How He Died
Australia.

O RADIANT Land! o'er whom the Sun's first dawning
   Fell brightest when God said “Let there be Light;”
O'er whom the day hung out its bluest awning
   Whitening to wondrous deeps of stars by night—
O Land exultant! on whose brow reposes
   A queenlier coronal than has been wrought
From light of pearls and bloom of Eastern roses
   In all the workshops of high Poet-thought!—

O thou who hast, thy splendid hair entwining,
   A toil-won wreath where are no blood-splashed bays,
Who standest in a stainless vestment shining
   Before the eyes and lips of love and praise—
O wrought of old in Orient clime and sunny,
   With all His richest bounties graced and decked;
Thy heart all virgin gold, thy breath all honey,
   Supremest work of greatest Architect!—

O Land of widest hope, of promise boundless,
   Why wert thou hidden in a dark, strange sea
To wait through ages, fruitless, scentless, soundless,
   Till from thy slumber men should waken thee?—
Why did'st thou lie, with ear that never hearkened
   The sounds without, the cries of strife and play,
Like some sweet child within a chamber darkened

What opiate sealed thine eyes while all the others
   Grew tired and faint in East and West and North;
Why did'st thou dream until thy joyful brothers
   Found where thou wast, and led thee smiling forth?—
Why did'st thou mask the happy face thou wearest?
   Why wert thou veiled from all the eager eyes?
Why left so long, O first of lands and fairest,
   Beneath the tent of unconjectured skies?

We know thy secret. In the awful ages
   When there was silence and the world was white,
Ere yet on the recording volume's pages
   The stern-browed Angel had begun to write;
Ere yet from Eden the sad feet had wandered
   Or yet was sin or any spilth of blood,
August in judgment, God the Father pondered
   Upon His work, and saw that it was good—
The Sovereign of suns and stars, the thunder
   Of whose dread Power we cannot understand,
Sate throned and musing on the shining wonder
   Of this new world within His hollowed hand,
With high sad eyes, like one that saw a vision—
   And spake "Lo! this My gift is fair to see,
But Pride will mar the glory, and derision
   Of many feet that will not follow Me.

"I give my creatures shields of hope and warning;
   I set in fruitful ways of peace their first;
But even these will turn from Me, and scorning
   My council, hearken to the Voice Accurst;
And sin, and pain, and death will make invasion
   Of this abode, and from a world undone
To Heaven will sound the moans of expiation
   They wring from Him, My well-beloved Son.

"And yet again will they, with eyes unheeding
   His sacrifice, uplift their guilty hands
Against their brethren, and with rage exceeding
   And lust, and vengeance, desolate the lands.
But this one land," so mused He, the Creator,
   "This will I bless and hide from all the woe,
That worthier among men, in ages later
   May find it pure, and, haply, hold it so."

Then, sweet Australia, fell a benediction
   Of sleep upon thee, where no wandering breath
Might come to tell thee of the loud affliction
   Of cursing tongues and clamouring hosts of death;
And with the peace of His great love around thee,
   And rest that clashing ages could not break,
Strong-sighted eyes of English seekers found thee,
   Strong English voices cried to thee “Awake!”

For them a continent undreamed of, peerless,
   A realm for happier sons of theirs to be,
One land preserved unspotted, bloodless, tearless,
   Beyond the rim of an enchanted sea
Lay folded in the soft compelling languor
   Of warm south airs, like an awaiting bride,
While strife, and hate, and culminating anger
   Raged through the far-off nations battle-dyed.

Here were no dreadful vestiges imprinted
   With evil messages and brands of Cain,
No mounds of death or walls of refuge dinted
   With signs that Christ had lived and died in vain;
No chill memorials here proclaimed the story
   Of kingships stricken for and murders done;
Here was a marvel and a separate glory,
   One land whose history had not begun!

One unsown garden, fenced by sea-crags sterile,
   Whose iron breasts flung back the thundering waves,
From all the years of fierce unrest and peril,
   And slaves, and lords, and broken blades, and graves;
One gracious freehold for the free, where only
   Soft dusky feet fell, reaching not thy sleep;
One field inviolate, untroubled, lonely,
   Across the dread of the uncharted deep!

O dear and fair! awakened from thy sleeping
   So late! The world is breaking into noon;
The eyes that all the morn were dim with weeping
   Smile through the tears that will cease dropping soon!
Thine have no tears in them for olden sorrow,
   Thou hast no heartache for a ruined past;
From bright to-day to many a bright to-morrow
   Shall be thy way, O first of lands and last!
The Last Bullet.

SINCE the first human eyes saw the first timid stars break through Heaven and shine,
Surely never a man was bowed down with the cross of a curse such as mine;
They of all the dead millions of millions whose dust whirls and flees in the wind,
Who were born helpless heirs of the hate of a fate that is bitter and blind—

All whose lives pain has smitten with fire since God first set the sun to its course—
What have they known of woe like to mine? What of grief? Of despair? Of remorse?
Oh! to cancel one hour of my past! Oh! to shut out all thought, to forget,
Then go forth as a leper to die in hot wastes! Listen! Over us yet,

Her and me, in the heart of the North, hung the glamour of Love at its height,
Joy of things unperceived of the rest, holy hours of unwaning delight;
Joy of selfless devotion to each in each heart; joy of guiding the feet
Of our babe, our one daughter, our May, by three summers of childhood made sweet!

I had dared overmuch in the battle for wealth, I had ventured alone
Upon verdurous tracts that lay fronting the edge of a desert unknown;
Fifty miles further out than the nearest I chanced on a green width of plain,
In a time when the earth was made glad by a grey year of bountiful rain;

Fifty miles from Maconochie's Gap. They had warned me. Some three years gone by,
In a night when the flames of his home reddened far up the heights of the sky,
With a hard ragged spear through his heart, and a tomahawk blade in his head,
Lay the Master, in death, and his wife—Ah! how better had she, too, lain dead!

Dark the tale is to tell, yet it was but a cruel resentment of wrong,
The fierce impulse of those who were weak, for revenge upon those who were strong—
Cattle speared at the first, blacks shot down, and the blood of their babes, even, shed;
Blood that stains the same hue as our own. It is written, red blood will have red!

But an organised anger of whites swept the bush with a fury unchained,
Till the dead seemed as thick as the trees, and the black murdered corpses remained,
Till the black glutted crows scarce could rise from their feast at the sound of a foot,
And the far-away camps through the nights lay unlighted, and ghastly, and mute!

And a terror ran out through the tribes. Since that devilish crime had been done;
Not a dusk stealthy savage had crossed the wide bounds of Maconochie's run;
But the white sky in pitiless scorn stared at waterless plains that implored
For the mercy of clouds that passed, mocking them. “Vengeance is mine,” said the Lord!

They had warned me. “Out yonder,” they said, “there's abundance of water and grass,
You've Brown's Ranges beside you, they draw down and drain all the rain-clouds that pass, (We are outside the rainy belt here). But remember the words we have said—
If you will go, prepare to have trouble; take plenty of powder and lead!”

And I went, with my trustworthy helpers, and lived through a desolate year
Of suspicions, and vigils, and hunger for her of all dear ones most dear;
But a year crowned with utmost successes, and crowned above all things in this,
That it brought her again to my side with the gift of a new face to kiss!

And a blessedness came with her feet, and our life was a prosperous peace,
And the years as they passed shed upon us a fair meed of worldly increase;
But a thousand times better to me than assurance of silver and gold
Was the measureless love of a wife, mine for ever to have and to hold!

Oh! the pang of remembering then! Oh! could madness dishevel my mind,
Till I babbled of wry tangled things, looking neither before nor behind!
But I shrink from the slumberless thought of one deed, as the first of our race,
In the shame of his wrong-doing, crouched from the light of God's terrible face!

We had hardly been vexed by the blacks in our work, though all through the first year,
And the second, we stood upon guard with the disciplined earnest of fear,
But the summers and winters went by, and the wild tribes gave never a proof
Of their hate, and our vigilance slept, and security came to our roof.

So, unwarned, fell the night of my doom. There was smoke in the west through the day,
And an hour after noon all the hands had been mustered and sent out to stay
In its course the red wave that approached, for the high grass was yellow and sere
With the withering breath of the dense sullen heat of the last of the year.

They took rifles to shoot kangaroo, as it chanced. My two darlings and I Sat together at night by the door, with our eyes on a fringe of the sky
Where the light of the late sunken sun was replaced by a wide lurid glow,
Which pulsed high or grew pale as the fire under-neath it waxed fierce or waned low.

We had spoken glad-voiced of the time, soon to come, when our exile would be
At an end, and our feet once again in the quiet lands over the sea,
Till the large, lovely eyes of the child felt their lids grow despotic. She drew
To her mother and slept in her arms, and the newrisen moon kissed the two.

I was looking beyond them to where the broad columns of tree-shadows slept,
Stretching west twice the length of the trees, when a horror of something that crept,
Something blacker than shade, through the shade, struck my heart with a hammer of ice,
And with eyeballs dilated and strained, and hands clenched with the clench of a vice,
I leapt up; but a clear sudden whirr cleaved the night, and with scarcely a groan
From her lips, the white soul of our child passed among the white souls at the Throne!
“To the house!” with the dead and the living, half dead, clasped before me, I sprang
Through the strong door, and bolted and barred it before, on the stillness, out rang
A wild-volumed malignance of yells. To have light might be death. In the dark,
On the floor, the poor mother groped madly about the dead child for a spark
Of the hope of faint lingering life, till the blood that was mine and her own
From the boomerang gash, warmed her hands, and she knew that we two were alone!

Yell on yell of the monsters without! crash of shutters behind!—but I knew
How the wall that divided was built; that, at least, they could never get through—
Crash of manifold blows on the door! but, I knew too, how that had been made;
And I crawled to the corner and found my revolvers, and hoarsely I said:

“Kiss me now, ere the worst comes to pass, O most stricken and dearest of wives—
They will find out the window—I hold in my hands but a dozen of lives.

In the storehouse the arms are, God help us! Fold hands in the dark, dear, and pray!”
But she sobbed from my feet, “God forgets us, and I have forgotten the way!”

Crash of spear through the window! an answering flash with the message of lead
From my hand!—and dull answer to that of a lean demon-form falling dead!
Crash on crash of a dozen of spears! till they lay in a sheaf on the floor!—
Red rejoinder of fire, as the moonlight revealed them—“But one bullet more!”

I had hissed to myself. But she heard me, and seizing my arm, held it fast,
And a hard, altered voice that I knew not at once, cried “Hold! I claim the last!
Dearest love, from your hand the divorce! One last kiss till the Infinite Life—
Once again, on my lips! Hold it close, and . . . . . remember Maconochie's wife!”

By the white sickly light of a match, she had bared that true bosom, all red
With the blood of her slain one. I looked in her eyes. “God forgive me!” I said . . . .
And the sound of the thing that I did was repeated outside by a sound—
Not as awful to me the dread Trump, when the time of my sentence comes round—

Rifle shots close at hand! devil-cries! counter-cheers of the voices I knew!
They were back! I was saved! Lost! lost! lost! Can the blood of the Saviour they slew
Upon Calvary's hill wash out her's from my hands? For I trusted not God
To the full in the hour of my need, and my lips will not cleave to the rod

Of his wrath, and I fall in the sand with the weight of the cross that I bear—
Who has ever gone out with a burden of pain, of remorse, of despair
Like to this? Let me stumble to death, or through life—it is equally well;
Doubly damned, what can death bring to me but translation from Hell unto Hell?
Charles Gordon.

TO-DAY, there comes from where the English crags
Stare blindly on the war of winter seas
A woe of many voices, and a breeze
Of sorrow from the stir of half-mast flags;

To-day, with lifted eyes and folded hands,
Men pray for one new-lost, with stammering lips
Not often moved to prayer, in forts and ships
And wastes and cities, and in many lands;

To-day, across the earth sounds one long moan
Of sudden lamentation for the loss
Of him, who yielded up beneath his cross
One of the noblest souls this world has known;

To-day, in that stern stronghold by the Nile,
Far from us all, amid a dusk, strange race
Who knew not what they did, his martyr-face
Looks up to Heaven to greet the Master's smile;

This was the man who swayed fierce pagan hordes
With kind, strong wisdom in a time of flame,
When China swooned in horror without name
Of brother-hate and blindly plunging swords;

This was the man whose hand but reached for power
To use it in the help of human-kind;
Who, leaving pomp and pageantry behind,
Fought Sin and Want with all his strength's large dower;

This was the man who, having fought and won
His country's battles, turned from all reward,
And, hearing the command of his dear Lord,
Sought all dark ways where good was to be done.

O dead, great hero! true to peace or strife;
Lifting a giant's arm to shatter chains,
Or kneeling by some couch to soothe the pains
Of such as groaned away a bitter life!

Brave Christian soldier, who, on hostile walls
Won martial glory, envied by thy peers,
Then found thy duty through unnoticed years
Down in the gloom of gaols and hospitals!

What need hast thou of our poor prayers? who wast
In thy high self-denial half divine;
Whose name as a clear beacon light will shine
Above the names of kings, till Time has past!

So lie, while through the world the requiems roll,
    By the dark Nile, and have for monument
    A story of brave deeds and high intent—
A name round which love makes an aureole!
How He Died.

‘TAKE my horse,” cried the Squatter to Nabbage, “tis thirty long miles at the least; Ride as if all Hell's devils rode after, and don't spare yourself or the beast, And just mark me, my cove—if I hear that you've stopped for as much as a nip, I will hide you while God lets me stand, and then pass Curly Johnson the whip!

‘Give the doctor this letter and tell him to get his best horses and drive As he never has driven before if he hopes to find Freddy alive: Say I'll pay for the pair twenty times if he flogs them until they drop dead, And be there in two hours, or, by God!”—there is no need to add what he said.

There was no need of threats to urge Nabbage; one instant, and firm on the back Of the boss's blood horse he was racing away down the dimly marked track, Far away in the thickening night, with the hand of an icy despair On his heart, for the help that was vain for a life that was past even prayer.

Not a man on the station liked Nabbage; he held himself coldly aloof From the boys in the hut, with his eyes mostly fixed on the floor or the roof: He was wrinkled, and pock-marked, and stooped, and at meal times sat silent, apart, As though nursing some scorn of them all which grew deep in the shade of his heart.

For awhile all the crowd thought him sulky and said he was “putting it on,” Then the sense of the hut, being taken, decided him just “a bit gone,” But Old Stumpy, the cook, held the view that the man was a natural skunk; And to add to the public disfavour, he oft went alone and got drunk.

Curly Johnson, the super, despised him, and never neglected a chance To annoy or degrade the poor wretch who replied not with even a glance: He was general drudge at the station, and toiled in a spiritless way At whatever they told him to do, for whatever they fancied to pay.

Strange that Freddie, the Squatter's one darling, the golden-haired impudent boy, With the slang of the bush on his lips, and the great eyes of Helen of Troy, He, the eager imperious young master whose talk was of yearlings and brands, Should pick out this strange slouch for a chum from among the more sociable hands;

But it was so, and often and often, from morning till set of the sun Rode these two through the light of the summer far out on the plains of the run, Freddie taking his favourite pony, and Nabbage—I think you can guess That the steed Curly Johnson let him have was not of the build of Black Bess.

And everyone noticed that Nabbage was gentle and kind with the child, And a rumour spread widely abroad that one night in the hut he had smiled As a man might whose thoughts were away in the grave of one cherished and kissed, While his comrades grew heated at euchre, or smoked their unspeakable twist.

And in this way things went on till one day, when the gum-leaves hung lifelessly down
In the haze of a ring of bush fires that at night made each hill seem a town,
They had yarded some steers to be branded—a wild-looking, dangerous lot,
And young Freddie had lighted the fire, and the iron was just getting hot,

When Joe Smith, the new boundary rider, whose conduct was painfully flash,
Passed along down the front of the yard, hitching in his red silk-woven sash;
All at once came a rush as of water, and Joe made one spring past the gate
Which withstood for a moment, then crashed with the strain of the multiplied weight.

Just then Freddie, poor Freddie, looked up with a laugh to see what had gone wrong,
When a score of mad steers burst upon him, and trampled and tossed him along—
Every man rushed at once to his help, and they lifted him, silent and white,
And that was the reason why Nabbage was riding away through the night.

* * * * *

Every light on the hills out of view, in the dim solemn glens not a light,
Not a sound or a stir in the depths of the marvellous hush of the night,
Not a pulse or a heart-beat of Nature, no break in the infinite rest,
Not a star with the eyelight of God to be seen from the east to the west.

Half a mile from a town wrapped in midnight a broken-necked horse at a creek,
And a man with death's dews on his forehead, and blood on his coat and his cheek;
“I am dying—I feel death upon me—but yet, even yet, if God wills
I may crawl on my knees to the doctor's—yes, this is the last of the hills!

“To the left is the way I am certain; God grant that it be not too late!
Heaven send that my life may be paid for the life of my poor little mate!
Darling child of the woman I loved in the days when—Oh, God! is it vain?
No! for your sake, my dead sweetheart's boy, I can fight yet a while with this pain!

“Years ago when the Curse overtook me, when drink brought the shame of my lot,
She recoiled with a shudder of loathing and scorn from the pitiful sot,
But to-night may be large with atonement; to-night, if her spirit can know
How and why I am wrestling with death, may redeem all the lost long ago!

“Not two hundred yards now! if I reach it, though even to die at the door,
Here's the letter to tell him—Oh, Heaven! the thought never struck me before!
He will see I am dying and stop for awhile to attend me! What way
Can I think of in time, to prevent half a moment of needless delay?

“Ha! I have it! He knows, like the rest, that whenever I can I get tight,
I'll pretend that I stopped out at Brown's and got drunk—for the last time—to-night,
I can muffle this handkerchief well round my face and he'll not see the mark
Of the rock on my head where I fell with the horse when we leaped in the dark.”

So the man, like a serpent disabled, writhes on with low agonised moans,
And just here and there touches with blood fallen logs, and dry twigs, and sharp stones,
Till he wearily drags round a corner and finds a warm light in the gloom,
Then creeps further and beats with faint strength on the door of the young doctor's room.

A strange man, most decidedly drunk, with a letter held out in his hand—
For a moment the doctor can't quite make it out, and proceeds to demand
Who he is? What he wants?—but the drunkard, half-rolling away from the door, Curls up just where the light cannot reach him, and calmly commences to snore.

