every seventy-second part of the population.

An Hon. MEMBER:
A member sent from Victoria to the house of representatives will represent a larger number than a member sent from South Australia.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
No matter how the population increases, you cannot increase the number of representatives, unless you increase the number of the senate.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
As the clause stands, the exact proportion of members is maintained precisely as it would be under the one in 30,000 or the one in 50,000 plan. It is a very ingenious arrangement that there shall be one member for every seventy-second part of the population.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I object to the arrangement altogether, because it is based upon the Norwegian plan!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
That is immaterial. I am not contending for this scheme because it provides that the number of the house of representatives shall be double the number of the senate. Whether you keep or give up that principle, the idea of a quota is a good one, because it provides an automatic arrangement which adjusts itself from time to time, and will work on for a hundred years without the slightest difficulty, maintaining an equal proportion of representation throughout the commonwealth. There should be one member to every 30,000 of population say some; there should be one member to every 50,000 of the population say others; but the fairest arrangement is that there should be one member to every seventy-second part of the population. Does the hon. member see that?

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I agree that that is so. But no matter how the population increases the number of members in the house of representatives cannot be increased unless you increase the number of members in the senate. I object to that!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
There is no object in increasing the number of members. Suppose the population of all the states were increased at once, there would be no object in doubling the representation, so long as the proportion is maintained, and it is maintained by adopting a quota. If 60,000 people have a representative in one state, 60,000 people will have a representative in another state. If 40,000 people have a representative in one state, 40,000 people will have a representative in another state.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I admit that!

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
Well, is not that a fair arrangement. I think it is a very ingenious arrangement for an automatic adjustment of what it would otherwise be very difficult to adjust.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[5.30]:
I take it that what we have settled in this Convention is that the states are to be represented as states, independently of the number of people they contain, so far as the senate is concerned. That is the arrangement that has been arrived at by this Convention as a whole, and it is certainly claimed as a principle, if not as a right, by my hon. friends from the less populous states. Now, when we come to deal with the house of representatives, it is our turn to claim and insist, as I take it, that we shall have representation in that house on the basis of population, uninterfered with by the number of people in the states, and absolutely independent of the constitution of the senate. I object strongly to be tied up in the number of the house of representatives by whatever may be the number in the senate, and I think you can do no better than follow the American Constitution in this respect. That Constitution provides for all possible cases; and I will show this Convention, as I endeavoured to show in Adelaide, by most reliable authorities, as to the number of the American House of Representatives, that the constitution embraces all the necessary and proper provisions for keeping down the number of the House of Representatives to whatever number the people think right. When the American Constitution was framed the number of people under it was somewhat approximate to the present population of Australia.

Mr. GLYNN:
Two-thirds of our population!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I said approximate. The constitution provided that, in the first place, there should be one member of the house of representatives for about 30,000 of inhabitants.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
It was not to exceed that!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It was not to exceed that. What they did was this: They had one member for 33,000; then they increased the quota until, as the population increased, instead of there being one member for 33,000, there was one member for 173,000; so that, as the population increases, the number of the members of the house of representatives relatively decreases. What was done was this: The first House of Representatives consisted of 65 members, which was one for every 30,000 inhabitants. By the census of 1790 there were constituted 106 representatives-one for every 33,000 inhabitants. By that of 1810, 183 representatives-one for every 35,000 inhabitants. By that of 1820, 213 representatives-one for every 40,000 inhabitants. By that of 1830, 242 representatives-one for every 47,700 inhabitants. By that of 1840, 223 representatives-one for every 70,680 inhabitants. By the act of May 23, 1850, the number of representatives was increased to 233 members from the States, which was one for every 93,423 inhabitants.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

It required an act of Congress in each case

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

In each case. As I said before, and now wish to repeat, the people will take very good care that the number of the house of representatives is not unduly increased.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

That is not our experience!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It is a question of increasing the number, and what I say is that the people will take care that the number is not increased. I will read hon. members a passage and the matter is one of vital importance to Victoria, and no doubt also to New South Wales from the work of Dr. Woodrow Wilson, called "The State." He says:

Congress itself decides by law how many representatives there shall be; it then divides the number decided upon among the states according to population; after which each state is divided by its own legislature into as many districts as it is to have representatives, and the people of each of these districts are entitled to elect one member to the House. The only limitation put by the Constitution itself upon the number of representatives is that there shall never be more than one for every 30,000 inhabitants. The first House of Representatives had by direction of the Constitution itself sixty-five members, upon the proportion of one for every 33,000 inhabitants. The number has of course grown, and the proportion decreased with the growth of population. A census is taken every ten years, and the rule is to effect readjustments and a redistribution of representation after every census. At present there are 330 members in the House, and the states are given one member for every 154,325 of their inhabitants. In cases where a state has many thousands more than an even number of times that many inhabitants it is given an additional member to represent the balance.

Therefore, it is perfectly plain that every ten years the American people, through their congress, do constantly and regularly reduce the proportion of the number of their representatives in their legislature, and it is for public opinion to decide what the quota shall be in each particular instance. But if you are going to say that the house of representatives shall be always in the proportion of two to one in the senate, what will be the result? Unless you have an amendment of the constitution there will be this result: that no matter how the population grows in the future we shall have no more than seventy-two members in the house of representatives, because I take it that in a few years the minimum in the house of representatives for some of the less populous states would disappear. Even if there be subdivision you will have a fixed quota, and a good thing too. If you have the same proportion of members amid a growing population that is, two members to one member in the senate-you would have such immense constituencies that we should have great difficulty indeed in the future in inducing any but the most wealthy men to contest an election, and that is a very serious matter. Why should not the federal parliament in this and other respects be trusted? There is now a good opportunity for many of my hon. friends who have been loud in their adjurations that we should trust the federal parliament, to put into definite practice the precepts they seek to enforce. The American Constitution leaves the matter in the hands of Congress, and I would point out how important the matter is to the larger colonies. If you want to increase the number of representatives under the bill, as it stands, you must get the consent of the senate, and the senate may say, "We are not inclined, even if we were increased in number, to increase the number of the house of representatives." Thus you have an instant block. If, on the other hand, you say to the senate, "We want to reduce the proportional number of members of the house of representatives, and we want you as a senate to consent to that," the senate naturally would never refuse. It has never refused to do so in America, and that is how it is there is never any difficulty there. When there is any change in the proportion of representation in America, the request of the House of Representatives to the Senate is to reduce the number the House of Representatives would otherwise contain, and naturally the Senate will always agree to that. Now,
I do not know whether I ought to use the figures which have been produced today. I hardly think the leader of the Convention really intended to put them forward as reliable figures; but I have worked out some results from them which are rather startling.

Having done so I was told that I could not rely upon them, and when I was told that I thought the hon. member had dropped them.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I do not suppose you could rely upon the relative proportions, but they afford a fair index of what the gross population of Australia will be!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The gross population of Australia is put down in decennial periods, and it is only arrived at by an estimate in each colony.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

No one can forecast the way in which the Australian population will increase!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

If the figures are to be taken even approximately they lead to most surprising results. It is quite true, as the hon. members, Mr. Barton and Mr. Holder, put it, that, in one respect, the proportionate distribution of members amongst all the colonies, when once the total is arrived at, will be fair as between the colonies. But that is not the question. How will it affect the larger colonies? It means this: Victoria, in forty years from now—even if this table is only approximately correct—instead of having about 1,200,000, as she has now, will have about 4,000,000 people; and although she will have twenty-four members at the present time, she will only have thirty members in 1941.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The other colonies will have in proportion!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Quite so. But, according to this expected result, New South Wales will have just about the same number as she will have at the present time twenty-six or twenty-seven. What I should like to ask, as a matter of practical politics, is this: will Victoria stand being told "No matter if your population should increase by millions, in proportion your number of members must decrease"?

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR:

The same thing has taken place in America, according to the figures that the hon. and learned gentleman quoted!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No. Every state in America has grown in population; but they take very good care that the number of the members of the House of Representatives increases with very few exceptions, increases in accordance with the growth of the population, but they reduce the ratio; they reduce the quota; they take very good care that no state ever gets fewer members in the House of Representatives than it had before; some may get more, and I suppose that they nearly all get more, but not more inexact proportion to the growth of population, because the quota, is diminished. Therefore, that does not apply. What I think is that we should take this stand as a matter of principle in regard to the house of representatives. It is a house which, admittedly, is to be based on population.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:
With or without a limit would the hon. and learned member put any limit at all?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
The federal parliament will determine the limit. We say not more than 1 for 50,000; the federal parliament can make it 1 for 60,000, and at the next increase of population 1 for 70,000, and at length, when the population of Australia is many millions, it may say 1 for 100,000 or 1 for 200,000.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The great trouble is that the universal tendency of popular chambers is to increase the number of their members, instead of diminishing it to do so by express provision!

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I again return to the standing example of America. I say that there is a living proof that the quotas are increased and the numbers are kept within proper limits. I would simply repeat that to tie up the house of representatives a house literally based on population-to tie it up by a fixed and practically unalterable rule—a rule absolutely unalterable except by a process amending the constitution of the senate after we have had the principle of equal representation claimed on one side as a right, and given on the other side not as a right, but as a concession-after that conclusion has been arrived at, I say that it would be very bad policy indeed to say to the larger colonies, "We will tie your house of representatives hand and foot to the senate; although on the one hand we provide that the one house shall be independent of the other as far as equal representation is concerned, we shall insist on your house of representatives being limited in its number according to the number of members of the senate." I say that it would be bad policy on the part of the representatives of the smaller states, and I do ask that the house of representatives shall consist in numbers in proportion to the population of the commonwealth, and that that proportion shall be regulated by the wisdom of the federal parliament.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[5.56]:

I should like to ask the hon. and learned member, Mr. R.E. O'Connor, who is the father of the clause, to explain a matter which, to my mind, presents a very serious difficulty. As I understand the clause, there is to be one member for each quota; consequently if the population of any colony, say Western Australia, quadrupled its population, as is quite possible, within the next ten years, that would raise the representation in the house of Assembly from five to twenty

Mr. SYMON:

That depends on how many there are in the other colonies!

Mr. WISE:

Whatever may be intended, I do not think that this clause provides that. It says until the parliament otherwise provides, there shall be one member for each quota of the people.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER:

The quota would increase as time went on!

Mr. WISE:

You are dividing the population of the commonwealth by the number of the senate, and, therefore, when there is any increase of population in a state, that state will be entitled to a certain number of representatives in the house of assembly. I do not care what the exact number will be. What I desire to make plain is that, inasmuch as the increase of population is not the same throughout the continent, the effect will be that, where there is an increase of population in any one colony I care not which that colony cannot obtain its rights until we alter the whole system of relative representation of the whole of the other colonies in the senate. Take the case of New South Wales. If New South Wales increases in population so as to entitle her to increase of representation in the house of assembly, before she can get that increase of representation we shall have to increase the voting power of South Australia, Tasmania, and Western Australia in the senate.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Or take the numbers off the other colonies!

Mr. WISE:

That is what I am complaining of. There are two objections to the clause. It provides a balance between the members of the senate and of the house of assembly, and if that principle is to be adhered to it is impossible to give to any one colony that increased representation which the increase of its population will demand, unless you at the same time increase the voting power of all the other states in the senate. That is how it appears to me, and the question is, is there any reason why, before any one colony can get that increase of voting power in the house of assembly to which it is entitled, the other colonies shall receive an access of voting strength in the senate to which they are not entitled, either by reason of increase of population or anything else?

[The Chairman left the chair at 5.50 p.m. The Committee resumed at 7.30 p.m.]

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Before answering the simple, though somewhat pertinent, question of my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Wise, I think it would be well to lay before the Committee my views in answer to the speech of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs. I agree with him that this matter is a very important one, viewed not only from the standpoint of the larger states, but also from the standpoint of the constitution of the senate. Hon. members who described this as a cast-iron system, I think, have apprehended the extent to which the system is cast-iron in this constitution. If they will refer to the 24th clause, they will find that the only portion of the principle which is fixed in the constitution is that the house of representatives shall bear the proportion of double the number of members of the senate. That is the only portion of this system which is fixed in the constitution, and as to the mode of ascertaining the quota by which the representatives are to be kept to a number proportionate to the number of the senate, that is provided in this clause only until parliament otherwise determines, and it leaves the parliament to determine at some future time any other method, if any other

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Not to alter the proportion!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

What I am pointing out now and I think it necessary to clear the ground is that the only unalterable part of the system is that fixing the proportion between the number of members of the senate and the number of members in the house of representatives. That proportion being fixed unalterably in the constitution, a mode is provided by the 24th clause for ascertaining the quota of representatives in the house of representatives in order to maintain that proportion—but that is subject to alteration by the parliament of the commonwealth whenever it may think fit to take action.

An Hon. MEMBER:

That part is in the machinery!
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

It is in the machinery: So that it only comes back to this principle that I have indicated, that there shall be a certain proportion between the number of the senate and the number of the house of representatives. That brings one at once to the principle which, it appears to me, has justified the adoption of this system. If it were merely to arrive at some automatic way of keeping down the number of members of the house of representatives, it certainly would not be worth while, as there are other ways in which that might be done. The fact of its limiting the number of members of the house of representatives is incidental merely to the main object of the application of this principle, which is to keep up that relation between the number of the senate and the number of the house of representatives. On what ground does that stand? It stands on this ground, which, it appears to me, certainly ought to commend itself to everyone who wishes to see the senate an effective body in the legislature. Of course numbers are not always a guarantee of effectiveness or power in any legislative body, but if you have two bodies which are working co-relatively, and there is a tendency of the number in one body to become larger and larger every decade, and the other body to remain at a standstill, you get to a point to which from the mere smallness of its numbers, the house which contains the smaller number of members will necessarily lose in power and importance in the community. To give an illustration: Suppose, for instance, the number of the members of the house of representatives in the course of some thirty years grew to be about 250, and the number of members of the senate remained at 36.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Why should they?

I am giving an illustration now, and I will point out to hon. members by and by that it is an illustration that goes as far as the facts are likely to justify. I say take that position of things. It must be very obvious that a house which contained 250 persons, representing the inhabitants of the commonwealth as a whole, must occupy a stronger and more effective position in popular estimation than a house containing only 36 members, and representing the states themselves. In the deliberations of these two bodies there can be no question that the weight attached to the smaller house would be correspondingly less than when it bore a larger proportion to the more numerous house. It may be said that the Senate of the United States is an illustration to the contrary. The Senate of the United States remains the same, while the House of Representatives has been increased from time to time until now there is no doubt it bears a very large proportion to the numbers of the senate. But the case of the Senate of the United States is altogether different. That body has not only legislative functions, but also executive functions of a very important character, and it is those executive functions which in the main now lend to the senate the great importance and weight which it exercises in the legislature of the United States. We give our senate no such functions; it is merely a legislative body, and never can be anything more than a legislative body. Therefore, it appears to me that if we are really to keep up that power, and effectiveness in the senate that everyone admits it must have if it is to take the place assigned to it in this constitution, some method must be adopted by which a proportion in the number of these two, houses must be kept up.

I think it will readily be admitted even by the hon. members representing the larger colonies here, that having once given this right of equal representation—whether we give it as a concession, as some of us say, or whether we give it as a right, as some others claim, having once given it, having once constituted the senate upon that basis, having once given it certain powers, we ought to be very careful to frankly and honestly carry out that principle all through in our dealings with the senate. If it is to be a house, representing the states, and if it is to be made effective for certain purposes, we ought to be very careful that we leave no germ of inoperation in the constitution itself which will gradually sap the power and the vitality of that body.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

How?

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR:

I thought I made myself clear to the hon. member I say that if we once concede the principle of equal representation for the purpose of making the senate a body which shall represent equally all the states, if we once, give it certain powers which will make it an effective body, and as strong as such a body ought to be, we should take care that there is no principle in operation in the constitution which may detract from its strength; and I say that the gradual increase in numbers of the house of representatives which would go on if there was no proportion fixed, and no limit placed on the increase of the number of the members of the house of representatives, must gradually reduce the senate to a position of comparative inefficiency in regard to its weight in the community. I referred to an example just now, and in answer to an inquiry by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, I said: that it was a suggestion only, but, an example that I thought not very far from probable. I should like to say a word about the figures which my hon, and learned friend, Mr. Barton, referred to. These figures are based on actual results; but, taking them beyond the present time, they are, of course, necessarily only founded on supposition.

But they have been very carefully prepared by Mr. Garran, to whom I am indebted very much throughout in preparing this matter. These have been prepared by him on the basis of Mr. Coghlan's figures. They show an increase in the population of the different colonies, taking ten years' periods in the same proportion in which the population has increased during the last ten years, and comparing them with each other. I admit at once that figures of that kind are, not necessarily reliable to their fullest extent; they are only illustrations; but whether the illustrations, are exaggerated, or do not come up to the mark, they illustrate most conclusively that there must be a tendency, as population goes on, to greatly increase the number of members of the house of representatives, if there is no check put upon it to numbers which will very largely exceed, the numbers of the senate. I take this table, and hon. members may discount it—even freely, if they wish—the illustration still stands. In 1897, say that the total number in the house of representatives would be 71; in 1901, it would be 88; in the year 1911, the number of members would be 129.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Would that be according to the same proportion?
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
No; I am now taking the quota proposed by the hon. member that is, 50,000.
The Hon. J.H. HOWE:
According to the same quota?
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
If we have no means of checking the increase in the number of members of the house: of representatives if we simply fix in the constitution the principle that there should be one member for every 50,000 inhabitants I am showing what the number will be. I am going to show the result of what the hon. member proposes, supporting there was no limitation upon it. According to this return, in 1901 the number of members in the house of representatives would have increased from 71 in 1897 to 88 in 1901. In 1911 it would have increased to 129; in 1921 to 190; in 1931 to 283; in 1941 to 446.
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
What are these increases based upon?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

The increase of population is estimated and taken upon the periods just passed. They we taken from Coghlan's book on the seven colonies, where he gives the population for an average of ten years. Taking the same rate in proportion, the increase in the number of members in the house of representatives would be something like what I have stated. Make the largest discount you like for any error or exaggeration there may be in that estimate, it still shows that if there; were no method of stopping this increase, the number of members in the house of representatives would become very largely in, excess of the proportion which existed at the beginning of the constitution.

An Hon. MEMBER:

No one advocates that!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

I am quite aware that a suggestion has been made that the limitation should be left in the hands of the federal parliament. That brings me to the second portion of the reasons which, it appears to me, exist why this proposition, should be carried in its original form. I have said that the proportion should be kept up between the house of representatives and the senate. I have pointed out to what disparity we would be led if there is no system of checking the increase in the number of the house of representatives, My hon. friends opposite admit that there must be some method of stopping the increase in the house of representatives. They say there is no reason why the number of members in the house of representatives should not be fixed exactly as the house of representatives may think fit to fix them-that there should be no proportion-

Mr. HIGGINS:

Rather, as both houses fix it?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Of course, as the parliament joins in fixing it, which is practically the same thing. There can be no doubt that the same rule would apply in the dealings between the two houses as applies where a legislature consists of two houses that is to say, that such a question as an increase or a diminution in the number of members of the representative house is always held to be within the province of that house. I feel perfectly confident it is the experience of hon. members that, in all the houses of the Australian colonies, that principle is invariably followed, and that no upper house would dream of interfering seriously with the fixing of the number of members of the house of representatives.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It would interfere under the proposed constitution!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

If the hon. and learned member will not be impatient I will meet all his objections. For that reason, although I was, perhaps, inaccurate in using the term "legislature," it will be fixed by the house of representatives. I said that the number very largely must be fixed and controlled by the voice of the house of representatives for the time-being; so that my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, and myself, are brought at once to this issue: He admits that there must be some mode of controlling the increase in the house of representatives; but he says that that should be left to the parliament, and he ignores altogether the necessity for any such principle as that the proportion should be maintained between the senate and the house of representatives. I cannot understand any hon. member who wishes to see the senate maintain its efficiency, its power, its effectiveness in the commonwealth, refusing to support a proposition which will keep up a fair ratio between the number of members in the senate and the number of members in the house of representatives. I come now to another view of the matter which I think is no less important. One of the objections which are continually met with in the discussions in public on this system of federation is the fear of the expenditure which it may entail. There are many persons who look with a great deal of fear—of course, in many cases, with groundless fear—upon the extent to which the expenditure on the parliament may lead, and there are many persons to whom it will be a very strong recommendation if the federal constitution contains some provisions by which there will be a guarantee against any needless extravagance in the number of the members of the legislature. And remember, in dealing with the question of the number of members of the legislature, we are dealing with it on the same terms as those on which the parliaments have had to deal with these questions in years gone by. We are dealing now with a number of members, every one of whom will be paid a comparatively high salary—perhaps not a high salary for the services rendered, but a salary which, taken in the lump, means a very large item in the public expenditure every year. Therefore, in dealing with this matter, we must have regard to economy for the sake of our own finances, and also for the sake of the public fear that this federation will be conducted on extravagant lines. I am not one of those who say that in any essential matter where the expenditure of money is necessary we should consider such questions; but I submit that where we have a choice between a method which may lead to extravagance, and a method which will lead to economy, unless there is some strong reason to the contrary we should adopt that method which leads to economy. One of the strongest reasons in favour of the proposition which is put forward now is that it will result in automatically keeping down the expenditure on the parliamentary institutions of the commonwealth, and will put upon any government that wishes to increase that expenditure the onus of showing that such increase is absolutely necessary. The question has been asked by some hon. members why this matter has not been left to the parliament. They would do as has been done in America. The hon member read an extract from Woodrow Wilson, which seems to me to be instructive from two points of view. In the first place it shows that, whatever your system is, whether you have a quota of increase—whether it is a quota ascertained as the bill proposes to ascertain it, or whether it is a fixed quota of 30,000, as my hon. friend suggests—we must readjust matters every ten years. Every census we shall probably find that we shall have to make some readjustment, and I think the periods at all events the later periods my hon. friend quoted from Woodrow Wilson are nearly all ten year periods. Of course the population of the United States increased with enormous rapidity during that time. At the same time it was found necessary to make these revisions every ten years, and in the course of these revisions it is apparent large reductions in the amount of the quota have been made. On the question of economy, which is, of course, altogether apart from the question of principle, to which I have alluded already, we are met with this position: Is it safe considering our experience of these matters in the Australian colonies to leave the matter of the reduction of the members of the house of representatives to the parliament itself?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
    It is proposed to leave the whole financial question to the parliament!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
    What is the experience? I know our experience in New South Wales is and I think it is the experience of most of the other colonies that when once we get a house consisting of a certain number of members, whatever may be said to the contrary, there is necessarily operating a very large amount of vested interests, which continually prevent the question of the reduction of members of the house of representatives from being satisfactorily dealt with.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
    The amount provides not for the extension but for the reduction of the number!
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
There is no distinction!
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
There is the distinction!
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
No, there is not. The hon. member will allow me to point this out: that if the 50,000 quota goes on without check or hindrance, as long as that quota remains, the numbers will go on rapidly increasing.
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
That is an assumption!
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
I am not dealing with the hon. member's assumption. I am dealing with what the facts must be that is to say, that if this 50,000 is taken as the quota, until you pull it up and introduce another quota, the numbers will go on increasing. Therefore, we must come to a period at which we shall be obliged to interfere with the vested rights and interests which would entitle a constituency to more members on the increase in the number of population. Our experience in these colonies is, that it is a very difficult matter to reduce a house, and for the same reason it would be a difficult matter to reduce a quota. It may be said that, as population increases, there should be some way by which the number of members of the house of representatives may be increased proportionately. That is granted; but I should like to point out that the analogy of the increase of representatives in our assemblies would be a very, misleading one in this case, and for this reason: that where local interests are necessarily represented in a parliament, where the expenditure of money in localities is being continually dealt with, it is a hardship if those localities are not sufficiently represented by numbers in the house which inaugurates and controls that expenditure. That is admitted; but if we look at the functions of the house of representatives, I think we shall find that, as far as local interests are concerned, there is not anything like the same necessity for the representation of localities as there is in the houses of parliament of the different colonies. If you look down the list of subjects dealt with, it will be found that they are all subjects of general application. In few instances are they matters which deal with particular localities. Certainly none of them are matters that would require an increase in the number of members with anything like the same urgency as would be the case with our local houses of parliament. So that the same argument certainly, does not apply in regard to the increase of the members of the house of representatives as applies in the case of our local houses of parliament. This bill does not by any means fix a cast-iron limit upon the number of members of the house of representatives. The fullest power is given to increase the number of representatives. Exactly the same power is given to increase the number of members of the house of representatives as is given to deal with the house of representatives under the proposal of my hon. friend, Mr. Isaacs. But there is this condition attached to it: that you cannot increase the number of the house of representatives without also increasing the number of the senate.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Why should we have that provision? There is no principle in it!

Another Hon. MEMBER:
In clause 28 The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR: There is no necessity for me to repeat what I said before. I explained at the beginning of my speech that which I contended was the principle which should guide us.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
May I say this: that there is no principle in observing a precaution of this kind? If there is no reason why the senate should not be one half of the number of the house of representatives, then there is no principle against making the number of the senate exceed the number of the house of representatives.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
There is a provision, as I have said, for increasing the number of members of the house of representatives. Parliament has the freest possible hand in dealing with that question; but it must deal with it subject to what is a vital principle in the constitution of the senate, and that is that its numbers should not be unduly reduced.

Mr. SYMON:
Maintaining the proportion!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
As long as the proportion is maintained, that is the only limitation upon parliament in dealing with this question of increased representation. How do these two principles apply? Under the method proposed by my hon. friend, at every decennial period when, I suppose, the alteration would have to be made an increase would be made in the number of the members of the house of representatives. That increase would take place by increasing the quota and the distribution of the number of members through more or less electorates as the case might be. Under the proposal contained in the bill, when an increase took place, the only necessity existing in dealing with the matter would be to find out the number of members in the senate necessary to give the increase in the house of representatives, and making provision for that additional number. For instance, supposing you wished to get an increase of twelve members in the house of representatives you would have, if there were six states, to give an additional senator to each state. Having given that additional senator to each state, you could add twelve representatives to the house of representatives. That is a perfectly simple principle. What injustice would there be in that? I come now to a question put to me by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, upon this point. He said, "It comes to this, then, that before you could increase the number of members of the house of representatives, say in the case of a colony largely increased in numbers, you would be obliged to add to the number of senators all round. You might then give to the colony which had increased in numbers additional representation."

Mr. HIGGINS:
And increase the expense!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
You would increase the expense, there is no question whatever about that. But on that score, I think that a calculation will very easily show that the increased expenditure in dealing with the matter in that way would, probably, be nothing like the increased expenditure in dealing with it by the other method. What difficulty is there in dealing with the question in that way? It is said that it is an injustice. What injustice? Surely, if we are going to adhere to the principle of equal representation, whether conceded as a right or made as a concession, there is no reason, according to this constitution, why the number of members of the senate should not be increased. They do not represent localities; they, represent the state; and, if an increase takes place all round, what reason can there be to complain?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The house of representatives does not suffer from that!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
No, it does not. The house of representatives, where an increase is necessary by reason of an increase of population, gets the increase required: the increase in the number of members of the senate is fixed in proportion to the number, of members of the house of representatives, and these having been increased, there should be no complaint when each state gets an increase in the number of its senators.

Mr. HIGGINS:
What is the object of increasing the number of senators for each state?

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
If the hon. member thinks that that is a wrong principle, of course he will vote against this proposal.

Mr. HIGGINS:

There is no reason in increasing the number of members of the senate because of the increase in population!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

There is this reason: if you would secure by the, very terms of the constitution itself a certain proportion of representation in the senate to the representation in the house of representatives, you must fix it in some way that is unalterable. I admit that you may do it by providing that wherever there is an increase in the number of members of the house of representatives there must, be a corresponding increase in the number of members of the senate, and you may leave it to the parliament to decide what that increase shall be. But surely this is exactly the same thing, only you provide for it in an automatic way instead of leaving it for the consideration of parliament. I have been also asked by an hon. member whether this difficulty might not arise that wherever an increase has to be made in the number of the members of the house of representatives under this system there must be a redistribution of seats. That must take place in any case. That must take place in the case of your 50,000 quota; in the case of your 50,000 quota, if at the end of the ten years period you find that there must be some alteration that more members are necessary-then, inasmuch as you have to fit, say, an additional ten members into the same space, you must make a redistribution of the seats. It must be done whichever way you carry it out; whether you adopt the 50,000, or whether the quota is to be ascertained in the way provided for by the bill, you must have a redistribution whenever you make an alteration in the numbers.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

I will come to that by-and-by. I am dealing now with the redistribution, and I say that whether you have the system provided for in the bill, or the 50,000 quota, you must have the same difficulty in redistributing the seats.

Mr. SYMON:

In some form or other!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Yes, however you fix the quota. The right hon. member, Sir George Turner, asks me how I deal with the difficulty as to the decrease in the number of members of the house of representatives? If we are to adopt the principle of proportionate representation, which I presume is the principle embedded in the constitution of the house of representatives, surely no colony can complain if, because its population diminishes, its representation diminishes proportionately.

Mr. WISE:
They will complain all the same!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
The population will be increased and the number of members decreased!

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR:
With all respect to the hon. and learned member I say the quota is fixed, and however you fix it, if that quota is decided by the population, there must be the same relative proportion between the representation and the population, and this is provided for in the bill at the beginning.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Can the hon. and learned member tell us by his figures what the quota will be forty years' hence?

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR:
I have not made a calculation.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I can tell you; it will be 310,000!