Then the doctor tears open the letter and shouts to the stableman, “Dick!
Fix up Starlight and Fan in the buggy and have them around pretty quick,”
Then indignantly kicks the fallen drunkard, and seizing the drugs he may need,
Drives away up the street with the greys at the utter-most reach of their speed!

And the drunkard half-rises, and listens, a wistful, sad smile on his face,
As he mutters, “Thank God I deceived him! in three hours he'll be at the place;
And whether poor Freddie lives yet or has gone where the blessed abide
I have triumphed an hour over Death for the child of my love!” So he died.
The Palace of Art.

I built my soul a lordly pleasure-house,
   Wherein at ease for aye to dwell.
I said, “O soul, make merry and carouse,
   “Dear soul, for all is well.”

A huge crag-platform, smooth as burnish'd brass
   I chose. The ranged ramparts bright
From level meadow-bases of deep grass
   Suddenly scaled the light.

Thereon I built it firm. Of ledge or shelf
   The rock rose clear, or winding stair.
My soul would live alone unto herself
   In her high palace there.

—Tennyson.

Fronting the rock whereon that palace, thronged
   With treasures that my soul held revel with,
Was reared, the land for half a mile belonged
   To a hard case named Smith:

A sordid churl, full gross and corpulent,
   Whom my still soul objected to, because
He had no soul, and oft discoursed of Rent,
   Spurning grammatic laws.

And while a thousand workmen of rare craft
   Did toil in my soul's courts and shape her towers,
This creature in his meadow stood and laughed
   Among the trees and flowers.

And after, when the shapely spires that were
   All people's wonder and her sure delight,
Rose through the breathless and astonished air
   Perfect and finished quite,

He laughed again, and my soul laughed to see
   Him laugh, exceeding glad that he was glad,
Not knowing at the time that I and she Had been severely “had.”

But so it hapt. For soon arose a town
   Beyond the breadth of that sweet field, where they
Who wrought for her desire had settled down
(As common souls would say).

And many came who from afar did hear
   Of this fair miracle that had been wrought
And picnicked in Smith's field on bottled beer:
   Each day in passing brought

A troop of wondering gapers who did wend
   Their footsteps thitherward from rise of sun
Till set thereof, and ere the seasons end
   Six 'buses there did run.

But when the town grew large and throve apace
   This field was measured into many a lot
For building leasehold, and became a place
   Where rubbish might be shot:

A spot where, when the world was white with noon,
   Or red with sunset, villains wielding goads
Urged weary horses, bearing late and soon
   Foul and unwholesome loads.

Vile offal and remains of things that were,
   Against the aspiring rock whereon I built
That wondrous mansion, high and wondrous fair,
   The miscreants did tilt.

Below the oriels, when my soul peered out
   Vexed and affrighted, where soft peace had smiled,
She heard discordant sounds, saw strewn about
   Confusion dire and wild:

Large bones and shreds of creatures newly dead
   And sordid relics from the kitchens cast,
Old kettles, broken pans, and bits of lead,
   She viewed with eyes aghast;

Boots past all use, and curved like black new moons,
   Fragments of earthenware and brick and glass,
Parts of old blankets and old pantaloons,
   Made her cry out, “Alas!”

The trees were gone; their stumps like skittle pins
   Stood up, and, scattered everywhere between,
Were many dinted and unwholesome tins
   That once held kerosene.

Here young plebeians of unresting jaws
   Assailed with words that did my soul surprise
And grieve, in strife begot of playing taws,
   Each other's limbs and eyes;
Here wayward hogs did root, from whose deep throats
   Came deep complaint, and sad discoloured cows,
And many evil and disownèd goats,
   Like Holman Hunt's, did browse.

And often to my soul there came a cry
   Of anguish, sudden, loud and tremulous,
As these same goats some pensive passer-by
   Did butt, and sore concuss.

So at the last she said to me, “Look here!
   I'm full of these mean sights and discords hoarse,
In consequence of which I almost fear
   My speech is growing coarse,

“Go to old Smith, confuse the soulless lout
   With gold! This thing has overflowed the cup;
You with uncounted wealth can buy him out—
   So go and ante up!”

I went, but all in vain. He would not yield
   One rood of all that land for all my gold;
He said, “Not much, old Cocky, that there field
   Is mine; I'm goin' to hold;

“You spent your millions up on that old rock
   Building your thingumbob, while not a cent
I parted. Well, you've simply made my block Worth fortunes: I will rent.”

   * * * * *

Within a week there came a wizened knave
   With prying eyes and an uncertain air,
Like a brave man who feared to be thought brave,
   Up by my palace stair.

(I said there was no stair, but that, you know,
   Was just poetic licence). He implored
My soul, who was about the place, to show
   The marvels that were stored

Within her heaven to him, whereat in glee
   She clapped her hands (my soul had hands; all souls Worth speaking of, have hands) and cried to me “Lo! I will heap up coals

“On this presumptuous stranger who has dared
   To reach his hand toward high forbidden fruits,” Then added, “The poor wretch is ginger-haired
   And shod with slop-made boots!”
Yet graciously, with grace that veiled deceit,
   She led him through the joy of her great halls
O'er gem-wrought floors together ranged their feet,
   Their eyes o'er carven walls:

Together they passed on through many a scene
   Of beauty strange, illumed with every hue
The sun had learned from panes of gold and green
   That he looked blandly through.

“Thus do I punish him!” she mused. “From here
   When he goes forth, how dead, and chill, and dim,
How utterly unbearable and drear
   His world will seem to him!”

But oftentimes from the pocket of his vest
   The stranger did a short lead-pencil draw,
And, like the average visitor, “expressed Surprise at what he saw,”

Then made some entries in a shiny book
   That might be bought for fourpence. Quite elate
He seemed, when all was seen, and warmly shook
   My soul's hand at the gate.

*      *      *      *      *

Not thrice thereafter did this moving ball
   Whereon we live show the sun both his sides
Ere this same stranger on my soul did call,
   With a face like a bride's;

From out his pouch a document he drew,
   Then drew himself in haste beyond the gates:
The paper, like my soul herself, was blue,
   And it demanded Rates;

Rates, in proportion to the gold that I
   Had spent, so that she might in bliss “carouse”;
Rates on each object that did glorify
   Her sumptuous pleasure-house;

Rates on the cloistered courts and galleries,
   And fountains, in whose basins clear did swim
All various fishes that might harmonise
   With even her lightest whim!

Rates upon everything, and tax, and fine,
   Beyond belief did my sad soul dismay—
Rates she well knew, this angry soul of mine,
   That I could never pay!
So she said this, “It's just a cruel sin!
    They've even taxed us on each dragon's gorge;
Smith isn't taxed at all! I shall begin
    To study Henry George!”

*      *      *      *      *

I sold the Palace below cost to Smith,
    And sadly on its towers we turned our backs,
My soul and I, saying, “Freedom is a myth Without the Single Tax!”
In Reply

(To a letter from Her, enclosing portrait of, and rhapsody on, the Run, Sister Clare).

“HER mouth is resolute,” you write
   In praise of her, your perfect Clare;
“Her chin betokens silent might
   To suffer scorn, to do, to bear”
(Or words to that effect), and I Agree. A paragon of chins!
“One to front dangers fearlessly,
   And fight its way until it wins”—

So you, most dear enthusiast,
   Run on with pen that flows and flies,
Out-pouring words of love too fast
   To cross their “t’s” or dot their “i’s”;
So you, exhausting dips of ink
   In diligent succession, race
To fill the sheets with what you think
   Of such a chin on such a face.

I gaze upon it long, and see
   What well may justify your praise:
Strong purpose, iron constancy
   To walk through fire on chosen ways—
To serve the cause appearing right,
   And not be turned away therefrom
By all the woe of hopeless fight,
   And all the pains of martyrdom.

I gaze on yours, so different,
   And mine, so like in difference,
That speak less firmness of intent,
   And more regard for consequence—
Egg-ended, I regret to see,
   And rounded off like skittle-pins;
Alas! alas! why have not we
   Two square Napoleonic chins?

There's some diversity, of course;
   Mine, double, if the glass can speak
The truth, but still devoid of force,
   Since both the knobs of it are weak;
Yours delicately tapered, one
   And indivisible, but that
You must not pride yourself upon—
   It's just because you're not so fat!

Do I regret this, after all?
   Do I repine and judge it wrong
Of Fate to give us chins so small
   That, morally, we can't be strong,
Or quite so strong as others are
   To shun transgression's snares and sins—
Who set their course by one fixed star
   Because of their more righteous chins?

God knows I always wish to do
   The right thing for Right's sake alone;
And know, dear love of mine, that you
   Have just such feeling as my own;
But Eric Mackay sang full well,
   For such a little trimmed squireen
Of song, “That some will smile in Hell
   To think how sweet their sins have been.”

The Power that rules the Universe,
   And swings the worlds, and stirs the hearts,
Has made so easy all the worse,
   So hard the bitter, better parts—
Has thickly-strewn our moral path
   With treacherous banana-skins,
And made us heritors of wrath
   And shapely, though unstable, chins!

I cannot answer “yes” or “no”
   (Being round-chinned, irresolute).
What! to be stone, and quite forego
   All munchings of forbidden fruit?—
To set the teeth and turn away
   From rosy apples close o'erhead—
Never to halt or disobey
   The stern commands of faith and dread?

I doubt, yet do not greatly fear,
   The end of ends; for one thing plain
To me is this: We are not here
   By any act of ours; the pain,
The sin, the wrong, the shame are His
   With all things else He bade to be;
The chins like Clare's, and those like this
   Of yours, just now confronting me.

But standing in the countless ranks
Of those who err, and yet will err,
Like you, I tender earnest thanks
For Sister Clare, and such as her,
Who shame us with the greater love
Than flutters after changing things—
No earthling of a Cupid's dove,
But white and high as angel's wings!

Yet, sweet, when all our days have passed,
If at the Tribunal we stand,
Clare on the right, we with the massed
And trembling hosts on God's left hand,
While she, against our doom abhorred,
Prays, “Father, pardon these their sins,”
I will advance this protest: “Lord,
We never had our choice of chins!”
A Message.

“Chanting their ‘Io Triomphe,’ the dockers marched up the green path to the Reformer's Tree, with the white and violet Union Jack of Australia, flanked by bouquets and flowers on poles, in the van.”

—London Paper.

So behind a flag, our flag, held up by hands that in beseeching
Had been stretched to all the world, you've walked in triumph, ours and yours;
Never will that flag be honoured with a crown of honour reaching
To a glory passing this, while it or any flag endures;
Neither was there homage paid in bygone years to banners fateful
Lifted over fields of death, like this to ours that, borne above
All your shouting tens of thousands, tells of brothers who are grateful
Unto brothers—waves the message that to love you answer love!

“Gold in God's name or we famish!” came a cry from out the distance;
“Gold to strengthen us to stand upright one hour and draw one breath;
Gold to help us where we face them, maddened to a last resistance;
Gold to fight with the damned tyrants, who are driving us to death!”
We that listened knew the voices, changed although they were and hollow
Like the cheeks of them that cried, the toilers fainting in their pain;
Gold we sent them, by God's blessing, and with twenty-fold to follow
Ere the burden they had spurned, their wasted hands should lift again!

What was gold to us to dare withhold a share from trampled kindred?
We that, in a time whose memory burns our faces gave our hoards
As a kingly dole to Murder—by no hint of conscience hindered Hired an angry setting out of sudden fools with naked swords!
We, that dazed and drunk with boasting, sent forth these to slay and ravish
Spite of all the bitter laughter and the voices crying “Shame!”
Is it wonder that our best gave of their store with hand as lavish
At the prayer of those who pleaded in the land from which we came?

Dear our brothers, who too long have borne as brutes, and hoped, and waited,
Not from twenty or an hundred, like that offering accurst,
Came this gift but from Australians one and all, who, consecrated
To your freeing bade you turn and bid your drivers do their worst!
Not because of any glamour or for prize of gratulation
From the rulers and the mighty were we moved, not now as then,
But because the groans and curses rising from our mother nation
Told us men were making devils out of helpless fellow men.

For before your trembling lips had dared that “No!” so resolutely
Here re-echoed by strong friends with swift persuasion in their tones,
Bravely though you bore the torture, striving well and suffering mutely
In a hell where they who earn the bread they ask receive but stones,
This we knew, that you, the sons of mighty soldiers, mighty seamen,
Sons of sires who swept oppression from the shores and from the waves,
You, whose fathers gave their lives to make the world a place of freemen,
Seeing not how you were fettered, vaunting freedom, bent as slaves;

This we knew, that some among you, few and scornful, sitting shameless
Upon coward heights of privilege, o'er all the rest prevailed, Robbing, murdering the others, who, not knowing, held them blameless,
Clothed in purple by wan multitudes who wrung their hands and wailed:
Masters arrogant and sovereign, heirs of acres purchased redly
With a letting out of blood maybe, or meed of harlot's gold
Bidding strength and virtue wither down in kennels dim and deadly
Where all thought of Christ is barred, and shame has prey of young and old!

Oh! we knew that in your England, standing sceptered there and stately,
By the grace of iron manhood in a past that spoke for right,
Things that fiends might shudder looking on have grown so common lately
That untroubled earls have hardly shrugged their shoulders at the sight—
Weary age, its white hair dyed to make a poor disguise of vigour,
In the hope of finding masters, standing in the desperate crowd;
Girlhood pale and cowering graveward, with a face set from the rigour
Of a youth that had no smiles nor time to stop and sob aloud!

Wealth and splendour waxing fourfold; ease and luxury and pleasure,
Wide domains and waving oaks for those whose lordship holds the earth:
For the others, want, and filth, and degradation beyond measure,
Sire and child and stranger huddled in one den of death and birth!
This we knew, and that the tyrants against whom you so have striven
In the battle just victorious, were not, as you deemed, your worst;
They who drove you without mercy, without mercy, too, were driven
By a power enthroned beyond them, cold, all mighty, all accurst!

You but saw who stood the nearest. Oh, our brothers, shed your blindness;
Look beyond the whip that scourges, and beyond the hand that drives!
There are masters of your masters, at whose nod all loving kindness
Dies from hearts of men condemned to fight each other for their lives.
Lift your eyes and look in theirs who stand to bar you from God's bounties,
You and others that you strive with in the bitterness of need,
Ask them which among their ancestors made one of England's counties—
Bid them show the Maker's signature or burn the title-deed!

It was little that you asked. What gain? To us, above all dowers
Time may bring of manliest honour until all Time's course has run
This will stand, that you beneath Australia's flag, decked out with flowers,
Marched to hail the first clear triumph of your right beneath it won!
What to you? A gain of brothers, strong to stand for every issue
Side by side with you, believing as in Heaven that is above,
In the grander victory coming. So we lean across and kiss you
For to-day and all to-morrows, answering back your love with love!
Widderin.

(VIDE “Geoffrey Hamlyn.”)

IN an eastern verandah that looks on grey plains rolling out to the rim
Of the sea, the fair lands of Baroona, with wavering smoke-films made dim,
Near at hand a dry creek-bed's white glare sharply piercing the folds of the haze,
In the drowse of a fire-smitten noon, three old men dreaming over old days—

In a garden whose grape clusters swing purple skins of warm wine from the bars
Of a leaf-hidden trellis, whereunder large blurs of fierce light glow like stars
That have fallen and splashed the dark path, moves a woman, white-haired in the grace
Of the evening of life, with the beautiful sign of its peace in her face—

In a paddock close by an old horse, grazing sleepily, nearing his rest,
Yet with flashes of spirit to gallop and kick up his heels with the best;
One old horse, honoured, tended, and petted, and held beyond price. Let me tell
Once again of the Arcturus colt what another told long ago well:

Just a leaf from the large-hearted tale of magnificent years that are done
Warm with manhood and splendid with hope, and fulfilled of the trees and the sun;
Just a shadow of terror and crime, black as ever was written or told,
Thrown across the broad light of true friendships and loves that were purer than gold!

* * * * * *

Doctor Mulhaus was at it again with the Major: “Your poets,” he stormed,
“Have their merits, but where lives the singer to-day as divinely informed
With the magic of sound as old Milton? Don't tell me”—the rest of it died
On his lips, for an ashen-faced man and a black boy who clung at his side

In the doorway were standing! Before the pale trooper found words, in his eyes
They could read that disaster had come. Hardly waiting to hear the replies Stammered forth to the questions they asked without speech, Doctor Mulhaus slipped past
And was gone, unobserved, while the others sat nerveless, and blanched, and aghast!

Swift and silent that morning a dozen of horsemen had suddenly burst
Upon Mayford's, the bushranger Touan's fell convict pack, bloody, accurst:
Cecil Mayford was murdered; none knew where his mother and Ellen had fled:
By the hut-keeper's side on the floor the dread cannibal Moody lay dead!

After riot of wolves in the house, brandy-maddened, pent there in the reek
Of the smoke and the blood of their deed, they had ridden away down the creek—
Down toward Brentwood's! It seemed to Sam Buckley his heart had been frozen to stone
For an instant, then touched with red fire! Alice Brentwood was there, and alone!
Then there came to his mind a quick thought. By the way Touan's red-handed men
Had set out it was twenty miles clear, straight across through the plain barely ten:
For a man and a horse was it hopeless to save her? At least they would try
To the very last heart-beat of each—they would do it together or die!

To the stable he ran, as a stag in his strength runs for life, to the stall
Where the thoroughbred bay he was proud of stood waiting, the pick of them all,
With the tremulous hands of a haste that defeated the purpose of haste
For a moment, he flung on the saddle, then flung himself in it, and raced

Past Baroona and out to the downs through the sweep of a hurricane wind
That seemed cutting his face as he rode, though the dust-wrack hung heavy behind
On the dead Summer air for a mile. Oh, good Widderin, all may be well!
You, the colt from the Shoalhaven gullies, have blood in your veins that will tell!

For the sake of your hundred years' lineage, do all that you can do to-day—
For the fame of a long line of ancestors, able to go and to stay!
Think of how your own sire won the Derby, and think, too, of this, that you run
For a prize beyond value, surpassing all Cups that all horses have won!

For her sake who has kissed your arched neck, lay your ears back and stretch yourself flat
On the grass—by God's grace and your pluck you and Sam may preserve her from that;
Tear along, heaving deep-chested sighs; all that stands in the way you must leap
Or go through; never heed if you maim a few startled and scattering sheep!

Pass the Doctor, already far out on his way—steady mind and brave heart,
He had seen where the danger lay first, and was off with a five minutes' start—
Pass the Organ-hill columns and cliffs, lifting up their stern pile from the plains;
Rush away through the scrub and the rocks, as the blood rushes now through your veins!

Round the bend to the river-flat! Making the shingle spurned up from your hoofs
Like a wild burst of thundercloud hail that smites windows and roars upon roofs!
Far on high right and left fling the spray of your terrible dash through the ford—
Not a mouthful, dear horse, though thirst racks you: No second of pause, lest the sword

Of the Horror should fall in that second! Away up the opposite slope—
At the crest of the bank he who sits on your back will know whether his hope
Shall bear goodliest fruit or die, instantly blasted, he dying with it;
Up the steep then! up! up! Does she live in the light? Has she passed to the “Pit?”
From the ridge Sam could see her, white-robed as her purity, feeding the birds
At the front of the house, and a cry of wild joy too impatient for words
From his breast seemed to break of itself. She was there—all the rest he would do;
Racing nearer, he shouted and beckoned. She heard him, then saw him—and knew!

Not an instant to waste, that was clear! Without even an impulse of doubt
Or a tremor of fear, she had fled through the hall, as she passed calling out
To Helena, the wrinkled old cook, well experienced in bushranging ways,
A loud warning to make for the bush—which she did at a notable pace.

Then her foot on his boot in the stirrup, her hand in his hand, and away
In his arms, to be held there for ever! There's foam on your flanks, gallant bay!
You are gasping and ready to drop, but on still! Let your great heart not burst!—
You shall rest all your years for this hour, but on yet and make sure of her first!

How they hid on the high rocky brow overlooking the river and plain,
Peering out in the distance for sign of the infamous horde, but in vain,
Till there rose up behind them a clamour of horrible voices, so near
That they thought themselves lost; how for shuddering moments that each seemed a

Sam held Widderin's head smothered close in his coat, lest an innocent neigh
Should betray them to guilt in its hunger; how after the Fear passed away,
While a devil's delirium of wreckage and ruin went on at its height
In the homestead below them, the Doctor, just then only come into sight

Down the bank to the left, would have gone to his death, thinking Alice there still;
How, at all risks, Sam coo-ed and pulled him up sharp, you may read if you will;
How Jim Brentwood limped there, broken-ribbed from his fall in the crabhole, and how
All the rest of them gathered that night to fulfil an inveterate vow:

And the end—how the bushrangers, standing at bay in the heel of the glen Where the rock walls rose sheer at their backs, fought that wild fight with Desborough's men;
How the father and son met at last face to face, driven on by the Fates,
And the hellish unspeakable thing that was done at the foot of the Gates!

You may learn if you like, and you should like, how Sam and his Alice were wed;
And of flowers and crowns that were theirs in the generous days that are dead—
I have told how they passed through the flame of an hour and made plain to you why
One old horse shall be honoured and tended, and petted until he may die;

Just a leaf from the large-hearted tale of magnificent years that are done,
Warm with manhood and splendid with hope, and fulfilled of the trees and the sun—
Just a shadow of horror and crime, black as ever was written or told, Thrown across the broad light of true friendships and loves that were purer than gold!
A Ballad of Red Heart Rum.

RED HEART; in fiery days gone over
   So dear to mine, a song to thee!
I that was faithful and thy lover
   Have cast thee off and chosen tea—
I that long worshipped thee, not wisely
   But far too well, have signed the pledge,
And now drink acids, coloured nicely
   Like thee, that set my teeth on edge!

I was thy servant; my defection
   Was great, for I was even as ten,
(By this I do not make reflection Upon thy present serving-men),
But what is one among so many;
   Around thee, countless as the sands,
Throng yet the swarms, with eyes uncanny,
   And stammering lips and shaking hands!

Thine still is empire: thou art royal
   Beyond most Kings, O King of Pain!
Ten thousand thousands, who are loyal
   To nothing else, uphold thy reign.
Thou still hast sorcery to win them
   From wife and children, son and sire,
To scorch all germs of good within them
   And lead their feet through fire to fire!

I have forsworn thee, and already
   For me a dull mazed mind grows sharp,
The touch is true, the hand is steady,
   With which to-day I wake the harp:
But, as of old, in all the regions
   Where thou art known thou holdest sway:
The shuddering, blind, dishevelled legions
   Are crouching at thy feet to-day.

The drover, far in wildernesses,
   Spies where thy barken temple is,
And, yielding to his love's excesses,
   Consumes himself and thee in bliss,
Then reels away with one last bottle,
   Delirious, ragged, happy, brave—
The rest thou knowest, Red Heart! The wattle
   Is said to bloom above his grave.
The carved bone scarf ring to the shearer
   Is dear, and the tan catskin vest,
But thou, Red Heart, to him art dearer
   A thousand fold than all the rest;
He parts with them to fill a billy
   With thee, regardless of expense,
Then rambles off, hilarious, silly,
   And slumbers by the dog-leg fence.

The navvy delving in a tunnel,
   Counts every day till pay-day comes
When he can make his mouth a funnel
   For many burning Red Heart rums;
He strikes the drill and hates the ganger
   Sustained by thought of the delights
Of sprees to come 'mid noise and anger,
   Dazed friendships and ferocious fights.

The sailor, out upon the briny,
   Who cries “Yo ho!” and furls the sheet
Ingenuous, gallant, British, shiny
   With tar, and having flat bare feet,
Devours salt junk and swallows weevils
   To make his way from port to port,
Then joins the host, half men, half devils,
   Who throng thy Lower George Street Court.

Red fishermen! in many waters
   Thy nets are cast, and all that come
Are fish to thee; the tawdry daughters
   That nibble baits hung near the slum,
The bitter mothers at the mangle
   Far in the night, with arms that ache;
For these thou knowest how to angle—
   These thou cans't trifle with and take.

Thou hast divined that human nature
   Is much the same in every grade;
Even in our halls of legislature
   Thy cunning snares, O Rum, are laid,
And there, as elsewhere, they have answered
   Thy purpose; many and many a thing
Unprinted on the leaves of Hansard
   Proclaims thee every inch a King!

My King no more! My love was fervent
   And long-enduring. I have said
I was thy most obedient servant,
   My heart was thine, my next-day head
My own. The bargain wasn't equal,
    It seemed when I began to think
About it coolly; and the sequel
    Is that I've given up the Drink.

No more for me the seasons reckless
    Of joy when thou did'st o'er me reign;
No more for thee I'll stumble chequeless
    Across the glimmering Old Man Plain!
Red Heart, Red Hand! no more for ever
    In thy blood-hues my soul I'll wash,
But, being thirsty, will endeavour
    To meet the case with lemon squash!
My Sundowner.

JUST as the bell at the men’s hut had tinkled
   For tea he came—well, sundowners must eat!
A back-block face he had, a visage wrinkled
   With lines of villainy and small deceit,
A stock of hair upon his head, just sprinkled
   With iron-grey; upon his ample feet
Were weighty bluchers, each with common string tied—Bluchers that long ago had passed their spring tide.

“Good evenin', boss! Got any work to do?” he Inquired, as on the dusty earth he flung
His swag, the orthodox horse-collar “bluey,” “I've tramped these fifteen days; I've been among The squatters, damn 'em! Old Black Sugar Toohey
   The”—here the wanderer's up-country tongue
Tripped off expressions which may not be quoted
In pages that make claim to be devoted

To blameless literature, but on stations
   Are much affected—“offered me a job
At ringbarking—ten bob a week and rations—
   I wouldn't take it under fifteen bob;
I've followed some (blank) rummy occupations
   With some queer bosses, but a one-horse swab
Like that I never work for when I know him;
A pretty thing to offer a man—blow him!”

His indignation all at once subsided
   When I (full super) in plain language said,
“To offer even ten; I rather prided Myself on knowing men. To yonder shed,”
I added, “Your time-honoured bluey take down
And make yourself before it's dark a shakedown;

“Thence to the hut repair—you'll get some damper,
   And mutton, and plum duff. To-morrow's sun
Must find you further on. I will not hamper
   Your movements by insisting that this run
Shall quite monopolise you! Now then, scamper
   And fix your doss, and when you've got it done
And had your tea and duff—the latter rich with Rare spices—you'll find lots of chaps to pitch with About your wrongs.” An hour or so thereafter,
Being close beside the dimly lighted hut
(Lit by a slush lamp from a smoky rafter Hung by a wire), through the old door half shut
I heard excessive bursts of mighty laughter
And cries of “Go it, stranger! that's a cut
Above you Billy! you're a (bad word) duffer
Beside this cove at pitchin' of a cuffer!”

I stood to listen, and, 'mid noisy plaudits
I heard my sundowner asseverate
With earnest voice, “No, boys, so help me God! it's
The solemn truth—the man was my own mate;
The thing is rather odd, but though it's odd, it's Not half so strange as what I'll now relate—
This yarn, you'll find, will knock the other silly;
I'm thirsty, though; just shove along the billy!

“Tea's poor swill, anyway, compared to swankey,
But still one must lap something! What d'ye think?
Your Super—who looks like a sheep-dipped Yankee”—
(He little thought I watched him through a chink Between the slabs)—“he says to me, ‘Why, blank ye,
My man’—you know his style—‘I fear that drink
Has been your trouble, or else how the devil
Could you—a man like you—have reached the level

‘Of seeking manual toil, while I, much younger,
As you'll observe, have been made Super here?—
Go, fellow, to the hut; appease your hunger;
Assuage your thirst!’ ” At this, from ear to ear,
The shearers grinned, and Sam, the Billabonger,
Whose noted points were ribaldry and beer,
Exclaimed, when after a protracted laugh he Could speak, “The Super, to an ephigraphy!”

“Well! twenty years ago I was with Dawson
Of Murragumbalalong, away out West;
You've heard of him? No! Strange! He made me boss on
The station. ‘Edward,’ says he, ‘all the rest
Are sodden fools! This place has been a cross on My back for years, and I'll give bosson best;
I'll make you manager and go you whacks on
The profits.’ Ah, he was a white-skinned Saxon!

“Of course I closed with him and fixed in writin'
The terms. It wasn't such a big chuck in
As you might think; the look of things would frighten
An ordinary cove; the stock was thin,
The paddocks hardly had a bloomin' bite in,
   And on the run you could have seen a pin
A dozen yards away. They prayed for rain for Three months, but that you never get by prayin' for “Out West—I couldn't tell you what's the reason,

   But from the first they never seemed to care
For Murragumbalong in Heaven. The season
   Was terrible; the land was brown and bare,
Without a blade of grass, and lots of trees on
   The ranges died. The water everywhere
Was turned to puddle and our sheep got stuck in The dams by scores. Well, boys! once more, here's luck! in “Black tea! If your imported Super's peeper

   Could spot me now, he'd say (his high-flown mag!)
‘As I surmised, this wretched man drinks deeper
   Than wisdom prompts, so has to bear a swag.'
He shouldn't be about without a keeper
   That swell! just chuck across the sugar bag!
You don't call this tea sweet enough, boys, do ye?
They're meaner here than old Black Sugar Toohey!

“Well! things were bad enough out West that summer,
   And ruin seemed to stare us in the face;
From day to day each squatter's mug grew glummer;
   Even I began to think it was a case
When a rum thing (I never knew a rummer)
   Turned up to save us. I had gone to chase
Some brumbies off the run with Wall-Eyed Abel,
   A rouseabout who hung around the stable;

“A mooney sort of chap, who used to study
   Theology and all such stuff as that;
Could tell you of some Indian cove call Buddy
   Who squatted cross-legged on a bit o' mat
And saved his people, but at bustin' wood he Was a poor rouseabout. We crossed the flat
Behind the homestead and struck out. 'Twas fully Seven miles ahead of us to Simpson's Gully

“Where we'd to go. It was a fierce day well in December, and the horses soon were blown;
The perspiration from their tired flanks fell in
   A perfect stream. My colt was but half-grown,
So I proposed that we should take a spell in
   The shade of a big tree that stood alone
Upon a strip of plain, and helter-skelter
We both crammed on the pace to reach its shelter.
“I got there first. My horse seemed rather shy of the tree and snorted and played up a bit!
But Abel! boys, even now I'm like to die of the buster he got when I think of it!
He didn't fall, he simply seemed to fly off the horse's back; you could have heard him hit the ground a mile off, while his nag skedaddled like blazes, bridled as it was and saddled.

“With spurs and curses and a good few lashes
I quieted my moke—I always could do that. Poor Abel rose again; from gashes about his head there trickled rills of blood, and all at once his face grew white as ashes—with pointed hand and shaking knees he stood; and then I knew what ailed the nags. Beside him a man hung by a piece of cord which tied him

“To a low branch! 'By ghost! a suicide, as I breathe!' I cried to Abel. 'Look, old man, his swag lies over there! his hands are tied as a safeguard against struggling! what's our plan?
I think I'll scoot towards the town and ride as my neck depended on it: Jim M'Cann, the trooper's there—I'll fetch him. As you're shaken a bit you'd best stop here. I'm much mistaken

“'If I'm not back within three hours. I'll fetch you another horse. However did you fall like that? it served you right, you stupid wretch! you will be more careful after this, that's all:
now, disraeli (my colt), I bet I'll stretch you across the plain.' i just drew rein to call at armstrong's with the news, then rode like thunder into the little one-horse township. under “the pub verandah, tossing bull-necked cooper, the publican, for drinks, I found the trap—a stuck-up half-grown kid, who thought a trooper was God Almighty almost, and his cap a crown of glory—something like your Super,

a 'haw-haw-my-good-fellow' sort of chap, though if you reckoned the slop fairly up he was hardly such a milk-and-water puppy

“as your damned lunatic! I didn't stay there too long—got horses, told the story straight, then started off to show M'Cann the way there,
and reached the tree as it was getting late.
And what d'ye think? You think that Abel lay there
    Just as I left him? No; as sure as fate—
As sure as I'm the son of my own mother,
He hung there stiff and stark beside the other!

“Yes! there they hung, the two of them together,
    And almost touching! Jim M'Cann turned pale,
And me—if you had hit me with a feather
    Just then, it would have floored me like a flail;
But I rode up and cut poor Abel's tether
    And let him drop. I tried without avail
To bring him round. Then Jim and I kept staring
At one another. Jim was reckoned daring

“Round Murragumbalong; to perfect strangers
    He liked to skite; you should have heard him blow
About the way he'd hunted down bushrangers,
    And collared private stills, and high and low
Played up old Nick; of his escapes and dangers
    And all the bullet marks that he could show,
Then seen him running in two drunken shearers
To prove himself a hero to his hearers;

“But he was scared just then if ever man was
    And in the saddle (for he still sat there)
I saw him shake. His face was ghastlier than was
    The corpses which yet dangled in the air;
That face of his told straight that Jim M'Cann was
    A coward out and out. ‘A strange affair,’
I said at last, ‘one would have been enough for
One day, without this half-demented duffer

“Improving the occasion! What's your notion
    Of who's to be the next? What's to be done
With this lot, anyhow? Propose a motion,
    I'll second it; you see, old man, the sun
Is down. Was ever upon earth or ocean
    A game like this? Now that it has begun,
Where will it end? Rouse up, mate, do, and tell us
What's best; will I ride down for Johnson's fellows?’

“No! no! I'll go!’ was his wild exclamation, ‘I'll not stop here—the living I can face,
But not the dead! How far's it to the station?
    Let me away from this infernal place!’
‘You'd never get to it in the creation
    Of cats! Besides, just look at the disgrace
If people get to know you were afraid of Two corpses! Stop and show them what you're made of,’
“I answered. ‘You could never find out Johnson's
From here; you'd beat about the bush all night;
What ails you? You must have a guilty conscience;
God knows my own's not anything too white,
And yet I'd stay. Drop this old woman's nonsense,
And tie your horse up here—he'll be all right—
Then build a thundering fire, that I can see it
Far off—I'll soon be back, I'll guarantee it.’

“So I rode off. M'Cann still sat there shaking
And staring at the tree; the last I saw
Of him alive was that. My jaws are aching
With all this talk; I'm not much good at jaw;
Who's got tobacco?—thanks! I'll shove this cake in My pocket, so that I can have a draw
To-morrow on the tramp; I must be stirring
From here, or who knows what might be occurring?

“Your Super might endeavour to detain me
(As he would put it) as a sort of sub;
And you can understand how it would pain me
To have to boss you! So I'll pack some grub
To night—don't speak, boys, nothing can restrain me—
I'm quite resolved! This place will have to rub
Along without me. Though the Super may break
His heart about it, I am off at daybreak.

“Well, as I rode the night came on as black as
The ace of spades, and even I got lost,
Although I thought I knew as well the track as
The Ten Commandments. Several times I crossed
M'Nalley's Creek, and blundered like a jackass;
But still I said, ‘Whatever is the cost,
I'll find the place if it is under Heaven!’—
And so I did, but not till past eleven.

“I roused them up and told my yarn, but no one
Would come that night. ‘What good is it,’ they said,
‘To turn out now and saddle up, and go on
A hunt like this? If both of them are dead
We can't well bring them back to life’—and so on;
So I had a cold feed and went to bed,
And early in the morning off we started—
Three of us, mounted well and cheerful-hearted

“As crickets. By and by we came in sight of The tree; and there was Jim M'Cann's horse tied To a small sapling. In the growing light of
The sun, just risen, all at once we spied
Two dead men hanging! Well, I fainted right off
When my two mates at the same moment cried,
'The trooper's done it!' As they had no brandy
Or any stimmylant whatever handy,

"I soon came round again. There hung the second
Of the two victims the accursed tree
Before my very eyes, it seemed, had beckoned
Over the brink into eternity;
So, without thinking the thing out, I reckoned
It time to go. 'No more of this for me!
Let us away!' I yelled, 'this very minute
From here; I dread this Tree, the devil's in it!'

"I jumped upon my horse and jammed my hat down
Across my eyes and galloped like the wind
Until I got away upon the flat down
Below the tree, then stopped to look behind—
And this was what I saw: Old Johnson sat down Upon a log, and (this is Gospel, mind,
As sure as that I build my firmest hope on
The Book) was fastening a halter rope on "His neck! His man had just commenced to climb up

The stem! And then I felt almighty queer
And thought, 'I'll just see Johnson off, then I'm up;
Am I less game than one of them? No fear!
Though I'd go through it pluckier could I prime up
With rum, or even a good fill of beer—
I must get out my bit of cord and twist it;
The Tree is drawing me, I can't resist it!'

"I turned my horse's head and came back slowly
Across the plain. I saw old Johnson kneel
And pray a bit, (he hadn't been too holy
Before—I knew the beggar used to steal
Our lambs), then start to climb. Half up the boll he Saw me and called, 'Ye tried to cheat the Deil;
Ye canna do 't— I tell ye, lad, ye canna—
I'm thinkin' ye'll no sup the nicht on manna!