The Hon. R.E. O’CONNOR:
As I pointed out before, if there is any other way in which you can arrive at this quota more justly, it is open to the parliament to deal with it at the end of forty years. We are dealing with the matter now on the same principle which it appears to me will be sufficient to enable us to deal with the question at any period, whether it is forty or fifty years hence. It comes back to this: that if you have proportionate representation, then the hon. member's complaint must fall to the ground, because the quota fixes the number of the house, and the quota will be in accordance with the population. In regard to redistribution, exactly the same consequences follow, whether you adopt this method or some other method of ascertaining the quota. I have thought it necessary to occupy some little time in explaining the matter, because it appears to me that if the thing is really understood there is no difficulty in the working of the system, and there are no objections in regard to the inconvenience of its working which apply to this more than to any other system of dealing with the increase in the number of members in the house of representatives; and it has this to recommend it: that by the automatic working of this provision it enforces economy in the administration of our parliamentary expenditure, and it secures in the constitution itself one of the highest guarantees for the ability, power, and effectiveness of the senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales)[8.8]:
At first when the hon. and learned member proposed this mode of dealing with this matter I was rather inclined to favour it, but after a certain amount of reflection I am inclined to believe that it bristles with difficulties. The best thing is to analyse exactly the characteristics of representation in the senate and the representation of the house of representatives. As far as the senate is concerned it matters very little whether you have two, four, six, or eight. It represents the state, as I think the hon. and learned member, Dr. Quick, said, in its corporate capacity; but the object of representation in the house of representatives is to ascertain the actual opinion of the people of the country. That may be got at by a variety of ways. It is possible that in some instances it could not be got at by constituencies of 50,000, 60,000, 70,000, or 100,000 people, and after all what we want to get in that great popular house is, the representation of all interests combined. It seems to me that we have to look very far ahead in considering a question like this. I can imagine a case of this kind. We will take for granted that the population of this colony has grown to 10,000,000. We will even take it for granted that the states have been doubled in number. That is to say, that there are twelve states instead of six, including Queensland, of course. That would give seventy-two members for the senate. But it does not follow that, because seventy-two would be a fair representation for the senate, 150 with 10,000,000 of people would be a fair representation in the house of assembly. You must recollect, as I said, that what you want is to get at the real opinion of the country. You might find that by these large overgrown electorates it would be impossible to get by popular vote the real opinion of the country. After a certain amount of reflection on this matter, I have come to the conclusion that there is absolutely no analogy between the representation of the senate and the representation of the house of assembly, and as on another matter to which we referred to-day, I fear that the introduction of any rigid system affecting matters in the future which nobody can foresee may lead to incalculable trouble. Therefore, it seems to me that it would be better to adopt a system which would leave in the hands of the federal parliament the arrangement of this matter in the years to come. Let us take the case of the United States of America, and see the principle upon which they act. I take it that, when there were 20,000,000 of people in that country, they took for granted that a certain number of men was a fair quota for the representation of that population; when they got to 40,000,000 of population, they considered that a larger member was a fair quota, and so on, until at the present time I think the representation is about 350 representatives for 70,000,000 of people. There you have an elastic system, by which you can use common-sense, and you can bring commonsense to bear upon your arrangements. But I can conceive that, in this country, you might want a large assembly when, practically, a small senate would be sufficient for all purposes. I quite realise the argument that, if you do not have a fair proportion between the senate and the house of representatives, you may, to a certain extent, lower the dignity of the senate. But on the other hand you cannot increase or determine the number of members of the house of representatives without the consent of the senate, and the senate can very well take care of its own dignity. As the number of the house of representatives is increased, the senate will say, "If you want to increase the number beyond a certain limit, you must increase our numbers so as to be commensurate as a matter of dignity." What I object to distinctly is this hard and fast principle, which may become outrun by the conditions of the future. I can imagine, to put it in an extreme way, that the population of this country might reach 70,000,000, which is the population of the United States of America at the present time. Would anybody attempt to say that under those conditions you would have to maintain exactly a ratio of two to one between the senate and the house of representatives?

Mr. Wise:

There would be one representative to every million of people in that case!

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It would be absolutely impossible to carry out representative government for that popular branch of the legislature, as we understand representative government. I quite agree that it is a good thing to put some check upon any inordinate number in the house of representatives; but I think it is a mistake, while trying to secure that principle, to bring in an automatic rule which may lead to great trouble in the future. Therefore, although I was at first inclined to favour the provision proposed by the hon. member, I can see that in the growth of these colonies, and under the various conditions of the future, it might lead to a great amount of trouble. It would be better to fix the quota now at what is reasonable under present circumstances, and leave it to the good sense of the federal parliament, which will have the check of the senate upon its deliberations, to deal finally with the matter. Furthermore, as a practical matter it would be very much against the feeling and the sense of these different states to find the continual process of reduction going on which this hard and fast rule might bring about. You might have a certain state having continually to reduce the number of its representatives, and that would be a very sore point with such state.
Therefore, it seems to me that what we have to do now is to fix what in the present circumstances is a fair proportion between the two houses, and leave it to the federal parliament in the future to decide what shall be the numerical strength of each house when the time comes.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[8.15]:

I fear very much any appeal which is made to secure the greater effectiveness of the senate, because an appeal of that character is very likely to carry with it the support of those who, during the whole of the proceedings of this Convention, have shown themselves anxious to secure the effectiveness of the senate at any price. At various stages of our proceedings my hon. and learned friend, Mr. O'Connor, and others, have advocated the adoption of the compromise which originated in the year 1891, by which equal representation in the senate, and various other provisions which have been embodied in the draft bill framed in Adelaide were conceded; but with an addition which has tended rather to strengthen the advocates of equal state rights, while the provision which the hon. and learned member has inserted has derogated from the dignity and detracted from the efficiency of the house of representatives. Therefore, when we are asked to abide by the compromise arrived at years ago, it is just as well to ask the representatives of the smaller states to stand by the bill which was drafted in 1891. That is practically the proposal of the Victorian and the New South Wales legislatures. In the New South Wales legislature there was not a solitary advocate of these quota provisions. There was not even a call for a division upon the question. With wonderful unanimity these provisions were negatived. First of all, the hon. and learned member says that the quota will result in economy; next, that it will result in greater efficiency; and lastly, that it will be difficult without some automatic arrangement of the kind to get parliament to alter its representation. In the first place, the hon. and learned member knows, and he has well pointed out, that the one drastic provision of this clause is that which provides that the house of representatives shall, as nearly as possible, contain twice the number of members forming the senate; a hard and fast rule which parliament itself cannot alter, and which, if it is found to be irksome, can only be altered by the cumbersome machinery which has to be set in motion to secure an amendment of the constitution. Let us consider how this rule would work out practically. Under the enabling act federation may, be accomplished if the legislatures of three states, the people of which have approved of the draft bill present their addresses to the Queen. Suppose that the three colonies federating are New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, whose united population would be more than three-fourths of the total population of Australia. They would begin their national career with eighteen senators and a house of representatives composed of thirty-six members. Common sense shows that a number so small as that would create the belief in the minds of the people that the reins of government were falling into the hands of a clique.

The Hon. S. FRASER:

The proportionate representation would be greater than that in the United Kingdom now!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

I believe that there is safety in numbers, especially in matters of government. You may fix the limit so small as to lose the security which comes from numbers; though, on the other hand, I am quite open to conviction on the point that you may have so many as to make the machinery costly and unworkable. I will now put another point to my hon. and learned friend. I dare say he has not contemplated an aspect of the case which was vividly portrayed in the New South Wales Assembly. After the commonwealth is established with this small number of senators and members of the house of representatives, Queensland may be subdivided and come in as three states. That would mean the addition of eighteen senators, and thirty-six members of the house of representatives to the federal parliament. The population of New South Wales may not have increased 1 per cent., or that of Victoria may not have increased 1 per cent, not they would be entitled to add to their representation between them probably about twenty additional members in the house of representatives. This automatic arrangement will give increased representation to colonies already properly represented, because another colony comes into the federation and increases the number of the senate.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Without any regard to the increase of population at all?

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

Yes; it ignores all reasonable representation. Can anyone say that states can be governed by a simple rule of mathematics? Are you to have a rule in proportion or some other rule in division coming in, governing the powers of the states, and adding to the representation of a colony, which is, perhaps, already quite satisfied with its representation, a large number of representatives, because some colony hundreds of miles away has chosen to join your federation? More than that, besides introducing this anomaly which I have already pointed out, you at once cause a necessity for a readjustment of your whole electoral system in order to comply with the terms of the constitution, or else you must be prepared to persist under an illegality. We know very well how people complain of the doings of moribund parliaments. How much more rightly will they complain of a parliament which does not act according to its constitution? Therefore I take it that there will be a necessity immediately after more states join, to dissolve parliament, and have a readjustment of the constitution. It is possible none of these rules or principles will satisfactorily govern the representation of the people; and more than that, they are apt to produce anomalies of a most glaring character. Now I come back to the point about cheapness. I hope my hon. friend will not complain if I say there are many parts of the bill respecting which he is not so strong an advocate of cheapness. Where it is necessary to have a strong bench and a number of judges, the argument of cheapness is not to apply. Here, where we have the question of the representation in the senate involved, the people, on the point of economy, are not to be trusted. They have to pay for their members, and the proposal of the local legislature is simply that the number of representatives shall be so many for 50,000 people. Surely the people can be trusted to govern themselves in this way. If they find the cost of the machinery is too much, they will put the question to the candidates on the hustings whether they are in favour of continuing this. The people have in their own hands the reform of the representation. They can be trusted to see that a reform will be carried out. I am a sufficient believer in federation to be prepared to trust the people, especially in a small matter of this character, and especially when there is this incentive to action on their own part, that they will feel the necessity of a change in their pockets. That is the best argument to impel people towards reform. I am not so anxious as the hon. member to have this effective senate. I would remind him of the words he used thrice in his speech that we had conceded the principle of equal representation of the states in the senate. He rightly directed our attention to that in a speech which I admired very much. This afternoon the hon. member was loud in his declaration that we, having conceded this to the existing colonies, were not prepared to concede it to new States; but the hon. member here based his remarks on the assumption that we are going to concede equal representation to the new states which will come in. The hon. member's arguments tonight are based, according to his own expression, on conceding this principle of equal representation. But he knows that he is only conceding that to existing states, yet these quota provisions are applicable to senators who come from all states, and they will not come from the concession of the principle of equal representation, because a number of them will be there on such representation as parliament may concede to them, no more and no less. I hope that this Convention will agree to revert to the provision in the draft bill of 1891. I can assure hon. members that in this colony the people will find, and will give evidence, that they are finding it rather difficult to swallow the constitution as we are proposing it. Add no greater difficulties than may be necessary. I take it that the more you diminish the power of that house in which the people are predominant, the more distasteful you will make the constitution to them. Having secured your point with regard to equal representation in the senate, I think it is only fair, unless there is any great principle of a vital character which was not apparent in 1891, to allow us to revert to the compromise of 1891 in this respect, and secure the dignity and effectiveness of the house of representatives.

Mr. Clarke (Tasmania)[8.27]:

The hon. member, Mr. McMillan, said and I am very sorry indeed that the smaller states should lose his advocacy on this occasion—that there was no principle involved, and that there was no reason why there should be a proportion between the number of members in the senate and the number of members in the house of representatives. I believe my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, has interjected somewhat to the same effect. I well remember when we were sitting on the Judiciary Committee that my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins—

An Hon. MEMBER:

Do not tell tales out of school!

Mr. Clarke:

As I do not want to tell any tales out of school, I will not mention the name of Mr. Higgins. I do not want to nail any one's ears to the pump.

An Hon. MEMBER: Anyone can tell that the hon. member is an Irishman!

Mr. Clarke:

I well remember that a number of hon. members on that committee urged with reference to the constitution of the judiciary that the federal high court ought to be stronger than any high court in any of the colonies for the purpose of preserving its strength and its prestige, and that principle had the thorough support of my hon. friend, Mr. Peacock. If there is any principle involved here, if there is any virtue in keeping up the prestige and the strength of such a body, I think if you grant the right of an equal representation of the existing states in the Senate, we ought to preserve the prestige and the strength of the senate, and we cannot do that if, after laying down that each state shall be entitled to six members in the senate, the house of representatives shall increase from time to time according as the population may increase without any regard whatever to the number of members in the senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
You cannot do that without the consent of the senate!

Mr. CLARKE:
I beg my hon. friend's pardon. If we insert the amendment which is suggested by some hon. members there will be one member in the house of representatives for every 50,000 of the population, and it will not require the consent of the senate to an increase of the number from time to time.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Mr. CLARKE:
I do not think so. I think that if we set out in this constitution that every 50,000 people in the commonwealth are entitled to one representative, it will not require the consent of the senate to increase the number of members of that house. The number will depend simply on the population.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
It is only to an alteration of that principle that you require the consent of the senate!

Mr. CLARKE:
It is only to an alteration of that principle that you will require the consent of the senate. If there is any principle involved in the relative strength of any high court in the colonies and the federal high court, the very same principle is involved in preserving some proportion between the number of members in the senate and the number of members in the house of representatives. If the senate is a very small body, and the house of representatives is a very large body, in my humble opinion, the senate will be overawed by the house of representatives, and I think we ought to avoid that as much as possible. My hon. friend, Mr. Isaacs, said that we ought to make the representation in the house of representatives according to population. We do that if we follow the principle of the quota that has been suggested by the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor. I assent entirely to the principle he has suggested, and I think the Committee ought to be thankful to him for discovering it. I would like to suggest to my hon. friends from Victoria that they ought to go down on their knees and bless the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, for discovering this principle; because, if we accept the figures which were placed before us in Adelaide as in any way accurate—we can accept them at all events as prophecies the colony of Victoria according to the quota supplied by the hon. member, Mr.
O'Connor will descend from twenty-two members in 1901 to thirteen members in 1911.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I pointed that out!

Mr. CLARKE:

I should like to point out that if the same ratio continues, in another fifty years Victoria will be one of the small colonies, and it will then be thankful to the delegates of Tasmania and South Australia for securing for them the principle of equal representation in the senate, and a minimum of five in the house of representatives.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
I suppose that is an argument to get the consent of the Victorian people to this extraordinary scheme!

Mr. CLARKE:

It is a very fair scheme. Unfortunately I was not in the Chamber when the hon. members, Mr. Barton and Mr. Isaacs, delivered their speeches; therefore I am unable to say whether I am mentioning anything new; but I have gone to the trouble of working out the figures, and I find that Queensland according to what has been stated in the papers which accompany the suggestions of the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor will rise from eleven members in 1901 to twenty-four members in 1941; South Australia will have seven members in 1901; and, according to the same arithmetic, she will be entitled to two members in 1941, but she would then get the minimum of five. Western Australia would be entitled, according to arithmetic, to three members in 1901, and in 1941 she would be justly entitled to the minimum. Tasmania will descend in the same way as Victoria and South Australia; but she will be always entitled to the minimum, and that is a satisfaction.

The Hon. A.J. PEACOCK:
If the hon. member keeps on much longer, he will find that there will be no representatives in the house of representatives at all!

Mr. CLARKE:

No; if my hon. friend takes the trouble of reading the section, he will find that, according to the proposal of the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, the number of members in the house of representatives is to be always about the same, namely it is to be, as nearly as practicable, double the number in the senate. It will remain the same so long as the number of states remains the same. That is the principle, and I think it is a great principle. I should like to ask the Attorney-General of Victoria this question: In case Victoria, according to population, is entitled to thirteen members in 1941 out of a house of seventy-two, why should she ask for more?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

She does not, if you restrict the whole number to seventy-two; but what we say is, that 310,000 persons to one member is too ridiculous a quota!

Mr. CLARKE:

Then the hon. gentleman objects to the quota being an automatic one.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Certainly!

Mr. CLARKE:

The strong argument of the Premier of Victoria was, that there was great trouble and inconvenience in inducing the parliaments to reduce the number of representatives. I think he will get over that difficulty if he will adopt the suggestion of the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor; because, if that suggestion is adopted, the quota is arrived at in a mathematical way, and the federal parliament ascertains for the various colonies the number of members to which each colony is entitled. It would be much easier for each colony to apportion its districts when it is informed how many members it is to have than it would be for the federal parliament to reduce the number of its own members. But, if Victoria is entitled to thirteen members, I do not see why she should wish to have that number continually increasing. If the numbers are continually increasing, I would point out this: that, if the members of the Senate and of the house of representatives are paid £400 a year each, the increase will amount to a very large sum in the course of a few years.

An HON MEMBER: The federal parliament will take care of that!

Mr. CLARKE:

My hon. friend from Victoria suggests that we should leave it to the federal parliament. If there is any force in the objection of my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs, that the representation of Victoria should increase instead of diminish, it can be got over by section 28, which allows the federal parliament to increase the number of the house of representatives under the condition that the senate must also be proportionately enlarged. If we leave the matter to the federal parliament, it will create a great necessity for the referendum for the purpose of getting over deadlocks. If you adopt the idea of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, and leave the fixing of the quota to the federal parliament, you may have the house of representatives wanting a larger number than that to which the senate thinks it is entitled. The senate, of course, may not agree, and such a state of affairs would be continually leading to deadlocks. Now, we do not want deadlocks from time to time. We want to overcome the possibility of the creation of deadlocks in this matter, and, for these reasons, I think we ought to adopt the automatic Principle discovered by my hon. friend, Mr. O'Connor, because it will give to the various colonies, from time to time, the number of members to which they are entitled according to their population. Now, my hon. friend, Mr. Wise, asked a question. He said, "Supposing the population of New South Wales is so much, and that the quota is so much, she would be entitled to a particular number of members; but, if her population increases to the extent of doubling, she would be entitled to double the number of members." That is not so; because the number to which any colony is entitled can only increase in one contingency - that is, the contingency of that particular colony increasing in population at a larger rate than the average of the rest of the colonies. If the various colonies start out in 1901, and if they travel at the same rate, they will be entitled always to the same number of members as they began with. But if one colony increases at a greater rate than the average of the rest of the colonies, she will be entitled to a greater number of members proportionately than are the other colonies - that is to say, while the total number of members continues the same, the more progressive colony gets more representatives as her increase of population out distances the average of the rest. And I think that is a good principle, because the matter of money is a very important thing to the smaller colonies. I know that it is a very important thing to Tasmania. I know that Tasmania would feel indisposed to favour the payment of £400 a year to a large number of representatives. We want to keep the number within bounds; and I think that both the smaller and the larger colonies ought to endeavour to do so. I entirely dissent from the suggestion that we should return to the proposal of the bill of 1891; because, according to that bill, the house of representatives would be entitled to a number of members equivalent to one for each quota of the population that is to say, one for each 30,000 people; the number of the house of representatives would increase according to the population. Under that arrangement, the senate, instead of being a powerful body commanding the respect of Australia, would be treated to the scorn of members of the house of representatives whenever it suited that house to create a conflict between the two houses. For these reasons, I think we ought to have some ratio between the number of members in the two houses, and that the suggestion made by the hon. member, Mr. O'Connor, and which commended itself to the Convention in Adelaide, should be adopted now.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid (New South Wales)[8.40]:

I must say that it is rather discouraging to sit and listen for a number of hours to a debate upon this matter, feeling that the atmosphere is becoming more dense as each hour proceeds. With very great respect, it seems to me that the matter is one which might have been disposed of in a much shorter time.

My able friend, Mr. O'Connor, convinced me of the unsoundness of his proposition by the length of time that he took to vindicate it. I know from experience of my hon. and learned friend that when he has a good case, no man can put it in fewer words, or in a shorter space of time than he can. When I found him speaking half an hour on this matter, I looked into it more carefully than I otherwise would have done, and it seems to me that we had better at once get rid of the fallacy that the influence of a house depends upon the number of its members. That is the fallacy which has been running through the whole of this debate in support of this particular proposition of the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor. It seems to me that so long as the powers are valid, so long as you have great powers, the fewer the number of persons who exercise them, the greater power those persons will have. I often think that the despotism of Europe would become infinitely milder if it were administered by twelve despots conjointly instead of by one. The force in politics, it seems to me, is not according to numbers. At the polls it is; but in a deliberative assembly, I often think that the more powerful body is that body which, having powers, has the smaller number of men to fritter them away. Take the Senate of the United States. It is based upon an immovable number-two to each state. That has existed from the foundation of the United States, although the population has grown from 2,000,000, 3,000,000, or 5,000,000 to 76,000,000 of human beings. The House of Representatives now numbers 357 members, as against the 90 members of the Senate, and yet there is no more powerful house in the world than the Senate of the United States.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
It is a permanent executive!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
But surely it has other aspects besides that. That is a very limited view to meet one with on the present occasion. Its power as a legislative body is infinitely stronger than the power of the house of representatives, owing to the circumstances that it is more easily managed. At any rate, I suppose that the senate of the Australian federation will be entirely satisfied if, as a legislative body, it commands as much power in the federation as the United States Senate has. Let us get rid entirely of the fallacy which I have mentioned. I know that in Adelaide I attached so little importance to the question of numbers that I proposed that the number of representatives should be only sixty, one to every 60,000 of the population, whilst the number of senators should be thirty-six.

The Hon. E. Barton:

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

No. In my address at Adelaide I pointed out that I would be content with a house of representatives consisting of one member to every 60,000 of the population. I named the number that would give us a house of sixty members, taking Queensland in, while the senate would have thirty-six members; and I am sure the Committee will gather from that circumstance the fact I am perfectly sincere in what I am saying that I do not attach the slightest weight to numbers as affecting the power of a deliberative body. I attach the significance to the powers it is capable of wielding, and I think hon. members will see, first of all, that their anxiety as to the senate should be shown by their anxiety as to the powers of the senate, and that this question as to how the number of the senate should compare with the number of members of the house of representatives, is, in the light of history and the facts of history, almost childish. The great inconvenience of the provision which we have in the bill before us is that it was really intended to meet a certain contrivance which has not been put in the constitution.

The Hon. R.E. O'connor:

No!

The Right Hon. Sir G. Turner:

Yes!

[P.445] starts here

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Well, the suggestion comes from the same source.

The Hon. R.E. O'connor:

There is no such object in it!

Mr. Wise:

It has assumed altogether a new significance this evening!

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

All I can say is, that my hon. and learned friend and at the time I thought very wisely-looked to a possible solution in the meeting together of the two houses, and that went the round of the Convention as one of the possible solutions; and I think I am correct in saying that if, at the time these words were proposed, it had been clearly seen that that method would be entirely discarded, the weight of this proposition would have been very much less than it was. Now we have to look upon the matter quite free from any suggestion of the meeting of the two houses, and it must be seen at once that the basis of the two houses is essentially distinct. What is the basis of state representation? Not representation of locality in the state, but the joint representation by six men of the whole state, and the national interests of the whole state. But the basis of the lower house is a widely different one.
It is a national house, and it is a house in which locality has to be considered, and it is deliberately considered by the arrangement of the electorates. Take the arrangement suggested, whether it is 30,000, 40,000, or 50,000, it is essentially a basis of locality, and in no sense similar to that of the senate. Then comes the only other remark which I wish to make.
Whatever our system may be, surely it should be one of a simple character-one which is not complicated by considerations which should not weigh.
Suppose, for instance, that in the process of time the number of senators increased from six to twelve, immediately there must be an adjustment of the basis of representation in the lower house, without the slightest rhyme or reason. Why should we complicate this matter, which has given rise to a variety of difficulties in some other countries, by endeavouring to make out a sort of relationship between the numbers of persons in the two houses? I submit that the basis in both cases is essentially different that we complicate the constitution very much by this and the succeeding clauses, and that we should do well to adopt the proposed amendment, which comes from this colony of New South Wales. To begin with, say, 30,000, the federal parliament having power to alter that basis.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Why 30,000?
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I take the amendment as I see it. I am prepared to accept any other number. I do not attach any great importance to the number. I believe that the lower house would be a stronger house if it contained twenty members than it would be if it contained 100, because it would bang more closely together. However, I do not wish to digress into a long speech on the matter. I wish to point out that I do not care what the number of members of the house of representatives is so long as it is a reasonably efficient number. Remember that the federal parliament in the proposed amendment will have absolute power to adjust this thing afterwards. If any alteration is proposed that is unfair, the senate may be left to look after that when the time comes. I object strongly to putting these words in the Constitution, because we are doing a thing in cast-iron which it might be expedient afterwards to alter. The other proposal recommends itself to me because the ratio will begin, just as we like to make it, on some basis of reason and equity, and the matter will be left in such a state that it can be altered by the federal parliament if an alteration is thought necessary.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[8.50]:

I was very pleased to hear the speech of my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, because I think we are fighting over a matter of difference which is of very little consequence. If my right hon. friend would make a proposal such as he referred to in the Adelaide Convention, to make the ratio one member to 60,000, I would not be indisposed to support him; but I am going to support the bill as it stands, because the alternative to follow the rejection of the words in the clause would be the insertion of the proportion of 1 to 30,000.

An Hon. MEMBER:

1 to 50,000!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I propose to ask permission to alter the 30,000 to 50,000!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I will support 50,000!

Mr. WISE:

So will I!

Mr. GLYNN:

I intend to make a suggestion myself as to what the proportion should be. I have run out a few figures with the object of reducing the house of representatives to a reasonable number of members, and to keep up what ought to be the proportion which should exist. A good deal has been said about the difficulty of toning down this ratio of 1 to 30,000 to start with. There were exceptional reasons in the case of America for making rapid changes in the quota. There was an exceedingly rapid increase in the population for the first thirty or thirty-five years; and when once they did adopt the principle of having a recasting of the quota every ten years, they adhered to it; but without such a rapid increase of population in Australia we shall find it more difficult to change the ratio from 1 to 30,000 to 1 to 60,000 than they did in America. If we stick to the ratio of 1 to 30,000, the position will be this: They started in America with a ratio of 1 to 30,000; there were then thirteen states with a population of 2,000,000; if the change had not been made, those thirteen states, which have now a population of 24,000,000, would be entitled in the house of representatives to 800 members.
Mr. HIGGINS:
The Hon. gentleman will find that when they started in America they had a population of 3,500,000!

Mr. GLYNN:
Not the thirteen states, However, the position will be this, as far as the ratio is concerned: that if an alteration had not been made, those thirteen states in America would now have in the House of Representatives 800 members; whereas for the whole of the 63,000,000 of population there is only a representation of 329 members, according to the latest statistics. If you took the population of Australia in 1894, keeping this ratio up, you would have a numb

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Mr. GLYNN:
You cannot possibly get anything that would determine it with mathematical accuracy.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
You are taking a larger representation!

Mr. GLYNN:
No doubt. That is my intention. You do not, even under the constitution, carry out the ratio of population with the strictest accuracy. You find in some of the other colonies—for instance, in South Australia that in some electorates 2,000 people return two members, while in others 15,000 people return only the same number of members. Under federation or pure consolidation you cannot carry out any absolute strictness of principle in regard to representation.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
But having equal representation in the senate why should you work up to equal representation in the house of representatives?

Mr. GLYNN:
It would not work up in that way. According to all reasonable probabilities, any large increase would take place in Victoria and New South Wales. South Australia has a large area of territory, but a small population, and, with the exception of 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 acres, the greater part of her land is pastoral country; so that there is a very small chance of a large increase of population in South Australia, and, with a few qualifications, the same thing might be said of Tasmania. The resources of New South Wales and Victoria, however, are boundless; they will respond with far greater rapidity to the call of human industry, and there is not the slightest doubt that they will be able to support a very large population. In the case of Western Australia you must measure its possibilities, not by its mineral resources, but by its general agricultural and pastoral resources. If there were any likelihood of the Convention adopting the amendment, I would vote for the insertion of the words; but otherwise I will vote for the bill as it stands.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[8.56]:

This matter has assumed, to me at all events, a different significance from that which it had when we were at Adelaide. I am not going to enter into the arithmetical argument used in favour of the amendment; but I will make an appeal to the Committee. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, has asked us, as a matter of practical politics, to reject the proposal which stands in the bill. I indorse that recommendation, and, as a representative of another colony, would, in the strongest possible manner, urge it upon the members of the Committee. We have had figures put before the public of Australia which, be they right or wrong and I believe they are wrong will be accepted by the enemies of federation as expressive of the truth. These figures and they come, I believe, from New South Wales show, or purport to show, that in a very short time, in the lifetime of many now living, the representation of Victoria, if the proposal in the bill be adopted, would be reduced from twenty-six to thirteen members. I ask hon. members who are in the habit of dealing with representative bodies whether they could go back and ask their people to accept a proposal which, whether it be theoretically right or wrong would, if these figures are correct, inevitably involve them in a loss of influence in the commonwealth?

An Hon. MEMBER:

We do not accept the figures!

Mr. WISE:

I agree that the figures may be doubtful; but they were accepted at Adelaide.

An Hon. MEMBER:

No!

Mr. WISE:

They were accepted by many at Adelaide, and we have to meet a strong and influential, if not very large, body of opponents of federation in every colony. If it is true, as I believe it is, that the proposals put forward are only alternatives of convenience in which there is no principle involved and I understood the hon. and learned member, Mr. O'Connor, to say that this was not a question of principle-
The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:
    On the contrary, I pointed out that it rested upon principle!
Mr. WISE:
    It is a principle of convenience rather than one underlying the main provisions of the bill.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
    The hon. and learned member accepts the principle that the house of representatives should contain twice the number of members contained in the senate!
Mr. WISE:
    Will it not be better to adopt a proposal such as that put forward by the right hon. member, and fix upon, say, 50,000 as a quota? That would give a two to one representation,
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
    Exactly!