"'I've been a sinner and I've stown the young of
Your yowies, but I've cleansed my saul wi' prayer;
I'll reach the haven that yon Psalmist sung of—Farewell! I'll no meet ony Papists there!'
Just then the other fellow gently swung off
And kicked his legs a moment in the air,
Then hung quite lifeless, with the end of rope in His hand clutched tightly, and his mouth half open!
“Old Johnson looked, and seemed much interested;
    Then firmly fixed his rope upon the limb,
And prayed another spell, and then divested
    Himself of his old coat. To look at him
Just then for all the funk he manifested
    You'd think he was preparing for a swim;
Then in he went—no off he went, like winking
While I stood plaiting up my cord, and thinking

“How strange the whole thing was! I'd somewhere read of A tree that poisoned all who came within Its shade, but not a word at all was said of
    A tree that made you hang yourself. 'Ned Flynn,'
I thought, 'the dance that the strange swagman led off
    You've got to join in, so you'd best begin;
Your partner's waiting—you'll just make the set up
Of three dead couples, so look sharp and get up.'

“Well, up I shinned and off I lurched! The cord broke,
    And down I came on top of Abel slap!
'I said I'd do it, and when was my word broke?'
    I thought. I went again. The cord went snap
Again! I went again, but no—the third broke—
    And then I sat and thought like this: 'Old chap,
It's not to be; whatever Fate may bring you,
One thing is sure—no rope will ever swing you!'

“And then I turned my back upon the dead ones—
    Four swinging in a row, one on the ground—
The notion never came into my head once
    To try again. Whatever spell had bound
Me to the tree was broke; and so I fled once
    Again, and never stopped to look around,
Nor for my horse had much consideration
Until he brought me to our own home station.

“I'd lost my hat—a seventeen-bob soft beaver—
    In galloping, and, as the sun was hot,
I felt the rays of it as if a cleaver
    Had split my head; and by the time I got
The saddle off I had a raging fever
    Upon me. Then they had a doctor brought,
Who told them that, but for his pills and doses,
In one day more I'd be as dead as Moses.

“Three weeks I lay before they were quite sure I
    Would live, but I came round all right by then,
And all was told to me. They'd had a jury
    And held an inquest on the five dead men.
(Now, Slushy, I can see you winking your eye;
I tell the truth.) Out of twelve, but ten Lived through it (must I say to you once more, man,
I never told a falsehood yet’). The foreman,

“It seems, had, while the rest deliberated,
Hid in his shirt a clothes-line, so's to be Quite ready, and then jawed away and waited,
And when his chance came slithered up the tree
And went! Another cried, ‘He's emigrated!—
I'll cut him down; just leave the thing to me!’
And up he went to do so, but instead of Attempting it, swung too, and jerked his head off!

“The coroner that same night suicided
Upon the Tree, and on the following day
Four of the jurymen came back and tried it,
But one of them came down the very way
(Only he came down wrong end first) that I did
And broke his neck. It went on like a play
For days, until the jury were all laid out;
And even then the Tree did not seem played out!

“Odd stragglers now and then had patronised it
And worked themselves off, bowing to their fate;
And all these deaths so much had advertised it
That in the end there came a magistrate
To see it—and he swung! Then they advised it Should be cut down. But all at once a great Idea struck my mind, and I commenced in
The morning with two men to have it fenced in.

“I had to shepherd them, though. Bill, from Wagga,
Who dug the post-holes, once chucked down the bar
And started, but—at that time I could slog a Real perisher—before he had got far
I stretched him. And that day I brought a dog, a Great wolf of mine—I'd christened him ‘Three Star,’
Because he'd killed a man (when quite a pup, too)—
And got a good long chain and chained him up to

“The Tree, and by knock-off time we'd completed
The fence, and built a humpy close beside
The gate for me, where, on a gin-case seated
Beside the fire, I watched till I could bide
No longer, then turned in. Well—I was cheated,
For, while I was asleep, ‘Three Star’ untied
His chain, climbed up the Tree, and there he hung out
On a dry branch, quite brazen, with his tongue out!
“And very close to him there hung as coolly
    A perfect stranger, comfortably dead!
‘Well I am damned!’ I cried. Now, as a rule, I Don’t use strong talk, but I was off my head
With rage, and said, ‘Now, what a blasted fool I
    Have been! While I was snoring in my bed
This swine got at me with the utmost cleanliness;
Who ever heard of such infernal meanness?’

“That dog, though, turned up trumps. Flash Dick, the Ringer
    From Wilson’s shed, where they had just cut out,
Came down to look at it. I saw him linger,
    Then go away, come back, and dodge about,
Then draw his diamond ring from off his finger
    And bring it over. ‘This is good to spout
For fifteen quid,’ he said. I answered ‘Is it?
I’m sorry you can pay me but one visit!’

“And then the shearers came in any number
    To see him hang, and I stood at the gate
And said, ‘Ten quid!’ as cool as a cucumber.
    They planked ’em down like men, and twenty-eight
Swung before dark. I had no chance of slumber
    That night—coves came along and wouldn’t wait
Till morning—in the dark I sent a score off
And before breakfast launched eleven more off!

“All day I had a better class of custom—
    Selectors and the like—and, coming on
To noon, one cockie wanted me to trust him,
    Though him and me had been at daggers drawn;
I wouldn’t, and it seemed to so disgust him
    That off he went and hanged himself upon
Another tree—just walked with a grim smile off
And patronised a gum about a mile off.

“I saw at once that it might burst my bubble
    If this got known; that it might take away
Good business from my Tree, and cause me trouble;
But no one twigged him. I took coin all day
And, after dusk (though he was nearly double
    My weight) I dropped him, and from where he lay,
Dragged him across, and had the satisfaction
Of hanging him again! Well, the attraction

“Of the infernal Tree did not diminish
    At all; the public came from far and near;
Some days, perhaps, the gathering was thinnish
    (As times were hard, some thought ten quid too dear),
But there were others when I couldn't finish
   My work. Upon an average I could clear
Five hundred sovereigns a day, or slightly
Above it, and I banked my stuff fortnightly.

“My game was watched, you may depend. Two fellows
   One night when sleepiness had grown too strong
For me, stole in and grabbed some bags of yellows
   And scooted off; but they did not stay long;
They might have hanged themselves at first as well as
   When they had done a fellow-creature wrong.
That gold—you know how wrong it is to pilfer—
Brought them to death, as did Iscariot's silver!

“There drooped the two of them at dawn, well weighted
   With my hard earnings! So, for many a week
I raked the bullion in. I estimated
   That I had netted by this single streak
Of business, thirty thousand quid, or stated
   More accurately—mostly when I speak
I like to be exact, it is a gift I
Had always—thirty thousand and odd fifty!

“When without any warning fortune played me
   A dirty trick, although it must be said
I was in fault. I found the goose that laid me
   The golden eggs one morning lying dead!
This was the way of it—a party paid me
   An extra figure, fifty quid a head
To be select, to let them go to the top
And hang (thirteen there were) right at the tree-top.

“Well, I consented. They were stylish jokers,
   Rich squatters and bank clerks, and all like that,
And two or three had dress suits and white chokers,
   And there they dangled gorgeous to look at,
Rigged out like lords and dukes, and stiff as pokers
   Right up aloft. For quite an hour I sat
At sunset in admiring contemplation
My Tree just then aroused my admiration

“It fairly drooped with men, the corpses swaying
   In the light wind, from scores and scores of strings,
And ropes, and hides; the poorer classes staying
   Down low; the richer up above, like kings.
I felt quite proud, but, boys, you know the saying
   That pride will have a fall. All human things
Must end; but in the morning it took me down
When I looked down and saw my priceless Tree down.
“The last thirteen had done it. Hanging high up
   They made the Tree top-heavy, and a squall
Had blown it over. I could only dry up
   My tears—at first I let a good few fall—
And shut the humpy door for good, and tie up
   The gate, and cart away my little haul
Quite sorrowful, but not at all unthankful—
With notes and cheques I had the local bank full!

“That was a year for us! Deserted stations
   For miles and miles around, and not a man
Left living; storehouses with lots of rations,
   And stone cold fire-places, with pot and pan
Just as the suicides had left them! Lashin's
   Of all that one could want. Our cattle ran
On all the runs, our sheep mixed all the flocks with
And no one came to claim those they might box with.

“In twelve months' time the pair of us had sold out
   For half-a-million; and I went home then
To England! and shed my Colonial gold out
   And got returned to Parliament; but, men,
I gave such sprees, my sugar couldn't hold out
   For ever, and—well, here I am again!
Good night, boys! Slushy, my important buck! ere
I go just fill this bag of mine with tucker.”

Such was my Sundowner. At early dawn he Went lightly off, and George, a shearer, who
Was loud and large, though, all the same, a “Sawney,”
   Found that his watchguard had been cut in two,
And Tom from Wellington, alert and brawny—
   The very kind of man you couldn't “do”—
Found that his Waltham, with gold chain and locket,
Had gone, like George's, into Ned Flynn's pocket.
The Bell of the Ly-Ee-Moon.

“The horror of the scene was heightened by the slow ringing of the ship's bell as the shattered hull went down.”

AH my love! my love! In the garden olden
She said, “For ever, my own, my own!”
And her eyes were true and the world was golden,
And the sunset burned upon roses blown
In a radiant day by an English river,
And she said again, “I believe, I wait;
To your heart mine answers a brave ‘For ever,’
And our love is stronger than years or Fate.”

We were still but children, unscarred and scathless
Of life and trial, ah me! ah me!
For my heart is dead, and my dear is faithless,
And I curse the moan of the envious sea,
And the wet skies weep and the wan waves shiver,
Where I wander, stricken and desolate,
Ah! the false words said by the English river!
Ah! the scornful strength of the blind, mad, Fate!

She had written lately, “The strife is over
And the years have crowned us; a marriage bell
In my ears is sounding—I come, sweet lover,
To the faithful arms that have waited well!”
Waited, still to wait, through a bitter shedding
Of tears, till they reach to her, late or soon—
For the bridegroom Death at my darling’s wedding
Laughed and tolled the bell of the Ly-ee-moon!
Another Address to a Mummy.

“The sale of the zoological collection at Walton included a Peruvian Mummy, which was stated to be 6000 years old, and was a good specimen of the mummy tribe. It was knocked down by the auctioneer for the small sum of one pound seven shillings.”

—LLOYD'S WEEKLY.

ADAM of mummies! Sire of all the race of Drysalted phantoms of the ages old,
That seem to love being kicked about the face of
The earth and dread to lie beneath the mould,
Though you have fallen upon the sad disgrace of Being put up in an auction room and sold
At such a wretched price, a parvenu
Belzoni's mummy was compared to you!

That hollow fraud that Horace Smith has sung in
A strain which may endure while mummies last;
That stolid witness who still held his tongue in
Some dead mysterious language of the past,
Compared with such as you was very young in
The cosmic catalogue. What changes vast
Must have swept o'er the races of the earth
Between your death and that impostor's birth!

He labelled as antique! He put on airs of Superior knowledge! the poor recent sham!
He called an actor in the strange affairs of
The earlier dynasties! Why are you calm
Who had been dead and swathed in many layers of Spiced wrappings—in your days they could embalm!—
Thousands of years before this understudy
Had thought of having a demnition body?

Perhaps you never cherished great ambition
Even when your veins had blood in them aflow,
So let this humbug hold a false position
For all these years. Or were you lying low
For us to put you right—our present mission—
To lift you to Fame's pedestal and show
You, as to all the ages yet to come we Here do, the genuine pre-Incarial Mummy!

Grim dead Peruvian! Pre-historic carcase!
We will not catechise you à la Smith;
Your eye and ear have grown too dull to mark us,
Your tongue too dry to answer questions with;
Your story must remain to us as dark as
That carven on some mystic monolith
Before savants, more clearly than their own,
Could read the writing on Rosetta's stone.

We let you stand unquestioned in your glory
As oldest resident. If you could speak
We would not credit half your wondrous story;
Strange as you are, you would be too unique
If you were truthful. As a man grows hoary
Whatever love he had for facts grows weak—
That's our experience of old hands. They fable
More wildly than a telegraphic cable.

You'd speak of marvels past our power to number;
Of dim dead peoples, who, ere Manco came,
For centuries had lain in Death's cold slumber;
Of human sacrifices given to flame
At mighty shrines whose ruins yet encumber
Lake Titicaca; you'd disclose the name
Of him they worshipped in that temple olden
At Pachacamac, whose great gate was golden;

You'd hint of mysteries whereat our marrow
Would freeze, of awful rites of long ago;
Then tell us how across that passage narrow (Just having skipped three thousand years or so)
In the dread Andes, the dark-browed Pizarro
Led his fierce thieves and gave Peru to Woe;
Then you'd propose to go and have a drink, as You'd lots of things to tell about the Incas;

Then, when adown your pre-Incarial gullet
You'd poured some modern fire-water, your eye
Would brighten, and you'd mention how a bullet
Had grazed your temple in its passage by
At Cuzcos siege; then take another pull at
The flask, and say you'd seen no season dry
As this—although you thought warm weather pleasant—
Since Abel, at whose funeral you were present,

Was slain; then growing just a trifle worse, off
You'd go again with memories of the days
When, at Pompeii, you received a purse of Their current coin and an address of praise
For climbing up Vesuvius, while those curs of Italians trembled, and, before the gaze
Of all, extinguishing the burning mountain
With pails of water from the public fountain!

And then you'd change the scene again and mention
   How at the siege of Babylon you fought
For Cyrus and received a generous pension,
   Also how Cyrus himself said he thought
Your valour won the fight, and bade attention
   Be paid your slightest wish, and rich silks bought
To robe you like a king, that far and near you
Should be proclaimed the Victor of Assyria;

Then back you'd move across a dozen eras,
   And vow your present life had not the charm
It had when, underneath the Cordilleras,
   Six thousand years ago you ran a farm,
And from your mummy eye would start a tear, as
   You bade us feel your shrunken mummy arm,
And said you scarce could lift a pewter now with
The arm that in those days you used to plough with;

Though still you didn't give a modern damn for Belzoni's mummy, and, in boastful tones,
Asserted that the Copts could not embalm for Sour apples, nor dissect, nor polish bones,
Beside the old Peruvians; that this sham for Whom Smith had touted was a man named Jones,
A modern body, and a foul deceiver,
Who in the flesh had been a drunken weaver.

Next, you'd get further mixed, and dwell with relish
   On things that happened when you were a boy;
With bygone blasphemies you would embellish
   Your own experience of the sack of Troy;
Then shock us with disclosures dark and hellish
   Of how the Pagans scrambled to enjoy
The Christian sacrifices—how proud scions
Of Rome would put their money on the lions;

And still you would run on apace and tell us
   How you and Nero—who is much belied,
And was a genial dog, the best of fellows—
   Upon a mountain top sat side by side,
And heard the sound of many a dying yell as
   The smoke of burning Rome rolled far and wide,
Saw Romans roasted as upon a griddle
And played alternate solos on the fiddle;

You'd liquor up again, and, waxing merry,
   Romance of how you'd passed the time since then;
How you were at the siege of Londonderry
   And personally slaughtered fifty men;
How you went with Munro to Pondicherry
   And peppered the poor French; although no pen
Had told your deeds, you'd swear before your Maker
You did a little thing or two at Acre;

You'd ramble on in circles growing wider,
   As though round cobwebs in your ancient brain
You trod the path of some erratic spider
   Who dropped a thread and picked one up again
In the wrong place, you'd dwell on Sodom's pride, or
   The way the Inquisition ruled in Spain;
And, after once more looking on the flask,
Say it was you who wore the Iron Mask;

You'd tell us the real facts concerning Midas,
   Who couldn't turn things into gold a bit,
But in his day was noted far and wide as
   A shady person and a counterfeit;
Then, with strong laughter shaking your dry hide, as Upon you came the memory of it,
That you had written, but not put your name to,
All Shakespeare's friends and Bacon's now lay claim to.

You'd babble of events that happened prior
   To Noah's time; you'd solemnly declare
The Tower of Babel never got much higher Than Nelson's Column in Trafalgar Square;
And then, you peerless pre-Incarial liar,
   Assure us that in person you were there
With quite a party on a neighbouring hill
When Joshua's prayers made the sun stand still.

*   *   *   *   *

We know you like a book, you see, and so we
   Would not interrogate you as to what You've seen and done. We know you, and we know we Have hereby done our duty as we ought 'Twixt man and mummy. But mark this, although we Proclaim you King, let it be never thought
We'd trust you, for if dates are true as stated
You died before the world had been created!
Thadeus O'Kane.

You have left us and passed where the laughter
Of this world sounds not, nor the sighs;
What is writ on the scrolls of hereafter,
To-day is made plain to your eyes—
You have found wings and soared from the regions
That fence mortal destinies in;
You are far away now from the legions
Of sorrow, and rancour, and sin.

You have fled from the heat and the anger
Of Queensland, to dwell in the calm
Of the King's land, where heavenly languor
Folds round you the peace of its balm—
You have gone from where life's thorns were sharpest
To a totally different clime,
Where the seraphim sing, and the harpist
Vamps always in excellent time.

You have seen; are you truly contented?
Are you satisfied, quite, with the change?
Is it up to what's been represented?
Does the restfulness strike you as strange
As you weave into garlands the flowers
That bloom on the Beautiful Plain?
Does your memory go back to the Towers?
Is it well with you, Thady O'Kane?

Does it strike you, when roaming through moly
And asphodel fields and so forth,
That Eternity passes more slowly
Than Time did when you were up North,
In the infinite realms of perfection,
With never a wrong to set right?
Do you, sometimes, in spells of dejection,
Feel rusty for lack of a fight?

You, who battled so fiercely and stoutly
For any cause seeming like Truth;
You, who knelt at her altar devoutly,
And smote against fraud without ruth;
You, whose life than most men's lives was fuller
Of effort to do what seemed best—
Do you feel the least trifle “off colour”
In the regions of absolute rest?
Do you yearn, in your new sphere diviner,
   For the bygone tumultuous joys,
For the roaring old days of the Miner
   And all the acclaim of the boys?
In your ears does there yet ring the howl of Dismay and acclaim that arose
When each issue came out and fell foul of
   All humbugs, your friends and your foes?

You were harsh, but men saw that your Bible
   Was Progress, and you its true priest;
How you plunged into quagmires of libel
   And lashed at the greatest and least!
How in language, unsparing and bitter,
   You made yourself heard, aye, and felt—
You were ever a vigorous hitter,
   But you never hit under the belt!