An Hon. MEMBER:
    That is the present quota!
Mr. WISE:
    I believe that the quota in the bill is 51,000. I appeal to members of the Committee if it is worth while to run the risk of exciting popular feeling in Victoria against this proposal? I am bound to say that those who, for the purpose of exciting popular feeling against federation, would urge that there is something behind this proposal, that there is some conspiracy on the part of those who wish to make the senate strong at the expense of the assembly, may find some justification in some of the speeches which we have heard this evening. I therefore appeal to the Committee whether it is worth while upon a matter which, after all, is only one of practical convenience, to take a step which will give rise to misconception, and, perhaps, prevent the consummation of what we all desire, the union of Australia.
The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL (Victoria)[9.1]:
    Hon. members must have forgotten the circumstance that there are in Australia at present very large legislatures. If this proposal is carried out the question will be what we are to do with the local legislatures, and how are we to reduce their numbers. It is idle to talk of a proportion of one member to 30,000 people; it is preposterous. The federal parliament cannot afford any such proposal.
Mr. WISE:
The proposal is one member for 50,000 people; that is virtually the proposal in the bill!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
The same remark applies to one member for 50,000. Unless the local legislatures are reduced that number will be altogether too large. Hon. members should look at what has been done in other countries when they make proposals of this kind. In the United States of America in 1897, with a population of 62,522,250, the representation in the Senate is one member for 694,691 people. Coming to the House of Representatives, we find there are 357 members, giving one member for 173,901 persons. That is rather more than three times what is proposed here.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
Will any hon. member attempt to argue that it is necessary for the efficient governing of the federation that we should have an enormous number of members? They will only be in each other's way. When we bear in mind that for five or six years there will be very little for this federal parliament to do, we should start on as economical and as efficient a basis as we possibly can. Will it be economical and efficient to start with one member to 30,000 people? That has been the proposal, and it is only because its ridiculous character has been demonstrated that hon. members have gone back to one for 50,000.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I proposed that in my first speech in Adelaide!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
I have every confidence in the hon. member. I am sure he is willing to do what is fair and reasonable; but it is monstrous for hon. members to advocate this large assembly. Do not hon. members know well what our experience has been in Australia, namely, that these large houses do not work well? What has been the case in Victoria? At the last election there was a direct mandate to the Government to reduce the number of members in the Assembly, but the Government were afraid to take up the challenge. I am speaking advisedly.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
I brought in a bill to reduce the number in both houses!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
But the hon. member knew very well that he was bringing in a bill which also affected a house which had the entire confidence of the people.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
No!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
I say that advisedly. The right hon. gentleman knows quite well that he and his friends in the Assembly are continually trying to find fault with the Council in order to keep in power.

The CHAIRMAN:
Does the hon. member think that that has anything to do with this clause?

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
Not much, sir; but I hope you will forgive me for trespassing, seeing that this question was brought up by the interjection of the Premier.

The CHAIRMAN:
The hon. member should take no notice of the Premier's interjection.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
I think it is our duty to start this federal parliament on an economical and businesslike basis. Do hon. members believe there is any virtue in numbers? Do they believe that if we have a house of 120 members, those members will carry on the business of the federation any better than a house of sixty or seventy members? The reverse is the fact. A small body, of men, at all events for the next ten years, will be all that Australia will require. I would be prepared to accept the proposal of my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, to have one member for every 50,000 persons.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
You would increase the number of representatives without rhyme or reason if there was a larger number of states!

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
We do not want any large number. I am quite sure that one member for every 50,000 persons will be a very adequate number, and I am prepared to support, that principle. I think it would be a good solution of the difficulty.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia):
I think that, after the last speech, we had better keep the clause as it is. My hon. friend, Sir William Zeal, need not be a bit anxious about the immediate effect on the economy of the federation. He has pointed out the pernicious effect of having too large a lower house. The difficulty, once it is established, is to reduce the number.

An Hon. MEMBER:
You cannot do it!
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
   It is impossible to do it.

An HON MEMBERS:-

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
   I thought the hon. member, Sir William Zeal, opposed the clause as it stands.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
   Yes!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
   I thought so; and I am using an argument he applied from the stores of his experience, which I value that we ought to prevent any inducement to the people to return too many members to the lower house. There is not a colony in Australasia which is not suffering from an excessive number of members in its house of assembly. There is not a single house that would not like to reduce its number if it had a chance; and there is not a single house that is able to do it; and, with these awful warmness before us, if we can, by some perfectly harmless and innocent provision because that is what my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid, says it is prevent that which is a public scandal and public nuisance, which we will have to accept, if once established, to all eternity, then it should be, not merely our duty, but our pride to do it.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
   There is no land tax in this!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
   I follow my hon. friend. I agree with his arguments, but I absolutely dissent from his conclusions. I arrive at the same result as he does, that it would be well that we should provide checks against having too many members in the house of representatives; but, apart from the persuasion which my hon. friend has unconsciously exercised upon me, I listened, if he will allow me to say so with all respect, with some amusement to the speech of my right hon. friend, Mr. Reid. He was a member of the Constitutional Committee which devised this scheme. He, except during the times when he was called away to discuss finance.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
   I was on the Finance Committee when you were doing this!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
   The right hon. gentleman was often with us. We had the advantage of his constant attention in the House when the matter was being discussed.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
   Not this!
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

We never thought of the Norwegian scheme from the beginning to the end, and it was never mentioned as a reason for our conclusions.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

It was never proposed and seconded nor suggested that the keeping up the numerical relations of the two houses was for the purpose of bringing about the Norwegian scheme.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

It was distributed!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

It was distributed, and I spent a week over it!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

If my right hon. friend had been listening to the constant debates at which he was always present in the House, I am quite sure he would have arrived at a conclusion different from that which his private studies seem to have conducted. This was arrived at after much consideration by the Constitutional Committee, was discussed at length in the Convention, had the hearty approval of the right hon. member, and it is only now that he has heard the reasons for the acceptance of the proposal, reiterated with great force and effect, that he says he has arrived at a different conclusion. Will he allow me to say this? I entirely disagree with him in saying there is no force in numbers. Most of us who have been in a position of authority agree that it would be very convenient that one man should rule, and if we could get everyone else to come to the same conclusion, the business of government would be much simplified, and the advantage to the public would be enormous. But the mischief is that we cannot get them to do that. To carry my right hon. friend's argument to its legitimate conclusion, what do we want six representing the senate in each colony? One will do. We should have the advantage of perfect unanimity in that gentleman, unless he was one who could not make up his mind. What do we want to increase the number for? If we have two, it might create division of opinion, and just in proportion as we make the number more, we increase the differences which will arise. If we keep up the number if by the legitimate evolution of events we keep it up progressively we might have a number which might fritter away largely the immense authority of the senate.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Have the numbers any necessary connection?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I think they have a good deal. Supposing we have a house of 30 members resisting, and trying, as it would be said, to dominate a house of 200 or 600 members, we should have a vehement outcry sounding throughout the land; we should have constant attacks both in newspapers and in every shape or form in which attacks could be made. I say that a solid phalanx does have an effect; that mere manhood, sympathy, influence, and force have an effect; and it is useless to talk in the way in which the right hon. member talked I hope with not much earnestness that numbers are of no consequence, and that the whole point is authority. I admit we must have the power, or the numbers will be useless; but given the numbers, and you get your power to exercise the authority-strong in one way though it may be weakened in another. We truly enough produce the differences of opinion that will come from the association together of a number instead of a few; but in those very differences we produce strength and confidence; and although there may be a certain amount of weakness in action, there is weakness in the corporate body through the confidence which exists in the whole largely through numbers. I think this is a sound and good provision. We all agree that it should exist at the start. It is trained on a basis which the right hon. gentleman wants to agree to. Why should not it exist in the future? Do we fear some sudden change in the condition of the colonies? Do we not think they are all going to advance I do not say with equal steps, but with something like an even degree of progress; and is it necessary that we should make these limitations or have these fears which hon. gentlemen entertain?

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Supposing a large colony now is subdivided into three, and the senate, instead of being six becomes eighteen does the hon. member see any necessity from his point of view, of adding thirty-six members to the lower house, the population being exactly the same as it was before? Would not that be an evil from the hon. member's point of view?

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer:

That could not happen, in the first instance. That is the answer to that remark. There is to be some quota of the numbers returned to the other house, and all that is provided is that the number shall be two to one. It is only an increase in population, and not a subdivision of states, that will produce any substantial increase in the number of members.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

But you make it absolutely compulsory that if you have an increase of twelve senators, you must have an increase of twenty-four members in the house of representatives.
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Why not?
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Because there is the same population!
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I want to know what is the objection, except on the score of expense? You have one house representing the people generally, and a second house representing the states,
An HON MEMBER: What is the use of the increase?
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
You would have to rearrange every constituency in the commonwealth!
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I am constantly asked what is the use of doing this. It is done with the object of preserving the importance of one house, of preserving its even ratio with the other. That is the object. If my right Hon. friend still contends, and is right in contending, that numbers are of no consequence, and that six men will do as well as sixty men, well and good; I retire from the position. But I entirely disagree with him in thinking that numbers are of no consequence, and I hope the Convention will adhere to that to which it agreed before.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales)[9.18]:
I shall vote for the amendment, and for two reasons. In the first place, I have always thought that, in the Australian colonies, there has been over representation in proportion to the population. My next reason is that the experience of New South Wales has shown us that any attempt to increase the representation of the constituencies automatically is an absolute failure. We tried the plan here, and we found constituencies obtaining an increase at every period at which a census was taken, until finally the number of members so increased that we had to abolish the system. Now, if the power is given to the commonwealth to deal with this matter, I do not see that there is any necessity for any other power at all. So far as over-representation is concerned, I would ask hon. members to compare the colony of New South Wales with Great Britain. If Great Britain had the same representation in the House of Commons in proportion to its population as New South Wales has in its Legislative Assembly, it would have over 6,000 members. Now, I do not want to see this over representation in the Australian colonies, and, therefore, I would like to know the number of votes for each representative returned. Why should we not fix it in the constitution act, and not leave it to any precarious system which may be adopted hereafter?
Question-That the words "as nearly as practicable there shall be two members of the house of representatives for every one member of the senate" proposed to be omitted stand part of the paragraph put. The Committee divided:

Question-That the paragraph stand part of the clause resolved in the affirmative.

Paragraph 2. Until the Parliament otherwise provides for the method of determining the number of members for each quota, there shall be one member for each quota of the people of the state, and the quota shall, whenever necessary, be ascertained by dividing the population of the commonwealth as shown by the latest statistics of the commonwealth by twice the number of the members of the senate, and the number of members to which each state is entitled shall be determined by dividing the population of the state as shown by the latest statistics of the commonwealth by the quota.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[9.22]:

I desire to make an amendment in this paragraph. In the third line, the words "for each quota" have crept in. I think that those words were not intended to be there.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Is not that a matter for the Drafting Committee to consider?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

This is merely a verbal amendment, and we might just as well make it ourselves.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I could not make head or tail of the paragraph!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The words number of members for each quota" are absurd, for under any circumstances there can only be one member for each quota. It has been discovered since we met at Adelaide that these words are a clerical or typographical error, and we might as well strike them out.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

So long as the hon. member is satisfied as to that!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I am quite satisfied as to it. I move:

That the words "for each quota," line 3, be omitted,

Amendment agreed to; paragraph, as amended, agreed to.

Parliament 3 agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 25. in ascertaining the number of the people of any state, so as to determine the number of members to which the state is entitled, there shall be deducted from the whole number of the people of the state the number of the people of any race not entitled to vote at elections for the more numerous house of the parliament of the state.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and Assembly of New South Wales:

That the clause be omitted.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[9.23]:

It is nearly half past 9. We are not likely to sit more than another hour, and the discussion as to the money powers which come next will undoubtedly take some time. Therefore, it may be convenient to hon. members if we deal with some minor clauses machinery clauses that follow so as not to go into so important a subject as the money powers until to-morrow morning. If that is most convenient to hon. members, I propose to go on with clauses which, I take it, will not provoke much discussion.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[9.24]:

It is proposed by the New South Wales legislature to strike out this clause, not because there was any objection to the principle involved in the clause, but because it was thought that there was some ambiguity in expression. It took me some time to realise the ambiguity, but I think there is an ambiguity, and I should like to point it out, so that the Drafting Committee may recast the clause, and put it in such a shape as to do away with any doubt. It is proposed that in ascertaining the number of people of any state, so as to determine the number of members to which the state is entitled, there shall be deducted from the whole number of people of the states the number of people of any race not entitled to vote for the more numerous house of the parliament of the state. What was intended was to exclude from the computation aboriginals, or others whom might be expressly disqualified by parliamentary enactment, but as the words are here, the number of people of any race not entitled to vote may be interpreted to include females and children, as they are not, entitled to vote. They are people of the race, and it is not a question of their race. It is difficult, I admit, in using these words to say that what you mean to exclude is the race, and not the mere individuals of the race. I hope that the Drafting Committee, when they meet to deliberate on the provisions of the bill, may see fit to alter this provision, so as to remove any ambiguity.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[9.26]:

This was included in the bill of 1891 in this way:

When in any state the people of any race are not entitled by law to vote at elections for the more numerous house of the parliament of the state, the representation of that state in the house of representatives shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of people of that race in the state bears to the whole number of the people of the state.

That was conceived to be a rather cumbersome way of stating the matter, and the clause in this bill is rather a shorter and clearer way. I do not think it can be seriously contended that any court would uphold the contention that the use of the words "people of any race not entitled to vote" applied to women or children. A race not entitled to vote is such an alien race as may exist in the community to whom the state in which they live has not conceded the privilege of voting. There may be some objection to the drafting of the clause, but I do not quite see it myself. I think the matter is clear enough, but in accordance with the arrangement we made the other day I would suggest to my hon. friend that we should pass the clause. I have made a note of the suggestion, and will bear it in mind.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 26. (Mode of calculating number of members.)

The CHAIRMAN:

There are two amendments suggested in this clause, but as they refer to matters already decided as to quota I shall not put them.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 27 (Representatives in first parliament), and 28 (Increase of number of house of representatives), agreed to.

Clause 29. Until the parliament otherwise provides, the electoral divisions of the several states for the purpose of returning members of the house of representatives, and the number of members to be chosen for each electoral division, shall be determined from time to time by the parliaments of the several states. Until division each state shall be one electorate.

Amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of Tasmania:
Omit the words, line 1, "Until the parliament otherwise provides."
Amendment negatived.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of Victoria:
Omit the words, "until division each state shall be one electorate," lines 7 and 8.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):

This is a provision which was inserted at the instance of Mr. Carruthers, and I think a very proper one, to meet the contingency of the parliament of a state not having provided as expected by the bill. In that case it would not be entitled to representation, unless this mode of representation were adopted, until it made some law on the subject.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Do I understand that the parliament of the commonwealth is to have power under this bill of arranging the electoral divisions in the state? Is it proposed that the federal parliament should override the state parliament in regard to the electoral divisions for the house of representatives?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

This provision was well discussed in Adelaide. The object of the insertion of the words, "Until the parliament otherwise provides" was to meet certain contingencies. The constitution does not in itself raise any objection to the laws on this subject being made by the various states. The subject is the making of electoral divisions and the prescribing of the number of members to be chosen. That is properly left in the hands of the parliaments of the several states. But there may arise some difficulty of this sort: Every hon. member of the Convention will remember the history of the "gerrymander." This is a reserve power proposed to be given to the parliament of the federation, not to been exercised in any ordinary case but in case there should happen to be some such state of things as once occurred in the United States. It is a reserve power left, to the parliament of the federation to see that the House, which is the most important of the federal legislature should not have its efficiency impaired or its representation made, I would not say, corrupt but ineffective or improper by any course that might be taken by a state.

The Hon. N.J. BROWN (Tasmania):

It seems to me that the words "until division each state shall be one electorate" should be struck out. Otherwise the clause will be contradictory. We have already provided that with regard to elections for the federal parliament each state parliament shall be empowered to make laws for the purpose of carrying out the first elections. Surely after having provided that it is somewhat contradictory to say that until the division is made by the federal parliament each state shall vote as one electorate.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

But suppose no provision is made by the state parliament for the holding of the elections?

Mr. SYMON:

I presume that provision has already been made.

Mr. SYMON:

No.

Amendment negatived; clause agreed to.

Clause 30. Until the parliament otherwise provides, the qualification of electors of members of the house of representatives shall be in each state that which is prescribed by the law of the state as the qualification of electors of the more numerous house of the parliament of the state. But in the choosing of such members each elector shall vote only once, and if any elector votes more than once he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and no elector who has at the establishment of the commonwealth, or who afterwards acquires a right to vote at elections for the more numerous house of the parliament of the state, shall, whilst the qualification continues, be prevented by any law of the common wealth from exercising such right at elections for the house of representatives.

Amendment suggested by the Legislature of Tasmania:
After "once," line 8, omit and if any elector votes more than once he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour."

Amendment negatived.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[9.37]:

With regard to the remainder of the clause I take it that it was intended that the provision for the preservation of rights should be made to apply equally to the houses of representatives, and to the senate, and that that will be borne in mind when the clause is finally dealt with.

The CHAIRMAN:

There are two other suggested amendments, one by the Assembly of New South Wales, and the other by the Assembly of Victoria.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The suggestion attributed to Victoria is a mistake.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales:

At end of clause add "Provided that the parliament may not enact that any elector shall have more than one vote."

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[9.38]:

We have to decide whether this amendment is a necessary one. We have already placed in the clause words which say that in the choosing of members for the house of representatives each elector will vote only once, so that the federal parliament will be unable to provide that an electo

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[9.39]:

I am rather in doubt as to whether the provision in the earlier part of the clause is thoroughly effective. What is intended is that at a general election each voter shall have one vote, and one vote only. But there is nothing in that provision which prevents a man being enrolled more than once. That is to say, he may be enrolled for one division here and for another division in another part of the colony. A by-election may take place, and then he may claim a vote in another division, wherein he has never exercised his vote before, and thus be only exercising one vote. What the Parliament of New South Wales intended to enact was that at any time should a law be passed which conferred on a man the right to be enrolled more than once as a voter, the former part of the clause should provide that no matter how many times a man might be enrolled as a voter he shall vote only once. But do not hon. members see that he may vote at a general election. only once, and a fortnight afterwards there might be a by-election in an electorate for which he is enrolled as a voter, in which he has not voted before. He could go there and claim a vote and be only voting once, although in the general election and at the by-election he will be exercising two votes in respect of two different constituencies, in both of which he may have been enrolled as a voter. It was said that a man should be enrolled only once, and that he should not have the option of exercising a choice as to where he would vote; otherwise during the currency of a parliament he would be exercising two votes where another man only had the right to exercise one vote. That was a point which was emphasised in the local legislature. I submit there is something in the point. This is a safeguarding proposal. I do not say that it is expressed as well as it might have been, but I think if the Drafting Committee take notice of this point, and if we let it go now, it might be framed much better afterwards, so as to avoid tautology, with respect to a general election. My hon. friend, seeing the aspect of the case with regard to by-elections, will recognise that a man, voting in this manner at a by-election, although only voting once, would have a greater right conceded to him than was enjoyed by the bulk of the electors.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)

I have not considered this clause very closely; but if there are divisions in the state, and electoral rolls in each district, and electors on several of those rolls, is it proposed that such electors should not be allowed to vote except once in the whole state?

An Hon. MEMBER:

Yes!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

That is not the system in force in many of the colonies at present, for instance Victoria, Western Australia, and Queensland. It has only recently been in force in New South Wales. Voters with the necessary qualification were able to vote wherever they happened to be on the roll. I cannot follow the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers. He seemed to urge that if a man exercised his vote, and if some months afterwards another election took place, he should not be allowed to exercise his vote, although he might be on the roll in another electorate. Must an elector always remain in one electorate? That would very much restrict the individual, because a voter, I suppose, can get transferred from one electorate to another under almost any system of voting. I would be very much obliged if the hon. member, Mr. Barton, would explain exactly the operation of this clause. It seems to me that the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, wishes to tie us down to something worse than one man one vote.

The Hon. S. FRASER (Victoria)
Is it contended that a man cannot be placed on the rolls of two electorates in any case?

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
Certainly he can!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
That is the intention of the act.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
No!

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I understand that to be so.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
There are many New South Welshmen resident in this colony who are on the ratepayers' roll in Victoria.

The Hon. S. FRASER:
I understand that the intention of the act is that a man cannot be on the rolls of two divisions at one time. I contend that we ought to adhere to the principle that a man can vote only once in any case.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia) [9.46]:
There is perhaps a little difficulty about this; but the clause, as it stands, I think will adequately meet the case. The point which my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, has in view is to prevent a man from voting in two different constituencies. That is, from voting in one constituency to-day, and if an election takes place in another constituency in a month's time-

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
A by-election!

Mr. SYMON:
It is clear that he cannot vote in two constituencies at the same election!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Mr. SYMON:
It is perfectly clear I think, because it says "in the choosing of such members each elector shall vote only once," and no act passed by the federal parliament could possibly be made to conflict with that provision, or to give the power of voting more than once.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Only once in one district!

Mr. SYMON:
Only once at each election. The point which my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, calls attention to is, that a by-election may take place within a short time, and then the same person who voted in another district at the previous general election may vote at the by-election in another constituency. But that is not a thing against which we ought to direct any of the provisions of this constitution, because that can happen in our colony now. Suppose, at a general election, a man votes in a district, if he changes his residence, he has to transfer his vote from one district to the other. That, I apprehend, is not something which can be sought to be provided against, because it would be grossly unfair. I think perhaps the better way will be to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend, and leave it to the Drafting Committee to reconsider the phraseology of this clause, with a view, if possible, to prevent any loophole by which a man would be enabled to vote twice at the same election.

Amendment negatived.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[9.48]:

I may mention that notwithstanding the vote which has taken place, the whole of my hon. friend's suggestions will be considered by the Drafting Committee.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria:

At end of clause add "Provided also that the basis of such qualification for the electors of the members of the house of representatives shall be on the basis of one adult one vote."

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[9.49]:

It is by a mistake that this suggested amendment appears in the schedule.
It was lost in the Legislative Assembly by 46 to 16 votes. It is not by a mistake of the Clerk of the Convention that it appears in the schedule.

The CHAIRMAN:

I will take it on the authority of the Attorney-General of Victoria that this is a clerical error.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 31. Until the parliament otherwise provides, the qualifications of a member of the house of representatives shall be as follows:-

1. He must be of the full age of twenty-one years, and must when chosen be an elector entitled to vote in some state at the election of members of the house of representatives, or a person qualified to become such elector, and must have been for three years at the least a resident within the limits of the commonwealth as existing at the time when he is elected:

2. He must be either a natural born subject of the Queen, or a subject of the Queen naturalised by or under a law of Great Britain and Ireland. or of one of the said colonies, or of the commonwealth, or of a state, at least five years before he is elected.
The Hon. N.E. LEWIS (Tasmania): Before the amendment proposed by the legislature of Tasmania to subclause 1 is submitted I should like to submit to the Drafting Committee, a question of which I have given one of them private notice, and that is whether it is not possible under that sub-clause for a female elector of South Australia to be a candidate and to be elected for either the senate or the house of representatives? The clause provides that a member of the house of representatives must be of the full age of 21 years, and entitled to vote in some state at the election of members to the house of representatives, or a person qualified to become such elector, and must have been for three years at the least a resident within the limits of the commonwealth as existing at the time when he is elected.

The Hon. E. BARTON: Under the clause it will have to be "he."

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS: This will be an Imperial act, and it will be read in connection with the Imperial statute, which provides that where the context does not imply to the contrary, the "female" will be included,

The Hon. E. BARTON: The context does imply to the contrary!

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS: I doubt it very much. Females will be able to contest every electoral district either for the senate or house of representatives, not only in South Australia, but right through Australia a state of affairs which is really too awful to think of.

Question That the paragraph, "Until the parliament otherwise provides the qualifications of a member of the house of representatives shall be at follows:" stand part of the clause agreed to.

Sub-clause I. He must be of the full age of twenty-one years, and must, when chosen, be an elector entitled to vote in some state at the election of members of the house of representatives, or a person qualified to become such elector, and must have been for three years at the least a resident within the limits of the commonwealth as existing at the time when he is elected.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and House of Assembly of Tasmania:

After "representatives," line 4, omit to the end of sub-clause (I); insert "and no person shall be capable of being chosen or of sitting or acting as a representative of any state except he be and has been for three years a resident of that state for which he is chosen. The seat of any senator or representative shall be declared vacant on his ceasing to be a resident of that state, except during such time as he may be a member of the executive government."

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH (Tasmania): The Legislative Council of Tasmania has suggested, with respect to sub-clause 1, that we should adopt the practice of the United States and make the qualification of a member a residential qualification not a residential qualification so far as the commonwealth is concerned, but so far as each state is concerned. It is not deemed desirable, at any rate in Tasmania, that a non-resident should have a qualification. He may be qualified as an elector but by reason of his residence elsewhere he should not be qualified to be elected. The purpose, therefore, is to secure the practice, I believe, of most of the United States of America that he must be absolutely resident within a state as a representative of which he is elected, and I move accordingly.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales): The object of this amendment is to secure that the person, to be a member of the house of representatives, shall Amendment negatived.

Sub-clause I agreed to.

Sub-clause II agreed to as follows:-

He must be either a natural-born subject of the Queen, or a subject of the Queen naturalised by or under a law of Great Britain and Ireland, or of one of the said colonies, or of the commonwealth, or of a state, at least five years before he is elected.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales): I desire to move an amendment in this clause which, I believe, was moved by Mr. A.I. Clark, of Tasmania.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH (Tasmania): I should like to explain to the Drafting Committee that Mr. Clark proposed to remove this clause from its present position, and to place it in, apparently, its proper position in Part IV that is, amongst the provisions relating to both houses. If we strike out the clause now, we can ultimately include it on page 10 of the bill, in Part IV, following sub-clauses which relate to both houses alike. The legislature of Tasmania propose to insert the following clauses to follow clause 44:
44A. A member of the house of the parliament of a state shall be incapable of sitting in either house of the parliament of the commonwealth.

44B. A member of either house of the parliament of the commonwealth shall be incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of the other house of the parliament.

I think the phraseology conveys all that can be said in connection with the matter.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It is only a question of drafting!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

It is a question of drafting; and if the hon. and learned member will make a note of it, it will obviate the necessity for any discussion on the point.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

The proposal to which the hon. member has referred goes further than the proposal in this bill!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

It is a provision which we ought to apply to both houses, and I submit that our proper course is to strike out the clause now, and to, reconsider it when we come to Part IV.

The CHAIRMAN:

Do I understand that the hon. member, Mr Wise, desires to, move an amendment.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[9.59]:

I do not desire to move an amendment at this stage; but the question I wish to test is whether a member of the senate and the house of representatives should not have the power to contest an election for a seat in the house of which he is not a member without resigning his seat in the house to which he belongs.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

He might be elected without knowing it!

Mr. WISE:

I do not wish to press the matter now. I have not the reports of the Tasmanian debates before me; but I was under the impression that an amendment to this effect had been moved by Mr. A.I. Clark. I think it is well worthy the attention of the Committee.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10]:

It will lead to considerable complication if the electors of the whole commonwealth do not understand that when a person is a member of the senate he cannot be made a member of the house of representatives. To place the matter in this way in the constitution does not impair the efficiency of the clause, and it is, at the same time, a clear indication to every elector as to what is intended.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
Would it not be well to change the position of the clause?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
It is not a question of position!

The CHAIRMAN:
I understand that the hon. and learned member, Mr. Wise, does not intend to move his amendment.

Mr. WISE:
No!

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS (Tasmania)[10.1]:
If this clause is to stand part of the bill I think it should go further and provide that a member of the house of representatives shall not be capable of being chosen or sitting as a member of the senate.

Mr. WISE:
Do this later on!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
It is possible the position of the clause will have to be changed!

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS:
If you pass this clause you ought to have an alternative provision in regard to the senate.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[10.2]:
I think it would be well if this clause were postponed, because there is a strong opinion that, if this clause is retained in the bill, there should be a similar clause with reference to the members of the house of representatives.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:
They both come later!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Yes.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.3]:
I have no objection to the postponement of the clause, which will give us an opportunity to consider the matter.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 33 (Election of speaker of the house of representatives), 34 (Absence of speaker provided for), and 35 (Resignation of place in house of representatives), agreed to.
Clause 36. The place of a member shall become vacant if for two consecutive months of any session of the parliament he, without permission of the house entered on its journals, fails to attend the house.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council and Assembly of Tasmania:

That after the word "for," line 2, the words two consecutive months of" be omitted with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "thirty consecutive sitting days in."

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH (Tasmania)[10.3]:

It is undesirable that a member should be permitted to absent himself for so long a period as two months. He could always secure leave of absence, if necessary, and to give him power under the constitution to absent himself for so long a period as two months seems too much. The purpose of the suggested amendment, therefore, is to limit the period to thirty consecutive sitting days.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

Is that better than two months?

An Hon. MEMBER:

It might be a longer period than two months!

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

We should not sit more than about two days a week!

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS (Tasmania)[10.4]:

The reason for putting in the words "thirty consecutive sitting days " was to meet the contingency of a long adjournment. At the present time our House is only adjourned for something like six weeks, and if any member of our Legislative Council had not been present the last week when there was very little business to do, and if he were not present the week after we go back, when probably also there will be very little business for the Council to do, he would be away two consecutive months when, however, there was practically nothing requiring his attendance.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

How could he attend if the house was not sitting?

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS:

The House might be sitting; and would you for merely formal business drag a member to the federal capital perhaps all the way from Perth or Cape York? There may be an adjournment of one of the houses.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

That does not count!

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS:

There may be no house, or the house may be just formed to receive messages and adjourn for a long period.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

It would not matter in that case!

The Hon. N.E. Lewis:

The mere fact that the house met would cause the time to run. It is thought that thirty consecutive sitting days would be a better arrangement than two consecutive months. The thirty consecutive sitting days is something understood, and no doubt the attendance or non-attendance of an hon. member would be placed on the records of the house. It would then be apparent whether he had infringed the provisions of the Constitution or not.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales)[10.7]:

I think it is really splitting straws to discuss the proposal to alter this provision. The House will sit three or four days a week, and thirty consecutive sittings will be about ten weeks. If the House sits four days a week, thirty consecutive sitting days will be seven and a half weeks. I do not think we want to put it in that way. If there is any doubt, as my hon. friend says, the Journals of the House will determine the matter; but the almanac will determine it, and I think that is enough.

The Hon. J.H. Carruthers (New South Wales)[10.8]:

I venture to suggest that the period provided by the bill, as it stands, and also in the proposed amendment, is too short. We must not forget that we shall have representatives from the whole of this vast continent. A man may be suddenly called home by sickness in his family.

An Hon. Member: He can get leave!

The Hon. J.H. Carruthers:

There have been cases where men have been suddenly called away by sickness, and have not made provision of this character, and before they have time to do anything in the ordinary course of things, they may find their seats taken. We shall have men from the northern portion of Western Australia. Accidents might occur, and having regard to the fact that there would be representatives of the whole continent, we ought to allow a reasonable time. In the parliaments of all the colonies absence for a session is allowed. I venture to suggest that we do not insert the words proposed by the Tasmanian legislature, but that we insert the words "the whole of," to give the right to a member to absent himself for a whole session, provided he gets the sanction of parliament.

Amendment negatived; clause agreed to.

Clauses 37 (Issue of new writs) and 38 (Quorum of house of representatives) agreed to.
Clause 39. Questions arising in the house of representatives shall be determined by a majority of votes other than that of the speaker; and when the votes are

The CHAIRMAN:
There is an amendment suggested in this clause. After the word "shall," in the third line of the clause, it is proposed by the Parliament of Victoria to insert the words "except as hereinafter provided," and to add at the end of the clause the words-

Provided that in case of a proposed amendment of the constitution the speaker may vote notwithstanding the votes are not equal and in such case he shall not have a casting-vote.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[10.10]:
The object for which this amendment was introduced was that while preserving, under ordinary circumstances, the very salutary rule that Mr. Speaker should observe an impartial attitude in the house of representatives, yet, when such an extraordinary occasion arose as a proposed amendment of the constitution, his state should not be deprived, in case of necessity, of his vote, but that he should not have a casting vote. It is not only possible, but it has actually occurred in the Victorian Assembly, that a proposed amendment of the Constitution that was considered by one chamber, at all events, to require an absolute majority did not have that absolute majority by one vote. If Mr. Speaker had been allowed to vote in that case, the vote would have been given. It seems a hard case that the state for which Mr. Speaker is returned should be deprived of his vote when the clause of the Constitution provides that an amendment of the Constitution cannot be carried unless it has an absolute majority of the senate and an absolute majority of the house of representatives. A proposal might be prevented from actually going to the people at all under the referendum provided by the bill by reason of the Speaker being in the chair. I think it will be conceded by the Convention that in such a case as that it is not unreasonable to ask that the Speaker should have an original vote, but not a casting vote. That would preserve the usual rule that he is not to intermingle in the debates and vote in the House, while laying down the principle that, in the case of a proposed amendment of the constitution, an exception should be made. I, therefore, hope that the Convention will agree to the amendment

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Suppose that, having an original vote as well as a casting vote, the Speaker's vote makes the numbers equal?
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

There would not then be an absolute majority!

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.13]:

Not feeling very strongly about this matter, I think the difference between the case of the house of representatives and the case of the senate is this: that a similar provision to that which my hon. and learned friend wishes to introduce has been made in the case of the senate.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Well, Somewhat similar. The President is to have an original vote and no casting vote.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

No; the President has a vote in all cases.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

My hon. friend is right.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

I propose that an exception should be made in the case of a proposed amendment of the constitution.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The argument for this which my hon. and learned friend puts is that the state is not to be disfranchised. I do not know that it really means that the state is disfranchised. The speaker represents an electorate in the national assembly in the same way as the Speaker in this Legislative Assembly represents an electorate in the representative and popular chamber. If there is a question of the amendment of the Constitution here, or in the lower house of any one of the parliaments of the colonies, the speaker is not entitled to any other vote than a casting vote. As this is not a states house, but what might be called, if it would not offend the susceptibilities of some people, a national house, it is rather difficult to suggest a reason for a differentiation between the position of a speaker in a chamber such as the house of representatives will be, and the position of a speaker in the Legislative Assembly of any separate colony.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

Both ought to have votes!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I do not see the reason for it myself. I do not feel strongly about it and I should be happy to be convinced. But, at the present time, I do not see any reason why there should be any difference between the position of a speaker in the house of representatives in the proposed federation and the position of a speaker in such a house as the House of Assembly in Victoria.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
Our experience in Victoria has shown the necessity for such a provision as that proposed!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
If this depends upon an exception arising out of the practice in a colonial legislature, then it cannot be the correct reason for it to say that a state would be disfranchised in the federation; because if it rests on the former reason it cannot rest on the latter.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)
May I add one word? In the case of an ordinary house of legislature, if the speaker had the right to vote, it might bring a law into operation at once; but in this case the vote of the speaker will only allow a matter to go to the people for decision. The absolute majority of both houses is required, in the first instance, in order that a proposed amendment of the constitution may be submitted to the people, and therefore it seems hard that the fact that the speaker is not allowed to vote should prevent the project from being put before the people.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Would the hon. and learned member provide that where the votes are equal, the question should pass in the negative?

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
If the votes were equal there would not be an absolute majority.
Amendment negatived.

The CHAIRMAN:
I will not put the other amendment.
Clause agreed to.
Clause 40. Every house of representatives shall continue for three years from the day appointed for the first meeting of the house, and no longer, but may be sooner dissolved by the governor-general.
The parliament shall be called together not later than thirty days after the day appointed for the return of the writs for a general election.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia:
Line 2, omit "three," insert "four."

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)
This amendment was suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia, because it would make the provision of the clause accord with that contained in our own constitution, the members of the Western Australian Legislative Assembly holding their seats for four years. It was also thought that three years would be too short a time, considering the long distance which members will have to travel from their homes to get to the place of meeting. I think there is a general feeling throughout Australia that the triennial System in rather short. Considering that members of the senate will hold their seats for six years, it does not seem unreasonable that members of the house of representatives should hold their seats for four years.

Amendment negatived; clause agreed to.

Clause 41. For the purpose of holding general elections of members to serve in the house of representatives, the governor-general may cause writs to be issued by such persons, in such form, and addressed to such returning officers, as he thinks fit.

The writs shall be issued within ten days from the expiry of a parliament, or from the proclamation of a dissolution.

Amendment suggested by the Legislature of Tasmania:

Line 5. After "The" where first occurring, line 7, insert "first writs shall be issued within six months from the date of the establishment of the commonwealth, and all subsequent."

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.19]:

It is a question for the Committee whether the amendment is necessary. The second paragraph of clause 6 provides that the parliament shall be called together not later than six months after the establishment of the commonwealth.

Therefore it is already provided that parliament shall be called together not less than six months after the establishment of the commonwealth, and as it is obvious that parliament cannot be called together without the issue of writs the amendment seems unnecessary.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Does not the hon. member propose to omit the black-letter word in the second paragraph?

The Hon. E. BARTON:

No. It is proposed by a very able gentleman in Tasmania, Mr. Inglis Clark, to make sure as to the procedure in the case of the first election. But I think it is sufficiently provided for.

Amendment negatived; clause agreed to.

Clause 42 (Continuance of existing election laws until the parliament otherwise provides) agreed to.

Clause 43. Until the parliament otherwise provides, any question respecting the qualification of a member or a vacancy in the house of representatives shall be determined by the house.

Amendment suggested by the Legislature of Tasmania:

After "representatives," line 4, insert "or any question of a disputed election relating to that house."

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH (Tasmania)[10.22]:

This is a question of qualification and vacancies. How are they to be dealt with? How are we to deal with disputed elections until parliament otherwise provides, so that you shall not have two powers dealing with these matters? If we have words in the clause which will deal not only with qualifications and vacancies, and also as to disputed elections, we will cover the whole ground.

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS (Tasmania)[10.23]:

Clause 50, referred to by the hon. member, does not make any provision for disputed elections. In the first election to the senate and the house of representatives, it says "until the parliament otherwise provides, all questions of disputed elections arising in the senate or the house of representatives shall be determined by a federal court, or a court exercising federal jurisdiction." Until the parliament is assembled, and the federal court is also established, and the procedure is laid down, there will be no court to deal with disputed elections which may arise in the first elections that take place.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

After parliament is constituted it will have power to deal with such cases!

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS:

It will have power, probably, under the authority contained in this 43rd section by the first words, "until the parliament otherwise provides." But until the parliament does otherwise provide, all questions of disputed elections, relating to either house, must be determined by some authority or power; and the Parliament of Tasmania considered it desirable that it should be determined by the house to which the election related, and that, after the federal high court was established, the court should deal with disputed elections. I think that in all the colonies except New South Wales disputed elections are tried by the Supreme Court.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS:

I think the federal parliament will undoubtedly enact, as soon as possible, that disputed elections relating to either house of that parliament shall be decided by the federal supreme court.

The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL (Victoria)[10.26]
was understood to say that he thought it was not necessary to make any addition to the clause, because each house would nominate a committee of elections and qualifications, which would decide a question of disputed election which could only be raised by petition.

The Hon. N.J. BROWN (Tasmania)[10.27]:

I hope the proposed amendment will not be rejected without consideration. Suppose some irregularity occurs in connection with the first elections to the house of representatives. It must be quite obvious to every hon. member that it is desirable to have some tribunal to settle that disputed election, so that when the parliament is called together every representative can be in his place. A period, of course, is allowed for the elections to take place before parliament is called together, and the object of this amendment is to provide that, in the case of an irregularity occurring, there may be an opportunity to cure that irregularity, and to provide for another election before the parliament meets. Of course, after the parliament meets, the federal court will be established, and then clause 50 will come into operation. A certain interval must elapse before the federal court is established to deal with a disputed election, and the only object of this provision is that the House itself shall deal with the matter until the federal court is established.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.29]:

I am inclined to be converted by what has been urged.

Mr. WISE:

Allow me to say one word first!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I speak quite subject to conviction. In clause 50 we have provided that any case of disputed election shall be determined by the high court, or a court exercising federal jurisdiction, and, in this clause, we have provided that questions of qualification and vacancies shall be decided by either house itself. That I take to be, on the face of it, a very proper provision; but there is this difficulty: If we turn to clause 71, that provides how the judicial power of the commonwealth shall be vested, we see this provision:

The high court shall consist of a chief justice, and so many other justices, not less than four, as the parliament may from time to time prescribe.

Until an act is passed by the parliament, constituting the other judges than the chief justice, there can be no judge of the federal high court, except the chief justice. That will create a difficulty, because it may be considered that there is no sufficient tribunal to deal with this matter at the time of the meeting of the first parliament, and at that time a question of disputed election may arise, so that there would be a hiatus unless we made some provision in this clause to meet such a case. Inasmuch as it is open to Parliament itself to provide how these matters are to be tried after the meeting of the first parliament, perhaps it will be better to adopt this amendment, or something like it; and we might in clause 50 make a further amendment that, on the constitution of the high court by act of the federal legislature, then questions touching disputed elections shall be tried by the federal court.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales): I understand the hon. member will keep in view the clear distinction between clauses 43 and 50. The amendment now proposed does not keep that in view, but will interfere with further amendments in clause 50.

Mr. WISE: I understand that the reason clause 50 was introduced was because it was thought that where the rights of the electors were in any way infringed, or came into question, the matter was one-for the courts. Where it was, merely a question of internal discipline if I may use the expression of Parliament itself to determine the qualification of a member who had done anything which, under the standing orders, or under the constitution, required his seat to be declared vacant, that was a matter for the house itself. Where the rights and privileges of members were affected, it was a matter for the house; but where any conflict arose as to the claims of any member to represent a particular constituency, the matter was one for the court. The amendments moved by Tasmania confuse altogether the distinctions which were endeavoured to be drawn by the framers of the bill.

Mr. JAMES: We propose to strike out clause 50 altogether!

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR: The hon. member might amend the amendment by making it apply only to questions of disputed elections in connection with the first general election!

Mr. WISE: That would do. Perhaps it would be better to leave the Drafting Committee to consider it.

[P.466] starts here

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS: Might I suggest that the consideration of the clause be postponed until we come to clause 50?
Hon. MEMBERS:
Adjourn!
Question That the consideration of clause 43 be postponed agreed to.
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.33]:
I have to thank hon. members for the assiduity exhibited during the first night sitting, and I now move:
That the Chairman leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again tomorrow.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER (Victoria)[10.33]:
There is one matter which I desire to mention before the adjournment takes place, and it has reference to clause 24 with which we have dealt tonight. We, as representatives of Victoria, feel the seriousness of the vote that was taken to-night, and the grave difficulties which it undoubtedly places in our way. As the Committee had not the full number of members present when the vote was taken, I desire to mention that later on I will ask the leader of the Convention to be good enough to recommit that clause, in order that it maybe further considered, and a vote taken in a full Committee. The clause is the one which has reference to the quota. In our opinion the vote is a very serious one, and one of grave importance; and I shall ask the leader of the Convention to recommit it in order that we may, if possible, produce arguments which may induce some members who voted one way to reverse their decision. That will also give an opportunity to those who were absent to be present. The matter is one which certainly ought to be voted upon in a full Convention.
The Hon. E. BARTON:
(New South Wales)[10.34]: I only desire to mention that the voting on the clause was 26 to 17. In other words, forty-three members out of fifty voted, and as you, Sir Richard Baker, were in the chair, there were only six absentees. I do not know whether or not there were any pairs.
The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
There was one pair!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
Then we had the vote practically of the whole Convention with the exception of four members.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Mr. Deakin is away!
The Hon. E. BARTON:
I know that. At the same time, I would say, with regard to any clause which appears to involve, in the opinion of hon. members, a matter of vital importance with regard to the acceptability of this bill in its final stage, I shall be prepared to give the greatest consideration to any application of this kind. I do not like to pledge myself now, because so much depends upon time and circumstances. At the same time, I think my right hon. friend can rely upon my giving every consideration to any such suggestion. I should like to say, with regard to tomorrow's proceedings—if I may say so now—that while we have taken some minor clauses since the division in reference to the house of representatives, I propose tomorrow to revert to the arrangement we made, and to take next the money powers of the two houses, in order that hon. members may proceed to consider any provision they wish to make in regard to deadlocks.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria)[10.37]:

With regard to the matter mentioned by my right hon. friend, the Premier of Victoria that is, the possibility of recommittal of clause 24 I hope the recommittal will be taken before we leaves otherwise the matter presents to my mind a very serious aspect. If the question is decided at a very late date, it will probably be in the absence of several members of the Victorian delegation. I do not wish to say anything further than that I desire to impress the Convention with the seriousness of the question, if the matter be not dealt with before we go to Melbourne.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.38]:

I understand that we cannot enter upon a recommittal until we have dealt with the whole of the clauses; but, from the progress which is being made, and having regard to the statement of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, that he and his colleagues could not stay beyond three weeks, I take it that by Friday week a, fall opportunity for recommittal will have been afforded.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I shall be away before then, although some of my colleagues will probably be here!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

All I can say is that I trust not; and I hope the right hon. gentleman will not state anything final in reference to the matter just now.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

I must go!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

I understood the statements of the right, Hon. gentleman when we first opened our session to be that the Victorian delegation could not remain here any longer than three weeks. I took that statement to imply that they certainly would stay for that three weeks. I assumed that there would be a disposition en the part of the whole of the Victorian delegation to stay during that time. And assuming that the Convention sits during a period of three weeks I do not see that we can fail to have an opportunity of recommitting any clauses which it may be desired to be recommitted.

The Hon. F.W. HOLDER (South Australia)[10.39]:

With reference to the question which is being discussed, I desire to say that although I voted on the opposite side to my right hon. friend, Sir George Turner, and to the hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, I shall nevertheless be prepared to afford every opportunity for a reconsideration of the clause by suspension of the standing orders, if necessary. I hope that the whole of our business will be done without any appearance of an attempt to catch votes.

Motion agreed to; progress reported.
Convention adjourned at 10.40 p.m.
Tuesday 14 September, 1897

Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.
COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee:
CHAPTER 1-THE PARLIAMENT.
Part IV-Provisions relating to both houses.
Clause 44 (Allowance to members).
The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.32]:
In accordance with the understanding arrived at yesterday, that we should take the constitution of the two houses, then the money powers, and, then the question of deadlocks, I presume that it will be acceptable to hon. members if I move to postpone clauses 44 to 53 inclusive. I, therefore, move:
That clauses 44 to 53 inclusive be postponed.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

Clause 54. Proposed laws having for their main object the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or moneys, or the imposition of any tax or impost, shall originate in the house of representatives.

The CHAIRMAN:
In this clause the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of New South Wales propose to omit the words "having for their main object" with a view to insert "for." The Legislative Assembly of Victoria propose to omit the words "having for their main object the appropriation of" with a view to insert the word "appropriating," and the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania propose to omit the word "main." I think that I will put the question that the words, "having for their main object" be omitted, and then those who only wish to strike out the word "main" can amend that suggestion by leaving out the other words, so that these hon. members from Tasmania who wish to give effect to the suggestion of their legislative assembly can do so by amending the proposed amendment.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

The CHAIRMAN:
In order to enable the amendments suggested by Victoria, New South Wales, and Tasmania, each to be put and voted upon, I now put the question:

That the words, "leaving for their main object, "proposed to be struck out, stand part of the question.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[10.36]:

There has been a good deal of trouble about the definition of the words "having for their main object," and I think we all feel this: even those of us who are against any undue limitation of the power of origination in the senate of some matters which impose charges on the people probably think that there is a great deal of indefiniteness about these words. I remember the difficulty which the original mover of the suggested amendment felt about that, and we all feel it. An attempt has been made to get rid of that difficulty by the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania which proposes to strike out the word "main" and leave that part of the clause to read "having for their object," and to put in the following proviso at the end of the clause:

But a proposed law which provides for the imposition and appropriation of fines or other pecuniary penalties, or for the demand and payment and appropriation of fees for licenses or for services, and does not otherwise impose any tax or appropriate any part of the public revenue, may originate either in the house of representatives or in the senate.

I thought it just as well to invite the attention of hon. members to this suggested amendment, because it maybe thought that it has the merit of making the intention more definite. On the other hand, there may be hon. members who think that the widest possible meaning should be given to the words "having for their main object," It struck me that to avoid that inconvenience and unnecessary trouble which occurs when the second chamber is prohibited to deal with matters which incidentally impose a fee, such as a license fee, or which ask a fee for services rendered, under which circumstances it has often been ruled that such bills cannot be introduced in the second chamber those of us who think it has been a needless. harassment, as I do, may very well vote for an amendment of this sort if we think that the words "having for their main object" are rather undefined as they stand. But I think it is well to consider whether this is or is not a desirable amendment.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH (Tasmania)[10.39]:

Who is to define the words "main object" the president of the senate, or the speaker of the house of representatives, or the minister, or executive, who introduces the bill? It is very certain that the word "main" is not sufficiently definite, and I also fully understand that the purpose of the Adelaide Convention was to give to the senate power for the introduction of a bill, whose object was only incidentally to collect a charge, as, for instance, a toll, or some fee for services rendered. If you leave out the word "main," therefore, and state definitely what you mean, namely, "a proposed law which provides for the imposition and appropriation of fines, or other pecuniary penalties, or for the demand, and payment, and appropriation of fees for licenses or for services," then you certainly get more near a definition than we have at the present time. If it can be improved upon, so much the better. The word "main" is certainly indefinite and unsatisfactory. More difficulties are likely to arise if we leave the provision in an indefinite form than if we attempt to make it definite.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid (New South Wales)[10.40]:

If we strike out the word "main" it will not remove the difficulty, because the ambiguity will be as great as before; but in accordance with the suggested amendment read by the Chairman we can make the clause read "proposed laws appropriating," which will get back to the phrase employed in the bill of 1891, and we can then add to the clause a very valuable amendment suggested by the Tasmanian legislature which, while leaving the wording of the clause similar to that in most of our constitution note, will give the senate power to introduce measures in which the appropriation of a fee or the creation of expenditure is a mere incident in the main scope of the bill. No man of any sense or moderation would call such a bill a money bill in the sense that it must be introduced in the lower chamber. The amendment suggested by the Tasmanian legislature would enable bills of this kind to be introduced in the senate without difficulty. I would suggest the omission of the words:

"having for their main object the appropriation of" with a view to the insertion of the word it appropriating."

The Chairman:

The omission of the words "having for their main object" has already been put from the Chair.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

Then I think we might fairly agree to the striking out of those words upon the understanding that words are to be added to the clause enabling the senate to initiate bills of a certain character.

The Hon. J.N. Bruncker (New South Wales)[10.43]:

Whilst I concur in the proposition of the right hon. gentleman, I would suggest that the word "licenses," occurring in the amendment suggested by the Tasmanian legislature, should be omitted.

An Hon. MEMBER:
We have not come to that yet!
Amendment agreed to.
Amendment (Right Hon. G.H. REID) proposed:
That the words "the appropriation of" be omitted with the view to the insertion of the word "appropriating."

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[10.45]:
As I understand that the word "main" has now been struck out-

An Hon. MEMBER:
No; the words having for their main object" have been struck out!

Mr. SYMON:
That is a very important amendment, and I am sorry that I did not understand at the time what words it was proposed to omit.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Did not the hon. and learned member hear the explanation of the right hon. member, Mr. Reid?

Mr. SYMON:
I always listen with a great deal of interest to what my right hon. friend has to say; but this morning I was not able to hear him. To my mind the Tasmanian amendment would be ineffective. I do not think that the omission of the words "having for their main object" will enable us to attain the end which we could have attained if the words had been left in the clause: "Proposed laws having for their object the appropriation of" is a phrase very different from the phrase "proposed laws appropriating." The very sweeping effect of the amendment to which I understand we have agreed is not helped by the introduction of the Tasmanian amendment dealing with fines, licenses, and matters of that kind. It reduces the powers of the senate to a mere farce. Of course, I cannot deny that the amendment now proposed is grammatically a good one; but I think some attention will have to be directed to this matter by those who wish to see the senate clothed with more satisfactory and reasonable powers in relation to money bills.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The words were in the original bill!

Mr. SYMON:
I know that; but the origination of money bills is a very important function. So far as the mere grammatical amendment now proposed is concerned, I have no objection to it; but if I had clearly heard what was being done, and understood the effect of the last amendment before it was carried I should have desired to have had some discussion upon it.

The CHAIRMAN:
I have overlooked the fact that the legislature of New South Wales has suggested the insertion of the word "for," which is a prior amendment to that suggested by the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, and must, therefore, be put first.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[10.48]:
I was under the impression at the time you put the last amendment, Mr. Chairman, that you intended to put the Tasmanian amendment afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN:
I explained to the Committee that if anyone wished to move an amendment upon the amendment he could do so!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
That was my idea. I think the amendment one of great importance.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Which amendment?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
The amendment of my right hon. friend.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It is merely a verbal amendment!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I think not. As I understand the amendment, if it is carried the clause will read "proposed laws for appropriating."

Mr. MCMILLAN:
That may make a slight difference!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Those words may mean the same as the words that have been struck out. There has been a difficulty in Victoria for twenty years over this subject, and the two houses are still debating it. With an example of that kind before us, it will not be beginning very well with the federal parliament if we allow this doubt to exist.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
My amendment avoids that difficulty!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Truly enough it avoids the difficulty, but it does not avoid the difficulty in the way in which the majority of the Convention desire to avoid it; because, if you simply say "bills appropriating," as long as there is no appropriation, however trifling, in any bill, there is no power of origination.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

I am moving this amendment with the object of allowing other words to be put in, giving the senate the power of amendment of bills, the main object of which is not appropriation.

Mr. Wise:

It will bring it back to the same as it was in 1891!

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer:

We altered the language because it was not sufficient.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

We are endeavouring to meet all you want by inserting subsequent words!

The Hon. Sir J.W. Downer:

I will carefully examine the subsequent words, and I have no doubt the hon. member will guarantee that they will be well considered. It seems to me that having omitted the words, "having for their main object," we have removed the matter beyond question much more clearly than the words will do which the Tasmania representatives propose.

Mr. Higgins (Victoria)[10.53]:

I think the hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, and the Hon. Sir John Downer, are under a misapprehension with regard to the object of the Right Hon. G.H. Reid's proposal. It will be understood that I have no dark design in this matter. I think we are all agreed as to what we want. I understand no one wishes to give to the senate the power of originating ordinary money or appropriation bills.

The Hon. H. Dobson:

Having for their main object!

Mr. Higgins:

Exactly; ordinary appropriation, or taxation bills. At the same time, I think there is no one who desires to prevent the senate from originating a bill which incidentally imposes a fine or fee, or to appropriate a small part of the revenue as incidental to the main object. The whole difficulty has arisen over the words "main object."

The Hon. H. Dobson:

Because you cannot define "main," you want to cut away the power from the senate!

Mr. Higgins:
I hope the hon. member will not adopt a suspicious and fearsome attitude with regard to any suggestion from the larger states.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
The amendment suggested by the Tasmanian Parliament goes a good way towards removing the difficulty!

Mr. HIGGINS:
If the proposal from Tasmania, which, I understand, was suggested by Mr. Clark, was adopted, it would achieve the object of the Convention.

An Hon. MEMBER:
No, it would not!

Mr. HIGGINS:
It simply means that all bills appropriating money, or imposing any tax, must originate in the house of representatives; but there is an exception. The only question is, whether the exception would cover all the matters which we wish to cover. I have looked at those words carefully, and they seem to me to cover all that any person who wants even extreme rights to be given to the senate could possibly wish. The Right Hon. G.H. Reid, in his excellent speech, which I understand was not heard by hon. members at the end of the chamber, indicated what the proposed amendment should be. The Tasmanian amendment says:

But a proposed law which provides for the imposition and appropriation of fines or other pecuniary penalties, or for the demand and payment and appropriation of fees for licenses or for services-

That will include appropriation, as will be seen-and does not otherwise impose any tax or appropriate any part of the public revenue, may originate either in the house of representatives or in the senate.

I do hope that such an excellent proposal as this, which, I think, really meets the views of members as a whole, will be adopted. If you put in the word "for," it will lead to those unending quarrels which have arisen in Victoria, I think very uselessly, and fruitlessly, between the Legislative Assembly and Council. In Victoria we have the words "for appropriating." The Council insists that the word "for" indicates that it must be a bill which has for its main object appropriation. The Assembly insists that it matters not what are the objects, that even these little bills providing for appropriation must be originated in the Assembly. That quarrel has never been settled, and has led to a great loss of time and temper. I hope the word "for" will not be put in the bill. I think the representatives of the larger states have no intention of depriving the senate of the power to impose these fines, fees, and penalties, and even to appropriate these fines, fees, and penalties.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[10.57]:
I wish to mention now that if this word "for" is put in I shall move the addition of the words "their chief purpose." At the time the question was put I did not know whether that had not been suggested by some of my colleagues, and therefore I did not insist upon a division although I called for one. Others beside myself allowed the amendment to be put under a complete misapprehension.

The CHAIRMAN:
I may say that I shall not be able to accept the amendment indicated by the hon. member, because it would be reopening a question which we have already decided.

Mr. GLYNN:
There has been some confusion about the matter, and if I assure the Committee that I called for a division, I would like to know if it is now too late to insist upon a division?

The CHAIRMAN:
Yes; it is too late now. I did not hear the hon. member.

An Hon. MEMBER:
I heard the hon. member, Mr. Glynn, call for a division!

Mr. GLYNN:
As you, sir, say it is now too late, I will simply say that later on I will make a proposition to add the words, "having for their chief purpose." I do not think the amendment suggested by the Tasmanian Parliament goes far enough.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Will it not be better to remove any ambiguity?

Mr. GLYNN:
Of course there is a great difficulty in filling up all the details so as to cover the general meaning.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Who is to decide what is the chief object?

Mr. GLYNN:
That is the point which shows the necessity of being particularly careful. Under our existing constitutions that point is decided by the houses themselves, but under this bill I think the question as to the main object of a bill might have to be interpreted on a case arising in litigation by the Supreme Court. That shows the necessity of being far more careful than even when such words are in the constitutions of our local parliaments. It has been pointed out that there has been a dispute in Victoria as to the meaning of the word "for" in connection with the word "appropriating," and that dispute is not yet settled after many years. Will it not be well to have the question as to the main object decided at once by putting in the necessary words? A definition to be complete ought to be sufficiently general to cover everything that can possibly be covered by specification.
But in specifying in detail we are almost sure to leave out something. Look at the Tasmanian amendment. Supposing it is desired to introduce a bill like the railway commissioners bill, fixing, the salaries of the railway commissioners? That bill could not, under the Tasmanian amendment, be introduced in the senate, because it would not be a question of fines, penalties, and fees for services, but a question of salary. I simply mention this as a case in point. The point, as regards the railway commissioners bill, was brought up in South Australia. There was a dispute there as to whether there was power to amend the bill, simply because it fixed the salary of the railway commissioners in one of its clauses; and the point raised was that it was not a money bill, although it contained one or two clauses relating to money matters.

The Hon. H. DOBSON (Tasmania)[11.2]:

I think the clause before the Committee has a more important and wider scope than hon. members seem to attribute to it; but you, Mr. Chairman, put the matter exceedingly clearly, and the Premier of New South Wales was also equally clear. Some of us, however, were busy with our letters and telegrams, and did not quite see the importance of what was being done. As I understand the matter when it was found that we departed from the 1891 bill, and allowed the senate to be elected by the direct vote of the people, and when we refused to give to the senate the power to amend a money bill, and only left them with power to suggest, the Convention, I understand, wanted to give them a slight quid pro quo, and in inserting the words "having for their main object" they wanted the senate to initiate bills in their own chamber, the main objects of which were not the appropriation of revenue. The hon. member, Mr. Higgins, and others are, I think, unintentionally and unwittingly cutting down the power which was advisedly and directly given to the senate in recommending the striking out of those words. The authority or power to the senate to introduce a bill which can simply impose a paltry fine or penalty is practically nothing, and it is not the kind of bill the senate would wish to originate.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Can the hon. member mention one they would wish to originate?