You have passed. No hand grasped the great Lever
   More firmly; none sought to do more
For his kind. In Life's turbulent fever
   The days of your travail are o'er—
Far too many like you have been taken,
   Far too few to the world yet remain:
In the sleep from which none can awaken,
   May your dreams be good, Thady O'Kane!
In Ballarat.

(FROM “A Bad Sovereign's Story.”)

ONE tale among the many that were written
   With knife points, in the fever-throbbing years,
When from the old cold lands came thousands smitten
   By lust of gold and sunlight—Pioneers
Of every race, with the prevailing Briton
   In front; tales tragic, yet which scarce won tears
From those who briefly saw, while yet attending,
A frenzied round of getting and of spending.

Lake Wendouree lay shining in the summer—
   Or what there was of it in those old days—
When to its edge there drew a weary comer,
   Slow dragging on beneath the fiery rays
Of the white sun—an outcast and a “bummer,”
   Whose later types and their deep devious ways,
The world may know, through humorous quip and antic,
In illustrated papers Transatlantic.

The wayfarer, who had a meagre swag on,
   Slouched forward with peculiar mien and gait,
Which, to discerning eyes, wrote clearly “lag” on His whole identity. “Hullo there, mate!”
He called to one, who, seated by his waggon,
   Cooked dinner in a mood disconsolate,
“I've come from Creswick, where I had no luck or I wouldn't have to beg a bit of tucker.”

The bullocky reached forth and took his pan off
   And turned the steak out on a plate of tin,
Then, straightening up, while perspiration ran off
   His face, said “Right, old man, there's not much in The grub box, but I've never turned a man off
   Without a feed, and don't think I'll begin
Just yet. Sit down then, mate, and take things steady
   And tell how you got lagged, till tucker's ready.”

His words came out unthinkingly and freely
   As words were wont in that red-shirted Past,
When sentiments were not expressed genteely
   And tongues were sure and swift to “damn” and “blast;”
But as he spoke the stranger's eyes grew steely,
   And like a man struck suddenly aghast,
Whose dearest hope some blow has left invalid,
His quivering lips grew all at once quite pallid.

And drawing to the teamster's side and grasping
   His hand, he trembingly essayed to speak;
But no sound came from him, save a low gasping,
   While tears ran down upon each dusty cheek;
Then all at once the other's wrist unclasping
   He reeled and fell. "The devil—here's a streak
Of luck!" exclaimed the puzzled bullock driver,
   "The man must be a madman—or a lifer!

"Poor devil, anyway, whatever he is
   Or what he may have done, I'll do my best
To help him. Ha! upon his leg, I see, is
   The iron-mark! If any of the rest
Know this, I fear his chance right up a tree is.
   He's fainted—there, I'll open his shirt breast.
His shoulder marked—quick! let me see the other—
   My God above! It's Harry—it's my brother!"

The other teamsters, one by one, had yoked up
   Their teams, and gone upon their heavy way,
Unwilling steers with saplings had been poked up,
   And every horse-waggon and bullock dray
Was gone, save one; the place was no more blocked up
   With fifty-guinea loads of native hay,
Or what would to its inmost cockles grieve a
   Good Templar's heart, piled cases of Geneva.

But one all day, unheeded and untended,
   Remained upon the camping ground, for when
The swoon that overcame his brother ended
   The teamster, fearing that the other men
Might ask too closely whom he had befriended
   Had borne him off to an unholy den
Which flourished where is now fair Sturt-street's centre
   Wherein the reader will be asked to enter.

A crowded tent, the air within is reeking
   With vilest utterance of vilest thought;
Mad diggers dancing, loose-haired women shrieking
   Wild words of sin that almost might have brought
A blush of shame the devil's shameless cheek on.
   While in their midst, more pitiful than aught
In all that scene of hideousness and loathing
   A girl stood, dazed and half bereft of clothing,

Upon whose body satyr glances gloated
   And drunken hands drew letters with the lees
Of rum—in Fifty-One the Miners doted
    On all such airy gaieties as these;
The shanty was a den, its keeper noted
    For yielding succour to such refugees
As shrank at sight of a policeman's garb, or Winced at the mention of Macquarie Harbour.

Just then the diggers' life was passed 'mid dangers
    Of sudden shot and unexpected knife;
Full half the men here gathered were bushrangers
    At heart, who lightly valued human life.
The shanty-keeper saw the entering strangers
    And whispering to his missus—not his wife—
He said, “Amelia, twig that cove—the farther—
    Clear out—look sharp! it's Harry from Port Arthur!”

The hostess, who had many stains of blood on Her dress, the traces of a recent fight
'Twixt “Bloody Mary,” who was thought a good 'un,
    And a frail sister known as “Hell's Delight,”
As one entranced for half a moment stood on
    The floor with lips all tremulous and white,
Then whispered back in low hoarse tones of terror,
    “He'll kill me, Billy—make no blooming error!”

And would have fled, but that her limbs were shaking
    With the swift cowardice that chilled her heart,
While Charlie Simpson, through the turmoil making
    His way, took One Eyed Billy, the boss, apart
And said “This fellow has been caught housebreaking
    And lagged, and bolted. Hide him! and be smart.
I'll make it doubly worth your while, old sonny,
    We won't dispute about a little money.”

The convict stood, while all the uproar went on
    About him, and men drank and women swore,
His head held downward and his look intent on
    The ground, till, turning round to seek the door,
His eyes looked straight into the woman's bent on His face—the eyes he looked into of yore
With love unspeakable and faith unbounded,
    Before his life Life's darkest deeps had sounded.

A sudden leap there was, a sudden gleaming
    Of a sharp dagger-blade that flashed on high,
A rush of men, a wild affrighted screaming
    Of women, and a low, short, deadly cry
From lips through which a crimson blood came streaming,
    A woman lying with slow glazing eye,
And voices crying, “Hold him, boys, and bring him
Out to the shed, the murdering dog, we'll swing him!”

Then spoke the convict, in clear tones unfearing,
   “Hold on, mates, for a moment—let me say
Why I have done for her. I ask a hearing,
   No more; my life is in my hand to pay
For hers, and it has hardly been so cheering
   That I need wish a moment of delay:
Just let me speak and tell my story; after
I'm ready for the nearest rope and rafter.

“She's dead enough—it's useless to endeavour
   To help her now—I've spilt her evil blood;
I think the way I struck her heart was clever,
   Although I never, be it understood,
Have murdered until now. No more for ever
   Will she ape modesty and maidenhood—
Oh! that I was so mad as to believe her
When first I met the doubly damned deceiver!

“But that was when her cheek seemed fresh and blooming
   Long years ago upon old England's shore,
When I had faith, and saw in every woman
   A thing to reverence and half adore;
The world was new to me and I was human,
   And no love that has ever been before
Was blinder than the love I poured upon her,
A viper of all baseness and dishonour.

“From Devonshire I came to London saying
   Farewell to my one brother—this is he—
God help me! When we two were children praying
   At bedtime by a darling mother's knee,
Or later through the fields together straying
   Or stealing apples from some guarded tree,
When life to us seemed made for joy and laughter,
How could I dream it had this curst hereafter?

“Amid the gaiety and shine and splendour
   Of Vauxhall, with the music at its height,
When everything was wrought that could engender
   In youthful hearts quick pulses of delight,
Her eyes invited and her voice was tender
   And I was passionate and void of sight,
And yielding to my heart's desire not slowly
I walked into the mesh of bonds unholy.

“She wrung my heart with stories of denial,
Of want and wretchedness and sordid woe,
She plied me with concoctions from a vial
Of black deceit, and made her voice sound low
And touching as it told of bitter trial,
And drooped her eyes and let their waters flow,
While I, believing, freely poured my cash on
The harlot's lap in innocent compassion.

“When all was gone but one last coin, I met her
To say good-bye, and bitterly she wept
And begged me with tear-misted eyes to let her
Have it, the last, to be for ever kept
For my sake; and that I might not forget her,
With gracious art, in which she was adept,
And oft-repeated hopes in accents broken,
Gave me a coin as her own love token.

“I went from her and tried in vain to borrow
Enough to help me from the weary town;
That night I walked the streets and on the morrow
I cried, ‘Alas!’—I was a country clown—
‘Alas, that I am forced to feel the sorrow
Of pawning her dear keepsake, but the frown
Of fortune will not make me less esteem it:
I'll pawn it and not rest till I redeem it.’

“The Jew's eye flashed, I thought, with recognition
Upon the coin, and as I told my tale
He bent on me a look of keen suspicion,
Then strong emotion turned his dark face pale,
And in a tone of masterful derision
He let me known that he was not for sale;
In vain I grew indignant and protested—
Before five minutes passed I was arrested.

“I told the story simply and sincerely
Of how I came to have the disc of brass,
But would not give her name I loved so dearly
Lest harm should come through it to my sweet lass;
When I said this the scornful Judge was nearly Convulsed with mirth, and, fastening his glass
In his left eye, he said ‘For Life,’ and straightway
Behind me closed the awful prison gateway.

“But in the silence of that gloomy prison,
I thought of her—this woman lying dead—
Whose lips I had imprinted Love's hot kiss on
As still an angel, and my soft heart bled
To think that had some other chance arisen
My dear one might have suffered in my stead,
Believing that some wretch the coin bestowing
Had cheated her, poor innocent, unknowing.

“At last it came, the day of my departure—
That dread departure in the convict ship—
‘By-bye, my gallant Devonshire sweetheart, you're Bound outward on a little pleasure trip—
Hope you'll enjoy yourself; a pleasant start you're Just making!’ There she stood with mocking lip,
This dead adultress, hemmed with evil sirens,
As I marched past them clanking in my irons!

“O God! that moment—what a fury flaming
Blazed in my heart, made all at once aware!
No after horror that outpassed the naming,
No maddening agony of damned despair,
No convict torture all Hell's torments shaming
Was like the pang that rent my bosom there,
And left my life to vengeance consecrated
And Hate, supreme o'er all that men have hated!

“How I escaped, or how God brought me hither
It matters nothing. I have kept an oath.
Tie me and take me out, I care not whither—
Death finds Port Arthur men but little loth.”
The diggers, almost to a man, cried “Slither,
You and your brother, or they'll nab you both.
The thing was right: you've properly repaid her,
She's only fit to be the corpse you've made her!”

Too late—for One Eyed Billy, who had bounded Right through the rotten canvas of the tent
When he beheld the knife, had fled and sounded
A cry of “Murder,” yelling as he went,
So that by now the shanty was surrounded
By “bobbies” bent on the accomplishment
Of daring deeds; for, used to diggers' revels,
They thought it but a case of the blue devils.

They found instead a spectacle most gory,
And had (an easy duty) to arrest
Harry, who afterwards was hanged—the story
Is nearly through. Soon Charlie gave life best
And died of grief; but the especial glory
Of this tale is to come. Perhaps you've guessed—
No? Well, the moral of exceeding weight is,
’Tis—One Eyed Billy now a Magistrate is!
Australia to England.

June 22, 1897

WHAT of the years of Englishmen?
   What have they brought of growth and grace
Since mud-built London by its fen
   Became the Briton's breeding-place?
What of the Village, where our blood
   Was brewed by sires, half man, half brute,
In vessels of wild womanhood,
   From blood of Saxon, Celt and Jute?

What are its gifts, this Harvest Home
   Of English tilth and English cost,
Where fell the hamlet won by Rome
   And rose the city that she lost?
O! terrible and grand and strange
   Beyond all phantasy that gleams
When Hope, asleep, sees radiant Change
   Come to her through the halls of dreams!

A heaving sea of life, that beats
   Like England's heart of pride to-day,
And up from roaring miles of streets
   Flings on the roofs its human spray;
And fluttering miles of flags aflow,
   And cannon's voice, and boom of bell,
And seas of fire to-night, as though
   A hundred cities flamed and fell;

While, under many a fair festoon
   And flowering crescent, set ablaze
With all the dyes that English June
   Can lend to deck a day of days,
And past where mart and palace rise,
   And shrine and temple lift their spears,
Below five million misted eyes
   Goes a gray Queen of Sixty Years—

Go lords, and servants of the lords
   Of earth, with homage on their lips,
And kinsmen carrying English swords,
   And offering England battle-ships;
And tribute-payers, on whose hands
   Their English fetters scarce appear;
And gathered round from utmost lands
Ambassadors of Love and Fear!

Dim signs of greeting waved afar,
Far trumpets blown and flags unfurled,
And England's name an Avatar
Of light and sound throughout the world—
Hailed Empress among nations, Queen
Enthroned in solemn majesty,
On splendid proofs of what has been,
And presages of what will be!

For this your sons, foreseeing not
Or heeding not the aftermath,
Because their strenuous hearts were hot
Went first on many a cruel path,
And, trusting first and last to blows,
Fed death with such as would gainsay
Their instant passing, or oppose
With talk of Right strength's right of way!

For this their names are on the stone
Of mountain spires, and carven trees
That stand in flickering wastes unknown
Wait with their dying messages;
When fire blasts dance with desert drifts
The English bones show white below,
And, not so white, when summer lifts
The counterpane of Yukon's snow.

Condemned by blood to reach for grapes
That hang in sight, however high,
Beyond the smoke of Asian capes,
The nameless, dauntless, dead ones lie;
And where Sierran morning shines
On summits rolling out like waves,
By many a brow of royal pines
The noisiest find quiet graves.

By lust of flesh and lust of gold,
And depth of loins and hairy breadth
Of breast, and hands to take and hold,
And boastful scorn of pain and death,
And something more of manliness
Than tamer men, and growing shame
Of shameful things, and something less
Of final faith in sword and flame—

By many a battle fought for wrong,
And many a battle fought for right,
So have you grown august and strong,
    Magnificent in all men's sight—
A voice for which the kings have ears,
    A face the craftiest statesmen scan;
A mind to mould the after years,
    And mint the destinies of man!
Red sins were yours: the avid greed
    Of pirate fathers, smocked as Grace,
Sent Judas missioners to read
    Christ's Word to many a feeble race—
False priests of Truth who made their tryst
    At Mammon's shrine, and reft or slew—
Some hands you taught to pray to Christ
    Have prayed His curse to rest on you!
Your way has been to pluck the blade
    Too readily, and train the guns.
We here, apart and unafraid
    Of envious foes, are but your sons:
We stretched a heedless hand to smutch
    Our spotless flag with Murder's blight—
For one less sacrilegious touch
    God's vengeance blasted Uzza white!
You vaunted most of forts and fleets,
    And courage proved in battle-feasts,
The courage of the beast that eats
    His torn and quivering fellow-beasts;
Your pride of deadliest armament—
    What is it but the self-same dint
Of joy with which the Cavemen bent
    To shape a bloodier axe of flint?
But praise to you, and more than praise
    And thankfulness, for some things done;
And blessedness, and length of days
    As long as earth shall last, or sun!
You first among the peoples spoke
    Sharp words and angry questionings
Which burst the bonds and shed the yoke
    That made your men the slaves of Kings!
You set and showed the whole world's school
    The lesson it will surely read,
That each one ruled has right to rule—
    The alphabet of Freedom's creed
Which slowly wins it proselytes
    And makes uneasier many a throne;
You taught them all to prate of Rights
In language growing like your own!

And now your holiest and best
And wisest dream of such a tie
As, holding hearts from East to West,
   Shall strengthen while the years go by;
And of a time when every man
   For every fellow-man will do
His kindliest, working by the plan
   God set him. May the dream come true!

And greater dreams! O Englishmen,
   Be sure the safest time of all
For even the mightiest State is when
   Not even the least desires its fall!
Make England stand supreme for aye,
   Because supreme for peace and good,
 Warned well by wrecks of yesterday
   That strongest feet may slip in blood!
To———.

Some songs of this dark, silent land of ours—
   Some rude poor strains and all unmeet to bring
To you whose ear has heard the sky-lark sing;
In splendid dawns above the English flowers,
   And him, your minstrel, the gray bard who towers
With crowned head over us, our English King;
   Yet, if my hand awakes the golden string
But faintlier, lacking his diviner powers,
   Be sure that for the worthless gift I bear
I blush, and cry, “Would worthier gift were mine
   To lay before the feet of one so fair
As perfect rose before a stainless shrine,”
   And trust my voice to swell this whole land's prayer
That God will always be near thee and thine.
JOHN FARRELL was born at Buenos Aires, South America, on the 18th December, 1851 or 1852. There is some uncertainty as to the year; Farrell himself did not know whether it was 1851 or 1852, and no official record can be obtained; but the date first mentioned is that entered in the family papers kept by Mrs. Farrell, and it agrees with other records. His parents were Andrew and Mary Farrell, both of whom were born in Ireland, and came from fairly well-to-do families in the city of Dublin. The father, Andrew Farrell, was left an orphan at an early age, his parents falling victims to an epidemic of cholera which swept through the part of Ireland in which they were living at the time. He was, however, well educated and carefully brought up by his guardians, and was taught the business of a chemist. He married in Ireland, and three of his four children were born there—Andrew, Matthew, and Kate. About 1847 he took his family to South America, and settled at Buenos Aires, where he started business and prospered as a chemist. There his youngest child, John, the subject of this memoir, was born. The year of his birth was a memorable one in the history of Australia, for it was the year in which gold was first discovered in New South Wales and Victoria. The news soon travelled over the world and in due course reached Andrew Farrell, in Buenos Aires. Stirred by the stories of fortunes quickly made on the diggings, he sold the chemist's shop, and in 1852, with his family, including the baby John, set sail for England in order to get to Australia. They arrived somewhere towards the end of 1852 at Sandridge, where Mrs Farrell and the younger children were left while Andrew Farrell and his eldest son went to the Ballarat diggings. Life at Sandridge at that time was primitive, the price of food and everything else was very high, medical attention was difficult to obtain, and, of course, there were no sanitary arrangements. It was no wonder, therefore, that John was attacked with a severe illness, and almost lost his life.

Andrew Farrell did not find much gold at Ballarat, so he returned shortly afterwards to his family and took them to Bendigo, where he was much more fortunate. Later on he migrated to Whroo, or Rushworth, where he mined for some years, and then bought horses and engaged in the carrying trade—a very profitable one in the ante-railway period. He was soon successful enough to be able to purchase a farm at a place called Baringhup, on the Loddon River, not far from the town now called Maldon.
(Victoria). He continued to trade as a carrier for some time, but eventually devoted himself wholly to farming, aided by his sons, and became fairly prosperous, well-known, and respected throughout the district. He took part in public affairs, and held several positions of local importance, such as those of Secretary to the Agricultural Society of the district, Librarian, and Electoral Registrar. He continued to live at Baringhup until his death on the 17th February, 1897, aged 74. His wife had died in 1862, after a long illness.

John Farrell's parents were of that honest, industrious, self-reliant class, physically strong, and mentally clear and resolute, which forms the backbone of the British people. Andrew Farrell was a man of sterling worth, and John is said to have strongly resembled him in manner and appearance. Both father and mother were educated and fond of reading, and though their time was fully occupied in the early years of their residence in Victoria, they did not neglect the education of their children. The home life was genial and mutually helpful; all the children were fond of books and music, and John acquired the rudiments of a sound education from his parents. The country about their farm on the Loddon River was wild and beautiful. There were very few settlers in the district then and their houses were far apart, so that each family practically depended upon its own resources for culture and amusement. John was fond of roaming at large through the bush with his brother Matthew, and occasionally they fished or hunted, but the younger brother had a strong aversion to inflicting pain or killing anything, and never became a sportsman. The children were sent to a private school in 1860. After their mother's death in 1862, however, they had no more schooling. The brief experience passed without any remarkable demonstration on John's part, but it was noticed that he was very anxious to learn and possessed a very good memory. He was popular amongst his fellows, and was regarded as a “very sociable and good-humoured boy.” For some years John worked on his father's farm, and occasionally on neighbouring farms—more for the sake of company than for the remuneration. He was eager to meet new people and hear the stories they had to tell. At shearing time on a station not far from his home he visited the men's hut as often as possible, and listened to their yarns or took part in their discussions. The gold fields had brought a strange medley of people into Victoria from all parts of the world, most of whom were of an adventurous turn and had journeyed in far countries, so young Farrell probably gained a good deal of second-hand experience. He earned such a reputation as a conversationalist and humourist while a boy that his company was sought by neighbours. He learned to play the concertina—“the piano of the bush” in the early days—and later the violin, and with his father and brothers often arranged concerts or took part in local festivities. In one of the last articles which he wrote, he referred to his brief career as a musician:—“I, too, have begun with a mouth organ and passed with honours in the concertina, aspiring to play ‘by note.’ As the haughty owner of the first Anglo-German instrument seen by resident Victorians so far inland I have occasionally, but coldly, consented to play polkas, ‘first sets,’ caledonians, and the like, wrought from a very limited repertoire of compositions for the inspiration of uncritical dancing assemblies. These performances, and some truly rascally violin solos, the result of a mistaken ambition, represent my range of accomplishment in one great branch of art; they are all I have done, or ever will do, in music.”

Fortunately, young Farrell had, in addition to his fondness for company and gaiety, a taste for reading, and found ample enjoyment in the works of Mayne Reid and Walter Scott, the only novels at first available. Books were not plentiful in his home or in the district at that time, but he early became acquainted with the works of Byron, Burns and Shakespeare. As with many another boy, Byron was his particular favourite; he read him through and through, and often at local entertainments, when he was asked to recite, he used to reel off passages or poems which he had committed to memory. His thirst for books developed rapidly, and most of his pocket-money was sent to Melbourne for more literature.

Life itself was, however, always more interesting to him than the reflection of it in books, and the great world of which he had read and heard beyond the horizon of the farm on the Loddon filled his imagination and made him eager to go out and explore it for himself. Therefore in 1870 he left his father's home, and made a start in life on his own account, by going to Sandhurst (now Bendigo) seeking employment. He was then 19, strong and healthy, jovial, light-hearted, and ambitious. The world was wide and life was pleasant; somehow, somewhere there were great things to be done. Time stretched indefinitely ahead, and it did not matter how one made a start. By chance he found a position in a brewery owned by Messrs. Jackson and Co. Here he worked hard and showed himself quick and trustworthy; he advanced rapidly and became before long a proficient brewer. One of his brothers visited him in Sandhurst some time afterwards, and says that he was struck with the difference that twelve months or so of town life had made in John; he seemed more refined and energetic, he read more than ever, yet found time for social pleasures and dressed stylishly. After he had been working there for two years the brewery changed hands, and Farrell thought it time to continue his quest of fame and fortune elsewhere. He went with one or two companions to the colony of Queensland, visited Charters Towers and travelled a long way north towards the Gulf country on a gold digging expedition. The far North of Queensland was then almost unknown, but gold had been discovered in Gympie in 1867, and there were rumours of rich goldfields on the Palmer River which drew many men thither in spite of the difficulties of travelling, the great heat and the hostile blacks. Farrell and his friends found no gold, but met with plenty of adventures and strange experiences. The party suffered many hardships, and Farrell fell ill with fever and ague. A strong constitution stood him in good stead and he recovered; but all his money was gone, and he had to work his way back to Victoria. He entered into a contract to fell timber, which occupied him for six months, and brought him money enough to get to Melbourne and thence home to Baringhup. He had been away two years.

Some months were spent quietly on the farm, and with his father and brothers he entered into the work of planting a vineyard and making wine.
He studied the vigneron's business as fully as possible, and intended to devote himself to it, but in 1875 he was tempted by the offer of a good position to return to his first trade—the brewing of beer. One of his Bendigo employers—a Mr. Jackson—established a brewery at Camperdown (Victoria), and asked Farrell to join him. Here for two years he worked as a brewer, and during this time he met Miss Eliza Watts (daughter of James Watts, of Camperdown), who became his wife on the 16th November, 1876, the marriage being celebrated in Melbourne before
Mr. Richard Gibbs, the Registrar General. After his marriage, Farrell decided to try farming on his own account and the young couple journeyed to Benalla, where they met Matthew Farrell. The two brothers travelled a good deal about the district in search of land suitable for selection, and John decided upon a place called Major Plains, where the Dookie Agricultural Farm is now situated, and there selected a small area of Crown land. The making of a home out of a wilderness requires hard work and immense patience; the clearing, fencing, ploughing, and all the other farming operations were endurable, but the monetary return was a long way off, and the young household was not established with any large amount of capital. Farrell found it necessary to find other and more quickly remunerative work. Abandoning the farm, he took a position in a cordial factory at Benalla, and thence went to a brewery in Melbourne. While at the latter place a firm of brewers in Albury(N.S.W.)—Messrs O'Keefe and Manning—offered him the management of their brewery, and he left for Albury in 1878. Henceforth his life was passed almost uninterruptedly in New South Wales.

Farrell's literary career may be said to have begun in Albury, although he had contributed occasional articles and humorous verse to the Camperdown paper in 1876. He wrote verses for the Albury Banner and the Border Post newspapers soon after his arrival, and in 1878, at the office of the latter paper, was published a little brochure entitled “Ephemera: An Iliad of Albury”—Farrell's first independent publication. The name of the author is printed as “J. O'Farrell,” and some of his newspaper work at this time was signed “O'Farrell”—merely to gratify a temporary Celtic whim, for his forefathers had dropped the “O.” The preface to the first canto of the “Iliad of Albury” stated that it was the author's intention, if his leisure would permit, “to write and publish his extravaganza at intervals of about one month.” It is signed—“J. O'F., Turk's Head Hotel, April 24th, 1878.” This first canto consists of 58 stanzas in the ottava rima measure of his admired “Don Juan.” The following is an example:—

“Thus I throw down my gage. Let none imagine
I fear one single man of woman born,
Or institution, which with time worn badge on
Lives as a butt for worth to laugh to scorn;
I mean to hammer, most persistently, the wedge on
Which will burst up the shades and ghosts forlorn
Of old abuses, and of new ones also,—
At least such as we all may safely call so.”

The spirit of this stanza actuated Farrell throughout the rest of his life: he was always a foe of abuses, and a hater of injustice.

I have been able to obtain a copy of the first canto only and cannot ascertain whether or not further instalments were published as promised. It had, at any rate, a considerable vogue locally, and no doubt its success encouraged the author to continue writing verse. In 1879 he wrote an ode for the Melbourne Exhibition in the competition opened by the Victorian Government, which carried his name further afield, though it did not win the prize. It was not until 1882, however, that he published any serious essay in verse. This was called “Two Stories, a Fragmentary Poem,” and was printed by A. H. Massina and Co., of Melbourne, “for private circulation only.” It is an unpretentious booklet of 50 pages, small Svo. The poem opens in the flowing line of “Locksley Hall,” in which measure one of the stories is told; the other, “a tale within a tale,” being an interlude in octosyllabic lines. The imagery is occasionally strained and the construction often faulty; but there are some passages of great beauty, and there is ample evidence of genuine poetic feeling and imaginative power. It was reviewed with mild praise by several Australian papers, eulogised by the Sydney Bulletin and noticed by, apparently, only one English paper, which, however, credited the author with a “vivid and picturesque imagination,” and stated that there was much to praise and little to blame.

As far as I can ascertain, Farrell's first contributions to the Sydney Bulletin appeared in 1882. In the issue of the 5th August of that year were printed some satirical verses entitled “An Auto-da-Fe,” dealing, in a thin disguise, with an incident which had aroused considerable feeling in Albury. These verses were subsequently reprinted in a pamphlet relating to the affair, which was published at Beechworth (Vic.). On the 14th October, 1882, the Bulletin printed the first instalment of a long poem in “Don Juan” stanzas, called “Jenny—An Australian Story,” which was continued almost every week until the 31st March of the following year. The story is of a kind that might have been continued indefinitely. It is full of topical allusions and slang now obsolete, with some fine patches of description and plentiful incident of a broadly humorous character. The Bulletin was then very young and strenuously unconventional. Its language was racy and free, and it encouraged the class of verse that Farrell had begun to write—satirical, slangy, and vigorous. The publication of a poem in irregular instalments of about a column at a time was an unusual proceeding for the Bulletin or any other Australian paper, but it was apparently appreciated by the readers of the day. Farrell did not venture any further flights in the more ambitious class of verse represented by “Two Stories,” but for many years confined himself to the lower level of fluent humorous narrative.

After “Jenny,” verses appeared at frequent intervals in the Bulletin until 1887. Most of the verses were unsigned, but the more important were printed over the signature—“J. Farrell.” The poem by which he has been most widely known—“How He Died”—appeared in the Bulletin of 21st July, 1883, and was reprinted in a volume of prose and verse by various Bulletin writers, called “A Golden Shanty” It was recited with great success by the well-known actor, Mr. G. S. Titheradge, and appeared in many English and American papers, by some of which it was attributed to Henry Kendall The list of poems which is printed in the Appendix is as complete as I could make it, but, of course, some pieces may have escaped my notice. His last poem—“A Hymn Before Battle”—was printed in the Bulletin Special Election Number on 5th December, 1903—a month before his death. His literary life was, therefore, more or less associated with that paper.

Farrell remained in Albury working at the brewery until 1883. When he first arrived in the Border City it was late at night and he was taken to “The Turk's Head Hotel,” kept by one Luke Gulson. He stayed there for some time until he got a suitable house to live in, but with Luke Gulson and his brother Thomas he formed an enduring friendship which was not affected by an incident that occurred early in their acquaintance. On the night of his arrival he found the hotel filled with people. Business was going on as usual, although it was after the time limited by the Licensing Act. Shortly afterwards the hotelkeeper was prosecuted for his disobedience of the Act, and he called Farrell as a witness in his defence. When the witness was asked to describe what he knew about the matter, he guilelessly said “that there was dancing and singing and card playing, and everyone seemed to be having a good time, and he really did not know what the police wanted to interfere for.” Farrell did not seem to understand the laughter of the audience, nor the consternation of the hotelkeeper, who declined to call any more witnesses, and was promptly fined by the Magistrate.

In 1879 Farrell had a severe attack of brain fever, and was taken to the Melbourne Hospital. The doctors there gave up all hope of a recovery, and for some time he lay at the point of death. Though he eventually got better, he never entirely recovered from the effects of that attack. For the rest of his life—over twenty years—he was an almost constant sufferer from various forms of neuritis. He bore the pain uncomplainingly, but was continually seeking a cure, and tried innumerable medicines, courses of diet, and treatment. After a temporary breakdown, he went to New Zealand for the sake of the hot baths at Rotorua, and gained some benefit from them, but in the latter years of his life his energy was considerably dulled by the too-frequent pain, for which no permanent remedy could be found.

Anxious to make a bid for fortune, Farrell decided to leave his employment as a brewer in Albury, and persuaded Thomas Gulson to enter into partnership with him in the establishment of a brewery of their own at Goulburn. They accordingly left Albury on the 4th March, 1883, and arrived on the same day at Goulburn, where a brewery was duly established and progressed satisfactorily. Farrell stayed eighteen months in Goulburn, and made many friends and a little money there. He left towards the end of 1884 to start a branch brewery in the town of Queanbeyan, not many miles distant. At Queanbeyan he worked away at the brewing of beer for two years, making a living, but certainly no fortune. It is related that one New Year's Eve a number of the lively spirits of the town who were “seeing the Old Year out” called at Farrell's house and asked for drinks. He said to them, “There is nothing here, boys, but I'll give you the keys of the brewery and you can go there and take what you want.” Of course they did so, and Queanbeyan has not yet forgotten the affair. Naturally, a man who ran a business on such lines was not likely to make a fortune. As a matter of fact, Farrell was quite unfitted for business management. He was far more deeply concerned in poetry and politics than in his own beer—which, by the way, he seldom drank. He could, and did, for the joy of the thing and the traditional literary flavour of it, write dithyrambs about rum and lyrical lines referring to ruby and topaz wine, but he cared no more for these famous liquors than he did for the aforesaid brew.

At this time Farrell was a Protectionist. He had grown up in that fiscal faith in Victoria, and while in Queanbeyan he took an important part in an election campaign on behalf of the Protectionist candidate. It happened that Sir Henry Parkes had made a speech in which he referred to the Queanbeyan electors as “yokels.” Farrell obtained control of a local paper and vigorously attacked the Freetrade leader, making the fight the hottest and most exciting Queanbeyan had ever known.

Henry George's “Progress and Poverty” was first published at the end of 1879, in England in 1880, and quickly spreading over the world was soon circulating in Australia. It came in John Farrell's way some time in 1884, and he read it eagerly and delightedly. His nature was sympathetic; his heart was distressed by the appalling poverty of the mass of the people and the flagrant injustices of modern civilisation. To him, therefore, whose mind was exercised by the bewildering problems of social life, upon which the old Political Economy threw no light, but rather increasing darkness—“Progress and Poverty” came as a wonderful revelation. That which had been hidden was now visible; that which had been perplexing was simple and clear. It was as if one who had been blind were suddenly made to see, and the phenomena of nature, vaguely guessed at in blindness, burst upon his astonished vision. This is not the place to attempt an estimate of the value and influence of Henry George's work, but the reading of “Progress and Poverty” marked an epoch in John Farrell's life. From that time onward he was an entirely devoted and enthusiastic disciple, and all his subsequent writing was coloured to some extent by the philosophy and the faith of the Prophet of San Francisco.

Some time elapsed, however, before Farrell finally abandoned the doctrine of Protection. At first many of the followers of Henry George failed to see that there was any immediate connection between the abolition of tariff duties and his scheme for the destruction of land monopoly; and in New South Wales, as elsewhere, the organisations first established to advocate the Georgian theory comprised both freetraders and protectionists. Henry George's “Protection or Freetrade,” published in 1885, finally cleared away any remaining doubts Farrell may have had about the fiscal question. He soon after avowed himself a freetrader, and in October, 1887, wrote, in a letter to the Daily Telegraph, a powerful attack on Protection (which he defined as a scheme of salvation by destruction) and Mr. David Buchanan, a prominent politician, whom he designated “the Father of the Smashers.” Throughout the rest of his career he worked unceasingly for land value taxation and freetrade.*

Meanwhile, in Queanbeyan, he had been writing a good deal of verse, and, encouraged by the late William Bede Dalley, he made preparations for the publication of the best of his work in book form. To Dalley, a man of culture, warmly interested in Australian letters, many a literary aspirant had turned confidently for criticism and encouragement, and, perhaps, in the future the many services by which Dalley helped to brighten

"... the life austere
That waits upon the man of letters here"

will be counted as of greater worth than those which won him a Privy Councillorship.

* Since the above was written, I have received evidence to the effect that not long before his death John Farrell changed his opinion on a matter in connection with land value taxation, which is of considerable importance in Australia. It was generally held by Single Taxers here that any tax on the unimproved value of land should fall on the total value of all lands, without exemption of any kind. In 1894 Mr. A. H. Sampson published a pamphlet, entitled “Principle before Party,” in which he claimed that the price paid to the State for land purchased from the Crown should be free of taxation, so that the Land Tax should fall only on any increment in value beyond the original purchase money paid to the State. Mr. B. R. Wise adopted this theory (known as Land Betterment Taxation), and it became part of the platform of the Freetrade Land and Reform League. Most Single Taxers opposed the theory, Farrell as strongly as any, and, for a number of years, he used all his influence against it. In 1901, however, he had several conversations with Mr. Sampson on the question, and eventually admitted to him that the theory seemed correct, and that if a man paid to the State £1000 for £1000 worth of land, the annual value of the money would be exactly equal to the annual value of the land, and the State could not equitably demand from him anything more than that annual value. Farrell fully acknowledged his conversion, saying, in a letter to Mr. Sampson:—“It seems to me that you are right, and that the view I held was wrong.”

In a letter to Mr. F. J. Broomfield, dated 28th July, 1887, Dalley relates the circumstances which made him acquainted with Farrell—

“It is six years ago—and he was then unknown—when from a distant country town he sent me a few lines containing some of his earliest compositions, and sought my judgment upon them. They were marked with occasional strokes of power, but were rude and unlettered, and showed such defective culture that I thought the kindest thing I could do was to tell him frankly that though I was convinced he had ‘the vision and the faculty divine,’ he would require the ‘inspiring aid of books,’ study, patience, and a severe discipline of refinement before he could produce anything worthy of his genius. He thanked me in very touching words, told me he would do what I advised, and when one day I read his poem of ‘How He Died’ I wrote to him on the spot, declaring that I recognised his hand at once. This is the origin of my knowledge of him and a brief history of my appreciation of his powers, concealed as they are partially by a rich veil of modesty.”

The selection of poems was published by subscription through Turner and Henderson, of Sydney, in January, 1887. The volume, consisting of 178 pages, demy 8vo, was entitled “How He Died and other Poems,” and was sold for 10s. 6d. It was dedicated to the Right Hon. W. B. Dalley, P.C., in a sonnet strongly deprecating the spirit which rushed us into the Soudan fiasco, but appreciating, nevertheless—

“... him, who past the blue sweet bay
Hides in a home with love and laurel crowned,
Most honoured by high nations far away,
Most loved by those, who, standing closest round,
See all his life ...”