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

I am going to mention one, and I would be glad to hear what the right hon. gentleman thinks of it. Hon. members will notice that the Attorney-General of Tasmania has put in the words "fees for licenses or for services." He put in those words upon a suggestion from myself, when I raised the point in Tasmania which I am now raising here. How can we have fees or licenses for service? What I suggest is that the senate may wish to be an active legislative body. Whilst the members of the house of representatives are busy with their finances, the senate may wish to go into the question of defence; they may wish to go into the question of establishing schools for meteorology, or other matters, which are handed over to the federal parliament; and if they introduce a very useful bill which the federation wishes for, but which involves the payment for services of a secretary or clerk to the extent of £1,000 or £2,000 a year, I understand that that is the kind of bill which this clause enables the senate, under the terms of the Adelaide Convention, to introduce.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

We should want a message from the governor for that!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

We should want a message from the governor, but the minister in the senate would bring the message from the governor. I understand that that was the quid pro quo offered to the senate because it was to be elected on manhood suffrage, and was not to have power to amend money bills, but only to suggest amendments. I would point out to the Premier of New South Wales that there would be scores of bills in time to come whose main object would not be the appropriation of revenue, but whose object could not be carried out without the appropriation of was understood to say that he hoped power would be given to the senate to introduce all bills excepting appropriation bills, bills imposing taxation, and loan bills. If we confined ourselves to that be thought there would be no difficulty.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales)[11.6]:

I think we all know exactly what we want, but the difficulty is to carry it out. We all know what we mean by those bills, which simply incidentally imply a money expenditure; but, although I am sure those who believe in strengthening the senate as much as possible are anxious to meet this difficulty, still, we must have no apprehension in the future. I cannot see what tribunal has been erected outside the Supreme Court which could define what is and what is not a money bill. Therefore, it seems to me that whilst a definition such as that proposed by Tasmania does very much to reduce the power of the senate because it is often the unforeseen that happens, and this is an attempt to define what is practically undefinable still, to my mind, it is the nearest approach we can make to this compromise. I look with the most absolute horror on the idea of any question between the two houses as to their separate jurisdiction. Therefore, whilst I have not sufficient knowledge to say whether the proposal of Tasmania is sufficiently large, still it does seem to me that whatever proviso we insert must be absolutely clear and unmistakable.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON (South Australia)

I shall be found recording my vote in favour of inserting the word "for," and one of my reasons for agreeing to the adoption of that word is that it is found in the Constitution Act, under which there has been a fairly harmonious working between the two branches of the legislature. In the 1st section of our Constitution Act, by which the two houses of the local parliament are established, a proviso is added that

All bills for appropriating any part of the revenue, or for imposing, altering, or repealing any rate, tax, duty, or impost shall originate in the House of Assembly.

I am prepared, so far as I can, to endeavour to place a provision in the Commonwealth Bill similar to that which we have in the Constitution Act. I am glad indeed that we have struck out the provision by which it is stipulated that the test as to whether or not the senate shall have the right to originate bills should depend as to whether or not the main object of the bill is a certain thing. I see in an indefinite definition, so to speak, an abundant source of future doubt and difficulty. We have had experience in the Victorian legislature as regards the use of this word, and in view of the difficulties which have arisen in the past, I think we shall be false to our trust if, in framing a constitution which will be acceptable to the people, we do not endeavour to prevent, as far as practicable, the possibility of dispute if we do not do all that we can to make the statute so clear that he who runs may read.

An Hon. MEMBER:

Will not the amendment make the clause more obscure?

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON:

It might make it obscure from some points of view; but I do not think it will generally, and for this reason: We ourselves have not had much trouble in ascertaining its meaning. I think, however, that what the Convention is determined to do is to adopt an expression which will tell us more clearly than we have it in the clause at present, what we really mean. I welcome the suggestion of the Tasmanian Parliament. No doubt the matter has been most carefully considered. It is not very difficult, I think, to observe in the amendment the handiwork of our friend, Mr. Inglis Clark, and I trust that by the addition of words such as he proposes we shall leave no loophole for those difficulties which have existed in the past; but that we shall define the relative rights of the two houses, with reference to the origination of these bills, in a way which will be acceptable to the two chambers, and which will promote the interests of the commonwealth.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales)[11.12]:

I am of opinion that the adjustment of these money clauses, which took place in 1891, is, on the whole, the fairest that can be made as between the colonies. The clause corresponding to this clause in the bill of 1891 reads thus:

Laws appropriating any part of the public revenue, or imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the house of representatives.

I take it that the desire of the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales is to retain this clause. The Right Hon. Sir George Turner moved a similar amendment, which was defeated by only four votes. I voted with the right hon. gentleman on that occasion, and I should like to explain that I have not changed my opinion. I am quite prepared to go in the direction indicated by the amendment of Mr. Inglis Clark which not only makes things a good deal more definite, but is a step beyond the bill of 1891 by way of making the legislative machinery work more smoothly, and securing to the senate that degree of individuality in matters of this kind of which it would be a scandal to deprive them through some matter of construction. I think that the addition contemplated by Mr. Inglis Clark might be made; but I think, also, that with that exception we should adhere to the lines of the adjustment made in 1891, because I believe it to be on the whole the fairest adjustment in the interests of the individual colonies, and also the best solution of this difficult money question in the interests of constitutional government. I hope the amendment suggested by the right hon. the Prime Minister of New South Wales will be adopted.

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid (New South Wales)[11.14]:

I believe the amendment put from the Chair is to insert the word "for," which precedes the amendment I desire to move. I would suggest to the Convention that inasmuch as we know as a matter of fact that the word "for" has created unending disputes between houses of an Australian legislature, we, with our eyes open to that fact, should incur a serious responsibility if we were to imitate that form of words. As I said in Adelaide, I am quite in favour of brushing away all those artificial difficulties which would prevent the senate from initiating bills of a general character where money comes in incidentally; for I have never been opposed to the senate having perfect freedom in those matters. I think we are all agreed upon that. I think, however, that we all owe one duty to the people of the future commonwealth, and that is, that we should not, with our eyes open put into the constitution a form of words which, as a matter of simple fact, we know to have caused endless disputes in a colony of the future commonwealth. With our eyes open to that state of things, we should be incurring a serious responsibility if we adopted precisely the same form of words. With reference to the fact that in the South Australian Constitution there is the word "for"; it is, in my opinion, a loose expression, which is calculated to give rise in a federal community to a great deal of dispute. Having removed that source of ambiguity, I am prepared to agree to any reasonable enlargement of the Tasmanian amendment in order to make it quite clear that we do not wish to prohibit the senate from initiating general legislation involving only incidentally the appropriation of money.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[11.16]:

There is no doubt to my mind that the Tasmanian suggestion will make the powers of the senate less than they are under the bill. Some hon. members, I know, are of a different opinion. My right hon. friend, Mr. Kingston, seems to think that it would be better to diminish powers that ought to be diminished than to use words having any ambiguity. I think the words originally in the clause stated that which was intended fairly enough. The right hon. the Premier of New South Wales has spoken of bills which incidentally impose expenditure. It seems to me that these words are clear enough, and I do not see why there should be difficulty in construing words which we understand thoroughly well when used colloquially, about which there is no difficulty, when those words get into an act of parliament. I object to the word "for." It seems to me that the alteration now proposed is a distinct diminution of the powers of the senate, and I think it is meant. The Tasmanian amendment probably contains everything which the ingenious draftsman could think of at the moment. Mr. Inglis Clark is a lover of precision, and he would rather diminish the powers of the senate a little than not be precise in his draftsmanship. The hon. gentleman has put into this addition everything he could think of which might represent the incidentals; but there are many things which may not be, and which experience will allow, are not contained within these words. The result will be that the senate will have no jurisdiction where they might have had it had the clause not been altered.

The Hon. E. Barton (New South Wales)[11.19]:

I might point out that this is really an adaptation of what is a standing order of the House of Commons, in which it is provided that the House will not insist upon its privileges in certain cases. Substantially, the cases there defined are the cases mentioned in this amendment. I thought it well to mention that matter. It will be better to have this provision in the constitution. In practice, the House of Lords exercises no power in the origination or amendment of money bills, and the friction caused by the want of power led to the passing of the standing order by the House of Commons, and it is constantly availed of by the House of Lords.

Question-That the word "for" be inserted-negatived.

The CHAIRMAN:

It is now proposed to strike out the words "the appropriation of," line 2. Question-That the words stand part of the clause-negatived. Question-That the word "appropriating" be inserted-agreed to. Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria agreed to:

Omit "the imposition of," line 3. Insert "imposing."

Amendment suggested by the House of Assembly of Tasmania:

At the end of clause add "but a proposed law which provides for the imposition and appropriation of fines or other pecuniary penalties, or for the demand and payment and appropriation of fees for licenses or for services, and does not otherwise impose any tax or appropriate any part of the public revenue, may originate either in the house of representatives or in the senate."

The Hon. J.H. Gordon (South Australia):

I would draw the attention of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, to the wording of this amendment. I would suggest that the word "and" after the word "demand," and also after the word payment," should be "or."

Amendments substituting "or" for and," in line 4 of proposed amendment, agreed to.

Suggested amendment, as amended, proposed.

The Hon. H. Dobson (Tasmania)[11.23]:

In this amendment the Attorney-General of Tasmania put in the word "services" in order to retain that power to the senate which the original clause gave it. As I read the clause with the word "services" in it, it appears to me that there is something which ought to be seen to. The hon. member, Mr. Higgins, in his speech, went on to say that we had power to appropriate, and there he stopped, and then he said "fees and licenses." Now, the senate does not care twopence about appropriating fees and licenses. We want to appropriate a small part of the revenue for services rendered. The senate may have to introduce health laws; it may have to introduce laws in reference to immigration, and it may want to pay the salary of a secretary or an inspector to the amount, perhaps, of £300, £400, or even £1,000 a year. I understand that these were the kind of laws which the senate might initiate as laws not having for their main object the appropriation of revenue. I desire to call the attention of the leader of the Convention and the other lawyers present to the fact that the word "services" ought to come out, or else something should be put before it. The amendment is hardly sense as it reads now.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[11.25]:

At the first blush I thought the proposed amendment rather limited the powers of the senate; but on close examination I find that its operation will be to largely increase the powers of that chamber. Under these words, "the appropriation of fees for licenses or for services," we are proposing now to hand over to the senate powers which, in the draft as it left us in Adelaide, were not conferred upon that body. Under this proviso the senate will have power to originate bills which will practically regulate the whole of the mining industry in the territories which come under its jurisdiction. It will not regulate the mining industry with regard to colonies, but with regard to territories which, under the 116th clause, may become vested in the commonwealth. The whole of the mining industry there will be regulated, and we know that taxation received from the mining industry is in the form of licenses. More than that, the whole of the postal revenue will be placed in the hands, so far as its collection and appropriation is concerned, of the senate equally with the house of representatives, because the large revenue which the commonwealth will derive from the postal business will consist of fees for services rendered.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:

They must always get a governor's message before they can move!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

In addition to the Governor's message, the words in clause 54 restrict the power of the senate to interfere in money bills, unless for merely an incidental purpose. We may have a postal bill introduced, having for its sole purpose the question of raising the postage on the mail matter of the commonwealth. Even if a message had preceded such a bill, it could not be introduced in the senate, but would have to be introduced in the house of representatives. We have also handed over to the commonwealth the question of Australasian fisheries. The whole of the revenue from those fisheries will be derived from fees or licenses. Prior to this amendment being proposed, the senate had no power in the bill to interfere with that great interest, as regards the revenue derived from it, or the appropriation of that revenue. Under this amendment, the whole of the revenue and the appropriation of it would be a matter of equal concern with the senate as with the house of representatives. That would be unduly enlarging the scope of the authority of the senate, and enlarging it beyond what we agreed upon in Adelaide. Although, as regards the colonies which have self-governing powers at the present time, these difficulties may not appear to be great, yet as regards the territories which would be handed over, some time or other, to the commonwealth, we should have the power of the purse to a large extent in the hands of the senate, which does not represent the individuals concerned, but which is supposed to be a body to conserve state rights. With regard to this financial jurisdiction over the territories there can be no claim as to state rights being involved, as the territories will, perhaps, have no state rights to be conserved in the senate. I warn hon. members that we are unduly enlarging, by this provision, the powers of the senate. The amendment proposed in the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, was in the direction of restricting those powers and going back to the compromise made in 1891. We carried those amendments, and it would be merely taking away that which has already been granted by the amendments passed, and superadding, to the powers of the senate, if we agreed to the amendment now proposed. Then, again, navigation is handed over as one of the subjects to be dealt with by the commonwealth. A large portion of the revenue of the commonwealth will be derived from the imposition of what are called harbour dues or tonnage rates. These are practically fees for services rendered. They will come under the broad definition in this proviso. We shall have the power handed over to the senate of originating laws, preceded, of course, by a message, which will wholly and solely deal with these questions of the imposition of harbour dues or tonnage rates.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
A message would only be required in case of their appropriation!

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
These laws, therefore, could be introduced without a message.
The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
But harbour dues and tonnage rates are scarcely fees-they are charges!
The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
With regard to harbour dues, most of the colonies collect them as fees for services rendered in the shape of pilotage and other matters. The plea on which harbour dues are imposed is that they are fees for services rendered by the pilot service. The wharfage rates may stand on a different footing, but the harbour dues are in Newcastle and Sydney, and I dare say in Melbourne, largely imposed on account of the services rendered by the various officers of the Government. In regard to the mining industry, the fisheries industry where the revenue is collected in the form of licenses in regard to other industries which would be carried on in a territory, the revenue would be derived in the form of fees. In regard to the postal business, the revenue is derived in the form of fees. And in regard to navigation, the revenue is derived in the form of fees. If we are going to hand over the power of originating bills to impose and appropriate those revenues we are whittling away all the power, which we claim for the lower house the power of the purse. If we begin to whittle them away in that direction, we might as well concede the whole thing, and give co-ordinate powers in matters of finance to the senate.
The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
Why not wipe out the senate altogether?
The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
I do not intend simply to speak; I desire to test the feeling of the Convention by moving the emission of the words, for the demand and payment and appropriation of fees for licenses or for services,-
Mr. MCMILLAN:
Read further on!
The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
and does not otherwise impose any tax or appropriate-
Does not the hon. member see that those words govern the latter words he calls my attention to? As long as the proposed bill only appropriated these fees or licenses, or other services, and does not otherwise appropriate any part of the public revenue, that bill will be introduced into the senate.
The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
What harm will be done?
The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
I move:
That the words "for licenses or other services "be omitted with the view to the insertion in their place of the words "of office."
I propose the amendment so that bills may not be introduced in the senate for the purpose of appropriating or collecting what are known as fees of office such fees as are collected by clerks of petty sessions, and minor fees collected by various officers in different parts of the colony. I wish to limit the powers of the senate in such a way that in those matters which are largely sources of revenue for licenses or for public services, the senate shall not have co-ordinate powers with the house of representatives.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales):[11.33]

I do not anticipate the dangers from this suggested amendment that seem to have suggested themselves to my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers. I do not think that there is anything in this addition to the clause which need arouse the susceptibilities of or need alarm anyone who, like myself, is a strong believer in the system of responsible government being conserved by the ultimate custody of the public purse being in one house. I do not think there can be any danger of that sort. Perhaps I had better read the standing order of the House of Commons which has been adopted in South Australia:

The Hon. N.E. LEWIS:

And in Tasmania!

The Hon. E. BARTON:

And in Tasmania also, I believe. I do so in order to show that a similar provision to this is not regarded by the House of Commons as leading to any infringement of its privileges on the put of the House of Lords. The following is the standing order of the Legislative Assembly of South Australia, and it is virtually a copy of the standing order of the House of Commons:

With respect to any bill brought to the House from the Legislative Council or returned by the Legislative Council to the House with amendments, whereby any pecuniary penalty, forfeiture, or fee shall be authorised, imposed, appropriated, regulated, varied, or extinguished, the House will not insist on its privileges in the following cases:-

1. When the object of such pecuniary penalty or forfeiture is to secure the execution of the act, or the punishment or prevention of offences.

2. Where such fees are imposed in respect of benefit taken or service rendered under the act, and in order to the execution of the act, and are not made payable into the Treasury-

That is to say, when there is no specific provision made that it should be made into the public Treasury.

or in aid of the. public revenue, and do not form the ground of public accounting by the parties receiving the same either in respect of deficit or surplus:
3. When such bill shall be a private bill for a local or personal act.

The Right Hon. Sir G. TURNER:
These words are wider than those!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Yes, a little wider; but the extent to which they are wider is not enough to alarm any one.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:
Why not insert after the word "services" the words under the proposed law "?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
I think that that would be a proper limitation. But even without those words, I think that there is nothing in the suggested amendment which need cause alarm to any one, or make any one suppose that the house of representatives are in any sense surrendering the control of the public purse.

Mr. TRENWITH:

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Yes; there is a marked difference between inserting something in a standing order and inserting it in an act of Parliament; but we must, recollect that the standing orders of the, House of Commons have been so long in existence, and have regulated the practice so uniformly for a long period of time, that they have now acquired such force that there ought not to be any bar to their being inserted in the constitution. I think that is a fair answer. If we want to avoid ambiguity, confusion, and unseemly quarrels between the two houses of legislature we had better take this opportunity of making a reasonable definition. Therefore, I think that these words may be retained. But I ask you, Sir, to put the amendment proposed by the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, in a limited form, because I wish to make a slight amendment even before that suggested by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs. So that there shall not be any misconstruction as to the meaning of the words "for services," I propose to make the amendment read "appropriation of fees for licenses or fees for services," and then to add the words "under the proposed law." I ask you, sir, to put Mr. Carruthers amendment in such a way as to permit of this afterwards coming on.

The CHAIRMAN:
I will put it in this way: that the words "fees or licenses" proposed to be struck out stand part of the proposed amendment. But I understand that the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, wishes to withdraw the proposed amendment.
The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
There being no chance of carrying the amendment which I have proposed, and the amendment proposed by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, going somewhat in the same direction, I beg leave to withdraw my amendment.
Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (by Hon. E. BARTON) proposed:
That after the word "or," line 5, of proposed amendment, the word fees" be inserted.

The Hon. J.H. GORDON (South Australia)[11.38]:
"Fees for services" appears to me not to include salaries. There is a distributive idea about the word "fee" which would imply short and temporary services,

The Hon. E. BARTON:
There is nothing in this amendment at any stage which will cover salaries!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
Then, I think, it ought to cover payment for salaries.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That comes in the annual appropriation bill!

The Hon. J.H. GORDON:
But still the intention of the clause is to give to the senate the power of appropriating money for salary under a bill which the Assembly has passed.

The Hon. E. BARTON:
That might allow the senate to real with the appropriation of money for carrying on the civil service!

Mr. WISE:
Or for originating a new department of the civil service!

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Very nearly. At any rate, it would enable the senate to go shares in the appropriation for the civil service!

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia)[11.41]:
I wish to insert after the word "services" the words "or as incidental to its policy of salaries." The case I have in mind is that of measures such as that under which the Railway Commissioners have been appointed. I think that in all the colonies the railway boards have been created by acts which fix the salaries of the commissioners, and in South Australia we had a dispute as to whether a measure of that kind was a money bill. The position I took up was that such a measure was not a money bill, that the term "money bill" ought to be abolished, and that for the future we should speak of money clauses in a bill. Originally all bills of the Commons were practically money bills. After some time it came to be the practice to mix up matters of general policy with matters of finance. If a bill like a bill appointing Railway Commissioners was introduced into the senate, and became law, the question of its validity might subsequently have to be decided by the Supreme Court.

The Hon. R.E. O'CONNOR:

Would the hon. member claim the right to introduce a bill of that kind in the senate?

Mr. GLYNN:

Decidedly. Why should we not introduce a bill for the creation of a public service board, or any measure of that kind in the senate? As a matter of convenience such bills have often been introduced in the Legislative Council of South Australia. We had a bill introduced there recently providing, for the consolidation of the electoral laws of the colony; but because that bill incorporated clauses for the payment of fees and salaries it was found necessary to divide it into two, and a bill was drafted to separate the two kinds of provisions. If the words which I suggest are inserted in the amendment it will get rid of the difficulty pointed out by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Barton, that you might, under the general term of salaries, perhaps bring in a bill appropriating the salaries necessary for the carrying out of the work of the state.

The CHAIRMAN:

I will first put the amendment proposed by the hon. member, Mr. Barton. Amendments (inserting "fees" before "for services," and inserting "under the proposed law after "services") agreed to.

Amendment (by Mr. GLYNN) proposed:

That, after the words last inserted, the words or as incidental to its policy of salaries " be inserted.

The Hon. E. BARTON (New South Wales)[11.45]:

I think we can scarcely insert these words. The limitation created by the words "I incidental to its policy" is almost so wide as scarcely to be properly called a limitation. A thing incidental to the policy of a measure is a very large order indeed; and I think that, if we agreed to the amendment, it would throw us again into that very troubled obscurity and confusion which it is our purpose to avert.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

The two questions are, what is an incident, and what is a policy?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

A big loan might be incidental to a policy!

The Hon. E. Barton:

How are we to ask a president or a speaker, they being officers removed from all party considerations, and supposed to be purely impartial, to define the policy of a government or of a member in connection with any measure? That is a task which we could not impose upon such an authority.

Amendment negatived.

Amendments (by the Hon. E. Barton) agreed to:

That after the word "revenue," line 7 of proposed amendment, the word "or moneys" be inserted.

That the words "either in the house of representatives or," lines 7 and 8, be omitted.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Clause, amended as under, agreed to.

Proposed laws appropriating any part of the public revenue or moneys, or imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the house of representatives. But a proposed law which provides for the imposition and appropriation of fines or other pecuniary penalties, or for the demand or payment or appropriation of fees for licenses or fees for services under the proposed law, and does not otherwise impose any tax or appropriate any part of the public revenue or moneys, may originate in the senate.

Clause 55.(1) The senate shall have equal power with the house of representatives in respect of all proposed laws, except laws imposing taxation and laws appropriating the necessary supplies for the ordinary annual services of the government, which the senate may affirm or reject, but may not amend. But the senate may not amend any proposed law in such a manner as to increase any proposed charge or burden on the people.

(2) Laws imposing taxation shall deal with the imposition of taxation only.

(3) Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of customs on imports or of excise, shall deal with one subject of taxation only; but laws imposing duties of customs shall deal with duties of customs only, and laws imposing duties of excise shall deal with duties of excise only.

(4) The expenditure for services other than the ordinary annual services of the government shall not be authorised by the same law as that which appropriates the supplies for the ordinary annual services, but shall be authorised by a separate law or laws.
(5) In the case of a proposed law which the senate may not amend, the senate may at any stage return it to the house of representatives with a message requesting the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein. And the house of representatives may, if it thinks fit, make such omissions or amendments, or any of them, with or without modifications.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of Western Australia:
Sub-clause I. Omit "laws imposing taxation and," lines 3 and 4.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia)[11.49]:
The important question involved in the amendment was dealt with by the Convention of 1891, and again at the beginning of this year in Adelaide. On both occasions it was desired by a considerable section almost half the members of the Convention that the words proposed to be struck out should be so struck out; but, in both cases, there was a majority in favour of restricting the powers of the senate. I do not want to take up the time of the Convention unnecessarily; but, inasmuch as the matter has gone a stage further since our meeting in Adelaide, I have no option but to again ask hon. members to give a vote upon it. Since we met in Adelaide, the bill has been before the various parliaments of the continent, and in some of them, at any rate in the colony I represent, both houses of Parliament have suggested the alteration which I now propose in this clause. The object of those who desire that these words should find a place in the bill, is, of course, to make the senate less powerful than we desire it should be. We were told in 1891, and in March of this year, and we will be told again today, that if these words are omitted from the clause, there cannot be federation, that the larger colonies will not have anything to do with it, and that the desire of the smaller states is to coerce the larger ones. Specious arguments, no doubt, will be used, and will have their full effect, and if they fail, then we will be threatened. That was generally the course pursued on the two former occasions; but, nevertheless, I have a duty to fulfil to the Parliament whose representative I am, and I shall do my best before I sit down, and in as few words as I can, to place the case before hon. members.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
The hon. member has never threatened!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
No.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I will tell the hon. member the reason because he has always had his own way!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
That is a very clever interjection no doubt; but, as a matter of fact, I have never had my own way in this matter at any rate, for I have been defeated on both occasions in 1891, and in the beginning of this year—with regard to this clause. I cannot understand the fear which is expressed by the larger colonies. I cannot see that there is anything to fear on their part with regard to this federation. I am sure they will be strong enough to hold their own in the future as they have been in the past. I cannot understand why they should take up the position they do with regard to this and every other matter where it is desired to make the senate of the commonwealth strong. Only yesterday we were told, because the majority of this Committee desired that in future the proportion should exist between the senate and the house of representatives of one to two, for that reason Victoria would not be able to enter the commonwealth. If there were any disadvantage to be suffered by any particular state, I could understand that argument; but, seeing we are all in the same boat, and that every one of the states is to be in the same position with regard to the number of representatives, I cannot see how it should affect one large, important, and wealthy state like Victoria more adversely than it would affect New South Wales, Queensland, or any other portion of Australia. When I was away from the Convention, and when I had no opportunity of opposing it, a clause was inserted in the bill with regard to the elections to the house of representatives, providing that there should be one man one vote, although that system does not exist in many of the colonies at present. Therefore the larger colonies of New South Wales and Victoria have been strong enough to have it decided that we shall altogether change our constitution with regard to the franchise in order to meet their wishes. It seems to me to be a system of coercion all round by the larger states with respect to the smaller ones. We are asked to give way in everything. Although in 1891 the Convention rejected almost unanimously, I think, the proposal that the commonwealth of the federal parliament should have anything whatever to do with the mode of election to the house of representatives by the various states, that has now gone by the board, according to the decision arrived at by the Convention in the early part of this year. Every attempt has been made to weaken the senate, and the larger states seem to be afraid—for some reason or another, but principally because they fear a combination of the smaller states of having a strong senate. I do not see why they should. They seem to consider that the senate will be a body similar to the existing upper house in the various colonies, and they desire that it should not have more power, or even as much power, as those bodies have at present. Now, by this clause, they desire that the power to amend a tariff or taxation bill shall be denied to the senate, which we have made representative of the whole of the states. Under the constitution we are creating in this bill, the senate will be far more representative of the whole of the people of the states than the members of the house of representatives will be, for the members of the house of representatives will be elected by the people of the states in various small divisions; they will be elected subject to local influences, local quarrels, and prejudices to a much larger degree, I think it will be admitted, than will be the case in the election of the whole people of the state as one electorate. Therefore, there can be no reason whatever, on the ground of logic or common-sense, why this thoroughly representative body—the senate—representing the whole people, and elected by the whole people as one constituency should not be trusted with as large powers as the house of representatives, which will be elected by various parts of a state subject to all sorts of influences. I suppose no one will deny that among all the powers that we are giving the parliament of the commonwealth, one of the most important will be the power of imposing taxation. We are giving to the commonwealth parliament power to impose taxation throughout the length and breadth of the continent. We are giving it power to borrow money for the purposes of the commonwealth. That being so, surely there should be some provision in the bill which will give to the smaller states of the commonwealth some power and influence over those great and important questions.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Who pays the taxation!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I do not know that that is any argument both houses will be representative of the people.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Yes, but the smaller states have fewer people!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
We will have fewer members in the house of representatives in consequence of that. The colonies of New South Wales and Victoria will each probably have nearly four times the number of members that the smaller colonies will have. All that it is desired to give the senate is the right of veto. The right of veto is a very important power, I do not deny that for a moment, but it is very often impossible to exercise it. Necessity may make it absolutely necessary that a taxation bill of some sort shall pass into law, and unless the senate are prepared to veto it they will have no power to insist upon any amendment of it. As we know very well, from our experience in regard to legislation in this continent, the power of veto, although a great one, cannot frequently be exercised, owing to the force of circumstances. I should like to ask whether a state, as a state, has any interest whatever as to the way in which it should be taxed? If hon. members admit that—if they will admit that a state has some right to say in what way it should be taxed, they cannot very well deny the power of the Senate to amend a taxation bill. As is apparent to every one, the number of the representatives of the smaller states, as states, in the house of representatives will be so small, as compared with the number of representatives of the larger states, that they will not have any great influence there in deciding the manner and method in which their states shall be taxed. Therefore, the only place in which they can have any influence in regard to the mode of taxation will be through their representatives in the senate.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:
What do you want equal representation in the senate for?

The Right Hon. Sir John Forrest:
There should be no fear on the part of the larger states as to the smaller states combining against them. That seems to me to be the argument generally used—that they will place themselves in subjection to the smaller states. In the first place, it is not easy to get a combination; it is not easy to find the whole of the smaller states agreeing. Is it not more likely that the smaller states will be altogether dominated by the larger ones, even though there may be more smaller states than large ones? The large populations, the environment, the surroundings, the public opinion of the place in which the meetings will be held because there can be no doubt that they will be held in one of the large colonies that the federal capital will be either in New South Wales or Victoria the press, the whole of the influences which are attached to large British communities, will be quite sufficient to prevent any combination of the smaller states to do an injustice to the larger. Even if there were such a combination, I do not believe that they would be able to carry it out. Therefore, I say, the larger states have nothing to fear in regard to combination it is merely an idea; nor do I think the smaller states have much to fear from a combination. I do not think there will be any desire on the part of either the larger or smaller states to coerce or do injustice. These things are imaginary in the minds of the people. But there need be no fear, even in imagination, so far a I can see, for the large states; but there is a sort of fear amongst the smaller states which we have to meet in dealing with this question. We have to meet the constant objection that we are to hand ourselves over body and soul to the large states. I think that, to a large extent, is imaginary; but, at the same time, it has to be faced. We all know that the occasions when the states will vote as states will not be very numerous. My great objection to limiting the senate and I am sure it ought to commend itself to hon. members is this: that it is desired by those who want to limit the powers of the senate to stamp it as an inferior body. The principal objection I have to trying to limit the powers of the senate is that there is a desire -and it has shown itself in this Convention many times to take away the power of the senate, and to stamp it as a body inferior to the house of representatives. We were told in Adelaide by some of the speakers near me by one of the members from Victoria, I do not remember which, I think it was the hon. member, Mr. Trenwith that it would all depend upon the sort of senate we created as to what powers he would give it; that if we made the senate a body representative of the whole of the people of the colonies, then he would be prepared to give it greater power. What has happened? We have taken away everything we can from the senate, and we have given nothing in return. The hon member, Mr. Trenwith, was carried away for the moment with a generous impulse, and stated that if we could only get a representative body in the senate it might be entrusted with great powers; but he thought better of it afterwards. He thought better of it after he found that we were willing to give what he wanted. Then he went back to his former position, and desired that the senate should be as weak in power as possible.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I never proposed, under any circumstances, to give the senate control over money matters!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
It was desired by many hon. members that the senate should not originate money bills. I do not object to that myself. It is proposed that it shall not have power to amend any taxation bill. To that I am opposed. It must not increase any tax, these are all concessions to the lower house and to that I agree.

The Hon. Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
That is no concession; the lower house even cannot increase a tax!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
It can by message from the Governor. The upper house cannot do anything even with a message from the Governor. Again, the upper house has no power whatever over the executive government. All these things are taken away from the senate, and are given to the house of representatives. Still, that does not satisfy, hon. members; they want to take away the power of amendment, and to give the house of representatives the sole power of taxation to provide that the states, as states, shall have no power to say anything in regard to taxation, except to reject it. In fact, as far as I can see, the leaders of what I may call the anti-senate movement in this House desire to make that branch of the legislature a sham a useless and discredited body. Now, what are the powers of the house of representatives? To begin with it makes and unmakes governments. It has the initiation of all money bills. It has control, except as to veto, in regard to the annual expenditure of the country. These are very great powers to give. It is not contended that such powers should be given to the senate. I myself do not contend for them, because I do not see how you can carry on a system of responsible government if the senate is to have power to amend the annual appropriation bill. You have already your schemes of taxation, and unless you repeal the existing taxation it would be only a new method you would be introducing, having the old one behind you, and the measure would not be as necessary as would an ordinary appropriation bill involving the carrying on of the ordinary business of the country. The power of initiation of all taxation is given to the house of representatives, and is willingly given, also the initiation of all borrowing, and that house, as I pointed out, has the control of the executive government. Surely these ought to be sufficient powers and privileges for that house without hon. members desiring to take away the one thing that the states want—that their representatives in the upper house should have the power to amend taxation bills. It seems to me that those who are opposed to giving power to the senate desire that it should be a body not in any way superior to, if indeed equal to, the existing legislative councils in the various colonies.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Hear, hear!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Hon. members do not hesitate to speak with contempt of the legislative councils of the various colonies. There is generally a sneer when anything is said about one of the legislative councils. The Legislative Council of Victoria certainly has one or two defenders here; but we know that, as a rule, all over these colonies the house of representatives sneers at, and as far as it can, treats with contempt the legislative council. Is it right that in the constitution we are desirous of building up, one branch of the legislature should be encouraged to regard with contempt and to sneer at the other branch? I said just now that there was a tendency on the part of hon. members in this Convention, as well as on the part of hon. members outside, to so limit the powers of the senate as to make it a discredited body. If the powers of the senate are to be limited and circumscribed in this way, would it not be better to sweep it away altogether? If hon. gentlemen are not prepared to give reasonable powers to the senate, a straight forward way of dealing

with the matter would be to sweep it away altogether. We want no inferior or discredited body in this constitution. We want both branches of the legislature strong; we desire that they should both live in the respect of the people. Hon. members are not satisfied with what has yet been proposed in regard to the senate. Members who are leading the attack upon the senate in this Convention, are not satisfied even to have the sole power of taxation in the house of representatives. They want in addition power to dissolve the senate, and also the power of referendum against the decisions of that body. I repeat that, rather than have provisions of that kind in the constitution, it would be better to sweep the senate away altogether. Rather than have a weak, useless, discredited body, it would be better not to have a senate at all.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Have a newspaper from each colony!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

We have often had placed before us by hon. members on both sides of this Convention, by hon. members holding all sorts of opinions, the Constitution of the United States. Is the Senate under that constitution a weak and discredited body?

Mr. TRENWITH:

It is discredited, but it is not weak!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

I think the hon. member knows very little about it. Some of us have travelled in the United States, and have had opportunities of observation there. Do the Americans tell us that the Senate is a weak and discredited body? Do those who have travelled in America say that? No; they say that it is a great and a powerful body. The very best and wisest men in the country endeavour to get into it to take part in its deliberations. What is this body in the United States? It is elected by the legislatures; it cannot be dissolved; there is no power of referendum, and it has equal powers with the House of Representatives.

Mr. TRENWITH:

It works Tammany rings!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

You will find weak spots in any system of government which ever was invented of which designing men will take advantage.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I said it was a discredited body!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
It is not a discredited body. It is one of the best legislative bodies in the world. It has equal power with the House of Representatives, and, what is more, it has the power to control the executive government. Beyond that it has stood the test of time for over 100 years, and it has flourished. Has it in any way injured or brought discredit upon the country? Has it crippled the liberties of the people? Has it impeded the progress of the United States?

Mr. TRENWITH:
Yes!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I say that the contrary is the case. You cannot say that of the Senate of the United States. It cannot be said of it that it has done any of these things. On the other hand it has promoted and maintained the glory of that great country. It is desired that there should be some power to dissolve the senate under this constitution, and that there should be some process of referendum with a view to prevent deadlocks. This is proposed notwithstanding that the senate is an elected house, and that its members must go before their constituents once in every three years. I say are also unknown in Great Britain, and they are unknown in the self-governing colonies of the empire. Why should we endeavour to improve upon those constitutions by the introduction of provisions of this kind which have been found quite unnecessary among the people of the great mother country and among the people of these colonies? We are referred in the matter of the referendum to Switzerland, but I would prefer to go for example and illustration in a matter of this kind to the self-governing colonies of our own empire and to the English-speaking people of the United States.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
The referendum of Switzerland is not the referendum which it is proposed to introduce here!

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I am not asking for anything which is unreasonable or which can be said to be unjust. All that I wish to see in this constitution are provisions which will promote our future prosperity. I do not think I need say any more. I hope that hon. members who voted for the omission of these words in 1891, and again at the beginning of this year, will stick to their colours. We have come back here fortified by the action we took on both those occasions, because we are not now speaking for ourselves; but we can speak on behalf of the parliaments of the colonies we represent.

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH (Tasmania)[12.21]:
It may be presumptuous for representatives of the smaller colonies to enter thus early into the discussion of the great question of the monetary powers of the senate; but I am emboldened by my right hon. friend who has just resumed his seat to rise and attempt to express the opinions which I know are held by many of my friends in Tasmania on this subject, and before I conclude I intend also to express my own opinion and my purpose of action. I am one of those who, in connection with the bill of 1891, and again in connection with this bill at the Adelaide Convention, strongly supported the power proposed to be given to the senate, not only to reject but to amend money bills. When the bill of 1891 came from the House of Assembly to the Legislative Council in Tasmania, I was charged with the duty of introducing an amendment in that Council by striking out the words "and not amend" in order that the bill of 1891 should provide that the senate should have power, not only to reject, but also to amend, and on a late occasion at Adelaide I voted with a like purpose. I will not anticipate my present intention by stating it now; but it maybe partially gathered by the opinion to which I give utterance—that federation in New South Wales and in Victoria has, since April last, found very many friends public men, whose opinions previously had been seriously doubted; public men, who it was feared were making use of federation for sinister or other purposes, but who by their declarations in their parliaments, and in this convention, have given to many of us who doubted their purpose the conviction that at any rate they are determined, if practicable, to obtain a true federation, and that to obtain such a federation they may be prepared to forego their own serious convictions. If, therefore, those of the smaller states who are equally desirous of securing federation approach this subject, it should be with the object of co-operating with those who have shown a desire to make concessions on important points, in order that the smaller states may not be found working as conspirators, or in actual co-operation, for the purpose of securing what may be regarded as the rights of the smaller states. I think it would be a great mistake for the smaller states to be discovered so co-operating and so conjoined time after time as to leave the conviction upon the mind of the public, when the great power of the federal parliament shall have been brought into existence, that the weaker or smaller states would be found in combination then as they have been found in combination in the Convention. I shall strive, therefore, to avoid anything which may give colour to that opinion, and shall endeavour so to act that the people at large may see that the interests of the smaller states are wrapped up in the interests of the larger States, and that we are prepared upon a great question of this kind—as New South Wales was prepared on the great question of free-trade or protection to leave to the judgment of those who will form the federal parliament the dealing with very many of these questions, and to trust the higher judgment and wisdom of that body, believing that they will be actuated by a desire to secure the good of the people as a whole, and not selfishly to promote the interests of any particular state. I speak thus, notwithstanding that I feel that I am charged with a message from Tasmania in common with my colleagues to maintain as strongly as possible the intention of securing in this bill the power to the senate of amending money bills. I have said that the 1891 bill was so amended in the House of Assembly in Tasmania, and had the bill gone to an issue in the Legislative Council, I was charged to secure a similar amendment there; and now, coming to this Convention after the local parliaments have considered the bill framed at Adelaide, I am the more convinced that there is a large majority of the legislature of Tasmania, representing a very large number of the people of Tasmania, who still feel strongly determined—even as strongly determined as my right hon. friend, Sir John Forrest to secure for the senate the powers which that right hon. gentleman has been advocating. But although the legislature and the people may desire to maintain the senate in the position of proud importance which, the right hon. gentleman desires, I am compelled to ask myself the question whether as we approach the difficulties of our deliberations, we are not approaching that period when, if concessions are to be made, they should be made now. I want, therefore, to bear in mind that the smaller states are not to have it all their own way, and that neither will the smaller states not be prepared to federate if upon some important matters their views have not been conceded. I am prepared to acknowledge that there has been a great concession. I agree that it is a right, if you please. It was claimed by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, by the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, and also by many others, that the right existed and that there has been no concession that we stand before you to-day as states having the same power by reason of our senates having equal numbers. I claim the right as much as anyone. But we may claim rights which may not be conceded, and I can quite understand that there are powers in existence throughout the community, which are backing up the powers of this Convention, who would have prevented, if possible, the granting of that as a right. But we had the speech of the hon. and learned member, Mr. Isaacs, in Victoria, admirable in its cause, admirable in its method, and admirable in its conciliation, which induced his people to give up that for which they had been clamouring.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

They have been wanting it for years!
The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

They have been wanting federation, and they need it, I think, as much as any of the colonies; but for all that we are none of us prepared to take federation at too great a price. You may buy gold too dearly, and you may buy federation too dearly; and, poor though we may be insignificant though we may be in Tasmania, it will be found that we are not prepared to buy federation at too dear a price. But when it comes to a question of drawing together the two ends of the string, to a question as to who is to jump in the one direction or the other, and when we have had the olive branch held out to us, as it has been held out to us, by New South Wales, and by those who carried the bill through the Victorian Assembly, then it seems to me that the time is coming when, while not concealing our opinions, we shall concede Something to those who have striven to meet us. I shall watch what will take place with respect to this clause, and shall watch it with the hope that some of my colleagues from Tasmania may join those three who on a former occasion voted with the majority on this particular question. It is not a matter upon which there should be a narrow majority it is now a matter on which we should either reverse that position or make the majority much more, powerful and I trust that the speeches which will be delivered on this occasion will induce many to change the opinions which they had, and to recognise that the time is coming for some concession. It is a very important matter that the senate shall have the full power of rejecting money bills. The senate will recognise the paramount importance of that power, which is embodied in our bill, and that they are not to be regarded as the nonentities to which my right hon. friend, Sir John Forrest, refers. But having that power, they will also have the power of making suggestions; and the more I think of the power of making suggestions, the more I am disposed to think that it is absolutely the power of amendment.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Oh, no! The Hon. member knows nothing about it!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

Follow the practice; and, although in the teeth of the strong opinions formed by our own respected Clerk of the Council, Mr. Nowell, I am not prepared to say it is a good system although I am not prepared to say that the power of suggesting which casts back on the house of representatives the responsibility of disobedience to their own standing orders in other words, of reviewing their own work, and amending it contrary to the parliamentary practice although I am not prepared to support the proposal as being a wiser one; yet, instead of giving to the senate the power of amendment, you give them the power of sending back the bill with their suggestions to another chamber.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Which they will treat with contempt!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
We shall soon discover if they are or are not treated with contempt. What is the difference between rejecting your amendment and rejecting your suggestion?

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:
The difference between "tweedledum" and tweedledee"!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
Surely the difference is as much as that between tweedledum" and
"tweedledee"?

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
-

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
Will it be contemptuous for the house of representatives to send back a measure with a suggestion? It surely would be equally contemptuous for them to send back the bill with an amendment? The position remains the same. If need be, there can be a conference between the two branches of the legislature. Therefore, I hold that whilst you have first of all the extravagant power of rejection by the senate, you have the minor power of suggesting which to my mind is equivalent to amendment.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Oh, no!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
I am quite prepared to magnify the position of our senate as our right
hon. friend, Sir John

Forrest, has done. We have magnified the senate in that we have lifted it from the position of numbers, and from the position of representation which the second chamber holds now in connection with our local legislatures. We are in the habit of regarding the opinion of our local legislative councils with less respect than we shall regard the opinion of our senate. Why? Because they are but representatives of a minor number of the people, and of certain class interests, mostly. Victoria may claim what she will with respect to her Legislative Council after the last important amendment of its Constitution; but there still remains, with respect to some of the legislative councils of Australasia, the fact that they are nominee; and if they are not nominee, there still remains the important fact that they are elected by a very small number of the people, and generally that number is selected from a class of property holders.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
There is no harm, in that!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
No; there is no harm in it. I have had the pleasure of respecting the opinions of the Legislative Council, and I have also had the opportunity and necessity of struggling very hard against some of their opinions; I have not only known them to stand in the way of progress, but I have also known them to be exceedingly useful. You cannot, however, obtain from the peoples of Australasia respect for a body which is, after all, but representative of classes, or of a class.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
What sort of a class?

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
Chiefly the monetary class, the property class.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Every householder has a vote!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
There must be a certain amount of rental, or of leasehold, or of capital value. The great masses of people have been excluded from representation in the Legislative Council.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Where?

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
Throughout Australia.

Mr. LYNE:
But in Tasmania are you not elected by property-holders?

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:
Partly so; but our House of Representatives is representative of the great masses of the people. If I am not interrupted I will just come to the same point, that so far as your commonwealth parliament is concerned, you will have two bodies of men chosen by the same class of persons and the same numbers of persons, and having made that important amendment in the old bill, that instead of your members being nominated or appointed by your legislatures, you will have them the representatives of the people, having secured their suffrages-and they, having secured their suffrages, will secure their respect, and most likely their affection, and so you will have two bodies of men holding correlatively the same respect from the people.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

I grant the right hon. member that, having raised up so respected and respectable a body, you might give them equal power.

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

I should think so!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

But I am not prepared at the present moment to wreck federation for the purpose of the senate securing that power.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Don't be afraid!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

I am not expressing any fear, but the time is coming, I feel sure, for some concessions to be made by the smaller states.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

We have been conceding all along!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

When my right hon. friend points out where we have made any special, important concession, I shall be very glad to hear him; but I do recognise that there has been a very important division taken in this Chamber during the last few days a division with such a majority as I little expected and that has inspired me with greater confidence that as we proceed with the bill we shall be drawing nearer and nearer together, and not finding ourselves more and more separated. I shall watch the progress of the measure with the hope that those of us who represent the smaller states may be found even in this matter voting with those who represent the larger states.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

We will not always be small!

The Hon. Sir P.O. FYSH:

I can quite understand my right hon. friend who is expecting to loom considerably larger. He is looming large already, and so is his colony. But Tasmania also looms large. Hon. gentlemen who laugh at the idea of Tasmania looming large would not do so if they happened to hold a thousand Mount Bischoffs, a thousand Mount Lyalls, a thousand Golden Gates, or a thousand Roseberys. They would admit that Tasmania looms large, and that there is laid up there a storehouse which we are now exposing, and which, I am perfectly satisfied, will in a few years place our colony in a position of greater importance than that which it has hitherto occupied. When she occupies that position she will, I feel sure, be a member of the Commonwealth of Australia, and I shall not regret that the senate, of which her six senators will form part, will have the power to defeat a taxing bill or an appropriation bill, and the power of suggesting alterations and amendments, although it does not secure the absolute recognition of the right to amend.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia)[12.41]:

This is a question of the very greatest importance, and, at the Adelaide session of the Convention, it was debated at length, and with a thoroughness worthy of the subject and of the occasion. I, myself, shared in that discussion, so that, probably, I need hardly assure hon. members that I am perfectly alive to the gravity of the question, and to the seriousness of the issues involved. I wish to say that I adhere entirely to the views which I then sought to enforce. It appears to me that the direct power of amendment is of great importance to the strength, and to what is, perhaps, of as much consequence, the dignity of the senate. I agree with the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest that to give up this power is, to a certain extent, an acknowledgment of inferiority to the house of representatives with regard to a certain class of bills. I think that my right hon. friend did not use language too strong when he spoke upon the point, and possibly it may be that, to the people of the less populous colonies, it may look as though the senate has been lopped of a limb, or, to some extent, maimed, if this power is taken away. But, adhering as I do to these views, I have come to the conclusion that this power is not absolutely essential to the efficient exercise of the functions of the senate. My belief is, and I wish to put my views in the very fewest possible words, that, even shorn of this power, the senate may still hold with effect a great and patriotic position in the councils of the nation we are going to create. I think so the more, because after a very thoughtful, and, I am sure hon. members will believe me when I say very anxious, consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the safeguards provided in the bill as it now stands are of the very highest value. I believe that the provisions which we inserted during our Adelaide session were most carefully considered, and that, short of retaining to the senate the power of amending taxation bills and the ordinary appropriation bills, it appears to me that the scope of the senate's control over finance is sufficiently large to enable it to exercise a very strong and very satisfactory power in the state. Under these circumstances, I have resolved to support the clause as it stands as the outcome of our deliberations at Adelaide. In my opinion, it will not materially weaken the senate.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
It will build up an inferior body!

Mr. SYMON:

There is undoubtedly the slight blemish to which the hon. member has referred. The senate will be an inferior body, but inferior only in the sense that it is not absolutely co-ordinate with the house of representatives. But if I entertained more doubts than I entertain on the points which I have briefly indicated, I should still take the course which I now propose for myself. On this great question I do not wish to act the part of the boy who looked for a star in the grass, and when he found a diamond threw it away. Like my hon. friend who has just sat down, I want to have federation. It seems to me that the irrevocable moment in this movement has arrived, and I wish to be guided, as I indicated the other day, on this and all questions of greater or less consequence, by the desire to remove every obstacle, whether of feeling or of substance, so long as it is not entirely essential to the progress of this great cause. I do so, because I have an assured hope of the greatness and the prosperity which the success of the cause is inevitably destined to secure. Therefore, without further argument on my part, and without any qualification, or any desire to know how others are going to vote, I declare that I will support the clause as it stands.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER (South Australia)[12.48]:

I am going to maintain the position which I took up in 1891, and again in Adelaide this year. I consider that the concessions to which the hon. member, Sir Philip Fysh, referred, have been all on one side. So far from gentlemen having sacrificed their views in most important particulars in order to meet us, they have given away nothing at all. The more we meet them, the more they ask for concessions. Directly we make a concession which some of them represent to be the only concession they want they make that a ground for demanding another. Even now, with the money clauses, they have weakened the senate until this unfortunate suggestion came from Tasmania, and we have to go back to the first principles upon which federation should be founded before we arrive at a true conclusion. I feel very much that the mere physical weight of the great states is telling upon the Convention even now.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

The weight of their arguments!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

Although opposed to the first principles on which any proper federation was ever established; although the representatives of the larger states ask for concessions that they never give to others; although they have managed more and more to bring this federation on to the lines of a consolidation, still I notice hon. members drop off one after another. The sweet surroundings, coupled with the great power of the people we are amongst, and the great states they represent, are proving too much for us. One by one the poor birds are fluttering down, and soon, I am afraid, there will not be one left.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
-

An Hon. MEMBER:
Do not let them put you down!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I will not just yet. We have now got to the practical consideration of this power of amendment about which we had so much discussion. When we were at the Convention in 1891 there was no substantial fight on the question of equal representation in the senate that was in fact conceded as a necessary condition.

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
As a postulate?

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
As a postulate.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It never will be again!

The Hon. Dr. COCKBURN:
You have got so much that you want more! The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER: It was well understood, and there were members as capable of discussing it as the hon. gentleman who says "Hear, hear." Every point of view was carefully thought out; but the history of all federations established amongst people in our condition pointed inevitably to the one condition, that the states must have equal representation. It was only when we came to this question as to the money power that the fight began. The question was whether there was to be a government responsible to the lower house, or a government responsible to both houses. Now, by the cleverness of the gentlemen representing the larger populations, the whole battle-ground has been shifted. We are thrown back a stage. We have had a big fight, which has been referred to triumphantly by the hon. member, Sir Philip Fysh. He seems to think it is something to be proud of; but it was all a matter of course. We have had a magnificent fight over nothing. After we have secured it, we are told that, out of consideration for the victory which we have gained, we should make concessions. What right have we to make any concessions at all? We ask for no favour, and if we did ask we should not get it. I should like to know what mission the hon. gentlemen who represent New South Wales and Victoria have from their constituents to give us anything to which we are not entitled. Is it not their mission to do the best they can for their own constituents?

Mr. HIGGINS:
NO!

Mr. LYNE:
It should be!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Is it their mission then to sacrifice their own constituents?

Mr. HIGGINS:
To do their best for all Australia!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
Is it their mission to do their best for all Australia including their own candidates?

Mr. HIGGINS:
Certainly!

Mr. LYNE:
It should be!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
I am glad that is admitted. If that is the case what is the good of talking about their having to give something away? If they do so it is throwing a sprat to catch a mackerel. They must do their duty to their constituents, and when it is for the well-being of their constituents that they should make some temporary sacrifice, it will be with a view of producing greater benefits for their people.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That has been our object always!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
That is the position of all of us; therefore, when we say we must make concessions, and you must make concessions, we may all have to submit to immediate sacrifices; but we all hope a reward will come to us from that line of action. What is the position now? We have got expressions of quite different understandings as to the effect of this provision, and as to how it will work out, from gentlemen who represent the larger colonies, and from the hon. member, Mr. Symon. The hon. member, Mr. Symon, says that if the present bill is preserved it will give more power to the senate over financial questions.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
He did not say so in Adelaide!
The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I am only dealing with the debate that is now taking place. The hon. member says it will give more power to the senate; but we have heard from the other side that it will not give more power. We are told that it will not be submitted to that the house which represents the people should be dictated to or interfered with by the house which represents the states, so that we begin this friendly compact with a misunderstandings. As I said before, the understanding by the Convention of the constitution is quite as important as the letter of it. We each interpret what is done in his own way, and we have the press in the different colonies giving their own interpretation. Instead of having the best and most thorough of understandings as to what we are doing it is evident that there is a thorough misunderstanding. The position I have always taken up, and which I intend to maintain, although no doubt I shall be defeated, is that the senate and the house of representatives ought to be co-ordinate houses with co-ordinate authority, and that they should only cease to be co-ordinate where some question of convenience would make a departure from it necessary. As far as the origination of taxation bills is concerned, it might be convenient that you should have one house in which they should originate. About that I care but little. When the American Constitution was established, and when it was provided that bills imposing taxation must originate in the house of representatives, that was not done with any view or intention of making the senate in any way inferior to the house of representatives. It was a mere provision of convenience as to the house in which certain measures should be introduced, and to some extent, possibly, it was copied from the British Constitution with which they were familiar. But beyond that, was there any question that the authorities of the senate were very much larger than those of the house of representatives? Here we are taking another course we are not taking away the great powers of the senate because we have not created them; but we are refusing to grant those great powers which constitute the dignity of the senate there.

[The Chairman left the chair at 1 p.m. The Committee resumed at 2 p.m.]

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

I was saying that as we are going we are more and more frittering away the essentials which are at the root of a true federation. We have had the argument of expediency—a good enough argument to use in the way of an assertion that unless you agree to this, and unless you agree to that, we will not have federation and I say there must be a time, surely, in which people will say "then we will not agree to federation." We are met here; the climate is beautiful at present; the scenery is delightful; the hospitality is perfect; and we feel disposed to agree more and more. I assure hon. members that I myself am speaking with the greatest difficulty, because I feel overwhelmed by the surroundings which are antagonistic to me, and yet so, friendly. I feel more killed by the kindness of my surroundings than I should be affected by action of a different character, and so I speak under an effort, trying to put myself in the cooler position of being at home with ordinary surroundings, and to think of this matter as the people of South Australia and the smaller populations will think of it with all our delightful environments absent from us. I am, from that point of view, trying to look coldly at the question and yet doing so under great difficulty. The people look back to the history of past federations, and they say, the very basis was the recognition of the states as states the recognition of the people as one people. "You will not get federation without this," said a gentleman to me not very long ago. You will not get federation at all with it, because, even if you get it, in my opinion it will not be federation. I have no particular objection from my own point of view to a consolidation of the colonies. I can see an immense advantage which might come from the centralisation of certain offices, and the saving of a vast amount of expense both in legislative authority and in administration. If our mission were to consider the best scheme under which we can consolidate all the colonies of Australia into one commonwealth, I certainly should not refuse, if elected, to be a party to that mission; but it is not our mission now, and in the degree in which we make this attempt at federation tend towards consolidation, to that extent we are false to our trust, and are not doing what we were sent here to do. That will apply equally to all the colonies. We must come back to this: we will not do this; if you will not concede this we will not concede that. We are business men who are talking here; we are not children with playthings; we are not talking about concessions; we are not talking about conferring benefits or receiving them. We are here to do what is fair and right for the benefit of all, and that is the point of view we have to pursue. What is all this objection to the only object lesson we have, the American Constitution? Where does all this objection come from? I observe that some writer in the press the other day thought he would expose the fallacy of my suggestion here that the American Constitution stood a severe test, in that it remained powerful in the face of a victorious army which could have destroyed it in a moment. To me, and to a good many people, I think that argument was conclusive on the subject of the American Constitution. What is the good of going back to the letter of the law and saying, "the army could not have destroyed it, because the law said they could not." Who was to resist them? If the senate were the cause of all the trouble, who could have stood in the way of that army in the destruction of it? They did make material alterations in the Constitution. They had the power of wiping the constitution out by mere physical force, without the aid of reason, and in utter disregard of the constitution; but so far from that, after all these years and years of experience of the working of this most mischievous constitution, which wronged the people for the benefit of rings after all this, after being forced into a most cruel civil war, with its endless trouble and bloodshed, they did not turn upon the power which had produced the injury, but they dignified and ennobled it. I say again, as I said the other day, what is the good of writing to the newspapers, or of essayists preparing elaborate articles, or of gentlemen twenty or thirty or a hundred years afterwards writing very clever books to prove that what was proved to demonstration then was not true? This is practically the argument I had to meet in Adelaide, and which everyone has to meet everywhere: "The American Constitution is the most corrupt constitution in the world; the American Senate is the most corrupt body in the world. Look at So-and so's book on the subject; look at the article in such a paper, and you will find all that is so." The American Senate I expect has done wrong, seeing, unfortunately, that it has to be composed of fallible human beings; but that the American Senate has not always been a body held in highest respect not only in America but in the civilised world, I absolutely deny; and above all things the American Senate is an institution suitable to the American people, which has not remained simply on account of their constitutional difficulties in making an alteration, but remained intact when the constitution was disrupted, and when there was nothing left but war and the power of main force. I defy anybody seriously to contend, under these circumstances, that the American Constitution has not worked well, has not worked harmoniously to the people. Has it worked to the ennoblement of the smaller states as against the larger states. We have two lines of argument. We have it said in one breath that the effect of this will be to establish a constitution similar to that in America, will be, as it has been in America, to produce an undue ennoblement of the smaller states to the degradation of the larger ones. We are in the same breath told, and by identically the same persons, that it is quite stupid to have all this trouble, to have all this discussion, to have all this ill-feeling which may be engendered, for the purpose of producing a body which will not bother about state right when it is established, because they say that, in America, where there is equal representation on the part of all the states, small as well as large, the question of state rights never arises. We have these gentlemen, from both points of view, showing us how very futile all this argument is, and how very unnecessary. Because a body is established on reasonable, sensible, aye, judicial lines, which has worked out so excellently in the results, that all state differences are forgotten, and when disputes occur they have so become one people that questions of state rights are never involved because that body, so well established, whose basis was so perfect, and whose vindication has been so supreme, has worked well, therefore a body established on no logical basis at all except the sacrifice of the entity of the smaller populations, will bring about just the same results. Why, sir, the very excellence of the working of the American Constitution proceeds from the excellence of the balance of its establishment. It is the perfect balance which is preserved by means of the strength of the senate, between the representatives, who are the people as a whole, and the states which have to preserve their individuality it is this perfect balance which has brought about that great result that, in all the troubles and disputes which have arisen between the Senate and the House of Representatives, a question of state rights has, practically, never arisen. That is the guarantee we want. We want our constitution established on a logical and sound basis, and above all, we want our constitution established on a basis consistent with the solemn duty we are sent here to discharge, which is not to establish a constitution which must end in consolidation, but to establish a constitution which will preserve the entity of the colonies whatever may occur. It is said you have really got the same power in the power of suggestion. Of course, we shall have that power vehemently attacked before long. The power which the gentlemen on the other side say we have got, they will industriously prevent us from having in a few minutes, and they will say, "What more do you want? You have got in effect the same power." When they have convinced me by their eloquence, by their friendliness, and by their conviviality, that it is all right, they will say, "We will not have that; we are going to strike that out." That is what will happen, as a matter of course.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
That will not happen in this clause!