The book was reviewed at length in the Sydney Morning Herald of 22nd
January, 1887, by W. B. Dalley, in the Brisbane Courier by J. Brunton Stephens, and in The Freeman's Journal, while numerous other papers gave it more or less careful treatment, and, generally, ample praise. Dalley pointed out the resemblance of much of the subject matter of the volume to Bret Harte's work, and other reviewers found likenesses to Byron, John Hay, A. L. Gordon, and G. R. Sims. The influence of Byron is, of course, marked in the poem called “Adrift,” which is part of the early booklet “Two Stories” before mentioned. Farrell had read a great deal of the then recent verse of Bret Harte, Joaquin Miller, J. Boyle O'Reilly, and other Americans of the same class. Preferring always the objective to subjective in literature, and direct statement to conventional periphrasis, he highly appreciated their fresh and vigorous verse, and was no doubt considerably affected by it in his own writing. Nevertheless, as Brunton Stephens remarked in his review, “the critic would make a great mistake who would insist upon Mr. Farrell's being merely an imitator or a product of the American writer (Harte). It is much more reasonable to suppose that the resemblance is due in large measure to certain features belonging in common to the materials from which both writers draw the sustenance of their spiritual activities.”

A copy of the book had been sent to Tennyson, and Farrell received from him a pathetic note in his own handwriting:—

“Farringford, Freshwater, “Isle of Wight.

“I thank you for your volume of poems which has just reached me. I have only read two—‘How He Died’ and ‘No.’ The first is very spirited, and with the other I entirely sympathise. It is not much that I can read, for I have entirely lost the use of my right eye, as far as reading goes, and the left is slowly darkening, and every morning of my life come by post, from all parts of the world, poems—reams of them—with requests that I should pronounce upon their merits, and hardly ever a book of prose; and I cannot live like John the Baptist on wild honey. Nevertheless

“I thank you,

“Tennyson.

“And I may add to this brief note that the praise of your Australian critics, to which you allude so modestly, seems to me, from the little I have read, not unmerited.

The book gave Farrell a definite place in Australian literature, and that a high one. The financial results, however, were very small, especially as he gave away a great many copies of the volume.

The passionate enthusiasm for humanity, and the imperative necessity which he felt to spread abroad the newly-discovered economic principles which he considered would do so much to improve the condition of the people, made him anxious to find some means whereby he could effectively work for this great cause. His interest in politics was never a personal one; he was naturally retiring and so averse to advertisement that he would never attempt to make a speech at a meeting; but he, of course, recognised that it was only by political action that social reform could be obtained. His brief taste of journalism in Queanbeyan, and the literary position he had attained, showed him that by his pen he could do more to help in bringing about political action in the direction he wished than by any other means. He therefore sold his interest in the brewery at Queanbeyan in 1887, and came to Sydney to look about for an opportunity of obtaining journalistic employment. There was a paper for sale in the mining town of Lithgow, and as Farrell's health was very bad at the time, Lithgow seemed a good place for him to live in. He at once bought this paper, the recently-established Lithgow Enterprise, and went to Lithgow in March or April, 1887. There was another paper published in the town—the Lithgow Mercury—edited by J. P. T. Caulfield, then a Protectionist, which was a formidable rival to its junior contemporary. Farrell entirely changed the character of his paper, which soon became celebrated for the excellent articles which poured from his pen, articles explanatory of the various points of George's economic teaching and trenchant criticisms of current politics. Local happenings were often dealt with in satirical verse, making the “Rum and Cloves” column in which they appeared an interesting feature of the paper. The rivalry with the Mercury was continued on different lines, Farrell proving too able an opponent for Mr. Caulfield, who, some time later, became a convert to the Georgian faith. The paper was not, however, a financial success, and after little more than twelve months Farrell was confronted with failure. He was quite unfitted for the management of a newspaper, as he never considered small questions of policy or local interest. A company was therefore formed by a number of Land Nationalisers, with a capital of £2000; the Lithgow Mercury was purchased and amalgamated with the Enterprise, a manager was engaged, and Farrell was appointed editor. The new paper, called The Australian Land Nationaliser, was the first special organ in New South Wales of the Land Nationalisers, or Single Taxers—the name by which the followers of Henry George were subsequently distinguished. The Land Nationaliser brought together the scattered forces of the Single Tax party, and did excellent propagandist work, but it became a very inefficient local newspaper. Of the petty personal and local news which characterises most country papers there was very little, and few of the bucolic readers cared for the lengthy disquisitions on the justification of interest or discussions as to whether rent entered into price—which were the principal features of the paper. While the circulation grew abroad, it declined at home, the advertisers fell away, and again Farrell had to face a failure. The directors, therefore, sold out, at a heavy loss, and decided to establish a purely Single Tax paper in the capital.

Farrell left Lithgow for Sydney in 1889 to edit the new paper, which was named The Australian Standard, after Henry George's paper in New York. The paper started off well. Farrell wrote most of the contents of the early issues, including a good deal of verse, and from Sir Henry Parkes and many others he received warmly congratulatory letters upon the high quality of the journal. It was the year of the great Maritime strike, and questions of social reform were the burning questions of the time. The Single Taxers, though not very numerous, were very active, and politically influential. Negotiations were then in progress for bringing Henry George to Australia on a lecturing tour; the newspapers opened their columns to discussions on the Single Tax, and everywhere the question was debated and talked about.

The Daily Telegraph, a young and dashing paper, gave a good deal of encouragement to the new movement, reported single tax meetings fully, and devoted a larger portion of space than did any other daily to correspondence on the question. John Farrell was invited to write a series of explanatory articles for it, the first of which appeared on 24th October, 1889, under the title of “The Philosophy of the Single Tax,” the remainder appearing irregularly up to 8th February, 1890. Before the series closed, Farrell was offered a position on the staff of The Daily Telegraph as leader writer. He accepted, and commenced work in February, 1890, handing over the Australian Standard to Mr. Frank Cotton, an early and prominent Single Taxer.

Henry George arrived in Sydney from San Francisco by the Mariposa on the 6th March, 1890. It must have been an eventful moment for John Farrell, as no doubt for many another, when first he met face to face the man who had so profoundly affected his life. Farrell wrote a lengthy account of the landing and reception of Henry George for the New York Standard, filling eight columns of that paper, and told how, upon hearing that the Mariposa would arrive early in the morning—a day earlier than expected—he and other Single Taxers secured beds at hotels near the wharf and remained sleeping or on sentry all night. The steamer did not arrive next morning, and all through the day they were in a state of unrest and excitement. In the afternoon they went in a launch to the Heads and waited there till dark, but still without a sign of the Mariposa on the horizon. Another sleepless night was passed, but at length, early on the following morning, the vessel arrived, and they met and welcomed their leader. Farrell attended all the meetings held in Sydney, and accompanied George on his inland tour and, subsequently, to Adelaide. This personal association with the man whom he held in such high regard that he considered him not least amongst the few great benefactors of the race was, of course, an immense pleasure to Farrell. That George had a very warm regard for and high opinion of his Sydney disciple is shown by the correspondence which he carried on with him up to the time of his own dramatic end in 1897.

On the resignation of Mr. Ward, in June, 1890, Farrell was appointed to the editorship of the Daily Telegraph. In a letter to The Standard of 30th July, 1890, George expressed his delight at hearing the news, spoke of Farrell's ability and his valuable services to the Single Tax cause, and said—“But, perhaps, the most striking characteristic of the man is the affectionate regard which he seems to inspire in all who know him.” The responsibility of his position was rather too much for Farrell, and perhaps his uncompromising spirit was too much for the proprietary—at any rate he resigned the editorship in September, 1890, but continued as a member of the leader writing staff until June, 1903. He was one of those who contributed to the “Notes of the Day” column in the Daily Telegraph over the signature of “Outis”—a striking journalistic success. Later on the various contributors adopted separate pen-names, that of Farrell being “Neimand.” In 1903, Mr. Ward came back to the editorial control of the Telegraph after a long absence, when Farrell resigned his position on the editorial staff of the paper and became a contributor of promiscuous articles.

It should be mentioned that in February, 1901, Farrell received from the directors an increase of salary and leave of absence for a month, and upon his final retirement last year was presented with a handsome cheque, accompanied by a letter which set forth “their high appreciation of his loyal and efficient services during the 15 years he had been associated with them,” and their best wishes for his future happiness and well being. His colleagues presented him with an address and accorded him as hearty a demonstration of friendship at a farewell banquet as any Sydney pressman has ever received.

During the time he was on the Daily Telegraph staff he made a trip to New Zealand for the sake of his health, and about January, 1899, he journeyed to Tasmania—principally for the purpose of visiting the home of John Mitchel, author of “The Jail Journal,” the result of which was a series of fine articles about John Mitchel, which appeared in the Daily Telegraph during February and March, 1899. In 1902 he made another trip to Tasmania with Mrs. Farrell. These were the only breaks in the regular round of his journalistic life, his home all this time being a comfortable cottage called “Wollondale” in the suburb of Lewisham.

After his retirement from the staff, Farrell contributed special articles to The Daily Telegraph and other newspapers. He was offered Editorial positions in other colonies which he did not care to accept, as he felt it would be too hard to sever all his ties with Sydney. He was practically offered the Editorship of the Australian Review of Reviews, and had the matter under his consideration just prior to his death. His health was, apparently, not any worse than usual until about Christmas, 1903. He kept up bravely till the end, only his family knowing how ill and utterly weary he was when he went to the Royal Prince Alfred Hospital at the beginning of this year. Even then the doctors thought he would recover and be able to go about again for some time, though they knew he could not last long. Very few of his friends knew of his illness, and when it was announced in the evening papers of 8th January that John Farrell had died that morning of heart failure, resulting from Bright's disease after a few days' illness, the shock was painfully severe to a large number of people who knew him, as well as to the widow and seven children whom he left behind. He died quietly as he wished to die. He was buried at Rookwood on 9th January, in the Roman Catholic portion of the cemetery, in the simplest way possible. Mr. Frank Cotton, his oldest friend present, made a brief, affecting address, and the Rev. W. H. Beale said a prayer, and all that was earthly of John Farrell returned to the earth.

If “to live in hearts we leave behind is not to die,” Farrell will not die to the world that knew him in the flesh for a great many years to come. Few men, it may be safely said, have inspired such genuine affection in those who were associated with them as did John Farrell. He was so considerate and courteous, his manner so easy and good humoured, that one felt on good terms with him on first acquaintance, and as the acquaintance grew, and one discovered the rich qualities of his nature, his generosity, his capacity of appreciation, his intense sympathy with the poor and the oppressed, combined with fine mental powers and a humorous, sanely optimistic outlook on life, one felt that here, indeed, was a man of rare qualities, whose modesty could not conceal his really great worth. There is unanimous testimony to his goodness in the numerous obituary notices which have appeared in Australian newspapers, two or three of which are reprinted in the appendix to this volume. There was no need to take refuge in the charitable maxim De Mortuis, for of this man there is nothing but good to be said. His life was full of “Little, nameless, unremembered acts

He had a high idea of duty, and, as a citizen and as a friend, he always lived up to it. A thorough Bohemian in spirit, he cared nothing for conventions. What faults he had no one seems to know anything about; what mistakes he made seem to have been forgotten; detractors of his literary merits may arise, but never any enemies of the man. No one can point to a mean or dishonourable action on the part of John Farrell.

His early life as a brewer, and the strain of his later journalistic career, added to almost continuous suffering, might easily have made him a hard drinker, but he seldom drank alcoholic liquors at all. He, however, derived a good deal of consolation from his pipe. One of his weaknesses in the latter part of his life was an over-indulgence in mining speculation. He dreaded the possibility of bad health affecting his capacity to earn money for his family, and always had the hope that he might be fortunate some day and make sufficient to put them beyond the fear of want. Alas! all his ventures were
Wrecked on a reef of visionary gold.”

Nothing seemed to disturb his equanimity. Whatever disappointment he felt at the failure of his speculations—and they were all failures—he kept to himself, making jests out of them for his friends.

Few people ever applied to him for help without success. He must have given away a good deal of his income to needy acquaintances, and he always contributed generously to the funds of the Single Tax organisation. He gave, also, what was more valuable—his time and services—to the cause he loved, spending hours almost every evening in replying to letters received from various parts of the world, and every Single Taxer who visited Sydney made a point of calling on John Farrell and taking up some of his time. When the Single Tax—a monthly journal of the league—was established in 1893, Farrell gratuitously edited it and wrote most of the contents for the first year or two. For a number of years he acted as New South Wales correspondent for American Single Tax papers. Everything he could do for the advancement of the Single Tax cause he did cheerfully and well.

Farrell was a very well-read man, but by no means bookish. His preferences in literature were not guided by the principle of “art for art's sake”; the subject matter was his first consideration. “Style is not everything,” he said; “kind hearts are more than style.” On this account he regarded Dickens as one of the noblest of literary geniuses, and amongst living novelists he held Mrs. Sarah McLean Greene in highest esteem. Olive Schreiner's “Story of an African Farm,” Reade's “The Cloister and the Hearth,” and Besant's “Children of Gibeon” were great favourites of his. He was far from being impervious to the charm of style; Tennyson and Swinburne amongst recent poets, and Stevenson as novelist and essayist, were read with constant pleasure. Stevenson he considered to be “the head master of style; a fine, all-round literary artist, who can beautify, without in the slightest degree disguising, everything he touches.” Kipling's early work appealed to him strongly on account of its force and frankness, but with the later Kipling of blatant jingoism he had no sympathy. Browning and Meredith he had grappled with, but failed to appreciate; and he had no interest in the modern symbolistic and mystical movement in literature. He had a high opinion of the works of many Australian writers, and during the period in which he wrote the book reviews for The Daily Telegraph any new novel or book of poems by an Australian author was sure to receive the fullest appreciation possible from Farrell.
As a conversationalist Farrell was finely humorous and interesting. He was fond of talking, and, withal, an excellent listener. He would argue at length, logically and clearly, and with a wealth of illustration on most questions—particularly political economy, which he considered as first amongst the things that matter. When William Lane was in Sydney engaged in organising the expedition to New Australia, he saw a good deal of Farrell, and, I believe, they engaged in an argument on the scheme—an argument which lasted for many hours at a time all through one week. Farrell, an individualist, was opposed to this communistic settlement, and set forth his reasons against it in a series of articles—“For those who remain”—in the Brisbane Worker (February-July, 1893).

His prose was always lucid and persuasive, and he showed considerable ability in handling dry subjects in an interesting way. Without any special training, he developed rapidly into a very capable journalist, and for ephemeral newspaper publication he wrote many finely-phrased and eloquent articles. It should be worth while rescuing some of these, and I am sure that a selection of his contributions on literary and economic subjects would rank amongst the best prose produced in Australia. It is a pity that such a fine writer should have been practically wasted on journalism—a regret expressed in many of the obituary notices, and Mr. J. Longmuir, in an article on Farrell which appeared in The Newsletter of the 16th January, aptly quoted J. G. Whittier's lines:—

“And one there was, a dreamer born,
Who, with a mission to fulfil,
Had left the Muse's haunts to turn
The crank of an opinion mill,
Making his rustic reed of song
A weapon in the war with Wrong.

* * * * * *

Yet, while he wrought with strenuous will
The work his hands had found to do,
He heard the fitful music still
Of winds that out of dreamland blew.”

Still, Farrell himself would not have considered his journalistic work a misuse of his talents, so long as he felt that his leaders were “weapons in the war with Wrong.”

He had a very moderate view of the value of his own writings, and avoided any discussion of them. He knew in later years that the bulk of his early work was crude and diffuse, but he knew, without mock modesty, that he had written a few really good things—such as “Australia,” which appeared as an introduction to the _Picturesque Atlas of Australasia_ in 1888, and “Ave Imperatrix,” which was first printed in the _Daily Telegraph_ in 1897, and he felt himself capable of producing good verse if he had leisure and freedom from the pain which often made the mere act of writing very troublesome. I well remember meeting him early in the morning before Jubilee Day, 1897, when he told me that he had a poem in his pocket which he would read to me. We went into a room near by, and he rolled out the poem in that rich brogue of his which was the delight of all his friends. I expressed my appreciation, and he said, “Yes, I think it is good myself,” in an honest, dispassionate way. He had been asked by the editor of the _Daily Telegraph_ on the previous day if he could write something appropriate for the celebration of Queen Victoria’s Diamond Jubilee. He sat down that evening and, writing at a white heat all through the night, had finished “Ave Imperatrix” by the morning. It occupied about a column of the _Daily Telegraph_ on the 22nd June, 1897, and elicited warm congratulations from all parts of Australia. The late J. Brunton Stephens wrote a characteristically generous letter of praise:—

“Brisbane, 8th July, 1897.

“My dear Farrell,

“I must congratulate you or bust. That is really a grand piece of work your ‘Ave Imperatrix.’ I am showing it all round, and everybody to whom I have shown it has thanked me for doing so. To my mind, the poem was the event of the Jubilee Day in Australia. I have read it over and over again, and each time with increased enjoyment. Go on and prosper. . . . “Yours faithfully and (I must now say) respectfully,

The poem, with slight alterations and a new title—“Australia to England”—was reprinted as a booklet by Angus and Robertson. Copies of this were sent to England and America for review, and the general verdict was highly laudatory. Professor Dowden wrote of it as “a memorable poem, fine and vigorous in spirit, in utterance and in the movement of its verse.” Rudyard Kipling, Cardinal Vaughan, Conan Doyle, Morley Roberts, Miss Jane Barlow, and many others wrote to the author in terms of appreciation.

The selection of poems printed in this volume is practically that made by John Farrell himself when he arranged with Messrs. Angus and Robertson to publish a volume which would comprise the best of the 1887 edition of “How he Died and other Poems,” and some new verses. He was dissatisfied with much of his old work, a great deal of it being occasional verse containing topical allusions, which soon become unintelligible. He hoped to write a good deal of new verse to include in the book, which was announced in 1896; but the opportunity did not come to him, and nothing of any value in verse was written after “Ave Imperatrix.” He had carefully revised a good deal of his earlier work, and re-written most of the poems here printed. During the last few months of his life he had intended to complete the work of revision, but he became so engrossed in the Federal elections held in December last that he put everything else aside—and he died on the 8th January. He was aware of many blemishes, faulty rhymes, and technical errors in his poems, most of which were written rapidly for newspaper publication. A comparison of the present form of “How He Died” with that in which it first appeared will show that Farrell had recognised and removed the principal defects in this case; doubtless the same process would have been applied to the rest. I have thought it best to print them all as he left them. I have included “In Ballarat” in deference to his apparent intention, and omitted those poems which I believe he wished omitted. The selection as it stands may be considered to comprise John Farrell's best work in verse.