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
If my vision is inaccurate, no one will rejoice more than myself; but, supposing it does happen, it is not the same, it is not meant to be the same thing. I admit that it may work out as the same thing. We can make the constitution; we can create conventions of the constitution; we may cause great ill-feeling, instead of great good-feeling at the initiation, and misunderstanding instead of a perfect understanding: but, as to limiting the manner in which the constitution will evolve itself, we are absolutely powerless. The constitution will be strong and effective just in proportion to the attractiveness it affords to the best intellects of the colonies; but the best intellects of the colonies will certainly not be attracted to a body which has no particular premiums to offer. I do not mean premiums in the sense of worldly advancement or money, I mean premiums in the sense of authority which can be exercised. Unless the senate has that power, the best intellects will, as a matter of course, go to the place which really has it, and the result will be a gradual degradation of the senate, as is intended by some, until it becomes a body less than the House of Lords, until it becomes a body which has the physical power of saying "no," but annexed to it, as a condition of its existence, that it must not say it. We are truer federationists, and much less narrow than some of these gentlemen; we want to approach the consideration of this question from a broad, constitutional standpoint, without which the federation cannot be established and cannot continue. That is the point of view from which we are acting, and which we are asking them to adopt. From what I observed in the voting last night, and from some defections I have seen today, I know that my views will not be carried. I must not be understood to use this favourite method, which comes particularly from one colony-I forget the name of it-that unless you do this we will have no more to do with it. We have passed the portmanteau stage. I am not going to speak at all in that spirit, because I do not feel in that way; but still I believe that we are not beginning well unless we establish our houses on a basis of practically co-ordinate authority. If we put the brand of inferiority on one at the start, with all the surroundings to induce inferiority, it will degenerate. When speaking in Adelaide, I said that, so far from giving the senate less powers, if I saw my way I would give it greater powers than the house of representatives, because the house of representatives is bound to be marvellously powerful. Representing the great body of the people, having both numbers and influence, with the pressure of public opinion that will be behind it all, its power will be almost absolute, and our senate will not have, like the American Senate, those large outside powers which practically give it its dignity, and enable it to retain the equality of its position. We want to establish an abiding federation, founded on the only means on which a federation will proceed. Our determination must be to have the states and the people equally represented. Anything short of that must end in a consolidation or will end in difficulty. As the right hon. member, Sir John Forrest, pointed out, this is only one of a string. When you have emasculated the powers of the senate, when you have said that it is not to have equal authority with the other house, you have not done then. You have to have what they are pleased to call a cure for deadlocks, which means more coercion on the senate; and after you have gradually frittered away all the authority of the senate that was intended to be established on something like the lines of the American Senate after you have frittered away the greater part of its authority after you have put the whole management of public concerns in the form of what is called constitutional government that is, a government responsible to only one house you are not satisfied, and something more has to be done, which is the institution of a national referendum. After all, this concession, which Sir Philip Fysh so gratefully accepted, this magnificent sacrifice of prejudice and interest on the part of the larger colonies, is, in my opinion, a stronger and stronger assertion of right inconsistent with the constitution of a true commonwealth, and, in all, is a substantial refusal to recognise the authority of the states as states, through refusing to recognise the right of the senate to dissent from the house of representatives; because that is to be the end of it all. After you have shorn the senate of these authorities one by one, after you have made it less and less powerful, after you have by this bill deprived it of its individuality so plainly that he who runs can we it, and there can be no mistake whatever as to the provision being thereafter you have done that, you say, having gone through all this solemn business, after first giving authority and then taking it away, or at all events a large part of it, we have one little thing more which is necessary in the event of your standing out against us with such authority as is left to you, the power of being able to send you to a national election of the whole of Australia, in which you smaller communities will have the advantage of your numbers. I do not put forward this point of view in order to obstruct the measure; but it is a point of view which will occur to a great many persons in the smaller colonies. Some of us in our enthusiasm for federation, with our belief in humanity, with our confidence that after all we will do justice to each other, might be induced, even if a constitution were established which is thought to be not on the soundest lines, to use our best influence to have it affirmed. But our influence is, after all, very limited. It is the great body of the people who have to settle these questions, and it is entirely from my feeling as to the true basis upon which any federation should exist, and, secondly, as to the method by which the popular assent should be obtained, that I take up the position I do at the present time in hoping that this amendment will be carried.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID (New South Wales)[2.24]:

I have listened to the speech of the hon. member, Sir John Downer, with great attention. I can assure him that he is quite under a delusion if he thinks that his surroundings have at all tempered the strength of his views upon the great question of state rights. I have never heard him more eloquent, more earnest, or more explicit in the view which he takes of that subject. I think we must all give up at once the idea of being able to frame what is called a perfect constitution, that we must give up the idea of arriving at a settlement which, in the opinion of everyone, will be perfect. The more time we take up in aiming at anything of the kind the less likely we are to do much good. We must get rid of phrases of what the term "federal" means, of what the term "commonwealth" means, and, to some extent, we must get rid of the veneration which my hon. friend seems to entertain for the Senate of the United States. We are framing a constitution today under vastly different circumstances, and I hope I am not too radical when I say with perhaps considerably more enlightenment than was vouchsafed to the framers of the American Constitution. I think we must all admit that during the past hundred years mankind has advanced to some extent in the perception of methods of government.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:

That is my argument!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

And even in federal matters, as to improvements in a federal constitution. My hon. friend derives great comfort from the assertion that no one has ever seriously proposed to amend the Constitution of the United States, that is to say, no one within the political circle. My hon. friend is surely not so ingenuous as he wishes us to believe when he makes such an assertion. Why is it that no one within the circle of politics in America has seriously proposed to alter the American Constitution, especially with reference to the powers of the smaller, states? Because it would mean political annihilation to do anything of the kind. There is a vast body of outside opinion in the United States which condemn as monstrous the present basis of the senate-utterly monstrous, and inconsistent with any modern ideas of representation, representative government, and even federal government, perhaps. But what leader of a great party in the United States Mr. McKinley or Mr. Cleveland would seriously go before the American people with the proposition that the powers of the smaller states should be interfered with? It would mean the destruction of the man's political position, because the smaller states hold, without doubt, the balance of power in the Senate.
There is no doubt that the Senate has worked wonderfully well in past years; but as time goes on, even public opinion is coming to the conclusion that the Senate of the United States has been vastly overpraised. A more humiliating or dishonorable petition was never occupied by a representative body than that occupied by the Senate of the United States within the past few months when the details of the tariff were being adjusted, and when senators are supposed on high authority to have made enormous fortunes out of the varying phases of expectation as to how that particular tariff would be finally settled. I assert, without the slightest fear, that the reputation of the Senate of the United States is vastly lower today than it was twenty years ago, and deservedly so. One of the reproaches of that body and I think it is a reproach is that nowadays it is mainly composed of men of enormous personal fortunes. No one objects to that in itself; but it is absurd to say that a senate composed of millionaires can be said to faithfully, or in any way adequately, represent all the various beliefs and classes of a people like those of the United States. The members are none the worse for having the millions, but no one expects a house to give satisfaction to a great democracy which happens by mere accident to be exposed to that observation. So far as we in Australia are concerned to day we have a very simple task, and that is to make this constitution as perfect as we can, always bearing in mind that it will never become a constitution unless the people of the various colonies can be induced by a majority to accept it. Now it is entirely upon that consideration that I have given up a large amount of ideas since I really became earnest in this federal movement. It is not that I do not still entertain, though, perhaps, not quite so strongly, many of those views as a matter of individual conviction; but the more in earnest one becomes about the grand object itself, the more a sense of proportion asserts itself, and the more we are disposed and prepared to give up even cherished convictions under the overmastering desire to bring this enterprise to a happy conclusion. I think the amendment of my right hon, friend, Sir John Forrest, is a most calamitous one. It is throwing us completely back. We had this great fight out in a much simpler form in Adelaide.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Not the same!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Pretty much the same, except that it was a broader fight than this.

The Hon. Sir J.W. DOWNER:
-

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
My hon. friend treated the matter from his point of view with absolute fairness and force, but in Adelaide I remember the proposition over which we had the great debate was a proposition that the senate should be entitled to amend all money bills.

An Hon. MEMBER:

No!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Except the annual appropriation bill. With that exception, I think it was a general power of amendment.

---

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The present amendment leaves out the appropriation bill!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Exactly. Practically we have come back again into the dispute we had at Adelaide.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

We have also had the question of equal representation over again!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

That is quite right, and no one can complain of it, because that is exactly what this final session is for. Perhaps, on reflection, I ought to withdraw the remarks I made in that sense, because every one is entitled at this final sitting to have a thorough reconsideration of all these important points. So that I am afraid I rather spoke without thought in the remarks I made. This particular amendment claims for the senate a power to amend bills imposing taxation. My right hon. friend, Sir John Forrest, as we all know, is a typical Englishman, as a rule. I do not know a man who is more thoroughly saturated with the proper ideas of an Englishman than is the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest. But when you come to framing a constitution he is a downright Yankee. He is always talking about the Senate of the United States. He is always talking about the great, dignified, strong Senate of America. Now, we are not framing a constitution for the American people. We are framing a constitution for the Australian people, and, with reference to the control of public moneys, and especially the right of imposing taxation, what are the principles which are thoroughly embedded in the minds of Australians today? They bear very strongly upon this proposition, and I think I make a fair observation when I say that many of those who, in this Convention, today, are prepared to take the view of the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, if the matter were discussed in their own colonies, as between the two houses in their own colonies, would absolutely take the view which I hold. I am dealing now with the general principles which are recognised by the Australian people. The more we keep in mind those principles and habits of thought, the more likely we are to frame a constitution which those people will accept. If the constitutions of these colonies are studied it will be found that there is no second chamber which has the right to amend a bill imposing taxation.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
Tasmania!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I do not know anything about the islands in the South Seas. Perhaps the fact mentioned by the hon. gentleman is the strongest proof I can give of the iniquity of such a proceeding. We all know how beautiful Tasmania is, and how promising are its mineral resources; but we have never yet heard a political writer quote Tasmania as an example of constitutional government. I am glad to see my hon. friend is here to give us the benefit of the experience of the Tasmanians, and I must correct myself under my hon. friend's observation, and say that in Tasmania it is a fact that the Legislative Council has the right of amending taxation bills.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
They exercise the right!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
But is it a right which the lower house concedes freely to them?

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
They make a formal protest!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
This little episode has enlightened me completely as to the attitude of my hon. friend, Mr. Adye Douglas, on matters of this sort. Having turned the political machine upside down in Tasmania, he cannot understand any other disposition of it. Well, we are not going to turn it upside down in the federal parliament.

We are not dealing with a legislative council now; we are dealing with a senate elected by the whole body of the people!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I am referring at present, not to the federal body proposed, but to the actual state of things in the different colonies, and I am referring, therefore, to the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania. But, rather than make any reference to the country which possesses so irascible a representative, I will give up Tasmania, and refer to the other colonies. In New South Wales, Queensland, Victoria, and South Australia, and, so far as we call pierce the mist of distance, Western Australia, there is an absolute distinction in the constitutions between the rights of the house which more directly represents the great body of the people and the rights of the house which either represents the people in some less universal form or is constituted by appointment.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
They have not the same franchise!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I do not know how that helps me at present, but I should think that my right hon. friend, if the upper house attempted to amend any of his money bills, would express himself in language which would entirely satisfy any of us. We should then see the political Nelson coming down to the quarter deck, and talking to this unfortunate body in Western Australia which presumed to speak otherwise than as the right hon. gentleman dictated.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
They have the right of suggestion!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
We are not speaking of that at present. I think we have heard that several times from the right hon. gentleman. The right hon. gentleman, I think, admits it is a farce. So that I come back to this: That with the possible exception of one colony, not the most populous, the peoples of Australia are accustomed to a recognition in their political constitutions of the difference between the powers of the two houses. Upon what principle does that difference rest? It rests on the simple well-known proposition which springs from the notorious facts of the case, that in taxation, and especially as taxation is known in Australia, inasmuch as the whole of the people are subject to the taxes, and have to pay them, it is in a peculiar sense the right of the representatives of those who are taxed not only to prescribe the form in which they shall be taxed, but also to dispose of the moneys which are the proceeds of that taxation. That principle is not an Australian principle. It is an old principle of the British Constitution as we understand it now, which took a long time and a great many battles to establish in the old country, but which is now so firmly established in Great Britain that the House of Lords, powerful as they are to reject a scheme of home rule for Ireland, although millions of the electors of Great Britain look on that as a burning question fearless as they are in dealing with attempted innovations on the structure of the constitution pass almost without a word, certainly without a division, measures of taxation which seem almost directly aimed at their class, and which reduce the financial position of the wealthy classes, of the landed estate owners, of England, to an extent which some of them look upon as little short of absolute ruin.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
But have they not practically given up the right of veto?
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
   Exactly. I pointed that out as an illustration.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
   But we are giving the right of veto, which they have given up!
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
   In dealing with this question, I wish to get down, first of all, to the main principle of the matter, as we understand it in Australia. It is necessary, after that, no doubt, to begin to deviate.

[P.502] starts here
Mr. GLYNN:
   The House of Lords did not give it up themselves. The Commons passed a resolution in 1860 that they must give it up!
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
   I should talk all day if I were to go into academic detail about resolutions passed this year or that. The broad consideration remains that, in practice and fact, the House of Lords do not interfere with a bill imposing taxation, although the taxation itself is odious and injurious to the last degree to the members of the House of Lords as was shown in the treatment of Sir William Harcourt's measure, some two or three years ago.

An Hon. MEMBER:
   The succession duties!
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
   Yes, in his general financial scheme. That is the principle on which our constitutions rest, and I have to say that that is a principle which the people of Australia-I mean the people of the different colonies would be the last to give up in the management of their own colonial affairs. I think that that is a fair representation of the case. I have, I admit, to come away from that state of things, and to admit that in framing a federal constitution we must deviate. We cannot frame the same sort of constitution as we would frame if it were a constitution for a unified Australia. I have never denied that.
   But the practical point is: can we deviate so far as we are asked to do today by the proposition now before the Convention? We must again look at the facts, and these facts are only facts today. In the course of time, instead of New South Wales and Victoria possessing the largest population, it may be that two colonies now possessing a small population will be infinitely ahead in population of those two colonies. This is to be a federation for all time; consequently, although we today seem to be fighting the battle of New South Wales and Victoria, we are really fighting the battle of the people of the other colonies in days to come.
Mr. SYMON:
    And vice versa!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
    I do not understand my hon. and learned friend's phrase. I wish to discard the mere geographical terms which are so burning today. I want to recommend the views which I have, not as views which happen to suit the colony to which I belong today, but as views which will, infallibly, be fair, whatever the vicissitudes of population may be in time to come. Let us suppose that in times to come the positions are reversed that instead of New South Wales and Victoria predominating in population, Queensland and Western Australia predominate in population over the other members of the group. My argument will apply just as well to such a state of things as to the present case of Victoria and New South Wales.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
    The right hon. gentleman does not expect that!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
    There is nothing to prevent it, especially if my right hon. friend continues to govern Western Australia, nothing to prevent it, because we are prepared to believe almost everything that the right hon. gentleman has said, and are not likely to go and look at his colony ourselves.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
    I hope the right hon. member will!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
    I wish to point out to the Convention that the reasons why I and others oppose this amendment is absolutely away from the circumstances of my own colony that it is one absolutely of principle, and not only of principle, but of the basic principle of every constitution of the British type. Here, again, we come to the crucial question: Is this to be a federal constitution of the British type, or a federal constitution of the American type? As far as I can judge the feelings of the people of Australia, they would infinitely prefer a federation of the British type. I admit at once that such a federation must present new features. It is a federation which cannot be reconciled to the experience and history of the United States. But with all respect to the United States and their constitution, I believe that a federation of the British type will be much more likely to be accepted by the Australian people, and to give them infinitely more satisfaction, mainly, perhaps, because it is that particular kind of constitution under which they have been born and bred, and which they have administered in these several colonies. If I am asked, under these circumstances, to throw away this basic principle of finance as it exists in all constitutions of the British type, and to adopt the methods of the American legislature in finance, I have to say at once to this Convention that I have not the remotest hope of inducing the people of this colony to do so. We must not forget that the financial history of the American legislature is by no means a satisfactory one. Whilst America was deriving enormous amounts of revenue from an extremely high tariff there was no difficulty, except the difficulty of the United States legislature to spend the money. They had millions and millions of dollars derived from those high protective duties which were filling the treasury until at last the difficulty was disposed of by a brilliant stroke of federal finance—those millions of surplus were converted into pension claims of veterans, alive or dead, or yet to be born. I think I am correct in saying that almost each individual case had to be submitted to this model house by means of a separate bill for each pensioner, alive or dead. Now, this model federal legislature, with this most dignified senate, nearly killed itself in passing thousands upon thousands of these bills, half of them, probably, representing bogus claims.
We see in a federation where the senate is the embodiment of everything that is stable and honorable and dignified, having equal financial power with the house of representatives

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
But not elected by the people!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Instead of being a check upon extravagant maladministration, instead of preserving the American people from financial straits, having millions of money in hand, it deliberately squandered the money and landed them in such a position that their deficiency is now to be calculated in millions.
Instead of the senate being a protection to the states in the custody and management of the public money, it was simply a co-partner with the other house in a course of reckless extravagance, the result of which is that now the American Congress have to pass a new tariff to bring in more revenue, and the country is saddled with a pension liability of $150,000,000 a year.
Strange to say, the further they get in point of time from the Civil War the larger the liability seems to be, the claims during the past few months totalling a larger amount than was ever known before in the history of this pension scheme. This attempt to have a system of federal finance based upon the equal powers of both houses to amend taxation bills has proved a rank failure in the case of the model example of the United States.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The United States senate is not elected by the people!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I hope that the right hon. gentleman's patriotism will be shown by his support of those who wish to leave these matters in the hands of the people.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

The right hon. gentleman only wishes to leave those matters which suit him in the hands of the people!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I am prepared to surrender a number of strong convictions in order to allow the senate to have equal powers with the house of representatives, so long as a pernicious attempt is not made to give the senate as constituted equal control of the money of the taxpayers of the commonwealth.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

No one asked that!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

What does the amendment in regard to taxation bills mean?

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

It deals with the obtaining of money, not with the spending of it!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

I am sure that if my right hon. friend saw the meaning of his amendment he would not have proposed it; but surely he sees that a house which by the constitution is give

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

But not power to spend the money of the people!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Surely it is of some importance to the people of Australia how they are to be taxed.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

Certainly it is!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Then, it occurs to me that the most important thing is to get the money first. There is no difficulty afterwards about spending it.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:

At any rate, there are two processes!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

So far as the people are concerned, the most important point is how are you going to raise from us the taxation of the commonwealth? How can my right hon. friend justify his position in connection with a matter of this kind? If he will come to us and say, "We will have no inequality in the commonwealth; we will all stand upon an absolutely equal footing and we will bring into the public treasury of the commonwealth as much money as you bring," we shall have equality. Let each colony agree that all shall contribute equally to the public funds of the commonwealth, and we shall have no more trouble.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Each individual in the commonwealth will contribute an equal amount!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
This is not to be a commonwealth of the Charles Stuart type. If you put upon the people as a whole, the people of the five colonies, not separated by geographical boundaries, but paying their taxation as individuals in the commonwealth-

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
They will do so!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
We know that they will do so, and the right hon. gentleman is very charitable in wishing that it should be done; but I say, if you do that—if you nationalise the area, and the burden of taxation, you must nationalise the power over the public purse. The right hon. gentleman appears to wish to call the people a nation in order to take money out of their pockets, and then to call them a federation in order that the majority representing those who contribute a tithe should have power equal to the power of those who contribute most.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
The right hon. gentleman wants unification!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
That is the fallacy of this position. It is a difficulty we can never yield to.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Then do not let us have federation; let us have unification at once!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Does my right hon. friend mean that unless the senate is to have equal power over taxation bills, there will be no federation?

The Hon. E. BARTON:
He means that the constitution would not be a federal constitution!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Exactly. There, again, I would ask my right hon. friend not to argue with phrases such as the phrase "federation." There is nothing in a phrase. It does not support any argument. Let us simply take the facts. There are five colonies represented at this Convention. One of these colonies has a population of 1,400,000; another of 1,200,000; another of 400,000; another-Tasmania—a population of 200,000-

The Hon. E. BARTON:
Lastly, Western Australia has a population of about 160,000. These are not phrases; they are simple facts. We propose that the federal parliament should put all these people together for the purpose of taxation. We need not go into tables about what tariffs will produce. We will take it that a tariff would produce the same amount per head throughout the federation.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
We know that it would not!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I am making the supposition against my own argument; but taking it as my right hon. friend likes, hot, medium, or cold, what I wish to say is that in the senate, as we have agreed that it shall be constituted, there will be eighteen senators representing the smaller number of people, and the twelve senators representing the larger portion. In other words, eighteen senators will have the right to amend taxation bills, although they represent an absolute and small minority of the whole colony.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Would the interests of the various populations differ?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
This is a state of things which you cannot bring any British community to. We have never lived under such a state of things, and we never shall. If you want equality in the senate, you must share and share alike. Then you will have equality, and as much of it as you like.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
Per head of population, the people of Western Australia will pay more than people in other colonies!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
That has been recognised all through. Take the case of Sir Samuel Griffith when he was in politics. I suppose that even my right hon. friend will admit that he was almost his equal in point of political sagacity, intellect, and attachment to the rights of the smaller states. I do not say that he was his equal, but he was almost his equal. He took a very prominent part in framing the Commonwealth Bill of 1891; but staunch, fearless, able, and very successful advocate as he was of state rights, as the representative of a small population he never put forward this proposal.

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN FORREST:
I think he has changed his opinion since then, and changed it again!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I am dealing with him as I knew him. I have not known him in regard to this matter since he went on to the bench. He is a keen-witted, able advocate of the rights of the smaller states. We all know him as a skilled man of the world, and he saw that if we were to have federation this power could not be given to the senate.

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
Not with a nominee senate!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
The hon. member will see that, for the purposes of my argument, it is absolutely immaterial who appoints the eighteen senators from the smaller states. They will still be appointed by the persons who live in those states. I am simply taking the facts as they are, and which cannot be altered. This is one of the points upon which we, representing the larger populations, cannot possibly give way. There are other points upon which my hon. friends opposite cannot give way. Personally, I look upon equal representation in the senate, apart from expediency altogether, as the most indefensible proposition in the world as a proposition; but, all through, I knew at once that, if I was not prepared to meet the views of those representing the smaller states on that point, the whole thing was a waste of time. I did not say anything about it. I did not go round to these hon. gentlemen and say, "Look at the concession we are making." I wasted no time about it, and did not say a word, but I stand by it now. As hon. members know, there is a remarkably strong feeling if not in the country, in the parliament of this country, against equal representation in the senate; but I did not allow that to influence me in the slightest, because I felt bound in this enterprise to remain true to the position I have taken up as a matter of common honor to this Convention, and especially after I, as we all did, put before the public of New South Wales my views on this matter. I have with my fellow representatives, a strength derived from the fact that when we became candidates for representation we plainly stated that we were prepared to concede equal representation to the states, so that I stand in a thoroughly honorable constitutional position. But it is idle for me to shut my eyes to the fact that equal representation as a proposition is indefensible, and it is only in order to secure federation that I can concede it. More than that, that is the spirit of the people of this colony. They saw from the first that it must be conceded, and they have wasted few words about it. They have raised no protest about it during all these years.

An Hon. MEMBER:
It was not considered by them!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
I know the people of this country are sufficiently intelligent to understand you when you make a plain declaration of opinion. I do not know how it is in other quarters. Over and over again my hon. friend, Mr. Barton, has had to run the gauntlet on this very point during the last six years.

Mr. WISE:
Half a dozen of the candidates in this colony who opposed equal representation were defeated!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
It is absurd to say that the question was not before the people of New South Wales. We do not want to magnify the question of equal representation. We have made up our minds that you must have it if you want federation. We do not want to labour it, or to magnify it as a matter of sacrifice. We simply want to do business. We saw this was a point that would wreck you, and we gave way to you. You must in return consider the points which would wreck us, and this is one of them. I feel that I should almost apologise to the Convention for having spoken even at this length, but I do think we have now come to a point when we should not attempt to make very long speeches. We should try to come straight to the important point, and not even wait for the peroration in order to sit down.

Motion (by the Hon. J.H. HOWE)—that this Committee do now divide—negatived:

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON (Tasmania)[3.6]:
The Right Hon. G.H. Reid has spoken with absolute fairness, and in a manner that is exceedingly convincing—not convincing to the extent of making me see eye to eye with him, but convincing in that I can quite understand and follow, and appreciate all his arguments as far as they are applicable to himself and to his own colony. He does not claim, as it has been very often claimed, that the giving to the small states of equal representation was by way of concession. I say it is not a concession; it was given as an absolute right in pursuance of what was done in 1891, and continued ever since. I may say, in perfect keeping with the very admirable argument used by the hon. member, Mr. Wise, that these colonies have now a separate and sovereign existence, and the equality of the states has always been recognised at the various conventions and meetings held to discuss local matters, and that if one asked why the colonies were equal, the answer was because they were equal. We hear a great deal about giving concessions, about yielding, and so forth, in order to secure federation. We of the smaller states might very well ask what these concessions are that have been given to us, or which are proposed, to be given to us. We know, as the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest has stated, that the smaller states have conceded a great many very valid points. In regard to some sections of the representation of the smaller states, they have conceded a good deal which should meet the cordial approval of my hon. friend, Mr. Deakin that is, they have conceded what I hold to be very precious—myself namely, that the senate should be a body representative to the very fullest extent of the popular will.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
That is not a concession. It strengthens the senate, and that is what you want!

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
It is a concession, so far as some members are concerned who have an objection to popular election. I am in favour of that, so that it is not a concession so far as I am concerned; but it is a concession as far as the principles and feelings of other members are concerned. That seems to me to seriously affect one portion of my right hon. friend's address as to the powers of the senate. He says that the principle that the house which represents the taxpayers should legislate on finance is the proper principle. Surely, if, in the individual capacity of the various states, there is some difference as to the bulk of the representation, collectively the members of the senate would represent all the people from one end to the other of the commonwealth just as fully as the members of the house of representatives.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
How could the Western Australian representatives represent us?

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
They would represent the people.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Of New South Wales?

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
Not the people of New South Wales, but the people of Western Australia. It would be just as much an assembly representative of the taxpayers as you could possibly conceive, and when the artificial geographical boundaries come to be removed, then I fancy my hon. friend will not dispute the fact that the senate equally with the house of representatives will represent the commonwealth.

Mr. TRENWITH:
But you do not remove the boundaries whilst you grant equal representation?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
The autonomy of the states remains!
The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
You retain the states as entities!
The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
We are obliged to do that for their own particular functions and business. But there is no reason why the boundaries should be lost and forgotten entirely when we come to deal with the matters of the commonwealth.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That is what we all say!
The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
That will not make the eighteen representatives of these colonies represent the larger number of the other two colonies!

Mr. HIGGINS:
If we ignore boundaries, why have eighteen representatives for the three smaller colonies?
The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
I think it has been conceded that there must be due protection of the interests and rights of the states as states. That being admitted, we now come to the question of the power of the senate in one particular, because we are only dealing, as I understand it, with the right of the senate to amending, instead of to suggest, amendments. The hon. member, Sir Philip Fysh, has asked what is the difference between the power of amending and the power of suggesting, and some one has replied that the difference is the difference between "tweedledum" and "tweedledee." If that be the only difference, if, in fact, there be no difference whatever, we are fighting about a shadow, and this principle might as well be conceded by those who are standing out against us. In the interests of federation, which we all desire to see secured, the smaller states dare not yield their opinions on this subject.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Then we had better go home!
The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:
Well, we shall have to go home shortly. It is said that Victoria and New South Wales will not accept this. How will it be if the other colonies will not accept anything less than the right of making amendments? The Premier of New South Wales has pointed out a very material difference between the right to amend and the right to suggest-material in this way: that the one will throw the responsibility of rejecting a bill on the house of representatives, while the other will throw it on the senate, and possibly may bring the senate into odium and public discredit, which we do not desire to see.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

It will have to take the responsibility for what it actually does!

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

If you will allow it to have a responsibility for something which is substantial; but we are talking about suggestions. I know that some hon. members particularly the Premier of New South Wales are anxious to see something introduced by way of a solution of deadlocks. That is a point upon which I should like to join with him by way of concession, if I could induce him and others to join with me by way of concession in this particular-

An Hon. MEMBER:

You do not want the referendum at all!

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

I am not saying anything about the referendum, but about some solution of the deadlock, and that solution might be arrived at by a dissolution.

The Hon. I.A. ISAACS:

That would be no solution!

The Right Hon. Sir E. BRADDON:

It might be a means of bringing a check to bear upon the senate, which would keep any reasonable senate in fair order. I merely say this to show that I am not hidebound in my opinions with regard to the bill, as adopted by the Federal Convention; but I am quite willing to make concessions where they are possible or reasonable, or where they are likely to be acceptable to the people of the smaller states; but I am not prepared to go further.

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS (Tasmania)[3.18]:

It requires a great deal of courage to follow immediately upon the Premier of New South Wales, because I look upon his speech as one of those likely to carry weight with the public outside. It was extremely interesting as far as it went; but it contained very little substance, and an immense amount of sound. His endeavour to correct me with respect to the colony of Tasmania was rather indefinite. I suppose I knew that colony before the right hon. gentleman was born. I have taken an interest in its representation ever since it was a free colony, and I profess to know something more about it than he does. The act of Parliament upon which the constitution was established states:
There shall be in place of the present Legislative Council of Van Dieman's Land one legislative council and one house of assembly in the said colony, to be severally constituted in the manner hereinafter prescribed, and such legislative council and house of assembly shall, after the dissolution as hereinafter provided of the existing Legislative Council, have and exercise all the powers and functions of the, said existing Legislative Council.