Sydney Jephcott

OLD mate, the night o'ertook you early;
    Death's sudden moon arose;
Beside the fire you lit I linger,
    And watch your still repose.

The firelight lengthens thro' the forest,
    The moonlit columns vast
That lift that dread dispeopled city,
    The all-abandoned Past.

Ah! piteous light! all Life's endeavour
    A little space we see,
Immersed in Death's pervading Spirit,
    This moonlight Memory.

The firelight mingles with the moonlight;
    Life makes with death one dream;
The songs you sang, the days I met you—
    And that still shape—they seem

Parts of the Pageant unrecorded,
    The Vision Infinite;
The which a great God dreams out, drowsing—
    Our God of Black and White—

Our Mighty one of Pain and Pleasure;
    Of Evil as of Good;
Who bears us in His boundless Being—
    Red atoms of His blood.

They told me suddenly that John Farrell was dead. The first defensive impulse is not to believe anything that hurts you. Then comes inexorable Truth, that cares for no man and is always anxious to corroborate bad news. I would as soon have believed that I, myself, was dead. I remember how Farrell laughed, not so very long ago, when a person who seemed to have been wiping his pen upon his coat, and his eyes and mouth upon his sleeve, met us in King-street and told us that he was collecting subscriptions towards the cost of making a coffin for to-morrow. “Wisest lunatic I ever met,” said Farrell. And then, with the large utterance of the early gods, he said, “Oysters.” “When in doubt—eat,” was one of his axioms.

Sometimes, very seldom, when I thought that the world was not treating me well enough, I used to walk up the stairs of the Daily Telegraph office and confide my worst suspicions about Fate to Farrell. He might be writing a leading article that would change the destiny of Five Dock, but he would lay his pen aside and light his pipe, and open his large blue grey eyes, and say in a rolling, comforting, charming brogue—I always think now that Charity speak with a brogue—“Is there any-thing I can do to alter the petty designs of Providence, or (recollecting his poetic reputation) change the way of the stars in their courses?” And all this time he was in pain, and I and others, with paltry little worries, knew nothing about it. On one of those occasions we happened to speak of another man who had gone the long journey. I was annoyed about it, and told Farrell that I regarded it as little less than a personal outrage that a friend of mine should be so taken, without sufficient warning, out of my life. He laughed and said—“Which of us is going to write an obituary notice of the other?” We spun a coin. Heads I wrote, tails he wrote. The coin ran under the table and I think Courtney found it afterwards, but it must have been heads.

The mere fact of dying is nothing to the man who dies. It is a bagatelle. The hard part of it is for those who survive and, as friend after friend passes over the border, realise that all their interests are in another country. That means dying by pieces. The world is still as good as it ever was. The sun shines and the birds sing, but it is not the same sun and they are not the same birds. You meet new friends with bright, sympathetic eyes and the kindliest thoughts about you—but they did not know you when you were young. All your rosy dreams and winged hopes and soaring ambitions—they know nothing about them. What can you say? Nothing. It is a closed book. I have buried some fine years in the grave of John Farrell.

He was a lover of the sun and the sea, and had the heart of a lion and the voice of a Lablache in conversation. A big, deep chest and clear eyes, and a fine, theoretic gusto for the joy of living. A brewer in Albury was Farrell when I first heard of him. He sent me a little book of poems, which he was rather proud of at the time, but would never mention in later years. Subsequently he brewed in Goulburn, and informed me that—literally and because it was an accident of environment—he used the head of a cask as a desk. Wrote “Jenny” for The Bulletin in this fashion. Wrote “How He Died” in the same way. Somebody else will probably say something of him as a writer. It is somebody else's business. I myself am too partial. But I will quote four lines from a ballad entitled “Australia to England”:

Make England stand supreme for aye,
Because supreme for peace and good,
Warned well by wrecks of yesterday
That strongest feet may slip in blood.

I have italicised a line that the author did not italicise. It expresses Farrell in seven words. He was virile or nothing. That is, when he himself was writing. Otherwise he liked to hear Roderic Quinn and others sing very sorrowfully about nightingales in Greece.

One evening I went to Goulburn at the invitation of Hugh Mahon, Senator. Mr. Mahon was then merely an editor. I arrived late at night and met Farrell, who was going to Queanbeyan. “Come with me,” he said. It was a cold, blue, early morning with point-lace clouds on the horizon and an intoxicated driver whooping at the horses and jig-jagging the coach over the sides of the precipices—and the hotel ten miles away. Farrell and I were sitting on the box seat. The off wheel hung over an abyss for a moment. I was horribly afraid and looked at Farrell. He said nothing, but smiled grimly. When we came to a better road he laughed. “Death is not what it is cracked up to be,” he said.

Farrell had a fine, strong grip of the hand and a hearty way of saying “God is great” that made you, in spite of your better knowledge, believe that life was worth living. But responsibility ruined him, as it ruins every man who is at heart a dweller in the Tents of Shem. Farrell put his brain, and the fire at which many hands might have been warmed, into perishable and perished articles about paltry questions concerning which no man knows or cares. Pegasus should never have been in that pound. He was the friend of every man worth knowing. I remember quoting to him on an evening the saying of Abou ben Zeyd—“I am a singing man of the singers—the world's guest and a stranger.” He said he would say it about me. And I have to say it about him.

THE pen falls from his nerveless hand,
    The light is fading from his eyes,
The brain that nobly served his land
    Darkens and dies.
No, never dies! From hour to hour
    The burning thought is living still,
Onward it speeds with gath'ring power,
    To strengthen and fulfil.

Build him no mockery of stone,
    Nor shame him with your idle praise;
He liveth in his work alone
    Through all our days.
Sleep, heart of gold, 'twas not in vain
    You loved the struggling and the poor
And taught in sweet yet strenuous strain
    To battle and endure.

The lust of wealth, the pride of place,
    Were not a light to guide thy feet,
But larger hopes and wider space
    For hearts to beat.
O, brother, dead! Thus, one by one,
    Our broken swords remain to tell
The fight is o'er, the work is done.
    Sleep! “It is well.”

IT is about 15 years since I first met John Farrell, and was struck by his quaintly shrewd estimate of all mundane things. From then till the day of his death, without the break of a single moment, it was my privilege to be one of the many hundreds of intimate personal friends who loved him for his simple, manly good-nature, as much as they admired him for his robust intellectuality, softly tinged as it was with the fancifulness of the poet. The curious thing was that on the day I met Farrell it seemed as if I had known him all my life. “Hello; how goes it?” was his method of first introduction, as his big, hard, earnest hand reached out to grasp yours. Whoever you were, from that minute all the boundless good-nature of John Farrell was at your disposal to draw upon for any service that it was in his power to render. During many years of close daily companionship in journalistic work, I made use of this privilege more, perhaps, than most men.

Farrell had little or no scholastic training, but in the severe academy of human experience he had learned much. And a lifetime of omnivorous reading had given him a knowledge of the belles lettres such as no college could impart. He had a poet's mind, susceptible of the highest degree of literary polish, which, added to an exceptionally rapid and powerful reasoning faculty, gave him the first essentials of the ideal all-round journalist. Notwithstanding the constant view of the seamy side of things which the more or less behind-the-scenes life of the pressman gives, he retained till his last day on earth a perennial spring of enthusiastic interest in all public affairs. He had a human sympathy that nothing could daunt. Yet from the bizarre glare of the public limelight, Farrell's sensitive poet's nature shrank with an utterly unconquerable aversion. When the land value taxation boom, which carried the Reid Government into power in the middle nineties, was at its height, John Farrell, who by his writings had done more perhaps than any other man to produce that effect, was frequently pressed to go for Parliament. Albury had a standing invitation to him, and whomever the land value tax party nominated there in the old pre-Federal days got the seat. It was amusing to note the peculiar terror with which he used to recoil from the political snare when it was thus set before him. Yet I have known Farrell, after a night of hard journalistic work, when I was leaving the office to go home, commencing to reply at length to ten or a dozen correspondents in various parts of the State who had written to him for information on doctrinal points connected with the single tax. For years that was a regular thing. And having enlightened each one of them he would continue on during the small hours writing gratuitous contributions to the single tax paper, the publication of which without fee or reward he for years superintended.

He was able to earn a good income as incomes go, and no man down on his luck from whatever cause ever way-laid him on the office steps for “a loan” without getting it. Farrell had no appreciation of the value of money. A man of the most abstemious tastes, he wanted little for himself, and could not understand the passion for wealth-gathering. Although a born Bohemian, he was, however, an intensely domesticated man. His one idea of a day out was to take the children for a romp on the beach at Manly or Brighton-le-Sands. Farrell never seemed to get any older either in his appearance or in his views of life. He was not a healthy man, but in spite of that and fifty-three years' wear and tear in the mill of life, he had up till the day he died all the artless vivacity of an overgrown boy. His was the charity that thinketh no evil and even against the fate which often compelled him to do arduous mental work under severe bodily suffering he had not an unkind word to say or thought to think. His indomitable good humour could extract amusement even out of his own troubles, and although full of sympathy for every fellow bearer of life's burden and keenly sensitive to suffering in other people, the distressing rheumatic malady that frequently tortured him afforded material for many a quaint and curious jest.

Farrell often used to speak of death, which he regarded in the light of an interesting curiosity. He died as he always wished to die, suddenly, and without fuss. And fate in the end proved kind in sparing him the pain not of passing out into the dark, which would never have troubled him, but of witnessing the grief of those whom he was leaving behind. With John Farrell goes out one of the most unique personalities in Australian literature, and one the memory of whose simple, earnest, unselfish life will amongst those who knew him take long to fade.

SOME 17 or 18 years ago, when I was wont to regard the spilling of ink and the spoiling of paper as one of the finest entertainments available to humanity, I had contracted to read a paper on the subject of Land Nationalisation before a Goulburn debating society, the identity of which I have forgotten. By some means or other the syllabus of the society came under the notice of John Farrell, then in Lithgow, and feeling his way into journalism. He wrote to me, asking me to send him a report of the essay, and touched with cheery optimism and marvellous lucidity of thought on the economics of the Single Tax and the wonders that were in store for a humdrum, workaday world when the theories of Henry George should be put into practice. I myself had been carefully studying the economics of the “Prophet of San Francisco,” and had become a convert, and the friendship thus inaugurated lasted without intermission and without a shadow until Farrell quietly passed “to where beyond these voices there is peace.” I duly supplied him with a copy of the paper, and he expressed a wish to know me personally. Not long after I spent some weeks with him in the grimy town of Lithgow, and the good impressions his letter had created were more than realised when I met him face to face. A sweeter and more lovable personality it was never my lot to foregather with. Nothing ever seemed to ruffle the ineffable serenity of his soul. He looked on life with the broad comprehensiveness and toleration of a born philosopher, and there was nothing narrow or mean in his composition. He made no pretensions to be a public speaker—in fact he shrank from publicity in any form; but as a conversationalist I never met his equal. Negligently seated by his office table or with his feet in the fender by his homely fireside, he poured uninterruptedly forth quaint aphorisms, subtle criticisms of life, literature and politics, views that glittered with originalities, dreams of poesy—the whole suffused with a quiet, kindly humour that lost nothing from the touches of Irish brogue that clung to him to the very last. To be in his company for an hour when he was in the humour was like breathing the mountain airs. It was a spiritual tonic. One left him with kindlier opinions and a brighter hope for the future. His irrepressible optimism was the best of all remedies for the megrims which assail the professional journalist grown sick of the sordid intrigues of politicians and the monotonies of our every-day life. At uncertain intervals ever since my first acquaintance with him—for the strenuous press life is one that admits of but few holidays—I had the privilege of knowing Farrell with his coat off and his hair tousled in his own home. The same gentle equableness of temper that only saw the good side of things characterised him there as in his public life. Many a night I have travelled with him by the mid-night tram to Dulwich Hill after he had finished his work on the Daily Telegraph, and forgot the lapse of time as he lingered over his supper and held forth racily and characteristically on things in general. His shrewd, philosophical observations, his quaint turns of phraseology, his boundless charity towards all men worthy of it, his eminently sane criticisms—these made the hours glide by imperceptibly. The poet in him bubbled forth in all he did or said. It was an essential part of his being; but he never posed. He was as natural as a tree in the forest or a flower in the garden. The man was sincerity incarnate. He told me once that that only was poetry to him which sent a thrill along his spine; the rest left him unmoved. Then, even at one o'clock in the morning, and wearied with the day's heat and toil, he would take down a volume from his bookcase and read selections of the genuine article in a low, crooning, expressive voice, full of exquisite modulations, himself evidently forgetful of everything but the miraculous visions conjured up by the magic of the poet. These quiet hours of communion, when the city was asleep are amongst the most cherished of my recollections. They have helped me not a little. They taught me to look upon John Farrell as one of the noblest spirits ever linked in association with me.

On those profoundest questions of life over which every man who has been touched by modern scientific thought must commune with his intimates, Farrell and I had more than once or twice a serious talk. The purpose of the universe, the destination of man, the riddle of being, personality and its relations to the hereafter, death as the end-all or the portal to a newer and broader existence—these we discussed; or rather he did and I listened. These things are too personal and too sacred to be made the subject of a fleeting article in a newspaper, but they gave me another side of Farrell's personality, the memory of which will persist as long as life itself. I shall never forget the rapt, far-away reverent look in his eyes as he laid bare his inmost soul on these tremendous issues. While professing no specific creed so far as I know, he seemed always to have an absolute trust that the Maker and Keeper of the universe would do justly towards His creatures, remembering that we are but dust; and I have no doubt he died in that faith.
One thing has always struck me as pitiful. Perhaps, as a journalist myself, I see it more clearly in all its bearings than an outsider. It is that so gifted a soul, capable of leaving an indelible mark on our nascent Australian literature, should, for the last twenty years of his matured intellectual life, have buried himself in the anonymity of daily journalism, wasting his genius on evanescent criticisms of the sayings and doings of tenth-rate politicians. His rightful place was on the slopes of Parnassus, within cooey of the gods, and breathing the elysian airs of Paradise. The press is doubtless a wonderful institution, but it eats up the best of our kind like an insatiable ogre; and Farrell was a victim to its devouring appetite. Under happier auspices he would probably have touched high-water mark in Australian literature. As it is, the better part of his work has floated namelessly down the tide of time, the most of it already forgotten—for what can be staler than yesterday's leading article!

I have already spun this sincere tribute to the memory of a dead friend to a greater extent than I proposed; but when I put pen to paper one thought led to another, and I found it difficult to stop. Looking back over the years I recognise the profound wisdom and truth of those verses of Young—

The friendless master of a world is poor,
The world in purchase for a friend is gain.

We can do without riches, but the world would be indeed a gloomy prison were it not for friendship. Wherever in the illimitable universe to-day the soul of John Farrell may be I have little doubt it is well with it; and so, VALE.

T. J. HEBBLEWHITE.
Some Recollections of John Farrell.

F. C. Kendall

“COME in,” a mellow voice would shout as I tapped at the door of the den in the D.T. office overlooking King-street. “Sit down, and don't fall through that rickety chair ... and have you been writing anything? Nothing? Then there's nothing to be explained or forgiven.” And then we would drift into a gossip on recent books of which, strangely, none were ever seen in the den. John must have devoured them, as Charles Lamb used to, at the book-shops in the dinner hour. What a memory the man had for ephemeral works, too; nothing new escaped his notice.

None who knew Farrell can forget the charm in the rise and fall of the rich Celtic voice, the brogue not crude and aggressive as was his friend Dalley's, but dissolved in a cheery sort of intonation that won a stranger's heart to John right away. Nothing remarkable at first sight in Farrell. A broad-shouldered, sturdy man of medium height and business-like manner, with refined, small, and pleasant features, clean-shaven chin, drooping moustaches, broad forehead, and thick brown clustering hair; he might have been merely an editor, but when the right key was touched John was a higher being.

Business-like and benign, sharp and sentimental, practical and visionary, brewer and bard, the coiner of cold economic exactitudes and the dreamer who penned “How He Died”—Farrell's life was a type of kaleidoscopic Australia. He was wonderfully good company, and could make himself the centre of any group of worldly men. In the street he saw things quizzically. I remember remarking the throngs in King-street. “Yes,” he murmured, “they are simply redundant.” There was something Whitmanesque in his love of the crowd, and his hearty pagan appreciation of all sights and sounds. “Let us wallow” was his invitation one day to a lunch at the A.B.C., and there we talked poetry and single tax alternately for an hour, leading to the final conclusion by my dear friend that “Nothing mattered, anyhow!”—a frequent observation of his that I never quite fathomed the meaning of.

It gave him joy to discover anything, however fugitive, that was good. I have forgotten a hundred fragments which lived for me only while Farrell read them out above the clang of the cable tram and the cricket-board crowd in King-street below. Australian verse he took as “read,” although certain names were often on his lips. How much there was I might have asked him—and now—and now—Eheu! fugaces ... labuntur anni.
His devotion to ideals, not less exalted than, but utterly dissonant with literary pursuits, has left us with but a slender tablet to place to his memory on the walls of our Temple Beautiful. Yet there is some fine work carven there, and we who knew him will cherish it all the more. Remembering how much he worked and sacrificed for freedom and human enlightenment, how unselfish and genial was his friendship, we can scarcely realise yet that we may not meet him and clasp his dear hand again in the familiar sunny street, or hear again the cheery voice drawl as we turn to part—“Nothing—really—matters—annyhow!”

BRAVE brow of honour and frank eyes sans fear:
   Farrell, we knew thee for the Man thou wert,
   With kindliest speech, e'en to the dull and pert—
To flippant cynic and to quidnunc drear—
Oh, that large utt'rance, with its notes, strong, clear,
   As ocean currents, freighted with rich craft
   And gallant galleons, yet the meanest raft
Was to thy hailing not a whit less dear.

Broad, hearty, honest-hearted son of toil,
   With ready hands to help his fellows' need;
   Full of large love and splendid kinmanship,
We hail thee from our narrow marge of soil
   Across the Gulf, to where hearts no more bleed,
In port, if port there be, where souls do re-equip.