The Hon. A. DEAKIN:
A Crown colony!

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
It was not a Crown colony. The only clauses relating to the power of the two houses—the House of Assembly and the Legislative Council is the 33rd clause, which has never been altered. It states:

All bills for appropriating any part of the revenue, or for imposing any tax, rate, duty, or impost shall originate in the said House of Assembly, and it shall not be lawful for the said House of Assembly to originate or pass any vote, resolution, or bill for the appropriation of any part of the revenue, or of any tax, rate, duty, or impost for any purpose which shall not have been first recommended by the Governor to the said House of Assembly during the session in which such vote, resolution, or bill shall be passed.

Therefore, the powers of the two houses remain the same as in the original constitution, with the exception of the power of origination, which is in the House of Assembly. We have maintained our power in the Council from that day to this, and although the House of Assembly show by a mild protest that they do not like it, they have to submit.

An Hon. MEMBER:
Have you survived it?

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
Survived it!

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:
Have they survived it—that is the question?

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:
It is like myself; I have survived everything. In considering this subject we must look at the powers of Tasmania at the present time. It does not follow, because a great colony like New South Wales wants on all occasions to be little a colony like Tasmania, that we are not in the possession of our rights and privileges the same as they are. We are free at the present moment. We have now only the Government of England over us, and are we going to vest the powers we have in this Government of New South Wales when we are free and independent in every shape and form, and to submit ourselves to be trampled under foot by this large colony?

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid:

I would like to see the man who would do it!

The Hon. A. Douglas:

I should like to see a federation between the two big colonies. I should like to see a federation between New South Wales and, as the late Sir John Robertson termed it when we were here in 1891, the "cabbage garden." That would be a very interesting combination.

The Hon. I.A. Isaacs:

Many a true word said in jest!

The Hon. A. Douglas:

You put forward in the bill that the federation must consist of three colonies. Why do you not start with two colonies? Then we should have known what you were. Here are two colonies like oil and water, which will never mix, wanting as quietly as possible to get another colony into this little arrangement. Many years ago when I arrived in Tasmania, Tasmania was a free colony, and Victoria was part and parcel of New South Wales. There was a very little community at a place called Melbourne, which was an exceedingly dirty hole. There were about 5,000 people in the whole of that colony, and Governor Bourke wrote down—I have seen the letter in the Colonial Secretary's Office at Hobart—complaining to Sir George Arthur because he had taken possession of Victoria for Tasmania. At that time Victoria was simply an offshoot from Tasmania.

The child was father of the man!

The Hon. A. Douglas:

The hon. member knows nothing about it. That great and powerful colony up to 1853 was a mere sheepwalk. Then, all of a sudden, up sprang the gold-diggings; Victoria went ahead with its millions of money, and inasmuch as those millions have now vanished, it has got into its proper position. Tasmania has a very quiet mode of doing business. Our progress, however, has been substantial. We have not built up seven and eight storey buildings to have them unoccupied. All our buildings and all our improvements are used. In other places they spend their money, and do not know what to do with the building when they are erected. New South Wales no doubt is progressing, and Tasmania is progressing. Tasmania has never since the period I am alluding to—which is close on to sixty years—been in a more favourable position than it is in at this moment.
The Hon. Sir W.A. ZEAL:
Who developed your western mines?

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

You have had more than you ever gave; therefore, you need not complain. In 1841 Victoria formed a part of this colony, and then what happened? It found that it was badly represented in New South Wales. It was determined in some way or other to show its opinion of New South Wales and the Government of New South Wales. What did it do? Earl Grey, the Se

Mr. HIGGINS:

They accuse me of being logical!

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

Logic is a peculiar science to know, and the only use which the hon. member makes of it is to blind the eyes of those who do not know anything about it. Where does the logic come in in respect to the rights and privileges of the separate colonies? It does not exist. The speech of the Right Hon. Mr. Reid was exceedingly amusing; but did it contain anything like the truth or the substance of the truth? Is the senate of these colonies to be corrupt because the Senate of the United States is corrupt? The argument is that this senate must be corrupt, because the Senate of the United States at one time has been corrupt. Because the senators there are millionaires, is it necessary that millionaires should represent us in our senate? Are the arrangements made for the election of its members the same as the arrangements made for the election of the members of the American Senate? They are vastly different. The right hon. and learned member is dealing with things which do not exist and never will exist. Take the mother country. Does Middlesex rule the whole of England?

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Why should Tasmania want to rule us?

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

We do not want to rule you, and you know very well we do not want to rule you; we have not the power, and we have not the wish to do so.

The Right Hon. G.H. REID:

Six men like my hon. friend in the senate would rule the whole show!

The Hon. A. DOUGLAS:

If you have not sufficient confidence in the federal parliament why go in for federation at all? What is the meaning of federation? It would be very instructive from that point of view to compare the speeches which the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales made in 1891 against federation with his utterances on the subject today. What did the predecessor of the hon. gentleman in the leadership of the free-trade party do? He advocated a federal council, and the bill instituting that council was altered to suit the views of the people of New South Wales. When it had been altered the hon. gentleman stood out of the council, and the bill was not allowed to have its proper operation. It has not had its proper operation from that day to this. Now I myself have regarded the Federal Council as a stepping stone to federation in these colonies; but it has been ruined primarily through this colony not joining it. The council has been deprived of a large measure of its usefulness by reason of the position taken up by New South Wales. Are we to put ourselves into the hands of this colony today, because it happens to suit the dominant party here for the moment to support a scheme of federation? It may mean the glorification of individuals, but it certainly does not mean the glorification of the states. I myself am not in favour of federation, except conditionally. I am certainly not such a believer in federation that I would take it on any terms whatever. If I find that this bill, as finally drawn by the Convention, is not acceptable to the people of Tasmania I shall not be at all diffident upon the subject; but I will go throughout Tasmania from one end of it to the other, and all round the coast, and will advise the electors to have nothing to do with the proposal. I know what their views upon a subject of this character are likely to be, much better than they can be known by strangers. Hon. gentlemen come to us because they wish to enjoy our genial climate, and we are only too glad to see them. As long as they will spend their money we do not care how long they remain. Our colony is free and independent, and can pay its way. One of my hon. friends has taken up a position which is somewhat peculiar, and I cannot help thinking that the climate of this colony must have had a peculiar effect upon him. He left Tasmania in 1891 with the determination that the states should have their rights, and not only that, but he was a party to the framing of a bill which contained a provision giving to the senate the power of amendment. Subsequently that part of the scheme was dropped, because he became frightened that unless that were done New South Wales would not join the federation. He modified his views accordingly. When he went to Adelaide he reformed his conduct; but he is now retrogressing again. So far as I am concerned, I intend to vote in the interests of the smaller colonies. It is all very well to talk about our having protection from the fact that we have six representatives in the senate in each colony. We know what that means. It is equivalent to telling us that you will give us wings, but that we are not to have the power to use them. In other words, you clip them. Well, let that be done, and we will have nothing further to do with you.
Mr. CLARKE (Tasmania)[3.36]:

I was one of the representatives who in Adelaide voted with the object of giving to the senate power to amend money bills, and I desire to state the reasons why I intend to give a different vote upon the question now. I have heard the remark made—I do not know whether in this Committee or outside—that we ought to support the views which have been put forward by the parliaments of the various colonies; but I do not think that is the position. We are not here to voice or support the opinions of the various parliaments which have been expressed within the last few months, however much: we may respect them; but we are here, as representatives of the people, to exercise our best judgment for the purpose of bringing about a scheme of federation which will be fair to all the colonies, and which will be dishonoring to none. We are sent here to bring about a system of federation of such a kind that when we return to our respective colonies, we shall be able to say, "We have brought back federation with honor." I think it is admitted on all hands that we must start with a system of responsible government. Although we may not for many years retain it, yet we must start with it; and, starting with it, the question arises, as was so well put in Adelaide, is the system of responsible government consistent with a system of responsibility to two houses in a federation where the two houses have co-ordinate powers as regards taxation? I admit, to a large extent, the force of the argument put forward in Adelaide and elsewhere. I admit that there is no instance of a federation in the world today under a system of responsible government where both houses have co-ordinate powers with regard to taxation; but, although that is a fact, I think that, just as the House of Lords and the House of Commons in Great Britain would soon show the constitution to be a mass of absurdities if they pushed their respective rights and powers to the utmost, and inasmuch as the British Constitution never the less works very well under such circumstances, I think, if we had a system of responsible government under federation with two houses of co-ordinate powers as to money bills, the genius of our people would surmount all difficulties and enable the two systems to work well together. But, while that would in my opinion be the case, I must look at the position of affairs at present, and I consider that, just as the granting of the principle of equal representation of the states in the senate is a practical necessity of federation, it is also a practical necessity of federation that we should give in to the views of the larger colonies on this very important question. Representatives of Victoria and of New South Wales have told us that their people will not agree to any scheme of federation in which the senate has co-ordinate powers in the matter of amending money bills. I accept fully the statement of these hon. members when they tell us that is the view of their people. I admit that their statement is perfectly correct, and if that is the case it, is useless for us to expect that those colonies will agree to any scheme of federation where such an important obstacle is placed in their way. For these reasons, I think it is the, duty of the representatives of the smaller colonies to weigh the position very carefully. It is our duty to ask ourselves, "Is the compromise that was agreed to in 1891, the scheme that was ratified in Adelaide in 1897, one that would be fair to us, and would bring about no dishonor on our part?" I think it is, because I assume that we shall get the power of suggestion. If we get that, it will enable us to protect ourselves to as large an extent as we reasonably want. It will be fair to us, it will do us no dishonor, it will help considerably in bringing about federation, and for these reasons I intend to support the clause it stands in the bill.

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales)[3.43]:

I have a very lively recollection that when in Adelaide an attempt was made to liberalise this constitution, we were answered with the statement that hon. members felt themselves obliged to abide by the compromise which was fairly expressed in clauses 56 and 57. I have no hesitation in characterising that compromise as one which has stood largely in the way of the more populous colonies gaining any concession in this constitution bill. To a large extent I sympathise with the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest in the amendment he has proposed today. Although I intend to vote against that amendment, I think it would be a distinct gain to the people of the larger colonies if it were carried, and if we once for all started to break down the compromise of 1891, that compromise which was ratified in Adelaide, and which has been the stumbling block in the way of obtaining some substantial reform. We shall be met very shortly, when proposals are made to deal with the great question of conflicts between the two houses, with appeals to stand loyally by the compromise expressed in this clause, and I fear the Greeks when they are offering gifts. I have no gratitude to my hon. friend, Sir Philip Fysh, and those hon. gentlemen who are breaking away from the compact, so-called, with the smaller colonies, because I feel that when the time comes to deal with more vital provisions in the bill, they will claim that, having already sacrificed something, they should not be called upon to sacrifice anything further. I tell them that they have sacrificed nothing which will be any gain to the larger colonies; that they have sacrificed nothing which will help the people to have their purposes accomplished under the constitution itself. The people are asking for bread, and you offer them a stone. What do the people concern themselves about these points of etiquette and procedure in the conduct of business between the two houses? What do the people of the colonies concern themselves about these legal technicalities that crop up from time to time, as to whether amendments are to be made as amendments or in the form of suggestions? What the people do concern themselves about is that which stands between them and the accomplishment of their purposes. They do concern themselves about having a voice in the government of themselves. These amendments offer them nothing which will satisfy their wants. These amendments and this compromise merely cater to a feeling which is growing up in the minds of those who participate in the politics of the country as members of one house or the other. They contain nothing which really touches those vital points that the people themselves feel. I undertake to say that, in most of the conflicts which have occurred with regard to money bills in the various Australian colonies, the people have not concerned themselves so much about the amendments that have been made, but have concerned themselves about the possibility or otherwise of having ingrafted in the statutebook that which expresses their will and their desire. The power of veto still remains, and the power of veto vested in the senate is the power that I fear, and it is the power which must result in conflict. The senate may be right, and the house of representatives may be wrong, or the senate may be wrong and the house of representatives may be right; but, when these cases occur when these two bodies come into conflict, whether they have equal powers or otherwise, what is to happen? Where is to be the remedy? When the people find their will thwarted by the obstinate attitude of one house or the other, where, then, is the outlet from the difficulty?

The Hon. A.J. PEACOCK:

Why not deal with that later on, when we come to the discussion of the question?

The Hon. J.H. CARRUTHERS:

The reason I speak now is because at this time, when we are dealing with this compromise, we are really raising a stumbling block in the way of gaining our purpose later on. The hon. member cannot be oblivious of the fact that in Adelaide, immediately after these clauses were dealt with, we were met with objections to the granting of any further so-called concessions to the more populous states on the ground that a compromise had been arrived at, and must loyally be abided by, and that compromise was expressed in these few clauses. I desire to express my utter lack of sympathy with those who are contesting so strongly the point at issue. I would not hesitate to grant to the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, and those who vote with him, co-ordinate powers in the two houses to give them that which they imagine to be the substance, but which I take to be the shadow as long as they would grant in return that, with those co-ordinate powers, when a conflict did occur, when the constitution was being strained by a crisis, then there should be some outlet by which the people themselves might voice their opinions, and claim, and have in reality, the right to mould their own destiny and to frame their own laws. The right hon. member objects that all the attempts which have been made in the various clauses are attempts to detract from the influence of the senate. I desire to see the senate a powerful body, a strong body; but you will get that strength by building it on strong foundations; you will get that strength by creating it as a body elected on the broadest and best suffrage possible. The weakness of the senate arises from that which we have already done in calling it into existence, not with the will of the people of the commonwealth at its back, but with the will of that inanimate thing that cannot express its own wishes, that cannot show any enthusiasm or be grateful - that inanimate thing, the corporate body of the state. The senate being so constructed has an element of weakness, which must follow it right through its existence. I do hope that, in connection with the vote on this question, there will not be attached any importance to the fact that we are having assistance from those who represent the less populous colonies; and I hope that there will be no compact made which will tie the hands or hereafter interfere with the votes of those who, putting aside technicalities, desire to have some real vital principle embodied in the bill, which in case of conflict will allow the voice of the people to be paramount.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales)[3.51]:

As a representative of one of the largest colonies, I cannot help rising to say that much of the language which has been used by my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, seemed to me entirely unsuited to the occasion. This is not a question of compact or bargain. We have not come here to make bargains. We have come here to frame a scheme which we conscientiously shall be able to recommend to the voters in our several colonies, and in doing that we have to take into account that there is a divergence of sentiment between the electors in one colony and those in another. Recognising that, we find that there are several matters none of them absolutely essential to the successful working of the federation upon which we may be compelled to vote in a way contrary to our own private inclination, whilst there are others in regard to which other hon. members may find themselves in a similar position. As the Right Hon. the Prime Minister of New South Wales has pointed out, I feel certain that this question is regarded in New South Wales as a matter of great moment that it is not regarded as a light matter and I certainly disclaim for my part, and I believe I may do so on the part of almost all those who represent New South Wales, any idea that in asking any of the representatives of the smaller colonies to take into consideration our difficulties, we expect, or imagine it to be even possible, that they should claim that we should give way afterwards on my matter of bargain. We are not asking them to make a bargain, and I think that the speeches made by the hon. members, Sir Philip Fysh and Mr. Clarke, and others, will have a very great effect in this colony, and I believe in Victoria, in dissipating that prejudice which I am bound to say my hon. colleague, Mr. Carruthers, has, with others, inadvertently assisted to circulate the prejudice that there is some conspiracy on the part of the smaller colonies to attack and injure the larger colonies, The speeches made today by the representatives of the smaller colonies, and the votes that they have given, will, I hope entirely remove from the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, the prejudice he has cherished, and, unintentionally, has helped to encourage in this colony, that there is an attempt being made by the smaller, colonies to combine against the larger colonies. We may surely rely on the patriotism of those who recognise that in the interests of Australia they may have to give way on matters on which many of the electors do not see eye to eye with them, and we hope they will be able to convince many who differ from them that they have acted in the best interests of Australian union as we are certain that in New South Wales, in spite of the opposition and the querulous complaints of some of our representatives, we shall be able to convince the people that equal representation of the states in the senate is a practical necessity of union.

The Hon. J.W. HACKETT (Western Australia):

I wish to explain that, as in the case of some of my hon. friends from Tasmania, and Mr. Symon, of South Australia, today my vote will be on the opposite side to that upon which I voted on a previous occasion. It happened that at Adelaide I was the one member of the Convention who was unable to veto upon this question and it also happened that at the Convention of 1891, held in this Chamber, I was the only one of the representatives of my own colony who voted in favour of what has been since called the "Sydney compromise of 1891," in favour of suggestion as against amendment, and I wish to explain my attitude on the present occasion. I am indebted to my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, for, to a great extent, anticipating one of my objections, which is that, at this stage, we cannot accept any vote of this body as a final one, or as committing us permanently to one view or another. We do not know what is going to come before this Convention closes its sittings, and there is a great deal in what the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, said, that a concession of more powers or of less powers to one house or the other will greatly depend on: the provisions ultimately adopted with regard to the avoidance of deadlocks. In Sydney, in this chamber, I expressed an opinion strongly in favour of allowing full powers of amendment to the senate, although from the same motive which operates with many hon. members in this Convention, I submitted my view to what I saw was the view of the majority, and felt that unless concessions were made on the part of the less populous colonies, federation was impossible for Victoria and New South Wales. But my main objection to the refusal to concede powers of amendment to the senate is that we are loading the constitution in one direction. We are forcing it to move in a course for which it may be amply suited, but for which circumstances may prove it to be totally unsuitable. I admit that we must commence with what is called responsible government, and I also admit the glorious fruits of that form of government, but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that we are now entering upon an unknown sea. We are creating a constitution of which almost everything is undefined. We have little in the past to argue from, we have absolutely nothing in the future but the purest efforts of imagination, and it may be that it would be best for that constitution to run on the lines which have been established in England and the colonies for so many years. We must also remember that we have had fifty years' experience of the one, and it may be that we are now entering on a more fruitful career of development even than that which has attended the course of England during the last fifty, or even hundred, years. That is the main reason why I have always been doubtful about limiting the powers of the senate, for I firmly agree with my hon. friend, Mr. Carruthers, that the political genius of the English nation will discover a way out of any difficulty that may arise, and our business is to impose as few obstacles as possible in the path of its freest development. Let me say one word in regard to what has been so often, if I may use the word, flaunted in this Chamber. That is the magnificent concession made by certain hon. members of this Convention to the smaller states, in giving them equality of representation in the senate.

The Hon. J.H. Howe:
Concession?

The Hon. J.W. Hackett:
Yes, the magnificent concession that it is claimed has been made. Let me once for all, on behalf of my own colony, repudiate that with all the energy of which I am capable. Talk of a concession, when all that we saw in it was a fundamental condition precedent as necessary to federation as the retention of the existence of our own parliaments and our own executives was necessary to the colonies.

An Hon. MEMBER:

The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:

I do not agree with my hon. friend. It is simply viewed from two different aspects. The fact remains that I am sure not one of the smaller colonies would be represented here at the present moment if equality of representation were not granted.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It seems that that ghost has not been laid yet. It will come up again!

The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:

Very likely.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I thought we settled that matter last week!

The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:

The hon. member settles things very fast; but many of the things which he settles unsettle themselves just as quickly.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I did not settle it!

The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:

I congratulate the Convention that the hon. member has not been able to settle these matters, and to settle them at the same time. The concession of equal representation may mean much, or it may mean absolutely nothing. It depends entirely upon the powers and rights which are conceded to the body which is invested with equal representation. To what purpose, is it to invite five men to a dinner, and then to muzzle three of them? Yet that is the concession which, after all, this compact as to equal representation in the senate amounts to. I am not going to labour these matters; but the two points I desire to impress upon hon. members in concluding my remarks are these. I look with no dread upon this power of suggestion. It seems to me that its value entirely depends upon the body to which it belongs. The objection I see to it at the present moment is this: that the power of suggestion being by its very terms a less important, less dignified, and less authoritative power than the power of amendment, a suggestion comes with inferior weight from a body which associates itself with a, position of inferiority by the very act of being compelled to make use of it to make its opinions known in another place. Of course if we get a strong senate and a good senate, which again depends upon the powers and rights which we give to that body, it will make its will known. There can be no doubt about that. After all, there may not be very much difference between making amendments in the body of another chamber and making amendments upon its own account; for after all, one body must concur in the amendments made by another body, and amendments are not made before they are concurred in. Therefore, an amendment which is simply put upon the statute book in the house of representatives would be just as valuable and just as important as if it were first proposed in the senate. That is the first remark I have to make; that I do not view with any serious alarm this power of suggestion. If the senate deserves to have the power of suggestion, and is determined to exercise it strongly, and it is found that it exercises it wisely-

Mr. SYMON:
The legislatures of the various colonies have exercised it in connection with the amendments which we are now considering!

The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:
Exactly, and although the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest rather mocks at its existence in our constitution, he is in the favourable position of having to deal with two houses which are in accord; but the time may come when the power of suggestion may be a very unpleasant scorpion in the bosom of the premier of the day. The second remark I have to make is this, and I make it with all sincerity. If it should be found that the right of amendment would stand in the way of federation, I would not weigh it in my mind for a moment before I would surrender it. If we are told by hon. members who speak with authority on behalf of the larger colonies that the substitution of the right of suggestion for that of amendment is an essential condition to their entering federation, I say, away with the power of amendment, and let us all stand by the right of suggestion.

An Hon. MEMBER:
The right hon. member, Mr. Reid, said that it was essential!

The Hon. J.W. HACKETT:
If the course of debates and events during the next few weeks or months convince me of that, I shall be found content to waive the matter in the spirit which I exhibited at the sittings of the Convention of 1891. The constitution which it is now proposed to adopt is different from that which was framed in 1891. More than one enormously important element has been introduced, and until we dispose of these, and see what form they are likely to take, I must, at all events on this occasion, record my vote with the right hon. member, Sir John Forrest.

The Hon. H. DOBSON (Tasmania)[4.5]:

Recognising as I do that every moment of our time is precious, I do not desire to make a long speech; but, after the challenge of the hon. member, Sir Philip Fysh, to change my vote, I think I ought to state to the Convention and to the people of all the colonies why I do not feel inclined to do so. I think the right hon. member, Sir Edward Braddon, hit the nail on the head when he said that some of us might be perfectly willing to give to our hon. friends opposite, and to the representatives of New South Wales, some means, either by dissolution or referendum, of settling disputes between the two houses. But I take it that our hon. friends cannot ask us for and I shall be found opposing my old and hon. colleague if he ventures to go through the colony with an opposite intention. We ought to have confidence in ourselves, and I feel certain that when the bill leaves this chamber it will have such elements of fairness in it that every one ought to be willing to accept it. When we talk about the will of the people, and about the wishes of a majority prevailing, we are using phrases which lead us into disaster, The right hon. member, Mr. Reid, told us that the whole of the people of this colony were in favour of equal representation in the senate. It was said that almost all the men elected to represent New South Wales went before this large constituency on that principle, and that half a dozen candidates who did not believe in equal representation were not elected. Yet we find both houses of the New South Wales legislature absolutely opposed to equal representation, which is a nice parody upon our so-called representative government, by which we are always imagining that we can find out what the will of the people is. I believe that in two cases out of five the legislature does not know what the will of the people is. I defy anyone to say what the will of the people is when there is passion and prejudice and party feeling abroad. We have found no, machine which will tell us what the popular will is. The right hon. member, Mr. Reid, asks us what is in a phrase or a name? What is in the word "federation"? Everything is in it. We are here to build up a federal constitution. Our constitution must, I take it, differ in certain elements from the constitutions which govern the separate colonies. Hon. members, when they are comparing the federation which we are now building up, with its upper and lower houses of legislature, to our own systems of two chambers, forget altogether that in some cases the upper chamber is a nominee body. I am surprised that the right hon. member, Mr. Reid, forgot that in New South Wales the upper chamber is a nominee house. In the federal legislature, however, the upper chamber will be a popular house. There will be the same popular will behind it as there will be behind the lower chamber. The right hon. member, Mr. Kingston, and the hon. member, Sir Graham Berry—one inside the Convention and the other outside—in the days when it was proposed that the senate should be elected by the parliaments, both said that suppose the second chamber sprang from the popular will, and was elected upon manhood suffrage they would have no objection, and there could be no objection, to its having powers co-equal with those possessed by the house of representatives. These hon. gentlemen get concessions on one hand, but they give us nothing back with the other. The hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, said he did not believe in graveyards; but certain hon. members here do believe in a very large graveyard—the graveyard of ultra-democracy, which, like the grave, takes everything and gives nothing back. I desire to say to my hon. friends, who I know have to go back to their electors, as I have to go back to mine and who desire, as we all earnestly desire, to get the bill accepted by the people, that I am prepared to meet them on the vital point of having some process by which we can settle disputes between the two houses. But I am not prepared to do that if you will only give me a weak senate. If you give me a strong senate, which can keep up its dignity and have some control over the great force which is hurrying us along quite fast enough, which will be enabled to have control in some way or another over the democratic force which prevails, I shall be quite prepared to give you what you desire. I am satisfied that blunders will be made in our constitution which will not redound to our credit. Why? Because we are taking the most cumbersome, bungling method of framing a constitution that the wit of man could devise. If we could shut our doors, I believe that by 12 o'clock tonight we could settle our differences, we could adjust the balance between the two houses in such a manner as would satisfy all of us, and put the bill in such a shape that we should be prepared to send it to the country and, if necessary, stump the constituencies in favour of it.

The Hon. E. BARTON:

Then they would not look at it!

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

I think the hon. member is wrong. If we sat round the table, each man speaking for a minute, instead of half an hour, and having a conference over the matter, we could come to a satisfactory agreement, and then, if you like, we could debate it afterwards in the light of day with the press and public present, giving reasons to show, not why we compromised, but reasons in favour of the bill.

An Hon. MEMBER:
That was tried at Adelaide!
The Hon. H. DOBSON:
Is the hon. member frightened by one or two sentences uttered by the hon. member, Mr. Lyne most improperly uttered, I think to the effect that we had been sitting in secret at Adelaide when we had done nothing of the kind.
Mr. LYNE:
So you did!
The Hon. H. DOBSON:
The hon. member used the word "secret" in such a way as to tell the electors of the colony that this had been done behind their backs, whereas there was nothing of the kind. I think the Right Hon. G.H. Reid would have done much better service if he had pointed out to the Convention exactly how the senate will work shorn of the powers of which you wish to deprive it, instead of giving that little historical account of what the Senate in America is doing. What bills will come before the senate? One of the first bills will deal with money; it will be a bill providing for the defences of the colonies. We all think that the defences of Australia have been to some extent neglected, because all have gone in for isolated, spasmodic, individual action instead of federal action. One of the first bills that the senate will have to deal with will be to provide a federal scheme of defence. Such a scheme may involve the expenditure of £1,000,000; it may involve the expenditure of £2,000,000 or £3,000,000. The senate might look upon that scheme as extravagant, and devised as much with the idea of finding work for the working classes as for carrying out efficiently a scheme of defence. The senate might want to reduce the expenditure from £2,000,000 to £1,000,000. According to what is now proposed the senate can do nothing. It must either pass the bill with all this extravagance, as it conscientiously believes, or it must throw it into the waste paper basket. Is there any one so unreasonable, conservative, or obstructive as to ask that the senate shall not have power to reduce the amount in that bill from £2,000,000 to £1,000,000 and to send it back in that shape to the lower house? In such a case if the lower house would not accept £1,000,000 it might be prepared to compromise and accept £1,500,000. It seems to me that you are framing an unworkable scheme; you are not only robbing the senate of the prestige which it ought to have, but you are taking away from it all power of concession and conciliation, taking away from it all power of giving and taking that spirit which we have here which prompts us to give and take, and which would enable the senate to try in that way to carry out the will of the people. What is the second bill which would probably come before the senate? A bill to establish a uniform tariff, under which we have financially to live. Our existence will, to a large extent, depend upon the tariff being so adjusted, that those colonies which want protection, and those colonies which, like Tasmania, want revenue from the customs, and without it would go insolvent, may be able to get what they desire. Yet some hon. members want it to go forth to the people that the senate cannot even reduce the duty on one single item out of 300 or 400 items.

Mr. LYNE:

The Hon. H. DOBSON:

We must get revenue in some way, and it must be provided through the customs. That is one of the financial problems before us. The point is this: that, in a customs bill containing 300 or 400 items, the senate, according to this clause, cannot say that the tax on tea shall be reduced from 4d to 3d., that a tax upon machinery cannot be reduced from 10 per cent to 5 per cent. It cannot take an item from the revenue schedule and put it on the free list. That is what you call building up a senate and a, federal government with two houses which will possess the confidence of Australia. Have we not a right to take into consideration the education, intelligence, and thrift of the people? Are we to simply count heads? As Burke, said, are we to have government by the counting of heads? There is another phase of this question to be considered. Will the intelligent, the wealthy classes, the men who sit at home and say, "A plague o'both your houses; we are sick of your party politics, and will have none of them" will these men accept your constitution if you make it lop-sided, as I think you may? But if we devise some scheme by which, in its essential particulars, we shall secure that the will of the people, when it is clearly ascertained to be in a certain direction, will be given effect to if we secure that the people shall have their way after due time has been given for discussion and reflection, I think surely we have a right to claim that the senate shall be made a strong body which will command the respect of the people as well as of the lower house.

The Hon. J. HENRY (Tasmania)[4.18]:

The Right Hon. G.H. Reid, in his exhaustive speech, advised hon. members who followed him to make short speeches. That advice commends itself to me, and there is no hon. member who has a stronger objection to wasting time or multiplying unnecessary words than I have. Yet I feel constrained to say something on this subject. Although I
